The Concise Routledge Encyclopedia of the Documentary Film

The Concise Routledge Encyclopedia of the Documentary Film is a fully international reference work on the history of the documentary film from the Lumière brothers' Workers Leaving the Lumière Factory (1885) to Michael Moore's Fahrenheit 9/11 (2004).

Documentary film dates back to the last decades of the nineteenth century and has been practiced since then in every region of the world. This Encyclopedia provides a resource that critically analyzes that history in all its aspects. Entries examine individual films and the careers of individual filmmakers, but also include overview articles of national and regional documentary film history.

Previously published in three volumes, entries have been edited for the new, concise edition and two new entries have been added, on India and China.

The Concise Routledge Encyclopedia of the Documentary Film:

- discusses individual films, bringing together all aspects of documentary film.
- introduces filmmakers, including lesser-known filmmakers from countries such as India, Bosnia, China, and others.

- examines the documentary filmmaking traditions within nations and regions, including places such as Iran, Brazil, Portugal, and Japan.
- explores themes, issues, and representations in regard to specific documentary films, including human rights, modernism, homosexuality, and World War I, as well as types of documentary film such as newsreels and educational films.

This accessible concise edition provides an invaluable resource for both scholars and students. With stills from key films, this resource provides the decisive entry point into the history of an art form.

Ian Aitken is Professor, in the Department of Cinema and TV, Hong Kong Baptist University. He is the author of Film and Reform: John Grierson and the British Documentary Film Movement (Routledge, 1990, 1992), The Documentary Film Movement: An Anthology (Edinburgh University Press, 1998), The Cinema of Alberto Cavalcanti: Realism, Surrealism and National Cinemas (Flicks Books, 2000) and The Encyclopedia of the Documentary Film, three-volume set (Routledge, 2006).

Documentary film: an introduction

Ian Aitken

It is with great pleasure that I acknowledge the invitation to write this new Introduction to the Concise Routledge Encyclopedia of the Documentary Film. The original three-volume, hardback edition of The Encyclopedia of the Documentary Film appeared in 2006, and met with considerable acclaim. For example, the Encyclopedia was awarded the prestigious Dartmouth Medal by the American Library Association in 2006 for the 'outstanding work of reference of the year'. Unfortunately, the single-volume Concise Routledge Encyclopedia of the Documentary Film is unable to accommodate all that appeared in the original hardback edition of the Encyclopedia and, as a consequence, many entries have, necessarily, had to be excluded from the present edition. Readers interested in these entries are referred to the 2006 edition, which is widely available. The entries appearing in the Concise edition have, after some deliberation, been limited to those concerning films, filmmakers, and national traditions. Two new entries on India and China have also been added to the national traditions covered in the original work.

Given the necessary abridgement involved here, it might be assumed that the task of a new Introduction would be to provide an overview of the contents of the new work. However, this is not my intention, as I do not believe that such a summary would be especially enlightening, or useful. Instead, I intend to take the opportunity presented to me here to do something perhaps more trying: to think about the documentary film in general, and to reflect upon the nature, character, structure, purpose and role of the documentary film. In doing so, I also draw on my own theoretical interests, as set out in my trilogy of books on cinematic realism: European Film Theory and Cinema (2001), Realist Film Theory and Cinema (2006), and Lukácsian Film Theory and Cinema (2011). Rather than an overview, therefore, I intend to use this Introduction to reflect more generally on the documentary film, and I also hope that this modest contribution will play some role in initiating and escalating further debate on what I regard to be one of the most important of contemporary aesthetic media: the documentary film.

I The likeness of everyday occurrence

Documentary film is the founding genre of the cinema and, like still photography before it, the original imperative of that genre was to record existing human, social, physical and natural reality. Documentary film is thus, always was, and ever will be, intrinsically related to issues of realism and realistic representation, and this affiliation has certainly influenced the development of the medium up to the present day. The earliest films, shot by the Lumière brothers and others towards the end of the nineteenth century, were, as a consequence of this orientation, chiefly concerned to represent aspects of everyday life—the ephemeral life of the street—and, in doing so, these films also carried on some of the central traditions of nineteenth-century realist art, traditions that were deliberately concentrated upon the representation of the quotidian and low, rather than the elevated and eminent. In carrying through this intrinsically democratic-realist mission, these films also passed on one of the principal—perhaps the principal—aesthetics and representational accomplishments of photography: the preservation and perpetuation of moments of everyday life which would otherwise be doomed to fade into darkness within the ever-changing flux of perceptual experience.

For early spectators, therefore, the chief initial fascination with these films lay in the fact that those spectators were now not only able to see moments of everyday life approximately as they appeared within perceptual experience, but were also able to spend time reflecting on and considering those moments. For the first time, the rich, concrete tapestry of commonplace lived experience, with all its peculiar, surprising, evolving and information-rich particularities, had now been made lastingly visible, and the actual perceptible reality, within which all people are necessarily domiciled, had been made tellingly and unbrokenly manifest. ‘So that is what that street corner really looks like’, would have been the exclamation arising from spectators who may have passed by that same street corner in ‘real life’ a hundred times before. Here, what also distinguishes film from photography, of course—the crucial element that film adds to still photography—is the portrayal of the experience of temporal duration. Film now becomes much more like perceptual experience than the stationary images of photography: images that simply lack the humanity which the moving image is able to both invoke and evoke, by virtue of its ability to secure the human perceptual experience of duration. Of course, still photographs are also able to evoke a powerful sense of human essence, when observed by a spectator. However, the crucial difference here is that film is able to create a simulacrum of how human beings exist within perceptual experience—of how human beings experience life—and this simulacrum is also, essentially, documentary in essence. One provisional definition of the documentary film, therefore, might be that it is the type of film that embodies most fully a simulacrum of the perceptual experience of human existence, although, of course, not all documentary films can be accommodated within this definition, and some much more so than others.

The crucial and momentous ability that the documentary film possesses to portray the evolving material complexities of everyday life—what phenomenologists frequently refer to as the Lebenswelt, or ‘lifeworld’—was also to eventually come to fascinate both of the two major theorists of classical cinematic realism: André Bazin and Siegfried Kracauer. Bazin’s influential essay ‘The Morphology of the Photographic Image’, written shortly after the atrocities and carnage of World War II had become more conspicuously and chillingly apparent to the European consciousness, is permeated by the idea, one also shared with the larger terrain of post-war French existentialist thought, that contemporary man is increasingly alienated from the ever more cold-blooded contemporary world that surrounds him: the ‘machine world’ that was also portrayed so effectively in the art of the Weimar New Objectivity movement. However, the essay is also characterised by the idea that all men—from the beginning of time until the present—are also deleteriously affected by a human condition in which man is inexorably caught up within the flow of temporality, and is, unfortunately, unable to stand outside of that flow and arrest its relentless passage towards finitude. What Bazin referred to as the ‘corrupting’ effect of temporality, therefore, refers, in part, to an existential inability to hold on to phenomenological experience, and to genuinely and meaningfully encounter the ‘complex fabric of the objective world’ (Bazin 1967: 15).

For Bazin, the human experience of temporality is ‘corrupting’ in two ways. First, it is corrupting in that existence within temporal duration eventually leads to decline and death. Second, it is corrupting because we cannot ever really, as the saying goes, ‘grasp the moment’, but must always be predestined to observe that moment fall away from us. Bazin argues that there is little we can do about the first of these consequences of temporal corruption and decline. However, he does argue that film can do something about the second, and that the filmed sequence of images is able to portray and secure the perceptual experience of temporal duration, and thus allow us to encounter the ‘complex fabric of the objective world’ as it is experienced through time. As Bazin argues, in film a span of temporal duration is captured as ‘change mummified’, and the flowing of the present out of and into the past can be observed time after time, as a section of the once-having-been-present that has now become the past completely (what we see in the film sequence is something that has already happened, and is now in the past); this can, therefore, also be said to amount to a more consequential experience of totality than is ever available through a perceptual experience which is always characterised by ephemerality and fragmentation. In this sense, film can be said to compensate for that which is missing from perceptual experience—permanency—almost as though, as Bazin hints, the medium was brought into existence in order to fulfil this existential requirement and so advance the capacities of the human condition in an auspicious evolutionary manner. Such compensation is also documentary in essence, as Bazin insists that the filmed sequence should remain as close as possible to what he refers to as the ‘physiology of existence’: in other words, to our perceptual experience of reality (Bazin 1967: 133).

Taking the above into account, it can also be argued that the film sequence functions in an analogous way to human memory, which similarly links past and present into a unified whole. However, the act of memory—like the moment of perceptual experience—cannot, of course, be held on to for very long and, as argued above, such debility must again be distinguished from the immutability which characterises the film sequence. Despite this, it is possible to argue that there is a similarity in another sense between the act of remembering and the act of viewing the film sequence. For example, the act of remembering must also, and always, remain necessarily part of the present—that is, of present experience—because we can only remember from the site of the present moment; in a similar manner, the act of viewing the film sequence also remains located as part of the present, because we can only watch a film sequence from the site of the present moment. However, despite this similarity, a key difference must also be recognised here. In the act of memory, the person remembering is remembering his or her own past, whereas in viewing a film the spectator watches a picture of the past that is not part of his or her own past (unless we are talking about the untypical case of home movies). Film, therefore, broadens out beyond the individual in a way that memory cannot, and the act of viewing the film takes the individual out of his or her own individuality, rather than further into that individuality, and in so doing both possesses the capacity to challenge the preconceptions upon which such an individuality is founded and directs that individuality into the domain of social experience.

However, while such a challenge clearly has benefits, this process of raising up the spectator out of his or her own individuality, and of positioning the spectator within a more trans-individual context, is also problematic because it means that, unlike the act of memory, the spectator is not the sole protagonist involved in the experience of spectatorship, but must share that experience with something that already persists in itself and, in addition, as a totality: the material, fabricated film sequence. In memory there is only one totality involved, one which consists of the person remembering, and that which he/she remembers. However, in the act of spectatorship two totalities are involved, the first of which consists of the film sequence, which is complete unto itself, and the second of the union of film sequence and spectator in the act of spectatorship. The loss of creative sovereignty involved here, and concomitant propensity for manipulation entailed by a possible subordination of the latter of these two totalities to the first, has exercised many who have thought about the documentary film, and particularly so when such a film is perceived to be connected to an economic, industrial and ideological apparatus, as is the case with many documentary films made yesterday and today (the ‘official’ film, propaganda, the public relations film, etc.).

However, a more propitious outcome can also be envisioned here, and one that takes us back to an important similarity between the acts of spectatorship and of memory. The act of memory is surely an enlightening one, which is not only about remembering for its own sake, but is also meant to illuminate the present circumstances of the person who remembers, and to perhaps show the way forward. Given this, it can also be argued that the act of watching the documentary film has an analogous effect. The act of watching (rather than remembering) the past illuminates the present circumstances of the person who is watching, because the past world that is presented to us in the documentary film is different from our own, and is, therefore, capable of making us view our present world in a different light: as mutable and open to the prospect of change, rather than as unchallengeable and inevitable. Here the comparison with memory throws up something quite important: by virtue of this ability to show a realistic world which yet differs from the one within which we are domiciled, the act of watching a documentary film always has the potential to expand the critical insight and reflective powers of the spectator, or at the least shake that spectator up a little. Of course, the fiction film is also able to establish a 'world'. However, and as the philosopher Georg Lukács argues in other contexts and respects, the photographic foundation of the documentary film confers a certain 'authenticity' on the world established within the medium (Lukács 1987: 473).

In addition to this ability to show a different world to the one which we inhabit, the notion that film, and particularly, by implication, documentary film, is able to recover a transient or even lost world of human experience and then redirect our attention to that world, is also echoed in the writings of Siegfried Kracauer, who, like Bazin, also believed that the ordinary everyday life of the street was the proper domain of the film. In his Theory of Film (1960), for example, Kracauer argues that the way to escape from the abstract character of the modern condition is to experience the world in all its phenomenological richness: to return to the concrete and intermediate labyrinth of the Lebenswelt. As he puts it: 'there is no substitute for the direct perception of the concrete achievement of a thing in its actuality' (Kracauer 1997: 296). When discussing Paul Rotha's 1953 documentary film World Without End, Kracauer also echoes Bazin when he argues that the 'substance of the images' in a documentary film should exhibit the 'continuum of physical reality' (Kracauer 1997: 212), while the leading argument of Kracauer's Theory of Film is based on the notion that film is able to redeem the material world for us through its ability to replicate and portray perceptual experience.

In his writings on the cinema—writings that still remain relatively little known in the English-speaking world because they are written in German—the Hungarian philosopher and literary critic Georg Lukács also argued that film's 'closeness to life' (Lebensnähe) determined the aesthetic specificity of the medium. For Lukács, film possessed a 'photographic basis' which must be respected and, clearly, this amounts to a documentary-naturalist form of film theory. However, all three of these theorists also went beyond arguing that film could reveal reality, to argue that film also possessed the ability to render the ordinary as beautiful, mysterious, enchanting and resonant with human meaning. In a disenchanted world, characterised by alienation and manipulation, film—especially film of a documentary-realist character—could, therefore, become a medium of necessary enchantment; at the heart of such enchantment lies an ability to return man to the reality of concrete, phenomenological, actual existence—to what Kracauer calls 'physical reality', and Lukács the 'outside world', or Aussenwelt.

II The art of record

If documentary film is a medium that is able to show the reality of transient, empirical experience, and then 'embalm'—to use Bazin's term—such experience, it is also able to embalm experience that took place in the distant past, and is thus able to produce a long-standing record of times past. However, it also seems that, because of this predilection for the transient, in the long run what we find embalmed in the documentary film in a consequential manner is not the big issue, the historic event, but the miscellaneous elements of quotidian experience: what, for example, Kracauer referred to when discussing the documentary films of Louis Lumière, as the apparently inconsequential 'jumble of transient, forever dissolving patterns accessible only to the camera [...] the ripple of leaves in the wind [... these are subjects which film appears] predestined (and eager) to exhibit' (Kracauer 1997: 82–3). For Kracauer, such a predestination to demonstrate the impermanent is far from unimportant, and his conception of 'ante-room historiography', as set out in his posthumously published work History: The Last Things Before the Last, is also premised on the conviction that film should not show the 'last things'—the big issues and events—but the 'last things before the last'—the concrete, intermediate and apparently unimportant things which 'lie in the hollows between the lands we know'. Here, the importance of the documentary film lies in the ability of the medium to render-record that which 'lies in the hollows' that lie below that which we know, or what we are told to know: that which cannot be recovered through, or is generally disregarded by, other media bent on the portrayal of more evidently consequential matters.

The Battle of the Somme (Charles Urban 1916) was designed as a propaganda film, aimed at raising morale amongst the British people during a period in which many family members were being routinely slaughtered in the inhuman carnage of World War I. Admittedly, the film is a rather understated example of film propaganda, far removed from other, more jingoistic efforts that appeared at the time, such as the aggressively patriotic Our Empire's Fight for Freedom (1918). Nevertheless, and even taking this aspect of the film into account, The Battle of the Somme is not ultimately significant because of this propagandistic imperative—this 'last thing'—but because the film reveals aspects of human experience that may, in other quarters, be regarded as incidental, and which may also have faded from our knowledge had they not been represented in this film. What we observe here, in The Battle of the Somme, are images of real people, but in soldiers' uniforms, living within a milieu of trenches and violently disfigured landscape. We see how these individuals move about. We observe their dress and body language. We notice how they interact with each other, and with the physical environment of trenches, mud and bomb-destroyed landscapes. We monitor the subsistence of a living, though bygone, gestural idiom. These soldiers seem to smile a lot (though this may be induced by the unfamiliar presence of the then bulky camera apparatus), and what in fact is most moving and touching in these scenes of now long-dead men are these instances of commonplace, easy-going companionship and comradeship, and it is this ordinary world of value, rather than any rhetoric of war valour or instrumentality of purpose, which renders the film so important and still eminently watchable. In his book on World War II, the British historian Angus Calder referred to that conflict as the 'people's war', and his ground-breaking study focused on the experience of ordinary people in the conflict, rather than the activities of government and the high command. However, documentary film is, in a sense, always really a record of the people, rather than the elite and, while documentary film has, historically, always presented us with records of leaders and monarchs, these portrayals seem to matter far less in the end than the portrayal of an ordinariness which, in its captivating involvedness, never ceases to beguile. Countless examples could be given, but think only of the scene in Listen to Britain (Humphrey Jennings 1942) in which workers congregate in a staff canteen awaiting the performance of a song. What pulls you forwards here is the dishevelled temperament of their demeanour as they loiter aimlessly, occasionally spitting tobacco-tainted phlegm onto the muddled floor.

Extracts from the wartime films of the British documentary film movement are often used to illustrate expositions carried out in more contemporary films or television programmes that take as their subject World War II. Here, these extracts function both as a putative testimony to what happened, and as corroboration of the explanatory theses being deployed within the commentary and narrative, almost as though these extracts were somehow umbilically linked to both the place and time that they depict, and the diegesis of the later film within which they appear. However, of course, this is not the case and, correspondingly, these extracts cannot therefore be presumed to be either a testimony to historical real-world events or a substantiation of whatever is said and appears in the later film. Instead, these extracts must be conceived of as portraying events and aspects taking place at a particular place and time in relation to the representational imperatives and purposes of the original film, where that film was also premeditated as a unitary, purposive whole and not as a concoction of extracts, or source of primary data for unspecified future filmmaking. In addition, when that original film was made, it, and all within it, represented the present, not the past; this is a point that has important consequences for the documentary film, and which, therefore, will be returned to later.

The sort of 'insertion-as-testimony-and-substantiation' being discussed here sometimes happens, for example, in a television documentary film series on World War II such as The World at War (1973–74), where extracts from a film such as Britain Can Take It (1940) may be used to back up a construal of the London Blitz informed, at least surely in part, by an historical perception projecting backwards from the world view of the 1970s. At any rate, this documentary film series itself was definitely produced in the 1970s, not the 1940s, and for reasons, and with an agenda, that are quite different from the reasons and agenda that influenced Britain Can Take It. What we have here, therefore, at least at a philosophical level, is what might be described as an abstract disarticulation from the original film, in that these sequences are lifted entirely out of historical and filmic context, rather like pearls plucked from the ocean bed or diamonds cut out of the rock face. In addition, a different role has now been grafted onto these sequences—become—extracts. In Britain Can Take It, these sequences play the role of indeterminate descriptive portrayal, evoking the general atmosphere of the period, and do not really substantiate any particular point being made in the narrative or commentary. However, in some sections of The World at War, these extracts are more straightforwardly related to narrative and commentary, and this, in turn, means that they come to play a role in what is a primarily intellectual exercise; this is, as argued, not the role that they play within Britain Can Take It, where these sequences form part of a more organic whole, like diamonds embedded still in their native terrain. This problem becomes particularly evident in the first episode of The World at War, ‘A New Germany 1933–39’, in which an exposition on Hitler’s brutal rise to power is embellished with extracts taken from Leni Riefensthal’s Olympia (1936) and Triumph of the Will (1935), giving the impression almost that these extracts are sections of newsreel footage.

This is not to say that there is anything axiomatically wrong with the modus operandi utilised by The World at War, which is, arguably, one of the finest achievements of the documentary film, and anyway, as will be argued later, The World at War also uses extracts from other kinds of filmed material in different and more fruitful ways. Clearly, it depends on how the modus operandi is utilised. However, this is to say that the practice certainly invites reflection upon its consequences, because there is a conceptual difficulty involved here, in that a sequence is not the same as an extract and the two should not be confused, and there is also, perhaps, an ethical quandary, in that a degree of instrumental disingenuousness is involved. One answer to both of these problems, and one which will also be discussed later in relation to The World at War, when the issue of the structure of the documentary film is discussed, is to retain as much as possible of the sequence as sequence, rather than as extract—in other words to retain more of the sense of the sequence as something relatively autonomous and also, in some cases, as part of something much more extensive than the host film. In terms of the latter, this, for example, is something that The World at War manages to achieve when the historical footage used in the film is archival footage, rather than footage taken from a specific, autonomous work.

It can also be argued that the primary value of a film such as Britain Can Take It—and also the principal value of the film as record—lies not in the capacity of its sequences to be used either as testimony, or in order to substantiate one intellectual-interpretative point or another about the past made in a later film. Instead, at least in respect of the discussion here, the principal value of the film lies in its ability to portray elements of a particular and then currently present time and place within a constructed whole, so that what we see emanating from the diegesis of the film is the whole ‘world’ that then surrounded the film’s filmmakers and related agents. Britain Can Take It, like Triumph of the Will, allows us as modern-day spectators to intuit that ‘world’, and it is in this more indeterminate sense that the film constitutes a ‘record’ of the past. If the documentary film is an art of record, therefore, it is a form of record far removed from objectivist premises and imperatives, and it may even be possible to argue that the documentary film can never ‘prove’ anything at all.

What is also so revelatory about these sequences, from films such as Britain Can Take It, or, for example, from Humphrey Jennings’ Spare Time (1939), is how intrinsically humane the worlds that they capture appear to be; how genuinely humanitarian people appear to be within their everyday relations with each other and their environment; and it is also this underlying kindness that these films record. It is possible to believe that human society is a competitive jungle, characterised by a constant struggle to attain power and advantage and weaken rivals (anyone who works in a university will recognise this picture), but these documentary films seem to disclose something quite different to this: that whilst the pursuit of such calculating self-interest may indeed exist, underlying it is something far more extensive and prevailing. People shown running to catch a bus, as in Britain Can Take It, do not contend with each other, but are almost light-hearted and cooperative in their actions. Here, the documentary film seems to show us evidence of, and, in a sense, record, an actually existing reality, and may also, therefore, be used to contest a vision of human life based in a belief in the necessity of antagonism, manipulation, exploitation, trickery and deceit. Happy eighteenth-century Enlightenment philosophers such as Marie Jean-Antoine Condorcet once believed that all men were endowed with ‘an active and enlightened benevolence [and] a decorous and generous sensibility', and the documentary film sometimes seems to show that this might be the case (Aitken 2006: 10). Of course, the documentary film can also reveal the calculating duplicity that exists in human beings, but such duplicity may not be as widespread as has been thought.

As a form of record, therefore, the documentary film seems to be imbued with a humanist imperative, and is even able to make demagogues appear defective, apprehensive and tentative: in other words, human. Look closely, for example, at the shots of Adolf Hitler in Riefensthal's Triumph of the Will, a film that was meant to venerate the Nietzschean authority of the Führer and his party. What we actually see, though, is what Kracauer referred to in other respects as a 'man of skin and hair'—a man with a comical moustache, a stumbling gait, shifty eyes, and a coat that appears to be far too big and heavy for him—and this seeps out into the film, between those darkly lit episodes that attempt to extol a rhetoric of high xenophobia and chauvinism (oddly this undermining is also augmented by the choice of music used in the opening sections of the film: extracts from Richard Wagner's The Mastersingers of Nuremberg, which is, of course, a comedy). Of course, one of the ideological projects of the film was to make the Nazis appear congenial; however, this project is not always carried through and often fades into the portrayal of idiosyncrasy. The documentary film, therefore, seems able to excavate such frailties and incongruities almost as a matter of course, and although such a humanist imperative is much more noticeable when documentary film turns to the portrayal of the lower orders, and the suffering and destitute, it also seems to be intrinsic to the documentary film in general.

Of course, Hitler was an ogre, but his monstrous nature is something that is internal, rather than, for the most part, able to be displayed externally, and the documentary film chiefly shows what is external. Hitler does not particularly look like a monster in this documentary film, even though he may have been one in real life, and the portrayal of 'monstrousness', or evil, or, for that matter, epic adamant leadership, is not easily accomplished within the documentary film without, for example, the accompaniment of a detailed supporting commentary, which an important film such as Triumph of the Will does not possess. In many documentary films there is often a contradiction to be found between the images used and the narrative/commentary/plot that is employed, and whatever degree of bombast is being articulated in the commentary, the images remain essentially descriptive-empirical in character. This is not to say that Triumph of the Will intentionally seeks to subvert the Hitler myth, but it is to say that this does appear to happen at certain points in the film.

What this also amounts to is a point concerning the value of naturalism. As record, the documentary film seems most valuable in its indeterminate portrayal of the empirical and intermediate details of times past and present, and less valuable when such details are connected up to an over-dominant and controlling intellectual diegesis. Even when the subject matter involved is weighty—for example, the rise of Hitler and Nazism—the documentary film is better employed showing a whole 'world' in all its empirical detail, rather than placing emphasis on consequential, concept-laden subject matter. This is what Riefensthal achieves in Triumph of the Will, and also in her Olympia. It does not matter here if such portrayals are of things, nature or people, because, ultimately, everything is filtered through a human sensibility: we cannot escape the fact that every conception of reality is filtered through our human perspective. So, for example, in Joris Ivens' Regen (1929), shots of reflections in a river, or of raindrops falling into a pool of water, appear emotionally moving not because they are so in themselves, but because we relate these images to our emotional and visceral experience of reality. The poetry involved here is partly invoked by the fact that when we see this film, and these images, we realise that our general experience of reality is, as Kracauer argues, 'abstract', and that we have consequently failed to recognise qualities such as those captured in Regen. What we have in the documentary film, therefore, is an intensified empiricism in which the rich and complex detail that we would normally fail to notice in daily life is held up for our pleasure and scrutiny. At its best, therefore, and also as a type of 'record', the documentary film appears to be characterised by a form of indeterminate, empirical and intermediary naturalism, which attempts to show us a 'whole world', and invites us to intuit a whole world.

The quandary for the documentary film begins when the simulacrum of perceptual experience constituted by the film sequence must be inserted into a narrative structure of some sort. However, this is also, quite obviously, the point at which the film—as film—comes into existence. So, the documentary film is a necessarily and inherently problematical medium in that what lies at its essential centre—the representation of perceptual reality—loses its primacy once such representation become inserted into mechanistic narrative configurations drawn from other sources, whether those sources lie in the arts or the social and natural sciences. There is, therefore, ground present for a potential antithetical conflict here between the deployment of empirical sequences that preserve the continuum of human perceptual experience and a concomitant deployment of intermediary and abstract structures that negate that continuum; this antithesis between an unadulterated, unmediated model of the documentary film, and one that employs mediation to a greater or lesser extent, has driven many of the debates and controversies that have arisen around the development of the medium. In fact, it could even be argued that the question of which type of structure to adopt in a documentary film, and the issue of the impact of such implementation upon the simulacrum of perceptual experience which the film mobilises, has dominated documentary film studies since the earliest days. Should, for example, the documentary film be structured like a work of art, or like a scientific enquiry? Should the documentary film be highly structured, or structured as little as possible? Should the film disclose its principles of structuration, or is this not necessary? These questions related to structure have, historically, also dominated discussion of the documentary film within the field of film theory, often to the detriment of a contemplation of documentary film in terms of questions relating to the first two categories considered in this Introduction: the documentary film as simulacrum of the experience of perceptual reality; and the documentary film as record. Of course, these two areas are inevitably caught up in debates over how the documentary film should be structured, but the prevailing and widespread focus on structure often leads to a situation in which they are not addressed directly, nor sufficiently.

The question of what structure to adopt in the documentary film is also frequently, even perhaps at all times, raised in relation to the purpose of the documentary film: what is the documentary film for; what is/should be the objective in making a documentary film; and, related to this, what purpose can/should a documentary film be said to possess, irrespective of filmmaking intentionality? Some documentary films are made for entirely aesthetic purposes and, here, purpose and structure are primarily related to interactions within and the evolution of the aesthetic sphere. Films such as Walter Ruttmann's Berlin: Symphony of a Great City (1927), a combination of observed documentary and experimental filmmaking, have been characterised—and also sometimes criticised—as formalist-modernist films because of the emphasis they place on questions of aesthetic form and substance. However, the phrase 'formalist-modernism' is a contentious one, and modernism has both supporters and detractors. For the former an absolute engagement with the aesthetic could, as Theodor Adorno and others before him have argued, constitute a standpoint of rejection against the instrumentality and degradation of contemporary human existence. Even though Ruttmann (a former painter) himself may have had only or mainly formalist aesthetic intentions when making Berlin, this does not mean that other forms of meaning and significance cannot be attributed to the film, which, it could be argued, stands today as an example of Adorno's 'autonomous art': art that stands against the 'machine world'. Much the same can also be said about later so-called 'structuralist' experimental documentaries such as Larry Gottheim's Fog Line (1970), Malcolm Le Grice's Little Dog for Roger (1967), or Michael Snow's influential Wavelength (1967)—films that have also been disparaged for their alleged lack of social-political substance. Such films constitute an aesthetic practice founded upon freedom, creativity and the importance of art in a materialistic society.

A considerable number of documentary films produced today are, however, not examples of 'autonomous art', but are largely generic products, produced within the commercial or other marketplace, and largely destined for the various purpose of entertainment. The rapid expansion of cable and satellite television—not to mention the internet and various other forms of new information technology—has spawned a huge increase in such films, and a number of channels have also appeared that are dedicated to their dissemination. Many of these films do not so much challenge or critically analyse the status quo, as reinforce it. For example, many natural history films convey a rhetoric of life as a competitive jungle, marked by the survival of the fittest, which conforms without difficulty with the ideology and needs of contemporary globalising capitalism. One thinks of a Discovery Channel series such as Predators here, and this and similar series of documentary films also draw upon a familiar range of stock conventions drawn from the standard (and often sub-standard) Hollywood film and various other entertainment genres. However, this is not the full picture, at least in relation to natural history documentary films, and series such as Life on Earth use the highest standards of filmmaking to paint a more enlightening portrait of animal communities which habitually engage in forms of social and familial cooperation and support. In such series the metaphor of the survival of the fittest is still evident, but is mediated by more providential and genuinely educational themes.

At their best, documentary film series such as Life on Earth convey knowledge to us about the opulence and wonder of the natural world. Their purpose is to educate, enlighten and enthral, and also, sometimes, to make us become more environmentally aware and active. The same is also true, for example, of Arne Sückdorff's The Great Adventure (1954), and the undersea photography in Jacques Cousteau's The Silent World (1956) and World Without Sun (1964). These films also show us another 'world'—the animal world—which often seems to contain the sort of absolute values that we would seek to emulate, values such as lifelong companionship and dedication to the care of the young. Other series of films also attempt something of the same in relation to the structures of the physical world, and also the story of human history. Carl Sagan's Cosmos, and Kenneth Clarke's Civilization come to mind here. Such primarily 'educational' series also show us a past 'world', the intricacies of which exist beyond our present knowledge, and make us aware of how little we know of things.

Such films as these may have no overt political or ideological agenda, but they usually always have covert ones. In addition, they sometimes do very much have overt ones, and one thinks here of Joseph Bronowski's The Ascent of Man, in which Bronowski declares that the thought of Hegel led directly and inevitably to Nazism. Bronowski's remarks here reveal the sort of dislike of 'continental' European philosophy, which one also finds elsewhere in the Anglo-American tradition and in 'educational' television documentary series such as The Ascent of Man. In addition to such epic 'grand narrative' series as Civilization, other documentary film series seek in contrast to tackle more circumscribed historical events or periods. Outstanding examples here might be The Nazis: A Lesson from History, and the landmark achievement of The World at War. Here, in one of the undoubted masterpieces of the documentary film, an episode such as 'Red Star', which portrays the defence of Leningrad, reaches great heights of emotional and rhetoric power. Here, the emotions provoked are absolute ones, related to matters of extreme heroism and refusal to accept defeat in the face of overwhelming odds.

In addition to such films, which have a primarily—though by no means exclusively—educative or academic orientation, other documentary films have a much more direct political and ideological agenda, and in these films the desire to have an impact on the world and effect change is also inevitably much stronger. Some of these adopt the hybrid form of the documentary drama, and important examples here would be Cathy Come Home (Ken Loach, Tony Garnett, 1966), Culloden (Peter Watkins, 1964), Death of a Princess (Anthony Thomas, 1980) and Who Bombed Birmingham (Granada Television, 1990). It seems, though, that the documentary drama is not so effective in dealing with situations that occur at the nationwide level, perhaps because the extent of reconstruction required tends to turn the work into more of a feature film than a documentary: they become feature-drama documentaries. Consequently, those documentary films that have more effectively turned to address national-political situations have tended to be far more obviously and classically documentary in format. Examples here would be The Battle of Chile (Patricio Guzman, 1975–7), the highly committed Cuba Sí! (Chris Marker, 1961), and the remorselessly committed The Battle of Algiers (Gilo Pontecorvo, 1966). The primary purpose of these and similar films is to speak up and out on behalf of the weak and defenceless, the dispossessed and the oppressed, and, in doing so, these films exhibit one of the central principled charges of the documentary film.

At one level, the documentary film of genuine substance must seek to inform, educate and, possibly, also entertain (though 'entertainment' does not seem to be medium-specific to the documentary film), but the documentary film is often, at its best, also endowed with an ethical imperative to defend and seek redress for those who are treated unjustly, to bring such unwarranted conduct to the attention of the local, national and international community, or, at the least, to raise up the disadvantaged into the sphere of representation. It was this latter objective, for example, which characterised the films of the British documentary film movement, in films such as Drifters (John Grierson, 1929), Housing Problems (Arthur Elton and Edgar Anstey 1935), and Coal Face (Alberto Cavalcanti, Basil Wright and others 1935). In this mission, documentary film can also be compared with the best investigative journalism, although, of course, unlike such journalism, the documentary film is also an aesthetic medium. Like the best investigative journalism, documentary film is also rarely particularly effective when used as an instrument of the ruling powers. Eventually, all documentary films that function as propaganda on behalf of one dominant group or another come to seem ridiculous and an object of scorn.

This ethical purpose of the documentary film also returns us to the matter of structure and to the question of what form and structure it would be best to adopt in order to realise this purpose, which also takes us into the realm of documentary film theory and practice. One of the unquestionable masterpieces of the documentary film is Dziga Vertov's The Man with a Movie Camera (1929). Vertov's film is, of course, far less important for its ideologically affirmative portrayal of the newborn Soviet Union than it is for its affectionate evocation of the lives of ordinary Russian people as they go about their various businesses during the course of a single day. Vertov wishes to present a panoramic view of everyday life in his film, and in order to achieve this he adopts a form of lateral, rather than linear editing, which allows him to portray a great many people and activities. Of course, Vertov's mission to raise up the image of the masses was, in theory, concomitant with the then dominant ideology within the Soviet Union. However, Vertov's modernist hierarchy-less, warts-and-all populism went too far, as far as the authorities were concerned, and propelled him into exile in the Russian outback.

The Man with a Movie Camera carries on the documentary film's representational mission to portray the lower classes, and the same can be said of the films of the British documentary film movement, some of which have already been mentioned. A film such as Spare Time (Humphrey Jennings, 1939), for example, adopts a similar lateral style as Vertov's film, though on a much smaller scale and without the formalist montage editing that characterises The Man with a Movie Camera. Instead, an impressionistic, observational style is employed, drawn from Jennings' involvement in the Mass Observation movement of the 1930s, and a paradoxical style is also employed, drawn from the filmmaker's familiarity with surrealist art. Other films made by the documentary film movement adopt a variety of styles, including the symbolic Soviet montage-inspired style of Drifters, the lyrical poetic naturalism of Song of Ceylon (Basil Wright 1934), and the social realism of Fires Were Started (Jennings 1943). However, whatever the style employed, the same underlying intention to portray the lower classes is always evident within these films, and virtually all the films of the British documentary film movement. Much the same can also be said of the committed Marxist filmmaker Joris Ivens, who combines montage editing, documentary naturalism and a socialist-realist style in films spread as far apart as The Spanish Earth (1937) and How Yukong Moved the Mountains (1976).

From the 1960s onwards debates then taking place within film studies began to spill over into the area of the documentary film. One consequence of this is that various influences, including that of Soviet montage theory, the work of Bertolt Brecht, and 'screen theory', led to the production of documentary films that sought to intentionally foreground their technical structures and ideological imperatives. From that point on, the 'reflexive' documentary film then became an important filament in the history of the documentary film. One of the earliest, and also most historically important, of these films was Jean Rouch and Edgar Morin's Chronique d'un été/Chronicle of a Summer (1961), in which Rouch sets out how his film was conceived and made, and then invites the subjects he has filmed to pass their opinion on the finished article. Various filmmakers have since followed this and similar reflexive approaches, including Nicholas Broomfield in his The Leader, the Driver and the Leader's Wife (1991), Michael Moore in his Fahrenheit 9/11 (2004), and others. However, the reflexive documentary, and the related 'performative' documentary, has always (and probably always will) remained a minority genre, perhaps because of the extent to which reflexivity inevitably disrupts the coherent diegesis of the film. As argued earlier, it is the evocation of a complete 'world' which is often important in the documentary film, and reflexivity is sometimes inimical to this.

Another approach to documentary filmmaking which developed in the late 1950s and 1960s, in many respects contrary to the reflexive approach, was based on the conviction that the documentary film should not only attempt to mask, rather than reveal, its structures, but also possess as little structuration as feasibly possible. Here, the underlying presumption was that a more 'objective' account of a situation could be achieved if whatever had been filmed had not been affected at all by the process of filmmaking, and if it could be verified that the same situation would have occurred exactly as it had whether the camera had been present or not. In order to achieve this degree of detachment the documentary film would not so much attempt to portray as record a situation. Underlying this notion of filmmaking is an inductive-empiricist theory of knowledge based on two principal premises: first, that a more 'objective' interpretation of a particular phenomenon can be achieved if no a priori pre-existing suppositions are imposed upon that phenomenon; and second, that only limited, rather than general or abstract, extrapolations should be derived from the observation of that phenomenon. According to this model, methods must be devised through which the subjectivity and mindset of the interpreter of the phenomenon are constrained to play only a minor role in that interpretation and, when this occurs, that interpretation will possess a higher epistemic value than that which is produced as a consequence of bringing more complex and abstract levels of supposition to bear.

When this empiricist model of knowledge was transplanted into the realm of the documentary film a new kind of 'observational', or 'direct', film appeared in which, or so its practitioners argued, the filmmaker's intrusion into events was reduced to a minimum, the events filmed appeared as they would have had the camera not been present, and the final edited structure of the films arose from the inner logic of the events and situations themselves. In order to facilitate this, a new mode of film shooting and editing was also employed, in which the filmmaker embedded himself or herself within the shooting location for extended periods of time, to the point at which, it was believed, the filmmaker ceased to have any influence on circumstances. Around this period (the late 1950s) new, more portable filmmaking equipment had also appeared, which enabled the filmmaker to interact more closely with the subjects and events being filmed, and also additionally enhanced the possibility that the filmmaker would be able to avoid influencing events less than had been the case when earlier, more bulky equipment had to be employed. After shooting, the film would then be edited in such a way that the narrative structure that emerged conformed as closely as possible to the linear development of the events that had taken place, so that the film reflected the essential structures of those events.

The American 'direct cinema' films of the 1950s and 1960s sometimes went to extreme lengths in carrying out this empiricist project, as, for example, in Andy Warhol's deliberately experimental Sleep (1963), a film of a man sleeping, in which there is no editing, hardly any camera movement, and in which commentary, plot, story and even titles are completely absent. Warhol's film also emerges from a context of post-war 'conceptual art', in which the artist followed intellectual premises regarding the formation of the art object to their logical conclusions. However, in the main, the bulk of films that constituted American direct cinema were not closely associated with the movement of conceptual art, and did employ the various cinematic devices eschewed by Sleep, although because of the predominance of their empiricist orientation, these films tended to give a lesser priority to such devices than observation of the events portrayed. That empiricist approach also led these films to excel at rendering detailed and intimate—and often surprisingly revelatory—portrayals of individuals and their immediate reactions with each other and their environments. For example, Primary (Don Pennebaker and others, 1960) followed closely the Wisconsin primary contest between Hubert Humphrey and John F. Kennedy, showing the often contradictory and chaotic relations and events that took place during the primary. Here, the primary appears not so much as an integral component of the democratic process, as an almost tribal affair with its own internal—and highly animated—protocols. Similarly, The Chair (Robert Drew and Richard Leacock 1963) explores the dramatic and tense interactions and uncertainties evident within a cast of characters—real people—who are caught up in one way or another with the execution—of a real man—to be carried out by electrocution. The films of Frederick Wiseman also fall into this category, although Wiseman eschews the dramatic events favoured by Pennebacker, Drew and Leacock in favour of portraying the micro-complexities of the everyday and mundane, as for example in his Law and Order (1969), which centres on some of the more idiosyncratic aspects of routine police work.

However, just as a pure empiricist theory of knowledge is untenable, so also is a pure empiricist conception of the documentary film. As virtually all philosophers would avow, it is not possible to transcend subjectivity in order to reach the ‘truth’, just as we are unable to step outside of our conceptual schemes in order to encounter reality directly. In practice, therefore, the films of direct cinema were all influenced, in one way or another, by the presuppositions of the filmmakers involved, as well as by background ideological formations, and were unable to encounter reality in an unmediated fashion. These films also drew on a whole host of narrative and other conventions in developing their structures, and this, in turn, meant that those structures could not replicate the structures of the real-world events taking place in front of the camera. Real-world events do not and cannot possess a definite structure: they are part of the indeterminate generality of the lifeworld, or Lebenswelt. In this sense one can also say that, philosophically speaking, Warhol was perhaps on the right track with Sleep. Warhol apart, though, the danger that lies here, within the ideological orientation of direct cinema, and one which makes that cinema both problematical and controversial as a mode of documentary filmmaking, is both twofold and important. First, by focusing on immediate interactions, these films tend to reduce context to a minimum and, while the documentary film is well suited to portray immediate interactions, the presentation of context is also central to the medium’s role.

Second, by attempting to transcend the subjective inclinations and ideology of the filmmaker, they also disguise, or leave aside, the extent to which intentionality and subjectivity play a necessary and determining role in any form of filmmaking, including the documentary film. The gate is now open for premeditated manipulation

In terms of the epistemic and moral mission of the documentary film outlined earlier, both of these factors constitute clear and present danger. However, arguing that the underlying theoretical model of direct cinema is untenable is not the same as arguing that this form of filmmaking itself is disreputable, and, as has been argued earlier, the empirical focus of the direct cinema model is both fundamental and indispensable to the documentary film. What is of most value in this approach also takes us back to the classical theories of cinematic realism, in Bazin, Kracauer and others. What this type of direct cinema can do is preserve moments and sections of everyday life which would otherwise be doomed to fade into non-existence within the ever-changing flux of perceptual experience. This ‘mummified’—to use Bazin’s phrase—naturalism, which allows us to see and be amazed—or appalled—by aspects of experience to which we would otherwise not have access, or would not have noticed in any meaningful way or contemplative manner, is an essential ingredient of the documentary film and lies at the heart of some of the greatest achievements of the medium. What, therefore, seems to be of primary importance here is that these films can present us with information that goes beyond our pre-existing, often stereotypical understanding of a particular subject, and in doing so these films expand our understanding and make us more knowledgeable about the world around us. As Frederick Wiseman put it:

You start off with a little bromide or stereotype about how prison guards are supposed to behave or what cops are really like. You find that they don’t match up to that image, that they are a lot more complicated. And the point of each film is to make that discovery.

(Bordwell and Thompson 1994: 695)

Wiseman’s hoped for ‘discovery’ points to what can be, in certain circumstances, genuinely illuminating about the documentary film, though, of course, the character of the ‘complications’ he discovers will always be influenced to a certain extent by his own pre-existing bromidic-stereotypical understandings, whether he believes that to be the case or not. In addition, his portrayal of individual complicated cops will not necessarily tell us much about the institution of the American police force as a whole. Bearing these difficulties in mind, it is worth returning to the argument made earlier, that the truly, or even predominantly, naturalist documentary film potentially possesses the two foreseeable dangers referred to previously: that of disguising ideological positions, and limiting the representation of context. This is also why in its attempt to overcome both of these dangers, while retaining an effective naturalist emphasis and adding to our understanding of the culture and people it portrays, Chronique d'un été remains one of the classic films of the documentary cinema.

In many respects the reflexive documentary and the observational documentary represent the Alpha and Omega of the documentary film. However, in addition to these two paradigms of the documentary film, neither of which can be realised in a pure form in any particular film anyway, a number of identifiable genres can also be discerned within the field of the documentary film, and perhaps the most historically important of these is the 'interview film', which often, though not always, also uses archival materials alongside the interviews it displays. In these films interviewees are allowed to have their significant say and the interviewer or narrator does not overly govern proceedings. The objective here, for many of these films, is to break with the omniscient—and conventionally prevailing—'expository' 'voice-of-God' narrative, in which an account or interpretation is given from a singular—and often officially sanctioned—perspective, or in which two or more accounts are given and then are brought into cohesion through a 'balancing' commentary and narration. In both cases here an order is imposed upon the subject and, inevitably, the disposition of such order will reflect institutional authority and dominant ideology, especially so in the age of the television documentary film.

Many of the interview-based documentary films that appeared from the 1970s onwards, after the worldwide advance of television, attempted to dispense with such an overall 'order' and, instead, present a more indeterminate understanding of their subjects. Many of these were also influenced by the New History movement, which also came to prominence during the 1970s. Here, historians attempted to develop histories of everyday life, rather than of high events and noble persons. It is, perhaps, because of this historiographic influence that many of these interview films also link past, present and memory using historical archival footage of the everyday past; in these films the testimonies of commonplace, individual people are linked to a past, and also largely elapsed, and indeterminate world of the everyday.

There is also a crucial distinction to be made here between these interview-based films and other types of documentary films which also use filmed extracts to illustrate their exposition. In such latter films, and as also argued earlier, a sequence is taken from a pre-existing film—which has a particular logic and coherence of its own—and is then inserted into the body of the host film in order to illustrate the exposition being mobilised by that film. However, as previously maintained, this is in fact a disingenuous and misleading type of illustration because the original footage was both intended and structured to illustrate another and completely different exposition, and may even not have directly illustrated any exposition at all but, rather, had the purpose of accompanying or even contradicting that exposition (if the original film even had an overall exposition). On the other hand, the footage used in the interview films being discussed here is largely archival: part of a huge, indeterminate body of filmed sequences which were originally shot as record, or in the case of war footage, with, at least initially, only vaguely formulated propaganda intentions in mind, or for no particular purpose of any consequence at all. Most of this footage was, therefore, never part of any pre-existing filmic-compositional totality. In addition, in these interview-based films the archival footage is not generally used in an illustrative manner but mainly exists partly in its own right and character, as an extract from a corpus—a sampling taken from the indeterminate historical materials record of filmed everyday life.

The most important of these interview-based films may, as argued earlier, be The World at War (Thames Television 1973–6), a film of twenty-six episodes and thirty-two hours in length. A breakthrough in British documentary film's attempt to represent World War II, the film adopts the perspective of the New History movement in consisting to a substantial extent of interviews given by commonplace people, rather than major political figures, and also employs an extensive range of archival footage, including home movies, instructional footage and captured enemy footage, as well as—as previously discussed—extracts from films such as Britain Can Take It, Triumph of the Will, and others. In a similar way, another landmark film, Marcel Ophuls' The Sorrow and the Pity: Chronicle of a French City Under the Occupation, also consists largely of interviews, and although some of these interviews are of dignitaries, the film largely consists of interviews with the man and woman in the street and focuses on everyday relationships to the Occupation. As the title suggests, The Sorrow and the Pity is an emotionally charged film, which forces participants to confront the sorrow and the pity of collaboration and betrayal. In both this film and The World at War, interviews and archival materials work together to show a sometimes emotionally overwhelming human-social reality of heroism and fearfulness, anguish and achievement, order and confusion.

It could be argued that these archival-interview films correspond more closely to the epistemic and moral imperative of the documentary film than perhaps almost any other kind of documentary film, and it is perhaps no accident that it is here that some of the most powerful examples of the medium have emerged. It has been argued earlier that the documentary film is most suited to explore the interstices of everyday human, animal and natural life. Clearly, the interview film which focuses on the everyday and the ordinary lends itself to this mission and supposed aesthetic specificity. The archival-interview film can bring Kracauer's 'terra incognita' into view, and present the voices of the oppressed and those treated unfairly. At their best, interview-based documentaries also do not seek some mythical 'balance' but display their preferences openly. The humanist-ethical stance of The World at War, The Sorrow and the Pity, and, another landmark achievement, Claude Lanzmann's twelve-hour long Shoah (1985), is, for example, openly evident. However, the interview film is not restricted to a humanist paradigm, and films such as Harlan County, USA (Barbara Kopple, 1976) and The Life and Times of Rosie the Riveter (Connie Field, 1980) reveal a clear social class and feminist agenda, respectively. In all of these films the interface between interviews and archival footage is, of course, handled in different ways. For example, in The World at War there is an overall commentary and the witnesses who appear are not normally cross-examined in any way. In Shoah, on the other hand, the director, Lanzmann, is often present, challenging as well as guiding his interviewees. Despite these distinctions, however, all these films can be linked together into a format which places indeterminate interview materials in conjunction with indeterminate archival materials, and which is also driven by a strong sense of purpose.

In addition to the three types of documentary film that have been discussed in the present section of this Introduction—the reflexive, direct and archival-interview film—other sub-genres of the documentary film are, of course, also identifiable, but can, unfortunately, only be referred to in passing here, given limitations of wordage. These would include the compilation film, such as Fredric Rossif's To Die in Madrid (1963), and many of the films of the British documentary film movement. They would also include the documentary film of primarily personal expression, which may be found in the work of the British Free Cinema movement and in the work of filmmakers as diverse as Chris Marker, Alain Resnais, Georges Franju, Werner Herzog and many others. It is not possible to cover the work of these and other filmmakers here, and readers are referred, instead, to the various entries within this Encyclopedia. Instead, it may be more appropriate to conclude this brief Introduction with a conjecture concerning the present and future role of the documentary film.

IV In conclusion: the role of the documentary film

The documentary film, today and tomorrow, has, and will continue to have, many roles to play. Many of these relate to the spheres of entertainment, commerce and uncomplicated gratification, and these are certainly significant domains. Beyond this, though, what are and will be the most imperative of these roles? The contemporary dominance of television from the 1960s onwards means that most documentary films are commissioned by, produced by, or shown on some form of television outlet. Often, these outlets are controlled by nation-states, capitalist corporations or a combination of both. Where the controllers of these outlets are enlightened, say—and to take a by no means unequivocal example—in the public broadcasting services of advanced, capitalist, liberal-democratic nations, the ideal role of documentary film should be to stay close to the mission of the documentary film as set out earlier: that is, to challenge the abuse of power, struggle to overcome injustice, defend the weak and powerless, and communicate information in a sophisticated, disinterested and impartial manner, taking into account the existence and authentic needs of a wide spectrum of types of persons, in terms of race, social class, ethnicity, gender, belief and other factors. However, even in such supposedly advanced nations, dominant relations of power and influence work against the realisation of such a mission, and, in these circumstances, where inequality and injustice is still ubiquitous, the documentary film will have to maintain a forcefully independent character and not shy away from the articulation of uncomfortable avowals.

In other countries, authoritarian and repressive nations of various sorts, which control their media and make that media work in the interests of the powerful, the mission of the documentary film may only be fulfilled by taking on the role of a covert fifth column or by going underground to a substantial degree. Today, documentary film is an important and essential vehicle for social and political change and protest in many countries around the world, where filmmakers often take great risks in order to stand up for the various victims of the current world order. New technology has also made it much easier—and much safer—for independent, underground networks of documentary filmmaking to persist. For example, in China an important movement of independent documentary filmmaking exists which challenges the blanket control that the Communist Party imposes upon the Chinese media and, ultimately, the Chinese people. This form of activity involving the documentary film is being repeated in many parts of the world today and needs to be encouraged. In this sense, the documentary film could become crucially important in the near future as an instrument for progress. The rulers of the contemporary world order will do whatever they can to maintain their power and authority and keep uncomfortable ideas that challenge that power and authority out of the public sphere. The German philosopher and heir to the German philosophical critique of modernity, Jürgen Habermas, has argued that Enlightenment values such as universal freedom and communicative rationalism are the instruments best able to deconstruct the forms of instrumental rationality which dominate and characterise contemporary experience; if this is so, then the documentary film must be part of that process. The documentary film must be both communicative and activist, in relation to the personal, social and globalised spheres.

Apart from this crucial role, documentary film also has a phenomenological and existential role to play in bringing us back to the material world. Siegfried Krakauer argued that the modern individual's experience of her/himself was an abstract one and, as has been argued earlier here, all the major theorists of cinematic realism comment on this abstract nature of the human condition. All of them, in one way or another, also emphasise the importance of film in bringing us back to the one thing that really exists: the present moment, in all its richness and reality. The documentary film is the aesthetic medium par excellence best suited to achieve this outcome, and here the documentary film takes on a utopic dimension. This is not to argue that the documentary film should be prescribed, like a medicinal drug, to persons suffering from various psychological disorders. It may never happen that 'documentary film therapy', like taking-a-holiday therapy, becomes established as a form of curative treatment; however, it is to argue that there is something essentially beneficial about watching a documentary film because, for once, one is faced with the rich and fascinating tapestry of the real world as we actually experience it. The world and our experience of it ceases to become abstract or manipulative, and the world in which we actually persist reveals itself as essentially purposeless and unmanipulative, and as consisting of a plethora of things available for our pleasure and enlightenment. As Georg Lukács put it in his The Specificity of the Aesthetic (1963), film is able to bring the Aussenwelt (outside world) up to the level of the human world so that we are better able to understand our authentic existential condition. If that is true of film in general, it is even more true of the documentary film. The documentary film also has an aesthetic role to play. In his ground-breaking 1913 article, 'Thoughts Toward an Aesthetic of the Cinema', Lukács asserts that film can show us a poetic aesthetic vision of reality. Let the last word be his:

The livingness of nature here acquires artistic form for the first time: the rushing of water, the wind in the trees, the stillness of the sunset and the roar of the storm, as natural processes, are here transformed into art [...] Those achievements of modern technology that are irrelevant to every great art will also become powerfully fantastic and poetic here. For the first time, in the 'cinema'—to give but one example—a car can become poetic, as in a romantic and thrilling pursuit involving other cars. In this way also the common bustle in the street and in the market place acquires a powerful humor and an elementally forceful poetry.

Abel Gance: Yesterday and Tomorrow

(France, Kaplan, 1962)

Abel Gance: Yesterday and Tomorrow is the dubbed version of Abel Gance, hier et demain, produced by the Office de Documentation par le Film and directed by Nelly Kaplan.

In the 1960s the motion picture rose to prominence as a key medium of expression. A newly focused and invigorated interest in the movies manifested itself both in new styles of filmmaking and the study of cinema's history. This generation questioned current cinematic conventions, watched old motion pictures, and identified with forgotten filmmakers and cinematic icons. An important outcome of this renaissance was a new appreciation for the art of the silent cinema. This audience was particularly receptive to Abel Gance: Yesterday and Tomorrow, which championed a rediscovered genius and his neglected silent masterpieces.

Nelly Kaplan, the director of Abel Gance, was in the vanguard of this new generation of film enthusiasts. Born in Buenos Aires in 1934, Kaplan abandoned her studies in economics at the University of Buenos Aires because of her fascination with film. She went to Paris as a representative of the Argentine Film Archive, and found employment as a film journalist writing for Argentine newspapers.

Shortly thereafter, in 1954, the 20-year-old met Abel Gance and worked as an actor, assistant director, and collaborator on a number of his film projects. A second unit camera operator on Gance's feature film, Cyrano et d'Artagnan (1963), Kaplan used footage of the 74-year-old filmmaker taken on the set to frame the flashback of his life and career in Abel

Gance: Yesterday and Tomorrow, which was made that same year.

In this dubbed version of Abel Gance, hier et demain, an English speaker provides a first-person account of the filmmaker's story. Recognized as a great technical innovator as well as an artist, Gance tells us that he invented prototypes of Cinerama and stereophonic sound. As his cinematic achievements are identified, film clips support his claims. We see examples of Gance's use of montage in his La Roue (1921). Yet, despite the quality of his cinematic innovations, Gance claims that the studios were initially reluctant to support his style of filmmaking. With the advent of sound in film, the director was no longer encouraged to make silent films, which he preferred to make. When asked to work for Adolph Hitler during the war, he fled to Spain. Gance did not make another film for over ten years.

Abel Gance: Yesterday and Tomorrow ends with Gance discussing his later work as a director, his disappointment with the current cinema, and his dreams of once again making sensational motion pictures in the future.

Abel Gance: Yesterday and Tomorrow presents its subject as a living treasure still capable of great work, one of the cinema's great innovators. Although her motives are understandable, Nelly Kaplan's narrowly focused concern that Gance be recognized as a hero of the cinema has its drawbacks. The constant emphasis on Gance's cinematic accomplishments to the exclusion of everything else hinders us from knowing him as a person. The limiting effect of offscreen narration, which could have been relieved by having Gance occasionally speak on camera, particularly accentuates our feeling of being distanced from the subject and prevents us from experiencing some sense of intimacy with Gance as a human being.

One way in which the interested viewer can get a better sense of Abel Gance as a person is to watch the other important documentary on the filmmaker from this period. Kevin Brownlow's 1968 production of Abel Gance: The Charm of Dynamite centers on a trip that Gance made to England in 1965. This documentary uses extensive interviews with the filmmaker to underscore the importance of his films. Abel Gance: The Charm of Dynamite also documents the beginning of Kevin Brownlow's lifelong pursuit of reconstructing Napoleon, a quest that confirmed Napoleon as one of the major accomplishments of the silent cinema.

Both Abel Gance: Yesterday and Tomorrow and Abel Gance: The Charm of Dynamite capture a 1960s cineaste's excitement in recognizing the art of a neglected major silent filmmaker. These documentaries also put Abel Gance in the select company of such maverick geniuses of the motion picture as D.W. Griffith, Erich von Stroheim, Sergei Eisenstein, and Orson Welles. Lauded today for his innovative cinematic achievements, Gance ultimately was denied the freedom to make motion pictures the way he wished, as his iconoclastic vision could not be supported by the film industry.

Act of God

(UK, Greenaway, 1980)

One of the most controversial and innovative filmmakers of the British film renaissance of the 1980s, Peter Greenaway is a director of fiction films, documentaries, and TV programmes; a painter; and an author of essays and novels. His very distinctive poetic universe is characterized by a proliferation of details and references, and is driven by an encyclopaedic ambition. Fiction features such as The Belly of an Architect (1986), Drowning by Numbers (1988), and The Pillow Book (1996) alternate in his filmography with documentaries that, for their utter originality, are situated at the limits of the genre. He often employs the form of the documentary either to represent something true but futile, as in Dear Phone (1977), or Water Wockets (1975), to tell a fictional story through absolutely neutral images of a series of rivers and ponds. As Jorge Luis Borges does, Greenaway applies a scientific language to nonscientific topics, considering the language of science itself as articulated in essay writing, in Darwin's books, and in mathematical formulae as a form of narration.

Act of God is a twenty-six-minute film made for Thames TV as part of a series produced by Udi Eichler. It consists of an investigation into the elusive nature of the phenomenon of lightning, through a series of filmed interviews with people who, from 1966 to 1980, were struck by lightning in various European locations. Act of God was presented at several international festivals, including Edinburgh, Chicago, and New York, and won prizes as Best Documentary at the festivals of Melbourne and Sidney. Made with his regular collaborator, musician Michael Nyman, Act of God is a documentary that, for its subject matter and aesthetic characteristics, is perfectly consistent with the filmmaker's artistic world and, in particular, with the obsessive cataloguing effort, which has always been at the core of his project. Act of God, in fact, confirms Greenaway's passion for taxonomy and categorization, which previously emerged, for instance, in the documentary The Falls (1980), the result of lengthy research carried out in the attempt at producing a sort of encyclopaedia of humanity, a gargantuan effort evocative of Borges.

In Act of God, Greenaway tries to classify and understand the most unclassifiable and unpredictable event on the face of the Earth. Always looking for the point in which all the lines of the world converge and everything happens simultaneously, he searches for a mathematical formula for lightning, which he tries to extract from the numbers that recur in the different accidents, keeping into account the site, the date, and the precise time when the lightning struck, the weight and shoe size of the victim, and anything the subject was carrying or wearing at the time. Greenaway makes a list of all the numbers and objects, but also includes advice deriving from popular belief, thus ironically mixing and granting the same importance to science and to folklore, in tune with his postmodern stance.

Act of God is composed of thirteen interviews with victims of lightning who are asked to describe in detail their experiences and the circumstances that preceded and followed the accident. Searching for a manifestation of God in the discovery of the presence of coherence even in the most absolutely indeterminate event, Greenaway is particularly interested in finding out whether and how intensely the victims believed that their accident had a religious meaning and saw it as a divine punishment. Finding that they did not, Greenaway suggests how these extraordinary instances have happened to ordinary people, who failed to interpret them as exceptional events, and tries to offer through the editing a sort of metaphorical interpretation of the stories told. These direct testimonies are intertwined with ten apocryphal stories also related to lightning, narrated in voice-over, in which the focus is always on the site and date of the accident, the victim, and the objects that she or he was carrying. Greenaway consistently highlights the accidental nature of the events narrated in the made-up stories, and intertwines with them a series of references to literary and music works that refer to lightning, drawing attention to the recurrence of this natural phenomenon in Shakespeare's oeuvre.

The interviews of Act of God are shot in a way that is utterly unique for a documentary. Every frame is composed by the filmmaker as if it were a painting, displaying a profound attention for location and background, and an obsessive research for symmetry between the body of the interviewee and the space that surrounds it. In some cases, Greenaway creates a game of shadows behind the interviewee's body; in other cases, he constructs an impressive depth of field through open doors and windows. In one interview held over the phone, Greenaway invents a shot with a strange perspective: a telephone handle in close-up looks unnaturally big, and from a window in the background the tops of some trees and a threatening sky are visible. Interviews are conducted both in interiors and in exteriors; when they are set outside, they are generally shot in gardens, always with an emphasis on the element of water (for instance, the rain is falling and the interviewee is under an umbrella, or water sprays out of a watering can, filling in the space between the camera lens and the interviewee). It must be noted that water is a recurrent presence in Greenaway's work, an ambivalent element, which is the object of innumerable associations and contradictions, loved by the director for its photogenic quality as well as for being a component of the human body that links us to the world. In Act of God, Greenaway suggests in fact the idea of the liquefaction of the body hit by lightning, in a sort of 'water to water' (rather than 'ashes to ashes') cycle.

The composition of the shots, the subject matter, and the music by Nyman make Act of God a product that is closer to video art than to traditional documentary. As always with Greenaway, the documentary is a language among other languages, to be deconstructed and reconstructed at will. Although the starting point is a real issue, the structure and visual quality of his documentary invite the spectator to doubt the reality of the testimonies, immersed as they are in an aesthetic surplus.

Adolescents, The (aka That Tender Age)

(France, Baldi, Brault, Rouch, Teshigahara, 1964)

In 1964, at the height of the omnibus film phenomenon sweeping throughout Europe and parts of Asia, a four-part docudrama about the travails of the teenage years was jointly produced by Cinematografica, Les Films de la Pléiade, the National Film Board of Canada, and Ninjin Club. Released that year in Italy under the title Le adolescenti, in France and Canada as La fleur de l'âge, and in Japan as Shishunki, The Adolescents (as it eventually came to be known in the United States and Great Britain after a belated 1967 release) is a curious quartet, its many national affiliations and linguistically differentiated incarnations a product of the polyglot sensibilities of that era. With each of its four episodes helmed by a different director (Gian Vittorio Baldi, Michel Brault, Jean Rouch, and Hiroshi Teshigahara—all of whom had gained international notoriety by that time for their ability to wed documentary and fiction filmmaking), The Adolescents is, as its title implies, a plural text, one that deploys ruptures and discontinuities across a broad, indeed global, spectrum so as to point out similarities as well as differences between people based on national, cultural, racial, and ethnic backgrounds. Moreover, like other multidirector coproductions of the early 1960s, such as L'Amour à vingt ans/Love at Twenty (1962), Boccaccio '70 (1962), and RoGoPaG (1962), the film calls into question our critical dependency on the perhaps outmoded notions attending ‘auteurist cinema’ (in particular, the idea that a single director puts his or her personal stamp on a film), even as its trumpets the individual talents of the contributing filmmakers. Perhaps more importantly, however, it is plural insofar as it combines fiction and nonfiction aesthetics, thus collapsing distinctions between dramatic artifice and documentary verisimilitude, between narrative construct and unmediated reality.

The Adolescents is differentiated from the above mentioned and other omnibus films—besides its reliance on nonscripted action—by its overriding focus on youth. Although certainly not the first episode film to tap into the existential uncertainties and emotional problems faced by teenagers (Michelangelo Antonioni mined this rich thematic material as early as 1953, when he made I vinti/The Vanquished, a three-episode study of the moral bankruptcy and dehumanized behavior of Europe’s postwar youth), The Adolescents provides a timely reminder of the generational and cultural schisms of the 1960s.

The only scripted episode is that of Gian Vittorio Baldi, who also served as one of the six producers of the film. His tale, ‘Fiammetta’, concerns a fourteen-year-old Florentine girl (played by Micaela Esdra) whose father has recently passed away. Left to reminisce in her widowed mother’s sprawling estate, Fiammetta spends her days moping about the tourist-filled mansion. Eventually, her sexual curiosity and growing awareness of her developing breasts are deflected onto her jealousy for her attractive mother, who is forced to give up her new lover and live a quiescent life alone with her demanding daughter. These interwoven themes of sexual curiosity and jealousy reemerge in the second episode, Canadian director Michel Brault’s ‘Geneviève’. The titular teen in this slim story is actually one-half of a female duo whose friendship is tested in a moment of indiscretion and dishonesty. Both Geneviève (Geneviève Bujold) and her companion Louise (Louise Marleau) are seventeen years old, and their simultaneous sexual awakenings spark a silent rivalry during a winter carnival in Montreal. Having met a young man named Bernard (Bernard Arcand) the day before, Louise oversleeps and misses her early morning date to see him again. Geneviève steps in and takes her place, spending the day with Bernard while her friend remains blissfully unaware. Later, at the end of the date, Louise discovers the truth when she spies the two kissing—an impulsive yet tentative act on Geneviève’s part and one that she steadfastly refuses to admit. Although the plot may sound trite, what energizes it is Brault’s deft handling of space, and his judicious use of the wide-angle lens and mobile framing, which extends the social milieu of the two teens to include a panorama of 'real' people doing 'real' things.

The third story, Jean Rouch's contribution to The Adolescents, similarly revolves around the exploits of two girls. Titled 'Marie-France et Véronique', this miniature psycho-drama—starring sixteen-year-olds Marie-France de Chabaneix and Véronique Duval—could be said to have paved the way for Eric Rohmer's 4 Aventures de Reinette et Mirabelle/4 Adventures of Reinette and Mirabelle, another episodic, fragmented film whose main characters' emotional restlessness and perambulatory predispositions provide spectators with numerous opportunities to catch glimpses of Paris—a city that has been fetishized throughout the history of cinema, yet in Rouch's (and Rohmer's) work is portrayed in a subtle way. In 'Marie-France et Véronique' Paris is an expressive backdrop against which this diametrically opposed duo make difficult choices in life and love before ultimately going their separate ways.

Followers of Rouch—a socially engaged anthropologist-documentarian sympathetic to the plight of marginalized dock workers, lumbermen, day laborers, vagabonds, and other fringe-dwellers populating postcolonial Africa—may be taken aback by his decision to focus neither on the dispossessed nor the diasporic, but instead on two well-to-do Parisians whose affluence affords them the luxury of grappling with such seemingly trivial issues as the need to escape boredom, family expectations, and marriages of convenience. However, in delving into the everyday details of contemporary adolescence, the filmmaker gestures back to his first feature-length film, Moi, un noir/I, a Black (1958). That film focuses on three young men as they go about their daily routines in Treichville, a suburb of Abidjan in the Ivory Coast. Having emigrated from Niger to this so-called New York of West Africa, these laborers could effectively communicate a sense of rootlessness in improvised scenes that invite the spectator to ruminate on the effects of proletarianization and cultural imperialism. By the time he made his contribution to The Adolescents, Rouch had mastered not only the technical aspects of fiction and nonfiction filmmaking but also the thematic motif central to that film, which called for spontaneity on the young performers' parts as well as diegetic participation on the director's part.

The Adolescents is an important historical artifact capturing a decisive moment in the careers of all four directors, when 'straight' documentary was giving way to fictional forms of cinematic discourse. For instance, Baldi, who drew on his training at the venerable Centro Sperimentale di Cinematografia in Rome when making such pro-proletariat documentaries as Il pianto delle zitelle (for which he took home the Venice Film Festival's Golden Lion in 1959), had begun segueing into short fiction during the early 1960s, when he contributed episodes to the omnibus films Le italiane e l'amore/Latin Lovers (1961) and The Adolescents. Although he continued to nurture his documentary roots and—as the organizer and director of the Istituto Italiano del Documentario—became close friends with Joris Ivens and John Grierson (with whom he cofounded the Associazione Internazionale del Film Cortometraggio e del Documentario), Baldi became increasingly ensconced in the world of fiction once he began overseeing the production of works by Pier Paolo Pasolini and Robert Bresson in the late 1960s.

Similarly, the multitasking Brault, one of the innovators behind the 1950s' 'Candid Eye movement' in Canadian documentary, who stepped behind the lens on such groundbreaking productions as Les raquetteurs (1958), La lutte (1961), Golden Gloves (1961), and Pour la suite du monde (1963), began to feel that fiction did not lie because it did not pretend to be the truth. Rouch was so deeply impressed by Brault's technical expertise and belief that the imagination was a necessary tool for penetrating reality that he proclaimed the Canadian to be the basis for French breakthroughs in cinéma vérité. Significantly, The Adolescents—released just one year before Brault left the National Film Board to found Nanouk Films—was made just a few months after his collaboration with friend Claude Jutra on the nondocumentary A tout prendre (1963), a film that suggests that Brault had indeed begun to question the ethical dimensions of documentary and shift into fictional modes of filmic discourse.

Like the other contributors to The Adolescents, Hiroshi Teshigahara had begun to feel that dramatic truth was as viable as documentary reportage, something to which the Japanese director's many films about artists and designers (such as Hokusai (1953), 12 Photographers (1955), and Ikebana (1956)) only faintly attest. Made a few months before his haunting depiction of moral descent, Suna no onna/

Woman in the Dunes (1964), Teshigahara's 'Ako' (sometimes referred to as 'White Morning') is the fourth and final episode of The Adolescents, although it was cut from US prints due to time constraints and has since been shown on its own as a short film in retrospectives.

Agee, James

The American writer James Agee was one of the most significant contributors to the development of the documentary form in the United States in the mid-twentieth century. He offered no systematized theory of documentary film, and he was only peripherally involved in the industry—first as a reviewer in the 1940s, and then as a screenwriter for such films as The African Queen (1951) and The Night of the Hunter (1955). However, the publication of Let Us Now Praise Famous Men in 1941 and his collected writings in Agee on Film in 1958 are evidence of his importance to the history of the documentary. Agee argued that many documentaries in the 1930s and 1940s were as removed from reality as Hollywood movies, with the filmmaker often adopting a didactic and polemical approach to the subject. Agee's solution was to develop a hybrid form, or semi-documentary, which he believed would offer a truer record of experience than the 'flat' presentation of life then presented in documentary films. He argued that propagandists had corrupted the documentary form in Germany and in the Soviet Union by degrading the film craft of Dziga Vertov and Sergei Eisenstein (arguing that by the 1940s it had become 'posterish, opportunistic, and anti-human'), but he believed the form still held great promise in the United Kingdom and the United States.

Agee wrote extensively on British World War II films and newsreels in the early 1940s, applauding them for capturing the bravery of servicemen and offering a cathartic encounter with reality (calling them 'the finest "escapes" available'). He also praised poetic documentaries such as Robert Flaherty's Nanook of the North (1922), recommending it for its 'beautiful simplicity', and Man of Aran (1934), which manages to convey the drama and nuances of human behavior in its portrayal of the daily struggle of Aran fishermen. He particularly liked the use of nonactors, which imparted a naturalness that would have been lacking, he believed, in actors' performances. Agee considered documentary no less a creative experience than fiction. As a modernist thinker, Agee was interested in the 'musical coherence' of documentary film and wrote about the 'real poetic energy' of its better exponents throughout his reviews for The Nation and Time, written between 1941 and 1948. This kind of poetic realism, which cuts across generic boundaries, was popular among other American cultural producers such as Tennessee Williams, who developed a plastic form of theater in his dramatic work in the 1940s and 1950s, and later, the New Journalists, who attempted to blend factuality and fiction in their prose.

Agee's major work, Let Us Now Praise Famous Men, was derived from a feature article commissioned in 1936 by Fortune magazine, for which he was asked to document the lives of white tenant farmers in the South (the article never appeared in the magazine). His research was conducted in Hale County, Alabama. Agee wanted to interfere as little as possible in the lives of his subjects. He relied heavily on montage in the book, with Walker Evans's sixty photographs, literary and biblical allusions, poetic meditation, autobiographical reflection, newspaper reportage, and domestic anecdotes, creating a fragmented text that invites the reader to recognize the artifice involved in producing documentary. The result is a text that shuttles between detailed observation and a broader statement about poverty, deprivation, and human need that cuts across different modes of inquiry—a technique that accords with Agee's claim that he and Walker did not position themselves 'as journalists, sociologists, politicians, entertainers, humanitarians, priests, or artists, but seriously'. His radical documentary technique challenged the flat realist documentaries of the 1930s, as well as the conservative ideology of the southern agrarians, with their emphasis on past glories at the expense of engaging with the present.

In light of Agee's disdain for certain modes of documentary technique, Let Us Now Praise Famous Men can be read as an attempt to create not only a semidocumentary but, as T.V. Reed (1988) argues, an 'anti-documentary', marked by complexity and an apparent lack of structure. Because it is so difficult to classify, the book can be interpreted as a serious modernist intervention into the verbal and visual language of documentary, or even a playful postmodern pastiche of styles. In fact, its hybridity stems from Agee's interest in the same kind of affinity between documentary and art that is evident in his film criticism. Agee was more comfortable with photographic images than language in capturing 'truth', arguing that words tend to be slippery, ambiguous, and often inaccurate. He describes the camera as belonging to an 'absolute' realm: 'an ice-cold, some ways limited, some ways more capable, eye, it is, like the phonograph record and like scientific instruments and unlike any other leverage of art, incapable of recording anything but absolute, dry truth'. This emphasis on the absolute objectivity of photography echoes the American visual artist Paul Strand's statement in 1917 that 'objectivity is the very essence of photography, its contribution and at the same time its limitation'. For Agee, if handled 'cleanly', photography could provide a documentary record unsurpassed in other media. However, he was aware that the artist's tendency to interfere with the subject, or to make aesthetic choices in terms of framing, would distort the truth of the moment or transform it into something else. In Let Us Now Praise Famous Men Agee displays his modernist colors by insisting that 'truth' lies in the photographic image, but he also goes beyond conventional documentary form by juxtaposing a range of texts and opening an interpretative space that encourages the reader to engage with the processes of composition.

Biography

James Agee was born in 1909 in Knoxville, Tennessee. He was raised in the Cumberland mountain region and used the topography of his childhood as the basis for his two autobiographical novels, The Morning Watch (1951) and the unfinished A Death in the Family (1957), for which he was posthumously awarded the Pulitzer Prize in 1958. Graduating from Harvard University, Agee became a feature writer for Fortune magazine. The research for one feature on sharecroppers in Alabama led to the publication of Let Us Now Praise Famous Men (1941) with the photographer Walker Evans. Agee published his first collection of poetry, Permit Me Voyage, in 1934 and spent the 1940s as a film reviewer working for Time and The Nation. In 1948 he worked as a scriptwriter in Hollywood, producing scripts for The African Queen (1951) and The Night of the Hunter (1955). Agee died in 1955 at the age of forty-five.

Agland, Phil

Phil Agland is known to be an unusual filmmaker in the landscape of television documentaries. Agland's theory and techniques are often compared to those of a careful and detailed painter or a patient hunter. His films are often referred to as poetical and epic accounts of life.

Agland's first film, Korup—An African Rain Forest, was a five-year enterprise. Agland, a wildlife enthusiast concerned about the plight of the endangered species in the rainforests, had ventured to make the documentary in an attempt to raise awareness of the problem. Despite having no cinematography experience and with a very small budget, he went into the depths of the rainforest in spells of three months over a period of five years. This endeavour resulted in a poetic film containing images never seen on screen before and in an award-winning documentary.

Since that time, Agland has turned his focus on people. He returned to Cameroon's rainforest to spend two years living among the Baka people with a small crew of two, filming Baka—The People of the Rain Forest. In the Western world, the Baka people are considered pygmies. Yet, Agland's impression was that this was in no way how the Baka perceived themselves. Agland's feelings were that the Baka's perception should be reflected in his camera work. Had he kept the camera on his shoulder, he would be filming the Baka from up high, giving cause to view them as pygmies. It was in the attempt to be truthful to the Baka's own image of their height that Agland developed what became his unique camera technique. Instead of perching the camera on the shoulder, Agland cradled the camera at waist height. This technique enabled him to film the Baka people from below their eye-level for a more intimate and nonpatronising viewpoint. Later on, Agland kept to this technique, claiming that by avoiding direct eye contact and by avoiding pointing the camera lens directly at his subject, he can minimise the presence of the camera.

Agland's theory is that in order to achieve genuine and intimate moments, the camera and crew should be as invisible as possible. He uses a radio microphone technique that enables the sound recordist to be at a fair distance and away from the scene. This radio microphone technique not only enables removal of the sound recordist from the scene but it also eliminates the presence of a third and sometimes a fourth person holding a somewhat intimidating boom pole, minimising the crew to two members or sometimes even one. The invisibility, claims Agland, is crucial in this observant, unobtrusive type of documentary-making, allowing the people in front of the camera to become oblivious to its presence.

Agland believes in observant documentaries rather than interview-based ones. His theory is that genuine stories or emotions will not emerge during an interview but rather in the small, sometimes insignificant and usually unpredictable moments in life, when the subjects are unaware of the camera and, hence, do not feel obliged to deliver or to satisfy. Agland also believes that the audience should feel part of the scene yet not in the middle of it. The centre of attention should be the story, the moment and the feelings within it rather than the camera or the audience. Agland therefore minimises his camera movements and often favours static camera shots.

Allowing for time and film stock is also a crucial aspect in Agland's careful work of portrayal. He avoids setting up situations and prefers to wait for moments and stories to emerge. Spending time with his characters allows them to get used to the presence of the camera and enables Agland to explore and capture rare and intimate moments in their lives. The structure and story are revealed throughout the filming process and during the editing period rather than in the scripting stage.

In his documentaries Agland creates scenes that follow the grammatical rules and language of a fiction film rather than adopting a documentary style of filming. Using a considerable coverage and carefully thought out editing ideas, both during and after filming, Agland creates rich and round scenes, covered with wide shots, close-ups and details and, hence, creating an illusion of fiction-style, multi-angled scenes.

Though his films appear not to be focusing on a specific place or a certain subject matter, Agland's passion and curiosity lie in people and in the small matters of life. Despite some views that would claim that Agland has an anthropologist's eye, Agland himself claims the very opposite. His aim is to emphasise the similarities between humans wherever they may live or come from, regardless of religion, cultural background or life circumstances. Agland strives to show the audience the familiar in the stranger on the screen.

Agland, therefore, comes back to the common subjects—family structure, sibling jealousy, parents' concern for their children, and the mutual need for attention and love. He deals with questions of age, health, and death as well as love, friendship, and community life. In Baka—The People of the Rain Forest, the focus of the film is four-year-old Ali and his family, his father's concern preparing him for life, his parents' relationship, and Ali's reaction to the newborn baby. Through these themes Agland explores the issues common to all humans and paints a portrait of what life is about, beyond the backdrop of place and time.

In China: Beyond the Clouds, set in Lijang, a small rural town located in the southwestern region of China, it seems that Agland furthers his attempt to paint a rich and full portrayal of life. He creates an epic about the small, familiar details of life. Agland interlaces different stories: a loss of a child alongside a lifetime friendship, a juvenile crime in a small town alongside a young mother's struggle to heal her child who suffers from cerebral palsy. Maintaining a fine balance between the tragic and the comic in life, Agland offers a complex and multilayered picture.

In his only fiction film so far, The Woodlanders, which is based on a nineteenth-century novel by Thomas Hardy, Agland challenges his audience to the same themes of finding the similarities beyond the differences by taking the audience on a journey to a different time, rather than to a faraway place.

Akerman, Chantal

Like Pasolini, members of the French New Wave, Sembène, Kiarostami, and others, Akerman has found her own way to push the boundaries of film realism. She has made a number of creative observational films, or documentaries. Yet the fiction films, for which she is best known, repeatedly allow in, or call forth, a documented reality that turns the film inside out, or makes the viewer ask: Where is it really grounded, in imagination or in fact? In the third and final episode of Je tu il elle (1974), two young women make love in a bed, rendered in three long takes with three different fixed camera positions. Are the women acting? Can they be? In a way, it seems that the earlier part of the film—a woman at home writing and thinking, and then a road journey through the night—is brought to earth by this ultimate dose of reality. Everything must be judged by the standard set here. Everything previous seems, in retrospect, fanciful. In another way, the first part of the film seems an ordinary experience, tied to reality, waiting for the sexual and emotional explosion that goes beyond imagination. In Akerman's most acclaimed film, Jeanne Dielman, 23 quai du Commerce, 1080 Bruxelles (1975), Delphine Seyrig gives a consummate, highly poised performance as the housewife, mother, and prostitute of the title. However, the film has her assemble a meatloaf from scratch, or peel all the potatoes necessary for a meal, or wash all the dinner dishes, each action filling one extraordinarily long take with a fixed camera. The pure act, documented as such, takes over the film. Les Rendez-vous d'Anna (1978) begins with a long-running fixed shot of a railway platform, where a train arrives, a crowd of people leave it, and a woman enters a phone booth fairly far away from us, makes a call, and then leaves the area. Akerman is fond of the long-distant look at a place, where the visual and aural environment seems to absorb people and their particular stories. Throughout this film, memories of 1930s and 1940s history, as well as personal problems of the present, struggle to find voice against the all-but-overwhelming documentation of Europe's cities, trains, train stations, and hotel rooms. In Toute une nuit (1982) the many characters, whose lives we see bits of in and around Brussels through a hot summer night, are never named, and their dialogue is largely inaudible; they are parts of the city and the atmosphere.

Akerman has said that she does not believe in the distinction between documentary and fiction. A film is made to project feelings and understanding, and the film may use an invented story and characters to do this, or it may take the world more or less as found, arranging a meeting of facts with what the filmmaker knows in her soul. Akerman's films without story and characters are perhaps best regarded in light of this denial of special documentary status, as personal, poetic works, which of course have the potential to reveal the world, to be true. Hotel Monterey (1972) is a silent film, giving us mostly fixed, long-held shots of the lobby area, elevator, hallways, and guest rooms of a modest old New York hotel, perhaps a residence for pensioners. People come and go in the shots, mysterious, ordinary, seemingly defined by their 1950s-ish attire and by the once stylish, now a bit desolate, clean atmosphere of this place they inhabit. The camera finds an abstract fascination in details of architecture or in the changing lights on an elevator call panel, suggesting forces that shape people's lives, which may not usually be acknowledged, and which may not even be fully understandable. The silence adds to this sense of incomprehensible power in some things we see. Late in the film the camera begins moving forward and back in a hallway, peering out a window at the end, as if curious and seeking escape. In the film's final moments the camera is up on the roof, panning across the New York skyline and Hudson River. The outdoors, the daylight, and the vistas accentuate by contrast the lurid light, the hothouse quality, something even gothic about the hotel interior. The film becomes a comment on the in-bred comforting worlds people make for themselves, or allow themselves, to live in.

Varied nonfictional work followed, including portraits of artists (choreographer Pina Bausch, pianist Alfred Brendel) and in Aujourd'hui, dis-moi (1982) a forum for older women to talk about their grandmothers and the Polish Jewish community that was obliterated or displaced by the Holocaust. Two of Akerman's most interesting observational films of the 1970s and 1980s show a great contrast in style. News from Home (1976) is a New York film akin to Hotel Monterey, this time with sound, giving us a succession of color shots of lonely alleys, streets busy with traffic and pedestrians, subway stations, subway cars with the camera inside among people, and a nearly empty diner at night. From time to time Akerman in voice-over reads letters from her mother in Brussels, at moments drowned out by the sounds of the city. The letters may be made up—but why be sceptical, or what difference does it make? With the reading there is a wonderful tension created between the pull of family ties, something going on in the head and heart, and what we otherwise see and hear in the film, evidence of the daughter artist confronting a multifarious new urban world, huge and forbidding, but where she can find an uncanny beauty. Les Années 80 (1983) is about preparation for the making of Akerman's romantic musical Golden Eighties (1986). We see auditions and rehearsals, with Akerman's voice giving instruction from off screen. At one point the director appears in a recording booth to do her own version of one of the film's songs. We see acting and filmmaking prepared and executed, and the series of Golden Eighties fragments of scenes, some rough and very much in preparation, others perfected, takes us more and more into the world of the fiction film to come. The documentary, with its consciousness about performance, is another version of the fiction's exploration of the psychology of love and the moods of loss.

With D'Est (1993) Akerman's documentary work takes a serious turn into history and geography. This is her most impressive film in the observational mode and one of her very best films altogether, a grand two-hour study of Eastern Europe and, mainly, Moscow, just watching and listening, offering no commentary and registering no one's words. Here, as a traveler, Akerman seems to find material she has always deeply known and understood, with which her filmmaking connects powerfully. The film opens with images of space—empty roads and intersections, and flat fields—and one never gets over the impression that human life in this East is lived against a background of emptiness. We see people sitting in their apartments, seeming to have agreed to pose for a portrait, exposing their somberness. Some eat a meal alone. There are long mobile shots—one a full ten minutes—as if looking at an endless world, moving through the streets of Moscow taking in crowds waiting for buses, or moving through railway stations where crowds sit quietly on benches, bundled up in the cold, as if displaced from home and waiting forever. Much of the film is shot at night, with all its beauty and uncertainty, and mostly in winter, where the physical world weighs heavily. It is a picture of life lived against the void, of a sameness with little sign of change. The many faces are intriguing, but do not show much; they acknowledge the camera, but only obliquely. People seem experienced and complex, but closed off. At the end of the film we are at a concert and hear a full solo cello piece by Boris Tchaikovsky, which is greeted with a strong ovation. This old-fashioned, soulful music, with some painful modernist twists, one feels could be playing inside the heads of all the people we see in the film.

Akerman's more recent films continue to look at places and the cultures associated with them. Sud (1999) journeys across the American South, staring at the lush vegetation and the air's heat waves that surround all activity, and listens to people talk about poor lives and racial problems. The journey comes to an uneasy rest in Jasper, Texas, gathering information on the then recent murder by dragging of James Byrd, a black man, at the hands of whites. Twice the camera, looking back at the road, travels over the route the man was dragged behind a truck. It is a simple, unnerving gesture, confronting the event in a way only film could do. De l'autre côté (2002) centers on the Mexican/US border in the Sonoran desert/southern Arizona region. The problems of economically desperate Mexicans trying to cross into the United States come into the film in interviews and monologues, as do the attitudes of fearful white Americans. However, the film mostly contemplates the place, the beautiful and threatening desert spaces, the skies in various light, the ugly, endless border wall, the ramshackle buildings that have grown up in the region and, viewed at night, the fence lights and search lights, roads or desert paths traversed by the camera like a migrant or the pursuer of migrants, barely revealing what is there, and finally the view through the night-vision device of an airborne surveillance mechanism or weapon. Human pressures have made this place what it is, yet the place takes on a life of its own, as if it is a destiny that has drawn people into it. As always in Akerman, film registers an inhuman power of place and things, which, paradoxically, is all too human.

Biography

Born in Brussels on June 6, 1950, Akerman was inspired to take up filmmaking after seeing Godard's Pierrot le fou. She studied for several months at the Belgian film school INSAS in 1967, completed her first film, Saute ma ville, in 1968, and won recognition when this was shown at the Oberhausen Short Film Festival in 1971. From 1971–3 Akerman spent time in New York doing odd jobs, seeing avant-garde films, and making films. She won international acclaim for Jeanne Dielman, 23 quai du Commerce, 1080 Bruxelles in 1975, and was given a retrospective at the Venice Film Festival that year. With Aujourd'hui, dis-moi (1980), she began making films for television, which would sponsor much of her future documentary work. With Hall de nuit (1991), she began writing plays, several of which were produced over the next decade. In 1995 her D'Est traveled to several museums in the United States and Europe. Two years later, she was given a retrospective at the Pesaro Festival in 1997. Akerman then taught filmmaking at Harvard University from 1997 to 1998. In 1998 she published Une famille à Bruxelles, a memoir/fiction centering on her mother, 1998. She used De l'autre côté for an installation at Documenta 11 in 2002.

Akomfrah, John

John Akomfrah was one of the founders of the Black Audio Film Collective in 1982, a group that went on to produce Handsworth Songs (1986). As a member of this cooperative, Akomfrah performed the role of director and writer alongside other writers and producers within a cooperative mode of production. The group's audiovisual practice was marked by a preference for discursive interrogation and recontextualization of archival documentary sources over documentary realism. After Black Audio ceased working as a collective in 1995, Akomfrah set up production of a company called Smoking Dogs with former members of Black Audio Lina Gopaul and David Lawson. The company produced television documentaries such as Goldie: When Saturn Returnz (1998) and Riot (1999) for the United Kingdom's Channel 4, and The Wonderful World of Louis Armstrong as part of the Omnibus season for the BBC.

Akomfrah has frequently favored the documentary form as a means of formal innovation, while also making feature-length films that invoke the relation between drama and documentary. The resources of drama and archival documentary are called on as a means of articulating the diasporic experience in Testament (1988), whereas in Who Needs a Heart (1991) the combination is used to highlight the cultural politics of the 1960s and a figure rather overlooked by history in the form of Michael X. The style of documentary demonstrated in Handsworth Songs involves a nonlinear structure, modernist techniques of juxtaposition and layering, and, in collaboration with Trevor Mathison, a dissonant and contrapuntal relation between sound and image. The interrogation of the relation between narrative, the poetic expression of diasporic memory, and the documentation of history in Handsworth Songs is recast via a female dramatic protagonist to Ghana in Testament. As a result, the referent for Akomfrah's filmmaking is not only black experience but also an ongoing exploration of form that looks into the problematic form of the bounded categories of fiction and nonfiction and simultaneously raises recurring questions concerning historiography. The concern with materializing history through documentary is underlined in The Cheese and the Worm (1996), featuring the historian Carlo Ginsberg and addressing Christianity, heresy, and witchcraft in Italy during the sixteenth century.

Akomfrah documents the diasporic experience of black British subjects in Touch of the Tarbrush (1991), which revisits J.B. Priestley's English Journey of 1933 as a starting point from which to enquire how the mixed-race community of Liverpool describes its own routes to a hybrid identity. Here, Akomfrah fuses his personal and remembered history as a black English subject with the memories of some members of the mixed-race community that is 'rooted and located in Liverpool'.

The expositional documentary and the tradition of surveying the condition of a particular place and time through history is annexed by Akomfrah in order to represent 'the lives and histories that represent the hope for another England'.

Akomfrah has produced work focused on significant cultural and political figures such as Malcolm X, Michael X, and Louis Armstrong. Who Needs a Heart, commissioned by Channel 4 in the United Kingdom, combines archival footage of the life of Michael X with a dramatic portrayal centered on a group of black people and white people who are caught up in the politics of black power and the culture of the 1960s. The dramatic element of the docudrama is supported by reportage. Diegetic sound and dialogue are frequently muted into silence and replaced by fragments of official voices denouncing the compromised life of Michael X. Who Needs a Heart emphasizes the problem of history as narrative and an approach to documenting a relatively undocumented political figure, where the outcome of historical knowledge and truth is rendered less secure and cannot be guaranteed.

Seven Songs for Malcolm X (1993) was produced for and broadcast by Channel 4 in the UK at the same time as the release in the UK of Spike Lee's film Malcolm X (1992). This documentary takes the form of a tableau, in which various black personalities and members of his family present a range of perspectives on Malcolm X. It comprises a combination of expositional testimonies, eyewitness accounts, archival footage, and dramatic reenactments. Sound is again used as a mechanism for drawing the viewer's attention to the relation between the different elements that constitute the documentary, and the different manifestations of Malcolm X within African American culture.

In The Mothership Connection (1995), Akomfrah attempts to understand the African diasporic experience of displacement through the vehicle of science fiction and new technology. Connections are suggested between the musical sources of George Clinton and Sun Ra, the history of the blues, and science-fiction narratives of abduction and transportation. The Mothership Connection questions the boundaries that separate the history of the African diaspora from the scenarios of narrative fiction.

Akomfrah's documentary output spans both television and film. Productions for Black Audio, such as Testament (1988) and Seven Songs for Malcolm X (1993), were exhibited and awarded prizes at international film festivals—for example at the African Film Festival of Perugia, where Testament received the Special Jury Prize in 1989. In the UK his films are generally either broadcast on television or receive a limited cinematic release. As a result, the critical context for Akomfrah's filmmaking is, somewhat problematically, a combination of the documentary tradition and European Art Cinema rather than the black communities in Britain (Gilroy 1989).

Throughout the 1980s and 1990s Akomfrah extended his reach beyond the context of black British experience, emphasizing the internationalism of the African diaspora. Testament (1988), The Mothership Connection (1995), and the African Political Broadcasts (1995) together represent a documenting of pan-African experience. Akomfrah's contribution to documentary represents both a formal interrogation of the materials and limits of documenting, and a significant contribution to the cultural representation of the black diaspora. Akomfrah, in collaboration with the members of the Black Audio Film Collective, opens up and places in doubt the language of documentary, while simultaneously exposing the gaps, silences, and blind spots of official, recorded history.

Alexander, Donald

Donald Alexander was a typical representative of the 1930s generation, which—shocked as it was by the human waste caused by the Depression—welcomed the social changes begun during the war and ending in the British Labour government's welfare programme. After graduating from the University of Cambridge, he gained his first film experience in the South Wales coal fields in 1935. Using a borrowed 16mm camera, he and his companion filmed such typical sights as miners looking for coal high upon the slagheaps. Once the film was finished it was shown to Paul Rotha. He invited Alexander to be his assistant at Strand Films—an offer that was immediately accepted.

Rotha ensured that Alexander learned all the tricks of the trade by having him work with the company's more experienced staff. For Today We Live, commissioned by the National Council for Social Service, Alexander, acting as assistant to director Ralph Bond, personally reshot on 35mm stock the sequence from his novice film on the Tylorstown slagheap. The footage would be incorporated in countless historical documentaries.

In 1937 Alexander was ready for his first directorial assignment: Eastern Valley, about a substance farm for unemployed miners in Cwmavon, run by the Order of Friends. In his last prewar film, about the city of Dundee, he made use of the more complex narrative structure that would become so characteristic of his 1940s documentaries. The frame story for Dundee is provided by a group of people meeting by chance on the ferry crossing the Tay; each character is used to impart factual information to, and derive empathy from, the spectator.

In December 1940 Alexander was asked by Paul Rotha to return to London. In response to the plans of former Shell publicity officer, Jack Beddington (now head of Films Division at the Ministry of Information (MOI)), to involve outside units in the production program, Rotha had the idea of setting up a new unit. Its aim was making 'films of social importance with an eye to the future' (Alexander), in line with the 'war aims' presented in the very first issue of Documentary Newsletter (1940), which demanded that 'the Educational system, Public Health Services, Child Welfare, the Housing Problem' be reviewed and reformed.

In 1941 Alexander was first introduced to Bridget (Budge) Cooper, who would soon become his (second) wife and close companion in film production. While working at Paul Rotha Productions (PRP), they tackled several social and health topics in films about day nurseries, rural local government, rehabilitation, female agricultural labor, and the contributions of West Indians to the war effort. However, it was Cooper's Children of the City (1944), analyzing the social roots of child delinquency, that epitomized PRP's social approach to documentary. Alexander acted as the film's producer, but it was Rotha who got the credit. It was out of resentment against this and similar incidents that Alexander, Cooper, and eight others decided in 1944 to break away from PRP. They formed Documentary Technicians Alliance (DATA), a cooperative recognized by the Co-operative Productive Federation. Until his departure in 1950, Alexander was annually elected as chairman by the DATA shareholder-employees.

To a large extent, the new unit was dependent on the MOI. When Labour won the 1945 general election by a significant majority, DATA felt proud in having contributed to this beginning of a new era through their films. However, Labour showed little concern for the documentary. It disbanded the MOI, replacing it with a common service department, the Central Office of Information. This remained the biggest sponsor of DATA, but its nongovernmental status proved a growing source of friction. By 1948 DATA, now employing more than forty technicians, had changed its direction by looking for other sponsors such as the National Coal Board (NCB, for which it produced the monthly Mining Review) and the Steel Company of Wales.

In 1950 Alexander left DATA. The following year he was asked to take over the one-day-a-week job of Films Adviser at the NCB. He discovered that there was a great need for technical, training, and safety films, and argued for the setting up of an in-house technical film unit; in 1953 the unit was operative. Over the years, the volume of its work increased and Alexander, whose NCB job gradually became a full-time one, had to hire more employees. It was his policy not only to give young people the chance to learn the trade but also to make sure that there would always be a place for those who had already 'paid their dues' in documentary.

After a twelve-year stint at the NCB, Alexander decided to step down. He continued working for the Coal Board, and made several films, including The 4 M's, a film that NCB Chairman Alf Robens personally used in his presentations. In 1969 Alexander became Director of Audiovisual Aids at the University of Dundee. Being back in his beloved Scotland offered him the chance to get involved in the (second) Films of Scotland Committee. In 1979 he retired from the University of Dundee. Donald Alexander died July 20, 1993.

Allégret, Marc

Although often remembered as the long-time companion and protégé of eminent French novelist André Gide, Marc Allégret was also among the most prolific directors of his generation. Between 1927 and 1970 he made nearly eighty films, including fifteen documentaries clustered at the beginning and end of his career. His only two feature-length offerings were his most important: Voyage au Congo/Travels in the Congo (1927), a portrait of life in central Africa that played a seminal role in the emergence of cinematic ethnography; and Avec André Gide/With André Gide (1952), an affectionate retrospective of the writer's life and work.

In July 1925 Allégret and Gide embarked on a ten-month expedition across French Equatorial Africa. Allégret was in charge of all the logistical details, foremost among which was crafting a written, photographic, and cinematic record of the journey. He had no formal training as a photographer or filmmaker, but he practised extensively prior to the trip under the guidance of the renowned surrealist artist Man Ray. In contrast to both Robert Flaherty's influential Nanook of the North (1922) and Léon Poirier's hit La Croisière noire/The Black Journey (1926), Allégret wanted his film to be an objective record of African cultures that informed and explained rather than entertaining through adventure and exoticism. To that end, the first-time director deliberately excluded references to the trip itself, the many technical challenges he faced, his own presence behind the camera, and grotesque elements of African culture, such as the large wooden discs worn in the lips of Massa women.

Voyage au Congo presents scenes of daily life among eight distinct ethnic groups, focusing on agricultural practices, hunting and fishing techniques, architectural styles, and key collective rituals, all of which are carefully contextualized with didactic intertitles (over one hundred and fifty in the eighty-minute montage that survives today) and detailed maps (ten in all). In so doing, Allégret rejected the sensationalism and racial stereotyping that had long characterized newsreel and documentary representations of so-called primitive cultures. Instead, the film promoted intercultural understanding by appealing to spectators' intellect and steeping them in knowledge. This approach, which reflects Gide's biting assertion that 'the less intelligent the white man is, the dumber he perceives Blacks to be' was nothing short of revolutionary, for it revealed the potential of cinema as a legitimate ethnographic tool.

Perhaps most importantly, Allégret realized the impossibility of ever achieving total objectivity because of the inherently unequal power dynamic that exists between the filmmaker and his or her subjects. His travel diary, which first appeared in 1987 under the title Carnets du Congo/Notebooks from the Congo, charts the emergence of a precocious self-reflexivity that would inform the later work of anthropologists such as Michel Leiris, Jean Rouch, and Claude Lévi-Strauss. In order to minimize the contaminating impact of his presence, Allégret shot much of the film with a long-range telephoto lens and whenever possible accustomed his subjects to the camera through repeated pantomime before taking any actual footage.

Whereas Gide's written accounts of the trip, Voyage au Congo/Travels in the Congo and Retour du Tchad/Return from Chad, sparked a national debate over colonial policy by exposing forced labour, crushing taxes, starvation, and insufficient medical care throughout central Africa, Allégret's film was more subtle in its politics, eschewing invective in favour of a primitivist aesthetic that celebrated African physical beauty, vitality, and moral purity. This brand of primitivism—which had its origins in the Enlightenment philosophers' critique of modern civilization and idealization of 'natural man'—had a significant influence on French art (particularly sculpture and painting) throughout the 1920s as concerns about European decadence and the need for cultural rejuvenation intensified in the wake of World War I.

In this regard, Allégret's footage of athletic competitions and dances is particularly striking. His long, graceful shots of contracting backs, arms, legs, and breasts create living, neo-classical sculptures reminiscent of the Renaissance. From today's perspective such scenes are disturbingly objectifying and voyeuristic, yet as an exercise in visual aesthetics and eroticism their appeal remains undeniable. Moreover, in the context of the late 1920s they constituted a powerful, if at root equally stereotypical, corrective to the widely held European prejudice that blacks were ugly, brutish, and unworthy of artistic attention.

The film's potentially incompatible aesthetic and ethnographic dimensions in fact complement each other, culminating in a sixteen-minute segment that dramatized courtship and marriage customs among the Sara people near Lake Chad. Although the practices represented on screen are sociologically accurate, the story of a young couple who meet by the river, fall in love, and struggle to satisfy their families' demands is entirely fictional. As Allégret's Carnets reveal, he carefully managed all aspects of the production, from scouting picturesque locations and choosing his actors among the local population, to directing their movements on camera and writing the explanatory intertitles. The result is a primitivist melodrama disguised as a documentary that uses the universal theme of love to inform European viewers about African cultural differences.

Although Voyage au Congo did not enjoy commercial success or have a substantial impact on popular mentalities, it received praise from critics and it launched Allégret's career as a filmmaker. During the following year he made short documentaries about native culture in Djerba, a small island off the coast of Tunisia, life in the region surrounding Tripoli, and a publicity film for the Belgian National Railroad Company. He then embarked on a successful career as a fiction film director, returning to documentary over twenty years later with Avec André Gide.

Released in early 1952 during a series of official ceremonies commemorating the first anniversary of Gide's death, the film was the first feature-length cinematic biography of a French writer. Its first two parts provide a historically contextualized overview of Gide's life and work through a smoothly edited montage of newsreel footage, photos, and voice-over narration. The narrative is accurate but highly selective and at times superficial, omitting major novels such as Les Faux-Monnayeurs/The Counterfeiters and Les Caves du Vatican/Lafcadio's Adventures, as well as allusions to Gide's homosexuality and its crucial place in his work.

The third and final section, shot in Gide's small Paris apartment during the last months of his life, is an intimate portrait that awkwardly attempts to humanize the Nobel Prize winner and to ensure his legacy for posterity. Rather than conveying nonchalance and spontaneity—as Allégret clearly intended by filming Gide reading aloud from his works in slippers and robe, playing with his grandchildren, and smoking at the kitchen table while reflecting on his career—this part of the film comes off as pretentious, transparently disguised hagiography. It is obvious that many scenes have been scripted, rehearsed, and edited in order to paint Gide as both the quintessential French intellectual whose genius enlightens the world and, quite inaccurately, as a devoted family man with whom everyone can identify. The film ends pointedly on that note as Gide paraphrases the final lines of Thésée/Theseus: 'I have built my city, which is to say my writing. Through it my thought will live eternally.'

In 1952 the film bitterly divided critics as Gide's work always had, eliciting lavish praise and sarcastic denunciation. Despite its obvious flaws, in retrospect Avec André Gide can be appreciated as the innovative forerunner of a film genre that is now a standard part of television programming. Also, despite its flaws, on a meta-textual level the film exemplifies Gide's penchant for self-reinvention and the growing role that cinema would play in shaping celebrity and public memory during the last half of the twentieth century. Allégret gave up fiction film in 1963 under the influence of the New Wave, whose exponents heavily criticized his traditional style. However, several years later he returned to directing with a series of well-crafted television documentaries based on the Lumière newsreel archives from the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries.

In the end, Allégret's contribution to the development of documentary film is quantitatively modest but qualitatively significant for his pioneering experimentation with form and genre. Though Avec André Gide was an ambitious failure, Voyage au Congo stands as a masterpiece of early ethnographic cinema and the most influential film of Allégret's entire career.

Alvarez, Santiago

Santiago Alvarez was not only the man who put Cuban documentary on the world map but he was also one of the most powerful and innovative documentarians in the history of cinema. Politically a supporter of Fidel Castro (he was once described as Castro's poet laureate for his loving film portrayals of the Cuban leader), his aesthetics were anything but conventional. Not only did Alvarez become a master of agitprop, whom many have compared with the Russian Dziga Vertov (although Alvarez himself knew nothing of Vertov's work until later), but he also extended the art of documentary in several directions. He did this through a highly personal style with huge visual impact, in which a rough-hewn lyricism was carried along by montage work that was often satirical or ironic, frequently using animated titles in place of commentary, and backed by the iconic use of music. In the 1950s Alvarez worked as a record librarian in a television station, and he developed a keen sense of the possibilities of matching—and mismatching—music and images.

One of the founder members of the Cuban film institute ICAIC (Instituto Cubano de Arte e Industria Cinematográficas), which was set up in 1959 during the first year of the Revolution, Alvarez was already forty years old when he was put in charge of the newsreel section and made his first short films. He once called himself a product of ‘accelerated underdevelopment’ and was always grateful to the Cuban Revolution for making him a filmmaker and enabling him to fulfill his youthful dreams. Born in the working-class district of Colonial Old Havana, he was the son of immigrant parents from Spain. When he was five years old, his shopkeeper father was arrested for anarchist activities and spent two years in prison, while the young family struggled to survive on their own. Alvarez started working at the age of fifteen as a compositor’s apprentice, became active in the union of graphic arts workers, went to night school, and set up a students’ association.

At the end of the 1930s he went to the United States, working as a coal miner in Pennsylvania and as a dishwasher in New York. Back in Cuba in 1942, he joined the Communist Party and got a job in radio, and later in television. He also attended a film club in Havana run by the Young Communists, which became a recruiting ground for the new film institute. At ICAIC, he was put in charge of newsreels and quickly proceeded to turn them into a veritable art form, as well as a training ground for several generations of young filmmakers in how to make films quickly, cheaply, and using whatever materials were at hand. Perhaps it was his anarchist susceptibilities that gave his aesthetics their particular slant: a healthy disapproval of schools, conventions, and orthodoxy, together with a penchant for the deployment of pithy, intelligent, didactic montage. These susceptibilities rapidly induced him to discard the conventional language of the newsreel, and turn the format inside out. Instead of an arbitrary sequence of disconnected items, Alvarez combined them into a political argument, or turned them into single-topic documentaries. He used this technique in the first of his films to win international awards, Ciclón/Hurricane in 1963, and Now (1965), a denunciation of racial discrimination in the United States.

The newsreel job gave Alvarez the chance to film abroad, and here too he took a radical approach. In 1966 he accompanied Cuban athletes to the Pan-American Games in Puerto Rico, using the opportunity to turn out his longest film yet (thirty-four minutes), a biting satire of US imperialism named after the ship that took them there, Cerro Pelado. ICAIC was still at this time filming newsreels on mute, handheld 35mm cameras, but Alvarez was already at the height of his creative powers and using only a few intertitles to convey basic information, eschewing a verbal voice-over and instead using music to narrate the events. At one point in Cerro Pelado, shots of a training center for Cuban counterrevolutionaries (as a caption describes it) are juxtaposed with a band arrangement of Rossini’s ‘William Tell Overture’, which naturally recalls the use of the same piece as the title music of the television series The Lone Ranger; thus Alvarez presents the counterrevolutionaries as imitation cowboys, an image both satiric and deflating. In 1967 came Hanoi Martes 13/Hanoi, Tuesday 13th, a lyrical and wordless forty-minute portrayal of what daily life was like in war-torn North Vietnam (Tuesday the 13th is the Spanish equivalent of Friday the 13th in English). Here, the music was an original score by Leo Brouwer, who was emerging as Cuba’s most original film composer.

The same experimental approach produces both LBJ (1968), a stunning satire on US political assassinations, and 79 Primaveras/79 Springtimes of Ho Chi Minh (1969), a deeply poetic tribute to the Vietnamese leader Ho Chi Minh. LBJ uses the three letters of President Johnson’s initials to stand for Luther, Bob, and John—Martin Luther King and the two Kennedys—in a bold play on the strange coincidence that the corpses of these three men littered Johnson’s ascent. Visually, the core of the satire is the image culled from a North American newspaper cartoon of Johnson as the incarnation of the Texan cowboy on his bronco. Alvarez doubles this up with Johnson as a medieval knight in armor astride his mount, reinforced with clips from two classic Hollywood genres—Westerns and the historical adventure—which appear distorted. (They came from wide-screen films that had been copied directly without using the appropriate lens to unsqueeze them.) The film is thus as much a deconstruction of the imagery of the mass media as of US politics, in which assassination became an almost accustomed weapon that remained veiled in misinformation and mystery. Except for some linking animation and a few shots in the sequence on Martin Luther King, almost everything in this twenty-minute film is found material. As Alvarez put it himself, it was the US blockade of Cuba that prompted this approach by denying Cuba access to new live material, so instead he raided the archives and used cuttings from newspapers and magazines.

One of his best-known films of these years, Hasta la victoria siempre/Always Until Victory (1967), was made in only forty-eight hours so that it could be shown in the Plaza de la Revolución in Havana before Castro delivered his eulogy for Che Guevara. Less well known abroad are the films that Alvarez made on internal politics, including the forty-minute Despegue a las 18:30/Take-off at 18:30 (1969), which confronted the failures of the Cuban economy, although it was made in a Guevara-like spirit of moral exhortation rather than as criticism. Even here, Alvarez eschews conventional narration in a long opening sequence that portrays the lines of potential customers at the food shops and the despondency of ‘No hay!’ (‘there isn’t any!’).

A series of longer films in the 1970s brought Alvarez’s style back toward reportage. In Piedra sobre piedra/Stone Upon Stone (1970), Alvarez goes to Peru to report on the radical military regime that had just restored diplomatic relations with Cuba, and is interrupted by a major earthquake, from which he draws a metaphor: an equation between the sixty seconds of the earthquake, the effects of which he films, and the earthquake of underdevelopment that lasted for three hundred and sixty-five days a year. Then came three films that chronicled Castro’s foreign tours of the 1970s (to Chile in 1971, Africa and Eastern Europe in 1972, and Africa again in 1977), where Alvarez developed a unique style of informal, observational filming that evidently took the Cuban leader’s fancy. (Castro gave Alvarez a Russian Lada car for his sixtieth birthday.) De América soy hijo/Born of the Americas (1972), the film of Fidel’s visit to Chile, is by far the longest—one hundred and ninety-five minutes in the full version. The length is justified by taking the cue from Castro’s oratory: Alvarez used Castro’s speeches as entry points to sequences analyzing aspects of Latin American history and the Cuban experience, which Castro explained to his Chilean audiences, and a similar technique was used for Y el cielo fue tomado por asalto/And Heaven was Taken by Storm, which covers Castro’s 1972 tour of ten different countries in just over two hours, except that here the interpolated sequences concerned the histories of the countries visited. As one commentator put it after a retrospective of Alvarez’s work in London in 1980, these lengthy films have an easy pace and ‘a certain discursive quality which can be deceptively innocent’—especially De América soy hijo, which is ‘loose-jointed but powerful in its cumulative effect and its insistent contextualization of the Chilean situation’ (Hood 1980). At the same time, these films offer a rich collection of glimpses of Fidel Castro in a large variety of circumstances, both formal and informal. There is no denying that Castro greeting crowds and crowds greeting Castro can become repetitive, but such images are frequently offset by moments of individual interaction, such as an exchange he has with a working woman at a rally in Chile, or by the habit Alvarez has of leaving in the scenes that many editors would wish to leave on the cutting room floor (Castro fidgeting with the microphones on the podium in front of him, for instance).

Alvarez himself was a man of unflagging energy, until he was slowed by the onset of Parkinson’s disease. His filmography is enormous. In the 1970s alone, important titles included two more films on Chile, ¿Cómo, por qué y para qué se asesina un general?/How, Why and for What is a General Assassinated (1971), and El tigre saltó y mató, pero morirá ... morirá/The Tiger Leapt and Killed but it Will Die ... it Will Die (1973), which are both rapid responses to events using a montage of library and archive images. Other notable achievements include the two-hour portrait of Vietnam, Abril de Vietnam en el año del gato/April in Vietnam in the Year of the Cat, commissioned by the Vietnamese to celebrate the thirtieth anniversary of the founding of the Democratic Republic, and Mi hermano Fidel/My Brother Fidel (1977), an intimate portrait in which Castro meets a man aged ninety-three who had met the Cuban patriot José Martí when he was eleven years old, shortly before Martí was killed in battle.

Elected to the Cuban national assembly for the Havana district where he lived, Alvarez remained a significant figure at ICAIC and in 1991 was one of the signatories of the unprecedented letter of protest with which ICAIC's film directors greeted the suppression of the controversial film Alicia en el pueblo de Maravillas/Alice in Wondertown, and the threat, later withdrawn, to merge ICAIC with Cuban television.

American Family, An

(US, Gilbert, 1973)

The twelve-part 1973 PBS series An American Family marked the culmination of the direct cinema movement in the United States. Producer Craig Gilbert's decision to move his crew into the home, positioning living cinema in the living room of middle-class suburbia, and then broadcasting it into the living rooms of America, erased the divide between public and private, a recurrent dream of cinéma vérité. Instead of revealing the private moments of public figures as the Drew Associates had in Primary (1960), Alan and Susan Raymond reversed the logic, making public the very private rituals of bourgeois family life as found at 35 Wood Dale Lane, Santa Barbara, California, thus acknowledging it to be an institution as open to surveillance as that of welfare recipients. Joining direct cinema documentary methods with television sitcom format, An American Family created a hybrid that fascinated its viewers.

In Pat and Bill Loud, Gilbert found a family defined, because of their cultural, economic, and political centrality, by their lack of definition. Seemingly raceless and classless, they were nevertheless marked by changing sexual mores, divorce, and homosexuality. The serial exposure of the Loud family on television revealed the suburban home as a central institution of post-war, middle-class experience. Filmed over seven months, the saga of the Louds, 'not the American family, but an American family', in the introductory words of Gilbert, begins with only the sketchiest background about the family prior to the moment of filming; the show, like all living cinema, features present-time experience shorn of sociological or historical context. The opening credits focus the series: first the house appears, then, in succession, Bill, Pat, and each of the children frozen in the middle of doing some typical activity. Their portraits surround the house, which dominates the frame. The sun-drenched family home becomes a spectacle, a source of envy in a consumer culture. Incredibly successful, Bill has built his own business forging replacement parts for heavy-mining equipment, marketing his products worldwide. Thus his home is linked to a global economy that makes possible the expansive ranch house with a pool and ocean view and the comfortable lives of his wife and children, who pursue their interests, secure in the knowledge that he will foot the bill for dancing lessons, apartments in New York City, musical instruments, and a horse and stable.

Yet, for all his economic centrality, Bill is not the center of the home. Rather, Pat, his wife and mother of his five children, dominates and maintains the family, and the footage. In her early forties, she is always perfectly made-up, her hair neatly done, wearing matching outfits and strands of gold around her neck and wrists. During the first episode, which includes both the end of the marriage (surrounded by friends, Pat tells Bill she is seeking a divorce, in the midst of drunken party at a restaurant) and the first day of filming, Pat is up at 6:30, poaching eggs and pouring mugs of coffee for her large family; however, the substance of the film is the emotional labor Pat expends in caring for her children. With the exception of the voluble and 'flamboyant' Lance, her oldest son, the Loud children are barely articulate teenagers.

They mumble about Michelle's horse, Delilah's tap dancing, Grant's band, Kevin's movies, and Lance's acting career.

The close monitoring that goes on in the Loud home (everyone checks in with the others about the day's activities, Lance calls long-distance from New York frequently, parents discuss problems relating to their children) reflects the scrutiny of Alan and Susan Raymond's camera and microphone. It also typifies the emotional intensity of the postwar middle-class family. During the first episode, as the camera follows Lance unpacking after his move into New York's Chelsea Hotel, he describes his siblings. Kevin is 'humane, the only one to buy presents for the others' birthdays'. Delilah 'lives a very Tammy existence, like Trisha Nixon with spice'. Michelle is selfish and bratty, 'made in the image of me', and Grant is 'talented but arrogant'. Summing up what will become clear over the course of the next eleven weeks, Lance's astute eye has been trained by gauging the emotional timbre of the home in which he was raised. The community he finds at the Chelsea Hotel, and continues to make in Copenhagen and Paris, becomes yet another form of this intimate social world.

This televised family saga codified a new political grammar, the rhetoric of celebrity. Both Lance and Pat launched careers from the series: Pat got her own talk show, and Lance became a minor star at Warhol's factory. HIV-positive since 1983, he died of complications from hepatitis C in December 2001, as the Raymonds were filming his last days in a Los Angeles hospice.

Anais Nin Observed

(France, Snyder, 1974)

Released in 1974, Anais Nin Observed is one of a number of films directed by Robert Snyder that takes an intimate look at the lives and personalities of celebrated artists. Snyder describes his films as 'voyages of discovery', and openly admits that he knew very little about Nin's life or works before he began the film. He was introduced to her in 1968, when filming The Henry Miller Odyssey (1974), and after a prolonged period of acquaintance she agreed to let him film her for a separate documentary, of which she would be the focus. The two films make up a kind of unofficial diptych: Nin not only features in the work on Miller, as he later would in the Nin documentary, but she also helped Snyder to edit the film, providing encouragement and advice, just as Miller spent a long time with Snyder editing Anais Nin Observed.

Snyder's film follows Nin through her daily life, as she takes tea, swims in her pool, works on her journal, and chats with friends. The vast body of the documentary consists of her conversations with Snyder, as well as with friends such as Frances Steloff and students from University of California, Los Angeles (UCLA). Although frequently categorised as biography, Anais Nin Observed, like the majority of Snyder's works, makes no attempt to give a comprehensive historical account of Nin's life and works. The film is aimed rather at providing accessibility to the writer for an interested audience without the barriers of experts. It does not delve into her personal life, but is rather a mouthpiece for her musings on art, literature, and her own life. This is Anais Nin in her own words. She is, as the title states, observed.

To this end, the film sets out to reflect qualities of Nin's personality and work within its form. Snyder's signature as a documentary director, paradoxically, tends to consist of a deferral to the artistic stamp of the documentary's subject, with whom he works very closely. In this regard he calls to mind the many female critics of Anais Nin who have adopted her prose style, writing about her as she wrote about herself. The film echoes the quality in Nin's writings that the literary critic Edmund Wilson describes as 'half ... story, half dream', and recreates the 'special world, a world of feminine perception and fancy' that is the circumscribed universe that Nin's characters inhabit. His success in this area is due in no small part to the work of the film's director of photography, Baylis Glascock, who uses soft focus and filters to recreate the aura of mystery that surrounds Nin. Repeated shots of light catching on glasses and water create a lilting quality that echoes that of Nin's writing. The film is edited in slow rhythms; conversations are conserved in their actuality rather than edited for highlights, so that, for example, when Nin finishes a thought, and gazes off into the distance before beginning her next conversation, the pause resonates with Nin's careful, well-thought out intellect.

Snyder's film mirrors Nin's diary in other ways—a fact he comments on in his notes on the film. At the time of filming, Nin was editing her journals for publication. The editing of the film echoes the process by which Nin selects material from her books: 'We could always pick up new material in the future and—together with material of our current film—make another one ... that's how diaries work!' Nin refers to the diaries constantly within the film: They are, she says, her 'cultural landscape', and she dips back into them daily. Snyder's film echoes this dialectic between past and present, opening with the contemporary Nin, before moving backwards to look at her past life and then forwards again into the present (Snyder 1976).

While Anais Nin Observed is unmistakably part of Snyder's oeuvre, at the same time we might consider it to be coauthored by Nin. The film is by no means an academic or historical study made about the subject, but is rather an experience of her: the director's authorship is in many ways secondary to Nin's, both in form and in content. In keeping with Miller's request for Snyder to 'mythologise' her, the director gives a very positive portrayal of Nin that might not be as objective as a more conventional biography, such as Coky Giedroyc's Spy in the House of Love—Anais Nin, shown as part of the UK's Channel 4 Arthouse series on in the late 1990s. Snyder's film is certainly a lot more flattering, portraying Nin as gracious, unpretentious, and intelligent. Unlike Giedroyc's film and the numerous written biographies of Nin, there is little mention of her infamous sex life, and a great deal more emphasis is placed on her intellect and artistic merit. It is perhaps no coincidence that Nin agreed to the documentary at approximately the same time as Miller, Sherwood Anderson, and a group of other intellectuals were campaigning to have Nin nominated for the Nobel Prize for Literature. Until 1963 Nin was relatively unheard of as an author in the United States and had been very frustrated by it. In many ways, the film provides her with the artistic recognition that had so long eluded her.

As an objective history, Snyder's film certainly leaves gaps. Nin's husband, Rupert Pole, for example, who was sharing the house in which Nin was filmed (unbeknownst to her other husband, Hugo Guiler), is omitted from the film altogether, as if he never existed (probably for Guiler's sake!). However, as a portrait of Anais Nin as she saw herself, or more importantly as she wanted others to see her, Snyder's film complements content with form elegantly. Through the film, Anais continues the constant process of seduction that has characterised her life and writing, reaching out to new audiences through the screen. In this respect, Snyder's documentary is an almost perfect replica of the diaries in intent and content. Even before the editing process begins, a great deal has been cut out, leaving us as mystified as to who the real Anais Nin is as she has always wanted the world to be.

Anderson, Lindsay

Lindsay Gordon Anderson, a Scottish director, critic, and cofounder of the Free Cinema movement, played a seminal role in postwar British filmmaking. When Anderson entered the film world in 1947, British filmmakers had largely forsaken art for propaganda because of the utilitarian demands created by World War II. Accustomed to making movies that served a national purpose, British directors churned out works that, to Anderson's eyes, lacked aesthetic appeal. Preferring romanticism to realism, he urged documentarians to abandon the studios, abstain from sophisticated technology, and rediscover the freedom found in the harmony of expression and substance. His search for high art led him to direct low-budget documentaries in the 1940s and 1950s and to create the Free Cinema movement, which encouraged other filmmakers to slip out of their political and social chains. The naturalistic look at the working classes promoted by Anderson would culminate in the British New Wave.

As an editor with the influential film magazine Sequence in the late 1940s and early 1950s, Anderson championed film as art and the director as the master of the medium. He argued that only the director was in a position to determine cinematic expression. On the basis of his reputation, he received a commission to make a series of industrial films for a Yorkshire conveyor belt company, Richard Sutcliffe Ltd. He accepted the offer because he wanted to learn how to make films and he believed that documentaries offered an avenue to larger projects. Anderson's first documentary, Meet the Pioneers (1948), focused on the firm's underground conveyor system that brought coal from the mines to the pithead in Yorkshire. This series of films shares a characteristic common to Anderson documentaries, in that the subject is work itself, with the director focusing on how things are made and how processes are set in motion.

Anderson's first nonindustrial film, the thirty-minute Wakefield Express (1952), was commissioned to celebrate the one hundredth anniversary of the newspaper. Shot as usual with 16mm film, the documentary begins in typical Anderson fashion—not with background information, but with people. Although the history of the paper is provided, the director focuses on the work of producing an edition. Aiming to capture the dignity of ordinary Britons, Anderson follows a reporter as he interviews local people in search of stories, shows communal activities such as children playing, and has a final sequence of the paper going to press. Anderson was an admirer of Humphrey Jennings, and this film reflects Jennings's influence in its poetic style and focus on common subjects. By showing a reporter interviewing a ninety-five-year-old woman, Anderson imitates Jennings's manner of linking person to person to show the relationship of the past to the present. Nothing about the film is impartial—another Anderson trait. The subjects frequently play to the camera, while the director does not attempt to hide his affection, respect, and occasional exasperation for the Wakefield community.

For his next film, Anderson collaborated with Guy Brenton, an Oxford acquaintance, to direct Thursday's Children (1953), about the Royal School for Deaf Children in Margate, UK. Named after the old nursery rhyme in which 'Thursday's child has far to go', the twenty-minute documentary follows Anderson's adage that to make a film, one must create a world. Immersing the viewer fully in the lives of the children, he shows them in their boarding school as they receive lessons and explains how they came to live away from their families. Without informing the filmmakers, the British Office of Information in New York submitted the film to the Motion Picture Academy and it won an Oscar for best short subject.

Not far from the deaf school was the most popular working-class amusement park in the south of England, called 'Dreamland'. Anderson paid it a visit, and was fascinated by exhibits such as 'Torture Through the Ages' and 'Famous Executions'. He reacted harshly to the passivity of the audience in the face of the unimaginative diversions, sad exhibitions, and pitifully caged animals. It is his anger at the undemanding aesthetic criteria of the crowd that makes this documentary an aggressive criticism rather than the positive affirmation found in his other films. The thirteen-minute O Dreamland (1953) was the first film that Anderson directed with no other impetus other than his own wish to make it.

Every Day Except Christmas (1957) is a forty-minute portrait of the workers who sold fruit, flowers, and vegetables three hundred and sixty-four days a year in London's Covent Garden market. The bustling workers, who occasionally mug for the camera, were generally filmed in long shot or close-up to show both their coordinated physical activity and their unique personalities.

Once Anderson had developed a mastery of filmmaking, his impatience with the mediocrity and prescriptive narrative style of most British films of the era increased. To encourage social realist films and freedom for the filmmaker, Anderson helped to develop the small Free Cinema movement. This British group presented six programs of films at the National Film Theatre from 1956 to 1959, including O Dreamland in 1956, Wakefield Express in 1957, and Every Day Except Christmas also in 1957. In the broadest sense, Free Cinema had two objectives: to show what it valued in the cinema, with the emphasis on the work of the young contemporary filmmakers, and to show films to encourage other similar films to be made. Anderson coined the phrase 'Free Cinema', wrote most of the movement's propaganda, and directed the greatest percentage of documentaries in the programs.

Anderson always refused to give his definition of a documentary, arguing that the term limited discussion of the film in question. He cherished freedom, and his films both reflect and examine this concept. In all of his works, Anderson explores the ways in which subjects interact, and the ultimate impossibility of being subjective. Poetic and lacking technological tricks, his documentaries are unvarnished portrayals of British life during the mid-twentieth century.

Angela: Portrait of a Revolutionary paints a picture of the educator Angela Davis from the point of view of one of her students at the University of California in Los Angeles in 1971. It explores the challenges that Davis faced because of her political activism, and shows the consequences of her being a communist. Shot entirely in black and white, this low-budget, student-produced documentary film is nonetheless ambitious. It tries to capture the essence of Angela Davis, lending a multidimensional view to the person behind the picture on the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) ‘Ten Most Wanted’ poster. Yolande du Luart, the film’s director, takes a sympathetic view of Davis, while at the same time presents the story from a number of different perspectives. The film is du Luart’s attempt to legitimize Angela Davis personally, politically, and professionally.

Angela: Portrait of a Revolutionary begins with sound images of police car sirens combined with footage of Angela Davis’s arrest in New York for her alleged involvement in the failed attempt to free Black Panther George Jackson, who was on trial for allegedly killing a prison guard at Soledad Prison in California. This scene is followed by a sound image of a cell door crashing shut against a totally dark screen. The camera then focuses on the Women’s House of Detention on December 5, 1970, with a voice-over by Angela Davis stating that she is ‘now being held captive’. Next, the camera focuses on still shots of her supporters rallying outside the Women’s House of Detention, carrying posters saying, ‘Free Our Sisters in the House of D’ and

The film then flashes back in time to the autumn of 1969. The viewer is given an insider’s look at Angela Davis, the academic, who is preparing for and then teaching a class in the philosophy department at University of California, Los Angeles (UCLA). This scene is followed by one of two interviews with the Chairperson, Professor Donald Kalish, who is filmed in the middle of the screen behind his desk in his office, thus presenting an authoritative image. He discusses in a measured way why and how Professor Davis was hired, and he is quick to point out that her appointment was based on her outstanding academic credentials and the needs of the department.

Later in the film, Professor Kalish explains why the Board of Regents fired Professor Davis, and he concludes that it was because of her membership in the Communist Party. The film also includes a voice-over by Max Rafferty, a member of the Board of Regents, giving his rationale for her dismissal (Professor Davis had yet to earn her doctorate). It is important to note that the film uses more than one voice to tell the story. This use of multiple points of view ultimately gives credibility to Professor Kalish’s account. He explains how Max Rafferty is misinformed about higher education, since a completed doctorate is not a requirement for the job of Assistant Professor in the early 1970s at UCLA. In addition, toward the end of the film, Angela Davis herself tells the story of her dismissal. This scene gives Davis ownership of her story. In sum, by illustrating her academic credentials and demonstrating the reasons for her dismissal, the film invites its audience to look at the politics behind the Board of Regents’ decision.

Angela: Portrait of a Revolutionary also illustrates Davis’s core beliefs. In it, Davis tries to spell out the difficulty of not only organizing a movement for social change and equality but also struggling to maintain that movement. The film seeks to merge the political with the personal, with a series of carefully spliced scenes that move between private spaces that Davis occupies in her home and study, for example, and public spaces where she teaches, lectures, and gives political speeches. These scenes do justice to the idea that the personal and political cannot be separated. Finally, the film demonstrates how repression comes in many forms by linking the killing of two students at Jackson State College, the war in Vietnam, the killing of four white students at Kent State University, the trial in Connecticut of Bobby Seale, and the Soledad Brothers facing the gas chamber.

Other techniques include the use of sound images to remind viewers of what is not visually present (e.g. police car sirens with gunshots ringing in the background while pictures of the bloody police raid on the Black Panther Party Office in South Central Los Angeles on December 8, 1969, are shown in still shots). This series of still shots serves to imprint police brutality of African Americans on the viewer's mind, especially since it is quickly juxtaposed with still shots of posters declaring 'Feed Hungry Children' and 'Free Breakfast for School Children', representing a Black Panther Party humanitarian initiative for inner-city poor children. By juxtaposing images of mainstream atrocities and Black Panther activism, not only are Davis's political views illustrated but also the notion that Jonathan and George Jackson and other Black Panthers are simple thugs who should be locked up, is challenged.

Angela: Portrait of a Revolutionary was little noted nor long remembered. Angela Davis herself, now a Professor of Social Consciousness at the University of California in Santa Cruz, neither owns a copy of it nor has she stayed in touch with its filmmaker, Yolande du Luart, who is now translating mysteries from French to English. Yet, to use a 1960s term, Angela: Portrait of a Revolutionary seems 'relevant' to those interested in experiencing a pivotal moment in the life and work of the controversial and iconic Angela Davis, and in the production of student documentary films rooted in the political milieu of the early 1970s. Not only is the film Davis's story of struggle but it is also a political act in and of itself. In the end, it powerfully demonstrates the means and methods by which Angela Davis dedicated her life to the struggle against fascism and racism.

Anstey, Edgar

Edgar Harold Macfarlane Anstey OBE, a documentary film director, producer, and critic, was perhaps one of the most versatile documentary filmmakers of the twentieth century, moving easily between the aesthetics of his time and its science.

Living in the shadow of John Grierson's desire to reshape society with ideals of social and ethical cohesion, Anstey was the only member of the Empire Marketing Board with technical and scientific training, and he urgently felt a need to make technological processes comprehensible. Anstey instantly recognized the value of the informational film for the purpose of training and educating. He sought an opportunity to follow through this conception of the informational film, and worked on the report that brought into being the Shell Film Unit. He produced Shell's first film, Airport (Roy Lockwood, UK, 1934), an observation of a day at Croydon Airport and the systematic examination and refurbishment of an aeroplane engine.

The film lasted only seventeen minutes, but nothing could quite compare with aircraft, and everything associated with them, for excitement. Many people had never seen an aeroplane, yet everyone recognised the exotic glamour of flight. Airport informed, entertained and educated while simultaneously indicating Shell's own position in the vanguard of modernity (Howarth 1997).

Anstey shared John Grierson's view that documentary must both criticize the agents of state and represent the interests of the exploited worker. He became frustrated and unhappy with the rate of progress at Shell and resigned to pursue his ideology.

Anstey found his opportunity with the Gas, Light and Coke Company, and (along with Arthur Elton) brought to the screen Housing Problems (1935), which focused on the plight of a Stepney (in London's East End) slum dweller. In doing so, he sparked a new approach to documentary filmmaking. Housing Problems marked the beginning of Anstey's long commitment to social change. The film was well received, although Joris Ivens, a fellow documentary filmmaker, commented in hindsight:

There have been cases in the history of documentary when photographers became so fascinated by dirt that the result was the dirt looked interesting and strange, not something repellent to the audience. In my opinion [...] Housing Problems, fell into this error of exotic dirt. You could not smell these London slums.
(Ivens, 1969)

However, John Betjemen, film critic of the Evening Standard, praised this new style of filmmaking and in 1935 wrote movingly of these 'films without sex'. Betjemen came later to admire Anstey's perceptive gifts as a critic with the BBC and The Spectator.

Grierson, too, later praised Housing Problems, and noted that both Anstey and Elton had taken 'the documentary film into the field of social problems, and keyed it to the task of describing not only industrial and commercial spectacle, but social truth as well' (Grierson, 1966: 215).

Housing Problems convinced Anstey of the power of documentary, and he followed it with Enough to Eat? (1936), an examination of the problem of malnutrition. Pushing for social change, Anstey claimed that the film was a contribution to ongoing national research on nutrition and nutritional issues. Its success can be attributed to the media coverage it received, rather than the quality of the filmmaking displayed. The Catholic Herald, for example, wrote:

The film does not show the terrible ravages that undernourishment has created in England. Director Edgar Anstey has chosen the better method of revealing the tragedy of poverty and the consequent semi-starvation which is the result of a cheap diet chosen more for its filling qualities than for its nutritive value.

(The Catholic Herald, October 10, 1936)

Like Grierson, Anstey believed that documentary could act as an effective medium of communication between the government and the working classes. During World War II, while at Film Centre, he made an abundance of films for the Ministry of Information to encourage more intensive cultivation of urban gardens and mixed farms throughout Great Britain.

It was during this time that the Scientific Film Association was formed. Anstey and Arthur Elton were convinced that film had a singular power to impart information. Anstey believed passionately that the scientist and the technologist shared the imagination and insight of the artist, and after the war he and Elton created the International Scientific Film Association to disseminate a wider corroboration of their outlook.

Anstey, like Grierson, had established himself at the forefront of documentary production. From the early 1940s he largely settled into the role of producer. His appointment as Films Officer and Producer in Charge to the British Transport Commission in 1949 allowed him to use his gifts and abilities to satisfy his vision for documentary film.

Antonio, Emile de

Emile de Antonio is best known for his innovations in the approach to documentary filmmaking. His works engage viewers in pointed political discourse through the clever arrangement of images, historical footage, interviews, text, sound, and other elements compiled to create a story without the use of a narrator. Although he came to filmmaking in his forties and made relatively few major films, de Antonio is a significant figure in the history of documentary. Nearly all of his films are explorations of the Cold War, its legacies, and its effects on US culture and values systems.

Perhaps the most fascinating thing about de Antonio's work is his challenge to the idea of truth being told about historical events. De Antonio is quite willing to accept that any story may have as many explanations and meanings given as it does witnesses. The notion of direct address of the witness championed by de Antonio is a simple principle with extremely complex implications for the understanding of history. This concept was well illustrated by his pioneering use of found footage. Television images are used to strengthen the inherent arguments about power and human nature that surface in his work.

De Antonio's first film was formulated in this way. Point of Order (1964) used historical footage of the McCarthy hearings to illustrate the trajectory of the tale. De Antonio employed distinctive editing techniques to create meaningful juxtapositions. He continued to explore the recontextualization of previously filmed material for the next few films, honing his skills in the compilation images. Although this is interesting as a formal technique, it is even more intriguing when the content is considered as well. The films of Emile de Antonio are largely about sociopolitical concerns, and this is well supported by the use of the televised image as a storytelling device. In a 1971 interview de Antonio spoke of his impetus for creating the film:

The Army-McCarthy hearings were a peak in American political theater. And there were lessons derived from it [...]

You get something like the Army-McCarthy hearings on television—in all its body, all of it—and something is revealed about the nature of our governmental structure, our society, where the real power is [...] because the whole thing about American politics is that it's a game, a game whereby you hide what's really happening from the American people while its happening. And that's part of what the film is all about, to show that game.

(Weiner 1971: 9)

This concept continued to propel de Antonio's work throughout the 1960s and 1970s.

Among de Antonio's best-known works is 1968's In the Year of the Pig, a film comprising found footage from many diverse sources designed to illustrate the high-level confusion of the Vietnam War. De Antonio skillfully organized images to raise difficult questions about the nature of US involvement in the war. Composed of his own interviews and new footage—combined with material gleaned from a detailed study of footage shot by the National Liberation Front, the Democratic Republic of Vietnam, the French Army, the American Broadcasting Company, and the BBC—In the Year of the Pig examines a complex issue from many angles. At the time of the 1971 Film Quarterly interview, de Antonio spoke of the impact of the news media and the war that was still underway.

There is nothing as bad that's happened concerning the war as the networks' coverage of it, because it seems as if they're covering the war whereas in fact, they're not. The networks have made the American people, in a final way, comfortable with the war—because it appears between commercials, every day; it's become part of our quotidian existence, like armpit commercials. There's never the question asked, 'Why are we doing this? What is this war about?' It's never suggested by anything that occurs on television that we should even be interested in that type of question. Television is a way of avoiding coming to terms with the fact that we're in this war.

It is intriguing that this statement has continued relevance today.

Perhaps the most unique of de Antonio's films is Painters Painting (1972), in that it is unlike any of his other work. This exploration of several artists' thoughts and concerns in their working environments is still compelling today for its direct approach to the artists and their processes. His first film in 35mm, this work sought to create a synthesis of form and content as it used this collage style of filmmaking to look at several artists who worked in collage painting. De Antonio stated:

This is a film about the System of the art world in the words of the people in that world: [Willem] de Kooning, [Robert] Motherwell, Jasper Johns, Andy Warhol, Robert Rauschenberg, Frank Stella, Barney Newman [...] and so on. Most of these are people I've known and who are friends of mine, but the film also includes the collectors, the manipulators, and the museum people and how an art market is created.

The film is entertaining and insightful, like other de Antonio works, but its political inquiry is less overt than in the rest of his catalog.

Emile de Antonio remains an important figure in documentary filmmaking. In recent memory, his works have taken on a renewed sense of social poignancy and verve. As documentary film has become more mass produced and widely screened throughout the world, the significance of de Antonio is heightened.

Apted, Michael

Michael Apted has been involved in documentary filmmaking since the early 1960s. He has long been known for his patient, probing interviews and the simple truths revealed through them. Apted is perhaps best known for his Up series, a remarkable continuation of a project he worked on as a researcher in 1963. Directed by Paul Almond for Granada TV, this film (Seven Up) was the start of an idea that is clearly and uniquely Apted. Fourteen British boys and girls were interviewed for this work, and the thoughts and hopes of seven-year-olds were revealed. Apted endeavored to continue this notion in 1970, when he interviewed the same set of youngsters (now fourteen years old) in his Seven Plus Seven. At seven-year intervals, Apted has interviewed these same people, producing 21 Up (1977), 28 Up (1985), 35 Up (1991), 42: Forty-Two Up (1998) and 49 Up (2005). This is unlike any other cinematic endeavor on record, and although a few of the original fourteen have dropped out of the project, those who remain have become very close to Apted and to each other. This careful study of human life, its simplicity, joys and sorrows, is indeed an epic documentary project.

Amid the years of this ongoing cinematic task, Apted has worked as a director for both independent and Hollywood features as well as continuing his documentary work. In 1985 he released Bring on the Night, a document of musician Sting and his tour experience, both backstage and in concert.

Apted's interest in political and social issues is evident in much of his work. His 1992 documentary, Incident at Oglala, explores the controversial case of two murdered Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) agents on the reservation at Pine Ridge, South Dakota, USA and the incarceration of Native American Leonard Peltier for these crimes. The film painstakingly investigates witnesses' accounts of the events of July 1975, showing testimonials from the legal proceedings, surveying evidence, and interviewing various players. Apted ultimately provides a study not only of the events themselves but also of the way in which people respond to the pressures of accusation, the role that race plays in such a case, and the notion of justice itself. Apted's 1994 film Moving the Mountain continues with this political framework as it explores the Tiananmen Square student demonstrations of June 1989 in Beijing, China. The 1997 project Inspirations is not overtly political, yet it investigates ideas themselves in a very critical manner, a kind of creative activism at play in the film. Apted interviewed artists about the specifics of their process in art-making, with attention paid to the exercise of problem solving. Musician David Bowie, pop art painter Roy Lichtenstein, glass artist Dale Chihuly, dancer Edouard Locke, actress Louise LeCavalier, architect Tadao Ando, and ceramicist and poet Nora Noranjo-Morse answer questions regarding the nature of their creativity and the origins of their ideas. In an interview with Pamela Klaffke, Apted explained his views on filmmaking and art:

You have to have a vision. That was why I was so interested in having an architect [in the film]. I felt a real sense of camaraderie with him because I felt both of our jobs are very public jobs, very collaborative, very man-management, very political jobs. It's a form of art, but not what I would call pure art of the blank page, the oil, the clay, the glass or whatever. It is a sort of art, but a wider view of art being a film director than being a composer, poet, painter or sculptor—because there are so many hands on your work.

Apted continues this tack of social and political observation in his new serial documentary, Married in America. A production of A&E Television Networks, this 2002 work represents the second time Apted has used the notion of returning to a subject as a method of storytelling. Married in America explores the lives of nine diverse couples, including racially mixed pairs, those who were previously married or of different religions, and a lesbian couple. All of these couples live in or near Los Angeles, New York, or Birmingham, Alabama. Surely this regional specificity will allow for closer examination of the social issues at hand in these places and the things they create in these relationships. Apted intends to visit the couples, whether they remain together or not, to see what has transpired in their lives. Of interest to him is the question of 'family values' rhetoric in a society filled with divorce and single-parent households. Do age and class differences, past relationships, and family pressures complicate these unions in similar ways? (Chocano 2002). The institution of marriage itself is examined here. Are there things that make a marriage work in today's world? Can the success of a union be predicted from the interactions between the people involved? Are the struggles of the early years always beneath the surface as the relationship continues? Apted is intrigued by these simple human dramas that shape society's attitudes. The second series was made in 2006.

Arcand, Denys

Denys Arcand made his first film, A l'est d'Eaton/East of Eaton (1959), with Stéphane Venne when he was eighteen years old. A few years later, while studying history at the Université de Montréal, he codirected Seul ou avec d'autres/Alone or with Others (1962) with Stéphane Venne and Denis Héroux. Seul ou avec d'autres was a docudrama on the life of university students. Although Arcand did not intend to pursue a career as a filmmaker at that time, he applied for a summer job at the National Film Board of Canada (NFB) and was hired to research and write a screenplay for a documentary on the founder of Québec City, Samuel de Champlain. He was eventually hired to direct the short film Champlain (1964) and two other shorts on the history of New France, Les Montréalistes/Ville-Marie (1965) and La route de l'ouest/The Westward Road (1965). After working on a few generic shorts in the late 1960s, such as Volleyball (1966), he made his first feature-length documentary, On est au coton/Cotton Mill, Treadmill (1970), an examination of the textile industry in Québec. The film was deemed subversive by NFB commissioner Sydney Newman, and banned from distribution until 1976.

The controversy surrounding On est au coton brought attention to Arcand, and he was given the opportunity to direct three fiction films in the private sector: La maudite galette/The Damed Dough (1971), Réjeanne Padovani (1973), and Gina (1975). The latter offers an intriguing commentary on the then censored On est au coton by presenting a fictionalized account of the shooting of the documentary.

Before leaving the NFB to work in the private sector, Arcand had shot a film on the provincial electoral campaign of 1970. Released in 1972, Québec: Duplessis et après .../Québec: Duplessis and After ..., argues that the right-wing ideology of Maurice Duplessis, who dominated the Québec political scene from 1936 until his death in 1959, was still present in the political discourse of 1970, even in the supposedly left-wing platform of the separatist Parti Québécois. With this film, Arcand managed to attract criticism from both sides of the political spectrum. He returned to the NFB in the late 1970s to make his last documentary, Le confort et l'indifférence/Comfort and Indifference (1981), on the failure of the 1980 referendum on Québec's independence (sixty percent voted against Québec's sovereignty). Arguing that pro-sovereignty Premier René Lévesque (in power from 1976 to 1985) misread the population's seeming enthusiasm for separation from Canada, Arcand was reproached by nationalists for his claim that residents of Québec were more interested in personal gratification than social and political issues.

Since the 1980s, Arcand has worked exclusively in fictional film. Le déclin de l'empire américain/Decline of the American Empire (1986) and Jésus de Montréal/Jesus of Montreal (1989) enjoyed tremendous success both in Canada and abroad.

From Champlain to his latest fiction film, The Age of Ignorance (2007), Arcand has consistently adopted a dialogic approach to his material, always articulating at least two discourses simultaneously as a means of 'problematizing' any simplistic reading of his subject matter. For instance, although On est au coton carries out a Marxist examination of working conditions in textile mills, it also undermines Marxist teleology by demonstrating the proletariat's inability to improve its circumstances. Similarly, in Le confort et l'indifférence, he exposes the weaknesses of both the separatist project and the federalist status quo. Arcand rarely provides solutions in his films, but never fails to make his audience think.

Ark, The

(UK, Dineen, 1993)

The Ark of the title refers to the Regent's Park Zoo in London. Shot over the course of a year, Molly Dineen's four-part series won a BAFTA for its portrayal of the zoo as it struggled to find both financial security and a resolution to the often conflicting demands of being both a center of scientific research and a popular visitor attraction.

As producer, photographer, and director, Dineen is central to all aspects of the film. As in her previous work, Dineen uses a minimal contextualizing voice-over and develops an informal, dialogic relationship with her subjects. Dineen's direct interjections are also fairly minimal and used only where necessary to draw out further revelations. These are often interspersed with long observational sequences that reveal the workings of the zoo, and interactions between the staff and between keepers and animals. However, Dineen's presence is clearly announced. The 'performance', both in terms of her own interventions and direction, as well as her subjects' response to her and the camera, provides the dynamic on which she builds her narratives (Bruzzi 2000). By creating such clearly authored films, Dineen makes transparent the constructed nature of documentary filmmaking and, to a certain extent, avoids the more extravagant claims for objectivity that normally accompany observational approaches. Rather than an attempt to disguise her presence, the films are a record of the developing and fairly informal relationship between Dineen and her subjects.

Episode one, Survival of the Fittest, establishes the basic financial crisis facing the zoo. The second episode, Natural Selection, illustrates the logistical problems facing the zoo after a round of layoffs, and the next phase of cost cutting—the reduction and dispersal of the animal collection. The Political Animal covers the complex negotiations surrounding the arrival of two giant pandas and establishes the growing struggle over the future of the zoo, underscored by the open challenge to management by a dissident group of keepers and the Fellows of the Royal Zoological Society. The last episode, Tooth and Claw, shows the final confrontation between the reform group and management, which leads to the departure of David Jones, the zoo's director.

The role and fate of public and cultural institutions in the face of neo-liberal economic theory was a central theme in the political discourse of the 1980s and 1990s. The Ark creates an intriguing picture of the internal workings of a venerable and seemingly unshakeable organization under threat in the shifting economic sands of the period. However, the wider issue of the place of zoos in relation to contemporary cultural mores and environmental concerns go unexamined in The Ark. Dineen's focus here, as in her other work, is primarily on character. As she states, 'Through focusing on the human drama and trying to tell a story through character[...], you can portray more of life's transparent complexities and contradictions' (MacDonald and Cousins 1998: 365). In the crisis that overtakes the zoo, Dineen's sympathy appears to lie with the keepers, due mainly to their clear dedication to their work and attachment to the animals. Yet, they are presented either as relatively passive in their acceptance of layoffs, or—in the case of those who organize to oust management—inappropriately conspiratorial. The dedication of the keepers is most dramatically revealed in the twenty-four-hour battle to save a sick koala bear. This emergency is contrasted with the ruthless politicking of senior management and the reform group of keepers and Fellows. However, David Jones, the zoo's director, who oversaw the cuts to the staff and collection, becomes a figure who, in turn, is treated with increasing sympathy as his own job is threatened. The eventual death of the koala is tellingly juxtaposed with news of Jones's redundancy.

Dineen's expressed determination to treat all sides with equanimity and to avoid stereotyping makes her appear uncomfortable at times with the very real conflicts made manifest as the crisis develops. Her frequent reappearance in the final episode to seek the views of the world-weary, apolitical Senior Keeper of Birds, David Robinson, is perhaps indicative of the need to find expression for her own neutral stance to the situation (Bruzzi 2000). Much of Dineen's work, such as Home from the Hill (BBC2, 1985) and In the Company of Men (BBC2, 1995), is overtly constructed around her relationship with male characters. This is also apparent in The Ark. Although the female staff members are approached, these interactions tend to be relatively formal in tone and lack the more familiar, even flirtatious, manner of her dealings with some of the central male figures. Her sympathetic treatment of Jones is perhaps symptomatic of the 'glorifying and exonerating of masculinity' (Bruzzi 2000: 169), which, it could be argued, is an underlying tendency in much of her earlier work. The final shots show the zoo's disused Bear Mountain, portrayed as a desolate wasteland. Shot in this way, this highly symbolic indicator of the zoo's wellbeing appears to reflect Dineen's own uncertainty about the situation, after the status quo has been disrupted by Jones's dismissal.

If Dineen's approach consciously glosses over the details and wider implications of the zoo's crisis, her ability to develop close relationships with her subjects, and to entreat them to speak openly about themselves before the camera, allows for a revealing glimpse of the zoo to be communicated. The Ark is also memorable for the finely observed relationships between the keepers and their animals, providing moments of real affection and humor.

Ascent of Man, The

(UK, 1973)

The Ascent of Man (1973), BBC TV's critically acclaimed major television documentary series of thirteen fifty-minute parts, is a television history of scientific ideas from prehistory to the late twentieth century. Its central organising metaphor is the optimism of the 'long childhood' of the growth of human intelligence. The BBC saw the series as the scientific counterpart of Civilisation, its impressive series on Western art and architecture. The Ascent of Man was written and narrated to camera by the late Dr Jacob Bronowski, a scientific humanist whose aim throughout was to portray science as an historically contextualized human achievement and progress, made possible by evolving human biology and intelligence, and not as a dry, abstract, and depersonalised array of scientific theories and facts. For example, in Part Five, 'The Music of the Spheres', Bronowski humanises mathematics: 'Calculation was an endless delight to Moorish scholars. They loved problems.' Similarly, in Part Six, 'The Starry Messenger', he observes: 'There are good Renaissance reasons—emotional, rather than intellectual—that made [Copernicus] choose the golden sun' as the centre of the universe. Late in life, Bronowski wrote: 'All that I have written [...] turns on the same centre: the uniqueness of man that grows out of his struggle (and his gift) to understand both nature and himself' (O'Conner and Robertson 2003).

Although remembered mainly as a scientist and mathematician, Bronowski was also an accomplished writer and poet. His first book, The Poet's Defence (1939), examined the relationship between scientific and poetic or human truth. Bronowski's integration of biology and physics is the central motif of The Ascent of Man. In the final chapter of the book of The Ascent of Man series, Bronowski states that he moved from physics to biology when it occurred to him that 'justice is part of the biological equipment of man', that we are 'ethical creatures' and that 'knowledge is not a loose-leaf notebook of facts'. In his Science and Human Values (1956, revised 1965), Bronowski addressed the two-culture debate between science and humanism. He believed that through science the human mind has always sought to find unity in the chaos of nature. Bronowski's instinct for presenting his ideas as strong, interesting narratives is central to his desire to make abstract and normally difficult notions lucid, and to facilitate narrativity he organised the vast amount of content thematically. Sir David Attenborough, Director of Programmes for the BBC when the series was made, commented, 'Bronowski was nothing short of inspired [... He] understood that one of the secrets of programme-making is great story telling'.

Permeating Bronowski's script is his rejection of the subject-object dualism that characterised scientific rationality up to the nineteenth century and that was discarded in the twentieth century with the revolution in philosophy towards a relational reality. In The Ascent of Man he states, 'Physics becomes [...] the greatest collective work of art of the twentieth century.' In Part Eleven, 'Knowledge or Certainty', Bronowski prioritises humanity over scientific preoccupation in an unforgettable sequence where, as he wades into the ashes pond at Auschwitz death camp, he says to the camera, 'We have to cure ourselves of the itch for absolute knowledge and power. We have to close the distance between the push-button order and the human act. We have to touch people.' He then reaches into the water and pulls up a handful of mud in a sequence of stop-motion shots. The effect, in context, is a sudden, emotionally charged move from cognition to emotion. Another example from Part Eleven is when Bronowski states to the camera, 'There is no absolute knowledge. And those who claim it, whether scientists or dogmatists, open the door to tragedy. All information is imperfect. We have to treat it with humility. That is the human condition; and that is what quantum physics says. I mean that quite literally.' His statement is followed by actual images of what the world would look like if seen successively through each band of the electromagnetic spectrum, not only from infrared to ultraviolet but also through the radio waves of radar, X-rays, and the electron microscope. He concludes that, in seeking the ultimate image of reality, there is no ideal wavelength: 'Even the hardest electrons do not give a hard outline. The perfect image is still as remote as the distant stars.'

Responses to the series also reflect the old tension between Education and Media Studies over assumptions that television is so constrained that it can say nothing that is not intrinsically superficial. This is part of the continuing contest for cultural authority between conceptual knowledge derivable from the printed word and the kind of knowledge of actuality derivable from pictures. Prior to making The Ascent of Man, Bronowski had shown considerable ability in both writing and broadcasting for television and radio and he believed that the written word had advantages over the audiovisual medium in the amount of detail of data that can be presented. However, as both poet and scientist, Bronowski was interested in successfully reconciling abstraction and actuality: previously in the BBC's Insight he had won a reputation for being able to express abstract and difficult ideas in science (e.g. entropy), mathematics (e.g. probability), human intelligence, and philosophy. He similarly approached The Ascent of Man with a strong sense of the need for television to acquit itself as a medium capable of effectively representing abstract ideas. The title of the series is ironic: the work of male scientists abounds but the contribution of women to the history and philosophy of science is lacking.

Critically, The Ascent of Man is still regarded as a tour de force among television documentaries. Christopher Dunkley of the Financial Times wrote that it was the 'most colossal concept I have ever come across in television', and the Daily Telegraph described its form as 'splendid'. Another observed that The Ascent of Man is a series 'looked up to by every producer of factual, educational programmes', and that it is made 'in a style much copied since'.

Aubervilliers

(France, Lotar, 1945)

Aubervilliers was made early in the post-World War II period by the director Eli Lotar. The French provisional government under Charles de Gaulle had some communist representatives, and the Fourth Republic, the Marshall Plan, and the prosperity and baby boom of the late 1940s and 1950s were yet to come. In the film, the narrator asserts that the ruins of Aubervilliers, a suburb of Paris, 'are not the brand new ruins of the war', but rather 'ancient, commonplace ruins, the mere ruins of workers' misery'.

Appearing ten years after Anstey and Elton's Housing Problems, Aubervilliers embraces the documentary forms of its time. Shot with no synchronous sound, it relies on commentary and music to maintain its discursive function. The narrative is driven by both the commentary and a song performed by Germaine Montero, both written by Jacques Prévert. The essentially denunciative intention intertwines with nostalgia, irony, humanism, and optimism. This approach recalls the feature films of French poetic realism. Lotar had previously worked as a cameraperson with Jean Renoir (Une Partie de campagne), Pierre Prévert (L’Affaire est dans le sac), Luis Buñuel (Las Hurdes), and Joris Ivens (Zuiderzee).

In a firm demonstration, sustained by striking and often shocking images, the film rises up in protest before misery, siding with workers and paying tribute to their strength and dignity. The commentary, as well as the song, salute repeatedly the ‘good children of Aubervilliers, good children of proletarians, good children of misery, good children of the whole world’. At the end, the voice-over states, ‘It is once again the simple, rude hand of the worker that will shake up this stiff and depressed world, this world that badly needs to change, that will finally change some day.’

The documentary strategy employed by Aubervilliers is threefold. An unconcealed camera presents shots and scenes that depict the general mood of the time. Short sequences are obviously reenacted, such as one of a girl walking to a water fountain. More specifically, persons working at home are filmed frontally, as if posing for a photographer, in a collaborative relationship. Their words, failing to be recorded, are reformulated off screen.

Aubervilliers is the major work of a minor filmmaker.

Australia

From the very birth of cinema, successive Australian governments had observed and developed strategies to explore and use the possibilities of film as a means of national projection. Before 1912 the Commonwealth government contracted private production companies to film official events and produce short nonfiction films for theatrical release. Following the appointment of an official cinematographer in 1912, the Cinema and Photographic Branch was established on a temporary basis with the brief ‘to film anything of interest’.

On 27 May 1913 the Department of External Affairs sent a letter to cinematographer Bert Ives: ‘Sir: in confirmation of my telegrams of yesterday’s date I have the honour to inform you that the Minister has approved of your appointment as cinematographer and photographer in this department at the rate of pounds five per week.’ Ives was now the official cameraman to the nation (he remained in the position until 1939), with the more specific brief to make films promoting Australia abroad and to record major events.

The new department developed along predictable lines. During the 1920s and 1930s the Melbourne Cinema Division increased its staff and produced newsreels and short features, much as the Empire Marketing Board under John Grierson would a decade later in Britain. Wheat, beef, and tobacco were featured in a series, ‘Know Your Country’, using a simplistic flat-on film style and using the mantra of Australia—‘the vast and rich land’.

From 1915 to 1930 approximately one reel of film per week was produced by the Branch for theatrical release. During the 1930s sound films were released less regularly. There are several of these in the National Film and Sound Archive Collection, including This is Australia, Mineral Wealth, and Australian Sugar. Such films were typically overburdened with long-winded commentaries that were still the official mode of address until the war years when there was something to be portentous about. The stereotypes of the nation thus projected were directly in line with the views of national character advanced by historians such as C.E.W. Bean and film studios (Efftee and Cinesound) producing epic and pastoral features or rural comedies like Dad and Dave (1932).

Documentary features were also intermittently produced, notably featuring the location cinematography of pioneering documentary-maker Captain Frank Hurley. Hurley was celebrated for his sweeping romantic nature still photography and film work in the heroic style of colonial painters like John Glover. Hurley established an early international fame with his Antarctic films Home of the Blizzard (1913) and In the Grip of the Polar Pack-Ice (1917), which contained much sensationalisation of ‘cannibal attacks’, but was a huge touring success in England and the United States, as well as later tropical adventures documented in Pearls and Savages (1921).

The now-developed tradition of filming in exotic or dangerous locations would, sixty years later, be a feature of the political documentaries of Gil Scrine and David Bradbury (Chile: Hasta Cuando?, Front Line). During World War II it saw the rise of a generation of war correspondents. Damien Parer won the Academy Award for Best Documentary in 1942 for his coverage of Pacific action in World War II in Kokoda Front Line (Cinesound Review, 1942). Following an invitation by the Australian government, John Grierson visited Australia in 1940 to report on the setting up of a more responsive and creative film production arm of government along the lines of the Crown Film Unit.

Grierson strongly recommended the non-theatrical use of 16mm film for general purposes. The Commonwealth Government established the ANFB (Australian National Film Board) in 1945 with the principal task of overseeing the production and distribution of documentary films and the importation of overseas documentaries. The National Library, in collaboration with the state libraries, became the national distributor of 16mm films for nontheatrical, educational use.

Instead of being set up as an independent statutory authority along the lines of the Canadian National Film Board, the ANFB in Australia soon came under the direct control of the Department of Information. In 1946 Stanley Hawes was appointed to the new position of Producer-in-Chief, a position he held until his retirement in 1970. Hawes was effectively a Grierson appointment, having worked with the General Post Office (GPO) Film Unit in London and later with Grierson in Ottawa before accepting the new post in Australia.

The key films produced by the Film Division in this period were Native Earth (John Heyer, 1946), Journey of a Nation (John Heyer, 1947), School in the Mail-Box (Stanley Hawes, 1947), Born in the Sun (John Heyer, 1947), The Cane Cutters (Hugh McInnes, 1948), The Valley is Ours (John E. Seyer, 1948), Goldtown (R. Maslyn Williams, 1949), Mike and Stefani

(R. Maslyn Williams, 1951), and Outback Patrol (Lee Robinson, 1952). All of the films of this period were very much in the GPO Film Unit mold, but featured mobile and fluid camera work (influenced by the successful Cinesound and Movietone newsreels) and a keen sense of a plastic landscape moulded by heat and time to very different forms and vistas than the familiar European models. Cities might look much alike the world over but the documentary filmmakers of this period were concerned, in line with nationalist literary movements, to express the difference of the Australian landscape and its unique challenges. Thus, School in a Mail-Box (1947) dealt with the unique outback correspondence school systems developed to serve far-flung rural communities, and the oeuvre of the filmmakers taken as a collective expressed a coherent vision of Australia as a country where highly urbanised cities clung to the rim of a harsh and unrelenting (the favourite adjectives of voice-over) inland.

The outstanding filmmaker of this period was to be John Heyer, whose best work was with the ANFB and whose most iconic and successful work was Back of Beyond (Shell, 1954), a lyrical film about the overland delivery run of the mail and provisions truck driver, shot entirely on location often in the most difficult circumstances—a decision rewarded with some of the finest location cinematography of the period and an outstanding film dealing with a vanished outback world that still has resonance today.

The aims and styles of the ANFB production slate changed little throughout the 1950s and 1960s. The 1964 film From the Tropics to the Snow, however, dealt in a self-reflexive way with the efforts of a team of ANFB producers to showcase Australia’s tourist attractions. It provided a humorous insight into the production system and it introduced many of the key figures of the postwar period. The film is now considered an essential research aid for any film historian rather than a great piece of documentary work, indicating an institution more interested in self-perpetuation than breaking new ground—or the rules.

Public broadcasting and documentary practice

provided both the training and the showcase for more innovative documentary practice from the introduction of television in 1956.

The tradition of Australia's Public Broadcaster as major producer of documentaries, inherited from the BBC in the early 1960s, continues today in diminished form. In the 1960s outstanding documentary filmmakers like director Bill Fitzwater (Boom Radio 1967) and Geoff Barnes (formerly head of documentary at the ABC) all shot their early films with the national broadcaster. Oscar-winning cinematographers Dean Semmler (Dances with Wolves) and John Seale (The English Patient) both trained as news and documentary cameramen at the ABC.

The best work of salaried ABC directors and crew was often to be seen in cinéma vérité documentary series such as Chequerboard (1968–72). Other series that used documentary techniques and often tackled major subjects were A Big Country (1968 until the early 1990s) and Four Corners (1961 and continuing), based on the BBC Panorama series, which on occasion continues with its one-hour format to produce and break major investigative stories, beginning with a controversial feature documentary on the Returned Services League (RSL) in 1963 and continuing to disturb the status quo to this day. As a documentary forum, Four Corners has consistently produced programmes that have effected more social and political change than any comparable series in the media history of the nation.

*Outside the public broadcasters:
independent documentary and dramatised documentary*

Today, the market and creative development systems are now dominated by a near monopoly on larger budget film funding by the (Australian) Film Finance Corporation. Some documentaries continue to be produced by both the ABC and the multicultural broadcaster, SBS, under various banners (The View from Here, ABC) through the late 1990s, and some fine documentaries are still being produced in-house—notably and most regularly, the short weekly documentary series Australian Story (1996 and continuing).

Former ABC producers such as Jenny Brockie continue to contribute personal evocations of the Australian (mainly suburban) zeitgeist with series like Our Street (2000–1). Here, personal style and involvement painted a striking series of portraits of Australia in cinéma vérité style, focusing on lives as far apart as those of the middle class in the larger coastal cities to the wilder eccentricities of hot and coastal Darwin.

The most influential free-to-air filmmakers of the period work outside the main channels as freelancers and include the writer Ian David, whose research and obsession led to the making of two dramatised documentaries of great influence, politically as well as aesthetically. The first was Police State (Chris Noonan, 1989), which mixed transcripts and newsclips to project a detailed and powerful vision of Queensland as a police state under the long-surviving rightist government of Joh Bjelke-Petersen. David writes dramatised documentary films that stylistically and thematically have much in common with Errol Morris's Thin Blue Line (1988) in their handling of suppressed materials and silenced witnesses. Blue Murder (Michael Jenkins, 1995) moved from a collagist approach to a more dramatised and character-driven style, documenting corruption within the New South Wales police force that had major legal repercussions and was partly responsible for the establishment of a Royal Commission. Few writers, however, have been as influential as David, and his writer-director (auteurist) mode of work remains the norm as well as the most likely to be funded under the rubric of 'director's vision' obsessively employed by all the major bodies (both Federal and State).

SBS and its independent production arm, SBSi, have also become key players in factual film production from experimental and arts programming to documentaries commissioned to reflect the multicultural remit of the channel. Arguably the most successful and important initiatives from SBS came with a season of documentaries on Aboriginal dispossession (Unfinished Business, 2000) from which grew the outstanding films Stolen Generations by Tom Zubrycki and Sally Browning, and Cry from the Heart by Jeni Kendall. Both films examined the disastrous effects of the policies of forced removal of Aboriginal children, which had been the subject of a national inquiry (published as Bringing Them Home, released in 1997). These and similar films on Aboriginality and cultural identity have been produced and screened by SBS at a steady rate and seem set to continue as a core activity for the broadcaster as long as it survives under its current charter.

The independent sector up to the present

The most consistently interesting and provocative documentary-makers of the last two decades have been those filmmakers who engaged with the margins of political and social themes.

David Bradbury's documentary oeuvre has proved paradigmatic of many Australian filmmakers' fascination with international political trouble spots and the exotic. Works echoed the much earlier work of Frank Hurley and Damien Parer and the more recent outstanding work of frontline war zone cinematographers like Neil Davis, who was himself the subject of a film by Bradbury.

'Keep the camera rolling, no matter what', was Neil Davis's motto, and in 1985 he literally filmed his own death. Bradbury's powerful tribute, Front Line, was an account of the Vietnam War as seen through the camera of Neil Davis, and is a fine record, full of astonishing action footage of a life lived on the edge—Davis's own death and legend echoing Damien Parer's death while filming in a war zone forty years before. The more political films of Bradbury include Public Enemy Number One (1980), an examination of controversial Australian journalist Wilfred Burchett who chose to report from the 'other side' in the Vietnam War and whose unorthodox views and activities caused him to be labeled a traitor by many. Burchett was the first Western journalist to report on the devastating aftereffects of the atomic bomb dropped on Hiroshima.

Nicaragua—No Pasarán (Bradbury 1984) tracks from 1978 the postrevolutionary Sandinista movement and the past, present, and future of this small Central American nation—another strongly personal portrait of a brutal military dictatorship made during a three-month visit to Chile. The footage reveals a country torn with civil strife and political unrest, military intimidation of the population, and indiscriminate arrests, murder, torture, and disappearances. Bradbury's personal involvement in his subjects and his sharp sense of irony are nowhere more apparent than in the opening scenes showing a wealthy right-wing couple in their Santiago mansion pontificating uninterrupted on the excellence of Augusto Pinochet's attitude to and actions against dissenters (especially young students). Bradbury often narrates his own work, diary-style, and his work overall has a spare quality that makes overt political comment unnecessary. South of the Border (1988) examines how the political and economic struggle in Central America is expressed through the music of the people south of the US border. Bradbury later turned to more local Australian themes with films such as State of Shock (1989), which deals with a notorious court case involving the dispossessed semi-tribal Aborigines.

Tom Zubrycki is widely respected as one of Australia's leading documentary filmmakers. He has worked consistently over the last decades as director of a series of films with strong social and political themes. Waterloo (1981), Kemira: A Diary of a Strike (1984), and Friends and Enemies (1987) were all shot in an offhand style. The subjects were allowed free expressive rein and thus remained valuable documents of Australian union and class struggle in confrontations in what were primarily heavy industry and inner-urban settings. Lord of the Bush (1989), Amongst Equals (1990), Homelands (1993), and Billal (1996) continued Zubrycki's role as diarist of social upheaval and issues-based filmmaking. Later he was to become equally influential as a producer of equally edgy films ranging from the migrant experience, as relived through the filmmaker's return to a war-shattered former Yugoslavia in Exile in Sarajevo (1997), International Emmy (1998), as well as more quirky local subjects like Dr Jazz (1998), and social documents such as Whiteys Like Us (1999) and Stolen Generations (2000).

Arguably Zubrycki's own most 'international' film was also his most internationally successful: The Diplomat (2000) follows East Timor's freedom fighter and Nobel Peace Prize winner José Ramos Horta in the final tumultuous year of his campaign to secure independence for his country. This feature-length film takes up Ramos Horta's story in the final dramatic stages of his long journey—the fall of Indonesia's President Suharto, the referendum to determine East Timor's future, the overwhelming vote for independence, the devastating carnage that ensued, the intervention of United Nations peacekeepers, and Ramos Horta's final triumphant return to his homeland.

Dennis O'Rourke, the most internationally recognised of recent Australian independent documentary filmmakers began his career with two films dealing with the early days of Papua New Guinea (Niugini) independence: Yumi Yet (1976) and Ileksen (1978), featuring striking handheld cinematography by Dick Marks. The films are distinguished by unusual access to key figures of power, such as the first Prime Minister of Niugini, Michael Somare.

O'Rourke had now attracted international funding as well as critical acclaim. His next film, Yap ... How Did You Know We'd Like TV? (1980), dealt with the total corruption of local Solomon Islands culture by a wholesale bombardment of American daily television (flown in daily from Los Angeles). The film revealed a sardonic streak in O'Rourke's later projects that became a recognisable trait in all his work as he moved into edgier territories with The Shark Callers of Kontu (1982), Couldn't Be Fairer (1984), and the fine Half Life: A Parable for the Nuclear Age (1985), which established O'Rourke as a world filmmaker whose filmmaking and sociological interests were now outrunning the Pacific Rim.

Nevertheless, O'Rourke returned to Niugini with Cannibal Tours (1988), a witty examination of European tourists juxtaposed with the 'authentic' lives of the Niuginians held up for their entertainment.

With (again government funded) The Good Woman of Bangkok (1991) O'Rourke became the centre of an international controversy as the film documented his relationship with a Thai prostitute, Aoi. The resulting outcries circled the globe through every means, both at academic conferences and at professional associations, and raised issues of gender, sexism, third-world politique, and exploitation.

O'Rourke's work continues to provoke and attract audiences and his film Cunnamulla (2000) played to a wide art house audience in Australia and garnered interest and acclaim internationally. Although it deals for the first time with O'Rourke's own very personal 'backyard'—the people who live in the fast-failing outback town of Cunnamulla—the film, with all the irony and quiet savagery, is O'Rourke's best work.

Bob Connolly was another filmmaker to have developed his skills at the ABC (1964–78), first as a foreign correspondent and later as a documentary filmmaker. He and Robin Anderson (as cameraman-director and sound recorder, respectively) worked from a base of strict social observation and deep research, using on location a remarkable degree of ability to relax and literally live with their filmic subjects. Anderson also had worked at the ABC, as a researcher, and both he and Connolly left to begin work as independent filmmakers with the masterful interweaving of themes of colonialism and kinship with First Contact (1983). The film was an anthropological study of the impact of the pioneering Leahy brothers in the New Guinea Highlands in the 1930s, leading to a consideration of both the cultural impact of their visit and the effects produced on Old Joe Leahy's scarcely acknowledged son, Joe, the child of a liaison with a tribal woman. This subject and associated themes developed further in three years of filming that produced Joe Leahy's Neighbours (1989) and the richly ironic and ultimately tragicomic Black Harvest (1992). These films, like the earlier part of the trilogy, won many international and local awards and enjoyed successful cinema releases, setting a pattern that has now become quite common for at least two or three major documentaries a year—creating a broad audience where none had really existed outside the academy since the 1950s. Anderson and Connolly have become the exemplars of the nonpurist anthropological style that has helped raise both public appreciation and, in association with independent cinema owners, much broader cinema screenings and good box office returns for most of their films in the commercial film market. Their success has also interacted with that of other equally accessible filmmakers' works, notably those of Dennis O'Rourke, in being able to guarantee good audiences by strength of reputation alone.

Rats in the Ranks (1996) was also the product of Connolly and Anderson's ability to win the trust of their subjects. This film, also running for a long season in cinemas before becoming a bestselling video, deals with the machinations and power struggles in an inner-city municipal council led by a Machiavellian mayor who will do anything to stay in power. The extraordinary access to all parties to the back-room death struggles leading up to an internal party schism and the next election are as powerful and revealing as Pennebaker and Hegedus' War Room (1992) (which, along with Rats in the Ranks, makes a perfect Australian political primer).

Equally successful and also the result of nearly a year of filming is Facing the Music (2001), another multiple award winner that also penetrated the independent cinema market, indicating that Connolly and Anderson now had a steady following and a 'brand name' among audiences. Shot inside Sydney University's Music Department and focusing on the travails of Department Head Professor Anne Boyd (herself also a noted Australian composer), this film actually treads deeper waters of unconscious irony than even the filmmakers may have realised. Their portrait of a threatened university department reveals a group of apparently self-serving academics—and, in one shocking scene, a young woman composer is both verbally and artistically assaulted by a teacher. However, the positioning of the film seems to be on the side of the 'threatened' teachers. What are perceived by the filmmakers as the strengths of the focus of the film, the professor and the role of the music department, are never interrogated.

The subsequent selling of the film by the filmmakers as unproblematic suggests that Australian documentary or its audiences are not necessarily possessed of a wide range of analytical or comparative tools. If shot and screened in Europe, for example, this film might well have been pitched as a satire on academic self-absorption and the dysfunctional approach taken by so many teachers working in 'creative' departments to their very raison d'être, the hapless students. For these reasons, of course, Facing the Music is the most tantalising and intriguing work yet from Australia's leading cinéma vérité team.

Few documentaries have dealt in detail with the supposed Australian national obsessions of sport and drink. Remarkably, only one major documentary has penetrated the mystique of a sporting club, but Michael Cordell's Year of the Dogs (1997) manages to sum up an Australian ambivalence to sporting heroes with cinéma vérité filming and a laconic and undercutting editorial style. As with the work of Connolly and Anderson's and Dennis O'Rourke's later projects, Year of the Dogs proved a success at cinemas. Audiences were composed in roughly equal parts of sports enthusiasts and those in search of the more complex pleasures of the well-made cinéma vérité film in a society where subjects are often surprisingly candid and articulate about their obsessions.

Although the supposed wry, self-deprecating defining characteristics of Australians are not always in evidence in documentary (feature films have appropriated that territory), two films have become small national treasures by stressing the darker aspects of living in contemporary Australia: David Caesar's Bodywork (1989) and Mark Lewis's Cane Toads (1987).

Bodywork is a cool and subtle gaze at the undertaking profession and Australian attitudes to death and what follows, shot in a Candide-like (wide angles) shooting style. The international success of the film is in part due to Caesar's great directorial control over the carefully composed 'look' of the film. Caesar uses the interviewees as dramatis personae and often interviews two or more at a time to increase the sardonic effect. This documentary, still very influential as a model for film students of the full possibilities of the carefully constructed documentary, led Caesar directly into a career as a maker of sharp and satirical feature films.

Cane Toads, too, was a success and won numerous awards. It took a bleak view of the disastrous attempts of overly optimistic scientists to solve ecological problems. The film is about the introduction in the 1930s of the Bufo Marinus (Cane Toad) to Queensland (in semi-tropical northern Australia) to control small insects annoying the crops. Toads multiply and then assume a horrific and unending advance from the northern Australia slowly throughout the nation. Bleak, yet very funny, Cane Toads remains influential and indicates a road down which Australian documentary may profitably stray.

Austria

The origins: 1895 to 1918

In the summer of 1895, a moving pictures machine was installed for the first time in Prater, an amusement quarter that continues to exist in Vienna today. Five machines were placed in a 'Kinetoscope Hall', where documentary pictures from American Thomas Alva Edison and his assistants were exhibited (Fritz 1980). The Viennese Prater was one of the first sites of the Habsburg monarchy Austria-Hungary where moving pictures were projected, and Prater was a popular film location during the beginnings of film history. On March 26, 1896 Eugene Dupont, collaborator of the firm Lumière, organized the first public performance in Austria: documentary films about Vienna were shown in the building located at Kärtnerstraße 45 (later in the contiguous building number 39). The work of Charles Moisson, principal operator of Lumière, was presented there. In the exhibition programme were the films Feuerwehr-Centrale am Hof, Kärtnerstraß Le Ring, and Freudenau, Sattelraum nach dem Pisek-Rennen. Pictures of Prater—such as Der Volksprater, Der Prater, and Die Hauptallee (Main Avenue)—were among the scenes that Alexander Promio and his assistant and interpreter Alexander Werschinger were shooting in Vienna on behalf of Lumière in mid-April 1896. These pictures belong to the earliest examples of Austrian cinematography. The company Pathé Frères produced in 1908 two documentary films: Blumenkorso in Mai/Flower Parade in May, and In der Prater Hauptallee/In Prater's Main Avenue (Büttner and Dewald 2002: 22).

Pioneering documentary films, which have been referred to in this way only since 1926, joined images together without tying them into a story. Different film types, such as newsreels, scientific films, and educational and cultural films, were later developed from this technique. At the beginning, the camera viewer played the role of a passive observer; later, the camera viewer was converted into a tourist or researcher (Büttner and Dewald 2002). The camera reflected the world exactly as it was: the Viennese locations filmed between 1896 and 1910 by Lumière, Pathé, and other directors staged representation rooms for the Viennese bourgeoisie. The Opera House, the 'Ring', the 'Trabrennplatz', and the 'Burgmusik' staged theatrical rooms in the film Wien um 1908/Vienna around 1908 (Pathé Frères) within the frame of related patterns between time and behavior. The early documentary film showed principally the large city and the bulk as admiring spectacles in themselves. In this sense, in the film presented in 1896 by Lumière (Kärtnerstraße 45), Verkehr bei dem Cinematographen/Traffic in the Cinematographer, the spectators convert themselves into their own performers. 'Open to the public' is an understood political, institutional kind of openness that serves only to create a specific audience (around 1900, only four percent of the inhabitants were elective). The early (documentary) film created a carefully selected image of the city and therefore did not show only a sensory real picture in which the spectacle is based. At the turn of the century these early film pioneers were followed by other filmmakers who produced 'scientific films'. As examples we can cite the ethnologist and anthropologist Rudolf Pöch (1870–1921) and the Viennese teacher Alto Arche. The first attempts took place from 1904 to 1908. The beginnings of 'racial research' in Austria are associated with the ethnographic film pioneer, the Viennese doctor, and Pöch. The central themes of Pöch's first film about the so-called Buschmaenner der Kalahari/Kalahari Bushmen, produced between 1908 and 1909, were technical aspects of specific works, such as culling and trampling on grass and bulbs, fabricating ropes, and/or sparking a fire. The external characteristics of the people created by Pöch's camera categorized him as a specific 'people classifier'.

In 1909 the first Austrian full-length documentary film was shown as an independent film in Viennese movie theaters: Die Kaisermanoever in Maehren/The King's Manoeuvre in Moravia. The film Se, Majestaet Kaiser Franz Josef I auf der Gemsjagd/His Majesty Kaiser Franz Josef I at the Gem Hunt was shown in the Viennese Prater in the cinematographic exhibition 'International Hunt Exhibition Vienna 1910' (Pathé Frères 1909). Besides feature films, film pioneers such as Anton and Luise Kolm (Der Faschingzug in Ober-St Veit/The Carnival Train at Ober St Veit, and Der Trauerzug Sr Exzellenz des Buergermeisters Dr Karl Jueger/The Funeral Procession Sr Exzellenz of Mayor Dr Karl Jueger (1910)), regularly produced documentary films. In 1910 Graf Alexander 'Sascha' Kolowrat—who later founded Sascha Film—also began to produce documentary films (Die Gewinnung des Erzes am steirischen Erzberg in Eisenerz/Ore Extraction at the Ore Mountain of Iron Ore (1912)). Hans Theyer shot cultural films about glassblowers, painters, and carpenters; his works led to the creation of the 'Central Office for Scientific and Educational Cinematography'.

This function of the documentary film had also been used to give pictures another conscious meaning, which was deliberately created, particularly during wartime. In August 1914 the war department commissioned film producers Sascha-Filmfabrik, Wiener Kunstfilmindustrie-Gesellschaft, and Österreichisch-Ungarische Kinoindustrie-Gesellschaft, to produce war film propaganda based on war archives. The first series of the Kriegs-Journal/War Journal produced by Wiener Kunstfilm appeared in September. At the end of 1914 Sascha-Film in cooperation with Philipp und Pressburger and the Österreichisch-Ungarische Kinoindustrie-Gesellschaft presented a war newsreeler titled Österreichischer Kino-Wochenbericht vom nördlichen und suedlichen Kriegsschauplatz/Austrian Weekly Report from Northern and Southern War Theater. Until 1918 field cinema was limited to showing the world upstanding images and frontline experience could no longer find visual expression.

In 1918 the UFA (Universumfilm Aktiengesellschaft) started production on documentaries in Berlin with a popular scientific content. This concept was imitated in Austria by Kurt Köfinger in his tourist films of the 1920s and later in the controlled propaganda documentary films of the Wien-Film (1938–45). The newsreels combined the characteristics of newscast and chronicle documentaries in their thematic mixture of politics, sports, and culture, which were sometimes presented in newsreel cinemas (from 1936 as nonstop cinemas in Vienna and also in Linz, Salzburg, and Innsbruck). The Viennese documentary film was presented as a 'war journal' for the first time in 1914, followed in 1930–3 by Sascha-Messter-Wochenschau/The Sascha Messter Newsreel, an international newsreel production based on the Austrian 'Selenophon' technique (Selenophon, together with Gustav-Mayer-Film, produced a newsreel from 1930 to 1932), and from 1934 to 1938 by Oesterreich in Bild und Ton/Austria in Vision and Sound.

Austro-Fascism/The Third Reich: 1933–45

In 1927 cameraman Rudi Mayer shot a three-piece documentary about the burning of the palace of justice in Vienna. The ten-minute documentary, titled Die Schreckenstage in Wien/Time of Horror in Vienna, shows objectivity: the destruction of a national institution is in the foreground, and the film compares the national values (order, security) with the crowd's bestiality (disorder, chaos).

On a traumatically staged world picture, the burning of the palace of justice represents a sign of imminent danger of civil war and collapse of the government's power and control. From this historic event of 1927, documentary practices and styles were invaded by Austro-Fascist propaganda concepts, which eventually became the rigorous standard-type for newsreels and documentary films (Achenbach and Moser 2002). Documentary films had to be systematically concerned with increasing the credibility and authenticity of the government's image. Just three weeks after the parliament's release, the Dollfuss-Regime deliberated on a central organization for film propaganda. One of the most important productions of this propaganda machine was the Austro-Fascist newsreel

Oesterreich in Bild und Ton (OEBUT)/Austria in Vision and Sound. It was created through the initiative of the federal chancellor, Engelbert Dollfuss, and was produced between June 1933 and March 1938 by the Vaterländischen Tonfilmgesellschaft of the film company Selenophon Licht- und Tonfilm Ltd. OEBUT worked principally on the establishment of the authoritarian regime's legitimacy, with its principal objectives being to spread Catholic values, reinforce Austrian identity, and counteract annexation to the German Reich.

Beginning in November 1934 all movie theaters had to show a 'cultural movie' in their preliminary programs. These were sometimes art and nature documentaries but often they were also propaganda movies about racial doctrine, political parties, and military matters. The newsreel became the most important propaganda instrument during wartime and its screening became mandatory every night at every showing of a film. The centerpoint of these educational and advertising short films was always Austria—its cultural, scientific, and political autonomy, together with its tradition and historical legacy.

Marshall Plan movie and 'documentary films' 1945–65

During the first two decades of the postwar period, documentary productions were characterized principally by the creation of cultural and propaganda films that were produced either for the Wiener ECA-Mission (Economic Cooperation Administration), the local office for the distribution and translation of the European Recovery Program (ERP), better known as the Marshall Plan, or for important cultural performances (screen adaptation of operas and plays).

The Österreichische Produktivitätszentrum (OEPZ, Austrian Center for Productivity), founded in the spring of 1950, is a direct outcome of the American reconstruction program. The OEPZ 'film office' section was established in 1951 on the initiative of the US administration, in line with the 'technical assistance' to effectively disseminate the pedagogy of 'productive managing and working' among the Austrian population. The 'Marshall Films', distributed by the OEPZ, promulgated a capitalistic Europe befriended by America (Reichert 2000: 83).

The Information Officer of the European film unit commissioned diverse documentary filmmakers to produce regional documentary films aimed at building consensus on specific local and regional needs. Austrian Georg Tressler, film officer of the ECA-Mission, was one of the most relevant documentary film producers of that time (Buchschwenter 2003). The films Gute Ernte/Good Crop (1950), Hansl und die 200,000 Küchen/Hansl and the 200,000 Kitchens (1952), Traudls neuer Gemüsegarten/Traudl's new Vegetable Garden (1952), Ertagreicher Kartoffelanbau/Fruitful Potato Cultivation (1952, exhibited at the Documentary Film Festival in Venice), Wie die Jungen Sungen/How the Boys Sang (1954), and Rund um die Milchwirtschaft/On the Dairy Farm (1954), followed the same objectives as the Marshall Plan films from Tressler, focusing on educating the public about effective management techniques, promoting identification with the concept of 'productivity improvement', and propagating the extension of US economic aid to broader population spheres.

An old-fashioned, pedagogical film type dominated so-called cultural films until the 1960s. This type of film is still produced today, mainly for government-commissioned TV productions such as tourist promotional films and Austrian historical reportage. These films were dependent on subsidies because they were not commercially viable.

About 680 cultural films were produced during the period from 1945 to 1961. Most of them fell more in line with the style of the National Socialist (NS) cultural films than with the artistic evolution of international documentary films. Tourism promotion was the principal motivation for regional and federal supporters. In this sense, Hans Pebahl produced the popular documentary film Und neues Leben blüht aus den Ruinen/And New Life Blooms in the Ruins in 1953. In this film, as in other postwar films, the reconstruction of the old cultural monuments was overvalued. This overvaluation was based on restorative cultural meaning, which simultaneously devalued contemporary culture. In award-winning films such as Wege in die Zukunft/Roads to the Future (Erich Pochlatko, 1959) and Die andere Seite/The Other Side (Bruno Loetsch, 1958), a gentle voice-over commented on pleasant pictures which ritualized the NS suppression.

In 1955 prizes for documentary films were awarded for the first time. The films were divided into two categories: the first comprised those films that bore representation of existing subjects; the second category consisted of the documentary films that went beyond the central theme, looking for creative, imaginary or artistic interpretation (Reichert 2000: 84). Most movie theaters had to close at the beginning of the 1960s because of low demand caused by the introduction of television—‘culture for the masses’. Documentary films experienced a decline in the market too. With a high value placed on civic education from the projection of cultural images, the National Funding Policy for Documentary Production was dedicated exclusively to the screen adaptation (in the studio) of diverse performances presented at the Viennese Burg Theater between 1955 and 1965.

The New Documentary Film

At the end of the 1960s and the beginning of the 1970s there was little structure to the production and commercialization of independent documentary films in Austria. From the 1970s a tendency to produce films called ‘New Documentary Films’ was identified, but they had only marginal importance in film evolution. Most of these films were produced in private studios by individuals who financed the productions with their own money earned through work in another field (Blümlinger 1986). In this way Michael Pilz, who worked for three years on his five-hour film essay, Himmel und Erde/Sky and Earth (1979–82), and lived for one year of that time with the miners whom he filmed, could perform a project of this kind as an independent producer. The controversial film Bonjour Capitaliste (1982) from Werner Grusch, which deals with the colonization of white tourists in black Africa, was also financed by private resources.

The Film Advisory Board of the Board of Education, founded in the 1970s, could implement a policy for the promotion of documentary films only until the creation of the Oesterreichischen Filmförderungsfonds (OEFF, Austrian Film Promotion Fund). The cultural film thereby faded into the background. In the early 1970s Ferry Radax, who had been involved with documentary film production since the 1950s, created some outstanding artist portrayals. Through great exertion, he achieved the outstanding formal depiction of the painter Hundertwasser (1965), for which he was awarded with the Austrian State Prize. Other films include Konrad Bayer (1969), Thomas Bernhardt (1970), Ludwig Wittgenstein (1975), and Japan oder die Suche nach dem verlorenen Reis/Japan or the Search for the Lost Rice (1981/82).

At the end of the 1970s the Filmladen (film store) and the Medienwerkstatt (media workshop) were founded and a longer-term structure for independent documentary film and video work finally could be created. Ruth Beckermann was cofounder of the rental business ‘film store’, which began in 1977 with an appropriate structure for commercialization and public distribution of documentary films beyond Austrian television. At the beginning of the film rental business, a series of so-called ‘Flugblattfilme’ (flight sheet films) about sociopolitical and work-political themes came into existence. In this sense, the film from Josek Aichholzer and Ruth Beckermann, Auf amol a Streik/Amol on Strike (1978), expounded the problems of a more than three-week-long strike in Semperit in Traiskirchen. The film was presented at numerous union meetings and was enthusiastically received. The fight for the former Viennese slaughterhouse Sankt Marx was documented in 1977 by ‘Video Group Arena’ in the film Arena besetzt/Arena Occupied. The same year saw the start of the collective work Wir kommen wieder/We Come Back from Syndikat der Filschaffenden, about the Austrian movement against atomic power plants. From many Medienwerkstatt productions emerged important experimental and sociopolitical video work. From 1983 to 1984 Niki List filmed—without any public financial support—on 16mm/SW Mama Lustig, a sociocritical documentary about the daily life of a disabled young person, which caused a sensation across Austria.

Margarethe Heinrichs’ films, called ‘solidarity films’, were devoted to production conditions in the revolutionary Latin American countries, unlike the ethnographic-oriented films about black Africa from director Grusch. The 16mm film Traum des Sandino/Sandino’s Dream (1981) and the television reportage No Pasarán/They Won’t Get Through (1984), both subsidized by the government, describe without any formal experiments the literacy campaign in Nicaragua and the exploitative conditions in the so-called Third World. The development of new documentary films has a connection with sociopolitical tendencies—essentially in the ‘Neue Linken’ environment. They were involved with daily life, the world of workers, and emancipation projects. The primordial objective for the film organization for documentary production was that the values of socially and politically segregated people, which were already faded out by the mass media, became visible.

Historical archaeology in the present context

In the 1980s the infrastructure of political groups (peace movement, Third World, anti-nuclear power, anti-racism) and the search for opposing ideas gradually broke down. Since then, a new trend in content and form has emerged: an orientation toward contemporary issues, but also toward ordinary life and subjective themes. Since the early 1980s, the Austrian film has practiced historical archaeology, which has been so meaningful that it revived the film category and the past started to open up to the present (Beckermann and Blümlinger 1996). 'Wien Retour—Franz West 1924–34' (1983) was the first Austrian documentary film to deal with contemporary history. The film Erzschmerz/Ore Pain (1983), produced by Bernhard Frankfurter on behalf of ORF, tried for the first time to expose the lengthy repression of fascism through some miners' experiences.

Axel Corti, motivated by the taboos of historical development during the NS period, produced films such as Die Verweigerung/The Refusal (1971), Der Fall Jaegerstätter/Fighter's Fall (1972), and An uns glaubt Gott nicht mehr/God Does Not Believe in Us Anymore (1985) with documentary film elements. Some techniques were the provision to the spectator of information about date and place; newsreel material insertions, which gave the film a realistic note; and the use of black and white, which provided a more authentic reference. This mixture of fiction and reality may serve to remind the audience that the time portrayed was real and did not exist only in films. In the 1980s other documentary producers besides the remarkable Corti, such as Josef Aichholzer, Ruth Beckermann, Karin Berger, Karin Brandauer, Eduard Erne, Bernhard Frankfurter, Andreas Gruber, Johanna Heer, Margareta Heinrich, Egon Humer, Wilma Kiener, Dieter Matzka, and Werner Schmiedel, undertook a memorial documentary work that the Austrian feature film was not capable of accomplishing because of melodramatic fictionalization. In 1997 Ruth Beckermann received the Bibliothèque prize at the Festival Cinema du Reel in Paris for the documentary film Jenseits des Krieges/Beyond War (1996), which became very popular at the Armed Forces Exhibition.

In the film produced by the multimedia performer Andre Heller and the documentary producer Othmar Schmiederer, Im toten Winkel/On the Dead Angle (2002), the eighty-one-year-old Traudl Junge recounts the time when she was working as private secretary to Adolf Hitler. The film was presented in February 2002 at the Berlin Film Festival, garnering a great reception by the media and was distinguished with the 'Audience Prize'.

In the 1980s 'oral history' projects, which relied on the presence of primary witnesses and on the authenticity of the on-camera effect, became more popular within the documentary field. Angela Summereder used a radically different semidocumentary technique for relating an historical court case. The case was staged in the film Zechmeister/Carousing Master (1981). The film does not reconstruct a 'case' per se, but recreates the history of a patriarchal law dominated by male representatives. The film Zur Lage/To the Circumstance (2002), filmed by four directors (Barbara Albert, Michael Glawogger, Ulrich Seidl, and Michael Sturminger), is an ethnological study of the conservative and reactionary thinking that emerged in Austria after the change of government.

The globalization of documentaries

Numerous documentary productions of the last decade led filmmakers out of the country: Megacities (1998) by Michael Glawogger was the most successful Austrian documentary of the 1990s. Glawogger links his observations to portrayals of individual inhabitants in the film, which was shot in four 'megacities'—Bombay, New York, Mexico City, and Moscow. Megacities refuses to relate the social condition of individual persons to complex structures.

One of the most successful contemporary documentaries is Hundstage/Dog Days (2002), produced in Austria by Ulrich Seidl. Dog Days consists of five independent stories of Viennese suburbs that are arranged and interwoven. It is a feature film that cleverly makes use of the documentary style of reality TV. Dog Days was awarded the Grand Jury Prize at the Vienna Film Festival. Ulrich Seidl became famous for his provocative documentaries in which he exposed the unpleasant side of the Austrian soul. In his second film, Der Ball/The Prom (1982), he staged the preparation for a high school prom and thereby exposed the class conceit, smugness, narrow-mindedness, and prudish behavior of a town. In Good News (1990), he documented the living conditions of foreign newspaper salesmen. Die letzten Männer/The Last Men (1994) is a TV drama about men with no self-confidence who look for a mail order Thai bride. In Tierische Liebe/Animal Love (1995) Seidl examines the intimate relationship of Austrian pet owners with their pets, while Models (1999) tells of the daily degradation of a photo model's life.

During the last decade of the twentieth century, Nikolaus Geyrhalt's films found a significant cinema audience. The film Pripyat (1999), awarded numerous international prizes, tells the story of survival in the dead zone around the former atomic power plant Chernobyl, evacuated in 1986. Elsewhere (2000), Geyrhalt's magnum opus, compress twelve twenty-minute episodes, one for every month of the year 2000, filmed at a remote, supposedly untouched, place on the globe. It is intended to show that there may not be a single place on Earth that is unaffected by tragedy. 'Phantom rides' was the name given to those films (like rollercoaster rides, railway journeys) that created a subjective experience by installing the camera onto a moving object. Martin Bruch created in his film Handbikemovie (2003) a phantom ride of a special kind: the audience 'sits' on the handlebars of the tricycle on which the film producer, suffering from multiple sclerosis, moves himself around.

It could be concluded that the sensibility for symbolic images and the interest in different political cultures were developed during the second half of the 1970s, when the 'newer' documentary film, which displaced the antiquated 'cultural film' of the 1950s and 1960s, made its appearance. Since the 1980s counter-cultural references to established cultures and societies have been gradually expanded. During the last decade of the twentieth century, a clear rejection of subjective-essayistic documentary productions emerged. In this sense, in the era of medium format reality TV, Austrian documentary film production was characterized by the need to visualize 'reality'.

Back of Beyond, The (John Heyer, 1954)

One of the most successful documentary films ever made in Australia, The Back of Beyond was also one of the most significant productions of the Shell Film Unit during the 1950s. A dramatized documentary in the tradition of Night Mail and Fires Were Started, it won critical acclaim at international film festivals and was the most widely seen Australian film of the era, due to extensive nontheatrical distribution at home and overseas.

The Back of Beyond was produced, written, and directed by Tasmanian-born John Heyer, who had left the Australian National Film Board in 1948 to lead the newly formed Australian Shell Film Unit. Given a brief to make a 'prestige' documentary that would capture the essence of the country, he undertook an extended three-month trip into the Outback, traveling through the Central Australian desert before returning to Sydney to prepare a detailed shooting script with the assistance of his wife, Janet, and writer Roland Robinson. Narration and dialogues were written in collaboration with the poet and playwright Douglas Stewart.

The Back of Beyond follows mailman Tom Kruse along the three hundred miles of the Birdsville Track between Marree, South Australia, and Birdsville, in southwest Queensland. His two-week journey in a 1936 Leyland truck takes him across hazardous terrain to deliver the post and supplies to remote outposts, crossing sand dunes, flooded creeks, and featureless plains. Dramatized scenes with locals playing themselves alternate with fictional reenactments, such as the story of two girls losing their way in the desert following the death of their mother on an isolated farm. The narration alternates between the commentary, spoken by Kevin Brennan and a chorus of voices—the mailman, women chatting on two-way radio, and an Aboriginal man reflecting on the abandoned Lutheran mission where he grew up—and the Birdsville policeman's laconic diary entry. The poetic, multilayered quality of the soundtrack is matched by the music of John Kay and complemented by the strong picture composition of cinematographer Ross Wood.

The Outback, the ostensible subject of The Back of Beyond, is seen in both a realistic and romanticized light. Beyond the obvious themes of communication (the mail run) and the battle against the elements, the film touches on some of the complexities of Australian identity, including not only indigenous people but also characters such as one of the very last Afghan camel-drivers in Marree. Heyer has a touch for comedy, a feel for evocative locations, and an eye for surreal details and recurring leitmotifs. Although some elements, such as the dubbed dialogues, might now seem somewhat wooden, the achievement of the film is the subtle interweaving of disparate story elements into a satisfying whole. Regarded as a minor classic of the genre, it was awarded the Grand Prix at the 1954 Venice Film Festival before being screened across Australia in theatres, town halls, schools, and traveling vans.

Bang Carlsen, Jon

Best known for his radical approach to the staging of documentaries, Jon Bang Carlsen has played a prominent role on the Danish film scene since about 1980, and remains one of Denmark's most innovative documentarists, with a number of feature films behind him as well.

Bang Carlsen's documentaries often focus on the daily lives and rituals of people whom viewers would consider either ordinary or marginal. Often living outside his native Denmark, Carlsen is drawn to other cultures and landscapes, and a number of his documentaries were shot in other countries—in the United States (Hotel of the Stars (1981) and Phoenix Bird (1986)), Germany (Ich bin auch ein Berliner (1990)), Ireland (It's Now or Never (1996), My Irish Diary (1996), and How to Invent Reality (1997)), and South Africa (Addicted to Solitude (1999), My African Diary (2000), and Portrait of God (2001)). Each of his films forcefully evokes a sense of place as an integral part of its storytelling, and Carlsen often uses long takes, dwelling on faces and settings as part of a highly controlled visual style.

Carlsen's unconventional views on the staging of documentaries date from the very start of his career and were given their fullest expression in his film essay How to Invent Reality in which he outlines his method and explains its underlying logic. Casting as his actors people who essentially play themselves on screen, but speak the lines he has written for them, Carlsen deliberately blurs the boundaries between documentary and fiction, uninhibitedly transforming the data other documentarists might prefer to record unchanged. He argues: 'I don't want to be a hostage to life's coincidences in my work. I allow myself to rearrange reality in order to express the inner life of my characters' (How to Invent Reality, 1997). However, these transformations are not gratuitous. The lines of dialogue he writes are tailor-made to suit the people speaking them, so that their words come across as natural and unrehearsed expressions of their own experience. At the same time, this staging of reality is an act whereby the filmmaker becomes a part of—and illuminates—what he films. As Carlsen puts it, 'My films are not the truth. They are how I sense the world. Nothing more' (How to Invent Reality, 1997).

In some cases, the viewer is entirely unaware of the degree to which the action has been staged and the dialogue written by the director. This is true, for example, of Before the Guests Arrive (1986), in which a woman who runs a small seaside hotel and her only employee are shown preparing the place for the approaching season. The viewer has every reason to believe that the two women are spontaneously expressing their own thoughts during their dialogue. On the other hand, with It's Now or Never, about an ageing Irish bachelor who is searching for a bride, the observant viewer will notice the rapidly changing camera positions and realize that the action must have been carefully orchestrated as a series of shots, just as if the film were a work of pure fiction.

In Jon Bang Carlsen's own words:

Whether you work with fiction or documentaries, you're telling stories because that is the only way we can approach the world: to fantasize about this mutual stage of ours as it reinvents itself in the sphere between the actual physical world and the way your soul reflects it back onto the world. For me documentaries are no more real than fiction films and fiction films no more invented than documentaries.

(Bang Carlsen 2003)

His most recent works depart somewhat from the staged documentaries in that his interviewees do in fact tell their own stories—for example, inmates in a South African prison describe how they imagine God in Portrait of God (2001). However, the director is just as present here as in his earlier works, in that he tells of his own life in a voice-over, speaking in the first person:

When I was a boy I often lay for hours staring up into the summer sky for a hole into heaven or a lazy angel daydreaming on a cloud who'd forgotten old God's strict orders never to be seen by us people from down on this earth.

In middle age my search for God had taken me all the way to southern Africa, but his trail was as fleeting as the banks of mist that rolled in from the Atlantic to mist up my windowpane as I tried to create a portrait of a person, who might only be a rumour.

(Portrait of God, 2001)

In one way or another in all of Jon Bang Carlsen's work the subjective experience of the filmmaker is deliberately made a central part of the film, and the director's own doubts and ongoing, tentative explorations are as much the subject of the documentary as are the people whose stories unfold before the camera.

Barclay, Barry

Barry Barclay established his unique place in the history of New Zealand culture during 1973 to 1974, when a six-part documentary series called Tangata Whenua aired on New Zealand television. Since then he has enhanced his significance with completion of the first feature film directed by a Maori male (Ngati, 1987), a book on issues associated with indigenous representation (Our Own Image, 1990), social activism (resulting in increased New Zealand on-air funding for Maori-produced and -targeted film material for local broadcast television), and The Feathers of Peace (2000), a mixture of documentary and drama that carries local history studies into controversial terrain.

What unites Barclay's filmmaking, writing, and activism is his respect for community and his advocacy for the integrity of indigenous communities. Early in his career he began working for John O'Shea's Pacific Films, a breeding ground for filmmakers inclined toward an independent point of view. Along with the trade films and television commercials that were Pacific Films' primary source of income, Barclay made documentaries and feature films with O'Shea's backing from the 1970s until Te Rua (1991), when the director and the producer had a falling out. With the appearance of The Feathers of Peace, Barclay's public profile has again increased; out of the limelight, he has also been involved in further efforts supporting Maori training and filmmaking.

Despite funding and policy obstacles, Barclay has creatively developed filming strategies designed to accommodate cultural sensitivities. Chief among these has been a set of practices designed to make documentary subjects feel comfortable throughout the filming process, from the extensive use of lenses to keep cameras as far as possible away from subjects while they are speaking, to the synching of sound and image via the clapperboard at the end, rather than the beginning, of takes. He also argues that the Western medium can accommodate indigenous narrative strategies. Taking Ngati as an example, he speaks of its emphasis on the community rather than the individual, with a narrative structure that avoids single heroic figures in favor of group interaction. From Te Rua, he cites moments involving Maori oral practice and traditions that would be clear to an audience familiar with them, but which could not be read in the same way by most non-Maori audiences. In the docudrama The Feathers of Peace, using text from legal testimony of the day as well as other historical documents, he gives nineteenth-century characters the opportunity to speak, following the example of marae practice.

For Barclay, the heart of a movie is its metaphor; until he has his metaphor, he says, the film cannot be made. Simultaneous with making the Tangata Whenua series, Barclay was a member of Nga Tamatoa, a group of young Maori organized around undermining social institutions that prevented Tino Rangatiratanga (self-determination) at every level. Although Barclay is modest about the extent of his involvement in a left-wing group that critiqued the television establishment that allowed Barclay to make his films, Barclay agreed with Nga Tamatoa's ideological premises. He was among the earliest members of Te Manu Aute, a group that, like Nga Tamatoa, focused on media control.

Our Own Image, the most important published statement of his philosophy so far, is in part a gift to Native Americans and First Peoples, made after Barclay attended a film festival of indigenous people's work. Among Barclay's most interesting points in this short book is the distinction between 'talking in' and 'talking out'. The latter could refer to an indigenous group trying to speak to a dominant culture, but 'talking in' refers to the opportunity for a group within the nondominant culture to speak in its own terms rather than in those of the dominant culture, without regard for whether the dominant culture understands (Barclay 1990: 75).

Not a speaker of Maori himself, Barclay has said that he thinks 'a Maori filmmaker is someone Maori who identifies as Maori and is proud to use the camera as a Maori for Maori purposes, at least some of the time', adding that 'it's good fun to do other things as well' (Read 2000-1: 3). To be Maori is to have a strong awareness of the spiritual; to be a filmmaker is to be aware of film's 'access to [...] visceral communal icons' (ibid.: 4).

As Barclay moved away from television toward feature filmmaking, he also turned away from lobbying for political change. In the late 1990s, however, Barclay returned to political activism in a spectacular way. He picketed one of Aotearoa's (New Zealand) funding bodies, camping out on the median in the boulevard in front of their office building. His private campaign gained widespread public attention. Barclay himself benefited through funding for The Feathers of Peace. At least one Maori filmmaker acknowledges Barclay as a force behind funding and other policy changes that have increased opportunities for Maori filmmaking, along with exhibition possibilities encompassing mainstream audiences.

Throughout his career, Barclay has mentored other filmmakers, particularly young Maori who have trained with him. Along with Merata Mita, he has called for and tutored in workshops to train Maori, as well as internships and apprenticeships. Like Mita, he and his work have been well received in Hawaii, and he has used his speaking opportunities there to discuss indigenous filmmaking as he perceives of it. For example, in 2001, he gave a keynote address in which he developed his concept of 'indigenous cinema', or 'fourth cinema'. Unlike 'Hollywood, arthouse, and Third World cinema' (Read 2000-1: 1), fourth cinema should be committed to using its viscerally persuasive powers to raise consciousness of ethical issues, particularly through giving indigenous peoples their own voice (Turner 2002: 11).

Barclay has developed and articulated his philosophy regarding the representation of indigenous groups through his own films, in interviews and talks, and in his own published work. He has influenced archival protocol, government funding, and public opinion through his work and action. Barclay's oeuvre is at least as well appreciated overseas as it is in his home country, where he has often raised issues that others wish to forget.

Basic Training

(US, Wiseman, 1971)

The first of three films about the United States Armed Forces made by American documentary filmmaker Frederick Wiseman, Basic Training documents the standard eight-week training for new army inductees and enlistees at Fort Polk, Kentucky, before being shipped out to Vietnam. The processes of institutional indoctrination and maintenance of power, primary aspects of institutional functioning explored in Wiseman's other films, are emphasized in the film's vision of the military machine. As commanding officer Lt Hoffman puts it bluntly in his welcoming speech to the men early in the film, 'The best way to go through basic training is to do what you're told, as you're told, and there'll be no problems.'

In the brief montage sequence that opens the film, the new inductees are immediately stripped of their individuality. The opening shot is of the men arriving on a bus, from which they walk unhurriedly to the barracks, dressed in a variety of civilian clothes. In the second shot they are assigned bunks by number. In the third shot they are measured for uniforms, the tailor calling out measurements. Next come three shots of men having their hair cut short, all the same, a recurrent Wiseman image signifying loss of individuality and absorption into an institutional system. Then there is one quick shot each of fingerprinting, ID photos being taken, and one man, in answer to an interview question, giving his social security number, his identity now only a statistic. At the end of this opening sequence, the men are in uniform, a striking contrast to their varied appearance just a few moments before.

The music in the film further emphasizes the loss of individuality within the larger group. The function of music is established early on in Basic Training, when the commanding officer and his entourage smartly march into a room to welcome the trainees accompanied by the musical fanfare of 'The Caissons Go Rolling Along'. The entire film is punctuated with shots of the men drilling, keeping time to marching tunes. In these shots the camera frequently tilts down to isolate in close-up the legs and feet of the men, showing that no one is allowed to march to the beat of a different drum.

When Lt Hoffman tells a black private that ‘the Army’s not just one man, it’s millions of people’, and that he must work with the group, he echoes the social message of virtually every classic Hollywood war movie, but with a crucial difference, for while the classic war films depict the compromise of individualism as a noble sacrifice necessary for the war effort, Wiseman views the military as unacceptably dehumanizing. In one particularly striking shot in Basic Training, the soldiers march in the foreground as if ‘beneath’ a large American flag waving in the background. Here, Wiseman finds a visual expression of the extent to which the individual is subject to the state—a point ominously reiterated in the image of the soldiers entering a transport plane shot from a position within or under it, the dark, jagged edges of the plane’s bay doors suggesting a giant maw about to consume the men.

Basic Training also offers a disturbing view of masculinity in its suggestion that violence is innate in men and easily nurtured by the process of basic military training. The men readily cheer each other on (‘get him from behind’, ‘hit him in the head’) as they fight in pairs. Even after the whistle blows, signaling that the combatants should stop, we see one pair continue on, their potential for violence now fully aroused. In the toothbrushing scene, several of the men are shown, in effect, foaming at the mouth, and in the scenes of bayonet practice, the men seem reduced to animals, ‘grunts’ abandoning language for screams of violence. Several scenes make the connection between firearms and the phallus. On the firing range, a demonstrator fires his weapon from his crotch, accompanied by a crude joke from the instructing sergeant, and one trainee is visited by his family, who concentrate their attention and conversation on his rifle, ‘fetishizing’ it and investing it with unmistakable phallic implications.

Much screen time is devoted to the hapless Private Hickman, a trainee who has trouble with everything from executing the to-the-rear march, to making his bed. Attempting to learn something as simple as reversing his direction while marching, behind him we see the other men drilling with increasing uniformity and competence. Just as they tend to march in the opposite direction from Hickman within the frame, so the lack of ability by this one individual in the foreground sets him up as a foil to the many in the background, all of whom are quickly becoming professional soldiers. (Their growing proficiency also provides Wiseman with a visual way of ‘marking time’ in the film.)

For Wiseman, Hickman is emblematic of the misfit literally out of step with society, scorned by his comrades as a result. The weakest link, he is threatened with a ‘blanket party’, a military hazing ritual in which a blanket is thrown over the victim before he is beaten, thus rendering him unable to name his attackers. Hickman’s response, we discover, is to attempt to overdose on drugs. Finally, Hickman evolves from a comic figure to a tragic one, for he represents that spark of human imperfection that is all but ruthlessly eliminated as the men become trained soldiers.

Basse, Wilfried

Wilfried Basse’s oeuvre bridged the gap between German avant-garde filmmaking of the Weimar Republic and the conventional educational filmmaking propagated during the Nazi period. When he started out in 1929, he counted prominent avant-garde artists such as Kurt Schwitters and other members of the Kestner Society as his friends. He dissociated himself from the Bauhaus aesthetic.

Basse's main filmic interest was people in their everyday surroundings, whom he observed from a short distance. His first film, Baumblütenzeit in Werder (1929), about a crude spring fair near Berlin, was noted for the satirical tone it employed with regard to human foibles and inadequacies. The film garnered comparisons to George Grosz and Heinrich Zille for Basse.

Basse used a small, handheld camera that allowed for great immediacy and intimacy in shooting. This was illustrated by Market in Berlin (1929), which depicts the hustle and bustle of a Berlin peasants' market. The film's style was praised by many reviewers; others, Siegfried Kracauer among them, criticized it for its lack of an overt political message. The same could not be said of Das Rote Sprachrohr (1931), a portrait of a communist agitprop company. Inspired by Russian formalism, this film was Basse's experiment with a specified screenplay and indoor shooting with studio lighting.

Basse's primary work was Deutschland—zwischen gestern und heute (1932–4), which demonstrated how historical developments determine the present. While Basse was editing the film, the Nazis came into power. Reviewers criticized the lack of Nazi ideology in the film, while audiences seemed to avoid the film exactly because they expected Nazi propaganda. Nevertheless, it was awarded a gold medal at the Venice Film Festival in 1935.

Suspected of communist sympathies, Basse and his production company faced numerous obstacles. For the rest of his career he worked with the Reichsanstalt für den Unterrichtsfilm (RfU, Reich Institute for Educational Films), for which he shot nearly forty films. Since these films were not publicly shown, they were not censored. In fact, the RfU worked independently, free of Nazi control. During this time, Basse's films focused on topics relating to handicrafts and sports. In 1940 he was commissioned to make a film about genetic diseases—Erbkrank—Erbgesund—Basse's only overt concession to the Nazi regime.

ULI JUNG

Biography

Born on August 17, 1899, the son of a banker. After several failed attempts at various professions, turned to filmmaking due to the influence of the films of Hans Cürlis. Formed his own production company in 1929. The Nazis' takeover brought about political difficulties, which led him to the Reichsanstalt für den Unterrichtsfilm, to which he was one of the most prolific contributors. Assigned to oversee the slow-motion photography for Leni Riefenstahl's film, Olympia, 1936. Died June 6, 1946.

Bataille du rail, La

(France, Clément, 1946)

La Bataille du rail (The Battle of the Rails) began as Résistance fer, a short film relating the contribution of the cheminots, the French railway workers, to the struggle against German occupation. This documentary, among a series of projects commissioned in 1945 to celebrate the Résistance by the Comité de Libération du Cinéma Français, made such a strong impression on the producers that they asked the director, René Clément, to turn it into a feature-length film. Professional and amateur actors were hired, stories of resistance in the railways were collated by the writer, Colette Audry, and German prisoners of war were brought in. La Bataille du rail was released in 1946 and gained instant acclaim as the most moving account of the Résistance.

La Bataille du rail is a rather disjointed film, half-documentary and half-fiction, where its transformation from a court-métrage to a ninety-minute, full-length feature is quite apparent. It is rather chaotic in its loose structure and confusing in its script. The odd juxtaposition of fiction to a documentary is nevertheless what makes La Bataille du rail so special. As a docudrama, it acquires unique qualities of being a detailed and dramatic account of the plight of railway men trying desperately to derive all sorts of obstacles to prevent the movement of trains through sabotage, diversion, and cooperation with the Maquis, the armed resistance to German occupation.

The film spans the four years of the war and can be divided into two sections. The first part is a documentary using actors; it explains the resistance to German occupation in the railways during these years, in particular its effect on the movement of trains between the occupied zone in the north and the 'free zone' in the south of France. The considerable risks taken by the workers of the SNCF, the nationalized French railways, are described in detail, almost in a didactic manner: the sabotage of the rolling stock, the meticulous deception of the German army officers, and the ensuing reprisals are narrated with an acute sense of patriotic duty and drama.

The second part of the film is set in the aftermath of D-Day and describes the attempts by the cheminots, allied with the Maquis, to stop a heavily armored train taking German reinforcements to the front line, ending with its dramatic derailment. The film becomes much closer to a work of fiction than a documentary. It finishes with scenes of triumph, greeting the arrival of the first train in a liberated France, the ultimate symbol of a nation freed by the sacrifice of its railway workers.

La Bataille du rail received the award for best film at the 1946 Cannes festival, and René Clément received the award for best director. It is still considered to be the first film that managed to capture the spirit of the Résistance, the heroism of a nation, and the dangers involved in resisting German occupation. Undoubtedly the circumstances of its release explain its success, among a public desperately looking for a film that would capture the emotional intensity of such acts of bravery. It is also a fine and rare example of French neorealism, not unlike the Italian postwar films, in its unique blend of reality and fiction and in its attempts to reach humanity in the most inhumane circumstances of war against an occupying army.

René Clément envisages acts of resistance in the SNCF as a patriotic epic and relies quite heavily on the 'feel-good' factor that prevailed after the war, hence its considerable success. The film does not, however, demonize German occupation—there is even some sympathy for the German soldiers relaxing on the side of the tracks where their military convoy is stranded, a sharp contrast with the violence unleashed in the attack that follows.

La Bataille du rail portrays a collective struggle, where there is no hero, where the fight for survival from both sides is described with a sense of the unavoidable. It ignores the real divisions that existed during these years among the French population. There is also little reference to the involvement of Allied troops or of the Gaullist resistance. Patriotism is mixed with socialist undertones: these acts of bravery are those of the cheminots, who symbolize the working class as the driving force in resisting German occupation.

The style of Clément is a cold assessment as well as a tense account of resistance by railway workers: there is some of Eisenstein's sense of drama in the languishing whistling of a steam engine during the summary execution of cheminots suspected of sabotage, and in the accordion rolling down the side of the track after the spectacular derailment of the German convoy. The photography of Henri Alekan contributes greatly to the dramatic effect of the film, and La Bataille du rail will establish him as one of the greatest photographers in black and white for the cinema. He had already collaborated on Beauty and the Beast with Jean Cocteau and worked with Wim Wenders in 1983 on The State of Things and on Wings of Desire in 1987.

La Bataille du rail transformed the career of René Clément from that of a minor documentary filmmaker to one of the prominent directors of his generation. Born in 1913, he made short documentary films during the 1930s and 1940s, in particular Ceux du rail in 1942, which gave him an insight into the railway industry that would be useful when filming La Bataille du rail. Until the late 1950s Clément confirmed his stature as a world-class director, receiving an Oscar for Au-delà des grilles in 1948 and Jeux interdits in 1952.

Clément belongs to the generation of directors left behind by the desire for change demanded by the La nouvelle vague advocates, who criticized his filming technique for its lack of subjectivity and its detachment from reality. His last noticeable success, Plein soleil, released in 1960, inaugurated a slow decline in a career that had been prolific and successful, until his last film, Jeune fille libre le soir, which came out in 1975, the year before his death.

La Bataille du rail remains the film for which he is best known.

Battle for Our Soviet Ukraine, The

(USSR, Dovzhenko, 1942–3)

The Battle for Our Soviet Ukraine (Bitva za nashu Sovetskuiu Ukrainu) is an account of the German Army Group South's invasion of the Ukraine and its repulsion in the Great Patriotic War. Produced for the Central and Ukrainian Newsreel Studios, the film was begun in early May 1943, completed on October 6, and released on October 25, 1943. Often attributed to Alexander Dovzhenko, the nominal directors were his wife, Julia Solntseva, and Jacob Ovdeyenko. However, although credited only as 'supervisor', bucolic sections link to Dovzhenko's earlier feature films, particularly Earth. The contrast between these lyrical scenes showing, in an idealized manner, what life was like before the invasion, and the starkness of the war footage, gives the images of destruction much of their impact.

Dovzhenko, with a number of other documentarists, remained in Moscow when the bulk of film production, along with much of industry that stood in the path of the invading forces, was evacuated to the east. He also spent time in liberated areas of the Ukraine, so he saw firsthand more of the effects of war than many of his colleagues. The authenticity that Dovzhenko's team managed to convey is remarkable. The film is put together with a freedom from the bureaucratic interference that filmmakers working on fiction production experienced, allowing Dovzhenko greater latitude than if he had gone to Alma Ata with the others.

Dovzhenko's feelings about the invasion are summed up in a letter to his wife dated June 4, 1942 (Marshall 1983: 152), in which he wrote that although Hitler would be defeated, the Ukraine had been ruined. Despite this pessimism, he and his team made another documentary, Victory in Right-Bank Ukraine and the Expulsion of the German Aggressors from the Boundaries of the Ukrainian Soviet Earth (released in May 1945), which contained material on reconstruction. Of the two films, The Battle for Our Soviet Ukraine is more harrowing, with many shots of dead bodies, including children, and the devastation in the reconquered areas is brought home vividly.

This graphic depiction of despoliation and despair runs contrary to Graham Roberts's (1999: 136) characterization of wartime Soviet documentary as 'a mirror image of reality', projecting confidence in a time of tragedy. Dovzhenko's diary indicates that before its release he was skeptical about the film's likely official reception, as it ran counter to the positive portrayals depicted in the bulk of Soviet films. He feared that it might be banned altogether, or marred 'by cutting the difficult and unheroic scenes'. His more subtle conception of the complexity of war—'the grandiose woe of retreat and the incomplete joy of advance' (Dovzhenko 1973: 91)—was at odds with the simplistic official ideology.

The original title was Ukraine in Battle, but the addition of the word Soviet served to lessen the nationalistic interpretation by stressing the common struggle of all the Soviet peoples. The political message was that the Ukraine was still part of the Soviet Union. The sensitivity of the nationalism issue can be gauged by the fact that while working on The Battle for Our Soviet Ukraine, Dovzhenko also wrote the script for Ukraine in Flames (not to be confused with The Battle for Our Soviet Ukraine's US release title). It had a similar theme to The Battle for Our Soviet Ukraine, but its perceived nationalism blocked its realization and blighted Dovzhenko's career.

Many contemporary reviewers claimed that there were twenty-four camera operators, although in fact twenty-nine are credited on The Battle for Our Soviet Ukraine and twenty-five on Victory in Right-Bank Ukraine. Both films feature footage taken by German forces that was later captured, providing a more rounded depiction of the conflict. There was enough material to allow adherence to the one-hundred-and-eighty-degree rule, with Germans usually attacking from left to right and the Soviet forces from right to left. Interspersed are speeches from party and army leaders, including Nikita Khrushchev, head of the Ukrainian Communist Party, and direct-to-camera witness accounts from ordinary people with harrowing stories to tell. Considering the disparate origins of its elements, The Battle for Our Soviet Ukraine displays a remarkable coherence. Jay Leyda (1983: 377) proclaimed it 'an inspiration to every artist who works in the documentary film'.

Dovzhenko was dismayed by the indifferent reception that the film received in the United States when it was released there in the spring of 1944. He noted in his diary entry for April 8, 1944: 'She [the United States] didn't even want to look at the blood she is buying with her canned bacon' (Dovzhenko 1973: 105). This was a sentiment that echoed his government's demand for the opening of a second front, and the feeling that the Soviet Union was being asked to make enormous sacrifices while its allies stood by.

Critical opinion in the United States was indeed lukewarm. While acknowledging the unvarnished presentation and the effectiveness of the battle sequences, many of the reviews were carping, with negative comments on the clarity of the photography, the quality of the translated commentary, and the tendency of the pictures of devastation to have a certain sameness. These blasé assessments of the film's lack of technical polish ignored the far from ideal circumstances of production.

The British Kinematograph Weekly, by contrast, while noting the 'family resemblance' of films depicting the effects of occupation, could still concede that The Battle for Our Soviet Ukraine was 'a vivid indictment of German brutality', and highlight its depiction of suffering and the realism of the battle sequences. Similarly, Monthly Film Bulletin considered that of the many documentaries originating from the Soviet front, few had 'been so vivid or poignant as this'. The difference in tone perhaps reflected the relative complacency of a country that had not experienced invasion, compared to one whose civilian population had itself suffered from direct attacks, and thus could empathize with the misery of those subjected directly to the German war machine.

Battle of Chile, The

(Cuba, Guzmán, 1975–7)

Patricio Guzmán's The Battle of Chile marks the end of a brief but intense period of revolutionary filmmaking in his native country. In the late 1960s and early 1970s Chilean feature and documentary filmmakers joined together in support of Popular Unity, a coalition of left-wing parties, producing work that protested the endemic poverty in their country. Guzmán's film covers the political upheaval of 1973 from the election of Salvador Allende in February to the coup in September that overthrew the political changes effected by the Popular Unity and forced Guzmán and his colleagues to work in exile.

The Battle of Chile is composed of three parts, 'The Bourgeois Insurrection' (1975), 'The Coup d'État' (1977), and 'Popular Power' (1979). Part One covers the election of Allende and the ensuing middle-class revolt. Part Two covers popular demonstrations in support and opposition to Allende. It also treats strategic debates within the left. Part Three focuses on later mass organization efforts. The film opens with some of the last footage shot by Guzmán and his crew: Allende is killed in the bombing of the La Moneda Palace and the Popular Unity party is effectively overthrown by the military coup supported by the middle class. With the denouement established at the outset, The Battle of Chile is set up to be studied more than experienced as a surprising narrative. Guzmán intended the film, while polemical, to be more analytic than propagandistic: 'From the very beginning, our idea was to make an analytical film, not an agitation alone' (Burton 1986: 51). After this opening shot, the film moves back to February, when the crew began filming, shortly before the narrow election of Allende.

Led by cinematographer Jorge Müller Silva, The Battle of Chile was shot with a team of handheld cameras by Guzmán and his team of collaborators, called El Equipo Tercer Año (The Third Year Group). The group participated in extended technical and theoretical discussions before filming began, defining five 'fronts of struggle' to focus the project (Pick 1980: 46–9). This allowed the cameramen to focus on capturing certain events effectively rather than worry over which events to record or neglect. From Guzmán's account, the more polished shots of the film were the result of his collaboration with Müller, where he would survey ongoing events while relaying specific filming strategies to Müller: 'Since I tried to anticipate for him what was about to happen, I could tell him to pan, to lower the camera, to raise it, instructing him to make certain movements that are much more readily identified with fictional than with documentary filmmaking' (Burton 1986: 57).

Even with this preplanning and improvised direction, the nature of the subject meant that the group had a limited amount of control over what they were able to film or, in some cases, found themselves filming. The filmmakers often captured planned events, such as governmental meetings, protests, and funerals, but as frequently taped unexpected developments.

Distinct scenes are often bridged by voice-over commentary, but the majority of analysis is provided by interviewed subjects. This one camera, one soundman style of filmmaking is most commonly known as direct or observational cinema. Here, the cameramen aim more to record as much of what unfolds before them than to produce polished shots. The editors of The Battle of Chile seem to have selected which scenes to include based on their impact or historical significance much more than their technical perfection. Shots with a shaky axis or blurring pans are often left in the film. In one scene, amidst unrest in the streets, the camera sweeps past the marquee of a movie theater. It announces that Violent City, starring Charles Bronson, is showing in Metrocolor. This brief reference to mainstream feature filmmaking reminds the spectator of the rhetorical, stylistic, and substantive differences between the type of cinema exemplified by The Battle of Chile versus this American feature. Moving past the marquee, the camera reveals an urban landscape lit with fire, running crowds, and the sounds of an ambulance. The fact that Violent City is showing in a truly riven, violent city jolts the spectator into recognition that, though certainly not shot in 35mm or Metrocolor, The Battle of Chile is a real document not to be conflated with Hollywood filmmaking. A more insistent reminder of this comes later.

In the most famous scene of the film, which closes Part One and opens Part Two, Argentine cameraman Leonardo Henricksen is shot and killed by a Chilean Army officer during the aborted coup in June. Here, the camera focuses on an officer who looks directly at the camera and fires; the image loses its balance and turns black.

Although the observational method of filmmaking employed in The Battle of Chile frequently produces objective shots that neither explicitly support nor oppose Allende, the left-wing political interest that was the impetus behind the project is more forcefully present in certain scenes, sometimes even in the shooting style. While the filmmakers begin by covering both sides of the electorate prior to Allende's election, often interviewing families at home in addition to mass demonstrations, afterwards the filmmakers appear more frequently and more intimately with Allende's sympathizers. Guzmán and his colleagues frequently film amidst leftist demonstrations, interviewing participants in the middle of crowds. They also travel with and interview workers on truck beds en route to union meetings. The right wing is shown in more formal settings or, if on the streets, from a greater distance. At a meeting of the American Institute for Free Trade Unionism (a group funded indirectly by the CIA, which encourages managers in the transportation sector to oppose Allende's policies), an unidentified speaker is shot in a low-angle close-up. His face monstrously fills the screen, with deep black nostrils flaring and a gaping mouth. Words that may already displease the viewer are colored even more insidiously by this stylistic choice.

In an interview, Guzmán states that the film was made to support Popular Unity, but none of its constitutive parties, mostly notably the Communists and Socialists, in particular. This was typical of Chilean documentary in this period, which was galvanized by a manifesto by Miguel Littín, another filmmaker and head of Chile Films, the national film production company. Littín called for the development of a leftist cinema that would valorize the workers and labor leaders who fought for Allende's reforms. Although Guzmán follows the principles that Littín outlines, The Battle of Chile was made without the help of Chile Films, which was too unstable to support the project.

The Battle of Chile, while shot by Chileans, received a great deal of international support in terms of production. French documentary filmmaker Chris Marker provided the film stock with which the picture was shot. After shooting was complete, fearing the destruction of his footage, Guzmán smuggled his film to Cuba following Allende's assassination. The Battle of Chile was edited in Cuba at the Cuban Institute of Film Art and Industry (ICAIC). With the help of solidarity campaigns, the film was distributed around the world and became the most prominent testament of the coup. Guzmán and other Chilean filmmakers went on to produce a startling amount of work in exile (one hundred and seventy-six films, fifty-six of which were features between 1973 and 1983), becoming the most successful Latin American 'cinema of exile' in this period.

(US, Capra, 1944)

Sixth in the 'Why We Fight' series produced by the US Army during World War II, The Battle of China builds on The Nazis Strike (1943), Divide and Conquer (1943), and The Battle of Russia (1944) through collaboration among Hollywood's top hands. Frank Capra, one of America's premier theatrical filmmakers, directed the film, stamping it with his recognizable personal style. Anatole Litvak, another influential Hollywood figure, codirected and oversaw production, without credit in both cases. Julius Epstein handled writing, William Hornbeck edited, Dimitri Tiomkin composed original music, and Anthony Veiller narrated. All worked together on the earlier documentaries.

Lacking Germany's propaganda machinery, Japan offered meager film footage for Capra to exploit for propaganda purposes. While some scenes in The Battle of China originated in Japan, Capra turned to stock Hollywood theatrical footage to help offset the deficit. The film states, 'Certain non-combat stock scenes were used from historical pictures', but never identifies theatrical footage. Where documentary film ends and Hollywood stock begins is deliberately indistinct.

The Battle of China appropriates and makes use of several stock patriotic symbols and images. Visual and auditory cues, such as the 'V for Victory' symbol superimposed on a ringing Liberty Bell, solicit predictable audience response. A rousing bugle call summons the troops, over an image of a road sign pointing to Tokyo. Thematic elements emphasize similarities, real and imaginary, between China and the United States. Confucius represents the Golden Rule and Sun Yat Sen becomes China's George Washington. While General Chiang Kai-Shek marches, Patton-like, across the screen, Madame Chiang addresses Congress. 'China's war is our war' is the resounding theme.

The Battle of China permits neither balance nor misinterpretation. The Chinese, with 'indestructible spirit', proceed on their 'Homeric journey to freedom', while their 'courage never faltered'. Through simplistic graphics, Chinese military disasters become 'trading space for time', while 'feverish' or 'blood-crazed' Japanese soldiers 'outdid themselves in barbarism', perpetrating a 'nightmare of cruelty'. The 'oldest and youngest of the world's great nations', filmgoers are assured, fight 'side-by-side', 'civilization against barbarism', 'good against evil'. In the process, this film demonstrates effective propaganda. In 2000 The Battle of China won the National Film Registry award of the National Film Preservation Board.

Battle of Midway, The

(US, Ford, 1942)

The first US combat documentary to receive wide commercial distribution during World War II, The Battle of Midway, was a project largely without precedent. As might be expected of a work sanctioned by the US Navy and President Franklin Roosevelt, the film commemorates the heroism of American forces in battle and illustrates the vital link between home front and war front at an early stage of US involvement in the war. Director John Ford, who was on leave from Hollywood as head of the Field Photographic branch of the Office of the Coordinator of Information (later the OSS), also experiments with formal elements and incorporates themes of importance to his work as a fiction filmmaker. In this regard, The Battle of Midway seems no less deeply personal a work for the political calculations that shaped its making.

Ford had previously supervised the production of training films for new recruits and reconnaissance films for the high command, but the three-day battle at the Pacific Ocean atoll of Midway, 1,100 miles northwest of Pearl Harbor, in early June 1942 provided Ford with an opportunity to extend his wartime work in a new direction. Accepting an assignment to photograph the defense of the US Naval Air Station at Midway, Ford navigated the shoals of military, governmental, and studio bureaucracies to retain control over the footage, shifting post-production from Washington to Los Angeles on the Twentieth Century Fox lot. Speculations about the distribution of Ford's new documentary was a topic of much comment in the Hollywood trade press in late summer, leading up to the release of The Battle of Midway by the War Activities Committee and Fox in September. Seven first-run houses in New York ran the film, as did six in Los Angeles; eventually five hundred prints were circulated nationwide. The following March, The Battle of Midway was among four films named Best Documentary by the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences.

Remarkably, The Battle of Midway devotes little of its eighteen minutes to explaining the wider causes and significance of the battle, a turning point in the Pacific campaign. We learn nothing about the arrangement of naval and air forces on the eve of battle or the tactical maneuvering on either side, including the crucial decoding of cables that alerted US officials to a feint of Japanese forces toward the Aleutians and the pending Midway air attack. Instead, the film offers a series of impressions of the Midway outpost and its occupants before, during, and after the battle, emphasizing the natural beauty and serenity of the islands and surrounding waters, the ominous stillness of an evening watch as silhouetted soldiers stand guard before a setting sun, the perceptual disorientation and confusion produced by the bombing and strafing of the islands, and the resilience and determination of the American marines tested by the attack.

Ford's account of the battle, moreover, does not shy away from images of destruction—billowing black smoke against a cobalt sky; gutted buildings; twisted metal, wreckage, and rubble; the injured and the dead—and a concluding account of burial at sea functions as an elegiac counterpoint to a more aggressively martial coda in which victory is asserted and the costs to the enemy are enumerated. Alfred Newman's musical score, incorporating familiar military and national anthems and hymns, is crucial to the overall rhythmic effects. In this regard, The Battle of Midway seems less journalistic than musical in design, indebted, as Tag Gallagher has suggested, to nineteenth-century battle compositions, with different musical markers signaling striking shifts in tone.

Contemporaneous reviewers found The Battle of Midway's combat footage—shot in 16mm Technicolor by Ford and Jack MacKenzie, his twenty-year-old first mate, from their post on Midway's Eastern Island—particularly compelling. (Additional air and sea photography was provided by Kenneth M. Pier, who accompanied pilots off the USS Hornet, and brief footage of an 'Ohio family' at home was supplied by cinematographer Gregg Toland.) The footage was assembled by editor Robert Parrish in two extended battle passages marked by free-hand camerawork and expressively disjointed cutting, with the descent of planes and multiple explosions interspersed with the reactions of marines returning anti-aircraft fire. At times, the image track seems to slip its sprockets, as a visible frame line optically registers the force of the concussion, and a sense of geography is lost amid the smoke and floating debris. Early in the assault Ford was knocked unconscious by one such explosion and received a flesh wound, for which he was awarded the Purple Heart. Reports of this, circulated by the press, only served to enhance the perceived authenticity of the film as a photographic document.

Ford's experiments with vocal commentary proved more controversial. Soliciting scripts from screenwriter Dudley Nichols and MGM executive James Kevin McGuinness, based on personal notes, Ford supervised the reading of the commentary by four actors—Donald Crisp, Irving Pichel, Henry Fonda, and James Darwell—the last two of whom were currently at work on The Ox Bow Incident on the Fox lot. Above and beyond conventional scene-setting, the commentary dramatizes, and works to bridge, the gap between depicted events and their presentation to the viewer, a function most conspicuously evident when Darwell, speaking as if an American mother watching the Midway footage, expresses urgent concern for the well-being of the young pilots far from home.

Some critics at the time found the commentary overly intrusive or sentimental; Darwell's dialogue, in particular, was thought an unwarranted Hollywood touch. Ford, however, who claimed to have wanted to make the film for 'the mothers of America', never expressed regret about these choices, and Parrish recalls that audiences at Radio City Music Hall were audibly moved by it. Certainly the selection of this particular quartet of voices was not gratuitous; Fonda and Darwell evoke the poignant leave-taking scene from Ford's film version of The Grapes of Wrath (1940); Crisp and Pichel likewise use Ford's adaptation of How Green Was My Valley (1941), with its wistful memorial view of a Welsh mining family. Strands of 'Red River Valley', lifted from the soundtrack to The Grapes of Wrath for the evening watch in The Battle of Midway, reinforce these associations. Trading in heightened emotion, certain moments on the soundtrack thus demonstrate possible points of intersection between combat narratives and domestic melodrama, genres then sharing the screen of movie houses. They also serve a wider project of reimagining community ties between home front and battle front under the pressure of a global war.

Battle of Russia, The

(US, Litvak, 1944)

The Battle of Russia was the fifth installment in the group of American World War II propaganda films known as the Why We Fight series. The films in the series, a total of seven, fall into two major groups: those that provided historical background for the events in Europe and Asia

(Prelude to War (1943), The Nazis Strike (1943), Divide and Conquer (1943), and War Comes to America (1945)), and those that detailed specific campaigns of the war and the respective allies involved in those campaigns. The Battle of Russia, along with The Battle of Britain (1943) and The Battle of China (1944), form the latter group. The Battle of Russia, like the other films in this subgroup, was intended to educate the audience about a nation and ally to which most Americans were traditionally adverse. The resulting film is one of the only pro-Soviet films ever produced by the US government.

Although most of the credit for the Why We Fight series has traditionally, and justifiably, been given to Frank Capra, these films were collaborative projects, and thus it is important to recognize all of those involved in the production of The Battle of Russia. Capra received producer credit for the film and, by all accounts, worked closely and intensively with director Anatole Litvak to give the film its shape and orientation. Eric Knight, who headed a team of seven screenwriters, is largely responsible for the film's verbose scripted narration, which was spoken by Walter Huston. The score for the film was done by Hollywood veteran Dmitri Tomkin and drew heavily on Tchaikovsky as well as traditional Russian folk songs and ballads. Although collaboration was obviously important to the genesis of The Battle of Russia, it is important to reiterate the important role that Litvak and Capra played in combining the elements of the film into a cohesive whole. As a compilation film, The Battle of Russia's footage is derived from various sources, including newsreels, amateur filming, and fiction films. From these disparate sources Litvak and Capra, along with veteran editor Walter Hornbeck, created a cogent report on the Russian people and their battle against Hitler's army.

The film itself consists of two parts, the first dealing with a history of the Russian people up to and including the peak of the Nazi invasions of Russia (December 1941). The second part of the film begins with winter falling on the Nazi invaders and goes on to detail the heroic Russian counterattack launched during that winter, which not only drove the Germans back, but also, as the film's narrator pointedly reminds us, 'shattered the myth of Nazi invincibility', and thus boosted the Allied hopes for an eventual defeat of Hitler and his forces. To illustrate all of this, the second part focuses especially on two decisive battles: that at Leningrad and that at Stalingrad.

Formally, The Battle of Russia is the epitome of the compilation film. Shots and sounds are recontextualized in such a way as to present the images as supportive of the film's argument, without a questioning of the image itself; thus, viewers take footage from Alexander Nevsky (Eisenstein, 1938) as representation of historical fact. This phenomenon is achieved in The Battle of Russia not only through skillful montage but also through the employment of a unifying voice-over that dominates the film's soundtrack. Thomas Bohn points out that voice-over narration is present in seventy-five percent of the film, well above contemporary theoretical protocol, which called for no more than two-thirds of the visual track to be accompanied by narration. Nonetheless, the narration in The Battle of Russia is not excessive. The material presented was both complex and obscure to the film's audience, and at no point does the film's propagandistic tone break down into obvious repetition. Besides the prominent narration, the film's informative mode demanded an abundance of animated effects to illustrate tactical concepts such as 'wedge and trap' and 'defense in depth', as well as troop movements and other military maneuvers.

Thematically, the film falls in line with the messages presented throughout the Why We Fight series: Germany's invasion of Russia represents an encroachment of the 'slave world' into the 'free world' of Russia, with a fascist army threatening a peace-loving, pious, and proud people. The depravity of the Germans is reiterated throughout the film with constant reminders that German soldiers were literally raping and pillaging their way through the Russian countryside. However, as the film's most famous line, 'Generals may win campaigns, but people win wars', indicates, the film is concerned with showing how the spirit of a people can defeat even the mightiest army. The film's concluding shots, showing the Russian army along with the armies of all of the Allies marching off to presumable victory, underscore the idea that the United States and Russia are 'in this together', and thus point to the film's true goal, that of propagandizing unity with the heretofore (and afterwards as well) adversarial Russians.

The success of the film in achieving this goal is illustrated by the film's popularity, which extended beyond the military audience for which it was initially intended. The Battle of Russia was the second of the Why We Fight films to receive an Academy Award nomination for Best Documentary feature. The film was also popular abroad, with Stalin ordering hundreds of prints to be shown in Russian theaters. Like all propaganda films, though, The Battle of Russia served its historical purpose and was quickly dated as an artifact of government policy. The necessary propagandistic elisions that the film presents (not mentioning the word communist once, the avoidance of any mention of the Stalin–Hitler nonaggression pact, and the praise for the piety of an officially atheist state), made the film unsuitable for postwar policies. The film was too good at sympathetically portraying Stalin and Russia, and was withdrawn from circulation during the Cold War, making it one of the most ironically effective propaganda pieces in documentary history.

(US, Huston, 1945)

The Battle of San Pietro, a documentary about one battle in Italy in the Allied campaign in World War II, is the most critically acclaimed wartime documentary ever produced under the auspices of the US War Department. The film makes use of maps, charts, and voice-over narration to provide an account of this battle. The more lasting contribution of The Battle of San Pietro, however, emerges from its meditation on the experience of the infantryman, and its larger insights into the destructiveness of war and the resilience of the human spirit.

The Battle of San Pietro bears the unmistakable stamp of its director, writer, and voice-over narrator, the Hollywood filmmaker John Huston. Before the war, Huston had been primarily known as a screenwriter, but his talents as a director were proven after the release of The Maltese Falcon (1941). Along with Frank Capra, William Wyler, John Ford, and others, Huston was one of several prominent filmmakers enlisted in the American war effort. Huston made three war documentaries for the US Army Pictorial Service: Report from the Aleutians (1943), The Battle of San Pietro, and Let There Be Light (1945). The latter film, about veterans under treatment for various mental problems resulting from combat, was suppressed by the War Department until 1980 (Simmon 2000: 58).

Huston was sent to Italy in 1943 to document the triumphant entry of American forces into Rome, but the ground offensive met stiff resistance from the Germans and slowed to a halt north of Naples. Huston was reassigned to make a film 'that would explain to American audiences why U.S. forces in Italy were no longer advancing' (Huston 1980: 109). American forces had moved into position at the foot of the Liri Valley, through which meandered the main road to Rome. The German defenses had taken position in and around the little village of San Pietro, and were about to offer some deadly resistance to Allied advances.

The film begins with a two-minute introduction by General Mark Clark, who led the US Fifth Army into the Liri Valley, explaining that San Pietro was key to the region and that in light of the importance of the objective, casualties were 'not excessive'. It is widely assumed that Clark's introductory words were designed and tacked on by the War Department to counter the film's implication that casualties were excessive. According to William Nolan, however, Huston wrote the opening narration for Clark, thinking that Clark would have it reworked for his own purposes. Huston was surprised when Clark used the speech unaltered: 'Now, there was this four-star general repeating, word for word, the strategy of the campaign as I saw it [...] and me just a dogface in it! I guess he didn't know any more about what was going on than I did' (Nolan 1965: 51).

In part the film chronicles the progress of, and military strategy employed in, Allied attempts to take San Pietro and the surrounding hills. The film's finest points are to be found elsewhere, however. Huston's film unit, with its 35mm handheld Eyemo newsreel cameras (Haskew 2000: 82), was attached to the 143rd Infantry Regiment of the 36th Texas Infantry Division. The Battle of San Pietro manages to convey the men's experience through footage that captures the violence of battle, including numerous close-ups of men's faces, shots of the many casualties as they lie on the battlefield or are wrapped in shrouds, and narrated accounts of the extreme danger of the infantry attacks. The 143rd Regiment alone required 1,100 replacements after the Battle of San Pietro (Huston 1980: 115). Huston has said that he made the film to express admiration for the courage and fortitude of the common foot soldier.

Where Frank Capra's wartime documentaries are highly propagandistic, Huston was unable or unwilling to hide his strong misgivings about the war. The Battle of San Pietro archly and subtly demonstrates the war's effect on the townspeople, on the town, on San Pietro's artistic and cultural treasures, and on nature itself. It does so in part through what has been called 'one of the most memorable voice-over narrations in film—both in script and delivery' (Simmon 2000: 59). After shots of the broken town of San Pietro, we see a pock-marked statue of St Peter as well as the ruined church of St Peter's, its dome missing to reveal the sky above. In voice-over Huston intones something apparently taken from a tourist guidebook: 'Patron Saint, Peter, point of interest, St Peter's, 1438, note interesting treatment of chancel'. Toward the film's end, Huston sums up with shots of men digging graves and slow pans across the faces of the survivors:

The lives lost were precious lives—to their country, to their loved ones, and to the men themselves [...] many among these you see alive here have since joined the ranks of their brothers at arms, who fell at San Pietro. For ahead lay San Battore, and the Rapido River, and Cassino, and beyond Cassino more rivers, and more mountains, and more towns, more San Pietros, greater or lesser, a thousand more.

(The Battle of San Pietro, 1945)

Toward the film's end we see a montage of images of children emerging from the rubble, some smiling, some obviously frightened but too curious to remain in hiding. James Agee objected to the 'emotional sales pressure' of the music of the Mormon Tabernacle Choir here. Nonetheless, he called the scene 'radiant with illimitable suggestions of meaning and mystery' and 'the first great passage of war poetry that has got on the screen' (Agee 1945). We see shots of the people of the village returning to their daily routines, carrying water, plowing, and sowing seeds. Huston's narration tells us that although the prime military aim had been to defeat the enemy, the people looked upon the Americans as their deliverers. We see a religious procession, and the voice-over narration ends the film: 'And the people pray to their patron saint to intercede with God on behalf of those who came to deliver them [...] and passed on to the North with the passing battle.'

Upon finishing the film, Huston showed it to a group of officers, who pronounced the film 'antiwar' and decided to withhold distribution. Huston told the officers that if he ever made a picture that was pro-war, he 'hoped someone would take me out and shoot me' (Huston 1980: 120). The Battle of San Pietro presented the battle not as a strategic victory, but as a small battle in a costly and continuing campaign. General George C. Marshall asked to see the film, and later pronounced that all army trainees should see it to become better prepared for the shock of battle. Huston was promoted to major. The Battle of San Pietro was released in 1945, however, after the Allied victory, and having been cut from five to three reels. Although it did not fulfill its original military objective, it remains one of the most humane and artful war documentaries ever made. As James Agee wrote in 1945, 'it is in every way as good a war film as I have seen; in some ways it is the best'.

(UK, Urban, 1916)

Of the various documentaries made under official auspices during World War I, The Battle of the Somme has rightly assumed a key place. It broke all box office records, as thousands were turned away in the first week despite its having opened simultaneously at over thirty London cinemas. More than one theatre was exhibiting it to ten thousand people a day, and the Finsbury Park Cinema attracted over fifty thousand people in that first week. Thereafter, one hundred prints were distributed around the provinces, and within two months hiring fees had been scaled down from £40 a week to £8 for three nights, bringing it within reach of the smallest cinemas. Bioscope complained of unfair competition when music halls hired it instead of limiting themselves to shorts, but it drew many into the cinema for the first time. Still more important, it provided a huge stimulus for the idea of a British film archive. Langford Reed noted that in 1913 both Copenhagen's Royal Library and the Louvre had established film sections, similar archives existing in the Vatican, Madrid, and New York. Meanwhile, the British Museum resisted because film was combustible and impermanent. However, the press considered it unthinkable that Somme prints should not be preserved for posterity.

The film covers the first phase of the Somme offensive, which was to last about four months, with an advance of some thousand yards at the expense of more than half a million British casualties. This opening phase, and the huge preparations that had been necessary, generated footage enough for a feature-length propaganda film, although disjointedness betrays its opportunist origins. Both the Germans and French produced their own Somme films, the former claimed by The Times to be technically superb. It focused on the devastation wrought on French towns by Allied guns, and German care for enemy wounded. The two German attacks were obvious fakes. The film allegedly 'followed the British model as closely as possible', and certainly the French version did so. This began with preparations: 'long files of marching soldiers and vast stores of ammunition', then trenches 'full of soldiers ready to leap out', the attack, and numerous Germans surrendering.

French troops, who had bled too freely at Verdun to be able to make their expected contribution on the Somme, have little place in the British film, but there is an image of enduring French peasant women, toiling within view of a military camp that proclaims the ever-present hazards of war. The film is especially distinguished by the amount of attention given to casualties. Topicals, no longer free from censorship, were shorn of 'realistic horrors of war' by either civil censor or service departments, leaving Cinema's reviewer unprepared for the Somme film's images of 'war, rich with death'. These same images continue to shape people's understanding of the war, because the 'over the top' sequence has been used repeatedly as television producers' shorthand. Indeed, it was passed off, in the official compilation America Goes Over (1927), as US Signal Corps' filming of the Doughboys' 'Jump-off' at St Mihielin in September 1918. A contemporary letter to The Nation quoted the Manchester Guardian: 'Two years ago the public exhibition of horrors like this would have been condemned as an indecency.’ Its writer, wondering what could have happened in the course of those two years, resented the soldiers’ suffering being turned into entertainment. Others, notably the Dean of Durham in a letter to The Times, protested ‘against an entertainment which wounds the heart and violates the very sanctities of bereavement’. However, the Daily News gloated that the provinces were devouring it ‘with an eagerness which must be not a little disturbing to the Dean of Durham’, and bereaved Times readers found his objections ‘squeamish and sentimental’.

John Raphael, Era’s Paris correspondent, focuses on those ‘over the top’ scenes, the core of the film since without them people would have been unconvinced by the remainder. Apparently an officer friend gave him an eyewitness account of their filming, when the cameraman ‘was actually crouching in that foremost trench, protected by nothing but a few sandbags, and operating through a hole’. These scenes were almost certainly staged, though his remarks may result from confusion rather than a desire to tell a good story or offset rumors of faking. Faked or not, they worked powerfully on many people. ‘My God, they’re dead’, cried one woman; at another cinema ‘two men fainted, but not a single woman’. Elsewhere ‘a woman felt faint, but after a sip of water outside insisted on returning to the theatre and seeing the film through’. On the whole, audiences seem to have been awe-stricken at feeling themselves witness to youthful vitality extinguished by unseen forces; however, one evening-gowned flapper complained: ‘It is rather too sad. They ought to cut out the gruesome bits.’

That ‘gruesome bits’ were included at all was doubtless due to the need to make some acknowledgment of the appalling casualty lists, and of public resentment that official films had revealed so little. Thus, this film purports to let people in on war’s grim secrets while still keeping them from the truth. Malins knew how mild it was. Even so, he had feared ‘that some of the dead scenes’ might offend. Graves’s ‘certain cure for lust of blood’ had to be avoided if the film was not to provoke demand for an end to the carnage. At the same time thrills were needed to draw the public; the trick was to offer glimpses of war’s grimness before sending them home, cheered with the prospect of victory. Malins discovered that editing involved ‘discretion, diplomacy and tact’ with so many interests to be served and ‘so much [...] at stake’. The central ploy was to translate death to willing and glorious sacrifice. This was the rhetoric used in Lloyd George’s statement that accompanied the film, canny enough to infect responses from some of the bereaved: ‘I never understood their sacrifice until I had seen this film.’ It was blazoned on countless happily smiling faces of men marching up the line, earnest in their belief in what they were doing. The authorities, far more skilled in mass psychology than in handling world affairs, understood that people wanted to be persuaded: it was so much easier to cope with loss if the bereaved could believe in the cause and its leaders. However, the justness of a cause is not sufficient to maintain people’s commitment to it; they must believe that it will prevail. Raphael was one among many who found the film worked wonderfully in this respect. Although he had never doubted final victory, the film made him feel safer and more confident than ever: ‘Look at the German prisoners as they pass on the film and you can see that Germany knows that she is fighting a losing fight.’ To his selective eye, personal shabbiness proclaims their loss of morale, whereas there is not ‘a dirty or unshaven man’ among the British (the German film showed Germans brushing their uniforms). British citizens smile while Germans cringe, and the ‘poor fellow whose own leg is badly smashed, giving up the corner he has found to rest it in to a fainting German prisoner’, typifies the chivalry of troops assured of their own superiority.

Another resource for victory on display was British hardware—guns of many calibers being shown in action. Here is the neat evasion used in TV coverage of the Gulf War. Audiences marvel at the technology, losing sight of end results: people blown to pieces or shredded by shrapnel. There was also targeting of the many munition workers seeking relief in the cinema. Pre-battle sequences include great stacks of shells that not only acknowledge the logistics of conflict but also the hard work being done at home to sustain the army in the field. This is both a pat on the back and an exhortation to continued effort. The aim is to balance humanity with technology. As ‘Blanche’ says in the Bystander, the horror of modern war is that people become cogs in a destructive machine. Naturally, it is the Hun who has robbed war of its romance, and a main objective of the struggle is to reeducate him. This shows on screen when, ‘a German prisoner, sitting dazed among his enemies, is offered a cigarette by a British soldier'. In a moment, as someone put it, 'his face is beautifully lit—lit with the sudden glory of the truth that men are men, and in their humanity triumphant over any process that would make them less than men'.

There were complaints that the film was sometimes screened in incongruous company, even farce, but it was often slotted at short notice into existing programs. Whatever the circumstances, it is clear that the film was never viewed passively, although there is evidence that audiences had generally lost their old demonstrativeness. People shouted excitedly when they recognized someone on screen. At the Maida Vale Palace one interruption came from 'a wounded Gordon [who] saw himself being medically attended at Minden Post'. There were also more formal commentaries: Lieutenant F.R. Holmes, later to accompany one of the cinemators touring the country, lectured at the Scala in 'a breezy, pleasant, chatty manner'. At Norwich and elsewhere parties of wounded were taken to see the film, and many of them would have had no trouble in filling out the gaps left by editorial reticence. One wounded soldier in a Shaftesbury Avenue cinema broke down when he saw 'the dead Devons lying on the battlefield, with the battery of artillery moving forward. He sobbed like a child and a nurse led him out of the theatre'. Cinema's reviewer noted how dozens of wheels passed the bodies without any desecrating them, but perhaps the wounded soldier was an artilleryman, who knew that gun teams could hardly avoid sprawled bodies as they careered along corduroy tracks. Besides, the fastidiousness of men and horses (who prefer not to trample on bloodied corpses) succumbs to the terrors of shellfire.

There are various other moments when frontline experience would have taken viewers behind the film's glib narrative. Even scenes of soldiers' ablutions, reassuring to mothers with soldier-sons still young enough to forget to wash behind their ears, would remind the trench soldier of the scarcity of clean water up the line. If he had been in any large attack, he would probably imagine General de Lisle's pep talk on the eve of battle not in the clichéd terms recorded by Malins, but more like Brigadier-General Tuxford's distortions about German war on the wounded, which had fighting mad troops screaming 'Remember the Llandovery Castle!'

Some deconstruction of the film's narrative has been undertaken by Smithers, who points to a dozen questionable episodes. Most striking is the July 1 mine explosion at Hawthorn Redoubt, which is followed by a shot of what purports to be the resulting crater. It probably represents the aftermath of a July 5 explosion, and its later repetition smacks of editorial carelessness. What was probably editorial calculation was the inclusion of that moment of irritation as 'one of the English "Tommies" gives a German prisoner a dig in the ribs'. The American trade paper Variety, seeing the film as a potential 'gold mine', proposed the omission of this moment of 'actual feeling' and some rearrangement. American audiences demanded a stronger narrative, and Charles Urban, handling British official documentaries in America, achieved this by splicing in sections of Britain Prepared and shots of an American Field Ambulance (interest was apt to lapse without an American presence). Titles were rewritten, 'eliminating what we should call British patriotism', and the resultant seven-episode serial proved highly successful with American audiences. It was shown in sixteen thousand theatres in twelve thousand towns from coast to coast, and by the end of 1917 some sixty-five million people had paid to see it.

BBC: The Voice of Britain

(UK, Legg, 1934–5)

BBC: The Voice of Britain was the first General Post Office (GPO) Film Unit film to use synchronized sound. It featured appearances by H.G. Wells, J.B. Priestley, G.K. Chesterton, George Bernard Shaw, and even a brief showing by the young filmmaker Humphrey Jennings (as a witch in Macbeth).

As early as 1932, the Empire Marketing Board (EMB) was approached by the BBC to produce a film advertising and celebrating the new national broadcaster. 'They informed the EMB that, after an examination of the field, they were satisfied that Mr Grierson and his EMB Film Unit were best qualified to make the particular type of film they desired' (Post Office memorandum to the Select Committee, undated 1932, in Rotha 1973: 128).

In many ways BBC: The Voice of Britain was the first film internationally to make clear the power of any major broadcasting institution, as well as spelling out the Reithian ideals that informed her public face. The irony of yet another government body making such a project is invisible in the film itself. Nevertheless, the film gives some clues as to why Legg, in his subsequent career, was to be so favoured by large institutional backers including, after the war, that ultimate global player, the United Nations. Grierson biographer Forsyth Hardy commented: 'The GPO film is admittedly diverse, but not only is there a plan behind the diversity but an individual approach is established and maintained. The film dramatises its material but humanises it as well' (Hardy in Cinema Quarterly vol. 3, no. 4, 1935).

The plan of the film is a straightforward, now classic, one for the 'behind the scenes' film: the film diary of a day's broadcasting activity at the BBC, itself less than ten years old at the time of the shoot.

The set-up of the film is equally normative. The popular cinematic trope of the sleeping (British) countryside is used to convey a land whose natural voice the BBC had, in the mind of the literary and intellectual world, rapidly become. An early morning service conducted by the Reverend Dick Sheppard is the first of the BBC programmes (that day) to 'gently wake the land'. This lyrical and elegiac mode, later often referred to as the 'ecclesiastical', using musical and poetic thematics and images quite unself-consciously, was to be more fully worked out in later films such as Coal Face (1935) and Night Mail (1936). In these films the words of poet W.H. Auden and the music of Benjamin Britten were woven into the visual montage in what was to become the paradigm of early British public documentary (the GPO and the Crown Film Unit) style and the bedrock of the BBC's own characteristic (and schooled) Documentary House Style for the next fifty or more years.

Paul Rotha saw no particular signs of personal style in the film, however. Writing of a group of films made in the mid-1930s, he stated: 'None of them had any individual characteristics of direction. Any of these three directors [Evelyn Spice, Stuart Legg, and Edgar Anstey] could have made any of the three films' (Rotha 1933).

Apparently, there were many periods of funding crisis in the making of the film. This might have been expected in Arthur Elton's first (public) filmmaking intersection with the perpetually beleaguered world of public broadcasting. Elizabeth Sussex reported that according to World Film News, in May 1936, the actual cost of the shoot through to the final release print was between £7,000 and £8,000.

Benoit-Lévy, Jean

Jean Benoit-Lévy was a filmmaker, screenwriter, and one of the most important producers of French educational and scientific films before World War II. Deprived of his professional position by the anti-Jewish statutes promulgated by the Vichy government in 1940, he sought refuge in the United States in 1941. There, by refocusing and redefining his contribution to educational films, he became a teacher, an author, and an executive officer for the United Nations. He continued his dedication to the importance of film in mass education.

His vision of film is based on his strong family values and the late nineteenth century's scientific outlook, imbued with positivism. He began his career as assistant filmmaker just before World War I, a time when Europeans were adjusting to the political, social, and educational challenges of mass society. Benoit-Lévy was introduced to the promising new technology by his uncle, Edmond Benoit-Lévy, a lawyer and pioneer of French cinema. The family shared a commitment to the republican ideals of equality, rationality, modern teaching, social reform, and progress.

Benoit-Lévy perceived film as both an art and formidable educational tool. His films testify to his preoccupation with applied scientific knowledge—particularly in medicine, hygiene, and engineering—to improve the living conditions of ordinary people, especially children. He believed that everyone had the right to live a healthy and rewarding life. His films on professional training and craftsmanship are tributes to technical skills and beauty.

He was well acquainted with the small group of talented avant-garde filmmakers of the late 1920s who connected formal research and social documentary. In 1945–6 Jean Benoit-Lévy would consult this group, which included John Grierson, Alberto Cavalcanti, Paul Rotha, and others, when he reflected on the role and the orientation of future film production for the United Nations Film Board.

In his work during the 1920s and 1930s Benoit-Lévy's position was reformist, opposed to the revolutionary and authoritarian solutions that flourished during his lifetime. He was attached to traditional values, a strong work ethic, and individual freedom. Nevertheless, he believed that state intervention was necessary to ensure adequate ongoing funding for educational film production, as well as to create a centralized institution dedicated to documentary film exchanges. Furthermore, he was convinced that France had an international cultural influence in this field that should be maintained and strengthened. He was well known in France, a person of stature among the cultural elite of the interwar period, and well acquainted with government officials. The war completely disrupted his personal and professional life. The deprivation he suffered and his exile contributed to his being almost forgotten.

Benoit-Lévy made more than three hundred films, many commissioned by institutions and ministries. As an educational film expert, he wrote articles and reports. His proposal to further the use of film in the school system was ambitious: the development of a new pedagogy (pédagogie cinématographique) that would involve a connection between filmmaker, teacher, and student. Moreover, different kinds of educational and social films were required, because learning was not restricted to the classroom. In accord with several documentary filmmakers of his time, Benoit-Lévy believed that film audiences should be educated to appreciate different genres. His friend, Germaine Dulac, called this éducation cinématographique. His films were shown in both nontheatrical and theatrical networks. For the latter, he used the category 'films éducatifs spectaculaires', which included such films as Pasteur (1922).

He referred to films de vie (films of life) to describe more precisely what documentary films should be. Films of life were 'documents of life'; they not only express human activities but 'transfer life itself to the screen'. They had a profound social function. During the interwar period he focused on educational and scientific films but also made eleven feature films. For many of those, he worked with Marie Epstein as a writer-director team. The most well known, La Maternelle (1933) and La Mort du cygne (Ballerina, 1937), follow his film of life (documentary) approach. The truth and reality of social issues could be addressed through a free creative process.

In 1941 Benoit-Lévy and his family came to New York with the help of the Rockefeller Foundation. Unwilling to compromise his vision of film to participate in the American commercial film industry, he taught film studies at the New School for Social Research alongside many refugee scholars. It was during his teaching tenure that he wrote Les Grandes Missions du cinéma, published in 1945. Film was an autonomous art with its own laws, technique, and means of expression. He believed that logic and visual and intellectual clarity were indispensable to filmmaking. The aesthetics and the editing—beauty and drama—contributed to the idée-force, the main idea, which must always be immediately accessible.

He was also convinced that cinema had a social and civic mission. This idea was not new, but it was forcefully repeated as the war was ending and social concern predominated. Then Benoit-Lévy insisted on freedom more than in his prewar writings. Film was a most powerful medium for the diffusion of human thought. After World War II the discourse was about film bringing people closer together to learn, to discover, and to understand the world.

SUZANNE LANGLOIS

Biography

Born in Paris in 1888, to a middle-class family originally from Alsace. Trained at the Laboratoires Pathé and Gaumont, then began his career as an assistant in 1910. In 1922 founded his company, the Édition française cinématographique, dedicated to producing educational films. In 1945 named Director of the Film and Visual Information Division of the United Nations Department of Public Information. Appointed director of the United Nations Film Board in January 1947. Left the UN in 1949 but maintained a lifetime commitment to the ideals of international cooperation and mass education. In 1958 the International Council for Film and Television (ICFT) was founded under the patronage of UN Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO), and he was elected its first delegate-general. Died in Paris in 1959.

Berlin: The Symphony of a Great City

(Germany, Ruttmann, 1927)

One of the internationally best known and most influential German documentaries of the 1920s was Walter Ruttmann's Berlin: Die Sinfonie der Großstadt (1927, Berlin: The Symphony of a Great City). With Alberto Cavalcanti's famous Rien que les heures (1926) on Paris, the film started the tradition of the city-films of that period. Walter Ruttmann and his two co-authors, Karl Freund and Carl Meyer, planned to show Berlin in a course of one day from sunrise to around midnight. The latter two wanted to report simply on the daily life in the metropolis, but Ruttmann preferred to create a visual symphony with his material. His tool was the montage of formal symbols and abstract structure, which was obviously influenced by his abstract animation films before. The form and movement became more important than the content. 'During editing it became clear how difficult it was to visualize the symphonic curve that I had before my eyes. Many of the most beautiful shots couldn't be used, because it is not a nice picture book that should be created, but something like a construction of a complex machine, which can only run when even the smallest parts fit into each other with precision,' as Ruttmann stated in an article shortly after the premiere on September 23, 1927.

Ruttmann succeeded, as the first images demonstrate, when waves of water changed into graphic structures. These abstract images then dissolve into a train crossing; a fast-moving train comes, which is heading in the direction of Berlin. The landscape is rushing past the window. The detailed rhythmic montage again builds up a close intensity. The spectator is already reaching Berlin with high expectations. What will happen next? After this hectic start, a calm moment follows. At five o'clock in the morning life on the streets begins slowly. The previous night's revellers head home exhausted, and the first workers start to rush to the factories. Now the streets and subway fill up. The machines start to run. The montage develops a growing speed and Ruttmann sometimes experiments with ironic comparisons, for example when a close-up of the walking feet of the laborers is followed by the feet of cows on their way to the slaughterhouse, which is then followed by marching soldiers. The second act shows pupils on the way to school, employees go to their offices, a group is riding in the park. The shops are opening, city life is awakening. An important element of the film is the traffic of cars, railways, trams, subway, and even airplanes, which symbolizes the rhythm of the modern metropolis. The lunch break at noon follows the different classes with their specific meals and behavior. Even the animals in the zoo get something to eat. After a short nap, life goes on. The suicide of a woman attracts onlookers. When work is over, leisure time with different kinds of sport begins. The last part shows the nightlife of the roaring twenties with theater, cabaret, variety, dance, and drinking. Berlin is illuminated by neon light. The traffic is still heavy. The film ends with fireworks. The next day is waiting in the wings.

In Berlin: Die Sinfonie der Großstadt the metropolis is the main actor. The people often appear in a group, or they are anonymous elements and only part of a mass. There are no individuals with whom to identify, and Ruttmann shows different classes without bias. He often contrasts the rich and the poor, but he also shows the wealthy middle class or simple workers. The film was, as a result, criticized by many from Siegfried Kracauer to Jerzy Toeplitz to Klaus Wildenhahn. They claimed that the film showed only the surface and that Ruttmann did not analyze the society deeply enough. They also claimed that he did not take a political position. These criticisms miss the point. Ruttmann was most interested not in a sociological study, but in creating a special symphony of Berlin. 'The strict rhythmic style of editing indicates that Berlin doesn't wait or pause for anything, and that the rhythm of the city, of which the activities of the masses function as a part, is the very essence of the city itself' (Chapman 1979: 39). Ruttmann aimed to show this as well as the modernity of Berlin. The broad range of impressions and images in their formalistic structure of editing become a dynamic flow and spectators were attracted by that rhythm, which shows typical life without any heroes. The Hungarian film theorist Béla Balázs experienced Berlin as 'optical music'. It was also discussed as an example of an 'absolute film', where the structure and visual impression is more important than the story. The avant-garde worked on this new form of abstract film, and Ruttmann had been one of the leaders of that group since 1922. The concept of new realism was best represented in this film, which became the model for many documentaries. Sequences of his Berlin film are still used in historical television programs to symbolize city life in the Weimar Republic. Ruttmann's symphony shows the city in a new way and was one of the first documentaries in the 1920s in Germany that attained the status of a classic.

The film was later often adapted and quoted in other films. Between 1936 and 1943 Leo de LaFogue shot another Berlin film. The theatrical release was in 1950 under the title Symphonie einer Weltstadt (Berlin wie es war) (1950, Symphony of the Metropolis (Berlin as it was)), and it showed Berlin before the destruction resulting from World War II and tried to imitate Ruttmann, but he was not successful. The most recent adaption was Thomas Schadt's Berlin: Sinfonie einer Großstadt (2002, Berlin: Symphony of a City). He was inspired by Ruttmann's classic film. The 2002 film is shot in black and white and follows a day in modern Berlin, but the new film also reflects the history of the metropolis in the last century and thus develops its own quality. The film is accompanied by modern, abstract music, which gives the film a rhythm of its own. This proved the actuality that Ruttmann's Berlin film still has today.

Berliner, Alan

Alan Berliner has been delving into the intricacies of family life in his documentary film work for many years. His style is at once one of meticulous research and down-to-earth story-swapping as he skillfully blends the personal and the universal. While Berliner's early work was essentially avant-garde or experimental in form and content, he gravitated toward documentary filmmaking largely out of a love for genealogy, family collections of home movies, and an interest in discovering his place in the world through an investigation of his own heritage. This is reflected in the various subjects he has taken for his work, both in form and content.

Berliner's early work explored notions of the avant-garde as well as documentary. Short films made in 1975–85 are compiled from found footage and use scraps to create new narrative tales. His move into the style of his later, better-known work came in 1987 with Family Album. Again, this film used found footage, but the 'bricolage' here (as Berliner calls it) was culled from estate sales. This led to a film reminiscent of Edward Steichen's Family of Man photographic project of the 1950s. Berliner constructed this experimental work from personal home movies from the 1920s through the 1950s, moving from birth to death in its progression. Footage celebrating new babies, graduations, birthdays and weddings are juxtaposed with images of life's more sorrowful passages. The film was screened at over twenty major festivals, including the 33rd Robert Flaherty Film Seminar (1987), the Sundance Film Festival (1988), and the Munich International Film Festival (1987). The work was featured in the 1987 Whitney Museum of American Art Biennial Exhibition.

Berliner's next work was Intimate Stranger. The 1991 film takes as its subject Berliner's maternal grandfather, Joseph Cassuto, a Palestinian Jew who worked as a merchant for the Japanese in the cotton industry in Egypt in the years prior to World War II. His break from his family during the war and the reunion in New York following it give a context for this study of a man admired in his professional life yet unpopular in his own family. Cassuto was unhappy in the United States and ultimately left his wife and children for most of the year to live in his beloved Japan to pursue business interests. Berliner finds means of constructing an elaborate portrait of his grandfather in a way that gives credence to the man's two distinct lives. The multifaceted approach to the discovery of this man's humanity brings dynamism to this complex investigation. This film was accepted into nearly forty international festivals upon its release, including the Margaret Mead Film Festival, Sundance, and Cinéma du Réel in Paris (where it garnered a Special Jury Award in 1992). Berliner was honored with the Distinguished Achievement Award from the International Documentary Association in 1993.

Following a pattern of increasingly personal approaches to his particular style of exploring family and history, Berliner revealed Nobody's Business in 1996. This film investigates his father, Oscar Berliner, a self-professed 'ordinary guy'. Berliner's reclusive father is initially in no way interested in being a willing participant in his son's investigation. The film is delightful in its depiction of the conflict between the two men, one endeavoring to learn more about his father's life, the other deeply concerned with his own privacy and seclusion. Nobody's Business takes its title from Oscar's relentless insistence that no one needs to know anything about him. It is not their business, it is not interesting, and he is not interested in making these things known to anyone. Slowly, though, the events of his life are discovered, as Berliner presses his father for clues and explanations. He shows his father old photographs and asks personal questions about their contexts. Stock footage is also employed, most notably the repetition of an image of boxers sparring, seen whenever the discussion between father and son becomes heated. Berliner's research took him to the massive archive run by the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints in Salt Lake City, and he shows the magnitude of this genealogical project alongside the microcosm of records relating to his father. This work was an enormous success in its ability to unite the personal tale of one man with the universal story of all mankind.

The film was shown as the first installment in the tenth season of PBS' POV (point of view) series, where it created a massive level of viewer response. This prompted the combined efforts of several agencies, including the National Archives, to encourage people to explore their own genealogies. The film was screened at over fifty festivals, including a place in the 'Frames of Reference' show at the Guggenheim Museum. It won an Emmy in 1998 from the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences, and received major awards from several international festivals.

The 2001 release of The Sweetest Sound, Berliner's film exploring the meaning of our names, takes him to Holocaust Memorials, the Vietnam Wall, the NAMES project, AIDS quilt, and other great repositories of memory. He finds that he shares a name with many other Alan Berliners in the world, including another filmmaker, Belgian Alain Berliner. He deals with the concept of 'Same Name Syndrome', visiting the Jim Smith Society and the National Linda Convention, before finally deciding to invite the Alan Berliners of the world over to his house for dinner. The study again shows the exquisite communion shared by all humans, even in the face of so much difference. Again a large success, this film was screened by over fifty festivals throughout the world and in such venues as the Hirshhorn Museum in Washington, DC. Berliner won the Storyteller Award at the Taos Talking Picture Film Festival in 2001, and has had retrospectives of his work at the Museum of Modern Art as well as the International Center for Photography in New York City. He continues to explore documentary forms, and is also very active as an installation artist working with found sound and audio environments.

Beruf: Neonazi

(Germany, Bonengel, 1993)

Beruf: Neonazi (Profession: Neo-Nazi) sparked a controversy on its release in June 1993, leading to its temporary ban in several regions of Germany. Later it served as evidence in the trial of the main protagonist, who was convicted on grounds of comments he made in the documentary, pre-eminently those in which he denied that the Holocaust took place. In Germany the 'Auschwitz-lie' is a crime that has been punishable in law since 1985 and 1994 (Long 2002). The intense reaction to the film also has to be seen against the backdrop of growing right-wing violence in Germany during the early 1990s.

The post-vérité documentary was criticized for its sympathetic treatment of the hero, Ewald Althans, whose neo-Nazi views, it was argued, the film presented without taking a stance against them. Althans was not merely a private person, a social actor, observed by the documentary, but an experienced agitator. Beruf: Neonazi made the limitations of observational documentary apparent and raised questions as to whether observation is an appropriate method to 'expose' a political performer, or whether it merely provides a neo-Nazi demagogue with a platform. The director, Winfried Bonengel, argued that only observation could penetrate the slick veneer of Althans, who would unmask himself involuntarily in moments in which his expressions manifested his doubts. Challenging Althans verbally would not lead anywhere, because he was such a rhetorically articulate operator who would dismiss any opposition as merely defensive. Instead of countering his views in a direct verbal debate, the film, Bonengel claimed, visually parodied the convictions of its protagonist through low camera angles that depicted his poses as pompous, like an exaggeration of the elevated angles in Leni Riefenstahl's Triumph of the Will (1935). The director and the cameraman saw Althans as 'a robot with a tiny little ball for a head' (Niroumand 1993). The film's critics, on the other hand, contested the claim that the images provided a parody or critique and found that the camera's positioning merely depicts Althans as superior and enhances his appeal. The cameraman had no choice other than to make images from a low angle, it was suggested, because he was short and his subject was tall (Donner 1993).

In the documentary's most controversial scene—the one that ultimately led to Althans's conviction—he talks a visibly shocked young American into the ground with his rhetoric that no one could have been gassed in Auschwitz. Instead, Althans manages to label him as rude and leaves the debate as a victor. Whether the close-up of his face when he is not speaking arrests it in a telescopic prison, as the cameraman Johann Feindt argued (Niroumand 1993) and reveals a 'rare loss of composure' (Bathrick 1996), or not, is down to interpretation. In fact, that none of the other Auschwitz visitors objects strongly to Althans's provocations might also be due to the fact that they were intimidated because he was accompanied by a film team rather than by his rhetorical skills. After this scene, the camera, arguably, takes Althans's side when it shows him walking away, and not the young tourist, whose political views the filmmaker and most of the film's audience share: Bonengel 'shows Althans from behind as with upright stride he moves away from the camera toward the exit. Like a cowboy who has just brushed off the dust from his pants or like a gladiator leaving the arena' (Wienert 1994).

The director's argument against using direct verbal challenge does not preclude an expository commentary. Bonengel rejected authoritative voice-over because it would be patronising and block an allegedly less educated audience from judging for themselves. The dangers of the attraction of fascism needed to be experienced in order to be properly rejected, and not be contained by a pedagogic narration, one newspaper agreed (Niroumand 1993). Similarly, the German Studies scholar David Bathrick finds that the reception in Germany expressed 'an immense fear of any visual ambiguity' rooted in a 'legitimizing notion of antifascism, that comes to function so successfully in the service of Bilderverbot (censoring of images)' (Bathrick 1996).

Beruf: Neonazi was also criticized for showing a right-wing extremist who was attractive, eloquent, and young (born 1966) rather than repellent, repetitive, and old as were the usual exponents of National Socialism in Germany at the time. These were much easier to dismiss. The 'Nazi-Yuppie' constituted an unwelcome reminder that beauty does not preclude fascism and earned the documentary the reproach of glamorizing fascism. Althans himself proclaimed elsewhere: 'I am a National Socialist and I am socially acceptable. And National Socialism is then only dangerous, when it becomes socially acceptable' (from Eckerle, Hohmann, 'Sein Kampf, mein Sieg', in Münchner, 1992, cited in Long 2002: 4). However, in another of the paradoxes that make out Beruf: Neonazi's history of reception, Althans was regarded as dangerous only by the media and the courts, which in turn boosted his visibility. This was in contrast to his much lower standing in the Holocaust-denial movement itself, especially after he was outed as gay. The 'revisionist international' did not want another closeted gay leader after the neo-Nazi Michael Kühnen had died of AIDS in prison (Long 2002: 76).

At the end of November 1993 the Hessian state parliament banned Beruf: Neonazi and confiscated copies because the film did not counter the neo-Nazi statements with its own commentary, and it rather seduced young viewers to Althans's position. The Frankfurt court ruled that the documentary 'circulated national socialist propaganda without providing commentary, incited the masses, insulted and disparaged the memory of the dead, and maintained that Auschwitz was a lie' ('Die Deutschen sind noch nicht reif dafür', in Berliner Zeitung 11 December 1993, cited in Bathrick 1996). Rallies were held against screenings of the film, it was demanded that the director pay back the film's grant money, and the distributors withdrew. At the end of December 1993, by contrast, the public prosecutor's office in Berlin pronounced that Beruf: Neonazi could be screened in that region, since it was a 'critical and realistic representation of actual neo-Nazi activities' and 'maintains distance to its protagonist [...] through artistic means, through the presentation of counter-positions and externally through the choice of its title' (Donner 1993).

In a typical succession of contradictory moves for the sake of generating publicity, the German magazine Der Spiegel initially attacked the film as neo-Nazi propaganda paid for by taxes in November 1993 (Der Spiegel, 15 November 1993). Three months later, however, Spiegel-TV wanted to broadcast the whole film, but was forced to drop this on account of the strong protest of prominent German public figures (Wienert 1994). Instead, it screened a discursive programme with the title 'Show It, Don't Censor It' about the film, including interviews with the director and the protagonist, and a thirty-minute excerpt of the eighty-three-minute film (Bathrick 1996). Bonengel objected to the broadcast of his film. While he defended a screening in the cinemas, arguing that the public space of the movie theatre would foster a debate among an audience, a broadcast to individuals at home would diminish their ability to be critically distanced and make the solitary viewer more susceptible to Althans's views. Had the film not originated in Germany—or indeed had it been neo-Nazi propaganda rather than a production by a serious filmmaker—it would probably not have evoked such a heated debate.

In September 1994 the same State Court of Berlin that previously had allowed the screening of Beruf: Neonazi arraigned Althans on grounds of his utterances in the film, which again effected a temporary ban on the documentary. Ironically, the screening of the film resulted in a court case against its main protagonist, which eventually resulted in his conviction after he previously had been acquitted due to lack of evidence for his right-wing activism. The former documentary subject represented himself in the trial, claiming that he had merely re-enacted his previous neo-Nazi persona for the documentary. He further maintained that with his statement in the documentary, 'What is going on here is a massive hoax', he meant the film itself and not the gas chambers of Auschwitz, in which he stood at the time. In a sense, Althans claimed to have taken the same position toward his own comments as the filmmaker did: he 'only wanted to make a neutral statement, as to what an orthodox neo-Nazi would be' (Associated Press, 13 June 1995). Furthermore, he argued that he played up to the image of a neo-Nazi because he did not want to alienate anyone. While conducting his own defense, Althans was sometimes moved to tears by his own depictions of his life, bearing witness to the director's suggestion that his subject became the victim of his own narcissism. The film team was enlisted in court as witnesses that their subject was authentic in the documentary. The cameraman testified that Althans's behavior in the documentary was genuine; that is, he was not acting when making his right-wing comments (Associated Press, 13 June 1995). The courts accepted his utterances as evidence, and in 1994 and 1995 Althans was sentenced to three-and-a-half years altogether, six months longer than asked for by the prosecution, for denial of the Holocaust, glorification of Nazism, defaming the memory of the dead, and incitement to hatred.

Bitomsky, Hartmut

In his essay 'The Documentary World', the German documentary filmmaker Hartmut Bitomsky advanced the idea of the documentary film image as ready-made. Like the artist, the filmmaker takes an object out of its original environment into a new context (Bitomsky 2003: 206). Taking this idea further, it is not only that he treats images as objects but that his images are also of objects: the Autobahn, the Beetle, the B-52 bomber. Arguing against the current focus in documentary film on the depiction of lives as individual or bizarre cases, Bitomsky is interested in the socioeconomic and planned effects of these functional objects of transport and war (Bitomsky 2003: 275). Tellingly, Bitomsky did the voice-over narration on the experimental documentary Four Corners (1997) by James Benning, another filmmaker who prefers the filming of streets, machinery, and landscape to that of individuals (Benning also did the sound on B-52).

The 'object' of Bitomsky's films, however, is not a closed entity. For Bitomsky, the dialogue with the images is imperative. The images are not merely 'objective' material untouched by the viewing process. Playback (1995), for example, follows the articulated thoughts of workshop participants at the Amsterdam Film museum as they closely analyze early silent film footage. In Playback the filmmaker narrates: 'There are not new films and old films, there are only films one has seen and films one has not seen.' It is the relation between both the visible, on the one hand, and the imagination of the filmmaker and the viewer, on the other, that produces a new entity. His documentaries do not merely depict an empirical, visible surface, but they make it visible (Bitomsky 1972). Bitomsky is interested in not only creating original images but in producing new images through the viewer's interaction with existing ones. His films examine the processes of production and trace the path of its material in the way they are made, as well as in what they depict. Der VW-Komplex begins the way B-52 ends, with the dismantling of its object on a scrapheap. The discarded machinery makes for new images, though. Bitomsky's 'recycling' of images is economic.

In many of his documentaries Bitomsky finds 'reality' in photos and footage stored in archives. In his examination of cinema through the medium's own means, the fragment retains its quality in itself and is not subsumed under a new whole. Bitomsky's 'interest starts after reality and event has already been formed into story' (Pirschat 1992: 5). The fragment can be a part of a machine or a section of a moving image. Exposing the found footage as fragments that are not integrated allows the viewer to examine their construction without being drawn in. In Bitomsky's films the viewer is always made aware of the viewing process. This is achieved by making the image itself into an object by, for example, framing it. Bitomsky follows Levi-Strauss's dictum that to understand images better, one must resist experiencing them, and this is realized by making them smaller (Kubitz 1992). In Die UFA, for example, the camera films several monitors at the same time, each showing different footage. Another way Bitomsky distances the viewer is to show photographs instead of moving images with the hand of the filmmaker moving his material and turning the pages of books full of images, rather than having the image fill the whole of the screen. This gives viewers the space to detach themselves from the image, but it also depicts the filmmaker as a manual worker given that the still images are propelled forward by manual labor.

Work has an aesthetic and aesthetics are work. Both impact on one another. At the beginning of Reichsautobahn the filmmaker narrates: 'The Autobahn is the biggest German edifice. At its inauguration Hitler said: "We'll make sure that the work does not become separated from those who built it".' Bitomsky argues that it was the aestheticisation of the Autobahn—it was made for sight—which was a means for work placement, rather than its functionality. His documentaries reflect the reciprocal influencing of ideology, industry, and images, as well as the interlacing of the civilian and the military, and of culture and war (Bitomsky 2003). Bitomsky's interest in the functional aspects of the aesthetic is consonant with Brecht, who wrote that 'less than ever does a simple reproduction of reality tell us anything about reality. A photograph of Krupps or the AEG yields hardly anything about those industries. True reality has taken refuge in the functional' (Brecht 1967: 161). The subject matter of his documentaries often is industrial and technological (roads, cars, fighter planes) and, as such, decidedly masculine. The image engineer Bitomsky, however, is interested in the unplanned malfunctions of these grand designs of modern technology: the disintegration of the pompous, totalitarian plans of Hitler's Autobahn in Reichsautobahn, or the many accidents in the power weapons of the Cold War in B-52. In Die UFA, another example, Bitomsky points out that the Nazi propaganda minister Joseph Goebbels had to prohibit the anti-communist propaganda films that initially they had commissioned. Even though the Nazis used communist footage against the Soviet's original intent, this inspired people to see the original films. This does not happen with Bitomsky's documentaries using found footage, however, as they examine and work through the originals and do not just reject them. In Germany, showing Nazi propaganda footage within a film has to be indexed by commentary, subtitles, or intertitles. The German film scholar Klaus Kreimeier argued that announcing the Nazi footage as propaganda precludes any experience of the images as anything other than propaganda (Kreimeier 1992: 16). In contrast to television reports or other German documentary filmmakers such as Erwin Leiser and Joachim C. Fest, who use Nazi footage as evidence, Bitomsky's documentaries do not use the markers of authenticity such as speech in sync-sound technology as proof. Rather, his films show Hitler before he talks and then paraphrase the content. Moreover, unlike for instance Emile de Antonio's narration in his compilation films, Bitomsky's is not merely contrapunctual against the original footage of, for example, Nazi images. Instead, Bitomsky carves out their inherent contradictions. Even though Bitomsky's documentaries address the concrete consequences of an ideology, they are not directly political. His films delineate the conflicts between the concepts of ideology and the causes and effects of industry not only in terms of his subject matter but also with respect to the film industry, which his documentaries are in the least possible way part of.

Since 1974 Bitomsky has published, edited, and contributed to the influential German film journal, Filmkritik (1957–85), amongst others with his friend the documentary filmmaker Harun Farocki. With his fellow Anglo-American and French film semioticians at the time, the documentary filmmaker shared an enthusiasm for American fiction film such as those by Samuel Fuller or John Ford. The latter features Das Kino von John Ford (1979) in Bitomsky's portrait. Although his earlier reviews in Filmkritik and his book Die Röte des Rots von Technicolor (1972) were influenced by semiotics, they are written like an instruction manual. Bitomsky approached semiotics like the Volkswagen in Der VW-Komplex. His style of writing is similar to that of his film narrations: profound and—untypical for analytic texts in German—constructed in short sentences. Bitomsky does not only analyze found images in his documentaries, but unusual for a documentary filmmaker, he has published texts about his films. The visual 'quoting' of found images in Bitomsky's films can perhaps be seen as a continuation of his frequent citing of texts in his early film reviews. In writing about the reception of his documentaries that already reflect production processes of other objects of modernity, Bitomsky constructs a circular trajectory in which he engages in a similar process with his writing about his films as he does in his filming about found images and objects.

Before Bitomsky left Germany his documentaries could broadly be divided into two groups: films that reflect on their medium such as the videofilms about the cinema, Das Kino und der Tod (1988), Kino Flächen Bunker (1991), and Das Kino und der Wind und die Photographie (1991), and films about images of Germany such as Deutschlandbilder (1983), Reichsautobahn (1986), and Der VW-Komplex (1989) (Pirschat 1992). Die UFA (1993), about the national-socialist image politics with respect to the German cinema studios, combined both. With B-52 (2001), invented by the Germans in the World War II and further developed by the Americans for the Cold War, the focus shifted to his chosen home country. Hartmut Bitomsky has produced more than forty documentaries.

Black Box BRD

(Germany, Veiel, 2001)

Germany's long and painful struggle to overcome the legacy of the Nazi regime reached a cataclysmic peak during the terrorist siege to which the Rote Armee Fraktion (RAF, Red Army Faction) subjected the nation and its government in the late 1960s and 1970s. The terrible violence during the fall of 1977 was portrayed by Rainer Werner Fassbinder, Volker Schlöndorff, and a team of other directors in their joint film Deutschland im Herbst/Germany in Autumn (1978). The following decades saw a decrease in the number of terrorist assaults, but the attacks on representatives of industry and government continued into the 1990s and ended only when the RAF eventually announced its own dissolution on April 20, 1998.

In his much-acclaimed film, Black Box BRD, which won both a German and a European Film Award, Andres Veiel follows the lives of two people directly connected to this conflict, Alfred Herrhausen and Wolfgang Grams. In the film, they represent the two opposing sides, although both died a violent death. Herrhausen was senior manager of Deutsche Bank when he was killed by an RAF bomb on November 30, 1989 while driving to work in his car. Grams, a leader of the third generation of the RAF, had been living underground since 1984. He died on June 27, 1993 during an exchange of fire with police officers attempting to arrest him. Investigations into the exact circumstances of his death have failed to provide conclusive answers.

Veiel approaches his difficult topic in a manner that is personal, yet remains distant from a narrative point of view. At no point in his film does the filmmaker comment directly on the events portrayed. The film ends with a few lines of text that do not attempt to answer the many questions raised by the film, but simply provide specific historical data on Herrhausen's and Grams's deaths. The text states that it is 'unclear' whether and to what extent Grams was involved in the attack on Herrhausen, causing hesitation on the part of the viewer who may be attempting to create a direct connection between the two stories.

The personal atmosphere of the film is a result of the many private memories shared by family members, as well as former friends and colleagues of the two main characters. These interviews are the main sources of information from which the film draws. In addition to these interviews, which make up the overwhelming majority of the film's running time, Veiel incorporates archival footage from private home movies which strengthen the personal tone of his biographical film. To provide the audience with some context, Black Box BRD also includes scenes from original news programs, thereby providing not only necessary historical information for a contemporary audience, but also a sense of the urgency and drama that surrounded the political conflicts during the decades when Germany was finally taking a closer look at its historical legacy.

It becomes increasingly apparent throughout Black Box BRD that the unconstrained idealism with which both segments of society were pursuing their political and societal goals still prevents many people, years and decades later, from analyzing the incidents with any degree of objectivity. The issues that initially stirred the student demonstrations, and then escalated into the RAF's terrorism might have been overcome had those issues been dealt with appropriately during the conflict. One of the great and sad ironies of Herrhausen's murder is that it occurred at a time when he was already starting to steer Deutsche Bank away from the hard-line capitalist ideology of the postwar boom years. After a meeting with Mexico's president, he proposed to the bank's board that they take greater account of the social consequences of their operations. Although his intentions alienated many of his senior colleagues, Herrhausen's plans might have found much support in the public debate about the social role and responsibilities of corporations.

Black Box BRD is aptly named after a technological device, the workings of which most of its users do not comprehend. The film is structured like a mosaic or puzzle and thus also presents itself as a mysterious object. Its manifold pieces, mostly brief segments smoothly cut from longer interviews, resist the temptation of presenting a conclusive or linear narrative. The film moves back and forth between the lives of its two main subjects, following their biographies in more or less chronological order. Beyond the interviews, Veiel filmed very little additional material: staged footage of the fateful auto convoy, neighborhoods, Deutsche Bank, and prison buildings. Veiel clearly refused to follow the current trend of producing a docudrama, in which historical and archival material is edited in a way that it becomes almost indistinguishable from reenacted scenes. The additional (fictitious) footage that Veiel included is helpful, however, as it often provides subtle clues whenever the film's narrative moves from one of its main characters to the other. Because there is no voice-over narrator in Black Box BRD, these transitions perform a crucial function. In general, however, the film's almost detached relationship to its topic is noticeable. The camera remains mostly immobile, and sound is natural, with only the theme song occasionally providing some distraction from the tense statements of the people on the screen.

As did his earlier film about German youth in the 1970s, Die Überlebenden/The Survivors (1996), Veiel's Black Box BRD refuses to judge the two people it portrays so intimately. It presents them as complex individuals who have, on occasion, questioned their own ideologies and principles. As a rule, the interviewees are not questioned while on camera. The film instead presents testimonials, memories, and the lasting pain deriving from the search for answers by the friends and relatives of Herrhausen and Grams, who represent all those who did not survive the dark terrorist phase of Germany's postwar history. Black Box BRD is not afraid of silence, as when family members are overcome by emotion and unable to continue. Yet, the film's very existence provides an outspoken and powerful reminder that the absence of clear answers does not have to mean that the past can be forgotten, thereby providing a valuable counterweight to cultural and political amnesia.

Blank, Les

An independent documentary filmmaker from the United States, Les Blank is considered a maverick for his lush films on food, regional music styles, and communities on the fringes of mainstream American society. The founder of Flower Films in El Cerrito, California, Blank has directed and/or produced approximately thirty-three documentary films since 1960. In addition, he has served as crew member on approximately seven other films, including additional photography on Little Dieter Needs to Fly (1997, Werner Herzog) and uncredited second camera on Easy Rider (1969).

Les Blank studied in the PhD film program at the University of Southern California and worked as a freelance industrial and commercial filmmaker in Los Angeles before directing his own independent documentary films. Blank initially financed these films by continuing to make promotional films for such companies as Holly Farms Poultry, Archway Cookies, and the National Wildlife Federation. His work has since been funded by such entities as the National Endowment for the Arts, the American Film Institute, the National Endowment for the Humanities, the Ford Foundation, the Guggenheim Foundation, PBS, and the BBC.

Major retrospectives of his work have been mounted worldwide, and feature articles have appeared in such publications as Film Quarterly, The New York Times, The Los Angeles Times, Mother Jones, Rolling Stone, and The Village Voice. Blank was awarded the American Film Institute's Maya Deren Award for outstanding lifetime achievement as an independent filmmaker in 1990, and his documentaries have been internationally recognized with awards, including the British Academy Award, the Grand Prize at the Melbourne Film Festival, the Special Jury Award at the Sundance Film Festival, the Grand Award at the Houston Film Festival, the Golden Jugo at the Chicago Film Festival, and the Best of Festival Award at the San Francisco Film Festival.

His documentary films are praised for the intimate and privileged glimpses they provide into artistic and culinary subcultures in the United States and are particularly recognized for capturing and visually/aurally preserving aspects of American culture that have now faded or disappeared altogether. He incorporates an organic and sensual shooting style that allows the viewer privileged views of artists, food lovers, and others who are committed to living life to the fullest. Possibly best characterized as artistic visual ethnographies, most of Blank's films invite the viewer to a better appreciation of common folk who have dedicated their lives to community around a common interest. These interests include garlic; late 1960s flower children; Serbian-American, Hawaiian, Afro-Cuban, Louisiana-French and Tejano music; bluegrass fiddling; German filmmaker Werner Herzog; women with gaps between their front teeth; beer; and Cajun and Creole cooking. Music is often an important cinematic element in his films, and close-up shots of steaming pots of sauce, pigs suckling, women dancing, people laughing and enjoying whatever it is that gives them pleasure and their lives meaning, are delicately paced to weave a tapestry of experience for the audience. Often presented as tight vignettes or segments, Blank's films unfold to gradually allow the viewer more information on the subject and people at hand. The subject matter, often quirky and outside of mainstream American experiences, are engaging and gratifying to observe. Blank uses a delicate hand to unfold stories of commitment to craft and community, often intercutting snatches of informal conversations, relaxed interviews, imbedded and privileged observational footage, and occasional hand-lettered explanations and subtitles. As a filmmaker, Les Blank appears to be at ease in every situation he documents and with every person he engages. He allows them to demonstrate and discuss their cultural nuances with dedication and passion, rarely seeming sentimental or patronizing. His shooting and editorial styles are as earthy and dedicated as the subjects he explores, and his films are noted for their devotion to vision and independence.

Blue Eyed

(Germany, Verhaag, 1996)

Blue Eyed was selected as one of the outstanding documentaries of 1996 by the Academy of Motion Pictures. The film is centered on Jane Elliot, who has committed herself to fighting prejudice, ignorance, and racism in society after the assassination of Martin Luther King in 1968. Elliot, a former teacher, offers a special training course, in which she divides people on the basis of two arbitrary physical properties: blue or brown eyes. She declares the latter to be better and more intelligent and grants them privileges that she denies to the blue-eyed, who are deemed to be inferior and less intelligent. When she started this workshop in her school, all the members of her family were aggressively attacked by their white fellow citizens and their restaurant had to close.

At the beginning of the experiment, the blue-eyed people are marked with a green collar around their necks. These seventeen candidates are sent to a small, overheated room with only three seats. They have to wait a long time for their appearance in the workshop and do not really know what will happen. The brown-eyed participants are encouraged to consider themselves special, and to treat the blue-eyed contemptuously. For the first time, many white people become acquainted with the feeling of belonging to a condemned group that can never win. They experience the feeling of being discriminated against, in the same way that society today discriminates against women, people of a different color, homosexuals, or the disabled.

The film documents this workshop with three observing cameras. They keep close to the protagonists, creating a sense of discomfort and tension for the viewer. There are only short breaks with typical images from America, beautiful shots that are accompanied by a jazz sound track, giving an impression of the atmosphere of the American middle class. The film was shot with a budget of $200,000, and the crew shot seventy hours of Digi-Beta material. The final film was then transferred to 35mm. The director, Bertram Verhaag, shows how the group dynamics work and why nobody among the blue-eyed can resist the mechanisms of suppression. The film shows the core of racism: power and its use against the weak or disenfranchised.

As film critic Thomas Klingensmaier wrote: 'It won't help much to be prepared to face Jane Elliot. This elderly woman will tear down any shield. Even we, the spectators of Blue Eyed, can't get rid of this feeling of uneasiness, embarrassment, anxiety and utterly helpless hatred when she starts putting people down, humiliating them, deriding them, incapacitating them. No doubt about this: for three quarters of the time in this documentation Jane Elliot is the meanest, the lowest, the most detestable, the most hypocritical human being hell has ever spit back on Earth. But she should be an example for all of us.'

Bond, Ralph

Ralph Bond's talent as a filmmaker was limited, but his political activism and organisational abilities have clearly left a mark on British documentary. Having worked in the insurance business, Bond, a young communist, started a career in politics in 1927 as the secretary of the National Left Wing Movement. In 1929 the new communist political line favouring the development of an independent proletarian culture offered Bond the chance of organising the cinema side of it. Following the examples of Germany (Volksfilmverband) and France (Les Amis de Spartacus), he set out to establish a workers' film movement to give working-class audiences access to Soviet and other films of artistic and political merit. Like its 'bourgeois' counterpart, the Film Society, and its political rival, the Masses Stage and Film Guild (controlled by the Independent Labour Party), the workers' film movement used the legal and organisational form of the private society to get around censorship measures. The London Workers' Film Society, the flagship of the UK-wide Federation of Workers' Film Societies (FOWFS), was the first to start its activities in November 1929. Writing in periodicals as far apart as the cinephile Close-Up, the Communist Party-controlled Daily Worker and the movement's own Workers' Cinema, Bond acted as a tireless propagandist for the cause.

As a manager of the Atlas Film Co., which imported films from Germany and the Soviet Union for FOWFS member societies, he also embarked on an ambitious production programme.

With limited means, Atlas produced three issues of the newsreel Workers' Topical News (1930–1), a compilation film Glimpses of Modern Russia (1930) and a twenty-minute film to support the Workers' Charter Campaign, entitled The Charter Film (1931). By the end of that year, however, the supply of new Soviet films dried up as a result of the coming of sound, and Atlas was on the verge of bankruptcy. Bond was happy to accept an invitation from John Grierson, who had occasionally helped out Atlas, to join his Empire Marketing Board (EMB) Film Unit.

Working as production and studio manager at the EMB Film Unit, Bond earned the respect of his colleagues for his knowledge of Marxism, which in the eyes of many in the documentary movement offered the only viable political alternative to the crisis-ridden capitalist system. Bond, on the other hand, completely endorsed the social realism of the documentary movement, 'the drama of the doorstep' as he coined it later, and respected Grierson as 'a man of extraordinary talent'. Bond had the chance to direct a few documentaries at the General Post Office (GPO) Film Unit, successor to the EMB Film Unit, and then moved on to Strand Films. In Today we Live (1937) he was able to show his views on the plight of the unemployed. Commissioned by the National Council for Social Service, the film was codirected by John Grierson's sister, Ruby. Her location was a seemingly picturesque Cotswold village, but Bond chose the bleak coal mining village of Pentre in South Wales. This visit resulted among others in the archetypal depression years sequence of unemployed miners looking for coal on the Tylorstown slagheap, shot by Bond's assistant, Donald Alexander. From 1938 Bond was given the chance to make a series of short films demonstrating the virtues of cooperation, as part of a 'five-year plan' of the big London Co-operative Societies. The first, Advance, Democracy! (1938) was directed by Bond himself, with a musical score by Benjamin Britten. It showed how a London crane driver and his wife, a staunch member of the Women's Co-operative Guild, start taking an interest in the political situation and join the May Day demonstration. Like most of his colleagues, Bond was busy making documentaries for the Ministry of Information during the war.

A committed trade unionist (he was an active member of the Association of Cinematograph and Allied Technicians (ACT) from 1935 onwards, serving as vice-president from 1942 to 1974), Bond welcomed the fact that at the end of the war some unions were finally showing an interest in having their own films. For the Amalgamated Engineering Union (AEU), he directed Unity is Strength (1945), and he acted as producer for A Power in the Land (1946), commissioned by the Electrical Trades Union. In 1950 the ACT started its own production company, ACT Films Ltd, with Bond serving as its general manager. With the financial support of the National Film Finance Corporation, ACT Films managed in the 1950s and 1960s to produce more than a dozen feature films, thus helping film technicians who were out of work with temporary employment. To Bond's personal regret, however, it was not until 1970 that a trade union—once more the AEU—would commission ACT Films to make a film. Bond, by now retired as general manager from ACT Films, acted as production controller for what was a rather disappointing documentary directed by Robert Kitts, We are the Engineers.

As a delegate of the ACT (from 1958 ACTT, when an extra T for Television was added), Bond attended the annual Trades Union Congress (TUC) without fail. In 1960 he successfully moved a resolution that called for 'a greater participation by the Trade Union movement in all cultural activities'. It prompted playwright Arnold Wesker to establish Centre 42 (referring to the number of the resolution), which, for lack of financial support, did not become the success that Bond had envisaged. Likewise the recommendations of a TUC Working Party on the Arts (1975–6), of which Bond was a prominent member, failed to make an impact.

In the 1970s Bond became Documentary Course Director and Lecturer at the London International Film School, enabling him to pass on his experiences to a younger generation. Bond witnessed the reemergence of a left-wing film culture in Britain in the same decade with a certain detachment, always willing to share his recollections, but unrelenting when it came down to what he considered basic trade union principles.

Bossak, Jerzy

Jerzy Bossak, a teacher, filmmaker, and journalist, was one of the most important and influential figures in post-World War II Polish cinema. He has often been called, in fact, the 'father' of Polish documentary filmmaking. He was instrumental in organizing the film company Start, a company founded on the following philosophy of cinematography: filmmaking should be as free as possible from commercial constraints and corporate demands, and filmmakers should understand their work not only as art, but as useful art. This pragmatic notion of usefulness went hand-in-hand with the notion of action: Bossak argued that film, documentary film in particular, should work to raise its viewers' social consciousness and inspire them to act, to make changes in their society. Such thinking was at the center of Bossak's philosophy of documentary filmmaking. He was critical of the film industry before the war, observing that, 'In prewar Poland there were no good films, not just because there was no difference between the maker of films and the maker of artificial jewelry, but also because we did not know how to make films and look at them[...] Today we have to create conditions in which Polish film can flourish' (Haltorf 2002). Bossak's company, Start, was successful in altering the industry and in many ways instituting his fresh philosophy of cinematography.

Bossak's theory of documentary filmmaking is derived in part from the Aristotelian approach to persuasion, which involves the three rhetorical appeals of logos (logical argument, an appeal to reason), pathos (pathetic argument, an appeal to the emotions), and ethos (the way in which writers, or director, situate their characters and present their work). Bossak felt that, for the most part, English and American documentary film focused far too much (or even entirely) on logical or reasoned presentations, on attempting to present just the 'facts'. Together with logical appeals, Bossak also played to his audiences' 'heart strings', or to their emotions, in an attempt to move them to action; both reasoned persuasion and emotional appeal, he espoused, were necessary. Also necessary in this equation was the way in which the filmmaker presented, organized, and interpreted the material. The 'authors' of any film presented themselves through the film by the way in which the chosen material was arranged. That is, the way in which logical and emotional footage were arranged by the filmmaker (the way the filmmaker set out his ethos) went a long way to whether an audience might be persuaded to act.

Underlying much of Bossak's work was an interest not only in war but in the tenuous relationship that existed between the government and the general population. He attempted to break away from the typical nationalistic propaganda films that both dominated the industry and disseminated what Bossak saw as untrue messages operating to pacify the masses. Warszawa 1956, by many accounts one of his best films, is a good example of his attempt to critique the government. Completed in 1956, this film juxtaposes modern, towering, clean government buildings with the run-down, filthy tenement buildings in which the masses were forced to live. Warszawa 1956 was one of the first films of the 'Black Series' of documentary film, a term attributed to the cinematography of Kazimierz Karabasz, which depicted the stark, everyday harsh realities of living under a socialist state. As part of such a cinematic approach, Bossak chose to focus on single, simple events, or on specific people and their individual realities to try and extract some fundamental, universal truths that apply to all humans. Such an inductive move—moving from a specific premise (or focus) to a more general conclusion—can be seen in many of his films, particularly Deluge (an award-winning film from 1947 depicting the catastrophic flooding of the Wistula river) and Requiem for 500,000 (an award-winning film from 1963 depicting a montage of German propaganda footage from the Warsaw ghetto).

In working from specific events to more universal conclusions, Bossak's films often took on an epic aura; in fact, Bossak saw himself in some regard as an epic historian. It was this epic element of his filmmaking, however, that drew some criticism of his work. Several critics noted that the political and human issues he attempted to address were so large that the specific person or place from which he started often got lost (in asserting such a claim, critics have pointed, for instance, to Bossak's film 273 Degrees below Zero). In the same vein, others have argued that the overarching conclusions he attempted to reach necessarily dictated that he oversimplify the issues at hand. Such criticism notwithstanding, however, Jerzy Bossak remains one of the most respected and influential filmmakers in the history of Polish cinematography.

Böttcher, Jürgen

Jürgen Böttcher is a documentary film director from eastern Germany. Initially a painter, Böttcher turned to film, regarding it as a medium more in keeping with reality: 'documentary film, the way I understand it, is one of the most magic forms of art, the invocation of the entire and indeed real' (Böttcher 1989: 5). The influence of the filmmaker's background in painting is clear. In his films, Böttcher has repeatedly examined artists and their work.

Moreover, he attempts to mimic the compositional methods and attributes of visual art in his films. He constructs precise and atmospheric settings, mostly in black and white, shot on 35mm film. Böttcher belongs to 'GDR's true avant-garde' (Roth 1984), a paradox in a political system that did not tolerate subversive artistic expression.

From 1961 until its dissolution in 1991, Böttcher was a documentary director at the state's DEFA-Studio, shooting short films for the cinema program. His first film for DEFA, Three of Many (1961), is an homage to three friends, all workers and artists. Böttcher shows the young men in their spare time, painting or relaxing. In their shabby apartments, they do not act as exemplary representatives of their class. Three of Many was censored by the government and had its first public screening only in 1988, at the Edinburgh Film Festival.

With Furnace Builders (1962), about an iron-works factory, Böttcher found his subject. The primary focus of his work thereafter was the lives of the working class. Furnace Builders follows workers as they attempt to move a fifty-six meter-high, two thousand-ton furnace roughly eighteen miles. The film depicts the precise mechanics of the work and conveys a belief in the power of the workers to achieve their goal, while assiduously avoiding sentimentality.

In Stars (1963), which follows a group of women working in a Berlin lightbulb factory, Böttcher attempted for the first time to record synchronous dialogue. The filmmaker was unable to procure a low-noise camera for shooting the film, as none were available in Berlin at the time. Therefore, the cameraman wrapped covers around the Arriflex to soften the sound it made while in operation. The words of the women themselves form the heart of the film, although they were impeded by both the poor sound technology and censorship.

Böttcher again focused on the plight of working women in Washerwomen (1972). The film follows apprentice washerwomen at a large laundry. Although their work is dull, Böttcher does not look at them condescendingly. Instead, he allows these young women to articulate their work and their lives, and they appear honest and confident.

Böttcher eventually pared down narration and dialogue in his films, protesting at 'the inflation of language'. The highlight of this evolution is Rangierer (1984), a lyrical black-and-white movie, shot in winter in the freight depot in Dresden. The switchers at the depot carry out their difficult and dangerous work, focused and silent. The low sounds of the ghostly rolling wagons, the screech of the shocks, the hollow loudspeaker announcements, and the few words the workers speak to one another make up the aural aspect of the film.

In Georgia (1987), Böttcher's first full-length feature motion picture, marks the first occasion on which he was allowed to direct in a foreign country. The film is a document of a trip through a land with an ancient culture and living traditions.

Böttcher directed The Wall (1990) in November and December of 1989 near the Brandenburg Gate, Berlin. It documents without commentary, making use of long, silent shots, the activities of people at the Berlin Wall in the days after its opening. The director sees the Berlin Wall, the symbol of the German division, as a document on which history has written itself. Historical images of the Brandenburg Gate are projected on a huge, painted area, including scenes of Prussian military parades, Nazi torch processions, Hitler in an open car, soldiers of the Red Army raising the Soviet flag, men starving during wartime, and the construction of the wall.

Böttcher stopped making films for ten years, instead working as a visual artist. In 2001 he returned to filmmaking with Konzert im Freien/A Place in Berlin. In this experimental documentary, Böttcher examines the shifting meanings of the Marx-Engels-Forum in Berlin, a large monument of the East German era. He presents footage of the monument's construction, which he shot in the 1980s, in new and unexpected ways.

BRITTA HARTMANN

Biography

Born July 8, 1931 in Frankenberg/Sachsen (Germany) and raised in the small village of Strawahlde in Oberlausitz. Studied at the Academy of Formative Arts in Dresden (GDR), 1949–53. From 1953 until 1955 self-employed artist and lecturer at the Volkshochschule. In 1965 took a directing course at the newly opened German College for Cinematic Art (today College for Film and Television 'Konrad Wolf') in Potsdam-Babelsberg, which ended 1960. Worked from 1961 to 1991 as a director of documentaries for DEFA. In 1989 became a member of the Academy of Arts Berlin (West). After the reunification of the two German states in 1990 and the dissolution of DEFA in 1991, worked as an artist. Works were shown in exhibitions in Berlin, Paris, Salzburg, Toronto, Brussels, Toulouse, Chicago, and New York, and retrospectives of his films could be seen in Paris, Edinburgh, Frankfurt am Main, Munich, Berlin, Bologna, and Leipzig. Received the European Award for Film for The Wall. The Festival for Documentary and Animation Film from Leipzig awarded him the 'Goldenen Taube' (The Golden Pigeon) in 2000. Lives in Berlin.

Boulting, John and Roy

The Boulting brothers were one of the great partnerships in British film. As independent producer-directors, they made a substantial contribution to the national cinema between the 1930s and 1970s, principally with intelligently made commercial feature films. They came to prominence with the wartime Pastor Hall (1940), a thought-provoking and controversial drama about Nazi persecution. Their work in documentary was largely confined to the wartime period, and they participated in a number of important and ambitious productions of the service film units.

Before enlistment, the Boultings produced Dawn Guard (1941) for the Ministry of Information, a short propaganda feature of immense significance. It features two members of the Home Guard on sentry duty discussing peace aims and reconstruction, cut against contrasting images of slums and new housebuilding, dole queues and busy factories, and playgrounds swarming with jolly children. The film stands out as the first cinematic expression of 'New Jerusalemism' and the desire for a better post-war world, and was an early indication of the filmmakers' social views.

For a brief period the brothers served conventionally in the armed forces, Roy as a trooper in the Royal Armoured Corps, and John as a flight mechanic in the RAF. Eventually Roy was redirected to the Army Film and Photographic Unit (AFPU), where he reached the rank of captain, and John to the RAF Film Unit, in time becoming a flight lieutenant. The service film units had been established early in the war to produce record and training films but gradually progressed to more substantial documentaries suitable for commercial release. This was the only sustained period when the brothers worked apart, and in fact they were each given a special period of leave to make the propaganda feature Thunder Rock (1942). With its pronounced interventionist theme, it was deemed an important film to help develop the Anglo-American entente.

Roy was the more prolific of the brothers. With the AFPU based at Pinewood, he contributed to a number of shorts such as Via Persia (1942), Minefield! (1944), and REME (1944). Of much greater consequence was his involvement in the trilogy of Victory documentaries, feature-length records of significant Allied campaigns. These began with Desert Victory (1943), which dealt with the war in the Western Desert and the British breakthrough at El Alamein. The film was compiled from footage shot by service cameramen and augmented by some material staged at Pinewood. Major David MacDonald was in charge of production, but the creative work of editing and direction was the responsibility of Roy Boulting. The production enjoyed support at the highest levels of government, where it was deemed crucial to publicize Britain's first significant success in the field. Released in February 1943, it won great praise and popular acclaim.

In America it was surprisingly granted an Academy Award as 'the Most Distinctive Documentary of 1943' and was generally held up as among the best achievements of wartime documentary. The film's distinctive imagery and treatment of the Desert campaign clearly influenced later reconstructions, notably The Way Ahead (1944), Sea of Sand (1958), and The Desert Fox (1951), with the latter film relying heavily on documentary footage taken uncredited from Desert Victory.

Tunisian Victory (1944) and Burma Victory (1945) were similar campaign records, this time detailing the Anglo-American liberations of North Africa and Southeast Asia, respectively. The Tunisian film eventually emerged as a coproduction between the AFPU and the official American filmmaker Frank Capra, who assumed dominance over the production. The collaboration was troubled by tension and rivalry, and Tunisian Victory has fared the least well with critics. The final Victory film was much more securely in the hands of the AFPU and Roy Boulting, as the British and Americans had wisely decided on separate documentaries covering the theatre of operations. The war in Southeast Asia was somewhat secondary to events in Europe, and hence Burma Victory was an important document to publicize and memorialize the conflict. The film effectively brings out the hardships and unpleasantness of the experience, with troops enduring rain, mud, exhaustion, dysentery, and malaria, as well as confronting a fanatical enemy. Each of the Victory films relied heavily on the striking images secured by combat cameramen. They brought an immediacy to war never previously experienced by a cinema-going public, and this has been their considerable legacy. Acclaimed American documentaries of the later war years, such as John Ford's The Battle of Midway (1944), were clearly in their debt.

The RAF Film Unit had been established in 1942 and was also based at Pinewood, meaning that the twins could remain in close contact. John similarly contributed to the routine training and informational films of the unit, such as the short Between Friends (1943). Throughout 1944, however, he was engaged as director on the RAF's principal film production of the war years, Journey Together (1945), a realistic but scripted depiction of pilot trainees. A small role was played by Hollywood star Edward G. Robinson, with the principal British characters being played by the up-and-coming actors Richard Attenborough and Jack Watling. Journey Together used much location shooting, including scenes in the United States, and the film propagandized British-American collaboration. The film was a significant example of the wartime trend in British documentary that blended fictional and factual styles. Each of the Victory films had incorporated small but significant staged scenes shot at Pinewood under the guidance of Roy, and John substantially developed this approach into what was essentially a feature-length treatment. John declared that he was after a 'straightforward public entertainment', and in this sense Journey Together was more in line with developments in realism taking place at commercial studios like Ealing, with such productions as Nine Men (1943), rather than the more austere experiments in documentary fiction being conducted at the Crown Film Unit, especially in the celebrated Western Approaches (1944).

Biography

Born identical twins at Bray, Berkshire, England, November 21, 1913. Educated at Reading School, where they formed one of the first film societies in a public school. John joined a small film distribution company in 1933; Roy gained some film experience in Canada. Early in 1937 John volunteered for the Republican forces in the Spanish Civil War. Later in November 1937 the twins formed Charter Films and produced modest films for quota distribution. During World War II, Roy served with the Army Film and Photographic Unit and John with the RAF Film Unit. For three decades after the war the Boultings were important independent producer-directors in British commercial films. John died on June 17, 1985 in Sunningdale, Berkshire, and Roy at his Oxfordshire home on November 5, 2001.

Brakhage, Stan

Stan Brakhage, one of the most influential American avant-garde filmmakers of the twentieth century, is not strictly considered a documentary filmmaker. However, his 'lyrical' films, often shot from a first-person perspective, are part of an American artistic culture interested in documenting individual perception and defamiliarizing everyday life (Sitney 1974). For Brakhage, perception is radically subjective; reality is comprehensible only through the implied point of view of the camera. Documentary, then, has an anti-traditional or anti-normative purpose. Instead of using conventional narratives or assuming objectivity, it should take nothing for granted, showing the world as it is experienced from a specific place.

Brakhage's position as an artist who rejects conventional forms to depict his own view of reality comes out of a long tradition of American individualism and rejection of tradition (Elder 1998). During the postwar era existentialist philosophers and abstract expressionist painters also rejected traditional notions of self and tradition, believing that fixed definitions were forms of commodification. For them (and for Brakhage) the only way of relating to the world was through action. The rapid cuts in early films such as Cat's Cradle (1959) and Mothlight (1963) were influenced by Sergei Eisenstein's theories of montage as a tool that documented reality while it created ideas. In Cat's Cradle, for example, the rapid movement between shots of a cat's head, a man and a woman, and the flowers on their bedspread and wallpaper blur the line between man and animal, nature and artifice. The quick cutting also prevents the films from fetishizing the images they present, focusing instead on the movement of vision and ideas.

The dynamic quality and shifting perspective seen in these films are central to his early documentaries. Brakhage was the cameraman for two early documentaries shot under the direction of American surrealist Joseph Cornell. The first film on which they collaborated, The Wonder Ring (1955), was a documentary of Manhattan's last elevated train, shot just before the city closed it down. Rather than an objective presentation of the El's history, Brakhage offers a silent and mobile first-person depiction of a typical ride on the train. The film starts with squares of light falling through the El tracks to the pavement below and an ascent to the El platform that repeats the abstract rectangular patterns. Throughout the film, the city flows past, occasionally focusing on a picturesque sight in a dialectic that echoes the train's stopping and going. People are on the train with our stand-in viewer, but they are mostly seen reflected in windows, glimpsed through the door into the next car, or framed off-center. The focus of this film is vision itself, as epitomized by the film's last shot. The focus on what's seen through a train window becomes more and more blurry until the focus is on the dusty and scratched glass itself.

The idea of defamiliarization is important to early twentieth-century avant-garde artists like Marcel Duchamp and Phillip Glass, who took everyday objects and sounds out of context to transform them into art and music. Like The Wonder Ring, most of Brakhage's films contain many close-ups that defamiliarize the objects being shown in order to explore how vision makes sense of the world when it is not mediated by language or convention. Language was social and, he believed, eliminated the personal perceptions of the world; Brakhage felt that the raw experience of the physical unmediated by structure is the only authentic way to know the world. In his early manifesto, Metaphors on Vision, he asks his readers to 'Imagine [...] an eye which does not respond to the name of everything but which must know each object encountered in life through an adventure of perception. How many colors are there in a field of grass to the crawling baby unaware of "Green"?' (Brakhage 1976).

The final, and perhaps most important, influence on Stan Brakhage is Gertrude Stein. Stein shares this use naive perspective of reality as a means of redefining it; her book Tender Buttons repeats simple words and phrases from daily life in various permutations that do not have conventional linguistic meaning but instead offer a combination of sound and intuitive sense. Brakhage uses repetition in a similar way in his films, both to imbue the images with new meaning in each context and to rid them of their conventional metaphorical associations. In Window Water Baby Moving (1962), his first film depicting his wife's pregnancy and childbirth, Brakhage repeats shots of his wife's pregnant stomach as seen in the film's first scene, where she sits in the bathtub kissing and embracing him. When this scene repeats in the middle of a sequence graphically depicting her giving birth, it serves both as a flashback to more peaceful times and an assertion that both states of being depict the body as sexual and natural.

Brakhage's interest in the body is another way in which he attempted to document the pre-linguistic experience of reality. The struggles of humanity against the natural world are most evident in his quasi-mythic epic film cycle called Dog Man Star, but he also attempted to connect the mythic with documenting everyday physical reality in his work. One grant proposal described a project he wished to pursue, which he called a 'dailiness film'; through this film, he wished to document his and his family's daily life as it allegorically represented principles of creation in the natural world:

our coming to life in the morning would also be visualized as the creation of the world; that sun which streaks our room with light still being the explosive source of life, drying our eyes (or rather the photography through rippled glass) as we emerge from the waters of sleep. The very sheets we push away from us in arising would photographically relate to the thaw of the glaciers.

(Brakhage 1976)

With the films of his wife in childbirth and this unproduced mythical documentary, Brakhage moved beyond depiction of the subjective and into universal realities. In his lyrical and mythical work Brakhage uses the documentary form to alter people's perceptions of reality by defamiliarizing either sight itself or the context in which the sight makes sense. Later films take this even further, moving into the abstraction of hand-painted colors and swirls of light.

Brault, Michel

Although Michel Brault has directed a number of important documentaries, his first passion was photography, and it is as a cinematographer rather than as a film director per se that he has had the most influence on Québec cinema. His achievements as director of photography greatly influenced the look of both documentary and narrative cinema in Québec in the 1960s and 1970s, as he shot some of the most significant works of the period, from his own and Pierre Perrault's Pour la suite du monde (1963), Claude Jutra's A tout prendre (1963), Mon oncle Antoine (1971), and Kamouraska (1973), to Anne Claire Poirier's Mourir à tue-tête (1979) and Francis Mankiewicz's Le temps d'une chasse (1972) and Les bons débarras (1980).

His contribution to the imaging of 'la Nation québécoise' on screen has been crucial.

In 1957–8 he worked on the Candid Eye series, developed by the Anglophone filmmakers of the National Film Board of Canada's (NFB's) renowned Unit B, which used recently developed lighter film equipment to capture people in everyday situations with spontaneity and free from judgmental commentary. After shooting the milestone Candid Eye film The Days Before Christmas (1958, Terence Macartney-Filgate, Stanley Jackson and Wolf Koenig), Brault codirected with Gilles Groulx Les raquetteurs/The Snowshoers (1958), about a congress of snowshoeing clubs in Sherbrooke (Québec). Both in its form and its content, this film marked a turning point in Québec documentary. Unlike the Candid Eye films, which sought to observe everyday activities from a distance, Les Raquetteurs attempted to show the event from within. The film's innovative visual style resulted from Brault's use of a hand-held camera equipped with a wide-angle lens to shoot the subjects up close. He walked among the 'snowshoers' and their entourage, capturing with immediacy their conversations and interactions.

On the eve of the Quiet Revolution—the period of liberalization and modernization that began in 1960 and saw the emergence of Québec's separatist movement—Les Raquetteurs was hailed as a sort of manifesto for cinéma direct, a home-grown film practice that could depict real people and their everyday concerns. Brault has always insisted that Les Raquetteurs itself is not actually an instance of cinéma direct, but it did trigger the movement, as subsequent NFB documentaries tried to reproduce its style and nationalist purpose in, for example, La lutte/Wrestling (1961, Brault, Marcel Carrière, Claude Fournier, and Claude Jutra) and Québec-USA ou l'invasion pacifique/Visit to a Foreign Country (1962, Brault, Jutra). Les raquetteurs also had an impact beyond the frontiers of Québec. A screening at the Flaherty Seminar in 1959 inspired Jean Rouch to develop his conception of cinéma vérité and led him to invite Brault to film Chronique d'un été/Chronicle of a Summer (1961) and La Punition/Punishment (1963) in France.

While Brault and Groulx's Les Raquetteurs announced the emergence of cinéma direct, Brault's first feature-length documentary, Pour la suite du monde/For the Continuation of the World (1963), which he codirected with Pierre Perrault, marked the culmination of the movement. In this film, Brault and Perrault follow the habitants of a small island in the St Lawrence River, Île-aux-Coudres, as they attempted to revive the traditional hunt of the beluga whale. Acclaimed both in Canada and abroad, especially in France, Pour la suite du monde owes its success to two fundamental aspects of direct cinema. First, Brault's cinematography, which is equally sensitive to the beauty of the island's landscape as to the weathered faces of old fishermen and the bewildered expressions of the young people who have no knowledge of the practice that their parents are trying to rediscover, and second, a profound respect for the subjects, based on a trusting relationship established before filming.

Brault transposed this documentary practice to fiction, first in Entre la mer et l'eau douce/Drifting Upstream (1967), a fictionalized depiction of the life and career of the film's main actor, Claude Gauthier (the title of this film actually comes from a quote in Pour la suite du monde taken from Jacques Cartier's diaries), and later in Les ordres/The Orders (1974), on the effects of the War Measures Act decreed during the hostage crisis of October 1970. Brault interviewed dozens of innocent people incarcerated as a result of the sweeping powers that the Act gave the police and created fictional characters to reenact the humiliating experiences of those imprisoned. Brault's ability to put the techniques of direct cinema at the service of narrative film earned him the best director award at the Cannes Film Festival in 1975. He remains the only Canadian cineaste to have received this honor.

From 1974 to 1980 Brault produced and directed, with André Gladu, an ambitious series of documentaries entitled Le son des français d'Amérique devoted to the various manifestations of francophone cultures throughout North America. He had already examined the question of French Canadian culture outside Québec in L'Acadie, l'Acadie?!?/Acadia, Acadia?!? (1971), codirected with Pierre Perrault and Éloge du chiac/Praise 'chiac' (1969). He also directed a series of documentaries on René Lévesque (three shorts in 1969, 1972, and 1976), a docudrama on domestic violence, L'Emprise (1988, with Suzanne Guy), and a portrait of a little-known Québec painter, Ozéas Leduc ... comme l'espace et le temps/Ozéas Leduc ... like space and time (1996). Since the 1980s he has made a handful of fiction features, the best of which is Les Noces de papier/Paper Wedding (1989) with Geneviève Bujold. His most recent fiction is Quand je serai parti ... vous vivrez encore (1999), an historical epic on the rebellion of French Canadian patriots against British forces in 1837–1938.

ANDRÉ LOISELLE

Biography

Born in 1928. Began making amateur films in the late 1940s with Claude Jutra. Directed a short film, Matin; worked briefly at the National Film Board of Canada, 1950. Assistant director on La petite Aurore l'enfant martyre, the most commercially successful French Canadian feature film of the 1950s, 1950–1. Worked on a number of short films for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation (CBC) television series, 'Petites médisances', 1953. Began his career as a filmmaker in earnest after the NFB moved from Ottawa (Ontario) to Montréal (Québec), 1956.

Brazil

Documentary film production stretches back to the origins of film in Brazil. In 1896 film first arrived in Brazil, brought by European immigrants. Early documentary films from this time focus on the natural landscape, as well as habits and traditions of the different regions of Brazil. These remained the primary focus of early Brazilian documentary. Afonso Segreto and Pascoal Segreto dominated the production of Brazilian documentary through its first decade.

Early ethnographic documentaries exposed urban Brazilians to images of an immense and unknown country, while emphasizing national integration and an idealized image of an Indian still savage. Major Luiz Thomas Reis made several films for the Comissão de Linhas Telegráficas e Estratégicas do Mato Grosso ao Amazonas (Commission of Telegraphic and Aeronautic Lines of Mato Grosso to Amazonas), known as Comissão Rondon (Rondon Commission). His Rituais e Festas Bororó/Bororo's rituals and parties (1917) was considered by film critics as an early example of skillful film editing, while also being an important early anthropological film.

The classics of the silent period include Rudolf Rex Lustig and Adalberto Kemeny's São Paulo, A Sinfonia da Metrópole/São Paulo, the Symphony of the Metropolis (1929), which portrays the continuing urbanization of the city; and Lampião, Rei do Cangaço/Lampião, King of the Cangaço (1936), directed by Benjamim Abraham. This film is a study of the Lampião group, in the northeastern interior.

In 1936 the federal government created the Instituto Nacional do Cinema Educativo (INCE, National Institute of Educational Movies), with the goal of bringing intellectually stimulating works to the working classes. For thirty years the direction of INCE was the responsibility of film director Humberto Mauro, who completed three hundred and fifty-four short educational films in the period. Despite the official and didactic nature of the produced material, the INCE was able to stamp a personal aesthetic on most of its work. Approximately fifty directors had their films financed by the INCE.

In the 1960s the prevalent theme of an exoticized forest and rural milieu gave way to a focus on national underdevelopment and social inequality, advancing aesthetic subjects of the cinema novo (new cinema) movement. Paulo César Saraceni and Mário Carneiro directed Arraial do cabo/Village of the Cable (1959), and Linduarte Noronha directed Aruanda (1960), two films that display the influence of this trend. Brazilian documentaries increasingly focused on issues relating to culture, economy, and popular religiosity, but without the overtly educational and didactic tone of INCE films.

In 1962 the Swedish director Arne Sucksdorff held a film seminar in Rio de Janeiro. As a result, the techniques of cinéma vérité films spread throughout Brazil. Leon Hirszman's Maioria Absoluta/Absolute Majority (1964), Paulo César Saraceni's Integração Racial/Racial Integration (1964) and Arnaldo Jabor's O Circo/The Circus (1965) are films influenced by this trend early on.

Brazilian documentary was also influenced by the work of Chilean filmmakers. In São Paulo a group formed by Vladimir Herzog, João Batista de Andrade, Maurice Capovilla, Sérgio Muniz, and Renato Tapajós maintained contact with Argentina's documentary filmmakers, through Fernando Birri, an initiate in practice of the cinéma vérité.

Between 1964 and 1965 the producer Thomas Farkas produced four documentaries: Geraldo Sarno's Viramundo (1965), Paulo Gil Soares' Memória do Cangaço/Memory of Cangaço (1965), Manuel Horácio Gimenez's Nossa Escola de Samba/Our Samba School (1965), and Maurice Capovilla's Subterrâneos do Futebol/Underground of Soccer (1965). These filmmakers formed the Caravana Farkas, and they collectively documented popular culture. The group produced nineteen documentaries of short films between 1969 and 1971 under the series title A Condição Brasileira/The Brazilian Condition, all influenced by cinéma vérité.

From the 1960s Brazilian film was censored by the military dictatorship in power. Eduardo Coutinho's Cabra Marcado para Morrer/Guy Marked to Die (1964–84), João Batista de Andrade's Liberdade de Imprensa/Freedom of the Press (1966), and Vladimir Carvalho's País de São Saruê/São Saruê's Country (1970) were all censored.

In 1972 the public television station of São Paulo began airing A Hora da Notícia/Hour of the News to show the real Brazil, as opposed to the official, sanitized images propagated by the military government. Film director João Batista de Andrade was called on to create small-scale documentaries directly in the streets. After a period of political persecution, the show was cancelled in 1974. Batista de Andrade was invited by Paulo Gil Soares to assume management of the team of special reporters for TV Globo of São Paulo. Eduardo Coutinho, Maurice Capovilla, Hermano Penna, and Walter Lima Jr were a part of the group. Thus the Globo Repórter was born.

Composed of a series of ten documentaries called Globo Shell Especial/Shell Globe Specials, the Globo Repórter was enthusiastically supported by the film directors and displayed accomplished cinematographic and authorial style. A few films in particular stand out from the series: João Batista de Andrade's Wilsinho Galiléia (1978), Eduardo Coutinho's Teodorico, o imperador do sertão/Teodorico, the emperor of the interior (1978), and Maurice Capovilla's O Último dia de Lampião/The Last Day of Lampião (1975). Although the nation was taking steps toward democracy at the time, the program suffered several occasions of forced internal censorship.

The boundary between fiction and documentary was explored in 1975 by Jorge Bodansky and Orlando Senna in Iracema, uma transa amazônica/Iracema, an Amazonian Affair. Bodansky continued as a documentary filmmaker for German television, in partnership with Wolf Gauer.

A number of filmmakers who have focused on documentary film stand out: Vladimir Carvalho of Conterrâneos velhos de Guerra/Old Fellow Citizens of War (1990), Sylvio Back, Revolução de 30/Revolution of 30 (1980), Silvio Tendler, director of Os anos JK, uma trajetória política/The years JK, a political path (1976–80), which was a popular success, and Eduardo Coutinho, who eventually focused on making films in video that were later enlarged for 35mm film, such as Santo Forte/Strong Saint (1999).

In the 1980s two Brazilian documentary filmmakers in particular stood out. Sérgio Bianchi's Mato Eles?/Did I kill them? (1982), and Jorge Furtado's Ilha das Flores/Island of the flowers (1989) are both marked by an innovative narrative style and resonant visual references.

The Associação Brasileira de Vídeo Popular (ABVP, Brazilian Association of Popular Video) was founded in the early 1980s. Its aim was to popularize a cohesive production model for filmmakers across the country, while encouraging popular participation in documentary filmmaking. One of the founders of the ABVP, Luiz Fernando Santoro, was also the first member of the Comitê de Cineastas da América Latina (Committee of Film Directors of Latin America), which emphasized the value of works done on video, as much of the recent history of Latin America had been documented in this format.

The Centro de Trabalho Indigenista (CIT, Center of Indigenous Work) encourages debate and discussion of the documentary use of video, while also encouraging reflection on the identity of indigenous people and their place in the contemporary world.

In the mid-1990s television became increasingly involved in the production and screening of documentary film. Several film directors made works for television. Nelson Pereira directed Casa Grande e Senzala/Big House and Slave Quarter (2000), a film in four episodes on the work of the anthropologist Gilberto Freire.

Documentary film assumed a central place in Brazilian media in the late 1990s. Paulo Sacramento's O Prisioneiro da Grade de Ferro/The Prisoner of the Iron Grating (2003), made inside the prison of Carandiru, was filmed in digital video with the assistance of the prisoners. Brazilian video documentaries continue to push the boundaries of documentary film, questioning the relationship between the documentary and the reality it purports to represent.

Bridge, The

(Holland, Ivens, 1928)

De Brug (The Bridge) can be considered as the first notable work of Joris Ivens's film career, although initially it was for him nothing more than an experiment and a film study. As manager of the Amsterdam branch of his father's photo business, Ivens's career was already determined. However, this did not stop him from using the available equipment for some film experiments and other projects. By 1927 Ivens had become increasingly involved in film. As one of the cofounders of the Dutch Film League, he participated in the projection and discussion of artistic films. He thoroughly analyzed films such as Pudowkin's The Mother and Eisenstein's Potemkin, and he himself was experimenting with camera work and editing. De Brug was for Ivens no more than a study in movement, made by an amateur in order to learn about camera movements, composition and editing. Upon its first projection at a Film League screening, however, the film was received with much acclaim, and it put Dutch film on the map of European avant-garde filmmaking.

While he was working on some films for Leiden University, Ivens took long lunch breaks to go to Rotterdam to film the lift bridge. He used a simple handheld Kinamo camera, normally used by amateur filmmakers. The use of this handheld camera allows the transformation of the huge static steel object into a dynamic filmed sequence.

The structure of De Brug is simple, composed entirely of the opening and closing of a rail road lift bridge. Though technically imperfect, the careful construction of the film, the composition of the images, the camera movements and the editing still encourage the consideration of this film as an avant-garde masterpiece. The film starts with two long shots of the bridge, to show its place and function. Spanning the water, it allows trains to cross the river and ships to pass underneath. Next there is a beautiful sequence of shots and camera movements that depict the massive steel bridge, emphasizing its vertical, horizontal, and diagonal lines and the shadows it casts on the water and the pillars. Ivens shows the interplay between these lines by carefully composing the images and following them with camera movements.

The static structure of the bridge is contrasted with the speed and dynamics of the approaching train, which has to stop when the signal is urging it to halt. With the train gradually coming to a standstill the bridge slowly begins to move. Ivens repeats the first sequence, but now with many parts of the bridge in movement: the big wheels turning, the contrasting movements of the bridge going upwards and the counterweights going down, the ships passing slowly underneath, and the train impatiently waiting and steaming. Ivens carefully composes the vertical, horizontal and diagonal lines and plays with the movements within the frame. He adds to the dynamics of this moment with several camera movements, before the scene reassembles itself, and we see a closed bridge and trains crossing the river. The result is an almost abstract composition of lines and movements. The bridge is no longer operative, but is now an industrial monument in Rotterdam.

Bronx Morning, A

(US, Leyda, 1931)

A Bronx Morning was photographer-turned-filmmaker Jay Leyda's first film and the only solo effort in his filmmaking practice. Leyda is best known for his translations of Sergei Eisenstein's film theories, and for his own books on film analysis and history ranging from Soviet and Chinese cinema to the compilation documentary. However, Leyda's actual work in film is an essential part of his wide-ranging career as an artist-scholar, and this eleven-minute experimental documentary is significant on several fronts. It is, first, a highly creative and accomplished film that explores many tropes of film style and renders a memorable impression of New York City early in the Depression years. Among those who admired the film in its day were no less than Eisenstein and Dziga Vertov: this was the film that gained Leyda admission to the Moscow Film School in 1933, and both Soviet artists were pleased to claim that they saw their influence upon Leyda. (Surely the numerous shots of the baby carriage in one sequence show Leyda referencing the Odessa Steps massacre in Potemkin.) Thus, this film enabled to some degree Leyda's seminal years studying and working in Moscow and all the later books and translations of Eisenstein and others that Leyda brought to English-language readers, filmmakers, and cinema studies in general. In some sense, then, this effort also matters because it indirectly had a huge impact on generations of scholarship and production. Third, in more recent years A Bronx Morning has proved to be a key film in the historiographic reevaluation of American avant-garde cinema. For years a great variety of film made in the 1920s and 1930s was understudied and undervalued. Now, however, the days are gone when Maya Deren's undeniable landmark Meshes of the Afternoon (1943) was somehow seen as giving birth singlehandedly to experimental film in the US. Finally, Leyda's film makes an interesting and significant contribution to the city symphony, a documentary subgenre more often studied in the light of a handful of earlier European classics. Indeed, city films such as this one point to a time when distinctions between documentary and the avant-garde had not become fully established (Uricchio 1995).

An impressionistic portrait of New York's northernmost borough in the early days of the Great Depression, A Bronx Morning does not follow the chronological 'day in the life' structure of many city symphonies of the period. Rather, the film has a sense of formal play that heralds a new filmmaker, a student emulating but not merely copying his teachers. One finds awnings and sacks used as wipes; a graphic match from two pumpkins to the O's in the 'LOOK' on a sandwich man's placard; and even an example of the Kuleshov effect, when shots of cats are followed by ones of birds scattering, as if in fear of the felines. The use of the 'LOOK' is but one of many highly reflexive tropes active in the film, starting with its disorienting opening as the camera rides along an elevated train. The train enables not only a vivid and self-conscious tracking shot, but also an interplay with light and dark patches evocative of the filmstrip itself, and also later reflected images in the train windows and distancing created by grating in the foreground. Leyda's work in still photography and his apprenticeship with Ralph Steiner appear too, in the film's fascination with objects and the care with composition, photographically centripetal yet cinematically centrifugal, as the film transcends traditional, premodernist ideas of framing. Even the focus upon feet hints at the still photographer traipsing about to set up his next shot (Lugowski 1999).

Historians have aptly linked the film with Ruttmann (Uricchio 1995) and have also read the film as a tribute to Eugene Atget, one of Leyda's favorite photographers (Horak 1993). Images of objects in deserted streets, before they are filled with pedestrians and cars, delay anything resembling an establishing shot until twenty-five shots into the film, and have a surrealistic touch like Atget. Leyda himself, though, admitted a far wider range of influence, from art cinema and documentary he saw when he moved to New York, to many films that he had only seen via stills in camera magazines he collected as a youth in Ohio (Cavalcanti's Rien que les heures, Man Ray's L'Etoile de mer, Dudley Murphy and Fernand Leger's Ballet Mecanique).

In later years, Leyda tended to downplay his first film, complaining that it was too 'formalistic' and not sufficiently political. Yet critics have argued that the city symphony, in moving experimental film away from abstraction and frequently either documenting the plight of the poor, or criticizing urban institutions, was actually a politicized, experimental play with realism. One certainly finds such commentary in Leyda's sardonic use of three intertitles. 'The Bronx does business ...' is followed by shots of businesses that have lost their leases. A second title, 'And the Bronx lives ...', while followed by shots of tenements that denotatively represent living quarters, nonetheless heralds a series of shots devoid of any people, as if to highlight the difficulties of living in such crowded, impoverished conditions. Finally, the third title, '... on the street' continues the ongoing trope of irony, as we see garbage trucks and a possibly homeless woman's legs sprawled on the pavement. This shot of the legs is but part of a larger fragmentation of the body seen throughout the film, combined with decentered framings and a prominent use of empty spaces. Horak (1993) notes that the film displays an essentially 'feminine perspective' in its world of children, pets and cleaning, unlike those city symphonies that emphasize men at work. Others have argued that a gender politics is in play here, that the absence of agency speaks to the 'crisis in masculinity' brought about by the socioeconomic conditions of the Depression (Lugowski 1999). However read, the film has belatedly come into its own for film scholars and cultural historians.

Burch, Noël

Although Noël Burch was schooled as a filmmaker in France in the early 1950s, his career as a director did not become fully realized until much later in life. From the time he graduated from L'IDHEC (translated roughly as the Institute for High Cinematographic Studies) now known as la FEMIS (the National Film School of France) until the mid-1980s, Burch gained recognition as a film theorist, teacher, and critic, engaging in landmark studies of formal film analysis, Japanese cinema, and early, silent cinema.

Throughout his life, Burch was never far from the camera. In the 1950s he assisted directors Preston Sturges and Michel Fano. Soon afterward, while becoming a respected film critic and theorist, Burch honed his filmmaking skills by making several short films. These included Et sur cette Pierre ... (1963), Noviciat (1964), Tout est écrit (1970), Correction, Please or How We Got into Pictures (1979), The Year of the Bodyguard (1981), The Impersonation (1983), and Not Distant Observers (1985). As Burch himself admits, however, before 1986, he 'was not really going anywhere' as a filmmaker.

In 1986 he made a series of six documentaries for England's Channel 4 television, titled together, What Do Those Old Films Mean? As his subject, Burch chose an often neglected period of film history: early cinema. In each of the six segments, Burch investigated how cinema developed after the turn of the century in a different part of the world. The six volumes are divided as follows: volume one examines English cinema from 1900 to 1912; volume two examines French cinema from 1904 to 1912; volume three examines American cinema from 1902 to 1914; volume four examines Soviet cinema from 1926 to 1930; volume five examines Danish cinema from 1910 to 1912; and volume six examines German cinema from 1926 to 1932.

That Burch chose to highlight the cinematic art in those particular countries during those specific time frames comes as no surprise. In his first book, Theory of Film Practice (1967), Burch had analyzed the work of key filmmakers who fit into those parameters, extolling, for example, the editing technique of Soviet filmmaker Sergei Eisenstein, and the structure of the gags in the films of American slapstick performer Buster Keaton.

As a self-proclaimed communist and expatriate, strongly influenced by the radicalism of the student movement in France in May 1968, it is not surprising that Burch was deeply critical of US politics. This criticism, along with his ongoing dedication to cinema, became the basis for Burch's most acclaimed documentary, Red Hollywood (1995). Although Burch had explored the subject of American dissidents in his 1994 film, Voyage Sentimental, he and codirector Thom Anderson's investigation into the blacklisted filmmakers of 1950s Hollywood brought him greater recognition as a documentarian than any of his previous films. Red Hollywood examines the forgotten works of several blacklisted filmmakers who fled to France rather than struggle within the US film industry. Burch and Anderson's subjects included Dalton Trumbo, Michael Wilson, John Berry, and Jules Dassin. Using fifty-three clips from their films, Red Hollywood explores the ways in which these political leftists were able to infuse communist ideas into their work. The documentary received a great deal of praise from critics in the United States.

Early in his career as a film theorist, Burch defined himself as a formalist, calling attention to a film's mise-en-scène over its narrative in his writing and teaching. Burch analogized cinema to music, arguing in Theory of Film Practice that film form could be conceived of in terms of 'atonal' formal elements, in which no single element consistently dominates. In that sense, in any given film narrative is just another element, not inherently more important than sound, editing structure, or a different aesthetic component. Burch demonstrates his thesis using a wide range of films and filmmakers, including Fritz Lang's M and Jacques Tati's Play Time.

Burch opposes what he calls mainstream cinema's institutional mode of production (IMP), which uses invisible editing, framing, and mise-en-scène to call the spectator's attention to the narrative, rather than the aesthetics of the film. Burch holds that the rise of the IMP in the early days of the medium was linked to the film industry's economic interest in attracting a bourgeois demographic. Toward that end, the industry wanted to create films with which the audience could identify psychologically, films that created the effect of reality. Burch preferred modernist and avant-garde films that stressed formal properties such as offscreen space and spatial framing. He praised the films of Antonioni and Resnais, in particular, for their elaborate orchestration and use of offscreen space.

In his seminal book on Japanese cinema, To the Distant Observer, Burch argues that Japanese film is inherently critical of the Hollywood realist cinema of the 1930s and 1940s. Burch points to the directors Ozu Yasujiro and Mizoguchi Kenji as two stylistically different filmmakers whose works both illustrate the difference between the realism of Hollywood and modernism of Japanese cinema. Whereas Hollywood privileges a continuous, coherent, character-driven narrative above other formal elements in film, Japanese cinema uses long shots, frontality, and, in the case of Ozu, a narrative in which nothing seems to be happening. For Burch, this is a deliberate and intentional stylistic indifference to the codified mode of filmmaking manufactured by Hollywood.

Although Burch has continued teaching, writing, and theorizing about film, publishing several books during the 1990s and beyond, Theory of Film Practice and To the Distant Observer remain his most influential and ground-breaking achievements. His attention to film form and overall concern for the medium became the subjects of his filmmaking ventures. His most successful documentaries, What Do Those Old Films Mean? and Red Hollywood both encourage a reevaluation of film outside the narrative-driven conventions of American cinema. As both a scholar and a filmmaker, Burch continues to be a powerful influence on the field of film studies.

Burden of Dreams

(Germany, Blank, 1982)

Regarded as one of the finest films ever made about movie-making, Burden of Dreams is also the most widely seen work by prolific documentarian Les Blank. In October 1979 and again in April–June 1981, director Werner Herzog brought in Blank and Maureen Gosling to document the production of his feature Fitzcarraldo (1982), being shot in Peru. Herzog eventually completed his quixotic jungle venture, but Blank's portrait of the director running amok in the Amazon emerged as the superior film. Burden of Dreams combines a 'making-of' chronicle with Les Blank's characteristic humor, keen eye for detail, and ethnographic sensitivity, creating a compelling portrait of the notoriously eccentric German filmmaker.

Burden of Dreams begins with a sequence both beautiful and cheeky. To the sounds of a Vivaldi chorale, aerial shots display the Peruvian Amazon. Unlike Hitler's arrival through the clouds in Triumph of the Will (1935), Herzog's shaky landing in a small plane signals his lack of command over this place. Blank then cuts to the director sitting in a small boat, explaining his film's 'Sisyphus-like story', which he based on an historical character. Fitzcarraldo, an Irish rubber merchant, dreams of bringing Enrico Caruso to sing at a new opera house in the Amazon. To finance his venture, he accesses untapped rubber trees by transporting a steamship over a mountainous isthmus. As we learn, although the actual Carlos Fitzcarraldo disassembled his boat, Herzog insists on having his hauled in one piece, even though it is ten times heavier. Blank builds his documentary's narrative around this literal and metaphorical feat.

The film next takes us back to November 1979, when shooting commenced. A narrator's detached voice condenses the production history throughout, emphasizing the complicated negotiations between the European crew and the divergent groups of people living in these remote parts of the Amazon. We see Aguaruna Indians working at the Fitzcarraldo encampment while one explains the political tensions and violence that force the production to flee. Cut to the city of Iquitos, Peru, where shooting resumed in January 1981, only to be suspended when the star Jason Robards fell ill. We see outtakes of Robards with co-star Mick Jagger, as Herzog relates: 'If I abandon this project, I would be a man without dreams.' In April, actor Klaus Kinski arrives to take the title role, as he had for Herzog's earlier tale of madness, Aguirre, der Zorn Gottes/Aguirre, the Wrath of God (1972), also filmed in the rainforests of Peru.

The remainder of Burden of Dreams chronicles three months of shooting from a second camp, one thousand five hundred miles to the south of Iquitos. Blank records moments of danger and the tedium of numerous delays. An understated voice-over narrator relates that, in fact, the crew must work with three ships, all representing Fitzcarraldo's one. In addition to the three hundred-ton steamer to be forced over a hill, a similar vessel stays in Iquitos for principal photography, and a third goes down a river for shooting on the 'Rapids of Death'. Alternating with vérité sequences of the production are interviews with Herzog, which become articulate but mad monologues on the 'curse' on his production, the 'authentic natives' in his cast, and the 'collective murder' and 'obscenity of all this jungle'. Blank concludes with a qualified fulfillment of the director's quest. We hear that, after several hazardous attempts, Herzog wins 'a painful victory' by getting his ship to the mountaintop with bulldozers. This climax, however, falls between despondent soliloquies. First, asked by Blank what he will do after the movie has wrapped, Herzog grimaces as he jokes that he 'shouldn't make movies anymore'. Even if Fitzcarraldo gets done, he says, 'Nobody on this Earth will convince me to be happy about all that'. Finally, Blank concludes his portrait of the artist on a note of bittersweet redemption, with Herzog saying: 'I make films because [...] it is my duty. Because this might be the inner chronicle of what we are, and we have to articulate ourselves.'

As a commissioned documentary, Burden of Dreams gives Werner Herzog the first and last word, but the film far from lionizes him. With characteristic aplomb, Les Blank reveals the beauty of the Amazon and the people who live in this place that Herzog finds both irresistible and horrible. His portrait is sympathetic to Herzog's artistry but revelatory of its cruel excesses. We see, for example, the filmmaker playing football with local Indians, only to find that when the Machiguengas engage in their traditional sport of arrow catching, he urges them to shoot harder, and at one another's heads. Blank intercuts this with footage of Herzog first explaining that a hostile tribe has attacked three of his camp members, then smiling as he says he will give his son the gruesome arrow that went through a man's throat.

Burden of Dreams was only one of several documentaries of the time that centered on the German filmmaker's eccentricities and droll lunacy. Erwin Keusch's Was ich bin, sind meine Filme/I Am My Films (1979) shows the director during the making of Stroszek (1977). It reveals a less assured cineaste, but one who declares that films are more important than life itself, hence Herzog's predilection for dangerous locales and outlandish actions. Shortly before embarking on Fitzcarraldo, he also participated in Werner Herzog's Eats his Shoe (1980), Blank's whimsical short about his comrade's appearance at the premiere of Errol Morris's Gates of Heaven (1978). Herzog had encouraged the fledgling filmmaker to make this peculiar nonfiction feature about pet cemeteries, claiming he would eat his shoe if Morris succeeded. In filming the literal cooking of leather boots at Chez Panisse, Blank not only paved the way for his 1980 film Garlic is as Good as Ten Mothers (in which Herzog briefly appears), but he also established the character rendered full-scale in Burden of Dreams—Herzog, the cinema-obsessed extremist who wants to save the world from banality by pursuing cinematic visions.

Although movies routinely commission documentaries about their making, Blank's work began a subgenre about troubled productions, often with their own directors going half mad in isolated locations. Most notably, Hearts of Darkness (1991) chronicles Francis Ford Coppola's trials and tribulations in directing Apocalypse Now (1979). The former, incidentally, includes footage shot by Les Blank, whom Coppola hired to film the Apocalypse wrap party. Mika Kaurismäki's Tigrero: A Film That Was Never Made (1994) records Sam Fuller's return to the Brazilian locales of a movie he abandoned forty years prior, and Terry Gilliam's failure to complete The Man Who Killed Don Quixote is recorded in Lost in La Mancha (2002). Arguably, the subgenre evolved beyond parody with a twisted homage to Burden of Dreams. In Zak Penn's presumed mockumentary, Incident at Loch Ness (2004), a crew sets out to film a documentary about Werner Herzog, who is himself directing a documentary about the Loch Ness monster.

Whatever the strengths of these kindred films, only Burden of Dreams goes beyond its commission. Rather than simply presenting a portrait of a filmmaker lost in an alien environment, Blank also respectfully documents the people who live in the place that Herzog can only see as ‘unfinished’ and ‘prehistorical’. As in his many films celebrating American subcultures, Blank delights in presenting people via their music and food. Although we see Klaus Kinski disgusted by the fermented masato that the Campas Indians offer to Fitzcarraldo, Blank counters with a long sequence documenting the communal process of making this staple food and ritual drink, even recording a zesty Campas song about the subject. After giving Herzog the last word, he tellingly gives Peruvians the final image. Burden of Dreams ends with the visiting German filmmaker having his portrait taken by an itinerant photographer, who frames the black-and-white photo in a heart, trimmed with drawings of flowers, vines, and songbirds, an artful domestication of the jungle to which Herzog could only surrender.

Burma Victory

(UK, Boulting, 1945)

Burma Victory was the final film in a wartime series of documentaries dealing with significant Allied campaigns. The previous ‘victory’ films, Desert Victory (1943) and Tunisian Victory (1944), had addressed the war in North Africa, whereas Burma Victory was an account of the arduous fighting in Southeast Asia. The feature-length documentaries were compiled from footage taken by the service film units and Tunisian Victory and The True Glory (1945), about the liberation of northern Europe, were notable, if troubled collaborations between the British and Americans. The films were widely screened, both theatrically and nontheatrically, and were considered principal achievements in the war documentary.

Britain’s main contribution to the war in the East was the struggle to recover Burma. It was a long, hard-fought, and unpleasant campaign, yet it was secondary to the events in Europe. The Fourteenth Army that operated there was awarded the epithet of ‘the forgotten army’ and its commander, Admiral Lord Mountbatten, aimed to get the recognition that the Allied forces were due. One way to achieve this goal was an ambitious campaign film such as Tunisian Victory, and early in 1944 he was encouraged London and Washington into a further Anglo-American documentary film. In the event, and very much a consequence of the previous difficulties of coproduction, it was decided in May 1945 to make separate British and American records of the Burma campaign.

Burma Victory begins with a series of bleak images depicting the hostility of the terrain and the ravages attendant on the monsoon. After early setbacks at the hands of the Japanese, a firmer resolve is brought to the Fourteenth Army by its new commander Mountbatten, who is seen addressing groups of servicemen and demanding no further retreats. The Allied campaign of 1944–5, including the successful defense of Imphal and Kohima, the system of supply by air operated by the Americans, the daring behind the enemy lines mission of the ‘chindits’, Stilwell’s Chinese Expeditionary Force advancing from the northwest, the crossing of the Chindwin and Irrawaddy rivers, the long, hard-fought march to Mandalay, and the relief of Rangoon, is presented through a combination of combat and documentary footage, reenactments, models, and diagrams. The war ends with the Japanese surrender in September 1945, after the dropping of atomic bombs on Nagasaki and Hiroshima.

David MacDonald of the Army Film and Photographic Unit (AFPU) had arrived in the region late in 1944 to commence work on a film. He was able to draw on and coordinate the activities of the Southeast Asia Command (SEAC) Film Unit, which was led by Derek Knight. After his work on the previous ‘victory’ films, Roy Boulting was again assigned to direct and edit the project, and everyone was required to work quickly, as the war was concluding. Burma Victory understandably bears much similarity to its predecessors. In a few respects, though, it develops techniques introduced in the earlier titles and gives them a new prominence. Boulting had staged a small but vitally effective scene in Desert Victory to provide some dramatic impact to the commencement of the Battle of El Alamein. Here, he opens the film with a studio-staged scene featuring two British Tommies in a tent, one of whom is reading aloud from a guidebook to Burma. Dispirited at its idealized vision, he tosses the book into the previously concealed rain and mud outside, now brought into view with a panning shot. A further, more developed reenactment occurs in the middle of the film. It is a nighttime scene and Boulting effectively uses sound, performance, and lighting to evoke the eerie atmosphere of the jungle. These scenes were shot at Pinewood

Studios, the home base of the AFPU. Although examples of the wartime trend in blending fiction and documentary, such reenactments are of a quite different order to those being developed within the documentary film movement at the Crown Film Unit, such as Pat Jackson’s work on Western Approaches (1944). Boulting was primarily a commercial filmmaker and intended such scenes to help dramatize the material and make the film more palatable at the box office. In a similar vein, the film makes use of the narrative device of a diarist, thus individualizing and humanizing the events depicted.

Burma Victory also includes restaged briefings of the Allied commanders. These scenes would have been shot on location by the SEAC Film Unit and, although extremely stilted, perform the vital democratic function of information and explanation. The ‘victory’ documentaries have been credited with promoting the ideals of a people’s war, and access to the military leaders and strategists is seen as a fulfillment of this. The notions of a democratic leadership and citizen army, strongly present in Desert Victory, are further stamped into the Burma film. On reflection, however, these qualities are compromised by Britain’s imperial role in the region, the aristocratic credentials of the Supreme Commander, and the over-prominence of the British Tommy in the film. After all, the brunt of the action was borne by Empire troops, especially the highly tenacious Indians who were fighting to keep the Japanese out of their homeland.

Burma Victory differed from its two predecessors in one important respect: they had carefully established the connection between the war front and the home front—that the former relied on the material produced by the latter. This was a central articulation of people’s war ideology. The geographic remoteness and side-show status of the Southeast Asia theatre seemingly precluded such a presentation and, besides, virtually all of the heavy equipment on view—tanks, planes, bulldozers—was of American origin. Perhaps a growing rivalry at that stage in the war prompted the British filmmakers to leave unmentioned such factors. In addition, the British were still smarting from Hollywood’s astonishingly insensitive treatment of the war in the region, Objective Burma (1945), which depicted Errol Flynn and a few American troops dispatching the Japanese singlehandedly.

Despite the intense effort, the film was not completed until October 1945. It attracted excellent reviews and was praised in the Monthly Film Bulletin as a 'masterly survey of a vast and complex campaign, presented with vivid realism'. It clearly went some way to providing recognition to the struggle in the East, and was the last great documentary to emerge from the wartime service film units.

Burns, Ken

Ken Burns is the documentary phenomenon of the last decade of the twentieth century. From The Civil War (1990) through Jazz (2001), Burns has produced and directed nine documentaries with a total running time of more than sixty hours for the Public Broadcasting System (PBS) in the United States. More than seventy million viewers have seen The Civil War and more than fifty million have seen Baseball (1994). Budgets for the Burns projects range from more than $3 million for The Civil War to $14 million for Jazz. (The sales of The Civil War on video had exceeded a million copies by 1993.) Public schools and libraries across America present this documentary to children and make it readily available to the public. The Civil War can stand with The Birth of a Nation (1915) and Gone with the Wind (1939) as landmarks in the politics of historical representation and of popular culture in twentieth-century America. Burns himself is a media celebrity, featuring widely on television, radio, and in the press (he was invited to the White House by both George H. Bush and Bill Clinton). Few would contest Gary Edgerton's observation that this documentary filmmaker is 'arguably the most recognizable and influential historian of his generation'. With the financial backing of PBS and the General Motors Corporation, and an experienced team of collaborators, at mid-career Burns appears likely to continue production at a remarkable pace.

Burns's project is to grapple with the national identity by exploring American history. His belief that the Civil War, baseball, and jazz are central to our culture motivated his grand documentary trilogy. So too, his conviction that individuals shape our historical destiny underlies his parallel series of American profiles. His respect for American institutions and his biographies of 'great' men and women testify to an allegiance to traditional values; yet his projects regularly portray reformers and even revolutionary figures, such as Frank Lloyd Wright, Susan B. Anthony, and Thomas Jefferson. Burns claims that America's racial heritage is the thread connecting all his work. (African Americans are obviously central to The Civil War and Jazz, and the prominence given the Negro leagues and Jackie Robinson's integration of the sport in Baseball offers more compelling evidence of the centrality of race to the Burns understanding of the United States.) A liberal, progressive sensibility guides the Burns exploration of what it means to be an American, and a fundamental allegiance to the national heritage unites the work.

The Ken Burns style helps to account for his enormous productivity. His historical documentaries have a fixed vocabulary of elements that offer flexibility within a well-established formula. Central to the method is the animation of still materials: photographs, paintings, and periodicals. With editing, moving camera, or zooming lens, Burns constructs a scene out of a single image. He wants his viewer to inhabit the picture as he brings it to life. The volume of this material can be enormous. The Civil War is reported to have used sixteen thousand photographs. In counterpoint, the filmmaker takes filmed footage, unpopulated landscapes, or empty buildings associated with an era and uses a stable, balanced composition to invest the image with stillness, allowing the shot to evoke a frozen past. A range of archival moving pictures fills out his compilation. Of course, the animation of still images in documentary goes back to Michelangelo (1940) and was used with eloquence by Alain Resnais in his documentaries from the 1950s. Burns himself acknowledges the influence of films such as City of Gold (1957) and The Real West (1961). The Burns visual style is derivative, but in his best work, outstanding.

The images from the past are further brought to life with the accompanying soundtracks. Various characters (such as Elijah Hunt Rhodes, Mary Chestnut, or Frederick Douglas among many others from The Civil War) constitute a 'chorus of voices' whose letters, diaries, speeches, and so forth are read by a distinguished actor, cultivating a highly personalized vocal delivery as the basis for each characterization. The documentaries establish and return to the cast of historical characters, allowing them to assume the intimacy and depth of figures from fiction. At their best, this chorus establishes contending characters animating dramatic conflict, as well as a sense of the variable forces propelling change. The soundtrack further evokes the past with folk tunes, period music, or other sounds associated with the era. These voices from the past are integrated with a general narrator and contemporary authorities (such as Gary Giddens, Gerald Early, or Wynton Marsalis in Jazz), who offer commentary and analysis culled from interviews. However, the authorities speak directly to the camera and address the viewer in the absence of any prompting or presence from the filmmaker. Rather than appearing as interviewees, these on-camera storytellers appear to be speaking directly to the viewer.

Finally, Burns segments his episodes into short sections of approximately ten to fifteen minutes, each one introduced by a simple title framed in black. The sections allow for a shift in subject or emphasis from a narrative description to an affecting personal tale, a flash forward or backward in time, or a montage of contending opinions. Episodes typically begin with an evocative introduction setting the tone before the general subject of the installment is announced with the credits.

In 1981 Burns's first film, The Brooklyn Bridge, appeared to have a fresh and engaging approach to the historical documentary. By the turn of the century, his style had become so widely imitated that television programming on the History or the Discovery Channel seems to have transformed it into an institutional practice. A challenge facing Burns at this point in his career is to develop his style, lest his work become undistinguishable from a movement he is largely responsible for inspiring.

The historical documentaries of Ken Burns have excited a new interest in history among the general public. Historians have greeted the phenomenon with mixed feelings. Though gratified by the attention, scholars are concerned because the films glide past controversy over evidence, method and interpretation that characterizes the discipline of history. Nonetheless, Ken Burns's documentaries address serious questions about what it means to be an American and explore a range of answers for an audience that is eager for more.

LEGER GRINDON

Born July 29, 1953 in Brooklyn, New York to Robert Kyle Burns, an anthropologist, and Lyla Smith (Tupper) Burns. Grew up in Newark, Delaware, and Ann Arbor, Michigan, where his father held positions as a university professor. Graduated from Hampshire College in 1975, majoring in film studies and design under the direction of Jerome Liebling and Elaine Mayes. Founded Florentine Films in 1975 with former classmates Buddy Squires and Roger Sherman. Beginning with The Brooklyn Bridge (1981) through Horatio's Drive: America's First Road Trip (2003), has worked as the producer and director, and frequently cinematographer and cowriter, on documentaries focusing on various aspects of American history and culture. Many of these works are multiple episode programs running between ten and twenty hours, most notably The Civil War (1990), Baseball (1994), and Jazz (2001). Has coauthored illustrated books that have accompanied his documentaries. Recipient of many awards including the Television Critics' Association Awards

(1991, 1995, 2001), Peabody Awards (1990, 1999, 2000), Emmy Awards (1991, 1994), and the Erik Barnouw Prize.

Camera Natura

(Australia, Gibson, 1984)

Camera Natura uses an essay mode to deconstruct the discourses around the nonaboriginal imaging of the landscape. The film had its origins in director/writer Ross Gibson's writings, in particular his essays 'Camera Natura: Landscape in Australian Feature Films' and 'Geography and Gender', which appear in rewritten form in his book South of the West (1992). Gibson used images from films such as The Sons of Matthew (1949), Gallipoli (1981), Picnic at Hanging Rock (1975), and Mad Max II (1981) in Camera Natura to answer the question he set for himself in the initial article: 'What can the preoccupation [with the landscape] tell us about Australian culture, cinematic and general?' Gibson's essaying in this film involved the same elliptical image-voice relationship that is evident in the seminal role model for this mode—Chris Marker's Sunless (1983)—except that Camera Natura exhibits a critical poesy informed by a postcolonial and deconstructionist examination of Australian film culture evident in several independent films of the early to mid-1980s. These include Helen Grace's Serious Undertakings (1983) and Tracey Moffatt's Nice Coloured Girls (1987).

Although Camera Natura involves a bricolage of images, voices, and sounds, it contained a distinct line of argument, which is that the dominance of landscape images in Australian feature films of the 1970s and early 1980s can be linked to a reemergent nationalism at the time, and the landscape was seen as a delimited, manageable source of 'Australianness'. In this respect, Camera Natura could be called an 'essay in futility', bolstered by the inclusion of such images as the girls entering the rock from Picnic at Hanging Rock, footage of Donald Campbell's failed attempt at the world land speed record, and of Jack Thompson crashing his car from Sunday Too Far Away (1975). The idea of non-productivity that these images denote implies that Australian film culture was exhausting itself and creating few future opportunities for itself.

Formally, Camera Natura is an adventurous departure from traditional documentary practices, including poetic and evocative voice-overs, drawing on the 'personal' style associated with a lineage of writing that can be traced back to the writing of the sixteenth-century essayist Michel de Montaigne. The film is also partly a compilation film, drawing on a host of images and sounds from Australian feature films to reconfigure these images and sounds in relation to the contemporary Australian social imaginary. In this regard the critical aspect of Camera Natura is related to the kind of postcolonial critique operating in a host of Australian films, all of which are concerned with examining white settler culture's inherited discursive patterns.

Canada

If documentary is the 'creative treatment of actuality', as John Grierson said, then in the beginning there was a lot more actuality than creative treatment. However, the actuality was not Canadian and the pattern that prevailed throughout the twentieth century was established. Moving pictures shown in Canadian theatres were rarely Canadian.

Lumière Bros representatives, Messieurs Minier and Pupier, brought moving pictures to Canada with a cinematographe screening in Montreal on June 27, 1896, at 78 Boulevard St Laurent. Among the early Lumière films shown that night were a train arriving at a station, a cavalry charge, waves breaking against rocks at the seashore, a card game between Lumière and friends in a garden, and a wall being torn down.

Three weeks later, on July 21, 1896, the rival Edison Vitascope was shown to an outdoor audience in Ottawa at the West End Park. Organized by Andrew and George Holland, the evening included live tricks on stage by pioneer exhibitor John C. Green, then known as Belsaz the Magician. The audience saw May Irwin, Canadian actress from Whitby, Ontario, kiss John Rice, as well as a train, a bathing scene at Atlantic City, four 'coloured boys' eating watermelons, and LoLo Fuller's serpentine dance.

Itinerant cameramen, such as Felix Mesguich and W.K.L. Dickson, began arriving in 1897 to shoot 'scenics' of the Canadian landscape. They usually headed for Niagara Falls, which was added time and again to the exotic sights seen by film viewers around the world. Robert Bonine went further afield to shoot footage of the Klondike Gold Rush.

James D. Freer, a Manitoba farmer and cinema hobbyist, was probably Canada's first filmmaker. He shot local scenes in 1897 and then was hired by the Canadian Pacific Railway (CPR) to tour Britain, showing his films and promoting immigration to Canada's 'golden west'. The CPR ensured that winter scenes were not on the program. Thus began a long tradition of sponsored films by the CPR, which led to the creation of a production company, Associated Screen News. Massey-Harris, which made farm equipment, and other companies also began sponsoring films.

The battle for Canadian screens

Leo-Ernest Ouimet, who established Canada's first luxury movie theatre in Montreal in 1906, soon began showing his own newsreels. After World War I he started the twice-weekly British Canadian Pathé News (1919–22), which combined Canadian and British newsreel items. Though popular, it could not compete with better-funded and -distributed American newsreels.

In fact, led by Adolph Zukor's Paramount, the major American companies were vertically integrating into exhibition, distribution, and production by the end of the war. This 'Hollywood studio system' left little room for an independent film industry in the United States or Canada. By 1922 Allen's, the largest Canadian exhibitor and one of the largest theatre chains in the world, went bankrupt competing against Famous Players, Paramount's Canadian theatre chain.

Private Canadian producers such as Ouimet or Ernest Shipman, whose most successful film was the feature drama Back to God's Country (1919), could no longer access the first-run Canadian theatre screens if they were outside the Hollywood system. They had to leave Canada and move to Los Angeles or New York if they wanted their films to be seen in Canada, or anywhere else.

The Canadian public did not seem concerned that their movie theatres showed mostly American films until the United States entered World War I. Then Canadians were outraged by patriotic war movies awash in American flags, which ignored the sacrifices of the French, British, and Canadians on the Western Front. Led by the Ontario Government, and soon followed by the federal government, public production bureaus were established to make Canadian nonfiction films.

State production of films in Canada began in 1917 with the establishment of the Ontario Government Motion Picture Bureau (1917–1934). The Ontario Bureau produced educational films, often on agricultural subjects, until it was closed down during the Depression. It was soon followed by the Canadian Government Motion Picture Bureau, which was absorbed by the National Film Board during World War II (see below). Thus, the National Film Board and its predecessors is probably the oldest continuously operating public film producer in the world (1918–).

Besides direct production through the public sector, the Canadian Government Motion Picture Bureau, and the Ontario Bureau to the NFB, the most important impetus to the production of Canadian nonfiction films was the Ontario ‘talking newsreel’ quota. This provincial screen-time quota was established in 1930 and continued until the end of theatrical newsreels in the 1950s. It required that each newsreel had to have forty percent ‘British Empire’ content, including twenty-five percent Canadian content. This created a theatrical market for Canadian newsreel items. Some private newsreel producers, such as Associated Screen News, then expanded into related documentary production.

Later, with the arrival of television, similar measures were tried, and Canadian programming was assured through the production of the public broadcaster and Canadian content quotas for all broadcasters.

Documentary explorers

Explorers increasingly used film to record their work and help raise funds for their explorations. From 1913 to 1916 George H. Wilkins filmed Canadian explorer Vilhjalmur Stefansson’s expedition in the Arctic. Richard S. Finnie shot many films about the North and directed the first Canadian feature documentary for the Canadian Government Motion Picture Bureau, In the Shadow of the Pole (1928), which recorded Canada’s 1928 Arctic expedition.

Explorers like Robert Flaherty in northern Quebec, or Varick Frissell in Labrador, used film to document their work. Then, following the lead of Edward Curtis, they began to record the life of the people they knew and respected before their way of life was gone.

American photographer Edward S. Curtis had begun a lifelong project to record the American Indians before they disappeared. In 1914 he extended this work to create a ‘documentary drama’ using Kwakiutl natives of British Columbia as actors. His film, In the Land of the War Canoes (1914), however, is more fiction than nonfiction, more drama than documentary.

Varick Frissell was an American who had been drawn to the work of the Grenfell Mission in northern Newfoundland and went on to explore the interior of Labrador. By 1930 Frissell had raised enough money to produce a feature based on his own experiences of the seal hunt. At the insistence of the distributor, Paramount Pictures, The Viking (1931) had a romantic story and drama sequences directed by George Melford. Frissell directed the incredible documentary sequences in the film. These cost him his life when his ship blew up while he was filming.

Robert Flaherty, another American who grew up in Canadian mining camps and had spent most of his life in Canada, explored and prospected along Hudson’s Bay for the Canadian Northern Railway. His employer, Sir William Mackenzie, encouraged Flaherty to record the life of the Inuit on film. In 1913 Flaherty began taking camera gear on his prospecting trips. His first film on Inuit life caught fire while being edited in Toronto. Undeterred, Flaherty returned to Hudson’s Bay with the support of France’s Revillon Frères fur traders. His second film was also produced with the help of Inuit, from developing film to suggesting ideas to shoot. Nanook of the North (1922) was about survival in the Arctic, and its dramatic footage was real, or seemed real. It was a hit around the world.

Robert Flaherty created a new film form by successfully marrying nonfiction, or apparent nonfiction, with a narrative storyline. Flaherty wanted a film showing the Inuit before their use of firearms, so his work is not an accurate record of the period. Yet Nanook seems true in its whole if not its parts, and it is usually considered the first Canadian documentary and indeed the first documentary ever made. Flaherty’s work was an inspiration to the young John Grierson who developed a close, and often contentious, relationship with Flaherty.

Associated Screen News

The most important early Canadian production company was Associated Screen News (ASN), which was organized in 1920 in Montreal by the Canadian Pacific Railway. Ben Norrish moved from the public sector to run this company until it was sold in the 1950s. ASN produced sponsored films, newsreel segments, and theatrical shorts. It also depended on release print laboratory work from Hollywood companies.

A series of monthly nonfiction theatrical shorts called Canadian Cameos (1932–54) was produced by Gordon Sparling for ASN. One of the best of these is Rhapsody in Two Languages (1934), which Sparling directed in the ‘city symphony’ style with imaginative special effects. It is about a day in the life of Montreal and is one of the first Canadian sound films to have an original music score (by Howard Fogg).

Sparling directed Royal Banners Over Ottawa (1939), a record of the Royal visit to Canada’s capitol. This was the first Canadian documentary shot in colour. Sparling also ran the Army Film and Photo Unit during the war and, after ASN’s production department was closed down in 1957, he joined the National Film Board.

Crawley Films

The Canadian Film Awards was organized in 1949 and was Canada’s first competitive film festival. Its first ‘Film of the Year Award’ went to a short documentary on Indian masks titled The Loon’s Necklace (1948) by F.R. (Budge) Crawley and his wife Judith. Budge Crawley produced Newfoundland Scene (1952), which also won the Canadian Film Awards’ ‘Film of the Year’. Budge and Judy Crawley set up their film company in Ottawa during the war, but it came to national attention after winning these awards. Crawley Films grew, depending primarily on sponsored production, and became the largest private film production house in Canada from the 1950s to the 1970s. Towards the end of his career, Budge Crawley risked his company by making feature films, and Crawley films had to be sold owing to indebtedness in 1982.

Canadian Government Motion Picture Bureau

In response to requests for films on Canada’s resources and industry, the Canadian government established a film production unit in 1918 under Ben Norrish, who moved on to ASN. This Publicity and Exhibits Bureau produced a successful series of theatrical shorts, Seeing Canada (1919–39), to encourage tourism and foreign investment.

Under Raymond Peck the Publicity and Exhibits Bureau was renamed the Canadian Government Motion Picture Bureau in 1923. The Bureau’s most ambitious project was the feature documentary Lest We Forget (1935), produced and directed by Frank Badgley, who was also head of the Bureau. This film was a compilation documentary using newsreels, graphics, and reenacted scenes to tell the story of Canada’s involvement in World War I.

NFB and John Grierson

Under the leadership of John Grierson, the work of the British Documentary Movement in the 1930s impressed Ross McLean, a member of the Canadian High Commission in London. By contrast, the films of the Canadian Government Motion Picture Bureau seemed dull and uninspired. Ross McLean believed that Grierson could do something about that.

In 1938 the Canadian Government invited Grierson to report on the work of the Bureau, and how it might be improved. Grierson quickly wrote a report that recommended a new organization be established to centralize all government film production. The National Film Board of Canada (NFB) was established in Ottawa in 1939 under its first Government Film Commissioner and CEO, John Grierson (1939–45). The Canadian Government Motion Picture Bureau was absorbed by the NFB in 1941.

The war provided a propaganda focus for the NFB, which quickly grew under Grierson’s energetic leadership. Grierson invited veteran documentary filmmakers, such as Boris Kaufman and Joris Ivens, to work at the Ottawa offices of the Board, which were located in an old sawmill. Members of the British Documentary Movement, such as Stanley Hawes, Stuart Legg, Raymond Spottiswoode, and Norman McLaren, arrived to teach documentary and animation to their young staff.

Canadians hired by Grierson included Tom Daly, Sydney Newman, Louis Applebaum, Jim McKay, Vincent Paquette, Margaret Ann Adamson, George Dunning, Lorne Greene, Donald Buchanan, Grant McLean, Jim Beveridge, Jane Marsh Beveridge, Julian Roffman, Evelyn Spice Cherry, Lawrence Cherry, Guy Glover, and many more. At the end of the war the NFB had a staff of more than seven hundred employees.

The Case of Charlie Gordon (1939), directed by Stuart Legg, was the first film distributed by the NFB. The NFB went on to produce hundreds of films during the war but was best known for its two theatrical series of one- or two-reel shorts. The Canada Carries On (1940–59) series was produced by Stuart Legg and began with the release of his Atlantic Patrol (1940).

The World in Action (1942–5) series took a more international slant and began with a re-release of Warclouds in the Pacific (1941) by Stuart Legg. It warned of a possible Japanese attack on the American Pacific fleet. As a result of this timely film, the NFB got a contract to show this series in six thousand American theatres. This series was also produced by Stuart Legg with the assistance of Tom Daly, using a great deal of compilation footage from all the combatants.

Other important titles included Inside Fighting Russia (1942), Our Northern Neighbour (1943), The War for Men's Minds (1943), and Balkan Powder Keg (1944).

The NFB won the first Oscar for documentary in 1941 with Legg's Churchill's Island (1941). It showed English resolve to resist an anticipated German invasion, and was narrated by Lorne Greene, who became known as 'the voice of doom'.

The Canadian Army Film and Photo Unit was created in 1943 to provide newsreel footage shot by Army cameramen. It included ASN's Gordon Sparling and future Canadian Film Development Corporation head Michael Spencer. However, Grierson was unsuccessful in his attempt to incorporate this unit into the NFB's operations.

The Canada Carries On theatrical series continued until 1959, as did the Eye Witness/ Coup d'oeil (1947–59) series, which replaced The World in Action series. However, Grierson often said that there were more seats in community halls than in theatres.

In 1942 Donald Buchanan, cofounder of the National Film Society in 1935, was hired by the NFB to organize nontheatrical film circuits. Itinerant NFB projectionists took films to rural, industrial, and union audiences. In 1943 the Volunteer Projection Service was established to encourage film distribution to urban community groups not covered by the industrial or trade union circuits. More than six hundred libraries distributed NFB films under contract by the end of the war. After the war the film circuits continued as Film Councils, which numbered nearly five hundred in 1955.

John Grierson resigned as Government Film Commissioner in November 1945 and was replaced by his deputy, Ross McLean (1945–50). Now at the peak of his influence, Grierson became one of the first victims of the Cold War 'red scare'. Cipher clerk Igor Gouzenko defected from the Soviet Embassy in Ottawa with documents proving that the Soviets ran a spy ring in Canada during the war. One ambivalent reference to Grierson cast suspicion on him. As the red scare deepened, the staff of the NFB came under growing suspicion. The new Film Commissioner, Arthur Irwin (1950–3), let some staff go to satisfy the Board's political critics.

NFB's Unit B

After World War II NFB filmmakers wanted their work identified with screen credits, which Grierson had discouraged to avoid undermining anonymous 'public service' values. When the NFB was reorganized into four production units in 1948, the 'unGriersonian' idea that 'public service' filmmakers should be recognized as artists took hold and screen credits were initiated.

Unit B was responsible for scientific, cultural, and animated films. Under executive producer Tom Daly, Unit B became known for its groundbreaking work that won numerous awards and gave the NFB an international reputation for quality and innovation. The core of Unit B included Roman Kroitor, Wolf Koenig, Terry Macartney-Filgate, Stanley Jackson, Colin Low, Bob Verrall, Bill Greaves, Don Owen, Gerald Potterton, Arthur Lipsett, as well as the veteran animator Norman McLaren.

Neighbours (1952), a live-action pixilation film by the NFB's Norman McLaren, won the Oscar for Best Documentary Short. This was a surprise because his film is not a documentary, but rather an animated drama. It also has a strong anti-war message, which one would not expect the American Academy to appreciate since it was at that time fighting the Cold War and losing soldiers in Korea.

One of the first films directed by Colin Low, and shot by Wolf Koenig, was Corral (1954), about a cowboy breaking a wild horse on a ranch in Alberta. Breaking with traditional Griersonian voice-over narration, Eldon Rathburn's guitar score is the only sound in the film. Another important NFB production was Paul Tomkowicz: Street-railway Switchman (1954), directed by Roman Kroitor. It is a melancholy 'film noir' short about an immigrant who keeps the trolleys running through Winnipeg's severe winter.

American ex-patriot Bill Greaves joined Unit B as an editor. When he directed the NFB documentary Putting It Straight (1957), he became Canada's first black filmmaker. Encouraged by the Civil Rights movement, Greaves returned to New York and continued his film career.

Using an animation stand modified by Roman Kroitor, Wolf Koenig and Colin Low successfully combined historical photos and new footage in City of Gold (1957). A new kind of photo-documentary, their evocative film about the Klondike Gold Rush was narrated by Yukon native Pierre Berton.

NFB and cinéma vérité

The NFB was a key innovator in the worldwide race to produce location sync-sound films, better known as cinéma vérité or direct cinema. The Board's staff worked on many technical innovations to make its 16mm sync-sound production equipment much lighter and more portable. The key to the NFB's early handheld shooting was the 'Sprocketape' portable magnetic sound recorder invented by Ches Beachell in 1955.

Influenced by the work of French photographer Henri Cartier-Bresson, Unit B experimented with cinéma vérité sequences in the Candid Eye (1958–9) TV series. Days Before Christmas (1958), directed by Terry Macartney-Filgate, Stanley Jackson, and Wolf Koenig, is a pastiche of events preceding 1957's Christmas in Montreal, and includes some of the first handheld sync-sound location shooting. Terry Macartney-Filgate's The Back-breaking Leaf (1959), about migrant tobacco workers in Ontario, used more extensive sync-sound location shooting.

The Candid Eye films, together with NFB French-language productions such as Michel Brault and Gilles Groulx's Les Raquetteurs (1958), as well as the work of Robert Drew Associates in New York, Jean Rouch in Paris, and the Free Cinema filmmakers in England, began the cinéma vérité documentary movement.

Perhaps the most important cinéma vérité film made at this time was Lonely Boy (1961), directed by Wolf Koenig and Roman Kroitor and shot by Koenig. It is a portrait of Canadian teenage pop singer Paul Anka. This film experiments with sound as well as image and 'reflexively' puts the filmmakers into the story.

Although not a Unit B alumnus, ex-journalist Don Brittain becomes one of the NFB's foremost documentary filmmakers with a cinéma vérité portrait of Canada's greatest living poet in Ladies and Gentleman ... Mr Leonard Cohen (1965), codirected with Don Owen. Brittain then codirected and wrote Memorandum (1965) with cinematographer John Spotton. This film blends archival and cinéma vérité footage to create a moving testament to the Holocaust. Later in his career Brittain increasingly turned to drama documentary and TV drama in a series of CBC-NFB coproductions.

NFB's Labyrinth

The Montreal World's Fair, Expo '67, was a showcase for film experimentation and prestige multiscreen or large-screen projects. Two notable Canadian contributions were antecedents of IMAX. One was A Place to Stand (1967) by Chris Chapman, a multi-image short projected in 70mm on a large screen at the Ontario Pavilion. The other was the NFB's most ambitious project, its Labyrinth pavilion for Expo '67, created by Hugh O'Connor, Roman Kroitor, and Colin Low. They invented a cruciform, multi-image screen as well as a display on two screens at a ninety-degree angle from each other. The $4.5 million pavilion was a stunning success with more than 1.3 million visitors.

Kroitor, Graeme Ferguson, and Robert Kerr formed the Multiscreen Corporation to bring the new IMAX format to the Osaka World's Fair. Their first IMAX film was Tiger Child (1970), directed by Don Brittain. Graeme Ferguson directed North of Superior (1971), which opened the first dedicated IMAX theatre, the Cinesphere in Toronto. IMAX films are also projected in three hundred and sixty-degree dome theatres called OMNIMAX. The first 3-D IMAX film, Transitions (1986), by Colin Low and Tony Ianzelo, was produced by the NFB for Vancouver's Expo '86.

NFB's Challenge for Change

The Things I Cannot Change (1966), directed by Tanya Ballantyne, shot by Paul Leach, and produced by John Kemeny, is a cinéma vérité film about a poor Montreal family. Unfortunately, the family was ridiculed after the film was broadcast, and they decided to leave their neighbourhood. However, the film was a critical success and sparked the groundbreaking Challenge for Change (1967–80) programme of social action filmmaking developed by John Kemeny, Colin Low, and George C. Stoney.

A French counterpart, Société nouvelle, was established under producer Léonard Forest. Challenge for Change/Société nouvelle experimented with half-inch video technology as early as 1967. VTR St-Jacques (1969) by Bonnie Sherr Klein and Dorothy Henaut was produced entirely on videotape. Despite the occasional controversy, this innovative programme produced about one hundred and forty films, which encouraged communication between the disenfranchised and the decision-makers. It was renewed until 1980.

NFB and aboriginal production

Challenge for Change changed the way in which the NFB, and perhaps the country, looked at native issues when it brought together natives from across the country to learning filmmaking skills. The most significant result was The Ballad of Crowfoot (1968) by Willie Dunn, a compilation documentary of photos and old footage about the white man's broken promises. The soundtrack is a bitter ballad written and sung by Dunn.

Other important Challenge for Change films on native issues include You Are on Indian Land (1969) by Mort Ransen, which showed natives demonstrating at a Mohawk reserve on the St Lawrence River. Cree Hunters of Mistassini (1974) by Boyce Richardson and Tony Ianzelo follows Cree families at a winter camp and shows the ecological principles that guide their way of life.

The best-known aboriginal filmmaker in Canada is the NFB's Alanis Obomsawin. Her work has documented social and political problems, often providing historical context. Obomsawin made Kanehsatake: 270 Years of Resistance (1993) and Rocks at Whiskey Trench (2000) about the confrontation between natives and the military at a Mohawk reserve near Montreal.

NFB's Studio D

In 1974 Challenge for Change producer Kathleen Shannon (Working Mothers series, 1974) succeeded in setting up a feminist production studio to 'make films by, for, and about women'. Studio D was known for innovative non-theatrical distribution and controversial films. It also won more Oscars than any other NFB studio, often for content more than filmmaking style. Oscar winners are I'll Find a Way (1977) by Beverly Shaffer, who interviewed a child with spina bifida; If You Love This Planet (1983) by Terre Nash, an antinuclear war speech by Dr Helen Caldicott; and Flamenco at 5:15 (1984) by Cynthia Scott, which gives an impressionistic view of a flamenco class at the National Ballet School of Canada.

Among the studio's more controversial and popular films were Not a Love Story: A Film About Pornography (1981), by Bonnie Sherr Klein and Dorothy Henaut, and Forbidden Love: The Unashamed Stories of Lesbian Lives (1993), by Margaret Pettigrew, Aerlyn Weissman, and Lynne Fernie about the portrayal of the lesbian subculture of the 1950s and 1960s. Studio D was closed down as the NFB faced growing financial pressures in the mid-1990s.

NFB decentralization

The NFB moved its headquarters from the Ottawa sawmill to a new building in Montreal. This move had a large impact on the use of French at the Board, and the balance of relations between the linguistic groups. Guy Roberge (1957–66), former Liberal member of the Quebec National Assembly, replaced Albert Trueman (1953–7) as Government Film Commissioner and Chief Executive Officer (CEO) of the NFB. He was the first francophone Film

Commissioner and, arguably, his tenure marked the creative peak of the Board.

The NFB set up an autonomous French Production unit under Fernand Dansereau in 1962. In 1964 Pierre Juneau was appointed director of French Production and Grant McLean headed English Production. McLean dismantled the producer-run unit system in favour of the 'pool' system, which gave greater autonomy to directors through a programme committee, and decentralized program planning.

The 1965 Sheppard Report, commissioned by the government from filmmaker Gordon Sheppard, recommended that the NFB 'gradually cease to staff-produce most of its films and instead have the majority of them made by private Canadian producers and freelancers on contract' (in 'A Special Report on the Cultural Policy and Activities of the Government of Canada, 1965-66'). Partly in response to the Sheppard Report, the NFB took the first steps toward regionalization of English production by setting up an office in Vancouver under Peter Jones in 1965. Eventually, most English production was produced by regional offices from Vancouver to Halifax. Over time, regionalization and privatization had a radical impact on the NFB and Canadian filmmaking.

'Make or buy?'

The Canadian government had responded to the problems of a small and linguistically fragmented market by establishing public sector production organizations such as the NFB and CBC. The private sector producers then complained about the resources going to the public sector and successfully lobbied to have public funding schemes created to finance private or independent production such as the Canadian Film Development Corporation in 1967 (now Telefilm Canada) or the Canadian Broadcast Program Development Fund in 1983 (now the Canadian Television Fund).

This production funding was aimed at independent producers but also supported private commercial broadcasters. As a result, direct funding for vertically integrated public producers or broadcasters, such as the NFB and CBC, has declined. The government has shifted its emphasis from 'make' in the public sector to 'buy' in the private sector. Now it is often difficult to tell whether a documentary is an 'NFB film', a 'CBC film', or 'independent'.

Decline of the NFB

NFB budgets declined beginning in 1968 when the federal government announced austerity measures that reduced NFB revenues. In addition, the filmmakers and technicians organized a union and negotiated a collective agreement that increased the Board's costs. Hugo McPherson, the new Film Commissioner (1967-70), was forced to dismiss recently hired staff. Caught between ongoing financial cuts and filmmaker discontent, McPherson resigned in 1970.

French and English tensions increased during the tenure of Sydney Newman (1970-5). He was a unilingual NFB wartime producer who had worked extensively in British television drama. Despite the appointment of francophone producer André Lamy as his deputy, Newman had ongoing problems with Quebec nationalist filmmakers. André Lamy (1975-9) succeeded Newman as Film Commissioner.

In 1980 the Federal Cultural Policy Review Committee was created and chaired by Louis Applebaum and Jacques Hébert. Its 'Applebert' report suggested that the NFB had outlived its usefulness, and that all of its production should be in the private sector. The report recommended that the NFB should be scaled back to a research and training facility. NFB head James Domville (1979-84) forcefully rejected this recommendation, but the report influenced government policy.

In 1984 Minister of Communications Francis Fox released his 'National Film and Video Policy', which significantly reduced the responsibilities and size of the NFB. The Board lost control of government-sponsored films, the still photo unit, film certification, and most of its foreign offices.

The new Film Commissioner, François Macerola (1984-8), was forced to initiate more cutbacks, and he then faced a major controversy. The docudrama The Kid Who Couldn't Miss (1982) by Paul Cowan claimed that Canada's most famous World War I flying ace, Billy Bishop, had lied about the number of enemy planes he had shot down. Veterans' groups were outraged, though they could not disprove the thesis of the film. A Senate subcommittee requested that the NFB withdraw the film, but Film Commissioner Macerola refused. A compromise was reached and a credit was added to the film that it was interpretive and dramatic in nature.

After Macerola, Joan Pennefather (1989–94) became the first woman to head the NFB, and celebrated its fiftieth anniversary in 1989. Sandra MacDonald (1995–2001) replaced her and faced the most severe of many funding cut-backs in 1995 and 1996. MacDonald cut one hundred and eighty jobs, closed the Board's film laboratory, and rented out the soundstage. Jacques Bensimon served as Film Commissioner from 2001 to 2006, when in constant dollars, the budget of the NFB was about twenty-five percent of its budget in 1966. Nearly all of its productions now require some outside financing and are made by freelance filmmakers. Tom Perlmutter took over as Film Commissioner in 2007.

Canadian Broadcasting Corporation

In 1952 Canadian Broadcasting Corporation Chair and CEO Davidson Dunton launched Canadian television in Toronto and Montreal. The American television networks wanted the CBC to become their affiliate and launched a programme boycott that lasted for three months. Dunton overcame the boycott, and the CBC won the battle for control of television in Canada. TV soon became the primary distribution outlet for documentaries.

CBC public affairs series

The line between CBC documentaries and public affairs programmes has not always been clear. The development of CBC public affairs programs began with Tabloid (1953–63) and Close-Up (1957–63), which were produced by Ross McLean (no relation to the NFB's Ross McLean) and his protégées, Douglas Leiterman and Patrick Watson.

Leiterman and Watson, influenced by the cinéma vérité movement and the British programme, This Was the Week That Was (1962–3), developed the hugely popular and controversial This Hour Has Seven Days (1964–6). This programme was cancelled by the CBC in a clash between senior management and the producers over control of the programme's content and its increasingly dramatic, even theatrical, approach to journalism.

Douglas Leiterman and Patrick Watson left Canada after the programme was cancelled and worked for some years in New York. There Leiterman was involved in the development of CBS's 60 Minutes public affairs series, while Patrick Watson hosted WNET's public affairs programme The Fifty-First State. He later produced the series The Struggle for Democracy (1989–90) with Ted Remerowski, Nancy Button, and Michael Levine, which was broadcast by CBC.

Following Seven Days, the flagship CBC public affairs series has been the fifth estate (1974–). Its best-known documentary was Just Another Missing Kid (1982) by Ian Parker and John Zaritsky, which won the 1983 Academy Award. The Trouble with Evan (1994), by Neil Docherty, recorded a troubled young boy's home life using cameras attached to ceilings in his family's apartment. There was no camera crew for much of the film.

The CBC moved the twenty-two-minute national news from 11 pm to 10 pm and added a public affairs segment called The Journal (1982–92) for the balance of the hour. This new programme was produced by Mark Starowicz and proved a popular success.

The longest running public affairs series has been the science programme, The Nature of Things (1961–), first produced by James Murray. It is currently hosted by David Suzuki and called The Nature of Things with David Suzuki (1980–). This programme has been a powerful voice, and Suzuki a popular advocate for environmental issues.

CBC documentary series

As early as 1953 the CBC established a film unit in Vancouver under Stan Fox. It became a training ground for Allan King, Ron Kelly, Daryl Duke, Gene Lawrence, Arla Saare, and many others. Memorable among these early CBC documentaries was Skid Row (1956) by Allan King.

The Document (1962–9) series was also produced by Douglas Leiterman and Patrick Watson and later Richard Nielsen. It often ran cinéma vérité documentaries. Among the most powerful were The Seven Hundred Million (1964) by Patrick Watson, about China; Summer in Mississippi (1964) by Beryl Fox, about the Civil Rights movement in the US South; and Mills of the Gods: Vietnam (1965) directed by Beryl Fox, shot by Erik Durschmeid, and edited by Don Haig. This was one of the earliest films critical of the Vietnam War and it is considered by some to be the best Canadian documentary of all time.

After the demise of Document, the centre of documentary gravity in the CBC moved from Toronto to Ottawa. Cameron Graham produced a number of important series such as The Tenth Decade (1971) about Canada from 1957 to 1967; First Person Singular (1973 and 1975), with Munroe Scott, the memoirs of former Prime Minister Lester Pearson; The Days Before Yesterday (1973), with Brian Nolan, Scott, and Ed Reid, about Canadian history in the first half of the twentieth century; and The Canadian Establishment (1980–1) with Marrin Canell, Ted Remerowski, and Peter Pearson and based on Peter C. Newman's book. James Murray produced the extremely popular The National Dream (1974) narrated by Pierre Berton and based on his history of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Besides The Journal, Mark Starowicz produced an hour-long anthology documentary series called Witness (1982–2003). This was the major venue for one-off prime-time documentaries on the English network and included documentaries from Canada and around the world.

The most ambitious documentary series the CBC ever attempted was the international coproduction Canada: A People's History (2000). This seventeen-part series included dramatic sequences in both languages and was the brainchild of Mark Starowicz. It became a popular event attracting as many as 2.3 million English-speaking viewers.

Controversial CBC documentaries

As a public broadcaster, controversial subjects often generate a great deal of criticism for the CBC. Therefore, management has sometimes been hesitant to broadcast a documentary that it feared would cause controversy. More recently, the nature of the criticism, and the CBC's reaction to it, has changed.

The CBC refused to broadcast Mr Pearson (1964) by Dick Ballentine and shot by Donn Pennebaker. This cinéma vérité portrait showed the Prime Minister in a sometimes unflattering light and was not broadcast until 1969, after Alphonse Ouimet had stepped down as president of the CBC.

The cinéma vérité classic Warrendale (1967), by Allan King, is about a controversial home for disturbed kids. It was never broadcast by the CBC because the children in the film used profanity. King then made the cinéma vérité A Married Couple (1969), shot by Richard Leiterman, about a disintegrating marriage. Gradually, he moved into dramatic films.

Perhaps the most influential CBC documentary was Air of Death (1967) by Larry Gosnell. This film raised questions about air pollution in a small Ontario town and helped start the environmental movement in Canada. It was attacked by the Ontario government and the industries in question. The federal regulator (CRTC) held a major hearing in 1969 to review the criticisms. The CBC stood by the programme and said that a democratic society needed to see minority, or controversial, opinions. The CRTC agreed.

The Valour and the Horror (1992) was a brilliant series of three feature documentaries with dramatic segments. The series was a CBC, NFB, and Gala-film coproduction directed by Brian McKenna with Terrence McKenna and produced by Arnie Gelbart, André Lamy, Darce Fardy, Adam Symansky, and D'Arcy O'Connor. Particularly controversial was the episode Death by Moonlight (1992), which maintained that the bombing campaign against Germany was deliberately planned by Air Marshall Athur Harris to maximize civilian casualties. Veterans' organizations were outraged, though they couldn't dispute the facts cited, and Senator Jack Marshall investigated. The CBC seemed to indicate that it would be more careful in the future, especially with dramatic reenactments in documentaries. Together with the NFB's The Kid Who Couldn't Miss, it would seem that revisionist military history is the most sensitive subject on Canadian television.

Theatrical feature documentaries

The subjects of Canadian feature documentaries have evolved over the decades, from royal visits, wildlife, and shipwrecks to more controversial subjects. As the economics of the industry changed, feature documentaries also moved from NFB productions to NFB coproductions and independent films.

Theatrical dramas have also been influenced by Canadian documentary style, particularly in the 1960s and 1970s. Examples include the NFB's Nobody Waved Goodbye (1964) by Don Owen and the independent Goin' Down the Road (1970) by Don Shebib.

The NFB's The Royal Journey (1951), directed by David Bairstow, Gudrun Parker, and Roger Blais, recorded the visit of Princess Elizabeth and Prince Philip to Canada and the United States. It was shot in the new Eastman color negative stock. In three months, more than two million people saw The Royal Journey in theatres, and it became Canada's most successful theatrical documentary feature.

Naturalist Bill Mason's NFB feature documentary about raising wolves, Cry of the Wild (1972), became a surprise hit, opening in five hundred American theatres. It grossed $4.5 million in North America.

Budge Crawley had built the largest private film company in Canada on sponsored films, but he always had larger ambitions and wanted to produce features. Janis (1974), produced by Crawley and directed by Howard Alk and Seaton Findlay, is a compilation documentary on the life of singer Janis Joplin before her untimely death in 1970. The Man Who Skied Down Everest (1975) was produced and directed by Crawley from footage he acquired of Japanese skier Yuichiro Miura attempting to ski down Everest. It won the Oscar for best feature documentary.

Peter Wintonick and Mark Achbar coproduced with the NFB a magnum opus on Noam Chomsky titled Manufacturing Consent: Noam Chomsky and the Media (1992). This film found clever visual metaphors to demonstrate Chomsky's ideas about the media, as well as his life as a public intellectual. Despite its length and subject, it grossed about $1 million in theatres worldwide.

Titanica (1992) was produced by Stephen Low and Pietro Serapiglia and directed by Stephen Low. It is a feature IMAX documentary about the exploration of the wreck of the Titanic. It has been one of the highest-grossing Canadian films.

Independent filmmaker Ron Mann has explored a range of marginal cultures through his feature documentaries. These include Poetry in Motion (1982), Comic Book Confidential (1988), and Grass (2000), which is about marijuana.

A Place Called Chiapas (1999) by Vancouver filmmaker Nettie Wild, was produced with Kirk Tougas and Betsy Carson. It is a cinéma vérité look at the Zapatista uprising in Mexico that takes a strong political position.

Another independent Vancouver production, The Corporation (2003), directed by Mark

Achbar and Jennifer Abbott, written by Joel Bakan, and produced by Bart Simpson, takes a critical look at capitalism by psychoanalysing the corporation. It has grossed nearly $5 million in theatres worldwide.

At present, the audience for theatrical feature-length documentaries has never been greater or more interested in seeing a uncompromising point of view, as The Corporation and Michael Moore's Fahrenheit 9/11 have shown.

Television explosion: the best of times and the worst of times

Between 1952 and the arrival of commercial television in 1960, the CBC was the only television outlet for documentaries. As a public broadcaster, it accepted its responsibility to broadcast public affairs and documentaries. In general, the commercial channels were not interested in documentaries and preferred scheduling dramas, usually from the United States, which could attract larger audiences.

In 1970 the first provincial educational channel was set up in Ontario, TVOntario, and this was followed by a similar educational channel in Quebec in 1974, Télé-Québec. These, and other provincial channels that followed, increased the market for documentaries, but they could not pay as much as national broadcasters.

Three fundamental changes occurred in the broadcasting landscape in the 1980s and 1990s that increased the demand for, and supply of, Canadian documentaries. First, in 1983 the federal government set up the Canadian Broadcast Program Development Fund (now called the Canadian Television Fund) with $35 million to support independent television production. Some of this money, as well as tax benefits, was available for documentaries. The creation of these funds shifted the balance of financial power from public broadcasters and the NFB, which faced ongoing cutbacks, to commercial broadcasters. This trend to private broadcasters also increased the industrialization of documentary production and commercialization of subjects, including 'reality TV'.

Second, in 1984 the federal broadcast regulator (CRTC), began licensing 'specialty channels', which were distributed by satellite and cable. In 1987 the CBC's second channel, Newsworld, was licensed, along with Vision TV, a multi-faith channel. These were followed by other specialty channels that depended heavily on documentaries such as Discovery Channel (1994), Bravo (1994), and the History Channel (1996). In 2000 the NFB and CBC became minority partners with a private broadcaster in The Documentary Channel, a specialty digital cable network. Although these channels increased the demand for documentaries, this market fragmentation lowered the average fees paid to documentary producers.

Third, documentary production was revolutionized by videotape and digital technology. These technological changes reduced the cost of production compared to film. Yet the supply of new funding, through a complicated network of tax credits and production funds, could not keep pace with demand created by a cascade of new specialty channels. As a result of these technological and market changes the average budget for Canadian documentaries fell rapidly in the last few decades of the twentieth century, while audiences for documentaries increased both on television and in theatres.

Faced with deteriorating budgets and working conditions, independent documentary filmmakers started an organization in Toronto in 1983 to lobby on their behalf. Called the Canadian Independent Film Caucus (CIFC), it created Point of View magazine in 1991 and the Hot Docs film festival in 1993. The CIFC expanded nationally in 1995 and changed its name in 2003 to the Documentary Organization of Canada.

Canada Carries On

Canada Carries On is the title given to the first major program of films undertaken by the National Film Board of Canada (NFB). The brainchild of NFB founder and Commissioner John Grierson and his chief lieutenant, Stuart Legg, it was initiated immediately after Canada's entry into World War II and continued long afterward. Sixty-two films were made for the series during the war, and one hundred and thirty-six after the war. The wartime phase of the series is its most significant.

Grierson put Legg in charge of the series. Legg directed, edited, and wrote the early entries, and throughout the war the series reflected Legg's approach to filmmaking. The films' style was inspired by the American March of Time series. They were compilation films, made from a combination of original footage, Allied combat footage, captured enemy footage, and other material that poured into the Film Board's vaults during the war. The first film in the series, Atlantic Patrol (1940), used some original footage but mostly stock footage from the Canadian Navy. The next two films, Letter from Aldershot (1940) and The Home Front (1940), used mostly original footage but some stock material. Whatever the particular mix of footage, the films were fast-paced and ranged from ten to twenty-two minutes long. They contained little or no dialogue and were narrated somewhat bombastically by Lorne Greene. Structurally they aimed to capture the audience's full attention early on, then rising in intensity, leading to a climactic ending. They were essentially filmed lectures, but the rich variety of footage, deft editing, solid writing, and other production values, such as original music, rendered them highly watchable.

The original aim of the series was to build and sustain Canadian morale by dramatizing Canada's war effort. Although the series emphasized Canada, however, it portrayed Canada's war efforts in relation to the world, and a few of the films had little or no Canadian content. The films displayed an intellectual boldness that often led to controversy for the NFB. When they were criticized for acknowledging the military strength of the Axis powers, Grierson countered that to deny the strength of the enemy would undermine the films' credibility. Occasionally, the perceived ideology of the films upset politicians and government officials.

Churchill's Island (1941), about the defense of Britain, made use of British material and footage from captured Germans. It presents the Germans as a ferocious enemy, but the British as determined and able to repel them. It was regarded at the time as innovative in its treatment of its subject a whole, and it won a special Academy Award in 1942. Geopolitik: Hitler's Plan for Empire (1942) also shows Germany as a formidable enemy while exemplifying the broader view that Grierson and Legg wanted the series to project, and it probably stands up even today as reliable history. The Gates of Italy (1943) was alleged to be soft on fascism because it lauds Italian culture and history and treats the Italian people warmly, praising them for honesty and lamenting their suffering. The film quotes contemptuous remarks about Hitler by Mussolini, but it also portrays Mussolini as a fool. Other films provoked charges of communist sympathies.

The analytical caliber of the series, as well as its creative energy, was exemplified in War Clouds in the Pacific (1941). Compiled from stock footage, the film predicted, against prevailing expert opinion, a Japanese attack on North America. Ten days after the film's release in late November, the Japanese attacked Pearl Harbor. Suddenly the film was in demand in the United States. The NFB released the film there under a new series title, The World in Action, which became a free-standing series in its own right for the duration of the war. The new series closely resembled Canada Carries On, the main difference being that while the original series emphasized Canada in relation to the world, the new series emphasized the world in relation to Canada; however, it is sometimes difficult to tell from the film itself to which series it belonged.

Legg took over The World in Action, and Canada Carries On was turned over to Canadian filmmakers Sydney Newman and Guy Glover. They employed a range of Canadian directors, put more Canadian content into the films, and loosened them up stylistically. Lorne Greene was dropped as the narrator. Post-synchronized sound effects began to be used, as in Ordeal by Ice (1945). After the war the series continued, but grew increasingly parochial and dull. By the late 1950s it had become somewhat eclectic. Some outstanding films, such as Corral (1954), although not initiated by the series, were appropriated for it and distributed under its title, as were various animation films such as The Romance of Transportation in Canada (1953).

Canada, French

The history of documentary film practice in French Canada is closely related to the history of the National Film Board of Canada (NFB). Although the NFB, from its inception in 1939 to the mid-1950s, focused almost exclusively on English-language productions, the relocation of its headquarters from Ottawa (Ontario) to Montréal (Québec) in 1956 had a profound impact on francophone documentary filmmaking. In fact, the move to Montréal could be seen as marking the beginning of the documentary in Québec. Undoubtedly, the period immediately after the 1956 move represents something of a 'golden age' in the history of French-language cinema in Canada. However, a documentary practice in Québec can be traced back to at least the 1930s, and the foundations laid during the early years of the sound film had a lasting influence on the documentaries made by the NFB's équipe française starting in the late 1950s.

The three most important figures of the 'pre-NFB' era in French Canada are Maurice Proulx (1902–88), Paul Provencher (1902–81), and Albert Tessier (1895–1976), all of whom made their first documentaries in the 1930s. The former, a priest educated at Université Laval and Cornell University, is primarily associated with the conservative Union National government of Maurice Duplessis (Premier of Québec from 1936 to 1959, with a brief interruption during World War II). Proulx was often commissioned by governmental agencies to make films on agricultural, religious, and touristic topics. His most famous work, En pays neufs/In New Lands (1937), the first feature-length sound documentary made in Canada, glorifies the life and work of settlers in the developing Abitibi region of northwest Québec. Although the voice-over commentary comes across as little more than a conservative propagandist lecture on the virtues of rural traditions and Catholic faith, the images of Abitibi evoke a strong sense of place and belonging that influenced later filmmakers. Bernard Devlin's (1923–83) Les brûlés/The Promised Land (1958), one of the first significant films made by the NFB after the move to Montréal, was directly inspired by En pays neufs in its depiction of settlers in Abitibi; and in the mid-1970s, Pierre Perrault (1927–99), one of the central figures of the francophone documentary after 1960, borrowed images from Proulx's film for his Le retour à la terre/Back to the Land (1976) about the failure of the Abitibi developments of the 1930s.

Other NFB films by Perrault also bear witness to the influence of the ethnographic tradition established by Paul Provencher in the 1930s. A forestry expert by trade, Provencher spent thirty-five years making films on nature and Native people. His Les Montagnais/The Montagnais (1935) and Les scènes montagnaises/Montagnais scenes (1936) were perhaps the first attempts by a French-Canadian filmmaker to produce authentic documents on the customs and rituals of Amerindians. Perrault's Le goût de la farine/The Taste of Flour (1977), with Bernard Gosselin (1934–2006) and Le pays de la terre sans arbre ou le Mouchouânipi/The Land without trees, or Mouchouanipi (1980), Arthur Lamothe's (b. 1928) series of documentaries Chronique des Indiens du Nord-Est du Québec/Chronicle of North-Eastern Quebec Indians (1973–83), as well as the films of Native cineaste Alanis Obomsawin (b. 1932) follow in the footsteps of Provencher, whom Jean-Claude Labrecque (b.1938) nicknamed Le dernier coureur des bois in his 1979 film portrait of the documentary pioneer.

Albert Tessier shared Provencher's interest in nature and the relationship between people and their natural environment, but Tessier's interest was less ethnographic than poetic. Tessier wanted to celebrate the beauty of his country to arouse in his audience an emotional connection to the ancestral land, the terroir. Many of his films, such as Hommage à notre paysannerie/A Tribute to Our Peasantry (1938), show images of simple Québec folk, working on the farm or sharing a meal. Tessier was a priest like Proulx, but his documentary practice was quite different. He was never commissioned to make films and was less didactic than his contemporary, preferring the panegyric to the lecture. He made amateur films that he distributed himself. The visual style of his work is perhaps best described as rustic. He never used a tripod, artificial lighting or preconceived scenarios and always preferred spontaneity to classical aesthetics. As such, he has been recognized by Québec film historians such as Yves Lever (Histoire générale du cinéma au Québec), as the precursor of cinéma direct, the most important documentary movement to occur after the move of the NFB to Montréal. Perhaps not surprisingly, some shots from Tessier's early films bear an uncanny resemblance to images from landmark works of cinéma direct, such as Perrault and Michel Brault's (b. 1928) Pour la suite du monde/The Moontrap (1963). Tessier's films of the 1930s and 1940s had shown with candor a way of life that was prevalent in Québec until the end of World War II but that had become obsolete by the 1960s. In Pour la suite du monde, Brault and Perrault sought both to recapture this disappearing tradition—here the tradition of beluga whale hunting formerly practiced by the inhabitants of Île-aux-Coudres—and to reproduce the qualities of spontaneity, intimacy, and respectfulness that Tessier had displayed twenty-five years earlier.

Michel Brault was among the new generation of francophone filmmakers who joined the NFB in 1956, and he quickly emerged as the leading cinematographer of cinéma direct. In 1957–8 Brault worked on the Candid Eye series developed by the anglophone filmmakers of the NFB's renowned Unit B, who used recently developed, lighter film equipment to capture people in everyday situations with spontaneity and free from judgmental commentary. After shooting the milestone Candid Eye film The Days Before Christmas (1958, Terence Macartney-Filgate (b. 1924), Stanley Jackson (1914–81), and Wolf Koenig (b. 1927)), Brault codirected with Gilles Groulx (1931–94) Les Raquetteurs/The Snowshoers (1958), about a congress of snowshoeing clubs in Sherbrooke (Québec).

In both its form and its content, this film marked a turning point in Québec documentary. Unlike the Candid Eye films, which sought to observe everyday activities from a distance, Les Raquetteurs attempted to show the event from within. The film's innovative visual style resulted from Brault's use of a handheld camera equipped with a wide-angle lens to shoot the subjects from up close. He walked amongst the snowshoers and their entourage, capturing with immediacy their conversations and interactions. Breaking with the Griersonian rules of expository documentary, replacing rhetorical narrative and authoritative composition with a sense of picaresque spontaneity, Brault and Groulx made a film that endeavored to evince the customs and rituals of French Canadians as a gesture of national affirmation.

On the eve of the Quiet Revolution—the period of liberalization and modernization that followed the fall of the Duplessis regime in 1960 and marked the beginning of Québec's separatist movement—Les Raquetteurs was hailed as a sort of manifesto for a home-grown film practice that could show real people (vrai monde) and contribute to their emancipation. Until the 1980s the nationalist aspirations introduced by Groulx and Brault would remain the unofficial mandate of most French-speaking filmmakers working at the NFB. Immediately after Les Raquetteurs numerous NFB documentaries tried to reproduce, to various degrees, its style and nationalist purpose. La Lutte/Wrestling (1961, Brault, Marcel Carrière (b. 1935), Claude Fournier (b. 1931), and Claude Jutra (1930–86)), Golden Gloves (1961, Groulx), and Québec-USA ou l'invasion pacifique/Visit to a Foreign Country (1962, Brault, Jutra) are but a few examples of films that took as their subject matter the mundane but important communal practices of French Canadians to assert, more or less explicitly, the distinct culture of Québec. Les raquetteurs also had an impact beyond the frontiers of Québec. A screening at the Flaherty Seminar in 1959 inspired Jean Rouch to develop his conception of cinéma vérité and led him to invite Brault to film Chronique d'un été/Chronicle of a Summer (1961) in France. For the first time in the history of Québec cinema, French Canadian filmmakers were at the vanguard of an international movement that included such significant filmmakers as Rouch, D.A. Pennebaker, Richard Leacock, Robert Drew, and the Maysles brothers.

The year 1963 marked the culmination of cinéma direct. First, the term itself was officially adopted at the MIPE TV (Marché International des Programmes et Équipements) in Lyon to clarify the confusion surrounding the term cinéma vérité. Furthermore, the NFB's first feature-length cinéma direct documentary, Pour la suite du monde, was released and presented at the Cannes Film Festival. With this film, Perrault became one of the few Québec filmmakers to find a place within the high-brow discourse of French film theory through the work of writers such as Gilles Deleuze and Jean-Louis Comolli. Finally cinéma direct took a turn toward fiction with Claude Jutra's New Wave-inspired feature, A tout prendre/Take It All (1963), one of the few productions of the early 1960s made outside the NFB. Jutra used techniques of direct cinema to tell the convoluted love story of a young French Canadian bourgeois repressing his homosexuality, and his girlfriend who claims to be from Haiti. The next year, Groulx made Le chat dans le sac/The Cat in the Bag (1964), an even more explicit hybrid of direct cinema and fiction. Groulx actually used funds allocated by the NFB for the production of a short documentary on how young people spend their time during the winter to make his feature-length drama on the nationalist awakening of a Québecois intellectual and the disintegration of his relationship with an English-speaking Jewish woman. These two films are often acknowledged as marking the beginning of modern Québec fiction cinema. Starting in the mid-1960s, many cinéastes left documentary practice and followed Groulx's and Jutra's lead to produce fictions that adopted cinéma direct's visual style. To this day, much of Québec's narrative cinema still exhibits a degree of documentary realism.

Those who continued to make documentaries used direct cinema techniques to create increasingly political films, thus shedding any claim to objectivity that earlier productions might have harbored. Furthermore, the observatory mode of direct cinema started being replaced by a more interactive and self-reflexive approach, with the filmmakers' involvement with their subjects becoming more explicitly acknowledged. Tanya Ballantyne's (b. 1944) English-language The Things I Cannot Change (1966) is worth mentioning here as a precursor for two important developments. On the one hand, this film about a poverty-stricken family in Montréal did not only observe but denounced the unbearable conditions in which these people live. Such proactive use of documentary eventually became the official mandate of the NFB's program Société nouvelle/Challenge for Change, established in 1969 to foster social improvement. This program, which lasted until 1979, sponsored film and video productions in French and English Canada that dealt with everything from the disenfranchisement of immigrants and terminal illness, to child abuse and the struggle of French-speaking Acadians in the largely anglophone Maritime provinces east of Québec. The Société nouvelle films often encouraged the full participation of the public, even at the level of production.

On the other hand, as the first feature-length documentary directed by a woman in Canada, The Things I Cannot Change paved the way for the emergence of a feminist voice at the NFB. A year after Ballantyne's film, Anne Claire Poirier (b. 1932) directed the feature De mère en fille/Mother-to-Be (1967), which dealt with the issue of pregnancy and maternity and is generally recognized as the first French-Canadian feminist documentary. Poirier consolidated her position as the leading figure of feminist cinema in Québec by producing the six-film series En tant que femme, sponsored by Société nouvelle from 1972 to 1975, which laid solid foundations upon which women's cinema could grow in French Canada. Poirier's most famous film is Mourir à tue-tête/Scream from Silence (1979), a powerful and controversial docudrama on the tragic effects of rape.

Controversy often accompanied the more politically radical documentaries of the late 1960s and 1970s. Some films, such as Jacques Leduc's (b. 1941) Cap d'espoir/Cape Hope (1969), Denys Arcand's (b. 1941) On est au coton/Cotton Mill, Treadmill (1970) and Groulx's 24 heures ou plus ... /24 hours or more ... (1973) were literally banned from circulation for a few years by NFB commissioner Sydney Newman because of their putative Marxist critique of Canadian society. In fact, Arcand's defeatist perspective on the textile workers' struggle in On est au coton undermines any Marxist agenda that the film might have had, but it doubtlessly remains a caustic condemnation of capitalism in Québec. Arcand was equally caustic in his documentary on Québec politics, Québec: Duplessis et après ... / Québec: Duplessis and After ... (1972), which argues that the right-wing ideology of Maurice Duplessis was still present in the post-Quiet Revolution 1970s, even in the supposedly left-wing platform of the separatist Parti Québécois. With this film Arcand managed to attract criticism from both sides of the political spectrum. Arcand's Le confort et l'indifférence/Comfort and Indifference (1981) was also controversial in its commentary on the failure of the 1980 referendum on Québec's independence (sixty percent voted against Québec's sovereignty). Arguing that sovereignist Premier René Lévesque (in power from 1976 to 1985) misread the population's seeming enthusiasm for separation, Arcand was reproached by nationalists for his claim that Québeckers were more interested in personal gratification than social and political issues, a point he reasserted in his fiction film Le déclin de l'empire américain/Decline of the American Empire (1986). In 1992 Jacques Godbout (b. 1933) came to a similar acknowledgment of political apathy in his documentary Le mouton noir/The Black Sheep, on the 1990 failure of the Meech Lake Accord, which proposed to grant special status to Québec in the Canadian federation.

Whether Arcand's analysis of the failure of the first referendum is accurate remains debatable, but the 1980s and 1990s were certainly characterized by a pull away from Québec politics on the part of documentarians and an increased interest either in private questions or international issues. In a number of documentaries, individual experiences became more important than the collective condition of the people of Québec. Jean Beaudry (b. 1947), François Bouvier (b. 1948), and Marcel Simard's (b. 1945) Une classe sans école/A Class Without a School (1980) on high school dropouts, Guy Simoneau (b. 1953) and Suzanne Guy's (b. 1956) On n'est pas des anges/We're No Angels (1981), on the sexual life of handicapped people, Michel Audy's (b. 1957) Crever à 20 ans/Dead at 20 (1984) on male prostitution, and Gilles Blais's (b. 1941) Les adeptes/The Followers (1981), on the initiation of three young people in the Krishna religious sect, are all early signs of this shift toward the personal experience of marginalized characters. Bernard Emond's (b. 1951) Ceux qui ont le pas léger meurent sans laisser de trace/ Those with a Light Step Go Without a Trace (1992), about an anonymous man in an urban wasteland, and André Cazabon's Enfer et contre tous/No Quick Fix (2000), which documents the struggle of drug addicts and their parents, are more recent examples of this interest in individuals on the margins of society. Marginalised celebrities, if such an oxymoron can be used, also became the focus of several films, such as in Jacques Leduc's Albédo/Albedo (1982) about a little-known photographer, Serge Giguère's (b. 1946) Oscar Thifault (1987) about a folk singer, and Le roi du drum/King of Drums (1991) about an eccentric jazz musician, as well as in Pierre Falardeau (b. 1946) and Manon Leriche's Le steak/The Steak (1992) about an aging professional boxer. Introspection started to appear in several films, as in Marilú Mallet's (b. 1944) Journal inachevé/Unfinished Diary (1982) a film diary, Michka Saäl's L'arbre qui dort rêve à ses racines/A Sleeping Tree Dreams of its Roots (1992) about the personal experiences of cultural displacement, Esther Valiquette's Le singe bleu/The Measure of Your Passage (1992) about the personal journey of a woman diagnosed with AIDS, and Anne Claire Poirier's Tu as crié LET ME GO/You Screamed: LET ME GO (1997), a moving reflection on the violent death of the filmmaker's daughter in a drug-related dispute. These films often have little in common with the cinéma direct tradition. Le singe bleu, for instance, is much closer to experimental film aesthetics than to Les Raquetteurs.

At the opposite end of the spectrum, but equally far from the nationalist politics of pre-1980 productions, documentaries on international or global issues have emerged in large numbers during the last twenty years. Although the NFB has long produced films on international subjects, including Jutra's Niger, jeune république/Niger—Young Republic (1961) and Louis Portugais's (1932–82) Alger 1962—chronique d'un conflit/Algeria 1962—Chronicle of a Conflict (1962), such topics became increasingly common after 1980. Films such as Diane Beaudry's (b. 1946) L'autre muraille/The Great Wall of Tradition (1986) about the condition of Chinese women, Laurette Deschamps's (b. 1936) La fin d'un long silence/No longer Silent (1986) about women in India, and Louise Carré's (b. 1936) Mon coeur est témoin ... au pays des femmes des mondes musulmans/My Heart is My Witness (1996) have extended feminist discourses far beyond the frontiers of Canada. Political documentaries have also focused their criticism on the broken promises of free trade agreements and the threat of globalization on marginal cultures. From Godbout's Un monologue Nord-Sud/A North-South Monologue (1982) to Magnus Isacson's (b. 1948) Le nouvel habit de l'empereur/The Emperor's New Clothes (1995) and Vue du sommet/View from the Summit (2001), a large portion of engagé documentaries are now used as symbolic weapons in the struggle against globalization.

There are obviously a few relatively recent documentaries that still deal with specifically French-Canadian questions. These films, however, often adopt the disillusioned perspective of Jean-François Mercier's Disparaître/Vanishing (1989), a veritable requiem for French-Canadian culture. Georges Payrastre's Parlons franc/Frankly Speaking (1992), Stéphane Drolet's Référendum—prise 2/take 2/Referendum—Take 2/Prise 2 (1996), and Marie-Claire Dugas's L'Eternité? ou la disparition d'une culture/Eternity? Or the Disappearance of a Culture (2000) all express strong doubts regarding the ability of francophone cultures to survive in an overwhelmingly English-speaking North America.

Cane Toads: An Unnatural History(Australia, Lewis, 1988)

Cane Toads: An Unnatural History was Mark Lewis's first 'feature' documentary, and probably the most commercially successful Australian documentary film ever released. It has been screened at film festivals and has enjoyed significant worldwide television and video sales. From its inception as a television documentary, Cane Toads was pitched at a commercial audience, with all the attendant marketing considerations taken into account (Stott 1990: 103).

The Bufo marinus, introduced to Queensland from Hawaii to combat pests attacking the sugar cane crop, is a real threat to the environment of northern Australia. With the release of Lewis's film, the cane toad also entered the Australian and international imagination as fictional kitsch symbol, emblematic of everything from colonization and regional identity to environmental neglect and tourism. Former journalist Lewis worked closely with Glenys Rowe, a publicist with Film Australia, in a collaborative venture that emphasized the marketing potential of such a film. They flew in Betty, a live cane toad, to accompany Lewis on a day-time variety show. They sent one hundred stuffed cane toads to journalists who were to attend the media previews and had T-shirts, badges, and radio advertisements, replete with cane toad noises, produced to facilitate publicity (Stott 1990: 104).

Like the films of Errol Morris, Cane Toads uses the rhetorical devices of a range of fiction and nonfiction films to render a multiperspective account of this environmental and social phenomenon. In this regard, Lewis is as interested in the broader cane toad 'culture' that can be ascertained only through interviews with so-called expert interviewees and the rendering of this (un)natural being as it stands within the cultural world. While the film constantly oscillates between a topic that is a serious and major threat to the environment and rhetoric that fictionalizes and diminishes any such threat, Cane Toads successfully enlarges the issues at hand to appeal to a wide range of audiences.

Self-conscious in its form, Cane Toads teeters on the brink of 'mockumentary' without the hollowness of topic that is featured in the likes of This is Spinal Tap, melding formal satire with savage social critique in the manner of films such as Roger & Me and The Thin Blue Line. Because of its scope, the film has been used in environmental studies, Australian history, documentary film theory and criticism, biology, and cultural studies, successfully negotiating the borders these disciplines have attempted to erect for themselves. In keeping with the multidisciplinary applications of the film, Cane Toads exists in a space between independent film and commercial, mainstream television documentary and therefore extends both the Griersonian traditions of social imperative and those of commercial entertainment (McMurchy 1994: 198).

Canudo, Ricciotto

An Italian expatriate who settled in Paris in 1901 and a friend of artists such as Apollinaire and Gabriele D'Annunzio, Marcel L'Herbier, and Jean Cocteau, Ricciotto Canudo was a multitalented intellectual. He was a poet and a novelist; a prolific critic of art, literature, music, and cinema; a theorist; a trendsetter; and a vivacious cultural mover. Canudo is, with Boleslaw Matuszewski, one of the first intellectuals to acknowledge the artistic quality of the cinema and to attempt a definition of the specificity of its language. He is particularly well known for having coined the fortunate expression 'seventh art' (and, as some claim, photogénie), and for his pioneering vision of cinema as the total art that presents characteristics of all the other arts, and that merges the arts of 'space' (architecture, painting, sculpture) and those of 'time' (music, dance, poetry), synthesizing and superseding them (Canudo 1995: 161–4).

Canudo is probably the first theorist to have pointed to the necessity of distinguishing between types of films and to have attempted a classification of the genres—a classification in which he gave particular relevance to the documentary (Canudo 1995: 334–5). It is opportune to read his contribution on two levels: against the backdrop of the theorization on modernist documentary filmmaking in France in the 1920s and against the backdrop of Canudo's own theoretical framework, which is split between the idea of a 'pure cinema', the ultimate purpose of which is the representation of inner life through the creation of a high aesthetic and poetic emotion, and the conception of cinema as the perfect expression of the dynamism, speed, and scientism of modern life.

French modernist documentary filmmaking, which produced films such as Alberto Cavalcanti's Rien que les heures/Nothing but the Hours (1926) and Jean Vigo's A propos de

Nice/On Nice (1930), was influenced by poetic impressionism and by naturalism. These influences are evident in the use of terminology and in the ideas that informed the articles and reviews of critics of the time, such as Hubert Revol and André Sauvage. Canudo was no exception; he saw the documentary as particularly suited for representing nature. Its mission was to show the relationship of humans with their environment (Canudo 1995: 303–5). 'Such a mission clearly draws on the French naturalist and realist tradition, and illustrates the extent to which these documentaries constituted a bridge between impressionist modernism and naturalist pictorialism' (Aitken 2001: 73).

In particular, Canudo's conception of the documentary is partly 'poetic' and partly 'historical'. He defined the documentary as both the true art film (Canudo 1995: 222) and—abhorring the melodramatic style of costume dramas at that time—as the true historical film (Canudo 1995: 183). In a review of W.G. Barker's London by Night (1913), Canudo noticed that the best documentaries are able to reconcile the 'commercial instinct of the cinema with a vast and exact expression of life' (Canudo 1995: 259). He repeatedly praised the documentary for its ability to elicit emotion and even attain the tragic. Rather than being confined to the lower status of intermission filler, as was the practice in Canudo's time, the documentary must inspire 'new dramas' (Canudo 1995: 222, 237). In an article about some documentaries of the early 1920s, including Flaherty's Nanook of the North (1922), he praised them for having reached a level of expression far superior to that of contemporary fiction films: 'more moving, more "direct" than all the most pathetic plot complications that the poets have ever imagined' (Canudo 1979: 20). He singled out the 'prodigious' Nanook, in which he admired the depiction of the struggle between humans and the elements, and which he compared to Aeschylus's tragedies, but then extended his praise to all travel and mountaineering documentaries: 'The voyages around the world, the "documentaries" of the well-known lakes and famous sites[...] have acquired a personality and are loved by all audiences. They attain the dimension of tragedies' (Canudo 1995: 222). Canudo's idea of the tragic quality of documentaries reflects his belief that these should 'transcend the limitations of the photographic reportage and transfigure the contingency of the observed phenomenon, communicating to the spectator universal meanings' (Boschi 1988: 149), as is true for Nanook, in which 'the Everyday Tragedy of polar man spreads out into the emotion of the entire world' (Canudo 1979: 20), as well as for the minor A l'assaut du mont Everest/The Assault on Mount Everest (1922), which shows 'the tragedy of the struggling man, only armed of the weapon of his courage, against the formidable power of nature' (Canudo 1995: 222).

With the documentary format, Canudo distinguished the biographical film, the war documentary, the propaganda film, and the scientific film. A biographical film (or 'retrospective documentary', as he also called it) that has been reviewed by Canudo is Jean Epstein's Pasteur (1922), which for the author showed how this type of film is, once again, 'a drama of the struggle of man against the hostility of evil' (Canudo 1995: 216). War documentaries are particularly valued by the author and are seen as being in between contemporary epic and novel journalism, with the camera operator depicted as the heroic witness of the human tragedy of the war (Canudo 1995: 229–31). The propaganda film, instead, a sort of biased subgenre of the war documentary, is for the author the cinematographic equivalent of the newspaper article. The cinema is destined to replace the printed newspaper with a product that will be suitable for 'unintelligent and utterly illiterate people' (Canudo 1995: 229). In line with the 'fascination with the science film [that] since the mid-1920s French avant-garde film circles had developed' (Barnard 2000: 14), as well as with his own conception of the cinema as educational art, Canudo also pointed to the importance of the use of film in popularizing great discoveries and scientific advancements (Canudo 1995: 167–8), as well as in the diffusion of visual knowledge of other peoples (Canudo 1995: 325).

Capra, Frank

Initially known for his Hollywood features, Frank Capra became recognized as a documentary filmmaker through his famous Why We Fight series, which he made between 1942 and 1945. Capra also produced and directed a series of military informational films entitled Know Your Ally/Know Your Enemy during the war, but these motion pictures were not as critically acclaimed. His wartime documentaries differed substantially from those made by other Hollywood directors in the military at this time. Filmmakers John Ford, William Wellman, and John Huston shot their footage in actual combat zones, thereby capturing the immediacy of the war, but Frank Capra's films were produced from behind the lines. The Why We Fight pictures were compilation documentaries that used 'found footage' to inform new soldiers as to why they were being asked to fight.

Frank Capra was commissioned as a major in the US Army Signal Corps in 1942, where General George Marshall assigned him the task of making informational films for the war effort.

Never having made documentaries, Capra educated himself on the subject by looking at propaganda films produced by the enemy. He was particularly affected by Leni Riefenstahl's classic Nazi propaganda film, Triumph of the Will (1935). Capra was both impressed with how Riefenstahl artfully conveyed her message through film and appalled at the way she used the medium to promote Adolph Hitler and the Nazi party.

Although Frank Capra had no qualms about attacking Riefenstahl's dogma, he was concerned about his method for rebuttal. Unlike Riefenstahl, Capra did not have the unlimited resources of his government to produce propaganda. He also felt challenged by the fact that while the enemy could tell lies, his documentaries had a moral obligation to uphold the truths of a free society.

Capra justified becoming a propagandist by taking a position similar to that of John Grierson. He envisioned himself as an educator who was using propaganda to teach. Instead of staging expensive sequences for the camera, Capra became a spin doctor who reedited found footage taken from enemy propaganda films to promote his own ideological views. The seven Why We Fight films were presented as a series of history lessons in which Capra contrasted the negative philosophy and behavior of the Axis powers with the positive alternative of the Allies. Originally intended to be used solely as instructional films for raw recruits, these documentaries were so effective in delivering their message that they were shown to civilian audiences in the United States and to millions of viewers overseas.

Although Frank Capra claimed to have had qualms about making propaganda films during World War II, he is considered one of the most ideological Hollywood directors of the 1930s and 1940s. Mr Deeds Goes to Town (1936), Mr Smith Goes to Washington (1939), Meet John Doe (1941), and It's A Wonderful Life (1946) are particularly overt in expressing Capra's populist philosophy. Starring either Gary Cooper or James Stewart, these films feature a heroic 'common man' whose deeply rooted values challenge the corruption fostered by dishonest government officials and big business interests. This type of message film fell out of favor after the war. By the 1970s Capra's most famous pictures were criticized for being overly sentimental and labeled 'Capracorn'. Despite Capra's condemnation of Adolph Hitler in the Why We Fight series, some detractors even accused his films of being fascist.

Other critics have suggested that Capra's populist motion pictures are not so easily pigeonholed. His most famous work clearly champions a heroic common man, but the existence of corrupt government officials and angry mobs in his movies can also be interpreted as revealing a darker and less idealistic side to this director's view of humanity. Frank Capra clearly believed that the individual hero can prove a moral point. How much more the Capra hero is capable of doing relative to combating corruption, controlling a mob, or formulating governmental policy is questionable given the information provided in his films.

Capra went into semiretirement when his postwar Hollywood movies failed to be popular at the box office. The government was now torn between involving Capra in various projects and questioning his loyalty. The depiction of corrupt American politicians in Capra's 1948 feature State of the Union, for example, was viewed as a controversial theme during this period of McCarthyism, and questions about Frank Capra's politics affected his career. Capra was able to exercise some creative expression using the film medium by returning to the documentary. He wrote, produced, and directed a series of educational documentaries for Bell Systems entitled Our Mr Sun (1955), Hemo the Magnificent (1957), The Strange Case of Cosmic Rays (1957), and The Unchained Goddess (1958).

Frank Capra pursued the role of being an educator in the 1970s by visiting universities and speaking to film students. During this time the American television producer Bill Moyers hosted a PBS broadcast for which Capra was invited to compare his philosophy of documentary filmmaking with that of the young filmmaker Barbara Kopple, who was receiving recognition for her feature Harlan County, USA (1976). In a taped review made after their conversation, Moyers noted that Capra had felt compelled to use this occasion to claim that his production of the Why We Fight series was justified because of Hitler's misuse of power. Moyers saw Capra's defense of the series as an indication that the filmmaker was uncomfortable with having made propaganda, justifiable though it may have been. If Bill Moyers's interpretation is true, Frank Capra, like some of his critics, was still finding it difficult to reconcile ideological contradictions in his work decades after it was produced.

Biography

Born Bisaquino, Sicily, May 18, 1897. Emigrated with his family to the United States in May 1903, and settled in Los Angeles. Attended Throop College of Technology (Caltech) in 1915, where he discovered poetry and began writing. Enlisted in the army in 1917 when the United States entered World War I, discharged in 1918 after he contracted Spanish influenza, graduated from Throop College with a bachelors degree that same year. Involved in various aspects of filmmaking, 1919–24. Achieved success as a gag writer for Mack Sennett in 1924 when he worked on a series of short comedies with Harry Langdon. Followed Langdon to First National in 1925 and directed the comedian's feature-length picture, The Strong Man, in 1926. Employed as a director at Columbia in 1927, a very modest studio at the time. Popularity of his films between 1927 and 1941 transformed Columbia into a major studio. President of Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences, 1935–41. Commissioned as a major in US Army Signal Corps in 1942, and produced the Why We Fight series, 1942–5. Formed Liberty Films in 1946, which proved unsuccessful, and career went into decline. Recipient of the Distinguished Service Medal and American Film Institute Lifetime Achievement Award. Winner of three Best Director Oscars. Died September 3, 1991, in La Quinta, California.

Cavalcanti, Alberto

Alberto de Almeida Cavalcanti was born in Rio de Janeiro on February 6, 1897. His father, Manoel, was originally of Italian extraction, while his mother came from the north of Brazil. It was his mother, Doña Aña, who was to have the greater influence on Alberto, and when he left for England in 1934 he lived with his mother until her death in 1945. In 1923 Alberto began work in Paris for the impressionist film director Marcel L'Herbier, as a set designer and assistant producer, but his first significant nondirectorial involvement in filmmaking came as an editor, with his participation in Voyage au Congo (1927), a documentary directed by Marc Allégret, with the participation of the novelist André Gide. Between 1926 and 1934, when he left France for England, Cavalcanti directed a number of films, but the most important of these were Rien que les heures and En Rade. Both films exhibit the influence of the French avant-garde cinema of the 1920s. Rien que les heures, in particular, can be described as a work of high modernism, although Cavalcanti was to make few other films in this mode during his career.

The coming of the sound film in 1927 had a terminal impact on the French cinematic avant-garde, the aesthetic of which was based on the silent film. As opportunities for filmmaking dried up and to support his family (his father had died in 1922, and Alberto was forced to support his mother, his brother, and a maid), Alberto accepted employment in the Paris studios of Paramount Studios. He had wanted to work in sound film since 1927, but between 1928 and 1930 ended up working on a number of undistinguished, commercial sound film projects. The exceptions here were his more experimental short sound films: La P'tite Lilie and Little Red Riding Hood. Between 1930 and 1931 Cavalcanti made a number of sound films for Paramount, but his involvement was mainly that of making foreign-language remakes of popular Hollywood films. Between 1930 and 1934 Cavalcanti continued to be involved in a number of undistinguished projects, and this led him to eventually take up an offer of employment to work for John Grierson's documentary film movement in England. When he left France, in 1934, the major influences on him were French realism and cinematic impressionism, and a tendency toward popular melodrama. However, life in England was to be very different from France.

By 1934, then, Cavalcanti's filmmaking remained grounded in the French realist tradition, and also exhibited a use of modernist features, melodramatic and sentimental formats, and comic, musical or folkloric elements. This complex and uneven set of stylistic characteristics did not add up to a systematic or coherent aesthetic position, although had Cavalcanti not been thrown off course by his involvement in the commercial film industry, it might well have eventually done so. Cavalcanti left France in 1934 because he had become increasingly frustrated by the lack of opportunity available to him within the French film industry. It is debatable, however, whether this was the right thing to do. Had he remained, he may well have emerged as one of the most important French directors of the 1930s, and one can imagine that his style may have evolved into something like that of Jean Vigo, the filmmaker whom he most admired, and to whom he devoted his Filme e Realidade (1952).

In England Cavalcanti made decisive contributions to both the British documentary film movement and Ealing Studios. However, his approach to filmmaking at both organisations was often at odds with those who employed him. Consequently, although Cavalcanti made some important films between 1934 and 1946, he was often unable to make the sorts of films that he would, ideally, have liked to make. In fact, it was only with For Them That Trespass (1949), and after a gap of some twenty years, that he was able to return to the French poetic realist tradition, in which he was most at home. However, even that film was the product of compromise, and it was not really until O Canto do Mar/The Song of the Sea that he was able to effect a full return to poetic realism. Unfortunately, however, what some Brazilian critics described as the 'unjustified gloom and futility' of the film was not what the film industry and film critics in Brazil wanted either.

Cavalcanti's contribution to the documentary film was made in England, both at the General Post Office (GPO) Film Unit, and at Ealing Studios. At the GPO, Cavalcanti brought a command of filmmaking technique to the young filmmakers employed by John Grierson. In particular, he brought expertise in the creative treatment of sound to a production unit that had only just acquired sound facilities. The first fruits of his involvement came with one of the most important documentaries to be produced during the 1930s. Basil Wright's The Song of Ceylon (1934) is particularly impressive in its use of impressionistic, nonsynchronous sound technique, a technique that was brought into the documentary film movement by Cavalcanti. The same use of modernist technique can be found in Cavalcanti's first directed film for the documentary film movement, Pett and Pott (1934). However, this surrealist fantasy was at odds with the intentions of John Grierson, and the film was criticised elsewhere within the movement, for example by Paul Rotha.

The problem over Pett and Pott was to illustrate a more general problem. Cavalcanti and Grierson were very different people, with very different sensibilities. Grierson was a dogmatic, obsessive Scot; Cavalcanti was an expressive, cultured man, and a homosexual. Grierson's distrust of Cavalcanti resulted in the latter directing few films between 1934 and 1936. However, he did make important contributions to a number of the GPO Film Movement's most important films over this period, most notably Coal Face (1935) and Night Mail (1936). These two films, with their use of music by Benjamin Britten and poetry by W.H. Auden, also exhibit Cavalcanti's knowledge of the creative use of sound and modernist technique.

Grierson left the GPO Film Unit in 1936, after which Cavalcanti was promoted to production leader. He remained in charge of the Unit until 1940, when it became integrated into the war effort as the Crown Film Unit. Between 1936 and 1940 Cavalcanti's major involvement was again as a producer. In particular, he formed a close relationship over this period with Humphrey Jennings. Jennings's Spare Time (1939) again exhibits Cavalcanti's concern for indeterminate, evocative forms of filmmaking and for associative editing. The section in the film showing a Welsh male choir is a remarkably affecting piece of filmmaking. Another important documentary in which Cavalcanti played a major role was Men of the Lightship (1940). Cavalcanti's influence is apparent here in the pictorial quality of some of the images and in one edited sequence which employs the kind of subjective camerawork characteristic of the French impressionist movement of the 1920s and which Cavalcanti first employed in Rien que les heures and En Rade.

In 1940 Cavalcanti left the GPO Film Unit, shortly to become the Crown Film Unit, to work for Michael Balcon at Ealing Studios. Cavalcanti really wanted to get back to the feature film, and this was the major influence on his move; however, during his first year at Ealing he continued to make documentaries. The most important of these films were Yellow Caesar, a parodic send-up of Mussolini, in which Cavalcanti again uses the forms of caricature he used in some of his French films, and Pett and Pott. However, Cavalcanti soon switched to feature film direction and production, and he brought to Ealing films a complicating sensibility that often elevated the films out of the mundane. This is apparent, for example, in the highly caricatured The Big Blockade, and in the montage edited sequences of The Foreman Went to France.

A concern for forms of documentary realism is also apparent in Champagne Charlie and in Cavalcanti's first post-Ealing film: They Made Me a Fugitive. The same concern for documentary realism also surfaces in Cavalcanti's Brazilian films, particularly Caiçara, O Canto do Mar, Terraé sempre Terra, and Volta Redonda, a documentary about steelmaking in Brazil. During the 1950s Cavalcanti also made a documentary in East Germany with Joris Ivens. Die Windrose was made as part of East Germany's attempt to build a cultural reputation for itself. Made to celebrate International Woman's Day, the film does not particularly display Cavalcanti's influence, and is now little known. Later, in the 1960s, Cavalcanti made Thus Spoke Theodore Herzl, a film made in Israel, celebrating the Israeli leader. The fact that Cavalcanti could make such a film, however, after making the pro-communist Die Windrose/The Windrose, and his 1955 adaptation of Brecht's Herr Puntilla und sein Knecht Matti/Mr. Puntilla and his servant Matti, speaks volumes for Cavalcanti's lack of political nous. His involvement with East Germany, for example, was to lead Michael Balcon, at Ealing Studios, to blacklist Cavalcanti from any future work at Ealing.

One final documentary that must be mentioned here was Cavalcanti's 1942 film, Film and Reality, a compilation documentary which attempted to put together the high points of achievement in the documentary film up to that date. In his film Cavalcanti emphasised the aesthetic achievement of the documentary. However, this had the effect of enraging Grierson and his associates, who believed that the prime purpose of the documentary film should be a social one. The fuss over Film and Reality was to rumble on for a long time, and it significantly affected Cavalcanti's relationship with Grierson. The film is not remarkable in itself, and the controversy it engendered says much more about the sorts of conflicts that Cavalcanti tended to get involved in with all his employers than about the film itself.

Cavalcanti's most important films can be divided into three groups. First are those that attempt to subvert dominant mores or positions. This group includes the avant-garde Rien que les heures, and, in England, the films Pett and Pott, Went the Day Well?, and Dead of Night. However, although these films are important, they do not fully represent Cavalcanti's core filmmaking concerns. The second major group of films consists of transitional films such as Champagne Charlie, They Made Me a Fugitive, and One-Eyed Simon. Although these films also critique dominant mores, they are also more positive in approach to their subjects. This shift from critique to a more affirmative approach, for example, differentiates a film such as Champagne Charlie from one like Went the Day Well? Finally, there are those films that come closest to realising and embodying Cavalcanti's core aspirations for his own filmmaking. These include En Rade, For Them That Trespass, and O Canto do Mar. These films are all made within the French poetic realist tradition.

Cavalcanti's major contribution to film culture was made in England, not as a director but as a producer, and his production work at both the GPO Film Unit and Ealing Studios had a considerable impact on two of the most important institutions within British film culture. In fact, Cavalcanti was not really a documentary filmmaker, and he made few documentaries after leaving the documentary film movement. In France in the 1920s he was also mainly active within the feature film industry, and even Rien que les heures is better described as an avant-garde modernist film than a documentary. Within the domain of documentary, however, his greatest achievements came in England, with the GPO Film Unit, where he was able to inject a poetic sensibility into films such as The Song of Ceylon, Coal Face, Night Mail, and Spare Time.

Chair, The

(US, Shuker, 1963)

One of the most important films produced in the 1960s by Drew Associates, and certainly the most widely known of The Living Camera series, The Chair remains grounded in many of the stylistic conventions of cinéma vérité while telling a compelling and tense narrative. Originally titled Paul, following the practice of naming the films in a series after the main subject of each film (it was the last produced in the series), the film has since been referred to as The Chair, that central, inanimate object that plays so crucial a role in the documentary. Filmed in July 1962, The Chair recounts a crisis in Chicago, that in five days' time Paul Crump is sentenced to die in Cook County Jail's electric chair for a murder he committed nine years ago. His lawyers, the young Donald Page Moore and the experienced Louis Nizer, must convince the Illinois State Parole Board that their client has been rehabilitated (a line of argumentation that in the United States had yet to be successful in the overturning of a death sentence), and that Governor Kerner should commute Crump's sentence.

As with the more than forty films produced by Drew Associates in the 1960s, The Chair is really a collaborative effort between executive producer Robert Drew, his chief filmmaker Gregory Shuker, the two additional filmmakers, Richard Leacock and D.A. Pennebaker, and his team of correspondents: Shuker, Drew, John MacDonald, and Sam Adams. Drew assigned the ideas of the film and oversaw production, the filmmakers photographed and planned the shoots, and the correspondents often acted as soundmen and journalists. The role each associate played often changed from film to film. Having first worked with Drew Associates as a correspondent in On the Pole (1960), Shuker was soon assigned the role of filmmaker. The Chair and Crisis: Behind a Presidential Commitment (1963) are his two most acknowledged accomplishments with Drew Associates.

As with Crisis, The Chair involves just that, a crisis. In The Chair, the resolution of the crisis may end with a man being executed. Shuker and his filmmakers were able to achieve a dramatic unity within the film by initially introducing us to the principal characters, Crump being the first. At the start of the film, narrator James Lipscomb states gravely, 'It's Sunday, less than five days before the condemned man, Paul Crump, is scheduled to die in the chair'. The phrase 'the chair' is repeated several times in the opening few minutes, and the direness in which Lipscomb repeats it only heightens the urgency of the crisis situation.

One of the more significant scenes of The Chair that builds on this crisis involves the introduction of Warden Jack Johnson. In charge of executions at the jail, Johnson is seen, ironically enough, as the man who will execute Crump (he is Crump's best friend, and the convict asked the Warden to perform the execution) and also as one of many who will testify on Crump's behalf. Through a series of following shots, we journey with the Warden from his office down endless hallways lit with eerie fluorescent lighting. We hear the sound of Johnson's echoing footsteps, down a dark elevator, through the bowels of the jail that are lit by a single window (producing wide-cast and attached shadows), into the chapel, and then finally into the sealed room that houses the chair. The handheld camera continues to follow Johnson as he circles the chair and then pans from the chair to the Warden's sullen face, and then back to the chair to end the scene. The long takes in this scene show the effectiveness at hiding the presence of the camera so as to allow the true emotions of the Warden, especially in his office, to be brought forth.

Some believe that the stylistic differences between the two camera crews (Pennebaker and Shuker; Leacock and Drew) coupled with the sudden alternation between one filmed subject and another, with little regard for temporality, created an oversimplified crisis situation that resembled a fictional story rather than a realistic one. Thus, at times The Chair appears to drift away from the stylistic and creative precepts of cinéma vérité, namely that of filming real people in real and uncontrolled situations. Nizer, and particularly Moore, often resemble characters from a play or a novel; they are teeming with emotions, and one could argue they are over-acting. Some of Moore's performances, particularly his phone conversation filmed in a very long take with Church officials who will make a statement on Crump's behalf, in which the lawyer weeps openly (later in the scene, they decide not to release their statement), do not appear genuine. Yet in another apparent disregard for filming in the cinéma vérité style, portions of the film were shot well after Crump's sentence had been commuted. Jean-Luc Godard who, with his fellow directors from the French New Wave influenced the cinéma vérité movement, was highly critical of The Chair, calling it a melodrama full of stereotypical images and simplified, one-dimensional characters.

Members of Drew Associates admit that there are problems with the film. Pennebaker believes that the real story was too complex. Drew, who made the final edit, acknowledges his error in simplifying the story in exchange for hype and suspense. Yet, despite these apparent drawbacks, the film succeeds in placing a human face on a condemned man. Although Paul Crump does not appear as often in The Chair as other title characters in The Living Camera series, most notably the exceptionally strong film David (1961), Crump's brief time on camera, as well as his brevity and humility of speech (as opposed to Moore's), allows him to be viewed sympathetically. While Crump's sentence is commuted by Governor Kerner (he will serve one hundred and ninety-nine years with no parole), the final shot, that of the doors of Crump's dim cell being shut and his cell backlit by a small window, creating high contrast between light and dark, underscores Crump's future as one of confinement and isolation.

Challenge for Change/Société Nouvelle

The National Film Board of Canada's (NFB) Challenge for Change and its francophone component, Société Nouvelle, were designed to use documentary filmmaking to address social, cultural, and economic disenfranchisement in Canadian society. Between 1967 and 1980 the initiative produced approximately one hundred and fifty films in the areas of community organization, native issues, labor, welfare and poverty, and women's issues. The most conventional were mass audience social documentaries, typified by their prototype film, Tanya Ballantyne's The Things I Cannot Change. The program produced films such as the series on the American community organizer, Saul Alinsky, meant to train social activists.

Most emblematic of Challenge for Change/Société Nouvelle were the films and videotapes generated by the disenfranchised themselves. The first example produced were Colin Low's twenty-eight films shot in the remote Newfoundland fishing community of Fogo Island. The Fogo residents, threatened with the failure of their fishery and a forced relocation, spoke uninterrupted, directly to the camera and were given the opportunity to edit the footage before its release.

Portable videotape recorders and community access cable television facilitated the use of the Fogo model as a tool for community organization. Challenge for Change/Société Nouvelle sponsored individual community video projects (and the documentation of those projects in films such as VTR St Jacques, VTR Rosedale), as well as the establishment of ongoing community video centers.

Challenge for Change/Société Nouvelle generated considerable discussion as to the role of the documentary filmmaker. Was it not disingenuous in an institution like the NFB, known for its documentary auteurs, to now claim a complete disinterest in style? Was it possible? John Grierson, while offering an equivocal approval of Challenge for Change/Société Nouvelle, found that 'the old unsatisfactory note of faraway liberal concern for humanity-in-general creeps in, in spite of these real excursions into the local realities' (Grierson 1977: 134).

A second critique of Challenge for Change/Société Nouvelle was the mandate itself. As Jones points out, 'A film could criticize practices, policies or situations that tended to bar certain groups from equitable participation in the mainstream of Canadian life [...] But films which criticized something fundamental about society were not encouraged and rarely permitted' (Jones 1981: 171). Even when focusing on the needs of their constituencies, the seven federal ministries cosponsoring the program could be put off by issues hostile to their own agendas. Indian Affairs, for example, attempted to block production of Cree Hunters of the Mistassini, a film that countered the Trudeau government's refusal to negotiate land claim treaties with native bands.

By the late 1970s all but two of the sponsoring federal ministries had left the program, making its collapse inevitable. The legacy of Challenge for Change/Société Nouvelle, however, remains in its raising of fundamental issues of public sponsorship of political filmmaking, the role of the documentary filmmaker in such work, and the uses of video and other ostensibly democratizing media. The program also served as a training ground, most notably for the women who were to become the founders of the National Film Board of Canada's women's unit, Studio D.

Chan, Evans

Although best known as a transnational fiction filmmaker based in New York City and Hong Kong, Evans Chan has a considerable body of documentary work to his credit. Before making his debut feature, To Liv(e), in 1990, Chan had spent much of his professional life as a journalist and media arts commentator in Asia and within the Chinese-language press in America. His interest in political affairs, current events, social trends, and the broad spectrum of personalities that make up the contemporary arts scene from Hong Kong to New York underpins all of his films—both fiction and nonfiction. Influenced by Bertolt Brecht's epic theater and Jean-Luc Godard's counter-cinema, Chan breaks the illusion of a seamless fiction in his dramatic features by including interviews with political figures, snippets of stage performances, and documentary inserts of life on the street. Like Godard and Marker, Chan works within the tradition of the film essayist. He uses fiction and nonfiction, as Georg Lukacs says of the essay form, as a 'springboard' (Lukacs 1974: 16) to engage the critical events of the day with the commitment of an activist.

The shockwaves that went through the global Chinese community after the Tiananmen Square incident of June 4, 1989 can be felt throughout Chan's entire oeuvre, and the impact that the events in Beijing in 1989 had on Hong Kong in 1997 and Macau in 1999, when those two colonies returned to Chinese rule, plays a major role in Chan's film dramas as well as his documentary work. To date, Chan has made four feature-length documentaries: Journey to Beijing (1998), Adeus Macau (1999), The Life and Times of Wu Zhong-Xian (2003, based on the play The Life and Times of Ng Chung Yin), and Sorceress of the New Piano (2004).

Journey to Beijing and Adeus Macau

These two documentaries constitute a filmic diptych with the umbrella title of China Decolonized. They deal with the transfer of sovereignty of Hong Kong in 1997 and Macau in 1999 to China. While neither film adopts an alarmist or negative perspective on the respective handovers, each expresses the aspiration for the retention of unique local characteristics, some of which represent the inevitable legacy of a long period of colonial influence. The thorny issue of political self-determination is raised in both films, and Chan's documentary approach is to allow his subjects to speak for themselves, unencumbered by intrusive voice-over.

Journey to Beijing, which brought Chan's documentary making to international critical attention at festivals in 1998, follows the trail of an assorted, Canterbury Tales-like group of Hong Kong 'pilgrims' on a charity walkathon from Hong Kong to Beijing under the auspices of Sowers' Action Group, which collects funds through sponsorship and other activities to develop schooling facilities in poorer regions of China. At the literal level the film charts the progress of the unlikely band of walkers toward their destination, with their arrival timed to coincide with the handover of Hong Kong, thus ensuring maximum publicity. At the metaphorical and symbolic level, however, the journey is presented as a microcosm of the complex process of reunification and mutual understanding.

Although Chan does not use a 'walk' as a metaphor for Macau's return to Chinese sovereignty in 1999, he does look broadly at the cultural landscape of Macau, the response of artists and intellectuals to the transfer of power, the distinct Portuguese colonial history of Macau, and some of the misunderstandings and failed hopes that accompanied the handover there. The film unfolds through a series of interviews and visual observations of the cityscape of Macau, including the handover ceremony and demonstrations/street theater by artists critical of the event. Law Kar, who was born in Macau and who has been involved in Hong Kong film culture through the Hong Kong Film Festival and Hong Kong Film Archive for many years, talks about making an experimental film in Macau during the late 1960s, when riots inspired by China's Cultural Revolution spilled across the border: 'We felt compelled to express our disorientation—dangling between the ruthless rioters and the repressive imperialists. Setting the film in Macau seemed safer, more disarming.' Although not as long or elaborate as Journey to Beijing, Adeus Macau may, indeed, be a more 'disarming' view of the end of European colonialism in the Pearl River Delta.

The Life and Times of Wu Zhong-Xian and Sorceress of the New Piano

In Sorceress of the New Piano, Evans Chan's camera literally gets inside the piano with Tan, actively engaging her as a creative force during her performances and bringing to the screen the excitement of seeing how musical experimentation opens new avenues for aesthetic expression. As in others of his documentary and fiction films, Chan highlights the role that women artists and intellectuals play in the international avant-garde. Just as Tan opens up this world to new audiences by playing Beatles tunes on toy pianos, Chan's film brings Tan's music to those who have never considered the importance of Asians, Asian Americans, and women within the musical avant-garde.

The 2002 film adaptation, The Life and Times of Wu Zhong Zian, is based on a play by Asian People's Theatre Festival Society about the Hong Kong-born democracy activist, Ng Chung Ying, who is strongly associated with Hong Kong's emergent political awareness in the 1970s. Chan's film title reflects the film's appeal to a broader audience in using the Mandarin Chinese version of his name. Chan assisted actor and director, Mok Chiu Yiu (who also appears in Adeus Macau) in the New York English stage adaptation. His decision to base the film version primarily, but not exclusively, on a filmed performance of the piece at Club 64 in Hong Kong's Lan Kwai Fong, testifies to his keen understanding and empathy with the aims of the original dramatic project.

Chan does an effective job of giving a film audience a clearer idea of the egregious character of Ng than would be possible in a purely filmed recording of the live performance. His blend of the respective media works well in giving a rounded portrait of Ng's passionately committed but inevitably frustrated idealism. To understand the derivation of popular activism in Hong Kong in the response to the Tiananmen Square massacre, and more recently the July 1 demonstrations against planned anti-subversion legislation emanating from Beijing, Ng Chung Ying's role and legacy are of crucial significance. The documentary is compelling for its typically dialectical quest for a balanced, if at times ironic and bitter, truth instead of mere hagiography.

Lukacs observes about the essay, 'the value-determining thing about it is not the verdict [...] but the process of judging' (Lukacs 1974: 18). Chan's film essays are very much about this process of judging, thereby opening up transnational conversations about contemporary Hong Kong, Chinese, and global politics through his documentaries.

Chang: A Drama of the Wilderness

(US, Cooper and Schoedsack, 1927)

In part because of its considerable craftsmanship, Merian Cooper and Ernest Schoedsack's Chang is a vivid record of its time and setting, or at least an engineered perception of the time and setting in question. If its commercial motivations and narrative contrivances ultimately reduce its strictly documentary value and status, then it remains of great interest and importance in the history of both the documentary and the commercial fiction film.

Grass (1925) and Chang, which Cooper and Schoedsack referred to as their 'natural dramas', were created at a time when the parameters and ethics of the documentary form were being debated and established. Robert Flaherty's early work in this period, in both its exemplary and problematical aspects, would have the most influence on this defining process.

Chang was shot and set in Siam (modern-day Thailand). It tells the story of a family of Lao tribesmen homesteading on the outskirts of a Siamese settlement, trying to eke out a living in the harsh jungle environment. The plot of the film was substantially formed in Cooper's head ever before he reached Siam, and its central aim was to entertain while taking advantage of a novel and exotic setting. On-set preparations were devoted to embodying the producers' preconceptions.

The filming of Chang was marked by an atmosphere of improvisation and openness, even of collaboration, in keeping with Cooper and Schoedsack's production method. As a result, the film's primarily fictional representations are embellished with documentary details. The film provides a brief but vivid representation of the fictional family's domestic arrangements and agricultural practices, for example. There were also incidents (such as when the mother elephant pulls the house down in the process of rescuing her baby) that occurred spontaneously during preparation for filming and were subsequently reenacted for the camera. The details of the film's many hunting sequences, such as the traps and dummies used, reflect authentic processes and methods.

Chang has been criticized for its perceived insensitivities and cultural missteps. At times, Cooper and Schoedsack subjected their actors (including children) to dangerous situations for the sake of the narrative. A modern audience may also be struck by the amount of violence against animals in the film. It is clear that a number of beasts were rather indiscriminately harmed during the picture's production.

Although Chang was well received at the time of its release, even contemporary reviews took consistent exception to the film's alternatively stilted and facetious titles: 'The very last grain of rice is husked, O very small daughter', says the noble native, and 'Give him hell, boys!' says the ribald-talking gibbon.

Chang reflects and implicitly supports the subservience and oppression that characterize colonial relations. Such attitudes are evident in the treatment of animals during the filming and in the film. The animals, which are domesticated and often killed, might be seen as having a metonymic relation to the Siamese themselves. Nevertheless, it is necessary to remember that Chang is a product of its time, and that much of common intercultural practices we now take for granted cannot fairly be expected of its producers. The film, for good and ill, reflects the enthusiasms and insensitivities of its time. The influence and continued presence of these incomplete, essential sensibilities should not be underestimated.

It is clear that Cooper and Schoedsack were motivated by more than just commercial or financial considerations. They encountered numerous technical challenges during the production of the film, and their recollections suggest that much of their motivation and satisfaction stemmed from finding successful solutions to these difficulties. The problems they faced included determining how to trap wild cats without killing them, inciting a tiger to attack, filming said attack without endangering the cameraman, protecting film stock from mildew, and incorporating the wide-screen magnascope process.

As they would again later with King Kong, Cooper and Schoedsack demonstrated remarkable ingenuity and aplomb in solving each of these problems. As was the case with Robert Flaherty and Werner Herzog, the adventures encountered during production were at least as important as the adventures portrayed in the production. With few exceptions, the serious, groundbreaking, critically validated documentary film would not follow in Chang's manic steps. Nevertheless it has many descendants, and its good-natured absurdity and superb sleights of hand are echoed in a great many diverse places. The influence of Chang is present in Jean Painlevé's surreal scientific films. They prefigure, as Kevin Brownlow has observed, Walt Disney's True Life Adventures and in some ways the films of Arne Sucksdorff as well. Its influence is discernible in any number of large-format nature films that couch cinematic spectacle in appreciation of the natural.

Contemporary audiences seem to have taken Chang at face value for the most part. Chang is emblematic of a great deal of commercial cinema; although there is much in it to criticize, we may finally find it difficult, and too delightful, to dismiss.

Children at School

(UK, Wright, 1937)

The National Film Archive summarizes the content of Children at School with the following: 'Deals with the physical conditions of schools in which many children are educated'. The accompanying shot list is as follows: Democratic education compared with that in a dictatorship; the organization of education in England—nursery, infant, junior, senior and secondary schools progressing to technical schools and universities. Scenes from life in the progressive schools follow. Nursery schools: free activity, air and sunlight, meal times and rest periods; training in hygiene and social habits; a trained nurse supervises the children's health. Infant schools; teaching of a sense of rhythm, reading by acting, confidence through verbal expression, creative play, provision of mid-morning milk. Reading aloud; regular supervision of health by school doctor—parents' help encouraged. Post-primary schools: encouragement of freedom, self-reliance. School scenes show gymnastics, woodwork, geography, chemistry, etc.; the use of films in teaching. Provision of nutritious meals.

In contrast there are many 'blacklist' schools, insanitary, unsafe, out of date. Great difficulties experienced by teachers in out-of-date buildings not yet scheduled for destruction—inadequate light, overcrowded classes, outside noises.

Mr Fred Mander, Secretary of the National Union of Teachers (NUT), campaigns for better working conditions. We see a meeting of the Council for the ten-year plan for children at which Lady Astor speaks. Student teachers discuss large classes. A meeting of headmaster and staff of his school. The question remains 'Can democracies afford to fall behind?'

Children at School was the first production arranged through Film Centre, which had been established in 1937. Realist Film Unit had been established in the same year by Basil Wright, after his departure from the General Post Office (GPO) Film Unit. The commentator, Wilson Harris, was editor of the Spectator, which published a good deal of writing on the documentary film. It is a continuation of the series sponsored by the gas industry, which had included Housing Problems (1935) and Enough to Eat? (1936). Through reportage and argument these films called public attention to pressing problems faced by the nation, insisted that they needed to be solved, and suggested their causes and possible solutions. By making use of stock shots and newsreel footage plus interviews, they were given coherence and rhetorical effectiveness through editing and voice-over commentary. Heavily influenced by the American The March of Time series, they represent the beginnings of what would become standard format for subsequent television documentaries.

Though competent in technique and hard-hitting as exposé, in its impersonality Children at School might have been directed by any number of documentarians. It represents Wright's deep and genuine social concern arrived at intellectually rather than the emotional core of his being out of which his most personal and best work came. The journalistic style of this film and the lyricism of The Song of Ceylon is frequently contrasted.

China

For historical reasons, documentary film in China has long been more valued for its ability to articulate political or moral discourses than for its cinematic qualities. Documentary film production, and especially newsreels, started in China around 1900. Expatriates living in Shanghai, or foreigners sent by overseas film companies such as Pathé and Edison, were the first to shoot and show fiction and documentary films. In 1905 Ren Qingtai, a former Chinese overseas student in Japan, owner of a photographic shop in Beijing, made his first film: The Battle of Dingjunshan. This documentary recording of a Beijing opera performance is the first film shot by a Chinese national and the starting point of Chinese film production. However, the economical and political situation of early twentieth-century China made film production an activity largely placed in the hands of foreigners. One of the first Shanghai-based companies was The Asia Film Company, founded by American Benjamin Brodsky, in which a team of foreigners and Chinese shot newsreels and fiction films.

After two decades of watching foreign images about China, the importance of themselves filming the reality of their country became more and more crucial to Chinese intellectuals and entrepreneurs during the 1920s. At that time, intellectuals were already commenting on the selectivity of the documentary filmmaking process and criticising the negative image of China conveyed by biased foreign newsreels and fiction films. Instead, they emphasised the power of documentary as an educational and moral media, potentially able to contribute to save the country from war, domination and disunity. In 1918 the Commercial Press of Shanghai was the first to open an image department, and it soon started to shoot newsreels and other documentary films, such as travelogues, educational films and opera recordings. A number of other Chinese film production companies were then soon established in Shanghai and throughout the country, reaching by 1925 over one hundred and seventy-nine registered companies. Aiming at educating the audience and competing with foreign documentaries, these films depicted landscapes and Chinese customs, and reported news about the current political situation. Other companies became famous for their involvement with documentary filmmaking. Li Minwei, known as the father of Hong Kong cinema with the fiction film Zhuangzi Tests his Wife (1913), cofounded the Mingxin (Star) Film Company in 1923 with his brothers Li Beihai and Li Haishan. Considering documentary film as a means to save the country, the revolutionary Li Minwei, an early member of the Nationalist Party (Guomindang, GMD hereafter), considered documentary film as a means to voice patriotic concerns by recording China's current political situation. His company produced twenty newsreels in the 1920s, half of which reported on miscellaneous events such as sports competitions in Guangdong or Shanghai, and opera performances in Beijing. Ten documented the political activities and discourses of Sun Yat-sen, whom Li Minwei followed during his travels. In 1927 Li Minwei gathered this footage and reedited it as a documentary film on Sun Yat-sen's life and actions, released as late as 1941, under the name A Page of History.

Commercial companies such as the Mingxing Film Company, focused more on fiction films, but also used documentary film in a very innovative way, in productions blending documentary footage and fictionalised narration.

As early as 1928 Zhang Shichuan and Hong Shen directed the romance Classmates (aka Kick), in part a recording of a real football game and in part a fictional love story between modern, athletic young people. Cheng Bugao's Raging Torrents (1932) also combined recordings of an actual flood in Hubei province with staged shots, to emphasise the impact of the natural disaster on different social classes, and criticise the gap between the lives of peasants and rich people.

From 1931 to 1945 documentary films became even more political, torn between the antagonism of Nationalists and communists; however, China's biggest threat was Japanese invasion. While fighting on the battlefield, the three forces were also struggling in the realm of images through film production. Documentary films from that era can roughly be divided into three categories: short newsreels reporting on various events without necessarily bearing a political discourse and educational films with a visible didactic purpose; those dealing with scientific or historical subjects, which used staged scenes as well as documentary shots to educate the audience with or without delivering a political message; and finally, long war documentaries, depicting battles and army leaders for the purposes of propaganda, incorporating both genuine recordings and staged scenes.

At the beginning of the 1930s the newsreel and documentary film departments of private companies such as the Lianhua Film Company and the Mingxing Film Company continued to record current political events, but also actors' and celebrities' lives such as Mei Lanfang and Hu Die; travelogues or local sports competitions. Fearing the influence of a growing number of 'left-wing' authors working for private film companies, however, the GMD government asserted its authority on the industry by establishing film administrations, placed under the leadership of the Propaganda Committee. The Script Censorship Committee and the Film Censorship Commission, both founded in 1933, aimed to control the content of the films produced by private companies, while the government-ruled Central Film Studio, established in 1934, produced pro-GMD films, newsreels (News of China), anti-communist films, as well as military educational documentaries. In 1937, when the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) and the GMD joined forces against Japan, the Central Film Studio stopped the production of anti-communist films and launched a series of newsreels called Record of the Opposition to the Japanese.

Sun Mingjing was a prominent figure of the 1930s educational films. A former student of sciences and electronic engineering at Jinling University (Nanjing University), he worked on over one hundred educational films financed by the Nationalist government. When the university founded in 1936 a Department of Educational Cinematography (DEC), Sun Mingjing became its head and, until 1948, he supervised the production of one hundred and twelve films, mainly travelogues (Scenes of the Capital City, 1936) and educational films on national defence, education, agriculture, industrial production (Coal Mining, 1937) and science (Solar Eclipse, 1936, the first Chinese colour film). Half of them were directed or edited by Sun Mingjing. Some, like The Front Line of Democracy (1946)—the first Chinese sound movie in colour—reflected the current situation of China. However, Sun Mingjing's films also illustrated his fascination for science and technology. To him, documentaries were first a tool to educate the people, before being an artistic or political medium. Sun Mingjing also published in 1942 the magazine Film and Radio Monthly, in which he wrote important articles on documentaries and translated some of John Grierson's articles too. His Peasants' Spring (1935), a script-based educational film on the everyday life of a family in the countryside, was screened at Brussels' World Expo, and was the first Chinese film to win a prize at an international competition.

When the second Sino-Japanese war broke out in July 1937, the Chinese film industry underwent a series of major changes. While most of the Shanghai film production houses moved to Hong Kong temporarily or permanently to escape Japanese invasion, the China Film Studio had to relocate to Chongqing at the end of 1938, along with the other governing bodies. Zheng Junli, a former actor and leftist filmmaker, who advocated the use of documentary in a fictionalised way, was the head of the newsreel department of the Guomindang film production house. He supervised the shooting of a feature-length documentary film depicting the heroism of Chinese ethnic minorities from northwest and southwest China in their fight against the Japanese. This film combines on-the-spot shooting and staged scenes, showing the traditions of Mongol, Tibetan, Miao and Hui minorities, and was released in 1942 as Long Live the Nation.

In Hong Kong, the 1930s were a period of prolific newsreel production, both by former Shanghai-based companies (such as Lianhua and Tianyi) and local ones. The War Effort in Guangzhou, for instance, was released in 1937 by Grandview Film Company and testified to the resistance of Guangzhou's residents against the Japanese. In 1938 the Youth Photographic Unit, a group of Hong Kong-based filmmakers (Lam Tsong and Tsui Tin-tseong among them), went to Yan'an to shoot Scenes of Yan'an, a documentary on the communist base.

Until 1938 the communists, although influential in some of the private film companies, had no financial means to produce documentary films themselves. When Edgar Snow, an American journalist, visited the Yan'an communist base in 1936, it was the first time that someone had recorded everyday life in this remote area. Soon after, however, Yuan Muzhi—the famous director of the fiction film Street Angels (1937)—saw Snow's film in Beiping (Beijing), and decided to follow his steps in documentary filmmaking. After a meeting arranged by Zhou Enlai between Yuan Muzhi and Joris Ivens—then in China for the shooting of The 400 Million (1939)—he received a 35mm camera from the Dutchman. In 1938 Yuan Muzhi and Wu Yinxian brought cameras and film equipment to Yan'an and established the Yan'an Film Group. From then on, they shot newsreels about the political life of the base and worked on two long documentaries (Yan'an and the Eighth Route Army, unfinished, and Production and Fighting Combine: Nanni Bay, shot by Xu Xiaobing and Wu Yinxian).

The occupying forces of imperial Japan also had their own film production company in Manchuria. The Manchukuo Film Association (Man-ei) founded in 1937, produced until the Liberation a fairly large number of fiction films (one hundred and twenty) and newsreels (three hundred, called Man-ei News and News of Manchuria). Aiming to enlighten the people, the Japanese documentaries were labelled Kulturfilme, as a reference to the German concept of educational films. All of them, as well as the films produced in Shanghai for the Japanese government, took the occupant's standpoint to describe the war and exalt their efforts in China (education, industrial production, etc.). After the defeat of Japan in 1945, the relationship between Nationalists and communists remained officially peaceful until June 1946. During this time, the Changchun-based Manchukuo Film Association—back in Chinese hands and renamed the Northeast Film Company—produced newsreels about the war and the liberating troops of USSR, China and North Korea. The communist workers insisted on translating and helping to distribute Soviet and North Korean films. However, at the outbreak of the civil war, communist and Nationalist armies fought to keep control of the film studio. Eventually, the communist film workers had to flee to Heilongjiang province, where they established the Northeast Film Studio in Xingshan, on October 1, 1946. From two hundred members in 1946, they reached nine hundred and eighty-three workers in 1949—including Yuan Muzhi, Wu Yinxian and Chen Bo'er. This film studio aimed to produce art films, newsreels, scientific educational films, and long documentaries (Three Years of Liberation War in the Northeast, 1949). To promote exchanges and mutual help between communist film teams, the Yan'an Film Studio, founded in 1946, sent a mobile film group across the country to develop film production in communist-ruled areas. They also brought to the Northeast Film Studio the footage of the archive documentary Protect Yan'an, Protect Shaanxi, Gansu and Ningxia (1947) in order to complete the postproduction work there. Shot in Yan'an during the war, this film introduced to the audience the main communist leaders Mao Zedong and Zhou Enlai and explained the politics undertaken by the communists, such as agrarian reform.

As the communists became stronger and progressively took back the major northern cities, they established film production and administrative structures even before the founding of the People's Republic of China. In spring 1949 communist film workers gathered in Beiping and founded the Beiping Film Studio (renamed Beijing Film Studio on October 1, 1949). Along with the Shanghai and the Northeast film studios, this structure's main task was to keep a record of the final stages of the civil war. The newsreels, closely monitored by CCP leaders, and especially by Zhou Enlai, were the first production priority, ahead of fiction films. The Central Film Management Bureau was also set up, with Yuan Muzhi at its head. In July a meeting officially announced the missions for the arts: unite the people and contribute in the cultural, educational and economic construction of the New China. Cinema was the only art with a central administration, indicating its prominence over the other cultural fields.

After the founding of the People's Republic of China on October 1, 1949, the film studios continued to record the liberation and the end of civil war. In 1950 the Beijing Film Studio sent a team to Tibet to shoot Marching to Liberate Tibet. The Korean war was filmed by a group led by Xu Xiaobing in the long documentary Resist America and Support North Korea (1951). The documentaries also reported on the new leaders' actions and the measures they implemented, such as the agrarian reform in The Great Land Reform (1954). On July 7, 1953 the Central Newsreel and Documentary Studio (CNDS) was established, remaining until the 1980s China's main production house for documentary films and newsreels, a task it later shared with the Shanghai Science Education Film Studio (founded in 1953), the China Agricultural Film Studio (1954), and the Beijing Science Education Film Studio (1960). A centralised body, the CNDS put together shooting teams, usually formed by members of the film crews previously working in different communist armies. The shooting teams were sent across the country to film the newsreels News Document Exhibit (ten minutes) and Global Sights and Sounds, screened before feature films in cinemas.

Post-1949 documentary aesthetics gradually took shape under the influence of Soviet films. In 1950 USSR filmmakers Serguei Gerasimov and Leonid Varlamov came to China to shoot, respectively, Liberated China and Victory of the Chinese People upon an invitation of the Beijing Film Studio. Many theory books from the USSR were translated and contributed to the great aesthetical homogeneity of Chinese documentary films: the shots were short and clear; the voice-over commentaries simplified events to make sure that the audience understood the meaning of the images and their underlying political discourse. Music was a mandatory accompaniment and, as in fiction films, it served to highlight the emotional significance of the events or people on screen. Understood as a visual political discourse aiming at constructing a new China, documentary films followed the eventful flow of Chinese politics, clearly articulating the communist ideology.

Before the start of the Cultural Revolution in 1966, a number of ethnographic documentaries on China's national minorities had already emerged. The first films of this kind were shot between 1927 and 1935 by a group of scientists led by Swedish geographer Sven Anders Hegin in the northwestern provinces. From then on, films dedicated to social sciences gave way to war and ideological documentaries, which became a priority. At the end of the 1950s Chinese ethnographic films depicting the traditions of non-Han populations started to develop (The Wa, 1958; The Naxi's Culture and Art from Lijiang, 1960). These films were usually the result of cooperation between cinema operators and social scientists from the Chinese Academy of Science or provincial universities, and were based on the scientists' research. The shootings consisted of immersing the filmmakers in the communities to record not only local traditions, but also the changes brought about by communism and the supposedly positive evolution of the group under the new leadership. Soon the universities in Yunnan established themselves as great contributors to this field, starting a long tradition of anthropological documentary that continues today.

The Cultural Revolution (1966–76), however, brought these projects to a halt, and created tremendous changes in documentary production. The film studios and TV stations—the first of which, Beijing TV, was launched as early as 1958—were controlled even more tightly than before, and the content of each film was closely scrutinised, while many film workers were deprived of their positions and publicly criticised. Production dropped drastically and the names of team workers disappeared from the credits, to underline the importance of the group over individual contributions. On Beijing TV and provincial TV channels the only programmes broadcast at the beginning of the Cultural Revolution were reports on Mao Zedong swimming across the Yangzi, live transmissions of struggle sessions, or Tiananmen Square's Red Guards meetings. During this period documentary film was supposed to follow even more closely than before the slogan 'truthfulness has to serve politics', as in Educated Youth in the Countryside (1973), in which the audience is brought to a village where young people from the city experience working and living with peasants. Careful framing of the students shows them building irrigation systems or collecting rubber from the trees. The voice-over commentary names each young worker and describes their actions, backgrounds, and even their thoughts, with all expressing irreproachable communist feelings. During this troubled era only two foreign filmmakers, communist sympathisers themselves, were allowed to shoot documentaries in China: Joris Ivens and Michelangelo Antonioni (How Yukong Moved the Mountains, 1976, and China, 1972 respectively).

At the very end of the 1970s, after a decade of turmoil and as the country started the Reform and Opening Policy under Deng Xiaoping's rule, the development of television began to seriously affect the position of the Central Newsreel and Documentary Studio as the main provider of documentary films. TV news programmes and the beginning of reform in the audiovisual sector reconfigured the modes of production and dissemination of documentary films. The reforms aimed to implement economic autonomy in the cinematographic sector—distribution, screening and production—and allow coproduction with private companies. The position of documentaries weakened in the film industry—they were less lucrative than feature films for newly economically responsible cinema theatres—but their presence increased on television networks. In 1993 the Central Newsreel and Documentary Studio was placed under the supervision of China Central Television (CCTV), its main task being to supply documentary programmes for television channels. Being drawn away from the realm of cinema, documentary films became television products, which secured them as a prominent educational media, but also made them more economically constrained. At first, television documentaries maintained most of the characteristics inherited from the Central Newsreel and Documentary Studio, but soon the growing influence of the market demanded more diversity and brought new opportunities for filmmakers to experiment with their medium. Yesteryear's 'mouthpiece of the Party', television started to be considered a tool of information and entertainment, trying to attract audiences with new types of programmes and thus new forms of documentaries. During the mid-1980s movement of 'cultural fever', and among great debates about the course of reforms, an important television documentary generated a heated controversy. This eight-part series called River's Elegy, broadcast twice in 1988 on CCTV, was a joint production of CCTV and external collaborators. Though it became a great audience success, River's Elegy was also very controversial. Supported by then Party General Secretary Zhao Ziyang and the reformist faction of the CCP, its narrative conflicted with the conservatives' views on reform, and would later be denounced as one of the causes of the Tiananmen incidents in 1989. Its main authors, Xia Jun, Su Xiaokang and Wang Luxiang, used the cycles of the Yellow River as a symbol of the eternal return of political disasters in Chinese history. Depicting Chinese culture in a negative manner expressed a wish for changes and reforms, and articulated a criticism of the conservatism in the CCP, the current Chinese political system being compared to older forms of despotism. Visually, this series draws close to becoming a travelogue, and the tone of the half poetic, half messianic voice-over commentary is similar to the all-knowing voice of god of 'traditional' documentaries. However, the novelty of River's Elegy lies in its political content, also carried by 'real' interviews, notably of a prominent philosopher of the 1980s, Jin Guantao.

The Tiananmen Square massacre of 1989 froze the relative freedom of criticism and cultural opening up of the 1980s, but not the course of economic reform in terms of the mode of production of TV programmes. After a certain period of stagnation, and even repression, documentary films were then reinvented both inside and outside of the official structures, owing to innovative television programmes and a growing movement of independent filmmakers recording China's present and past in a more personal way. While some important documentary projects were cancelled after the events, and while political control over broadcasting increased, television channels were still experimenting with new forms of (noncontroversial) documentary programmes, and some individuals also started to shoot their own personal documentary projects. Shi Jian's Tiananmen, an eight-part documentary series, each episode fifty minutes long, is an example of the U-turn taken by television channels. Although it received the approval of the network at the start of filming in 1988, this documentary showing various people living around the famous square was then forbidden to be broadcast after completion in 1991.

The new documentary forms appearing on television during the 1990s belonged to a genre called 'entertainment documentary programmes'. These TV documentaries tried to get closer to ordinary people and reflect their personal lives. Life Space, created in 1993, was a short documentary programme (eight to ten minutes long) that appeared among other 'infotainment' subjects in the programme Oriental Time. Its purpose was to 'let ordinary people tell their own stories', and this proximity to individual concerns was the reason for its success. Similar documentaries multiplied on other TV channels, all of them quite successful in focusing on ordinary people instead of the grand themed narratives found in earlier television documentaries. Later, this trend generated into other TV programmes using a participatory filmmaking process: Ordinary People's Lives created in early 2000 had ordinary people filming their own personal lives. Professionals monitored the editing and the narrative construction, but this pioneering programme still allowed normal citizens to participate in the making of images and to express their personal concerns on national television.

Most of these novelty programmes came, in fact, from filmmakers who, besides working for television networks, also had their personal projects and were using the channel's equipment (cameras and editing rooms) to complete their own films. With or without the agreement of their employers, and not necessarily with the prospect of broadcasting the final product, they started to film reality in a more personal way. Jiang Yue, for instance, who contributed to Life Space, and also worked for Tibetan TV, filmed The Other Bank (1995), a recording of Mou Sen's creation of Gao Xingjian's play. Duan Jinchuan, employed by Tibetan TV, became internationally famous for his independent project No. 16 Barkhor South Street in 1997. Wu Wenguang, formerly employed by Kunming TV, started to film his artist friends from 1988 to 1991, and finally established himself as an 'independent' director.

A certain number of common points are shared by these 'independent' filmmakers and are manifest in these films: a rejection of television documentary conventions such as explanatory voice-over commentary and a certain influence of direct cinema embodied in the frequent use of observational camera. No. 16 Barkhor South Street, for instance, showed the daily tasks of a neighbourhood committee in Lhasa without the intervention of the filmmaker, who focused instead on depicting the protagonists, their aspirations, difficulties and personal stories, without imposing judgment on the audience.

In Bumming in Beijing the precarious lives of five wishful artists, all friends of the director Wu Wenguang, are shown through discussions between the filmmaker and the protagonists, and shots depicting their everyday lives. Through this film, Wu Wenguang drew a portrait of a generation of young, marginal artists struggling to find means, and meaning, in their lives.

By the end of the 1990s the commercialisation of small digital cameras and editing software for personal computers brought new possibilities for filmmakers. In China a growing number of amateurs or professionals started to record reality and express themselves with this new technology. As more films and directors appeared throughout the country, the tiny group of independent documentary filmmakers grew into a 'movement' and attracted worldwide attention for the subjects they dealt with and the aesthetics they proposed. The films' circulation, restricted in the past to very small circles of friends or film festivals abroad, started to reach in the 2000s a limited but growing national audience, thanks to independent film festivals, screenings and archive collections in newly established alternative film structures.

Ranging from humble amateur recordings to acclaimed masterpieces, the diversity of the films encompassed in this movement seems quite broad, as much as the differences between the filmmakers themselves. Through investigation of historical issues (Hu Jie), social activism (Ai Xiaoming), memory seeking (Wang Bing) or formal experiments (Huang Weikai), the common practices of the filmmakers ensure for this movement a coherence by focusing on China's social transformations, while their differences make possible a plurality never seen before in Chinese documentary films.

The 'New Documentary Film' movement has contributed greatly to renewing the documentary style and expanding the range of topics filmed in China. However, it still has to find an economically viable way to survive among other more appealing film productions, and to secure a legitimate position vis-à-vis the Chinese audiovisual institutions. Its role within society and its growing position on the international stage will, it is hoped, help the filmmakers to continue their work and push the boundaries of Chinese documentary films.

China!

(US, Greene, 1965)

A socially and politically important film when first released, China! remains a striking and powerful document of Felix Greene's desire to show the West, for the first time, just how vibrant and progressive life was for the majority of Chinese since the Communist Revolution. The film is not as complete as some of Greene's other documentaries on China, such as One Man's China (1972), or as focused, as in Freedom Railway (1974), but China! can be seen as an early representation of Greene's guerrilla filmmaking style, which is more fully realized in Inside North Vietnam (1973), and of his artistic skill of using color, montage, sound, and a highly controlled narrative structure so as to inform, but also persuade, the viewer that the West has been misinformed as to the quality of life in communist China.

In 1963 Greene did not set out to make a documentary when he visited China. His goal was to study the nation so as to gather material for another book. After filming for four months and traveling fifteen thousand miles, Greene and his photographer, Hsu Chih-Chiang, had more than twelve hours of film. The resulting film was produced and written by Felix Greene and edited by John Jeremy. Greene recorded the music, mostly of Chinese songs played on traditional instruments. Narrator Alexander Scourby's minimal contribution of informative voice-overs allows the viewer to focus on the images and the actions of the people. However, the US Justice Department attempted to prevent the exhibition of China! on the grounds that, since the film stock was exposed in China, bringing the film into the United States would make it an import that would require a special license, which they would not grant. Senator Fulbright intervened on Greene's behalf and convinced Secretary of State Rusk and members of the White House that the film should be released. This controversy did not hurt, for China! proved to be a success, earning favorable reviews from The New York Times, running for sixteen weeks at Carnegie Hall Cinema, and showing in one hundred and sixty-five American cities.

China! is organized into two distinct sections. The first, a prologue narrated by Greene, serves as a preview of representative images to come (of schoolchildren, or parades, for example), while also establishing the central theme of the film—that Greene's own perceptions of China, and therefore possibly our own, have been incorrect. As Greene comments in the prologue, 'I know very well how personal feelings and evaluations can influence any kind of reporting, whether it's in newspapers or on film. So you will see China as I saw it'. There are two montage sequences in China!, and both exhibit a distinct stylistic difference from the rest of the film. The first comes soon after Greene's statement. Here, a series of quick shots of life in China, the first being a dramatic point-of-view parachute drop, followed by parades, workers, dancers, and other archetypal images that are repeated throughout China!, are cut together to the rhythm of the song 'Socialism is Good', sung by the Shanghai Workers' Cultural Palace. It is a sequence and song that, despite Greene's previous statement regarding the inclusion of one's own beliefs in a movie, lies at the heart of the film's argument that the Marxist Revolution helped to bring China from a destitute nation rife with poverty, disease, and class warfare, to a civilization that was ready to enter into the modern world and succeed.

The prologue sets the argument in place, but it is with the remainder of the film that Greene attempts to support his ideological convictions. Communist China is first contextualized by Greene in a series of archival images of the 1931 Japanese invasion and the subsequent civil war between the factions of Mao Tse-tung and Chiang Kai-shek. The final black-and-white newsreel shot, that of an infant wailing in the arms of its mother while their village lies in ruins, fades, and suddenly we are witness to a sea of red flags at the annual celebration of the Revolution.

This use of graphic discontinuity serves to bring the audience into modern China; it is a country that is alive with striking colors—the orange molten metal used to make trucks, the green rice fields, the white snow in the northern regions. This sudden graphic transition also supports the film's sense of historical progression, that through surviving the horrors of the first half of the twentieth century, China has established a system of government that treats all citizens as integral persons who will help bring about positive moral and industrial change.

The citizens of Shanghai are better off because of the sweeping economic and social reforms that transformed the city from a criminal and moral cesspool into a leading economy and a sober example of socialism at work. This may be one of the more serious drawbacks of Greene's film: at times it borders on propaganda. Although there were areas of China that were off-limits to Greene and Hsu, Greene did not attempt to broach the subject of human rights abuses in the nation, or of the countless millions who were executed in political purges. Instead, there are short segments on different aspects of Chinese life: school, entertainment, manufacturing, family, art, farming, advancements in medicine, life in a typical rural village, and the building of a causeway from the mainland to the island of Amoy. Each segment follows the same general style of framing: a series of extreme long shots to introduce the topic, of terraced farming, for example, followed by a series of medium and close-up shots of the people at work. Life in China! does not seem very different from life in the Western world, and although that may be Greene's implicit belief in this far left-leaning film, the unanswered questions regarding the past and current state of human rights in China remain highly problematic.

Chronique d'un été

(France, Rouch and Morin, 1961)

From its opening sequence, Chronique d'un été/Chronicle of a Summer self-consciously proclaimed its novelty: 'this film was not played by actors, but lived by men and women who have given a few moments of their lives to a new experiment in cinéma vérité'. The film has since been celebrated as a turning point in the history of the documentary film.

A joint project of sociologist Edgar Morin and filmmaker Jean Rouch, Chronique d'un été was conceived as a query into how Parisians lived their lives. Taking advantage of a newly portable sync-sound technology that made it possible to film people speaking spontaneously, the filmmakers took to the street, stopping Parisians with the question: 'Are you happy?' The film gradually comes to focus on a handful of characters: a worker, two immigrants, and a concentration camp survivor. Following them through the summer of 1960, the film achieved an unforgettable portrait of its times and breached a new way of filmmaking—cinéma vérité. Despite the confusion generated by this term, Chronique d'un été did not make simplistic claims to truthfulness. A self-reflexive film if ever there was one, it articulated the question of what truth means in the cinema, with unprecedented force and sophistication.

This experiment certainly did not arise in a void. The name cinéma vérité, a translation of the Russian Kino-Pravda (film truth), was meant to honour a predecessor, Dziga Vertov, who had done away with actors and gone out into the city in an attempt 'to catch life unawares' in the 1920s. Another often-mentioned predecessor was Robert Flaherty's Nanook of the North. The last scenes of Chronique d'un été directly mirrored Flaherty's practice of showing the film subjects rough cuts and recording their reactions.

The experiment was also deeply rooted in its own times. For those documentary filmmakers who were becoming weary of 'showing life in its Sunday best' (Morin 1985: 4), the new portable sync-sound equipment opened the way to unprecedented explorations of the everyday. In its attempt to go beyond 'the official and the ritualised', the cinéma vérité introduced by Chronique d'un été shared many affinities with its American contemporary, direct cinema (Rothman 1997: 87).

The classic distinction between cinéma vérité and kindred experiments like direct cinema is that 'cinéma vérité provokes and participates, whereas direct cinema observes' (Rothman 1997: 87). In Erik Barnouw's memorable formulation, the filmmaker acts as a 'catalyst' for the action of its subjects (Barnouw 1993: 253). Rouch insisted that 'he did not film reality as it was but reality as it was provoked in the act of filmmaking. It is this new reality, which would not exist apart from the making of the film, that the filming 'documents' revealing a new truth, a cinema truth' (Rothman 1997: 87). Insofar as his subjects were concerned, Rouch did not try to play down or disguise the presence of the camera. Assuming 'the disjunction caused by the very presence of the camera', he expected 'that people will act, will lie, will be uncomfortable', and regarded 'this manifestation of this side of themselves as the most profound revelation that anything a "candid" camera or "living cinema" could reveal' (Eaton 1979: 51). In other words, cinéma vérité is based on the premise that the masks that people choose for themselves, and the way they wear them on screen, can be more telling than a soul-baring confession.

The truth that cinéma vérité hopes to reveal is thus akin to 'psychoanalytic truth, that is, precisely that which is hidden or repressed comes to the surface in these roles' that people play in front of the camera (Morin 1985: 5). From the very beginning, Morin envisioned replacing the interviews and dialogue of traditional documentary film with a 'psychodrama carried out collectively among authors and characters' (Morin 1985: 6). He believed that this intersection between psychoanalysis and film was 'one of the richest and least exploited universes of cinematographic expression' (ibid.). The response of the characters to this psychoanalytic side of the cinéma vérité experiment varied widely. These differences are polemically articulated in the last scene of the film, as the participants openly discuss their impressions of the rough cut. They are largely divided into two camps that reproach each other for having been either 'too real', or 'not real enough'. This polemic crystallizes around the two women protagonists, Marceline and Marilou. Marilou argues that 'to have a tiny spark of truth the character has to be [...] alone and on the verge of a nervous breakdown' (Feld 1985: 68). This is, of course, exactly how she is throughout the film, baring her soul in tête-à-tête with Morin. In her confession she attempts to communicate her extreme alienation from the world and from herself. Her success in communicating her alienation, that is, her inability to communicate to Morin and, through the camera, to the world would have de facto cured her alienation, but this talking cinema cure fails and Marilou falls helplessly, desperately silent in front of the camera in a gesture that Rothman interprets as an onstage suicide (Rothman 1997: 77–8). Unable to express and thus vanquish her alienation, Marilou is condemned to poignantly reenact it in front of the camera.

While Marilou's confessions are considered by some of the characters/viewers to be the most moving part of the film, other characters openly attack them as 'indecent and exhibitionistic'. The starkest critic is Marceline, who opposes Marilou's confessional mode with a careful direction of her own stage persona. Marceline revisits her most intimate and traumatic memories in front of the camera—memories of her time in the concentration camps, her relationship to her father who was also deported, and to the family she had left behind. However, Marceline insists that the heartrending scene of her walking alone through a deserted Paris and reminiscing about her past was a thoroughly controlled and crafted performance that she had carefully planned in advance. What we see in the film, Marceline claims, is just one of many possible 'characters of Marceline' that she created for the medium of film (Morin and Rouch 1985: 77). Marceline's self-creation testifies to her sophisticated understanding of film as a specific medium with certain expressive possibilities and limitations. (Marceline also notes that during her performance she consciously thought of Hiroshima Mon Amour and also of Michelangelo Antonioni's films.) Marceline's insistence on her acting is also a reminder of the existence of a part of her that is not on display in the film, a part of her that is not public and not accessible through this particular medium. While exposing a most vulnerable part of herself, Marceline also lays claim to her ability to control that exposure, not only by acting but also by directing her performance. (Thus her displeasure when the directors of the film override her self-direction and manipulate her character (ibid.)) Of all the characters, Marceline appears most aware of the politics and power dynamics of the film, and most invested in controlling her own representation.

The debate between Marceline and Marilou's modes of self-presentation throws new light on the initial psychoanalytic ambitions of the film. In the course of the filming, it is clear that Morin's idea of a communal psychodrama openly played between actors and authors remains utopian. The direction of the psychoanalytic exploration is marked by strong power dynamics. There is no psychoanalyzing of the directors by the characters. Among the characters, it is the women who are the choice subjects of analysis. Marceline accepts the premise of the game, that is, that the roles that one plays in front of the camera may reveal a deep part of oneself, but she is intent on carefully directing what gets revealed. In carefully constructing a persona or mask that expresses her, she guards herself against those privileged moments in cinéma vérité where the director and spectator see, through the cracks and slippages of hasty masks, parts of the character of which she is unaware or would rather repress. Unlike Marilou, who has little control over her persona and helplessly lays herself bare in front of the camera, Marceline usurps the position of power that the cinéma vérité director, spectator, and the psychoanalyst traditionally share.

If Chronique d'un été uses a psychoanalytic lens to approach some of its characters, its overall scope is much wider. In Edgar Morin's words, the film was conceived as an ethnographic study 'in the strong sense of the term: it studie[d] humanity' (Morin 1985: 6). The film was to participate in forging a new direction in ethnographic filmmaking 'by emphasizing kinship rather than exotic foreignness' (Morin 1985: 5). Having made his name directing ethnographic films in Africa, Rouch intended to turn his ethnographic lens toward 'his own tribe'. One of the most interesting aspects of this ethnographic project is contributed by Laundry, a student from Côte d'Ivoire. The film's casting of Laundry in the role of 'African explorer of a France on vacation' (Morin 1985: 13) attempts to reverse the traditional ethnographic relationship between white observer and colonized subject. Laundry catalyzes some of the most revelatory discussions of the film, revealing a rich spectrum of contemporary French attitudes towards colonization, race, and racism. At the same time, this casting of Laundry in the role of explorer is limiting. The film is interested in Laundry in as much as he can shed light on French society, and less in him as a new member of that society. For example, as Laundry remarked, in the discussion on interracial marriage the film gave airtime only to the white women's attitudes toward marrying blacks, while excluding his and other black students' ideas about marrying whites.

Chronique d'un été's ethnographic project was planned as a survey of contemporary France taken 'at three levels: the level of private life, internal and subjective; the level of work and social relations; and finally the level of present history, dominated by the war in Algeria' (Morin 1985: 10). The two directors disagreed, however, on the method of bringing this project into being. Rouch was interested in organizing the film chronologically and focusing it tightly on just a few characters (Morin 1985: 24). Morin wished for a less individualized, 'mosaic-like montage of sequences' sustained by the question 'How do you live?' (ibid.). As a result, the film often vacillates between these two main approaches, sometimes further divided by the diverging approaches of the characters. Nowhere is this more evident than in the representation of the worker's plight in contemporary France. The film starts by formally interviewing a group of workers who sharply express their dissatisfaction with the conditions of their work. Then, in one of its most innovative moves, the film focuses on one worker, Angelou, following him from the moment his eyes open in the morning throughout his work day and leisure hours to bedtime. This sequence suggestively shows the alienation that the workers had openly articulated in the previous scenes. Once again changing registers, the camera descends into the factory where it films people at work. This factory scene briefly flirts with another movie genre, what a worker calls 'a film about work in the twentieth century', a film that Angelou wishes would record life in the factory, with an emphasis on relationships among workers, unions, and management (Morin and Rouch 1985: 76–7). This oscillation between different cinematic registers is representative of the experimental, searching quality of the film. At times this experimentation might threaten the unity of the film, but it also allows for a plurality of approaches to the workers' problem to coexist.

As Edgar Morin modestly put it: 'The film is a hybrid, and this hybridness is as much the cause of its infirmity as of its interrogative virtue' (Morin 1985: 26). Chronique d'un été relinquished the authority of the traditional voice-over and instead allowed its subjects to speak spontaneously. As the debate between Marceline and Marilou shows, the ensuing dialogue was not always free of tension or of problematic power dynamics. Furthermore, allowing a plurality of voices to be heard assumed the risk of creating a cacophony. Still, this imperfect plurality is one of the path-breaking achievements of the film. It gave the film its experimental novelty and complexity, which has made Chronique d'un été an inspiration for the upcoming documentary and nouvelle cinema.

Chulas Fronteras

(US, Blank, 1976)

Les Blank's Chulas Fronteras holds a prominent place in this documentary director's notable body of work, many of his films dealing with the folk music of communities on the fringes of mainstream America or with the specific delights of particular foods. It is a loving ode to the conjunto music of the Texas–Mexico frontier. (A conjunto is a small group including an accordion, a twelve-string guitar, a bass, and drums.) The solid research was provided by producer and writer Chris Strachwitz, founder of Arhoolie Records. When Chulas Fronteras was made (in 1976), the music was little known outside the Chicano world, but Blank's film contributed to its wider dissemination and was to inspire later, enthusiastically appreciative documentary treatments. The title means 'Beautiful Borderlands' and it suggests the considerable strengths but also the limits of Chulas Fronteras. It is above all a presentation and celebration through music of a simplified, occasionally sentimentalized version of Tex-Mex life (in general outside the big cities) and only 'a selective' exploration of the more complex experience, emotions, and society behind the music.

The Rio Grande (for Mexicans the Rio Bravo) passes behind the credits as water and a blue curve on the map along with a song of yearning for the Mexico left behind. The beauty of Texas-Mexican women is sung and soon after, the camera roams through a barbecue and later, in the kitchen of singer Lydia Mendoza, another mouth-watering abundance of food as she and other women prepare tamales. We hear Mendoza's rendition of Mal Hombre, about a woman enchanted and deceived in her youth by an unfaithful man. The song plus the food (and other songs about women performed by male conjunto singers) add up to a traditional depiction of the role of the woman in an essentially conservative and seemingly static society. There is no presentation of the extended impact of machismo or of possibly more independent roles for women in a society of immigrants. Even for its time, the film tends toward a nostalgic vision rooted in the past. It also ignores the darker, more stoically tragic side of the northern Mexican sensibility in general. There are no songs (common in norteño music) about the defense of honor or a man's reckless or heroic embracing of death.

The social dilemma of the Mexican immigrant (or illegal 'wetback') of the time does appear strongly, taking up the middle third of the film. Blank uses a mixture of expressively cut footage from the present, moments of interview and photos of workers (and some of their oppressors), many from decades earlier. The photos are seen through an orange-tinted filter as we hear a corrido (ballad) sung about a strike in the melon fields, with the footage full of oranges and carrots and the laborers who pick them. A story of anti-Mexican prejudice and an organizing song for Cesar Chavez's Farmworkers' Union led up to the high point of the sequence, the blessing of the vehicles, suddenly without music, as a priest sprinkles rows of cars and trucks with holy water and blesses them in Spanish. The camera panning across vehicles and faces, together with the rare absence of music, turns the blessing of the vehicles into the most solemn moment of Chulas Fronteras. Most of these vehicles will carry Mexican farm laborers northward in search of more crops, often with adolescents taken out of school to help feed the families.

The extended cadenza on social issues ends with a fairly long interview sequence, at least for this film, which skims along elegantly and boisterously to the swift, dance-beat of the conjuntos. A tractor driver working near the border comments on the need for schooling, for youngsters to have the time to learn how to better themselves, and on the hardships of the wandering life, which he has earlier described as the pattern of his own childhood, a constant moving from state to state and crop to crop through a long year of harvesting. More securely employed as he is now, he is grateful that he need not travel 'north'.

This sense of enforced travel, a necessary but difficult roaming away from home, is the primary serious underpinning of Chulas Fronteras, like a bass note below all the visible and audible vocals and accordions and guitars. It marks the present-day Mexican Diaspora, too, with its much greater numbers and its dispersion across the entire United States into numerous different lines of hard work. However, it is still a Diaspora that retains close links to its spatial origins—practical (in the importance of the money sent back home) and emotional (in the will to return). From this angle, the tone of the film still rings true about important aspects of the Chicano and emigrant Mexican experience.

The concluding movement, as it should be, is all musicians and music, with one performer, El Flaco ('Skinny') Jiménez, embodying continuity in time. He performs, he teaches the accordion to his young son, and we also see his father playing the same instrument and telling us he learned from his father, who was 'one of the best accordionists of his time' and whom we know only through a photo. Then quickly, with a sound cut to another voice repeating the word padre, another photo of a musician father appears and another description of musical skill passed down as inheritance, to yet another accordionist, Eugenio Abrego of the group Los Alegres de Terán. The elegant sequence deserves its critical placement, because the rapid runs of the accordions dominate the instrumental sound of the film while, for most of the many songs, clever lyrics soar with a sense of music as pure pleasure. It is from the beautifully recorded music and the inventive images mirroring its notes—from animals skittering at a zoo to dancers to farm laborers to a bouncing, swaying low-rider automobile—that Chulas Fronteras derives its verve and its lasting value.

Churchill's Island

(Canada, Legg, 1941)

Churchill's Island is primarily remembered as the first film of the National Film Board of Canada to win an Academy Award (best documentary, 1941). However, it is not so much its acceptance by the commercial mainstream, as its departure from that mainstream's conventions and institutional presuppositions, that makes the film historically significant and of some continuing interest. Churchill's Island marks the visible beginning of a Canadian film alternative to industrial Hollywood and an extension and elaboration of the documentary idea to new national circumstances and possibilities.

In the early years of its existence, the Board's founder and first commissioner, John Grierson, discovered that much of his time was occupied by administrative and political duties. As a result, much of the responsibility for day-to-day producing and mentoring fell to Stuart Legg, a Grierson recruit from the days of the Empire Marketing Board. Legg was particularly noted for his subtle grasp of public, political, and—as he would increasingly demonstrate—geopolitical issues. As head of production he would explore these topics through the Board's flagship wartime series, Canada Carries On (of which Churchill's Island was an early entry) and The World in Action.

The March of Time was an acknowledged influence on the Canadian series. Legg was impressed by the quality of its reporting, its concision, and its cinematic craft; however, Legg and his collaborators began immediately to move beyond the entertaining reportage so often characteristic of the existing newsreels. Propaganda played a role in this decision. The United States was still officially neutral with regard to the European conflict, and so the Board series had a great gap to fill in informing and motivating its domestic audiences.

Churchill's Island is a vivid response to this challenge. The film, which recounts the details of Britain's defense of itself against the Nazis, is completely compiled from the Board's extensive stock library. Future Board stalwart Tom Daly was largely responsible for maintaining this library. His seemingly complete recall of its holdings would make him increasingly central to the compilation films that would make up a good portion of the Board's early output. Daly has ascribed much of their motivational success to Legg's principle of 'waves', which was that sequences were to rise to a climax and then diminish, before the next sequence came along and increased the intensity. The emotional results are still clear in Churchill's Island, in which the high stakes, the national peril, and the national opportunity are quite palpable.

Although there were motivational (and manipulative) imperatives, Legg also intended to move his films toward the depth and breadth of the best investigative journalism. In Churchill's Island this deepening process is visibly well underway. There is a conceptual, and even dialectical, element to the film that was emblematic of the innovations and elaborations that Legg and his newsreel collaborators would develop throughout the war period. In addition to emotional appeal, there is a constant illumination of causal chains, a setting forth of the tactical and strategic elements of the conflict.

Legg introduces us to the main participants and the key processes, ensuring not only sympathetic identification, but also understanding. The exposition discusses varying threats of invasion, the defensive responses thereto, and the courage of Britain's army. These three elements recur through what are essentially the film's three acts. The first gives an account of the Blitz, during which Legg takes a characteristic retrospective turn, reviewing the causes and conditions of the German action to that point, ensuring that the audience member remains historically oriented. Next we witness the Royal Air Force's defense of Britain's skies and, from the Nazi perspective, the German blockade that was devised in response. During this second act, there is a clear discussion of the tactics of the U-boats and a frank admission of the great cost of their activities. There is also a clear message, quite common in this period (cf. London Can Take It, Foreign Correspondent), to the neutral United States. With the rising toll of sinkings, the ever more bold encroachments toward North American soil, it is intimated that no one is safe, and no one can remain neutral.

In keeping with Grierson's instruction that these films be 'truthful, but not defeatist', the warnings give way to an expression of gratitude for help rendered, and confidence for the future. The U-boats are on the run, and even as the third act outlines, and then just slightly glosses over, the possibilities of and preparations against a possible land invasion, the film moves toward a stirring climax. As the last wave crashes we hear narrator Lorne Greene's mighty challenge to the Nazis to 'come if you dare!' This justifiably famous conclusion remains extraordinarily powerful.

Churchill's Island was a great success. Along with the practically prophetic War Clouds in the Pacific (November 1941), it facilitated the remarkable access that Board newsreels would have not only to Canadian audiences but to screens in the United States as well. Although that access would continue, the tone of the newsreels would be altered. Wartime propaganda under Legg would further shift from the emotional and the partisan—however justifiable such approaches may have been at the time—to a more global, humanitarian approach. In this endeavor, Legg's sensibilities coincided with one of Grierson's most important convictions, which was that wartime films were also a preparation for peacetime, and that an awareness and anticipation of the needs of peacetime were essential to their successful execution. The Board's activities strongly prefigured the international role that Canada, and Canada's documentary films, would assume in the decades after the war.

City, The

(US, Steiner, 1939)

A brief history of the American city and a call for better civic planning, made at the behest of the American Institute of Planners, The City was one of the most celebrated and widely viewed documentary films of the 1930s and 1940s in the United States. The production benefited from financial backing from the Carnegie Corporation, which awarded $50,000 to the project, and from close collaboration among a group of gifted artists brought together to make the film. The City also had the advantage of a well-publicized debut at the New York World's Fair in May 1939, where it was screened in the Science and Education Pavillion four times daily for the next eighteen months, aptly placed among an array of fairground exhibitions devoted to the theme of 'The World of Tomorrow'. Subsequent distribution through various channels boosted The City's reputation further, although not always in ways that were in keeping with the sponsor's intentions.

Key figures in the making of The City included director-photographers Ralph Steiner and Willard Van Dyke, who formed American Documentary Films in 1938 to handle sponsored films of this kind; associate producer Henwar Rodakiewicz, who assisted at various points with the writing, directing, and editing; and composer Aaron Copland, who participated during the editing stage to create an integrated score, his first for film. Pare Lorentz, mentor to both Steiner and Van Dyke, contributed an outline that shaped the film's tone and structure. Urban critic Lewis Mumford wrote the narration, which was spoken by Morris Charnovsky of the Group Theater. The assembled talent alone ensured that critical attention would be given to this particular documentary.

For the American Institute of Planners, The City was intended to promote not simply the idea of thoughtful planning but a specific development project: 'garden' or 'green' cities, suburban centers built into the countryside, ringed by trees and hillsides and equipped with efficiently designed modern housing and hospitable spaces for work and play. In the past, the planners argued, unregulated industrial development had fractured community relations and led to incalculable environmental and human waste. 'Green' cities were the remedy. Inhabitants of these planned communities would regain the sociability and breathing space of the nineteenth-century village, while also enjoying the advantages of modern engineering, a combination made possible by the emergence of what Mumford labeled a 'neotechnic' age.

The assignment presented to the filmmakers thus involved a problem-solving narrative and images of nature and industry common to many American social documentaries of the previous decade, including those of Lorentz. In its finished form, The City organizes this material into five loosely bracketed sequences: a New England village idyll; an industrial city marked by smoke, slagheaps, and decay; a modern metropolis where the work day is automated and congested; a weekend traffic jam on a suburban highway; and a 'green' community of the kind the planners sought to promote.

Stylistic differences underscore social distinctions among the five segments. Compositions in the New England section, for example, favor horizontal framing, leisurely and lateral movement, and a balanced arrangement of people and structures, whereas the modern metropolis is defined through spatial constriction, sharp angles, and diagonal lines. Commentary, gentle and poetic in the village sequence, becomes clipped and sardonic in the industrial section that follows. Copland's innovative score establishes motifs for each section while also linking passages, as when a melodic line accompanying scenes of the New England village is recast in an elegiac key during bleaker parts of the industrial and metropolis segments, or a series of dissonant brass chords at the beginning of the industrial segment are converted into a harmonious closing at the film's end. Select stylistic devices exemplify the power of technological change, as when smokestacks multiply through superimpositions, or editing rhythms accelerate in coordination with the pace and mechanized movement of metropolitan life. A picture of the 'green' town—composited from footage of working prototypes filmed in Maryland, New Jersey, Wisconsin, and Ohio—includes aerial views of buildings set amid foliage and curved streets and roadways that thread their way to and through the community in patterns that are seemingly organic yet dynamic, conforming to topographical features. In this fashion, The City itself constituted a form of spatial planning and design.

Yet if such strategies lent emotive or expressive force to the planners' arguments, the filmmakers also clashed with the sponsors over key details, leading to telling compromises on both sides. The automated movement, rapid cutting, and sprightly music of parts of the metropolis sequence, for example, had a humorous, playful aspect that the sponsors believed undercut their sober critique. Steiner prevailed on this point, and the passage was singled out for discussion by critics, pro and con. Moreover, a contentious offscreen debate among a quartet of voices, scripted for the final segment by Rodakiewicz, was vetoed outright by the sponsors, who also demanded that the filmmakers extend the ending and spell out the advantages of the 'green' community in detail.

The City also circulated in ways that emphasized values that fell outside, and even ran counter to, the sponsor's promotional aims. The teaming of the film on a double bill with the French film La Principessa Tarakanovz/Betrayal at New York's Little Carnegie Theater in the fall of 1939, and the inclusion of The City in major documentary retrospectives mounted by the Museum of Modern Art (MoMA) in the winter of 1939–40 and again in 1946, foregrounded the aesthetic accomplishment of the film over the planners' argument. (MoMA's curator, Iris Barry, in 1946 declared the The City a 'three-quarter masterpiece on town-planning', alluding to the aesthetic weakness of the sponsor-imposed ending.) Non-theatrical distributors, including MoMA, also circulated 16mm prints to educational groups, where the historical claims of the film were more closely scrutinized. The American Association for Adult Education, for example, published a movie study guide for community groups that asked discussants to assess the political adequacy of The City's history of urban development, opening up the topic to the kind of controversy that the planning association wanted the filmmakers to avoid. During the 1940s excerpted passages from The City also were recycled in montage sequences of urban life in a variety of different films, including War Comes to America (1945), a US Army documentary; Humoresque (1947), a Warner Bros. urban melodrama; and Mr Blandings Builds his Dream House (1948), an RKO urban-suburban comedy. From this angle, the durability of The City seems in part a function of the varied kinds of attention it attracted and a stylistic virtuosity that permitted individual sequences to take on an identity apart from the whole.

City of Gold

(Canada, Koenig and Low, 1957)

The National Film Board of Canada's City of Gold (1957) is one of the most celebrated short films ever produced and is one of the most decorated. Its numerous international awards, as well as its influence on the historical documentary and on noted contemporary filmmakers, testify to its merit and innovation.

City of Gold relates the history of the 1898 Klondike Gold Rush. The origins of the film lie in the 1949 discovery of several hundred Klondike-era photographs in Dawson City, of the Yukon Territories. These images, preserved on 8 x 10 glass-plate negatives, had been stored and forgotten in a sod-roof cabin and were found only by chance just before its demolition. They were largely the work of A.E. Hegg, an American photojournalist and entrepreneur, who captured the ferment of the Gold Rush with extraordinary vividness.

In ensuing years, through numerous means, these remarkable images attained wide circulation. In 1955 board director and animator Colin Low saw them at Ottawa's National Archive. He had been working on a Gold Rush project and quickly saw that these photographs might provide his film's centre. The challenge for Low and his collaborators was determining how to render this windfall of static imagery in some kind of dynamic cinematic fashion.

The solution came in the form of a mechanism devised by Roman Kroitor and Brian Salt, which enabled Low and codirector Wolf Koenig to plot and execute the most minute camera movements with complete precision and to explore their fixed images with unprecedented flexibility and fluidity. It is for this innovation that City of Gold is most cited today, but the film would probably remain a mere technical footnote were it not for the material that the technology served and the sensibilities that informed the arrangement and presentation.

City of Gold was a collaboration. In its production there was a democratization of roles and relationships and a neutralization of film elements, resulting in an impressively integrated work of art and information. These characteristics and qualities were strongly associated with the board's legendary Unit B, of which City of Gold is perhaps the most well-known product. In the ideal Unit B production, the ego of individualism was subordinated to the needs and values of the creative community and, as behooved a publicly funded institution, of the larger community the creators served. The idea and actuality of Unit B at the Film Board was not without contradiction and controversy. Nevertheless, with this film and with many others besides, the ideal and the real seem to have been substantially correlated.

City of Gold is notable for being very well made. There is a telling tension between the stasis of present-day Dawson, as illustrated by the film's live-action prologue and epilogue, and the dynamism of the still photographs that preserve the vivid past. The contrast is emphasized by the exquisite transitions between the two periods. Much of the credit for this seamless assembly goes to editor, and Unit B head, Tom Daly.

Daly pointed out that the edges of the photographs were never shown, leaving audiences with the illusion of extended offscreen spaces. This quality had been integral to realist filmmaking for some time, but what was remarkable was how that space operated in a photographed context. As Erik Barnouw observed, it was not only space that was expanded in City of Gold, but time as well. The vividness of the images and the superb coordination of their rendering opened up the documentary film to times and events that predated it.

Some of the credit for this must also go to Eldon Rathburn's superb score. The immediacy of the historical is also aided by the film's narration, cowritten and delivered by Pierre Berton, a Dawson native who was on the brink of becoming Canada's most prolific and popular historian. The voice that he presents combines the scholar's rigor with the citizen's affection and commitment. This combination communicates a concrete sense of past realities, as well as a clear sense of their relevance to the present.

Low and Koenig's film appeared at an important juncture in the development of the North, and the Canadian identity. Dire notions of the inhospitable and the impossible had long pervaded northern representations. Inevitably these pictures had affected the perceptions and self-concept of the nation as a whole; however, competing voices had also spoken for the necessity, even the inevitability, of successful community in this savage environment. In the light of more recent events (the Leduc oil strike of 1947, the subsequent establishment of the Canadian pipeline system, the dissemination of native cultural ideas and aspirations), this idea had assumed even greater importance. For the sake of the region's own economic and social development, there was a need for a more nuanced, more optimistic view of the region.

City of Gold filled a number of present needs, and it continues to resonate in more contemporary contexts. In parallel to the organization that produced it, the film recalls how individual pursuit within a strong community led to great prosperity in the midst of environmental and geographical obstacles. It presents a model for peaceful relations between Americans and Canadians, in which the values of both sides are defended and combined to greatest mutual advantage. It affirms the importance of history's obscure, for whom difficulties are assured, but whose flexibility and decency in the face of inevitable frustration presents a worthy model for living, and for representing life.

Clair, René

René Clair was a French filmmaker whose films spanned forty years and represented a wide variety of genres, from experimental shorts to musicals to Hollywood studio dramas. His contribution to theories of documentary film was chiefly as a writer who championed the power of the film image as a nonnarrative form of communication, the importance of film rhythm and movement, and the independence of film as an art form. Condensing the thinking of several different French avant-garde intellectual traditions in the late 1910s and 1920s with his practical experience in the French studio system, Clair valued films whenever their fantastic or documentary powers circumvented, or offered alternatives to, traditional fictional narratives. As a practitioner of documentary and documentary-influenced film, he was interested in conveying the realities of the city (in his case, Paris) through on-location shooting. He was not a believer in the absolute truth conveyed by the image itself. His experiences with Dada, the iconoclastic post-World War I art movement, led in part to his films playing with an image's absolute truth through contrapuntal sound or camera work. In theory and in practice, Clair always foregrounded the process of filmmaking as it created reality rather than simply reproducing it on film; in addition, he always emphasized the power of film in general (and documentary film in particular) as a visceral experience with its own unconscious communicative power unrelated to that of other arts.

Clair first participated in the film industry as a newspaper writer and actor. His writing entered into the ‘great debates’ in French film magazines during the 1920s, where film critics and practitioners argued over the purpose and direction cinema should take (Abel 1988). Poetic documentaries—epitomized by Nanook of the North (1922)—flourished in this period, and Clair used these documentaries as examples of what film could achieve as an independent art form. In his opinion, the documentary was the only genre that could communicate its message in a wholly new way because it was the only one not parasitically dependent on earlier art forms. While the French films d’art of the 1920s seemed dependent on theater and literature as models, Clair believed that the documentary made it possible to communicate ideas, emotions, and intellectual arguments purely through the visual experience. In an essay on the Abel Gance film La Roue, he rejects the literary and theatrical aspirations of the ‘cinema of ideas’ in favor of a cinema that creates ideas in the mind of the viewer through image and movement alone:

Oh, if M. Abel Gance would only give up making locomotives say yes and no, lending a railroad engineer the thoughts of antiquity, and quoting his favorite authors! If he were willing to create a pure documentary, since he knows how to give life to a machine part, a hand, a branch, a wisp of smoke! If only he were willing to contribute in that way to the creation of the Film that can barely be glimpsed today! Oh, if he were willing to give up literature and place his trust in the cinema!

(quoted in Abel 1988)

Here, Abel Gance is made to stand in for all filmmakers who lazily use conventions for earlier art forms instead of using film to communicate in a new way. Gance’s films are both metaphorical and descriptive, but Clair believed that ‘pure documentary’ could show instead of telling. Through lighting, shot framing, and the like film invested an object with meaning and life that could be interpreted or intuited by the viewer on an unconscious level. This idea is similar to that of other theorists of ‘photogenic’, a belief that the skill of an auteur and the power of film as a medium could articulate previously unseen truths about objects, faces, and places (such as the ‘life’ Gance imbues in hands, branches, and smoke). This understanding of the image is similar to that expressed in cinematic impressionism, a French movement that used pure and often not referential film images to convey a subjective, poetic emotion. Clair’s ideas about the power of the documentary image are not purely impressionist, however, as they focus on the power of the image and the film as both subinfluence, but Clair’s understanding of the power of documentary film belongs to a larger tradition of European modernism. This movement held, among other things, that old narrative forms could no longer adequately communicate the realities of the newly mechanized world (particularly after World War I), and instead it turned to forms that worked through fragmentation, collage, juxtaposition, and unconscious association. For Clair, this meant that ‘pure cinema’ untainted by commercial concerns could never truly exist, but the filmmaker could create fragments of purely visual story that communicated emotion unconsciously and helped the audience arrive at a new understanding of reality. Clair is best known as a filmmaker shaped by Dada and surrealism, and those art movements shared with cinematic impressionism a belief in the dreamlike power of images. Clair also took from Dada in particular a sense of film’s power, through montage, to thwart conventional understanding. He believed that the logical culmination of the poetic documentaries of the 1920s would be a chain of images held together by ‘no definable link but united by a secret harmony’ (Clair 1972) like that which unified his seemingly nonsensical Dadaist film, Entr’acte. Clair thought that a film with a sense that was structural rather than narrative would hold a viewer’s attention in the same way that a symphony does. Although Clair was initially opposed to sound film (chiefly because he thought it would return film to the status of theater), he later believed it had the same power to shock through juxtaposition with the image. His musicals in the 1930s and his later writing used sound to counterpoint, ironize, or call into question the unmediated reality the image presents, a technique important to many documentarians, and to those who use found footage in particular.

As an actor in Louis Feuillade’s troupe, Clair was exposed to an important early French film tradition, one that had the most concrete influence on his experiences as a documentary filmmaker. This movement, described by critics as

'pictorialist naturalism' was influenced by the theories of nineteenth- and twentieth-century writer Emile Zola, whose novels of lower-class life explored the effect environment has on character (Aitken 2001). In practice, this meant that the films used on-location shooting and nonprofessional actors in an attempt to represent objective, unmediated, and unaestheticized reality. Even in his serials like Les Vampires, a fantastic crime thriller that the surrealists loved for its bizarre plots and imagery, Feuillade still shot on-location to document the reality of Paris at night, a reality that he believed could not be realized on a constructed set.

Clair shot on location for La Tour/The Eiffel Tower (1928), his only documentary, as well as the street scenes in his science fiction film, Paris qui dort/The Crazy Ray (1925). These films emphasize film's rhythmic qualities and the emotional and intellectual resonance of an image's movement and duration. For Clair, movement was the most important and effective technique for unconsciously conveying the film's meaning to the viewer: 'I don't mean the movement recorded in the shot itself, but the movement of the shots in relation to one another. Movement, the primary base of cinematic lyricism, whose mysterious rules become clearer every day' (Dale 1986). He used this concept to think about the basic elements of montage, such as shot length, action, and the visual field, in a musical way, taking into account the feelings of shock and connection that arise from each shot's place in the larger composition.

Through both his on-location shooting and his musical techniques of composition in La Tour and Paris qui dort, Clair can be understood as part of a larger tradition of European modernist documentary films of the 1920s and 1930s, and in particular the 'city symphony films' such as Rien que les heures/Nothing but the Hours (1926), Chelovek s kinoapparatom/Man with the Movie Camera (1929), and Berlin: Die Symphonie der Großstadt/Berlin: The Symphony of a Great City (1927). Neither of Clair's films aspires to the kind of epic totality in its presentation of the rhythms of urban life seen in those films. The city scenes in Paris qui dort are part of a larger narrative and La Tour is about one landmark rather than Paris as a whole. Clair does share with Vertov the interest in paralleling the rhythms of city life with those of film itself, in particular by calling attention to materiality and construction of the film. In Paris qui dort, a mad scientist uses a ray to stop all motion in Paris, and the few residents who are not immobilized ransack the city, eating in fine restaurants and stealing from stores. Because of the scientist's actions, documentary footage of Paris pauses, fast forwards, and rewinds, showing the city while calling attention to how the city gets shown. Here, Clair is using film techniques such as stop-motion to undercut the intrinsic, unquestioned reality of the city in the same way that he later uses sound to undercut the intrinsic truth of the image.

La Tour uses rhythm and movement to redefine the viewer's understanding of the most clichéd of Paris landmarks, the Eiffel Tower. This film is an articulation of all Clair's theories of the poetic documentary, as it unites film's ability to show the world in a fantastic or impossible way and its ability to communicate the concrete details of reality. Clair starts the film with a conventional postcard view of the Eiffel Tower, then splits this whole image into rapidly changing impressions of different pieces of the tower coming together and moving apart. This section's composition owes much to Cubist painting, particularly its method of presenting disparate views of an object as a way of both emphasizing the subjective nature of perception and presenting a more complete picture than a 'whole' view of the Eiffel Tower would give. Clair transcends the techniques of the canvas, however, by constantly showing these different fragments in motion. As with Paris qui dort, Clair uses techniques such as fast motion and superimposition as a way of defamiliarizing a familiar place and calling into question precisely how we perceive it. Clair is somewhat interested in the tower's history. He shows a picture of Georges Eiffel and some blueprints and then mimics the construction of the Tower through matching dissolves of still images. The film then returns to the subject of perception through a first-person focus on the experience of ascending to the top of the tower; once the top has been reached, a shot multiplies this experience, looking down on a lower platform where a man looks down on even lower spectators. Throughout the film, shots where the camera moves upward mimic the structure of the tower and the first-person experience of moving to the top. After a rapid descent, the film ends with the same establishing shot of the Eiffel Tower, invested with new meaning through the firsthand experience of it.

The interplay of poetic fantasy and prosaic reality is important both to Clair's entire filmography and to the genre of poetic documentary that was shaped during his most productive and influential period as a writer in the 1920s. Clair's experience working on a variety of film projects, from the most independent and experimental to studio-funded adaptations of classic French plays, led to a more balanced view on the possibilities of documentary film than other film theorists and practitioners of the period. He agreed that film should attempt to communicate through visual effects, but this never descended into a purely subjective vision of the cinema. Perhaps his most important contribution to documentary film was the idea that images and their movement on screen, no matter how fantastic, could always intervene into reality and alter the audience's perception of it.

Close-Up

(Iran, Kiarostami, 1990)

Like certain films of Buñuel, Chris Marker, and others, Close-Up puts into question what it is we are prepared to call reality, or documented reality, on film. Despite all its words and reasoning, its modernity and sophistication, Close-Up brings us at last to the issue of faith. What is to be feared in faith? What can faith bring?

Without title, credits, or any announcement, the film begins with a fifteen-minute sequence in which a journalist travels with two policemen in a taxi to a Tehran residential district to arrest an impostor. He has been taking advantage of a well-off family, pretending to be the famous film director Mohsen Makhmalbaf. The sequence feels like fiction, a careful staging with precise timing of lines and the camera set up where the car's dashboard or windshield would be. Once the arrest is made, the film's title and credits appear, informing us of a 'screenplay' by Kiarostami 'based on true events', and listing the names of the persons of the film, who 'appear as themselves'. The titles are superimposed over the image of a press printing newspapers, which suggests that the film understands its status as something like that of a newspaper, hardly a transparent medium, yet a medium of mass communication to which one turns for information and, presumably, truthful and accurate information.

The film proceeds to present four scenes that, by all accounts, are directly filmed, first-encounter interviews with individuals involved in the story. The first interview, with policemen outside the jail where the arrested man is being held, gives Kiarostami his first information about the arrest. Therefore, the opening sequence, showing the arrest at the time it happened, is certifiably a reenactment, as Kiarostami did not know about the arrest at the time it occurred and thus could not have been present at the actual event.

The film moves on to an interview with the victimized family, the Ahankhahs, in their well-appointed home. They address Kiarostami by name, bringing him more explicitly into the film. The interview seems a first encounter simply because the family so frankly expresses its concern not to be depicted as credulous in what appears now to be a film project in which they have agreed to participate. The family makes clear its interest in film. The unemployed son, Mehrdad, writes screenplays as an escape from bourgeois boredom and disappointment. Interest in film drew the family in with the impostor, and it now draws them in with Kiarostami.

Next, in a prison interview, we meet the impostor, one Hossein Sabzian, the figure on whom the whole film hinges. Here we actually see Kiarostami for the first and only time, although only from the back. It is the filmmaker pressing forward to confront his subject, the source that generates the film. Kiarostami's cameraman frames the prison office where the interview takes place, staying, presumably as required by prison rules, on the near side of a glass partition with columns, beyond which sit Kiarostami and Sabzian. A lens is used gradually to penetrate the barrier and come close to Sabzian's face as he speaks. The situation here illustrates documentary's perennial task and desire, to overcome barriers, to look closely, to let its attention be drawn by what is interesting. Here that interest is the face of this complex, emotional, working-class man possessed, he tells us, by cinema, and drawn by this possession into committing his crime. 'Make a film about my suffering', he entreats.

Kiarostami speaks with a court official and then the judge who presides over Sabzian's trial, securing permission to film the trial and getting the court date moved forward. Film's power to intervene in the justice system is impressive and, at the end of the interview, two of the filmmakers pass in silhouette across the foreground, spectral figures, suggestive of angels. The judge, a small man with large eyes, dressed as a cleric, wants to participate in the film.

A filmmaker's chalkboard announces the trial scene, which will take up the lengthy middle portion of Close-Up, at once a crucial public event and a film. The first words are the judge's, 'In the name of God', picking up on the suggestion of angels, reiterating the issue of faith, and opening the dimensions of film's power and source wider than the film has done so far.

If this is God's court, it is very much a film director's court, or film's court. The episode appears to be shot on videotape or some lower grade of material than the rest of Close-Up, perhaps out of necessity in the courtroom setting, or perhaps to set this material apart formally. Are we watching the actual trial or a reenactment, perhaps with changes? Does it matter if we trust Kiarostami? Here Sabzian and the Ahankhahs are allowed to explain fully their motives and actions in all that has transpired.

Kiarostami asks questions and guides the proceedings to a degree, directing them. He explains to Sabzian that he will use a 'close-up lens' to allow Sabzian to express himself fully. Pans across the room reveal Kiarostami's lighting man, making it clear that the filmmakers suggestively put Sabzian's face half in strong light, half in deep shadow. The long trial scene involves two flashback reenactment scenes, suggesting that what is being talked about builds a pressure that requires staged scenes to make things clear, to let things be fully what they are. There is argument about whether Sabzian is still performing, now as a repentant, which raises the question of whether performance can be avoided. Sabzian says that he speaks from the heart and quotes Tolstoy to the effect that the sincere sharing of feeling is art. Close-Up is at once sincere and artful, if we accept it. At the judge's behest, the Ahankhah family forgives Sabzian.

Close-Up concludes with a sequence in which, seen at a distance, Mohsen Makhmalbaf appears on the street and meets a weeping Sabzian, and the two ride across Tehran on Makhmalbaf's motorbike to call on the Ahankhahs and offer them flowers. Kiarostami and crew follow in another vehicle, filming. Makhmalbaf's lapel microphone appears to fail, and Kiarostami and an associate appear to make on-the-spot comments about the progress of the scene, such as 'we can't retake this'. From its opening (that first journey across town to the Ahankhahs), Close-Up has established a pattern of confinement breaking out into the open. The trial scene breaks out into flashbacks. The whole film seems a preparation to break out into the highly mobile final sequence, a complicated artistic trick or a case of film doing all it can to keep up with events not under its control. The film ends on a freeze frame of Sabzian's face, his head bowed in repentance, tears having flowed, a subtle smile starting to take over.

Coal Face

(UK, Cavalcanti, 1935)

The National Film Archive summarizes the content of the film Coal Face as: 'The work of the British miner and its importance.' The shot list is as follows: Shots of pitheads. Overhead transporters dump slag onto slagheaps. Mechanized washing and grading of coal at a pithead. The location and size of the main coalfields are indicated on a map of Britain. Miners walk along a shaft to the Coal Face for the night shift. Horses pulling wagons. A miner working at the face. A Davey safety lamp in operation. A naked flame lamp in a gasless Scottish pit. Miners working at the face. A sandwich break. An electric coal cutter in operation. Coal is shovelled into trucks which are hauled off—commentary gives statistics of accidents in the mine. The winding machinery brings the men to the surface in the morning. They check out. The miners make their way home, rows of terraced houses owned by the company. Pithead chimneys. A tree. A miner walks under a line of washing. Slagheaps. Tree blowing in the wind. Ruined building. Trees and sky. A railway marshalling yard. A train moves off with coal.

Shunting coal wagons—a signalman operates points. Horse-drawn coal carts distribute coal locally. Commentary gives statistics of coal used by the major industries: the electricity industry—shots of pylons, worker in a power station; railways: coal is loaded into a tender, the locomotive moves off; express trains. Shipping: dockers loading coal into a ship. A mechanical grab hoists a load of coal and empties it. Industrial landscapes. Pitheads. Miner walking along a street. Pithead at evening.

Coal Face was presented at the [London] Film Society as an experiment in sound. The commentary provides factual information—data, processes, by-products—overpoetic images of coal mines. The commentator's voice is unconventional and nonprofessional sounding (even the maps are abstract at first). The music is modern, cacophonous, discordant piano with percussion are prominent. As miners walk into the mine, choral speech and drumbeat begin. The choruses are of male and female voices, separate and combined. The commentator is objective, the chorus subjective. We hear snatches of miners' talk, individual men's voices, whistling, choir in a kind of keen. The poem sung by the female voices on the return of the miners to the surface was written for the film by W.H. Auden:

O lurcher loving collier black as night,
 Follow your love across the smokeless hill.
 Your lamp is out and all your cages still.
 Course for her heart and do not miss
 And Kate fly not so fast,
 For Sunday soon is past,
 And Monday comes when none may kiss.
 Be marble to his soot and to his black be white.

Coal Face continued the formal experimentation with sound in relation to sight so strongly evident in The Song of Ceylon (1934), though this time as an exalted tribute to the lives of British miners. It was the editing of sound in relation to image that was the strongest and most original line of formal invention in the British documentary of the 1930s (and on into the 1940s). It is generally agreed that Cavalcanti, much more than Grierson, was responsible for that rich and innovative use of sound, ahead of anything being attempted in feature fiction filmmaking at the time. Of course it was Grierson who brought Cavalcanti, with his background in the avant-garde and work in early sound features, from France to the General Post Office (GPO) Film Unit for that purpose. (Though it was also suggested, given the youthfulness of the GPO Unit filmmakers, that Grierson may have invited Cavalcanti to have someone of his age with whom to talk.) In any case, the films they worked on together maintain their interest as artistic experiments. Coal Face won a medal of honour at the International Film Festival in Brussels in 1935.

Cavalcanti, while assisting on most of the GPO Unit's productions, had films for which he was mainly responsible. Coal Face was the second and perhaps most important of these (Pett and Pott, in 1934, was the first). It was, wrote Roger Manvell, 'an oratorio of mining'. He added that 'oratorios are not popular with film-goers. The visuals were good but not exceptional,' in Manvell's opinion. 'What mattered was the sound' (Manvell 1946: 362). Part of the problem may well have been that the recording quality of this soundtrack is sub-standard. Because of government regulations, the GPO Film Unit was at first required to purchase British sound equipment (Visatone-Marconi) for its Blackheath Studio. RCA equipment was purchased later.

In addition to Grierson and Cavalcanti the poet W.H. Auden and the composer Benjamin Britten were part of the film crew. They worked together and separately on subsequent documentaries (most notably Night Mail, 1936). In 1935 Britten would have been twenty-three years old and at the beginning of his career. Edgar Anstey suggested that Coal Face anticipated Britten's later operatic work, in Peter Grimes, for example (Anstey 1966). It also anticipated and may even have been a source of inspiration for Willard Van Dyke's Valley Town (US, 1940), with its daring use of sung soliloquy. However, the mixing of stylized song and actuality footage was not actively pursued in documentary.

Even in Coal Face, along with the experimentation and poetry, the drabness and hardship of the miners' lives, including their resilience, courage, and dignity, are made prominent. Although the last images we see are of an individual miner walking against a background of mining village and pithead at evening, the commentary ends with the assertion that 'Coal mining is the basic industry of Britain.'

Contact

(UK, Rotha, 1933)

Contact was Paul Rotha's directorial debut. It was released when the British documentary film movement was being critically hailed within intellectual circles. Rotha had already established himself as a film critic with his large history/theory of the cinema, The Film Till Now (1929), and had then gone on to briefly work for John Grierson at the Empire Marketing Board (EMB) film unit. Although clashes with Grierson led to Rotha leaving the EMB film unit, Contact can be placed firmly within the more aesthetic school of filmmaking at the EMB and subsequently at the General Postal Office Film Unit (a school that also includes, most significantly, Drifters).

Contact was made to advertise Imperial Railways at a time when the company was facing stiff competition from new air companies, after its civic aviation monopoly came to an end in 1930. The film was originally shot by British Instructional Film (BIF) cameraman Horace Wheddon, who was replaced by another BIF employee, Frank Goodliffe, as a result of illness mid-way through shooting. During the making of the film, Rotha and crew traveled thirty-five thousand miles around the world to shoot footage in different countries. As the camera could not be mounted on the airplane used because of insurance restrictions, aerial shots were obtained by shooting through a small sliding window in the cockpit.

The film dramatizes the evolution of transport and also constructs air travel as something at which to marvel, aestheticizing the flight of the aircraft. It can roughly be divided into two parts, the first being much shorter than the second. The first part looks at the evolution of travel and the background of air flight; the second concentrates on aerial vision. The film begins with a fast montage of different transportation vehicles from a variety of angles. Titles then announce that the plane is the next wonder of transport and a montage of airplanes and views from the plane follow briefly. We then see workers involved in constructing the airplane and people boarding a plane. The film then enters a more relaxed, leisurely mode, as the plane in midair is contrasted with the many images that can be seen from the plane: deserts, seas, mountains, and famous landmarks from places such as Nairobi, Athens, and Cairo. The second part of the film settles into a romantic, picturesque view of distant lands. It provides a kind of symphony of air travel, an impression bolstered by its musical score by Clarence Reybould, who mostly adapted music by Mozart, Rossini, and Tchaikovsky.

Contact can be considered alongside the early travel films that were a staple of cinema's first decade. Early travel films used transportation (especially trains) to provide mobile views of distant, exotic lands for audiences who would not have been able to experience such views first hand. Many early railroad films also provided covert advertising, as did Contact. Contact is, in one sense at least, an updating of these early travel films, with the plane now replacing the wonders of the railway. At the time the film was made, only a small fraction of economically advantaged people could afford to travel by air, so Contact provided a simulated virtual reality of an aerial journey.

The film also tackles a theme that was prevalent within the more modernist films of the documentary film movement: the dialectic between nature and industry. Both Drifters (1929) and The Song of Ceylon (1933–4), in different ways, portray links between nature, humankind, and technology. In both of these films industrial progress is largely seen in a positive light (despite elements of criticism), and a benign process of evolution is posited in which industry develops in a manner that also respects and preserves nature. Likewise, Contact extols the wonders of industrial progress in creating new modes of transport and, at the same time, admires at the wonders of nature. Technology and nature are thus seen as interdependent in this film: technological progress has enabled new ways of perceiving natural beauty.

Contact is ultimately less successful than both Drifters and The Song of Ceylon, as it does not attain the level of formal sophistication of either of those films. It begins interestingly, but its dominant mode of aerial views, although beautifully photographed, is rather repetitive and uninspired. It feels, for the most part, like a straightforward travelogue, which was exactly the type of filmmaking that both Grierson and Rotha attacked. They thought that travelogs were nothing more than an agglomeration of pretty pictures, lacking both aesthetically and sociologically. Aesthetically, they were not structured in an imaginative or 'artistic' manner; sociologically, they did not reveal anything about the structure of the modern world.

The beginning of Contact does, to an extent, integrate Rotha's aesthetic and sociological agenda. The film uses highly stylized montage, with images and titles interwoven at a rhythmic pace, displaying a modernist approach to filmic organization. The evolutionary sketch of technological progress, although promotional, builds a sense of industrial purpose. The film also shows a number of materials needed to construct an airplane and shows workers involved in construction, thus moving beyond the superficial details of the flight to the complex assemblage involved in its constitution.

Yet the main pictorial sequences of the film dominate Contact, and these are more one-dimensional than the earlier scenes. The industrial interconnections at the beginning of the film become overshadowed by a more romantic portrayal of travel cinematography. The film does share with Drifters and The Song of Ceylon an evolutionary purview that nevertheless stresses the importance of nature, but it also tends to provide a somewhat more ruthless, simplistic view of progress in comparison to those two films. Rotha does not quite manage to negotiate the rather complicated mixture of aesthetic expression, sociological investigation, and promotional message in a successful manner. Instead, the promotional origins of the film become all too evident.

Cooper, Merian C.

Merian C. Cooper—best known in cinema history for his role as coproducer, cowriter, and codirector of the 1933 classic film King Kong—began his filmmaking career in documentaries. In partnership with Ernest B. Schoedsack, Cooper made expeditionary documentaries such as Grass (1925) and Chang (1927). These films (especially Chang) are part travelog, part adventure tale. Even King Kong was originally conceived as a semidocumentary project to be shot on location and feature a real gorilla enlarged through trick photography. As has often been pointed out by critics, the fictional filmmaker Carl Denham, the adventurous protagonist of King Kong who is willing to travel far and risk his own life as well as the lives of others for the most exciting film possible, could very well stand in for Cooper himself. Like Denham, Cooper was a natural showman intent on thrilling his audience through cinema's ability to place the spectator in the midst of the action.

Cooper and Schoedsack's first completed documentary together, in close collaboration with foreign journalist Marguerite Harrison, was entitled Grass: A Nation's Battle for Life. The team traveled to the Persian Gulf to chronicle with two cameras the forty-eight-day annual migration of a nomadic Iranian tribe called the Bakhtiari over hundreds of miles in search of suitable grazing land. The film follows in the documentary tradition established by Robert Flaherty's classic film about the North American Inuits, Nanook of the North (1922). Cooper originally intended to screen Grass on the college lecture circuit. However, a Paramount executive named Jesse Lasky, who had distributed Nanook, saw the film by chance at a private dinner and later obtained Grass for theatrical distribution. Intertitles were inserted into the action to provide the film with some kind of conventional structure for mainstream audiences. In its final form, Grass begins with scenes of Harrison interacting with the tribespeople. Then the tribe embarks on its quest in a huge caravan, a scene evocative for American audiences of mythic pioneer migration westward (lest the point is missed, the film's intertitles frequently refer to covered wagons). The tens of thousands of Bakhtiari, including their hundreds of thousands of cattle and goats, journey through an impressive range of hazardous terrain, including desert and mountain and raging water, to reach the grasslands. Frequently, against this epic backdrop, the film foregrounds the chief of the tribe and his son, perhaps in an effort to provide a narrative focus for audience identification among the mass of humanity. As a Hollywood feature film, Grass proved exciting in its visual spectacle of the Bakhtiari mass migration. Also, the film was exotic enough in subject matter to appeal to the American imagination, yet close enough to American pioneer myths to seem familiar to domestic audiences.

Most important for the future direction of Cooper's career, the film was profitable. Cooper and Schoedsack promptly began planning other films.

The pair's next film was Chang: A Drama of the Wilderness. In some ways, Chang anticipates the contemporary craze for 'reality programming' in combining elements of live action shot in Siam (Thailand today) into a preconceived storyline for maximum dramatic effect. The result is a hybrid film that is fictional but partially constructed from spontaneous, real-life events. Cooper and Schoedsack captured the wild animals that appear in the film and shot the action sequences themselves, including the famous shot where a tiger leaps up a tree toward the camera. After fourteen months of often hazardous location shooting, Cooper and Schoedsack returned to the United States to complete postproduction at Paramount. The completed film centers on a Siamese family. The central characters are played by local people, not professional Hollywood actors. The patriarch of the family is Kru (Cooper and Schoedsack's interpreter in real life). His wife is Chantui, their son is Nah, and their daughter is Landah. They have livestock and a pet white gibbon. The family attempts to establish a rice-farming homestead in the jungle while threatened by tigers, leopards, snakes, elephants (the 'chang' of the title), and about every other menace the filmmakers could coerce into action for the cameras. The plot is set in motion by predators' attacks on the family's animals. Kru successfully fights back by organizing his pioneer neighbors into hunting parties. The jungle's threat to domesticity escalates, however, when a rampaging 'chang' herd destroys Kru's home and a nearby village. Kru has to organize another hunting party that eventually captures the elephants. The primal natural force represented by the elephants is finally conquered when the elephants are domesticated to work for Kru. Victorious, Kru and his family rebuild their home. Continuing his usual flair for showmanship at the film's New York premiere, Cooper had installed a special projector lens (or 'magnascope') that enlarged the screen to three times its normal size during the film's intense action scenes, such as an elephant charge that levels a village. In addition to garnering favorable critical reviews, Chang was nominated for an Academy Award for Unique and Artistic Production on the occasion of the first Academy Awards ceremony in 1929—the only year this award was presented.

Cooper's work in the documentary and semi-documentary genre paved the way for his next and greatest success. While in Africa with Schoedsack to shoot location footage for the fictional film Four Feathers, Cooper photographed many apes and began thinking of a story about a giant gorilla captured and taken to the urban jungle of Manhattan. In Cooper's scenario, the gorilla would escape and eventually climb to the top of the Empire State Building before being killed by fighter planes. The publication of a friend's book about the fearsome monitor lizards or 'dragons' of Komodo Island inspired Cooper to incorporate a fight scene between the giant gorilla and the giant lizard into his proposed film. Cooper then took the name for 'gorilla' from the language of an East Indies tribe and entitled his proposed film Kong, or as it came to be known, King Kong. The film production ultimately eschewed location shooting and live animal photography for the special-effects work of animator Willis O'Brien, but Cooper applied all of the lessons he had learned from Grass and Chang to King Kong. The phenomenal success of King Kong, starring Four Feathers veteran Fay Wray as the giant gorilla's 'love interest', enshrined Cooper as one of the industry's legends. Over the years he was twice a studio vice-president and a producer. After more military service during World War II, he formed a production company named Argosy Film Pictures with famous director John Ford in 1941. He served as producer for many classic films, including Rio Grande in 1950, The Quiet Man in 1952, and The Searchers in 1956. For all of his contributions, Cooper was given a special Academy Award in 1952. He died in 1973.

Cousteau, Jacques-Yves

Jacques-Yves Cousteau, a prolific author, environmental activist, explorer, inventor, and filmmaker, has long been regarded as a respected pioneer of the documentary film genre for his innovative efforts to record the undersea environment. Cousteau is often considered to be the creator of the underwater documentary, not only because of his novel approach to documentary filmmaking but also because he was, along with French engineer Emile Gagnan, the cocreator of the first underwater diving apparatus, the aqualung, or scuba (McGill 2000). Cousteau's underwater breathing invention, coupled with his creation of a waterproof enclosure for movie cameras, made it possible for divers, scientists, and film crews to explore and document the undersea world as they never could before (Kempke 2002). By using these new inventions, Cousteau, who had previous experience producing, directing, and acting in feature films, began to make his unprecedented documentaries about the sea, its vegetation, animal inhabitants, and sunken vessels. For many members of the audience, Cousteau's documentaries heralded the actual viewing of entities and environs that once could be conjured only in the imagination.

Although Cousteau had made several short documentaries in the 1940s during the German occupation of France, it was his feature-length documentary films and television programmes that gained him worldwide recognition. Cousteau's film Le Monde du silence/The Silent World (1956), his first feature-length documentary film, which was codirected by Louis Malle, won the Grand Prize at the Cannes Film Festival in 1956 (McGill 2000). A 1956 review of The Silent World in The New York Times lauded the film for its ability to leave the audience not only in awe but also wishing to participate in the deep-sea dives themselves, owing to the unique way in which the film contrasted the images of undersea explorers with the ocean creatures being investigated (Crowther 1971).

After the success of The Silent World, Cousteau continued to make feature-length documentaries for the cinema chronicling marine life and its environs, including Histoire d'un poisson rouge/The Golden Fish (1959) and Le Monde sans soleil/World Without Sun (1964).

In the late 1960s and the 1970s Cousteau's documentaries began to reach audiences differently. Instead of feature-length films for the cinema, Cousteau's documentaries became the subject of several critically acclaimed television series and specials, including his most famous, The Undersea World of Jacques Cousteau, which ran from 1968 to 1976. Each episode of The Undersea World of Jacques Cousteau was the result of a minor feat of filmmaking and would not have been possible without an extraordinary amount of editing. Extra footage was a requirement for Cousteau's documentaries, because undersea creatures are not often cooperative with the filmmakers, and because of the temperamental nature of the ocean itself. For approximately fifty-one minutes of air time, one thousand seven hundred and fifty feet of picture edit was necessary, and it often took the production staff more than ten weeks to prepare (Shaheen 1987). In addition to the remarkable images, another factor that made the series well received among critics and viewers alike was its innovative narration. With conarration responsibilities divided between Cousteau and Rod Serling (widely recognized for his work on the television series The Twilight Zone), the audience was presented with two very distinct tones of voice and narration styles, which helped to ward off monotony (Shaheen 1987).

Perhaps the most enlightening element of these later documentaries, however, was the intensification of Cousteau's environmental activism, which ultimately became his greatest passion when his undersea explorations revealed to him the destruction the sea and its inhabitants were enduring at the hands of humankind. As a consequence of his environmental concerns, Cousteau founded several nonprofit organizations to help spread awareness about the endangered ecology, including the most famous one, which is still in existence, the aptly named Cousteau Society (McGill 2000).

In a June 1985 interview in the Cousteau Society's membership publication, the Calypso Log, Cousteau mused about the significance of film in his own personal life. Cousteau asserted that he considered the cinema so 'important' because it encompasses other forms of art, including literature and music. Cousteau also declared that because cinema is an art form that uses the element of time, film is akin to 'a flower, [created] to bloom and die'. Apparently, for Cousteau, the ephemeral nature of film is preferable to art forms that are 'here for eternity' and represent a 'challenge to death'; thus, for Cousteau, film was ostensibly analogous to humanity itself, a living and breathing entity (Cousteau 1985).

Coutinho, Eduardo

Coutinho played an important role in the first generation of Brazil's Cinema Novo. He began his career in 1962 as the production manager of the feature-length fiction Cinco Vezes Favela/Five Times Shantytown, produced by the National Student Union (União Nacional dos Estudantes, UNE). In the same year, he filmed the travels of the so-called UNE-on-the-Move. UNE's idea was to make a documentary about the cities that the student union leaders were visiting in 1962 and 1963. They filmed in Manaus, Paraíba, Maranhão, Belo Horizonte, and other places, but the material was never assembled into a documentary. Through UNE-on-the-Move, Coutinho met Elizabeth Teixeira, the widow of João Pedro Teixeira, a peasant leader who was murdered in 1962. When he returned to Rio de Janeiro, Coutinho made a new proposal to the UNE through their cultural centers (CPCs). He wanted to make a film about the life of João Pedro Teixeira in which the same peasants who had experienced the tragedy would participate as actors. In February 1964

Coutinho began to film the never-to-be-completed first version of Cabra Marcado Para Morrer/Marked for Death, a docudrama that reconstructs the life of João Pedro Teixeira. It was filmed at the Galiléia Plantation in the city of Vitória de Santo Antão of Pernambuco state, and Elizabeth Teixeira played the role of herself as a widow. The film was interrupted by the military coup of March 31, 1964, and the production team was dispersed. Elizabeth Teixeira changed her name and spent seventeen years hiding in the interior of the northeastern state of Rio Grande do Norte.

Coutinho returned to Rio and developed a career in fiction films as a screenwriter and director. He encountered documentary film during the second half of the 1970s when he began to work for Globo Repórter, a program of Rede Globo, Brazil's major television broadcaster. He directed several editions of the program, some in a true vérité documentary style. The remake of the unfinished Cabra Marcado Para Morrer (also known as Twenty Years Later) marks the beginning of Coutinho's authorial career. Based on his experience in television, Coutinho incorporated the flexible techniques of the new documentary, including a nervous moving camera, direct sound, and the intense use of interviews. Coutinho began to see the possibility of a second version of Cabra in 1979, when amnesty was decreed and it became possible for him to safely contact Elizabeth Teixeira. The idea for this documentary was to search for the same peasants who had participated, as actors, in the docudrama that had been interrupted in 1964 and to film their daily life in 1981. Coutinho had secretly kept the negatives of the first Cabra for twenty years, and he used them in his new film. The main part of the documentary was filmed in March 1981, in the state of Rio Grande do Norte, interviewing the same peasants of 1964. Back in Rio de Janeiro, during 1982 and 1983, Coutinho finished filming interviews with Elizabeth's sons and daughters, with whom she had lost contact for twenty years. The film was released in 1984, generating a strong response from the public and the media. By portraying the fragmentation of Elizabeth Teixeira's family, Twenty Years Later presented a portrait of a country that, after a twenty-year military dictatorship, was also finding itself.

In 1986 Coutinho directed Santa Marta—2 Semanas no Morro/Santa Marta—Two Weeks in a Slum at the Santa Marta favela (Brazilian hillside slum) in the middle of Rio's wealthy and chic southern region. The film was produced by the Superior Institute of Religious Studies (ISER, a nongovernmental institution) and is the first documentary work that Coutinho made in a Rio favela. Coutinho's career as a documentary filmmaker became more firmly established in the 1990s. In 1992 he rediscovered the strongest stylistic vein of his work in a vérité-form documentary, Boca do Lixo/The Scavengers. It was filmed in video and takes place in a large garbage dump in the city of São Gonçalo, close to Rio de Janeiro. Through interviews, marked by Coutinho's active participation, the film manages to discover unique characters with strong and impressive personalities. This search for 'types' can be defined as the core of Coutinho's style, based on interviews or testimonies that his subjects deliver directly to the camera. During the 1990s the interview scenes of Coutinho's documentaries became more and more static, resembling a series of identity card photos with intense facial expressions.

It is through this kind of minimalist method that Coutinho affirmed his distinctive style throughout the 1990s and even today. In 1998–9 he filmed Santo Forte/The Mighty Spirit, which depicts the everyday religiosity of the people of Vila Parque da Cidade favelas in Rio de Janeiro. The narrative portrays the common people of Brazil by using religious experience and trance as motifs. Santo Forte is a landmark of Coutinho's work, where his style takes the shape we will find in his three next feature-length documentaries (Babilônia 2000, Edifício Master/Master a Building in Copacabana, and Peões/Workers). Babilônia 2000 was made during the celebration of the new millennium in the hillside of Babilônia, where the Chapéu Mangueira and Babilônia favelas are located, with an extraordinary view of Rio de Janeiro's most famous beaches. Most of the documentary was shot on December 31, 1999.

After his 'trilogy' about favelas (Santa Marta, Santo Forte and Babilônia 2000), Coutinho continued to use this characteristic 'portrait' style but switched social classes and filmed in a typical petit bourgeois building in the Copacabana beach neighborhood. Through Coutinho's static interview method, Master, a Building in Copacabana, reveals astonishing personalities living in the small apartment rooms. Coutinho's 2004 film, Peões/Workers, is a project made together with João Salles, a new figure in Brazilian contemporary documentary. They planned to make two feature-length films together (Peões/Workers directed by Coutinho and Entreatos/Entr'acts by Salles) about the life of the poor northeastern migrant who became Brazil's current president. Loyal to his distinctive method, Coutinho went to the factories and the neighborhood where Lula used to work and live and interviewed the anonymous metallurgical workers who once met him. Through a series of personal testimonies, Peões unveils the diverse personalities and life stories of Brazilian industrial workers.

Craigie, Jill

Although frequently referred to as the first female film director in Britain, several directors preceded Jill Craigie in the silent period. Nonetheless, Craigie's contribution to British film culture is important. Her directorial career was relatively brief, spanning seven years, but two of her films stand out because of their innovative approach to documentary filmmaking and because of Craigie's feminist and socialist political beliefs.

Craigie entered the film industry in 1937 as an actress but made only one film. When war broke out she began writing short documentary scripts for the British Council, as well as cowriting the script for the Two Cities production The Flemish Farm (1943) with her then husband, Jeffrey Dell. This inspired her to direct her first short film, Out of Chaos (1944), a documentary about how to appreciate modern art, using the work of British war artists as examples.

After the war, Craigie's interest in the postwar reconstruction of Britain's bomb-damaged cities and, in particular, the need to consult with the citizens living there, led to the making of The Way We Live (1946), a docudrama outlining plans for the rebuilding of Plymouth. The socialist leanings of the film did not deter the conservative J. Arthur Rank from backing the film, and it was funded by the Rank subsidiary, Two Cities Film, which distributed Out of Chaos. The Way We Live combines an orthodox documentary style of straight visual exposition with a dramatic narrative featuring a cast drawn almost entirely from the local community. Seen predominantly from the female characters' viewpoint, the plight of a bombed-out family living in temporary accommodation provides the framework for a social and political examination of town planning procedures. During the making of this film Craigie met her third husband, the Labour MP Michael Foot.

Craigie next directed a short documentary for the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) about efforts to improve the living conditions of children displaced by two world wars. She followed this with Blue Scar (1949), which, like The Way We Live, blurred the boundaries between fiction and documentary. Set in a South Wales mining village, Blue Scar is a feature-length docudrama about poverty and conflict in a South Wales mining village, partly scripted by the villagers themselves. Made by Outlook Films, the production company Craigie formed with William MacQuitty in 1948, the film also featured several cast members drawn from the local population. She then directed a documentary short for Outlook, To Be a Woman (1951), arguing the case for equal pay for women.

Frustrated by the feature industry's obstructive attitude to women directors, Craigie gave up directing and returned to scriptwriting before retiring from the film business. Her political fervour did not diminish with age, however, and in 1994, appalled by what was happening in war-torn Yugoslavia, she financed and directed a documentary about the ravaged city and people of Dubrovnik. Two Hours from London (1994) was shown on BBC television in 1995 and was her final film.

Cuba Sí!

(France, Marker, 1961)

Of the many filmmakers drawn to Cuba by the Revolution of 1959, it was Chris Marker who made what Cubans regarded as the best documentary on the Revolution at the time. According to Marker, in his preface to the published version of the script, the film was shot rapidly in January 1961, 'during the first alert period (you know, at the time when the majority of French papers were hooting over Fidel's paranoia in imagining himself threatened with invasion)', and it 'aims at communicating, if not the experience, at least the vibrations, the rhythm of a revolution that will one day perhaps be held to be the decisive moment of a whole era of contemporary history' (Marker 1961: preface).

Marker's sense of solidarity is announced by the title, one half of the slogan that was one of the Revolution's mottos: ¡Cuba Sí! ¡Yanqui No! Marker's method is interrogative, inclusive, and visually ironic. Filming the crowds in the streets or at a baseball match (baseball and tourist posters remind the viewer that the United States is less than an hour away by plane), he picks out faces who look at the camera directly and unaggressively, as people enjoying their newfound right to take full possession of public space. The effect is to ask the viewer to consider before judging. These scenes give way to newsreel of the guerrillas in the mountains, with shots of Fidel Castro, Che Guevara, and Camilo Cienfuegos, through which the events and motivations of the Revolution are recounted, including the hostile responses of the US administration. The interpellation of shots of a printing press and an open-air film projection speak of the necessary supplement to guerrilla struggle and victory: the battle of the media at home and abroad. The headline of a Miami newspaper reads 'Fidel Hurls New Barbs at US'. A moment later, we hear shots of execution by a firing squad followed by crowds at a boxing match, and then a French newspaper headline appears that reads, 'The State Department accuses Fidel Castro of having betrayed the Cuban Revolution'.

Marker eschews the conventional solidarity film and instead uses montage to raise the question of how the events he chronicles are to be represented. Hence the comparison he makes between Fidel and Robin Hood. As the commentary puts it: 'Perhaps he is Robin Hood [...] Only in this century taking from the rich to give to the poor does not necessarily mean attacking stage-coaches. And when Robin Hood has read Marx, when, up in the mountains he is preparing the laws and reforms of the future republic, some parts of the world realize painfully that they too are one Robin Hood late.' There is a song about revolutionary decrees on agrarian reform and rent, and the commentary concludes, 'So legends die. The myth of Robin Hood is shattered. In its place a Revolution.'

The film was banned in France for three reasons according to the Minister of Information: it was not a documentary but 'an apologia for the Castro regime'; no film 'which is ideological propaganda can be authorized if only because of the risks this type of production entails for public order'; and the Cuban press frequently attacks the administrations of Martinique and Guadeloupe, and it therefore 'does not seem suitable to offer a cinematographic hearing to Cuba's leaders' (Marker 1962). Marker got round the ban by providing a new commentary full of the touristic clichés of a travelog, which enabled him to get an export visa, then sending the film to Belgium with the original commentary restored.

If the ban tells us of French government nervousness about its Caribbean territories in the year that Paris finally acceded to Algerian independence, it is doubtless Fidel Castro's analysis of democracy, which he gives in an interview in the film, that the government wished to keep as inaccessible to the public as possible. For sixty years, he says, Cuba had to put up with the farce of a pseudo-democracy, and:

the French ought to be the first to understand: the French have an election almost every year: municipal [...] national [...] for a president, for an MP [...] perhaps no other country in the world has had more elections than France in the last six decades. And even so the French are not content [...] they can perfectly understand that political factions [and] electoralism have not solved a single one of France's fundamental problems.

In sum, Cuba Sí! is a political travelog that never collapses into mere rhetoric. If Marker now regards it as more a pamphlet than a film, edited in a hurry as an urgent response to events (Marker 2003), it exemplifies, nevertheless, something of what the Argentine filmmakers Fernando Solanas and Octavio Getino would define at the end of the same decade as one of the aims of what they called 'third cinema', the political film feared and rejected by the political mainstream.

Czech Republic/Slovakia

The evolution of documentary film in both the Czech Republic and Slovakia can be traced back to the 1900s, when the two separate states were intermingled into one: Czechoslovakia. After its formation into an independent republic in 1918, Czechoslovakia faced grave economic insecurity. Although Czechoslovak documentaries were gaining popularity owing to their emphasis on patriotism, producers struggled to compete with foreign imports in order to realize success. Until the early 1920s technical standards were hampered by the lack of properly equipped studios. In 1921 the A-B company was converted into a film studio and technical standards began to ameliorate. In 1933 the A-B Company built the Barrandov Film Studios in Prague. Being the heart of the majority of prewar and postwar developments, the establishment of these film studios led to an increase in domestic film production. Czechoslovak films gained early international success in the late 1940s, when the Venice Grand Prix was awarded to Karel Stekly's locally produced film Sirena/The Stroke (1947). As Czechoslovak films continued winning film prizes including Academy Awards, critics around the world became more and more familiar with Czechoslovak cinema.

After World War II a newly established democracy in Czechoslovakia lasted less than three years before a new communist rule was established in 1948. With the communist rule came the nationalization of the film industry, which led producers to focus their films on politically significant themes (Hames 1985: 37). During this time all documentary films were expected to portray reality and its revolutionary transition as accurately as possible. Jiri Weiss's film Uloupena Hranice/The Stolen Frontier (1947) is one such film in which Munich and the crisis in the Sudetenland is depicted. This film was an immediate success because the Munich problem was a massive ordeal that especially affected those growing up in Weiss's generation. In making Uloupena Hranice, Weiss takes advantage of his experience with British documentaries, in which amateur actors and non-professionals are videotaped with the use of a hidden camera.

Similarly, Otakar Vavra makes use of the expectation of shorts to capture reality and the transition that individuals were undergoing in Czechoslovakia. Vavra's film Nema Barikada/Silent Barricade (1948) documents the Prague uprising against the Nazis before the arrival of the Red army. His film, although extremely nationalistic, manages to document the struggle of the Czechoslovak people in a time of war.

After World War II 'the theory of lack of conflict' emerged. This theory introduced the concept of positive heroes, also known as protagonists, triumphing over negative characters, also known as antagonists. This theory quickly became the foundation for films and gave rise to a standardized plot in which a happy ending was inevitable. Producers would continue documenting reality, while illustrating conflicts between heroes and villains, but ensuring that their films would always end in the expected, optimistic light.

The years 1947 and 1948 marked the beginning of the Cold War. Despite the war, the radical youth went on believing that the revolution went hand in hand with art and expression.

During the 1950s Czechoslovak shorts mainly served to illustrate socialist-realist dogma and historical events. In 1956, with the denunciation of Stalinism, Czechoslovakia experienced a scene of cultural 'thaw' followed by reaction (Hames 1985: 44).

In the 1960s there were two main types of documentary films. As Anton Navratil, Czech historian of documentary film, put it: 'Ways of Lies, Ways of Truth'. 'The ways of lies' were those films produced using an ideological filter that supported what the communist authorities preached, regardless of how much this would distort reality. The filmmakers exploring 'the ways of truth' were those who produced short films that were highly creative, and risky. Living in a communist nation, it was difficult to openly express one's opinions. Producers of truth documentaries went out on a limb on many occasions and found ways to express concepts and opinions that would otherwise be impossible to state verbally and openly. This approach gave audiences a glimpse into what communism really was, without the authority's filter of distortion and propaganda.

In 1956, once 'de-Stalinization' was under way, an enormous hunger developed for the flourishing of ideas, the sphere of culture, and the need for freedom of expression. By the 1960s a new film movement had emerged, also known as the Czechoslovak New Wave. By 1963 the first wave of the Czechoslovak New Wave was underway. The first wave is defined as 'that group of directors who prepared the way for the developments of the 1960s through thematic or formal breaks with the conventions of Socialist Realism' (Hames 1985: 35).

Czechoslovakia's film movement, the Czechoslovak New Wave, can be traced back to the years after World War II. During this movement, film producers looked for ways to portray society in a new light by 'combining criticism of the status quo with the rejection of traditional narrative' (Hames 1985: 92). Filmmakers desired the ability to portray society in a nonstereotyped fashion, without the integration of propaganda, or communist standards and expectations. The focus of shorts revolved around the everyday life, of the everyday individual, less emphasis on protagonists and antagonists, and more on just the average individual going about daily life. The need to have to end the film with a happy ending diminished, as filmmakers continued ensuring that their films would record and expose everyday reality.

Milos Forman, a scriptwriter and director, is one of many who has produced a number of films that follow the trend of recording and exposing the everyday. This standard procedure, known as the realist/documentary tradition, reflects an Italian neorealism and cinéma vérité approach. Both approaches strongly influenced the Czechoslovak film industry. The use of the two approaches helped audiences and filmmakers to deal with social reality and its connection with the individual. Film producers relied on these techniques to tie together the world of the subjective with that of the objective. Cinéma vérité can best be described as 'the act of filming real people in uncontrolled situations. Uncontrolled means that the filmmaker does not function as a director nor, for that matter, as a screenwriter [...] no one is told what to say or how to act' (Hames 1985: 120).

Most scholars, when referring to the Czechoslovak New Wave, are aware that the majority of the films produced during this time were concerned with both the individual and society. For example, two of Forman's films, Cerny Petr/Black Peter (1963) and Lasky Jedne Plavovlasky/Loves of a Blonde (1965), take on a boy-meets-girl theme, which is deemed acceptable by socialist-realist cinema audiences. By integrating elements of cinéma vérité and classical film comedy into their work, Forman carefully describes the life of two young children and the society in which they live. The importance of personal life is juxtaposed next to the struggle of everyday life. The result in both films is one of the most profound analyses of Czechoslovak society yet to be illustrated.

Because short films would often stimulate one's mind, individuals turned to them as a means to stimulate change in reality. Documentaries represented a factor of real life; in fact, they changed real life. As the presence of creative ideas increased in documentaries, ideas on economics, politics, literature, and the arts also increased. It was not long before all these ideas led to the development of the Czechoslovak Reform Movement, which led to the fall of the Novotny regime. In 1968 Alexander Dubček, the first secretary of communist Czechoslovakia, implemented a variety of democratic, political, and economic reforms known as the Prague Spring. A Socialist democracy was underway in Czechoslovakia. The Soviet Union, alarmed at what appeared to be the collapse of communism in Czechoslovakia, invaded the republic in August 1968 in hopes of crushing the Prague Spring. The invasion was successful in abolishing any continuation of democratic reforms, and Czechoslovakia was forced into 'normalization' back into a communist state. For the brief period that the Czechoslovaks had a taste of a Western-style democracy, the level of filmmaking surpassed any level known before. As Pryl argues, 'these remarkable achievements were not merely works born during the spell of freedom [...] they were quite conscious demonstrations of a refusal to give in' (Hames 1985: 257).

Although the republic had again been taken over by a communist authority, the government did not actually reorganize the film industry until the latter part of 1969. Many films were forced to cease production, one of which was Helge's Jak Se U Nas Pece Chleba/How Bread is Made (1969). By 1973 a number of films that were perceived as segregating society, as oppose to strengthening it, were banned, including Forman's Hori, Ma Panenko/The Fireman's Ball (1967).

In the 1970s, rather than producing films based on aesthetic value, conviction, ideas, and risks, the majority of filmmakers centered their work around the theme of the world wars and Czechoslovakia's struggle. One of the most popular films produced during this time was Vladmir Cech's Klic/The Key (1971), a film illustrating the life of a communist official during World War II. 'The unifying characteristic of nearly all the films made in the seventies was a lack of ideas at the script level—a fear of ideological nonconformity that resulted in films being about almost nothing at all' (Hames 1985: 261). Kachyna's Laska/Love (1973), Hubacek's Znamost Sestry Aleny/Sister Alena's Boy (1973), and Jires' Lide Z Metra/People of the Metro (1974) are three of the many films that fell into the standard category of 1970s empty films.

As a result of the declining economy and the reorganization of the film industry between 1968 and 1970, many of Czechoslovakia's best-known film directors emigrated to different parts of the world to continue producing successful films. Forman and Passer took their talents to North America; Stanislav Barabas and Jan Némec moved to West Germany. The majority of film producers who did choose to stay in Czechoslovakia faced unemployment.

The mid-1970s marked the return of a number of skilled and talented directors and actors who were eager to rejuvenate the Czechoslovak film industry. The number of films produced slowly improved. Although there was not much room to deviate from the status quo and the communist authority beliefs, scholars were optimistic that with the continuance of this 'thaw', brought about by the post-1969 regime, film achievements would again parallel those brought about during the New Wave. Scholars were hopeful that as political pressure lifted, a critical and aesthetic diversity would surface, as it did amidst the New Wave.

On March 11, 1985 Mikhail Gorbachev was made the general secretary of the Communist party of the Soviet Union. Gorbachev introduced perestroika (restructuring) and glasnost (openness) to the communist regime, and these two practices posed unexpected challenges to the status quo.

By the 1990s, the years after the time known as the Velvet Revolution, voices in favor of Slovakia's independence grew stronger. Finally, the prime ministers of both republics were left with no choice but to divide the country into two parts. On January 1, 1993 Czechoslovakia was broken up into Slovakia and the Czech Republic.

Today, many look at Czech cinema as being on the verge of experiencing a New Wave in the film industry, just as Czechoslovakia did in the 1960s. Since 1993 Czech films have been winning countless prizes and awards. In 1997 Jan Svěrák's short Kolya/Kolja (1996) won an Oscar, and many have cited this event as marking the beginning of a resurgence of the film industry in the Czech Republic. With a number of Czech films, such as Petr Zelenka's Knoflikari/Buttoners (1997), gaining praise all across the world, it is no wonder that the Czech film industry is so admired. As Hames states, 'Since 1993 no fewer than 30 directors have made feature debuts, most of them graduates of the documentary and screenwriting departments of the Prague Film School' (Hames 1985: 32).

The majority of Czech documentaries that are produced today juxtapose everyday life with the politics prevalent in society. Czech shorts depict individuals' means of adapting, conforming, and changing according not only to their surroundings but to historical experiences as well. Filmmakers are careful to integrate the critical, the personal, and the historical into their documentary masterpieces. One of the many documentaries produced during the 1990s that hit the box office top ten lists was Jan Hřebejk's Pelisky/Cosy Dens (1999). This short illustrates family relations during the Prague Spring. By taking on their own personal approach to filmmaking, Czech directors are producing critically acclaimed masterpieces.

By contrast, since its 1993 separation from the Czech Republic, Slovakia's film industry has been struggling to survive. Having only produced two or three movies per year on average, the Slovak film industry is far behind compared to its neighbors. The lack of technical progress and financial security is the biggest impediment of both the quantitative and qualitative growth of Slovak cinema. The majority of filmmaking equipment has to be imported, while a great deal of production is being completed abroad (Karpaty 2002: 1). Because of the underdeveloped film industry, many Slovak film producers are emigrating to neighboring countries.

Although Slovakia still faces great challenges before realizing a healthy film industry, critics comment that the industry has improved greatly since 1998, when Mikuláš Dzurinda became head of the government. New means of support are being established to make the gaining of funds for film production a lot easier. Initiatives such as the founding of the European Community's Media Plus Program and the establishment of an advisory Media Desk office are helping to ensure that the Slovak film industry will see vast improvement in coming years.

Despite all the social, political, and economic changes of the past, documentary film in both the Czech Republic and Slovakia has survived and continues to evolve and develop in both regions. Shorts are realizing higher levels of success in the Czech Republic than in Slovakia, but scholars are convinced that, in time, Slovakia will catch up to its neighbor, just as the two regions' documentary film industries once paralleled each other's success.

Davis, Peter

Director, producer, writer, and cinematographer Peter Davis challenged political and public institutions with his documentary television and film works in the 1970s, courting controversy in the process. He began working on documentaries for CBS television in 1965. Davis served as an associate producer and writer for Hunger in America (1968), which won a Writer's Guild Award. For CBS Reports he served as a writer and producer of both Heritage of Slavery (1968) and The Battle of East St Louis (1968).

This training prepared Davis well for taking on US politics and institutions during the social unrest of the Vietnam War. In The Selling of the Pentagon (1971), writer and producer Davis explores how the public relations arm of the Department of Defense manipulated public opinion about the war through propaganda. The film questions how the department spent large amounts of tax money by scrutinizing its films, speakers' bureau, and corporate contracts. The film also looks at how the Pentagon controlled news about the military: daily briefings did present information, but the news media could not verify the information, given that much of it was classified.

The Selling of the Pentagon aired on February 23, 1971. Its controversial subject matter led to a House Special Subcommittee investigation into the film's production. The subcommittee subpoenaed outtakes and other production-related materials, but CBS refused to turn them over, citing the First Amendment. Congress eventually threw out its own subpoena, resulting in a win for CBS. The Selling of the Pentagon went on to win an Emmy award.

Davis took a leave of absence from CBS in 1972 to pursue his next project, Hearts and Minds (1974). He wanted to explore three questions about the Vietnam War and its impact: 'Why did we go to Vietnam? What precisely did we do there? And, what did doing this do, in turn, to all of us?' (Berman 1975). Davis interviews US political leaders, US military members, Vietnamese leaders, and Vietnamese civilians. Following the direct cinema tradition, Davis remains offscreen. In an interview with famed economist Walt Rostow, Davis, offscreen, asks, 'Why do they [the Vietnamese] need us?' Stuttering in surprise, Rostow first replies, 'Because they were subject to, uh, military attack from the outside', and after more stuttering, he asks, 'Are you really asking me this goddamn silly question?' Unlike other documentaries about the Vietnam War, Hearts and Minds features interviews with Vietnamese individuals. Vu Duc Vinh lost both his son and his daughter in a bombing mission. He demands to know, 'What have I done to Nixon so that he comes here to bomb my country?' Another unidentified Vietnamese person observes, 'Look, they're focusing on us now. First, they bomb as much as they please, then they film'. Hearts and Minds also incorporates archival footage, including some now-famous images that capture the horror of the Vietnam War. At the age of nine, Kim Phuc was immortalized in a famous photograph as she ran away from her bombed village, her clothes burned off her body from a napalm blast. Another famous archival piece shows a Vietnamese prisoner shot in the head by a passing military officer. All of these elements combine to create a hard-hitting look at an unpopular war.

Hearts and Minds, like The Selling of the Pentagon, generated controversy. Rostow filed an injunction against the film, claiming his reputation was compromised, and the lawsuit provided Columbia Pictures with an excuse to withhold the film from distribution for six months. A California court dismissed the case in January 1975, but Columbia's monetary problems became another obstacle to distribution, until Warner Brothers eventually distributed the film. Hearts and Minds won the Oscar for Best Documentary Feature.

The next major project for Davis was Middletown (1982), a documentary series about life in Muncie, Indiana. He served as executive producer for the six-episode series, which included The Campaign, The Big Game, Community of Praise, Family Business, Second Time Around, and Seventeen. The series again followed the direct cinema style Davis preferred, and it aired March 24 to April 21, 1982. As with The Selling of the Pentagon and Hearts and Minds, the series was controversial, especially the episode titled Seventeen. An examination of the life of a high school student, the episode includes scenes of pot smoking, interracial dating, drinking, and teen pregnancy. Excessive swearing punctuates the dialogue in the episode. Seventeen was never broadcast, partially because of its subject matter and foul language. Because of the episode, sponsor Xerox also withdrew its funding in late January 1982, leaving Davis to scramble for additional funds. Some groups began to campaign for certain cuts, but preferring to leave Seventeen intact, he pulled it from the air.

Davis continues exploration of sociopolitical subjects through writing. He is the author of several books, including Hometown (1982), Where is Nicaragua? (1987), and If You Came This Way: A Journey through the Lives of the Underclass (1995). He has contributed articles to The Nation, Esquire, The New York Times Magazine, New York Woman, The Boston Globe, and The Los Angeles Times.

Dead Birds

(US, Gardner, 1963)

Dead Birds is a landmark film by Robert Gardner, about both ritual warfare and cultural conceptions of humanity, as refracted through symbolism of mortality, among the Dugum Dani of Irian Jaya, Indonesia (formerly Netherlands New Guinea). Dead Birds marks an extraordinary achievement in both nonfiction filmmaking and in collaborative anthropological research. It is the result of the three-year 1961-3

Harvard-Peabody New Guinea Expedition. Under the auspices of the Harvard Film Study Center, the Expedition's members included the initiator and filmmaker Robert Gardner; anthropologist Karl Heider as assistant cinematographer; anthropologist Jan Broekhuijse as interpreter; Michael Rockefeller as sound recorder and still photographer; and naturalist and writer Peter Mattheissen.

Although the Dani had already encountered the Western world and industrial modernity before the Harvard-Peabody expedition arrived, many were still using stone axes and conducting warfare with spears and bows and arrows. Gardner has written that:

[my] job was made much easier because no one knew what I was doing. My camera was no more or less interesting or threatening than my belt buckle or sunglasses. It was part of the strange costume which I always wore and that it made a noise was a matter of complete indifference. I might have been holding a large insect which occasionally murmured as I put it to my eye. Such innocence worked, of course, to my advantage, and I kept as strictly as possible to the rule that no photographs be shown to anyone.

(Gardner 1972: 2–34)

This interest in nonacted behavior, unprovoked by the presence of a camera, continues to characterize the core of ethnographic filmmaking today, unlike mainstream documentary, which has become in recent decades increasingly performative and, in certain respects, fictional.

Gardner has explained that the intention of the expedition was 'to make a comprehensive study of a single community of Neolithic warrior farmers [... and to] document verbally and visually the whole social and cultural fabric of this community' (Gardner and Heider 1968: xv). Thus, in addition to the feature-length Dead Birds, Mattheissen published the ecological essay Under the Mountain Wall: A Chronicle of Two Seasons in Stone Age New Guinea (1962), Heider completed his PhD dissertation, The Dugum Dani (1970), Broekhuijse authored De Wiligiman-Dani (1967), and Gardner and Heider together composed the remarkable photographic essay, Gardens of War: Life and Death in the New Guinea Stone Age (1968). With affinities to both the Griaule-Leiris Mission Dakar-Djibouti of 1931–3 and the Marshall family expedition of 1952–3, this collaborative Harvard-Peabody expedition has been essentially without sequel in both the social sciences and the visual arts. Although the aspiration to complete a 'comprehensive' verbal and visual documentation of the 'whole social and cultural fabric' of the Dani might be thought to imply a yearning after a totalizing holism that has since been abandoned by anthropology, the multidisciplinary, multi-authored, multimedia, and multigenre nature of the expedition and its publications in certain regards prefigured experimental, reflexive anthropology by almost half a century. In Heider's words in The Dani of West Irian, a study guide designed to complement the film, the intention was to produce a multitude of image-based and textual materials 'from different points of view, and give somewhat different pictures of the Dugum Dani [...] which has important implications for anthropological methodology' (Heider 1972: 2–3).

The film is perhaps best known for its extraordinary sequences of actual, unstaged warfare between different Dani alliances. These were produced, it must be remembered, during the Vietnam War, at a time when the ethics of US military involvement in Southeast Asia were on the minds of filmmakers and spectators alike. Although the battle scenes in Dead Birds would later be criticized for their synthetic nature—they were composed of shots taken from various battles in various locations—they were no less astonishing for that. As anthropologist Margaret Mead wrote, invoking the contrast between a filmic depiction of people's actual, lived experience, and interview testimony commenting on that experience, 'There is a great difference between hearing from the lips of people to whom warfare had been forbidden what war was once like [...] and on the other hand, having a visual record of how such warriors really confront each other across a traditional battlefield' (Gardner and Heider 1968: viii). Moreover, any cut between shots necessarily entails a rupture in time and/or space, and for the most part written ethnography is also synthetic in similar ways to film. Dead Birds was also notable for its innovations with technical limitations of the time, especially with the recording of location sound. Produced on the eve of portable synchronous equipment, much of the audio in Dead Birds, and even some

Dead Birds follows a classic narrative structure, akin to those of fiction films. It reveals social patterns through the actions of two main characters: Weyak, a warrior, and Pua, a child swineherd who functions as a surrogate son of Weyak. Both stand apart from their peers. Weyak is characterized as unusually vigilant, and also responsible. Pua, on the other hand, is slower, frailer, and weaker than his friends. As the film progresses various tensions and contrasts are developed within the narrative. There is the large-scale conflict of Weyak and Pua's alliance against a neighboring one. There are the visual and thematic contrasts between the labor of women and the labor of men. There are the pitfalls that little Pua encounters as he struggles to take care of his pigs. There is the larger symbolic contest that humans wage, however vainly, with death. Indeed, the film's climax comes when Wejakhe, a young tribe member, is found dying by the Aikhe River. The film's denouement occurs after his funeral, as Weyak and the others ponder their roles in the boy's death and contemplate revenge, and in turn the audience is implicitly prompted to reflect on its own mortality.

Significantly, much of Gardner's work draws from symbolism and world mythology. Dead Birds is no exception. The very title, Dead Birds, is a translation of the Dani term for weapons and other ornaments captured during warfare (Gardner 1972: 2–35). The image of birds as a symbol for war, death, and mortality is prevalent throughout the film. Bird plumage is the desired battle attire, as the otherwise almost unclothed Dani adorn themselves with feathered head-dresses. After Wejakhe is killed, Pua finds and eats a small dead bird, bedecking himself with its feathers 'like a warrior'. The recurring, ominous image portending Wejakhe's fate is one of ducks swimming on the Aikhe River. These birds, we are told early on, are avoided at all costs because of the debilitating magic they contain. They ascend with piercing squawks as the narrator announces Wejakhe's death. It is later revealed to be the very place where Wejakhe ('wrong path') is killed.

In addition to presenting its disparate images of battles as a pastiche of a single battle, Dead Birds has been criticized on various counts. The apparently affectless narration, voiced in the third-person passive by Robert Gardner himself, has been taken to task for its omniscience of its characters' actions and thoughts, at times resulting in a literal one-to-one correspondence between picture and soundtrack. However, anthropologist Karl Heider has contended that the thoughts and sensations attributed to individual Dani in the film are, to his mind, entirely credible. Moreover, as with that in John Marshall's The Hunters, it is also possible to understand the narration as an experimental exercise in mythopoetic representation, obliquely evoking the inner lives of its subjects through narratively constructed poetic symbolism, rather than as purporting to convey a comprehensive, objective account of their thought processes in toto.

Additionally, the film has been criticized in contemporary classrooms for its inattention to the lives of Dani women. Although the bulk of women's activities are shown in a subordinate light to those of men, this criticism is not entirely correct. We are introduced to Weyak's wife, Lakha, and follow her and other women as they process salt (even if the salt-making is intercut, as parallel action, with the more visually arresting scenes from the battlefield). Later in the film, after Wejakhe's death, women and girls figure prominently—as funeral mourners and as instruments of religious sacrifice. Indeed, one of the most unsparing sequences of the film shows tiny girls whose fingers have been partially chopped off by the Dani in order to placate the ghosts of the deceased. For all its containment within the symbolic logic of the film, the realism and violence of this sequence in many ways resists metalinguistic translation, making it both 'cruel', in Antonin Artaud's sense, and 'obtuse', in Roland Barthes's sense.

Finally, some anthropologists have taken Gardner to task for being a universalist, with insufficient interest in and knowledge of the cultural particularities of the subjects he has chosen for his films. However, this line of criticism is arguably more revealing about the trajectory of late twentieth-century cultural anthropology, with its increasing and arguably disproportionate attention to cultural difference in the face of widespread global homogenization, than it is a shortcoming of the films themselves. As Gardner himself has spoken of Dead Birds:

I seized the opportunity of speaking to certain fundamental issues in human life. The Dani were then less important to me than those issues [...] I saw the Dani people, feathered and fluttering men and women, as enjoying the fate of all men and women. They dressed their lives with plumage, but faced as certain death as the rest of us drabber souls. The film attempts to say something about how we all, as humans, meet our animal fate.

(Gardner 1972: 2–34)

In 1989 Gardner returned to the Baliem Valley to work on a sequel film, called Roads End. While there he located both Pua and Weyak, who were working in the tourist industry. Although a video cassette copy of Dead Birds had made its way to the local Protestant Mission, it had not been seen by its subjects. Gardner consequently arranged (and documented on film) a screening of Dead Birds for them. Afterwards, Gardner wrote:

It was not long before I realized that it hardly mattered what they saw that day. Their pleasure was not in the shape but in the content of what they watched. The film could have begun in the middle or gone backwards or forwards or have been composed of any of the thousands of scene that had been left out when I edited the film so scrupulously more than twenty-five years ago.

(Gardner 1996: 65)

(UK, Thomas, 1980)

Death of a Princess was one of the most controversial documentary dramas ever screened on British television. Filmed in the style of the investigative documentary for which British television had achieved a justified reputation in the postwar period, it depicts a journalist's attempt to discover the truth behind the public executions of a member of the Saudi royal family and her lover. London's Daily Express had reported the incident in 1977, using the account of a British contract construction worker who had witnessed and taken photographs of the executions. Antony Thomas, a South African-born documentary filmmaker, researched this story of royal adultery and its punishment under Islamic law in both the UK and the Middle East between July and November 1978. He was struck by the stark contrasts in interpretation among the various Western and Arab witnesses and authorities he met.

The film caused a diplomatic furore before and after its screening in 1980. Between April (just before the film was transmitted) and July, diplomatic relations between Saudi Arabia and Britain were directly affected. The Saudis at one point asked ATV to withdraw the film; at another time they demanded cuts to be made. King Khalid's planned State Visit to Britain was then cancelled, and finally Lord Carrington, the British foreign minister, felt constrained to offer what amounted to an apology. Only then could relations be normalized and lucrative contracts for British industry restored. In the United States, too, there was pressure on the PBS network from both government and programme sponsors (Mobil Oil) to withdraw the film. It was, however, transmitted in the UK, Europe, Australasia, and the United States.

The controversial subject caused additional questions to be asked about the form and function of the film. Writer/producer Thomas chose to dramatize his own real quest for truth about this historical incident via a fiction structured like a documentary. He did this, he claimed, because he was especially concerned about protecting his Arab sources. He also felt that the very excess evident in the opinions and prejudices the incident generated meant that fictional analogy held out greater possibilities than pure documentary. Thomas's intention was to interrogate the difficulty of establishing truth through the documentary form in a fraught situation where cultures were clashing. Ironically, he succeeded in making the East–West situation even more fraught, as well as raising questions about the legitimacy of the documentary drama. Death of a Princess was accused of blurring the boundaries between fiction and nonfiction, and it intensified the debate about what was permissible in mixing modes on broadcast television.

The film illustrates the truth of the proposition that it is never the form of a documentary drama that causes controversy in the wider political world beyond media representation. Thomas's angle on the comprehension gap between Western and Middle Eastern societies was certainly sophisticated; the film's self-conscious attempt to meditate on the wider ramifications of the act of representation makes it into one of the first 'metadocumentary dramas'. The film's main protagonist, standing for Thomas himself, is journalist Christopher Ryder (played by Paul Freeman). Identification with this character situates the audience in the subject position of 'seeker after truth'. Ryder takes a literal and metaphorical 'journey to the East' as a kind of cultural explorer (clearly evident in a central sequence of the film in which shots of religious chanting and calls to prayer are juxtaposed with his difficulties in making headway with Saudi officials).

In Ryder's gathering bafflement can be discerned a critique of the documentary claim of authenticity as well as a measurement of the East–West divide. By 1980 documentary no longer had an unproblematical claim on truth, with its essentially constructed nature being increasingly seen by academics as based on a questionable belief in the representational power of the camera and the quasi-legal authority of the witness. In the narrative structure of Death of a Princess can also be seen the fictional template of an international thriller. This genre-hybridizing tendency was to become a major feature of late twentieth-century British and American docudrama.

The form, then, was more conscious, more knowing, in 1980 than ever it had been before, but it did not protect this film from blatantly aberrant readings in the public sphere. Its coproducer, Martin McKeand, once remarked that it became a film about which everybody had an opinion—even if they had not actually seen it. The controversy was primarily generated by the sensitive nature of US/European relations with the Middle East at this point in history. Formal experimentation was no guarantee against the film becoming a media event, and part of a wider 'moral panic'. The film's fascination for a Western audience was increased by the portrait it offered of a sexually active Arab woman making choices in a quasi-Western way. (Allegedly, Saudi princesses regularly procured men for casual sex.) Ten years after the beginning of the women's movement, this aspect played provocatively to Western audiences, going against the stereotype of the submissive Arab woman hidden behind a veil. The punishment suffered by the Arab princess was all the more shocking when seen from this angle. Thus, not only was the Saudi government infuriated but also postcolonial cultural commentators such as Edward Said (in his Covering Islam, 1981) felt that the film shamelessly used the Arab as 'Other' and was more interested in debating Western social and political issues than in understanding Middle Eastern culture and values.

The documentary drama achieves a kind of formal maturity in films like Death of a Princess, even more so than in the other 'foreign policy' films of the same era. Many of these dealt with the struggle toward political liberalization in Iron Curtain satellite states (e.g. Granada's 1980 Invasion). Because they had a European cultural and political focus, and human rights credentials, these films were seen as campaigning against the worst abuses of a discredited political system. Death of a Princess, by contrast, mobilized a much more complex set of issues. Issues of form, function, and reception have continued to reverberate around the documentary drama.

(US, Ford/Toland, 1942)

December 7 deals with the surprise attack on US military installations in Hawaii by the Japanese in 1941. Two versions exist. The first, an eighty-three-minute docudrama, was never released to the public. The other, comprising thirty-four minutes of footage drawn entirely from this original, was exhibited widely, winning an Oscar for Best Short Subject in 1943. Footage from December 7 has since been used extensively in World War II documentaries, yet almost all of it is bogus, having been created in a Hollywood studio. Through constant repetition, its spurious images have become the accepted record of the 'Day of Infamy'.

The US government, in consultation with John Ford, chose Gregg Toland (photographer of Citizen Kane) to direct. In Hawaii Toland discovered that less than six minutes of indifferent quality footage of the actual raids existed.

On his return to Hollywood, he proceeded to restage events using miniatures, rear screen, and matte projection. US aircraft were painted with Japanese insignia and military personnel were pressed into service as extras. The dramatic leads were played by Walter Huston, Charles Davenport, and Dana Andrews.

A weary Uncle Sam (Huston) is convalescing in Hawaii on December 6 after a year of international crises that have sorely tried his endurance. His conscience (Davenport), whose geniality masks a racism no less chilling for being charmingly delivered, materialises to cast doubt on America's trust in the loyalty of the one hundred and fifty-seven thousand Japanese-Americans on the islands. A series of vignettes would seem to prove that a proliferation of spies exists. Also bemoaned is the ostrich-like behaviour of Washington's politicians faced with evidence of Japanese militarism in the Far East. Following the simulated raids and massive reconstruction effort, the film concludes in Arlington National Cemetery with a ghostly sailor (Andrews) insisting to a skeptical fellow-phantom from the Great War that the United States will not return to its isolationist shell when this conflict ends.

Official reaction was almost unanimously negative. The major flaw was seen as the picture's fence-sitting equivocation. Effective screen propaganda must be factually selective, allowing no room for doubt or compassion. Those aims are not achieved by providing a forum for reasoned debate. Given December 7's intended audience, the need was for a work that would elicit a negative response to all things Japanese as well as pride in the accomplishments of those who had literally salvaged much from the débâcle that was Pearl Harbor. The print remained locked away until 1943, when Ford suggested the government could obtain some recompense for its $80,000 investment. The result was the abbreviated version, shorn of all but the attacks and reconstruction footage.

December 7 in either format is not a negligible achievement. It provides an excitement and immediacy that few World War II documentaries surpass. Continued recourse to its images by filmmakers over the past half-century bears testimony to its lasting impact and, specifically, to the visual and dramatic flair of Gregg Toland, its discredited director.

December 7 (US, Field Photographic Unit, 1942–3, 83 mins and 34 mins). Produced by John Ford. Directed by Gregg Toland and John Ford. Shooting script by Sam Engel. Edited by Robert Parrish. Music by Alfred Newman.

Del Mero Corazón

(US, Blank, 1979)

According to its collaborators, director Les Blank's Del Mero Corazón: Love Songs of the Southwest (1980) was an attempt to preserve some of the cutting-room leftovers from their previous venture into the world of Tejano and Norteña music, Chulas Fronteras/Beautiful Borders (1975). In the process of making the first film, the scope of the subject matter grew from an investigation of a regional music tradition into a poetic commentary on the lifestyles and hardships of the musicians and the communities that support them. Producer and sound recorder Chris Strachwitz worried that, despite the cinematic accomplishment of Chulas, many of the songs that initially sparked his interest in the subject—the heart-wrenching love ballads—were not given enough depth. A DVD released by Strachwitz's Arhoolie Records in 2003 puts both films together, with an abundance of commentary and outtakes from the entire project.

Watching the films in chronological order, Del Mero Corazón's stylistic and thematic inspiration can be seen in two of Chula's most poignant moments: in an interview the legendary Lydia Mendoza explains that with every song she performs, she experiences emotionally what the lyrics detail; later, the camera fixates on a taut barbed wire, pulls its focus to a spiny cactus paddle, continues to the plant's bursting yellow blossoms, all while the lead vocalist of Los Alegres de Terán bitterly-sweetly contemplates long-distance love. The latter sequence illustrates the overlay of lyrical poetry and symbolically relevant images that serves as the staple of Del Mero Corazón's montage structure. The result is an audiovisual poem stripped of narrative interpretation, which allows the viewer—like Mendoza—to live rather than listen to each song on the soundtrack.

The film's opening sequence shows a hand chopping chiles, barbecue festivities, several close-ups of flames and glowing embers, and a crimson crepuscular sky. As each shot burns red, the lyrics of Ricardo Mejía and Rubén Valdez's 'Seis pies abajo' (six feet under) weeps of unrequited love and bleeding hearts. At same time, the bouncing accordion and rhythmic clapping align the mood with the general revelry of the banquet, pointing out that tragic lyrics and celebratory music are not mutually exclusive in the culture under scrutiny.

The film's primary concern is a consistent matching of visual, musical, and emotional passions in a variety of settings. In nearly all of the twelve sequences a unique musical track is performed, while the visuals build a bricolage of voyage and place icons, from trains and eighteen-wheeler trucks, to the landscape they traverse and the towns and truck stops they approach. Spliced together five years after Chulas was released, Del Mero Corazón makes a point to 'travel' beyond its predecessor's border theme. The footage is taken primarily from filming done in San Antonio, Texas, and Monterrey, Nuevo León; it also includes performances in California, showing that the Tejano music's audience is geographically broader than its name implies. Much like Chulas, it brings the political issues of migratory work and travel (in particular with regard to the toll distance takes on romantic relationships) into a film that at first glance simply celebrates the southwestern traditions of music and dance, food, and beer. One fictitious heroine's story pervades various lyrics in both films with Homeric tribulations, as Zenaida's laments are interpreted in corridos by Los Madrugadores and later by Andrés Berlanga.

In two sequences late in the film, the interview and performances of accordionist Chavela Ortiz break up the masculine voices and gazes, bring an inspirational air of political evolution to this musical field heavy with history and tradition. Ortiz tells of her beginnings performing with her mother and sister, but that neither chose to continue due to the pressure and resentment shown by many male colleagues, romantic partners, and audience members. Ortiz persisted and succeeded despite the same struggle until her untimely death after the production of the film (mentioned by the filmmakers in the 2003 DVD commentary). This documentation of her music and insight augments Del Mero Corazón's value as a cultural-historical artifact.

Rich in color, the film uses fuchsia stucco buildings and aqua wedding attire to underscore the musical excitement. Hand-painted graphics on the façades of Mexican and Texan businesses, along with California murals, show how the vibrant rural landscape infuses artistic and artisanal sensibilities. The desire to capture the chromatic intensity can be seen carried over into editor Maureen Gosling's later directorial work, Blossoms of Fire (2000), about the matriarchal Zapotec culture of Mexico. Gosling considers this project with Blank and Strachwitz to have informed much of her later work on Latin American cultures. At other points in the film, the colorful exteriors are left behind in order to show the true home of the music: inside the bars, cantinas, and dance halls. Les Blank films an energetic performance by Leo Garza's conjunto, with shots from a shadowy stage behind the two vocalists. The camerawork creates the aura of their sweat-drenched profiles with the moisture reflecting a makeshift lighting set-up attached to the rafters of an otherwise dark locale. The film ends by studying the details of a Chicano Power mural in California while the ballad 'Las Nubes' (The Clouds), updated to a 1970s sound and style with electronic keyboards and infusion of English callouts, is performed by Little Joe y la familia. The vocalist contemplates a life journey of political struggle, and much as in Chulas, the theme of love is pushed beyond romance, to cultural pride, passion, and self-empowerment.

The few small segments of narration in the film, read by María Antonia Contreras, are recent. Historical lyrical texts chosen by professor of Hispanic literature Guillermo Hernández to underscore the Mexican American culture's extensive tradition of emotive expression through lyrical verse. The film is seamlessly subtitled for both Spanish- and English-speaking audiences, thanks to a government grant awarded to the filmmakers shortly after the production of Blank's Burden of Dreams (1982), allowing several of the director's films to be screened throughout Latin America.

Depardon, Raymond

Raymond Depardon began his professional life as a photographic journalist. Having worked for press agencies and cofounded the agency Gamma in 1966, his subsequent move into filmmaking in 1969—with his first film, Ian Pallach—owes a great deal to his initial training. Although the trajectory of his career has gradually taken him away from the more journalistic reportage style of the earlier work, his filming and his photography remain inextricably linked. Known mainly for his documentaries, Depardon also explores the border between fact and fiction, straying into the latter domain almost entirely in some films (e.g. Empty Quarter) and revisiting documentary subjects to test the limits of fictional representation in others (e.g. Tchad (2) et (3) and La Captive du désert). From the outset, he has traveled the world to work in settings as varied as Prague, Yemen, Chad, India, and New York, to name but a few, but returning periodically yet repeatedly to film French-based subjects in Parisian and, most recently, rural settings.

Depardon became interested in filmmaking at a time when the direct cinema of Leacock, Pennebaker, and the Maysles brothers was prominent. When he eventually began making his own films, they turned out to be more influenced by this US tradition than by that of the French cinéma vérité of Rouch. Depardon's filming is not participatory in the Rouchian sense in that he does not intervene or communicate with his subjects, nor does he explicitly interrogate his own relationship to them. Although the filmed subjects of his documentaries may acknowledge the presence of the camera, neither Depardon nor any of his assistants stage this encounter in order to turn the camera on the observer(s).

This activity is saved for his more autobiographical, self-reflective works. Another crucial connection to the direct cinema tradition is via the work of Wiseman. Like Wiseman in the United States, Depardon has filmed institutions crucial to the French establishment, notably in the three films Faits divers, Urgences, and Délits flagrants, all set in Paris, which deal respectively with law and order, psychiatric health care, and justice. In contrast to the filming of Wiseman, however, Depardon films the institutions concerned in order to focus on the people who allow them to function and not on a critique of the institutions in themselves.

Although infinitely varied in approach to his subjects and adopting a correspondingly appropriate style, Depardon's films have traits that recall the influence of still photography in his work. The photograph features literally in Les Années Déclic, as does discussion of the profession of photographer in Reporters and in his section of the collaboratively made Contacts. Yet, even when there is no place afforded to the photographic still, Depardon's filming is characterized by a patient, motionless focus that is reminiscent of this other medium. This is particularly apparent in the Paris-based Urgences and Délits flagrants, for example, where the psychiatric emergencies of the Hôtel Dieu and the interviews of offenders at the Palais de Justice are stationary encounters. Even within the films that deploy this fixed framing technique most frequently, the camera becomes more mobile when necessary. However, when he uses the long static shot, Depardon does not steer the viewer's gaze to certain aspects of a given scene but keeps a steady focus on the space of the encounter, allowing people to enter or leave it without following them.

Depardon waits for his subjects to come into the space of his enclosure rather than moving into theirs, even though he is conscious of being located in the space of the other as soon as he begins filming. He keeps his distance, an ethical one in some respects, but he is fully aware that approaching any of his subjects with a camera is a form of violence. He comments specifically on the violence of the filming encounter when making San Clemente, set in the Italian asylum.

His contribution to Contacts focuses on the photographer as a professional voyeur, distance here becoming ultimately more damaging than respectful. Continuing from his desire not to disturb the scene he is filming, this does not, however, prevent him from focusing on himself in other ways. Indeed, consideration of the filming self becomes an important ethical concern. The presence of what he terms 'le regard mixte' or 'la caméra mixte' in the fiction Empty Quarter is an attempt to negotiate a point of view for the camera that is somewhere between the gaze of the filmmaker and that of the fictive male subject of the film. Without turning the camera on himself in Contacts, he sees himself being totally implicated in the pain he views such that the greatest violence is done toward the filming self. The most complete turn toward the filming self, however, has been in the more autobiographical mode of Les Années Déclic.

Numéros zéro and Reporters focus on linked aspects to his profession but Les Années Déclic, in contrast, features photographs that tell the tale of his life up until that point while featuring extracts from some of the films he had made thus far. One film in particular, 50.81 pour cent, was banned by Giscard d'Estaing at the time, since he did not like its portrayal of his electoral campaign (the film is now distributed as 1974: Une partie de campagne). Les Années Déclic is a film with a difference, since Depardon sits in front of a projector with the light shining in his eyes, looking down at the still images on which he then comments. These images are brought to life occasionally by the films to which they relate. He dedicated this quasi-autobiography to his parents. He makes touching reference to his father, who died when Depardon was on location making another film; his mother died during the making of this particular film. Rather than having gone round the world, he states that he should perhaps have spent more time getting to know his father, whom he loved a great deal.

Although this is now impossible, the return to film a French rural community in his 2001 work, Profils paysans: l'approche (Chapter one in an evolving series), seems in some way to represent the displacement of this desire to return home.

Biography

Born in Villefranche-sur-Saône, July 6, 1942, into a farming family. Left home for Paris in 1958 to work alongside Louis Foucherand, his first contact with the profession of photographic journalist. Became attached to the Dalmas agency, via Foucherand, in 1959. Left for the Sahara at the request of Louis Dalmas, then subsequently to Algeria for his first trip to Africa, 1960. Employed on return by Dalmas, part of a team of photographers who worked with papers such as Samedi-Soir, France-Dimanche. Called to military service in March 1962, Dalmas agency insisted that he be photographer for Bled 5-5, the journal for the armed forces, and was subsequently transferred to Paris. Cofounded the Gamma agency with Hubert Henrotte and Gilles Caron, 1966. A special report on Chile earned him and two other Gamma photographers a Robert Capa Gold Medal Award. In 1977 he received a Pulitzer Prize for his work in Chad. Among his prestigious film accolades to date, he was awarded the Prix Georges Sadoul for Numéros zéro and Césars for best documentary for Reporters, Délits flagrants and for the documentary short, New York, NY.

Deren, Maya

Maya Deren (née Eleanora Derenkowsky), one of the most prolific advocates for experimental and independent film practice in the United States, helped to establish a paradigm (based on a unified front of institutional patronage and collective social action by art cinema's practitioners) for the funding, circulation, and presentation of avant-garde films. Her labors as both a filmmaker and proponent of 'non-industrial' film work were a result of her interest in sustaining a countersystem to that of the distribution circuit of America's popular commercial cinema, and include a range of activities that enriched the fields of independent film manufacturing, distribution, exhibition, and promotion following World War II.

Although Deren's contributions to the language of indigenous art cinema in the United States have been characterized by some critics and historians within formalist categories and as autoethnography, the broad language of her work, including the corpus of critical texts she produced in order to frame her films' reception, suggests otherwise. Her awareness and concern with the acts of historical classification and collective modes of interpretation were as much a part of the working methodology of her artistic practice (thus eluding or making complex the subsequent linear categorization of her work) as the construction and circulation of the art-object she produced.

During World War II, the state of experimental or avant-garde film production in the United States was limited by a lack of material resources and exhibition venues. Further restricting potential attempts at filmic experimentation or production outside of the commercial center of film manufacturing in Los Angeles was the high cost of 35mm film production, with its large and cumbersome equipment, and the lack of funding bodies engaged to support nonindustrial film work.

The conclusion of the war helped to rectify these conditions as new and used portable 16mm equipment and a surplus of 16mm stock produced by Eastman Kodak for use by the US military prompted a consumer market to be developed in order to expend the surplus film resources that were now available domestically. In New York the end of the war brought with it a great number of import films that were available for commercial use and an art house exhibition circuit that quickly expanded in order to serve this market.

During this period Deren had completed work on her first film, Meshes in the Afternoon (1943), in collaboration with her husband, filmmaker Alexander Hammid, in Los Angeles. By 1946 she had her first opportunity to screen her films 'outside of the law of industrial production' in a rented theater in Greenwich Village. It was her first few initial experiences with self-distribution and production that exposed Deren to the difficulties of operating outside of the commercial mainstream. However, through her ability to sustain a market for her work from the support of screenings held at educational institutions, museums, and film societies, a viable model for alternative praxis was developed. This model was held together primarily through Deren's own advocacy, taking the form of public lecture presentations, numerous published articles, and seeking the support of organizations offering fellowship support or financing for the plastic arts, which led to her being awarded the first Guggenheim Fellowship granted for 'creative work in the field of motion pictures' in 1946. By 1954, unable to obtain consistent financial backing, Deren focused her efforts on establishing the Creative Film Foundation (CFF), a nonprofit organization that was to offer grants for the 'development of motion pictures as a creative fine art form'. She expanded the CFF's activities in 1956 with the Creative Film Awards, which promoted the work of a select group of experimental filmmakers. Although limited funds would end up being distributed through the CFF, the organization helped to aid the dissemination of avant-garde film work in the United States and provided a formal platform for the broad dissemination of experimental filmic praxis.

In 1946 Deren was invited to collect her writing on film by Alicat Press publisher Oscar Baradinsky. For Deren this was an opportunity to make available for the first time the range of her theories on film and film art in one concise volume that could then subsequently be made available through her distribution company, Maya Deren Films, and aid her in the management of her financial difficulties. This text, published as Anagram of Ideas on Art, Form and Film (1946), is an exploration of numerous topics, including an analysis of the field of documentary film and documentary realism. In Anagram, Deren posits that the 'real value' of the documentary mode is found in its ability to make material an 'otherwise obscure or remote reality', but cautions that its status as art must result not from its pursuit of narrative or poetic realism but by its particular affinity to film form. She criticizes the successes of documentaries produced during the 1930s and 1940s as misguided, and asserts that the integrity, or by her own term 'validity', that these films found was a false celebration of the medium's capabilities. Of the documentaries that she praises in Anagram for producing an 'art reality [...] independent of the reality by which it was inspired', she includes The Song of Ceylon (1934) and the early work of Dziga Vertov (aka Denis Arkadyevich Kaufman).

A year after the publication of Anagram, Deren had the opportunity to perform within the field of documentary through ethnographic field work while in Haiti, where she began to film secular dance and voodoo possession rituals with the financial backing of her 1946 Guggenheim Fellowship. By 1953, having made multiple trips to Haiti in order to gather footage for her voodoo project, Deren was still in pursuit of financing, but had been able to publish the monograph, Divine Horsemen: The Living Gods of Haiti, an observational analysis and history of Haitian voodoo culture. Although she was never able to complete work on her documentary film project, she continued to look for financing until her death in the early 1960s. In 1977 Deren's Haitian footage and audio recordings were collected and edited together by Teiji Ito, her third husband, and Cherel Winett Ito and released under the same title as her monograph.

Biography

Born in Kiev, Ukraine, 20 April 1917. In 1922 arrived with parents at Ellis Island in the United States. Attended the League of Nations International School in Geneva, Switzerland, 1930–3. Received BA degree from New York University in 1936. Participated in activities with the socialist movement and the Young People's Socialist League, 1934–7. In 1938–42 worked as a freelance secretary and editorial assistant, including a period in which Deren held a position with the Dunham Dance Company during 1941–2. Earned a Master's degree in English Literature from Smith College in 1939. Married filmmaker Alexander Hammid in 1942. Production of Meshes in the Afternoon in 1943. In 1945 began to self-distribute and promote films, arrange speaking engagements, and publish written work about film. In 1946 received Guggenheim Fellowship and published Anagram of Ideas on Art, Form and Film. Awarded the 'Grand Prix International for 16mm Film, Experimental Class' at Cannes for Meshes in the Afternoon, 1947. From 1947 to 1955 toured the Caribbean and studied secular and ritualistic dance and culture focusing on Haitian voodoo. In 1954 founded the Creative Film Foundation and in 1956 established the Creative Film Awards. Married composer Teiji Ito in 1960. Died October 13, 1961 in New York.

Desert Victory

(UK, Boulting, Macdonald, 1943)

Desert Victory is a documentary record of the British Eighth Army's campaign in North Africa against German and Italian forces under the command of Field Marshall Erwin Rommel. It consists almost entirely of footage shot by combat cameramen, including some captured German film. In this kind of filmmaking, two creative problems are uppermost for the filmmakers working with miles of actuality material: first, to give clarity to the mass of confusing, technical detail; and second, to give it dramatic form.

In Desert Victory, the first problem was solved by the use of animated maps to establish the overall patterns and movement of the campaign, and by a carefully planned narration. As for the second, all of the nonartistic material with the randomness and irregularity of history inherent in it was given a beginning, middle, and end—like the chronicle plays of Shakespeare. (Henry V gives considerable attention to an English army at war on foreign soil, and Laurence Olivier's film version of it (1944) fitted into the patriotic spirit of the time.) To organize these events so that they would appear both clear and dramatic, the filmmakers contrived an alternation of cause and effect. To personalize the mass action and to gain empathy, a number of close-ups of individual soldiers were inserted. (Some of them were obviously recreated; for those, actuality footage was augmented with brief scenes shot at Pinewood Studios.) Generals Alexander, Montgomery, and Wavell, and Prime Minister

Churchill are introduced as well. In addition, the irrelevancies of the sponsor's requirements—to show each branch of the armed forces, the civilian workers, the presence of US aid, and so on—were fitted into the whole without warping it out of shape.

Desert Victory starts at the lowest point of the campaign, in the summer of 1942. The British, who had retreated across the Sahara, pursued by the seemingly invincible Afrika Korps, are halted just sixty miles from Alexandria, deep inside Egypt. Then, in October, there is the fierce battle at El Alamein, with the British emerging victorious. From there the film follows the triumphant one thousand three hundred-mile pursuit of the German and Italian armies to the final victory at Tripoli.

In comparison with the British indoctrinational semi-documentaries (Target for Tonight, 1941; Fires Were Started, 1943; Western Approaches (The Raider in the United States), 1944), which tended to make the violence of war part of a job of work to be done, Desert Victory is singularly bloodthirsty. Perhaps these filmmakers weren't inclined to conceal their elation over this first major British victory following the battering that Britain had received in the previous desert fighting and from the air Blitz of Britain itself.

Desert Victory was an enormous critical and popular success. Apparently its sincerity and feeling of authenticity were most responsible for this. In Britain it became the most successful of all official films at the box office up to that point. The Times (of London) wrote of it that it was not only a valuable document but that it also succeeded in being good 'cinema' as well (March 4, 1943). In the United States two respected reviewers (tough-minded realists) praised it highly. Manny Farber wrote that it was a pleasure and an excitement: 'It is a real documentary, not a newsreel assembly [...] This is the first time a movie has been the original source for the clearest account of an event. The filmmakers of the British government were obviously as well prepared [...] as was the Eighth Army under Montgomery' (New Republic, April 12, 1943). James Agee thought that 'Desert Victory is the first completely admirable combat film, and if only film makers and their bosses can learn the simple lessons it so vigorously teaches, its service to the immediate future and to history will be incalculably great' (The Nation, May 1, 1943). It received an Academy Award as the year's most distinctive achievement in documentary features.

Its success prompted a series of large-scale, feature-length 'victory' films. Tunisian Victory (1944), a British-American coproduction, also directed by Roy Boulting, carried the North African story from the US landings in November 1942 to the annihilation of the German forces at Cape Bon. Burma Victory (1945), also directed by Boulting, may have been prompted in part by a Hollywood feature, Objective Burma (1945, directed by Raoul Walsh), which annoyed the British. In it Errol Flynn, as a US paratrooper, pretty much single-handedly mops up the Japanese enemy. The True Glory (1945), the final film in the series, was produced jointly by the British Ministry of Information and the US Office of War Information. It was codirected by Englishman Carol Reed and American Garson Kanin, fiction film directors of considerable distinction. It covers the period from the preparation for the D-Day landings in Normandy, through the fall of Berlin, to the establishing of contact between the Western Allies and Soviet troops at the Elbe River. Desert Victory may also have been a model for the highly successful and influential American television series Victory at Sea (1952–3).

Diary for Timothy, A

(UK, Jennings, 1945)

documentary materials with rather conventional, heavily fictionalized narrative structures in Fires Were Started and two subsequent short films (The Deserted Village and The True Story of Lilli Marlene), Jennings returned in A Diary for Timothy to what Jim Hillier has called the ‘distinctively associative and non-narrative style’ of such earlier short films as Listen to Britain (Hillier 1972). The result was arguably the most aesthetically accomplished of Jennings’s films, with regard to both the graphic quality and compression of its individual images (photographed by Fred Gamage) and the sophistication and complexity of its montage. At the same time, Jennings’s own ideological uncertainties as to the significance, for Britain, of the imminent end of World War II are embodied in the film’s formal irresolution, the impression it conveys of a filmmaker straining against both the Griersonian model of documentary and his own aesthetic of synthesis. It is precisely this sense of strain that gives A Diary for Timothy a poignancy and tension missing from Jennings’s earlier films, and that makes it a more interesting work than either its partisans or its antagonists have allowed.

Jennings began work on A Diary for Timothy in the summer of 1944 and began location work in the autumn; filming continued into the following spring, and the war was over by the time the film was released. Although it documents some setbacks for the Allied side (notably the Arnhem campaign of late 1944), the whole film is shaped by the certainty of the war’s end, and all its images of sacrifice, loss, and mortality are set in relation to the filmmaker’s—and the viewer’s—confidence in a happy ending (one of the narrative conventions Jennings both adopts and worries over). The voice-over commentary was written by E.M. Forster, but clearly he worked to Jennings’s design; indeed, some phrases from Jennings’s working notes turn up more or less intact in the final version. While the film was certainly affected by the unfolding of public, historical events, the essential structure was in place early on in the filming.

A Diary for Timothy presents itself as an account, addressed to the protagonist, Timothy James Jenkins, of the first six months of his life. Jennings weaves together scenes from the child’s life (homecoming, baptism, first Christmas) with episodes from the lives of four other ‘typical’ characters: Goronwy, the Welsh coal miner; Alan, the gentleman farmer; Bill, the London engine driver; and Peter Roper (the only one of these characters with a surname), an injured fighter pilot recovering in a hospital. Intercut with these continually interrupted and deliberately inconclusive narrative strands are scenes of landmines being cleared from the British coastline (as fears of invasion recede); children playing amidst the wreckage of bomb sites; people standing in line for coal on the street; Myra Hess performing Beethoven at an afternoon concert; John Gielgud playing Hamlet; rescue workers looking for survivors of a V-2 attack; a woman unable to sleep in an underground shelter; young people at a dance hall; and, running through the whole film, within and around all these other strands, scenes of people listening to the radio for news of the war. The familiar voices of the radio newsreaders connect the listeners in their separate rooms, but what we see is the separation; the montage isolates what it joins.

Jennings's scenario in A Diary for Timothy, with its simple stock characters identified by their work, has certain qualities reminiscent of a children's story. This makes sense in a film addressed to an infant, but that device itself may have the effect, as Andrew Britton contends, of infantilizing the spectator. There is some truth to this observation, although it oversimplifies the multiple levels on which the film actually addresses its audience, and its multiplicity of voices. Jennings constructs representative rather than individualized characters in order to convey a sense of social totality: a Griersonian strategy, but adapted by Jennings to more critical and less obvious ends. Here, the sense of totality is a product of total war. 'You were part of the war, even before you were born,' the commentary runs. 'Everyone was in it; it was everywhere; not only on the battlefields but in the valleys, where Goronwy, the coal miner, carries his own weapons to his own battlefield.' Such language might be taken to affirm a patriotic sense of connectedness and common purpose, but equally it articulates a feeling of inescapability, of history as nightmare—and not only in wartime, as the film's recurrent references to the unchangingly terrible conditions in the mines make clear.

A Diary for Timothy celebrates the Allied advances of early 1945, but it also pushes its audience to think more critically about war and its 'sides'. In a 1948 essay Jennings named a 'propensity for endless aggressive war' as one of the defining traits of the English, and wrote that 'some of the English achievements in the late war, notably the burning of Hamburg, make the blood run cold'. So, in a late sequence in the film, when we see a series of shots of London being rebuilt while on the soundtrack a radio announcer describes massive Allied bombing raids on Berlin, the juxtaposition should complicate our response to the good news from the front, as should a later sequence intercutting images of bombing with Timothy crying in his small white cot. Timothy's comfortable whiteness is contrasted throughout the film with the hellish darkness in which Goronwy works, and it is Goronwy's voice we hear in a sequence just after the Berlin air raids: 'I was sitting thinking about the past: the last war, the unemployed, broken homes, scattered families. And then I thought, has all this really got to happen again?' The apprehension that runs through A Diary for Timothy as to what comes after the war's end is not rooted in a hollow nostalgia for 'the war as golden age' (Britton 1989), but in a disenchanting historical memory of the economic and social conditions—not just 'there', but 'here'—that brought the war into being.

Dindo, Richard

Richard Dindo is the best-known documentary filmmaker to emerge from Switzerland, and one of the country's most prolific. Active since the early 1970s, he has made more than twenty-five films, most of which are documentaries. Within Switzerland, Dindo's reputation is based primarily on his rereadings of key episodes of twentieth-century Swiss history. Several of his films—such as the 1975 The Execution of the Traitor Ernst S., on Swiss collaboration with the Nazis, and Dani, Michi, Renato & Max (1987), on police brutality against the youth movement—raised controversy when they were first released but are now considered definitive accounts of the period in question. Grüniger's Case (1998) took a critical look at Swiss refugee policy during World War II through the case of a police chief who was dismissed in disgrace for helping Jewish refugees to enter the country at a time when the borders were officially closed to Jews.

Internationally, Dindo is known mainly for his critical biographies of literary as well as artistic and political figures, such as Arthur Rimbaud, Jean Genet, Max Frisch, Charlotte Salomon, and Che Guevara. In nearly every case, Dindo has based his film on documents and/or art works created by the protagonists themselves, and the films are thus often filmic adaptations of their subjects' own autobiographical accounts.

Throughout his career, Dindo has continually returned to a handful of major themes: the process of artistic creation; the potentially political role of the artist in society; oppositional social movements and the often tragic outcome for their participants; and the way in which accounts of such movements and individuals have been suppressed or distorted by official history. In his 2003 Ni olvido ni perdón (Neither Forget Nor Forgive) Dindo combines all these themes in his analysis of the 1968 student movement in Mexico, which was brutally crushed by the government but continues to live on in the films, plays, monuments, and songs created to try to come to terms with the tragedy.

Dindo's body of work is distinctive not only in the consistency of his themes and choice of subjects but also in his signature filmmaking approach, which has remained remarkably constant over the years. Dindo has often referred to himself as 'a documentarist of the past', more interested in rereading past events than in chronicling the present as it unfolds. In most cases his protagonists are long dead, forming a central absence around which the films are structured. Dindo's aim is to reconstruct past events so that they may be reexamined by contemporary viewers. In doing so he makes little use of standard methods such as archival footage or docudrama. Instead, he relies on a range of other devices that suggest fragmentary links with past events, rather than directly reproducing them.

A main element in Dindo's films is always testimony, both written and spoken, whether in the form of his protagonists' autobiographical writings or the memories of surviving witnesses. Letters, photos, paintings, excerpts from fiction films, old newspaper coverage, and other historical materials are also cited for their ability to partially recall the past. A recurring motif in nearly every Dindo film is the return to the location of a key event, where the very absence of any traces testifies to the difficulty of bridging the gap between then and now. To emphasize this juxtaposition of past and the present, Dindo will often contrast a writer's description of a place with newly shot views of the location. In other cases, eyewitnesses visit the scene of the events they are describing and may comment on what is missing in the present time.

If Dindo does use staging, it is usually partial or indirect: introducing a catalyst into a situation but not determining its outcome. The return to an historical location may provoke an eyewitness reaction, but the reaction itself is clearly unrehearsed. In some cases Dindo has had actors follow the path of his dead subjects, retracing their steps as described in their writings. Only rarely has he used actors to literally restage scenes from a protagonist's life. In his Arthur Rimbaud, a Biography (1990) Dindo explicitly addresses the boundary between documentary and fiction by having actors playing Rimbaud's friends and having relatives read authentic texts from the poet's life, such as diaries and letters, in the original locations. In his 1983 portrait of actor and film director Max Haufler, he films scenes from a project that Haufler himself was unable to shoot, with Haufler's actress daughter playing the role her father had intended for himself (Max Haufler, 'The Mute').

In talking about his work (see for instance the chapter-length interview in Hübner 1996), Dindo has often expressed a fundamental mistrust in the ability of the film image alone to adequately represent a documentary situation. For Dindo the true power of documentary film as an analytical tool resides in the juxtaposition of, or the dialectical relationship between, image and text. Thus, an idyllic landscape gains new significance when we are told by a witness that the film's hero died there, and a scene read out loud from a protagonist's diary becomes truly moving when it is accompanied by contemporary footage of the place it describes.

Moving the spectator and inspiring the viewer's imagination—these play a fundamental part in Dindo's declared documentary goal of restoring contact with his absent protagonists. Dindo has cited Marcel Proust's In Search of Lost Time novel cycle as his biggest artistic influence. In Dindo's own attempt to temporarily conjure up an otherwise irrecoverable past, he depends on the viewer's willingness to take an active role. In his 2000 essay, 'Ich erzähle die Erzählung des anderen' (which can be loosely translated as 'I Am the Teller of Others' Stories') Dindo writes: 'My viewers must also perform the work of memory by participating in the construction of the film [as] they watch it, shot by shot and sentence by sentence'. Through the artifice of his films' construction, Dindo invites the viewer to engage in authentic dialogue with historical figures and events.

Born in Zurich on June 5, 1944, as the grandson of Italian immigrants, left school at the age of fifteen, working at a series of odd jobs and traveling widely before moving to Paris in 1966. The encounter with French culture—literary and cinematic—would have a lasting influence on his work. As a self-taught filmmaker with no formal training, he considers the hundreds of books and films he encountered in those years as his filmic education. In 1970 returned to Switzerland to make his first film, and has divided his time between Zurich and Paris ever since. Has made over twenty-five documentaries and fiction films.

Dinner Party, The

(UK, Watson, 1997)

While not his most well-known work, Paul Watson's The Dinner Party (1997) exemplifies the British filmmaker's 'fly on the wall' documentary style, his socially introspective slant and biting tone. Watson's methodology and cinematic aim are prevalent as the camera turns a critical and often satirical eye on society to reveal all of the quirks, warts and banalities of everyday people in a particular class or social situation.

Like the majority of his other works, the film was created for and broadcast on television, allowing it to reach a expansive spectrum of society in their own homes.

Paul Watson has made a career of creating powerful and award-winning documentaries for UK television entities including the BBC, ITV, Granada and Channel 4. Watson's earlier works, the ground-breaking The Family (1974), The Fishing Party (1985) and Sylvania Waters (1993), were striking in their then innovative portraits of working- and middle-class British and Australian life on camera.

The Dinner Party focuses on a wealthy group of British Conservatives gathered for dinner preceding the Labour Party's election victory. The film's release caused great controversy due to both the dramatic interactions unfolding in the work on-screen and the resulting accusations by the dinner party guests offscreen. The bold, bigoted views, largely centring around race and sexual orientation, expressed by the participants in the film predictably shocked many viewers. These same film participants then maintained that Watson distorted their conversations and attitudes following the public outcry. The discussion about truth and representation in the media that developed brought the film to light again, and served to both re-establish Watson as a progressive and non-orthodox documentary filmmaker and fit The Dinner Party sturdily into his socially critical 'docusoap' oeuvre.

Paul Watson, known for his years at the BBC, as Governor of the Bournemouth Film and Television School in England and then at Granada TV, is part of a 'new generation' of British documentary directors. While earlier British documentary works were renowned for their concern with greater societal issues, the films of Watson and his contemporaries present a more focused, personal view of the world. Watson's first major foray into this style that gained critical and audience attention was The Family (1974) for the BBC. This film became part of a genre of so-called 'docusoaps', a grouping that Watson credited with founding, but tries to separate himself from as they developed into reality television trends. These controversial films use the power of the documentary form to entertain instead of educate. They also often feature a biased narrator and seemingly bizarre individual everyday lives rather than large societal issues that effect a collective. The Dinner Party fits into the later part of the docusoaps' reign with British audiences as popular interest began to wane toward the end of the century. Watson tries to distance his career from this heading and maintains his films' serious intent over entertainment.

However, it cannot be overlooked that the primary themes in his body of work, over three hundred films in total, resound with the style and popularity of the docusoap genre. It is significant that The Dinner Party, made nearly twenty-five years following Watson's initial success with The Family, employs similar cinematic styles to corresponding rhetorical aims.

Divided World, A

(Sweden, Sucksdorff, 1948)

While not the most acclaimed of Arne Sucksdorff's shorts at the time of its premiere, En kluven varld/A Divided World stands now as one of his best-known films and one of his masterworks. The film's 'story' is simple and, unlike a number of Sucksdorff's other nature shorts, has no voice-over narration. After opening shots of water and the dark Swedish forest in winter, we see a church and graveyard as the music of Bach's 'Fantasia', continuing from the credits, swells. A white weasel stops munching its food and hides in the snow from a wolf. The wolf eats the rest of what the weasel had started. We next see a white rabbit eating from the branches of a tree. Similarly spooked, it dashes across the snow. A pair of flashing eyes indicate, however, that the wolf is near. The weasel and an owl watch and listen as the wolf captures and kills the rabbit. The owl then swoops down next to the wolf, successfully battling the larger animal and flying off with the rabbit. Later, however, we see the wolf licking at another piece of food. The film ends with shots of a house, separated from the forest by a modest fence.

Seemingly highly Darwinian, the film nonetheless posits that the world of humans is strongly divided from that of animals. One way to read Sucksdorff's film, in fact, is as a response to those who were inclined to anthropomorphize the motivations of the animals in his work. Early on, the reflections of trees bent over the water appear on its surface, separated from the actual trees, giving the film's first signifiers of division.

We see shots of a graveyard, a repository for when people die. When animals die, they receive no burial but rather are eaten by their predators or by scavengers. That said, there is no sense of judgment in the framing, camera movement, or editing; this very lack is also part of what gives the film its remarkable suspense. No reason is given for a world in which cute bunnies die, lucky weasels hide, and an owl can defeat a wolf. The film thus combines the almost childlike, observational innocence that is one of Sucksdorff's greatest strengths as a filmmaker with a maturity resigned to the harsh beauty of the ways of nature.

Sound plays a crucial role in the film. The opening sound of water bubbles calls attention to the precision and intensity of sounds that pierce the winter silence. The expressionistic use of sound critics find in other Sucksdorff films is in evidence here, especially in the howling wind, highlighted in stunning shots of moonlight through trees, that seems to warn the animals of impending danger. Sound is especially important in telling Sucksdorff's highly arranged narrative. We only hear the rabbit's death as the camera dwells on what we read as the reactions of the weasel and the owl. Later, we see the owl land next to the wolf but are not privy to their battle for the rabbit. Only the weasel is seen as, with another use of somewhat amplified sound, the scuffle between the owl and the wolf takes place, ending with the surprising sound of the wolf's whimper. Thus, neither of the film's moments of violence is actually shown. Either Sucksdorff was unable to fully capture the battle, or it did not turn out as scripted, and what we see later is either a different owl or the same one carrying a different carcass. What is equally likely is that Sucksdorff was uninterested in the gore attendant upon the kill and the battle. Such scenes would have disrupted the austere beauty, or worse, they would have encouraged viewers to pass judgment on the animals. In Sucksdorff's vision there are no villains. The sound proves that he does not exploit the savagery, but neither does he find it contemptible or unnecessary.

The use of Bach works on several levels. Given that it is heard most clearly during shots that show, or appear to be near, the world of humans, this music represents civilization, the separation from the world of animals. This latter world has its own music, one of rustling trees, burbling water, roaring winds, scampering animals and, of course, the fierce, isolated cries of attack and the agonized death screams of the rabbit. At the same time the music suggests the stylized nature of the entire enterprise, one well aware of the ominous tones in Bach's deep chords. For all the appeal of the animals, this film is no Disney Fantasia: winsome animals kill, or they die painfully.

Critics have complained about the fakery in shots of the church and graveyard, but such criticism is essentially beside the point, for this fakery only emphasizes the larger theme of a divided world. The same might apply to those shots where the wolf's eyes flash and suddenly disappear. Since one continuous shot pans and tracks from the frightened rabbit to the lupine eyes, one might wonder whether Sucksdorff staged two flashes of light to suggest the moonlight momentarily capturing the animal's glassy eyes. An earlier flash of the wolf's eyes appears where one of the film's buildings appears in the distance; this, too, raises the question of staging in order to contrast the world of humans with that of animals. Elsewhere, concerns about staging arise simply because some shots seem too amazing to be 'true'. Was the wolf's tail that close to the hiding weasel, or did Sucksdorff place a fake tail near the hole and film the weasel's emergence? One might similarly wonder how he managed to track the owl flying off with the rabbit's carcass, or if it battled the wolf at all. It is in the framing and the editing that, while the observational strength of individual long takes gives the film its persuasiveness, Sucksdorff's film states its themes in an overtly essayistic manner.

The tendency of critics to read this film allegorically also stems from its structure of repetition and variation. When the wolf appears, the weasel responds by hiding, and it survives. When the rabbit senses the wolf, it runs, but is caught and killed. Finally, when the owl sees that the wolf has food, it attacks and successfully seizes the carcass. To hide, to flee, to confront—these choices, the film suggests, cover the range of options in the animal world. For all the timeless quality of this film, given that it was made just after World War II and the Holocaust, hiding, fleeing, and attacking must have summed up for many the choices that people made. The fence that separates the cozy cottage from the forest in the film's final shot, while demarcating a divided world, nonetheless appears jagged and rickety.

Divine Horsemen

(US, Deren, 1977)

Maya Deren's Divine Horsemen: The Living Gods of Haiti is a visually rich, ethnographic study of the rituals of the Haitian religion of voodoo and its dance rituals. Unable to edit her own footage during her lifetime, Deren instead wrote a book with the same title, which, although she had no formal training in anthropology, became an authoritative work on Haitian voodoo—more commonly known by its colloquial name 'voodoo'—for many decades to come.

Divine Horsemen is Deren's last film, and probably also her most mystical piece of work, not least due to its subject matter. Teiji Ito, who had composed the music for Deren's Meshes of the Afternoon and who became her third husband, produced the film after Deren's death, together with his later wife, Cherel, using Deren's twenty thousand feet of film and her music recordings. The film had its first screening in 1978.

Having worked as an assistant to Katherine Dunham, a choreographer and anthropological researcher of Caribbean dance, Deren had seen Dunham's dance footage from the West Indies and was inspired to write essays on religious possession and dancing. In 1946 Deren received a grant of $3,000, the first given out by the Guggenheim Foundation for filmmaking. Deren had originally proposed a film that would contrast the ritual of children's games with ritual ceremonies of traditional societies in Bali and Haiti, but once in Haiti she changed her mind, feeling, according to her own account, 'defeated in her original intentions' (Deren 1953: 7). Over the period of four years Deren took three trips to Haiti and spent a total of eighteen months on the island, mostly staying with a community outside Port-au-Prince.

Divine Horsemen, shot in black and white, is divided into two parts. The first part—consisting of seven of the film's eight chapters—explores Haitian religious dance ceremonies and the various gods for whom these are performed. The last chapter shows footage from carnival festivities in Port-au-Prince. The individual chapters begin with a black screen and the veve, the sacred symbol of the god, drawn with flour onto dust. The film follows the ceremonies in the order they are performed for the gods.

Hence, the first chapter shows a dance for the loa Legba, the gatekeeper between the visible and mortal and the invisible and immortal world. There follow dance ceremonies for Agwe, the loa of wisdom, Erzulie, the goddess of love, Ogoun, the loa of might and power, Ghede, the loa of life and death, Azacca, the god of agriculture, and last, a presentation of the fast rhythmic music of the Kongo tribe.

Maya Deren was highly suspicious of an alleged scholarly detachment from the subject matter as a means to understand the 'object', and instead regarded subjectivity as the characteristic approach of the artist (Deren 1953: 8–9). She particularly avoided learning anything about the dances and their meaning beforehand, in order to respond purely to the direct impacts that they would have on her.

In recording the energetic dances, Deren's camera focuses on the individual and collective bodies of the dancers and, in particular, their arms and legs. The camera is unusually close to the action, at times immersed, and yet the dancers and bystanders hardly ever seem distracted by the camera. The fast music and the numerous close shots of moving limbs, rather than the focus on the faces of the dancers, pull the viewer into the action and by doing so almost make it difficult to treat the dancers as exotic objects. The result is the intimate perspective of a camera that is very close but never intrusive. Also, the recorded 'possessions'—the visible manifestations of the gods—are not artificially dramatized or exoticized. Were it not for the voice-over the viewer might hardly notice them. Voodoo, 'a religion of rare poetic vision and artistic expression' (Deren 1953: 15), is depicted as a complex social ritual and a source of communal enjoyment and strength rather than as an unfathomable primitive cult.

Divine Horsemen is also a study in movement. Although Deren made only seven films, she is often considered the first dance filmmaker. Her interest is not so much in documenting facts as in representing the diverse aesthetic forms that reality takes, as is made clear in her use of slow motion and freeze-frames. They also reveal Deren's interest in these ceremonies as aesthetic, sensory experiences.

The impression of an immersed rather than a 'prying and staring' (Deren 1953: 7) spectator is further reinforced by the voice-over. Although Deren's other films usually do not use language, Divine Horsemen uses a male and a female voice-over to elaborate on the ceremonies. The voice-over narration is also used to move the film outside the purely aesthetic and visual spheres, as it links the religious dances of the Petro rites to the political history of Haiti, and to its successful fight for independence in 1804. The Petro loa incorporates ‘the rage against the evil fate which the African suffered, the brutality of his displacement and his enslavement’ (Deren 1953: 62), and eventually gives the slaves the moral force to pursue independence. Throughout, these descriptions—themselves excerpts from Deren’s book—are given in the language of an insider who very benevolently explains the facts of this society to an outsider.

Although superficially the film does not have much resemblance to Deren’s earlier films—partly because Divine Horsemen is her only documentary film—there are important themes that link the film with her broader work. Like the majority of her films, Divine Horsemen is concerned with dance and body movement as an aesthetic form of communication. The film also focuses on an aspect of a theme that is core to Deren’s other work: transformation of identities. It seems that all these concerns amalgamate in Divine Horsemen in a way unforeseen by Deren herself. The inclusion of voodoo in her life stands as an experience that transformed her personally and as an artist. Deren herself read her inability to edit her material as a sign of the power of voodoo: ‘I had begun as an artist [...] I end by recording, as humbly and accurately as I can, the logics of a reality which had forced me to recognize its integrity, and to abandon my manipulations’ (Deren 1953: 6).

Dockers

(UK, Anderson, 1999)

Dockers stands at the ambiguous intersection between feature and documentary film. It tells the story of a fictitious family’s involvement in an historical event: the industrial dispute at Liverpool Docks from 1995 to 1998. What is unique about the film, though, is that it has been written, acted, produced, and televised, in part, by participants of the dispute, with the intention of documenting their experiences during this dispute.

In September 1995 Mersey Docks sacked five hundred Liverpool dockers for refusing to cross the picket line raised by fellow dockers over a labour rights dispute. Dockers narrates the events of the strike from the dockers' point of view. It focuses in particular on the life of one family, the Waltons, in which both father and son are caught up in the strike. The story's starting point is the days immediately before the strike—the miserable working conditions on the dockside—and it continues up to the workers' defeat twenty-eight months later, when three hundred dockers were paid off with £28,000 each.

Dockers was written as a three-part television drama and televised in the summer of 1999. In Dockers the fact-fiction boundary is an intricate one. The sacked dockers and their wives themselves—in workshops run by the Workers' Educational Association (WEA)—wrote the screenplay and successively signed a contract for the screenplay to be televised. Moreover, even though the film uses professional actors in many key roles, some of the dockers who wrote the script also acted in the film, although they do not play themselves. Actors play alongside nonactors and together they reconstruct a dramatized version of reality. All this makes Dockers a drama that could be described as a 'creative treatment of actuality' (Rotha 1952: 70).

As is the nature of a television drama, Dockers focuses more on the individual and private repercussions of the strike than on the collective and political ones. It uses the development of these personal narratives to move from one dramatic sequence to the next. The drama of the film is heightened by a focus on two brothers, one who supports the strike, and dies as a result of the hardship of the strike, and the other, who, to support his family, turns 'scab' and crosses the picket line, losing the friendship and support of all around him. The music—for the most part a highly dramatic refrain carried by multiple violins and intended to draw in the audience emotionally—complements the dramatic structure and adds to the tension of the story.

Dockers continues a long tradition of the representation of working-class lives in British film. It works by juxtaposing the public and the private aspects of the conflict into a tightly woven tableau of interrelations, where the fight of the dockers and their families touches all spheres of life and all is political. Despite the focus on the personal experience of fictitious characters, the film follows a tight script, aimed at conveying as much historical information about the politics of the strike as possible. Alongside a representation of the daily struggles of the working class is a more bitter critique of the unions that failed the dockers—despite huge international support for their actions—and ultimately of the new left Labour government of Tony Blair.

Dont Look Back

(US, Pennebaker, Leacock, 1967)

Donn Alan Pennebaker's Dont Look Back [sic] is the prototypical rock performance/tour movie, a genre that promises an all-access pass to the onstage, backstage, and offstage arenas of the life of a public figure. Reveling in direct cinema's ability to provide unprecedented access to its subject, Dont Look Back goes well beyond simply documenting Bob Dylan's 1965 concert tour of England, by criticizing attempts by more traditional media to label the young singer-songwriter, by turns, a precocious teen idol, an anarchist, and a poet. Dylan's propensity for 'playing' these roles for the camera while offstage raises the question of whether or not the singer-songwriter participates in this packaging process as he negotiates the swirl of adulation generated by his breakneck accomplishments as an emerging young artist.

As a performance-based observational documentary, Dont Look Back depends on Bob Dylan's ease before the camera. The brash and opinionated young Dylan's effusive willingness to speak for himself during press conferences, onstage performances, and offstage critiques of news reports about him makes him the perfect subject for a documentary that celebrates direct cinema's superiority to older forms of journalistic reportage such as print and radio. However, Dont Look Back also revels in the paradox inherent in its ostensibly objective presentation of a subject with an established public persona.

A shot during which Pennebaker follows Dylan as he strolls from a dressing room, down a dark passageway, and out onto a brightly lit stage to deafening applause exemplifies direct cinema's greatest advantage over radio and print media: its ability 'to go into a situation and simply film what you see there, what happens there, what goes on, and let everybody decide whether it tells them' about an event of public significance (Levin 1971: 235). Incumbent in this goal is a journalistic philosophy of filmmaking that insists that objectivity can be achieved by simply documenting an event and allowing the audience to decide for itself its newsworthy implications. In foregrounding the role of the journalist, direct cinema afforded Pennebaker the ability to mount a critique of other more traditional newsgathering practices on the basis of a realist style that characterizes photography, television news, radio interviews, and newspaper reports as inferior because of their subjective dependence on an intermediary to select and organize facts and details into a story.

For this reason, Pennebaker resisted attempts by critics to elicit an admission that Dont Look Back also harbors a hidden agenda of organizing details into a subjective construction of 'Bob Dylan'. On one hand, the director described Dylan as a 'guy acting out his life' and gleefully noted that someone had performed part of Dont Look Back onstage. On the other hand, Pennebaker insisted that 'you couldn't fake it in a hundred years' and that 'if there's any artistry in what I do, it is deciding who to turn this fearsome machine on' (Levin 1971: 241, 261).

Dont Look Back delights in revealing the constructed nature of press images and words. By allowing Dylan to speak for himself, the film launches both direct and indirect criticisms of print journalism. During a seven-minute retort to a Time magazine reporter, Dylan notes the potential for human error in newsgathering ('You might hear the wrong words' and 'You have to weed it out—I can't teach you to weed it out'); the impossibility of objectivity in print journalism ('There's no ideas in Time magazine, there's just these facts'); and print's implicit use of social and cultural guidelines to 'frame' the meaning of a news event ('I mean, it's a certain class of people that take the magazine seriously'). To be sure, Dylan simultaneously effaces direct cinema's own subjectivity by defining the truth as 'just a plain picture', evading in the process any recognition of documentary's construction of truth through its juxtaposition of strips of celluloid frames. For example, Pennebaker contrasts Dylan's assertion to a reporter that he doesn't compose music or write lyrics while on the road with a scene of the songwriter hunching over a typewriter in his hotel room. While it is impossible to tell if Dylan is composing a song, the indisputable evidence provided by Pennebaker's 'picture logic' suggests that the interviewer who relies on Dylan's 'word logic' is more likely to get it wrong (Hall 1998: 232).

In a similar condemnation of radio as a newsgathering technique, Pennebaker abruptly cuts short an interview that begins with a BBC reporter asking, 'How did it all begin for you, Bob? How did you get started?' As Dylan organizes a reply, Pennebaker suddenly cuts to even earlier footage of the singer accompanying himself on acoustic guitar and singing before a group of black men, apparently farm workers, in a rural setting. The timing of the cut again implies that if a picture is worth a thousand words then radio simply cannot convey the truth as vividly as direct cinema. That the director chose to include the pre-interview segment at all is perhaps best understood on the basis of how it upholds the film's agenda of flaunting its own ostensible verisimilitude. That Pennebaker shows the radio interviewer submitting his four questions to his subject for prior approval suggests that the director is once again criticizing the false spontaneity of the interview and the contrived nature of Dylan's pre-formulated responses.

In Dont Look Back's final scene, Pennebaker and his subject launch one last fusillade at the mainstream media. Responding to another printed attempt to label him, Dylan sighs, 'Give the "anarchist" a cigarette. A singer such as I. It probably took them a while to think of that name.' While the comment on one level offers a conclusive critique of the press's propensity for packaging Dylan, on another plane it stakes out direct cinema's position as a decidedly liberal rather than revolutionary reportage style. In the tradition of the press's role as provocateur of public discussion, Dont Look Back offers the deceptively simple claim that detached observation can yield objective truth while masking its own implicit—albeit inspired—construction of reality.

Drew, Robert

Aided and inspired as much by the programming opportunities in the still-developing medium of television as by technological improvements that added to a filmmaker's mobility, Robert Drew shares a reputation with his collaborator Richard Leacock as the father of 'direct cinema'. Drew Associates, the company they founded in the 1950s, produced seminal films that shaped what would become known as cinéma vérité and offered a new, intimate way of looking at news events.

As a photographer for the weekly magazine Life, Drew became interested in moving documentary film away from the authoritarian model of John Grierson and others and toward the 'candid' viewpoint offered by photo-journalism. After a year's fellowship at Harvard exploring his theories, Drew made an unsuccessful effort to develop a news show for NBC, but the results were unaired. Convinced that television remained the best vehicle for the films he envisioned, and inspired by the similarly minded Leacock, Drew obtained sponsorship from his former publisher, Time-Life, which owned a few television stations and was interested in developing programming for them. Drew and Leacock formed Drew Associates in 1957 and began to explore the methods that would eventually become the standard techniques of direct cinema: multiple camera crews using lightweight, portable equipment and synchronized sound recording, combined with an objective approach to the subject which allowed no outside, authoritative narrative voice molding the viewers' perceptions.

After three years of producing short films designed to coincide with stories in Life, Drew and his team filmed what is commonly regarded as the first important work to come from Drew Associates. For Primary, Drew and Leacock, aided by D.A. Pennebaker and Albert Maysles, among others, spent five days covering the simultaneous efforts of two US Senators, John F. Kennedy and Hubert Humphrey, as they campaigned in the Wisconsin primary for the Democratic presidential nomination. With its close, intimate focus on the campaigners, the film caught not only the details of a political campaign but also the historical moment in which style and image came to dominate the political process; Kennedy and his glamorous wife mesmerize their audience through sheer movie star charm, making Humphrey's earnest but old-fashioned baby-kissing and hand-shaking style seem quaintly archaic by comparison.

Drew's narrative approach to documentary can be summed up by the title of one of his most recognized films, Crisis: Behind a Presidential Commitment. For the 1963 film showing the behind-the-scenes reaction from the White House as the first black students prepared their court-ordered integration of the University of Alabama, Drew benefited from his previous access to Kennedy, who understood the importance of the media. Crisis, however, is also the implicit subject of many of the Drew Associates films of that period, which tend to focus on a group or an individual as they face a major decision within a set period of time: a young heroin addict faces a week without drugs (David), Jane Fonda rehearses a short-lived Broadway play (Jane), attorneys try to have a death sentence overturned in the week before the scheduled execution (The Chair).

Working in a challenging period while US media was changing rapidly, the Drew films set many of the standard operational methods for documentary filmmaking, but the interest and support of the television broadcasting companies proved to be unreliable. While Leacock, Pennabaker, the Maysles brothers, and other filmmakers who worked for Drew continued to develop his model of an intimate and immediate form of film journalism, they turned to theatrical distribution to counter the indifference and interference of network television.

Drifters

(UK, Grierson, 1929)

Drifters (1929) encapsulates many of the paradoxes of the British documentary film movement, both in itself and in terms of how it is perceived. Sandwiched ideologically and aesthetically between the cinema of Robert Flaherty and the agitprop of the Soviet Union, John Grierson's directorial debut was both the annunciation of a new type of cinema for the United Kingdom and an attestation of its potential failings. Nominally a record of the working lives of herring fishermen working off the coast of Britain, the film charts the activities of an industrial flotilla of fishing boats and the role of their crew in bringing 'the harvest of the sea' to the market of the world. It is divided into four parts, beginning with the departure of the men, proceeding through their casting of their nets before bedding down for the night, reaching a climax with the retrieval of the loaded nets in anticipation of a storm, and concluding with the cargo being brought to port, where it is bartered and packaged for delivery to the market.

Drifters was made with the avowed aim of documenting the hithertofore largely unrepresented life of the British working class and exploring the role their labour played in the physical and psychic fabric of the age of steam and steel. Representation of this section of society to date had mostly consisted of comic burlesques in fiction films in which actual labour played no part. Grierson's determination to change this came both as part of a general move toward realism to counter the increasing illusionism proffered by fiction film and as part of a more specific attempt to 'open, for Britain, a new vista of film reference' (Grierson 1938) by establishing reality-based filmmaking as an instrument of propaganda and education. Inspired by the political ideals of Soviet cinema, Grierson envisioned factual film as a conduit via which the experience of life need not be bound by geography or economic circumstance, but could be expanded through cinematic interconnection that showed one section of society how the others actually lived and worked.

The film went into production in the summer of 1928 with the New Era Film Company, known mostly for promotional shorts. Drifters was originally to be one of four films produced by the Empire Marketing Board that year as part of a package of educational/promotional material. It is said that the selection of this subject was partly an attempt to curry favour with the Treasury, the Financial Secretary of which was among the country's leading authorities on the fishing industry. The film would eventually cost just short of £3,000. It was shot silently, with Grierson serving as both director and editor, assisted by cinematographer Basil Emmott, then known as one of Britain's most accomplished cameramen. Grierson himself had almost no practical experience of filmmaking, although he had been observing and writing about it since the early 1920s. At the time, he wrote, 'What I know of cinema I have learned partly from the Russians, partly from the American westerns, and partly from Flaherty' (Grierson 1966: 136).

Superficially, Drifters demonstrates the influence of Flaherty most plainly. Its photographic style and narrative structure follow patterns of observation and visual storytelling used by Flaherty on Nanook of the North (1922) and Moana: A Romance of the South Seas (1926). Although less explicit in its use of character, it concentrates on observing real people in a mixture of real and recreated environments in the course of routine tasks that supposedly make up their everyday lives. It collects the action into an overall 'story', then segments this story into broad narrative movements that are illustrated with anecdotal and illustrative detail. Its opening scenes portray fishermen departing their village and use repeated images of waves crashing against the shore. The combination of imagery prefigures Flaherty's Man of Aran (1934), while its sentimental intertitles signal an attempt to distance the film from Flaherty by hesitantly suggesting that it will document a moment in which the traditions of the past are giving way to technological and industrial progress.

The film is fraught with formal tensions, as if, regardless of its polemical objectives, it is uncertain as to whether or not the exaltation of the labours of the working man within the industrial infrastructure is enough in itself to sustain an emotional connection with the audience. Grierson responds by taking a Flahertyesque turn to the poetic, although he avoids the excesses of romanticism because of the continued presence of technological imagery and because of the subject's stated direct connection with contemporary social reality.

Drifters departs from Flaherty and moves toward the Soviets in its attempts to integrate its observation of the rhythms of man and the sea with industrial imagery. It establishes a dialectical relationship between the surface and the underneath through a form of montage that, although less pronounced than that employed by Eisenstein, nonetheless betrays his influence. Grierson had garnered experience as an editor by working on the print of Battleship Potemkin (Eisenstein, 1925) being prepared for exhibition in the United Kingdom. According to Basil Wright (1976), 'to work with him at the editing bench was a liberal education'. As such, it is in its editing that Drifters assumed a more radical aspect. Shots of boats forging their way through the waves are intercut with images of pistons and engines, and the sight of a man shovelling coal into the furnace below decks informs our perception of the operations above where a sea captain barks silent orders at his crew. Emblematic imagery of scavenging dogfish stealing herring from the nets at night and ragged sea-gulls pecking and squabbling over the catch while men in suits barter for the payload indicate ideological awareness.

The film is organized around a series of physical conflicts: between land and sea, sea and boats, men and boats, fish and men, men and nets, nets and fish. It illustrates these tensions with close observation of the energies involved, be they expended preparing the boats for launch, fuelling and driving them at sea, letting out the nets, catching fish, or preparing them for market. It also uses conflict, or the expectation of conflict, to supply the climax: the fishermen suit up in rain gear and prepare to haul in the nets as the storm moves in. Although Flahertyesque in one sense, these contests are portrayed within an overall rhythmic structure that demonstrates some attempt to create imagistic and intellectual collision reminiscent of the work of the Soviets. The film is also, like Eisenstein's, driven by a sense of movement, not only in terms of the overall story, but within individual frames and sequences where images are rarely static. Almost every shot is filled with objects or elements in constant motion, and many are filmed from the deck of actual ships being tossed on the waves. The rise and fall of the horizon makes for an onomatopoeic representation of the experience of being on board one of the boats. Imagistic and ideological conflict coupled with a sense of visual and social movement are cornerstones of montage, yet the film still seems to lean more towards Flaherty than Eisenstein. There is an underlying sense that the rhythms of the fishermen's lives are congruent with those of the sea, not quite to the point of the neo-Rousseauianism of Flaherty's work, but still demonstrating what Ian Aitken terms a 'pantheistic humanism' (Aitken 1998) not too far from it. Meanwhile, the relationship between labour and production is not framed so much by an overarching dialectic of society or economy as by a simpler, more mechanical attempt to illustrate the process of production (fishing) in an informative, expositional, and educational way.

The film is of questionable value as a social document insofar as the term implies an engagement with society that extends beyond the specific instance of social reality that it represents. The section of the film that has come in for most criticism in this regard is the final one, which undertakes to contextualise the activities of the fishermen by suggesting that they are part of a larger economic and social infrastructure. A series of uncomfortable juxtapositions attempt to link imagery of the fish being prepared for shipping with white-collar commerce and trade. Images are quite literally blended together by superimposition, clumsily forcing connections between them in an attempt to convince the audience of a breadth of social analysis that is simply not present. The film concludes with faintly elegiac intertitles suggesting that what has been seen is merely the first link in a great chain of commerce and enterprise, but it does not in itself attempt to chart it.

Brian Winston, citing David Schrire, has referred to this as a 'flight from social meaning' (Winston 1995), a deliberate avoidance of the issues raised by social representation by recourse to the poetic. Winston sees this failure as symptomatic of the British documentary film movement on the whole. The recourse to the poetic is, he argues, endemic to the methodology of Grierson's 'creative treatment of actuality', which, as he says, 'depends on an assumption of a particular naivety in the audience. Without such naivety, the audience could not believe that anything of the real would survive "creative treatment".' Harry Alan Potamkin, writing on the film's original release, went deeper into its structural weaknesses by observing that Grierson had failed to understand that true power of montage cinema was cumulative. Though Potamkin recognised the qualities that Grierson had brought to individual scenes, he noted that the scenes were separated from one another on a level of deeper meaning. This prevented the film on the whole from achieving results at the measure of the political aesthetics of the Soviets. 'This was a film intended to show labor. If Mr. Grierson thought to extend it to inferences beyond the facts of toil, to the total economy of exploitation, his attempts at inter-reference between sea and market, fisher and broker, were certainly too inadequate' (Potamkin 1979).

In spite of its flaws, Drifters had enormous impact. It was famously premiered at the London Film Society on November 10, 1929 in a double-bill with Grierson's edit of Battleship Potemkin, and drew largely favourable notices. Its portrayal of the working class was seen as a triumph for the common man, and Grierson's direction was singled out for praise by many contemporary commentators. Many observers saw the film as a preferable alternative to Potemkin. Its humanism was more easily subsumed into a socially democratic conception of state-sponsored cinema. The film subsequently received screenings at a number of commercial venues, and was also shown at the House of Commons by special request. A year after its release Drifters had recouped its production costs. Its success cemented the Empire Marketing Board's commitment to documentary film as a component of its publicity and promotional activities. The EMB Film Unit was officially established in 1930, by which time Grierson had already begun to gather talented young amateur filmmakers of similar mind to himself to make more of the same. As Erik Barnouw observed, 'After Drifters, they flocked to the Grierson banner' (Barnouw 1993).

Dyke, Willard Van

Willard Van Dyke, originally a photographer, joined the world of film as one of three cinematographers on Pare Lorentz's The River (1937). Along with a number of writers, playwrights, filmmakers, and others prominent in the arts at the time, he became associated with the left-wing organization Nykino, which metamorphosed into Frontier Films in 1937. When Van Dyke and Ralph Steiner left Frontier Films on ideological grounds, a large-scale sponsored project left with them (creating tension among some of those involved in Frontier Films which was never assuaged).

The film became The City (1939), produced for the American Institute of Planners. It promotes the concept of planned greenbelt communities detached from urban centers. Codirected and cophotographed by Steiner and Van Dyke, it was a notable success, and was well received at the New York World's Fair of 1939.

Van Dyke followed The City with Valley Town (1940). Throughout his life he considered those two films to be his best. Sponsored by the Sloan Foundation, Valley Town concerns the problem of technological unemployment. Directed by Van Dyke, the cinematography was by Roger Barlow and Bob Churchill, and the editing by Irving Lerner; the score was composed by Mark Blitzstein.

A dark view of a depressed US industrial community, Valley Town offers a partial solution to the bitter problem it examines. However, as with many American documentaries of this era, the hopeful ending seems tacked on to meet the sponsor's requirements without much conviction on the part of the film's makers. The impression that remains after viewing it is of an impersonal and vast economic system that serves few well.

Aesthetically and technically, Valley Town is remarkable in several ways. The extraordinary force and effectiveness of its images is striking. Its use of soliloquy, including some sung soliloquy, is daring.

Following the US entry into World War II, Van Dyke (with Ben Maddow) made a film for the Coordinator of Inter-American Affairs, The Bridge (1944). It is about the economies of South America and the importance of air transport in connecting its countries with each other and with North America. For the Office of War Information he made Pacific Northwest (1944), which describes and interprets the northwestern states, rarely settings for Hollywood entertainment (or other documentaries, for that matter).

After the war Van Dyke made films for industrial sponsors, such as American Frontier (1953), produced for the American Petroleum Institute. Although he retained some of the themes and style of his earlier work, a prevailing blandness replaced his originality and conviction. He also made a film about his former teacher, Edward Weston, for the United States Information Agency, entitled The Photographer (1948). He made films for television when that possibility became available, including a number for the Twentieth Century series: Ireland: The Tear and the Smile (1961), Sweden (1961), and So That Men Are Free (1962). From 1965 to 1973 he was director of the film department of the Museum of Modern Art, where he distinguished himself by being particularly interested in and supportive of emerging and young experimental and documentary filmmakers. In his retirement, he returned to his first love, still photography.

E

Eiffel Tower, The

(France, Clair, 1928)

René Clair's short film La Tour (The Eiffel Tower), with a running time of fifteen minutes, is a paean to the French icon of modernity—the Eiffel Tower. The film is constructed as a cinematic postcard using rhythmical montage and editing as its poetic means of expression. Similar to the 'city symphonies', many of which were being made at the same time, Clair's film straddles the margins between documentary and experimental film in its treatment of subject matter. Traveling up and down the monument, Clair's camera emphasizes the 'iron lass' itself and the materials used to create it: the iron girders, the elevators, the cages. Clair constructs his film with sequences of varying lengths and speed, which make up a visual poem. As a hybrid genre it represents, as do many of Clair's short films, an attempt at 'pure cinema', a film that is totally free of narrative restraints, and whose subject is realized completely through the creative use of the film medium.

The Eiffel Tower was made after René Clair had completed Une Chapeau de paille d'Italie/The Italian Straw Hat in 1927. Clair had used the French landmark as an important setting in his film, Paris qui dort (1924), and felt that he had not used it enough because of the requirements of the scenario. The director wanted to make a film ('une documentaire lyrique') expressing his adoration of the Eiffel Tower. He discussed the idea with his production company, Albatros-Kamenka, which in turn provided him with a camera and film for the project. The short film was shot on location at the Eiffel Tower during the spring of 1928, and editing was completed in the autumn of that year.

The Eiffel Tower begins with a postcard-like image of the tower standing against a cloud-filled sky. This pictorial stasis is soon broken by a rapid montage of images of portions of the tower. Clair then returns to the opening shot and fades out. The director then uses a series of short sequences, interconnected by dissolves, showing the history of the construction of the monument. Beginning with a portrait of Gustave Eiffel and architectural blueprints, the sequence progresses through the birth of the tower. The final shot of this sequence shows the completed tower with a title card that reads '1889'. Clair then uses a slow tilt all the way up the tower that fades to black. The camera then enters the structure and begins an upward ascent to the various observation decks. Clair's camera movements progress upward from shot to shot, either by tilting the camera or with 'crane shots' taken from the tower elevator. At each level Clair pauses the camera to inspect the surroundings before progressing to another upward tilt to the next platform. When Clair's camera reaches the top, it briefly looks down to observe a man below looking down on the crowd below him. The camera then begins to descend much more quickly until it reaches ground level. Clair then returns to a close shot of the top of the tower. The end of the film returns to its opening postcard-like image of the Eiffel Tower amid a cloud-filled skyline.

The Eiffel Tower can be placed in the category of the 'city symphony' in that it is concerned solely with a particular monument associated with the city of Paris. According to Richard M. Barsam, the city symphonies 'present brief and realistic views of city life, united within a larger rhythmic structure—a symphony—by the recurrence of images, motifs, and themes that provide continuity and progression of ideas' (Barsam 1992). Two of the most famous city symphonies, Alberto Cavalcanti's Rien que les heures (1926) and Walther Ruttmann's Berlin: The Symphony of a Great City (1927), attempted to express the life of a city on film through rhythmic and associational editing. The synaesthetic montage portrait is a key element of these films. Clair uses tilts, pans, crane shots, fades, and dissolves to provide a rhythmic movement to a stationary object. Clair's technique was created in the editing room in an attempt to produce a purely cinematic portrait of the French monument. In this approach, he was probably influenced by the ideas of his brother, Henri Chomette (1896–1941), whose short film, Cinq Minutes de cinéma pur/Five Minutes of Pure Cinema, was made in 1926. Chomette had been promoting the idea of 'pure cinema' as an avant-garde form, even collaborating on a film with the artist Man Ray. The Eiffel Tower in many ways is, because of its editing technique, a realization of 'pure cinema' in that it lets the camera create an impressionistic viewpoint. When a friend suggested that his film should be accompanied by a Bach fugue, Clair made sure that was suggested to theater musicians wherever the film was shown. The mathematical precision of the fugue is the perfect accompaniment to the rhythmical cadence of Clair's editing technique.

Elton, Arthur

The career of Arthur Elton is an exemplar of John Grierson's approach to appointing and developing young, traditionally trained university graduates into documentary filmmakers throughout the 1930s in Britain and thereafter in Canada and Australia. Stuart Legg, Humphrey Jennings, and Basil Wright were Elton's contemporaries at Cambridge University. As an undergraduate in English Literature and Psychology, as well as Granta's film critic, Elton embodied the qualities sought by Grierson and joined the screenwriting department at Gainsborough in 1927 under Michael Balcon.

While at Gainsborough, Elton was encouraged by Ian Dalrymple to script and shoot a documentary about London, a film never finished. When the studios burned down, Elton immediately applied for a job at the Empire Marketing Board (EMB) under Grierson. Of the remit of the EMB and its successor under Grierson, the General Post Office (GPO) Film Unit, Grierson was later to state in part: 'When it came to making industry not ugly for people, but a matter of beauty, so that people would accept their industrial selves [...] who initiated the finding of beauty in industry?' (Hardy 1966: 91).

Arthur Elton's earliest works with the GPO Film Unit exactly matched this ideal. In speaking of his young directors, Grierson also noted that: 'In the three years that followed (the founding of the GPO Film Unit in 1930) we gathered and, in a sense, created Basil Wright, Arthur Elton [...] Wright was the best lyrical director in the country, Elton the best industrial [director]' (Hardy 1966: 167).

Elton's Aero-Engine (1933, silent), however, is elegantly photographed in black and white and is an intricate and richly detailed observation of every step in the making of an aircraft engine. Narrative is subordinated to the internal visual rhythms of the industrial flow, and the film lies almost more in the tradition of films like Berlin: The Symphony of a Great City (Ruttmann, 1927) than in the realist propaganda mode so often espoused by Rotha and Grierson.

I was asked to make a film on British craftsmanship, particularly in the aeroplane industry, so I made Aero-Engine, which took me at once into engineering [...] I became fascinated with the processes and the people.

(Elton in Sussex 1976: 32)

Elton's fascination with craft and manufacturing set this work apart from the more formal artistic experimentations of Ruttmann or Richter. His eye was always on the actual work, the design flowing into the final metal stamping. He was, in that sense, close to a director of drama in following the action and then cutting in the editing suite to make the narrative clearer.

Elton's Voice of the World (1932) also revealed elements of stylistic experimentation. Paul Rotha was later to reflect that the film was the first documentary: 'at any rate in Britain which used sound at all imaginatively' (Rotha 1973: 162).

Just as with Aero-Engine, Elton had experimented with the formal flows of industrial process. When he came to make Housing Problems, Elton (with Edgar Anstey) tried out new ways of using the soundtrack in a documentary film. Directed for the British Commercial Gas Association by Elton and Edgar Anstey, the film used no omniscient narrator, but rather a linked series of slum dwellers on location (in freezing kitchens, hallways) talking directly to the camera and offering a sound montage on the failures of modern housing policy.

One of the narrators, a woman detailing heroic struggles with a rat, offers a direct way into the experience, for all the 'amateur' delivery of her words. Arthur Elton had also used direct address or spontaneous and unrehearsed speech in an earlier GPO film, Workers and Jobs (1935), but Housing Problems used the more tentative experiments of the earlier film to more powerful effect—foreshadowing the effects of British television documentary makers of the 1960s (notably Loach and Watkins) and beyond. John Grierson was to comment:

Housing Problems is not so well made nor so brilliant in technical excitements but something speaks within it that touches the conscience. These other films 'uplift', Housing Problems transforms and will not let you forget.

As Production Chief of the Films Division of the Ministry of Information during the War, Elton presided over the making of some superb footage, but also continued the running battle forever run by filmmakers on matters of both budget and policy. Immediately after the war Elton revealed a Griersonian ability to be influential everywhere, from acting as Film Adviser to the Film Department in the British Zone of Germany to, later, on invitation, producing a group of films on 'Social Denmark' to which many outstanding filmmakers including Carl Dreyer contributed.

As he had in the GPO and Gas Association years, Elton became a leading filmmaker for industrial sponsors, taking over the prewar Shell Film Unit from Edgar Anstey and acting as its 'able guiding spirit' (Barnouw 1977: 214) as he moved to widen the remit and scope of the unit's work after the war, producing films as ambitious and successful as Louisiana Story (Robert Flaherty, 1948) and, in Australia, Back of Beyond (John Heyer, 1954).

Elton's work at Shell cannot be judged in any traditional sense as advertising work; indeed, the company policy excluded references to any Shell product or to the company itself in the film. In the 1950s, however, films like Grand Prix (1949) and 21st Monte Carlo Car Rally (1951) were palpably 'Shell products'.

Emigholz, Heinz

Heinz Emigholz is highly regarded as an experimental filmmaker, but his body of work owes much to the aesthetics of documentary film in combination with a variety of ideas derived from the tradition of early film theory. Coming from a background as a plastic artist, Emigholz adopted early the notion that not only the film stock, but also time itself, captured onto the emulsion of the film base, is a material of its own and therefore can be shaped by filmmakers in any way they want. The premise of this thinking was the conviction that in the age of recording technology, time had become such an abstract concept that the cinematic representation of time can be analyzed based on its technical and physical occurrence. As a consequence, Emigholz suggests that any filmmaker should always take into account the constructiveness of the technically reproduced motion (in opposition to the real-life motion).

With his first experiments, the short film cycle Schenec-Tady I–III (1972–5), Arrowplane (1973–4), and Tide (1974), Emigholz examined the process of cinematic motion and also established some key issues for his later films: (1) the parameters of time, architecture/landscapes, and memory; (2) the interaction of time and space in the continuity of the moving image; and (3) the moving image as an 'imaginary architecture within time' (Emigholz 1991).

The method used in these early experiments was rather simple: Emigholz dismantled the linear motion of pan shots of landscapes into their smallest units, frames of a 1/24th second, which he then 'reanimated' according to a complicated mathematical scheme, comparable to a musical score. The results were complex visual compositions, 'artificially generated with cinematic time and real-life motion' (Emigholz). With his long-time project Photography and Beyond (1999–), Emigholz later returned to the principal ideas of his early work; however, at that time he had developed a less theoretical form of representation of time and space that would manifest within the aesthetic framework of documentary film.

With his examination of the process of technically reproduced motion, Emigholz indirectly referred to Roland Barthes's notion that the 'filmic image', removed from a chronological continuity, reveals a 'third sense': a disruption of its immediate significance as part of a pictorial sequence. The nature of film, according to Barthes, lies beyond the film itself. Emigholz picked up Barthes's conception of the single frame, applying the idea of its outer-filmic reality onto the motion picture. He considered the technicity of the medium as the key to this 'other', metaphysical reality; however, metaphysics was never his concern. Emigholz's theories did not drift into areas of irrationality, although the common use of image/sound asynchronicity and experimental printing techniques indeed projected a ghostly aura onto his 1980s films.

Throughout the 1970s, Emigholz had pursued a personal project of long-term observations titled Eine kleine Enzyklopädie des Alltags: Wohnen, Essen, Schlafen, Räume, Straßen, Verkehr/A Little Encyclopaedia of the Everyday: Living, Eating, Sleeping, Space, Streets, Traffic, which would mark a link to his narrative films of the 1980s. Sequences of this project, randomly shot on 16mm footage, were included in his first feature film, Normalsatz (1982). Normalsatz was Emigholz's departure from a strictly formalist method toward a less structured, narrative-based essay form. The fact that Emigholz introduced actors into one of his films for the first time was a deliberate step, as he stated, to free the experimental film from its stigma as being solely self-referential. Emigholz had always rejected the label 'structuralist film' for his own work. At that time it seemed he had lost interest in documentary film aesthetics, but Emigholz's 1980s oeuvre essentially refined the ideas of his earlier experiments and paved the ground for his later 'film-photographic' work. The angular compositions of his cinematic space were traceable back to his formalist short films, the shooting locations reflected Emigholz's fascination with extravagant architectural designs and the direction expressed a formal reference to photography, a discipline that would gain new importance in his work in the late 1990s. Emigholz's disapproval of any authoritative narrative concept had finally resulted in an open form of narrative film that he, as in his formalist short films, considered rather as 'text' than as the product of an author. His conviction that the meaning of a cultural object is brought by the audience instead of residing in the object itself, refers again to Barthes and his concept of intertextuality. The form of a narrative feature film allowed Emigholz to work with 'text' on a more literal level.

In the late 1990s Emigholz returned to a more formal approach with his still ongoing film cycle Photografie und Jenseits/Photography and Beyond. The project is conceived as a system of twenty-five freely combinable 'modules', each documenting a cultural artefact, and structured into topical groups as buildings, sculptures, paintings, photos, or historical documents. According to Emigholz, Photographie und Jenseits is intended to recall the origins of cinema and its ability to depict space and objects in a 'preconditioned' state. As a consequence of this premise Emigholz dismissed the idea of montage in order to present these artefacts in a deliberately 'undramatic' way. It is his pivotal concern to document the spatial relations of these artefacts as realistically as possible. Every film is shot on 35mm stock to guarantee that the viewer's experience will not be affected by the technical limitations of electronic recording systems.

Goff in der Wüste/Goff in the Desert (2003), the seventh film in the cycle, is the most elaborate example of Emigholz's 'film-photographic' films so far. It documents twenty-six buildings by the American architect Bruce Goff, each in a series of long, motionless shots of exterior and interior parts of the architectural design. Emigholz's decision to suspend all editorial comments from the soundtrack reflects his conviction that every space can create a specific 'awareness'—apart from its external dramatization and functionalization. As another consequence, Emigholz worked only with the diegetic sound to preserve the initial experience of Goff's architecture.

This concept of 'immediate' representation within a technical-reproductive framework might seem an utterly naive approach, but it really is the essence of a thoroughly evolved, interdisciplinary art theory that Emigholz has developed during the last twenty-five years. Emigholz's film theory, in the cycle Photographie und Beyond applied on documentary film aesthetics, takes into account his own experience as an artist, as well as the 'institutionalized' circumstances of the spectator-object relationship. He described his films as an empowering act against the 'passive look'. In his mission statement for Photographie und Beyond, Emigholz called for a new reception of the arts: 'Seeing as an expression, not an impression'. By 'reversing the process of seeing' (Emigholz 1991), his films aspire to mediate between the viewer and his environment.

ANDREAS BUSCHE

Biography

Born 1948 near Bremen, Germany. Trained as an artist, later studied at the University Hamburg. Since 1973 has been active in various artistic disciplines, working as an independent filmmaker, director of photography, plastic artist, actor, publisher, and producer. In 1974 started to work on an encyclopedic series of documentary films titled Die Basis des Make Up. Founded his own production company Pym Films, in 1978. In 1984 finished the short film The Basis of Make-Up I, which later was recognized by Emigholz as the starting point for his film cycle Photographie und Jenseits. In the same year, published a journal that accompanied the release of The Basis of Make-Up I. His books Krieg der Augen, Kreuz der Sinne (1991), and Seit Freud gesagt hat, der Künstler heile seine Neurosen selbst, heilen die Künstler ihre Neurosen selbst (1993) served as a first introduction to Emigholz's theories of the 'arts as science'. Since 1993 Professor for Experimental Film Design at the Akademie der Künste in Berlin. In 1999 started to conceive his film cycle Photographie und Jenseits, which is still a work in progress. In 2003 he released the seventh part about the American architect Bruce Goff. There are eighteen parts still to come.

Enough to Eat?(UK, Anstey, 1936)

Enough to Eat? (The Nutrition Film) was one of the celebrated films of social enquiry produced within the British documentary film movement in the latter half of the 1930s and on which its reputation for social progressiveness rests. The films investigated contemporary social issues such as slum housing (Housing Problems, 1935), nutrition (Enough to Eat?), education (Children at School, 1937), and public health (The Smoke Menace, 1938), and attracted unprecedented popular discussion. Arthur Elton's Workers and Jobs, made at the General Post Office (GPO) Film Unit in 1935, influenced this group of films. This film had used location shooting in a Labour Exchange and direct sound recording to capture spontaneous, unscripted interviews with unemployed workers.

John Grierson had sought to widen the corporate sponsorship of documentary production, and an important success was the commission for a programme of five films from the British Commercial Gas Association in the mid-1930s. Arthur Elton and Edgar Anstey were responsible for the productions and, significantly, were allowed to collaborate on the choice of subject. Enough to Eat? was the second film in the series, following Housing Problems (1935), and the general approach to the series was more direct and expositional than the classic Griersonian model that combined montage with social reportage. In the absence of a suitable independent documentary film production unit, Elton and Anstey simply hired the necessary studio facilities to realise the first two films. The latter titles in the series were produced by the Realist Film Unit, which had been formed in 1937 to handle exactly this kind of commission.

Enough to Eat? is an examination into the problem of malnutrition among the working classes in Britain. The eminent scientist Julian Huxley, who occasionally speaks to the camera while seated at a desk, provides a commentary. The recent research of Sir John Orr is described and illustrated, and the results of contrasting diets are presented across various animal groups and humans. In a notable example, well-built Christ's Hospital schoolboys are compared with ill-fed, working-class boys. The principles of good nutrition are explained and, with the use of diagrams and graphs, the link between income and dietary deficiency is established. Three working-class mothers give direct-to-camera interviews about their difficulties (in the style of the pioneering Housing Problems). The methods used to deal with the problem are outlined: the provision of cheap milk in schools, free school dinners, the distribution of free meals, education in nutrition to poor mothers, and so forth. At intervals, authorities and experts give their views, including Dr G. C. M. M'Gonigle, Herbert Morrison (on the work of the London County Council), and Viscount Astor (on the work of the League of Nations).

During the interwar period, the general health of the nation was improving. Nevertheless, social investigators consistently revealed the persistence of poverty, which was condemning a significant proportion of the population to ill health. Knowledge of nutritional science was increasing and many medical conditions were being recognised as 'deficiency diseases', the result being a greater emphasis on diet as an agent of improving health. The most influential study into nutrition was Food, Health and Income (1936), conducted by John Boyd Orr. According to his findings, one-tenth of the population were chronically ill-nourished; the figure was higher for children, at one-fifth, and one-half of the population had a deficient diet in some respect. The study was severely criticised in some quarters; however, other surveys, such as Dr M'Gonigle's in the northeast, confirmed the link between poor diet, ill health, and low income.

In terms of theme and style, two aspects stand out in relation to Enough to Eat? The first concerns the role and influence of sponsorship in these documentaries of social enquiry, and the view that the filmmakers were essentially compromised in their critical intentions by the nature of corporate funding. This criticism has been strongly levelled against Housing Problems, and holds for the later Kensal House (1936) and The Smoke Menace (1937), where the Gas, Light and Coke Company clearly had a stake in slum clearance and house building. In matters of nutrition, though, there is no such obvious narrow self-interest, and the film seems to conform to the Griersonian ideal of disinterested corporate sponsorship, where documentary filmmakers were left free to tackle important social questions of the day. In the broader sense, though, the sponsored documentaries were only part of a larger public relations strategy to improve the standing of the gas industry, especially in relation to the electricity industry and its clean, smart, and modern image.

Although the social purpose of the film was widely applauded, there was a more mixed response to its method of construction. For some reviewers there was a clutter of detail, a tendency for the film to drag through repetition, and a basic simplicity to the solutions offered. There was particular praise, however, for the interviews with the mothers as assessed by the reviewer at Sight and Sound as 'straight-forward, undramatized, infinitely revealing and shocking'. Also, a sequence comparing the fate of two rats fed on contrasting diets had a noticeable impact.

Enough to Eat? was the cause of considerable press debate on the issue of nutrition, and brought much attention onto the documentary film movement. Its style of presentation through diagrams and graphs, although attracting some criticism at the time, was ultimately influential and was developed with great finesse by Paul Rotha in his wartime documentaries such as World of Plenty (1943). More immediately, the film led Anstey to the March of Time, which appreciated this didactic approach, and where he was invited to reprise his work for the documentary news series.

Enthusiasm

(USSR, Vertov, 1930)

On completion, Enthusiasm (also known as Symphony of the Don Basin), Dziga Vertov's 1930 film on coal mining in the Don Basin region of the Soviet Union, was criticized for its unconventional use of sound and visual style. The film was produced a few years after Soviet cinema had gained recognition on an international scale. Produced when films with simple and didactic narratives were endorsed by the Soviet state, this documentary was charged as being too abstract and belonging to the much maligned art movement of Formalism. Made during the Five Year Plan, Enthusiasm is an important documentary, as it is an experiment on Vertov's theories of the kino-eye and the radio-ear. It is one of the first full production sound films in the Soviet Union and illustrates how Vertov tackled the issue of sound at its advent in the cinema.

Vertov was the main creative force in all stages of the film's production. He developed the script in two stages. Beginning in 1929, Vertov conceived of an idea for the film in terms of its sound components. One year later, he came up with a plan outlining the film's visual shots. It was at this time that he gave the film its two titles, Enthusiasm and Symphony of the Don Basin; Vertov preferred the former title. Vertov wanted the speech and natural sounds of the film to be recorded as clearly and precisely as its musical score composed by N. Timofeyev and D. Shostakovich. However, in 1929 sound systems by inventors such as A.F. Shorin and P.G. Tager were only beginning to be produced and tested. By being the first film to use an innovative sound system created by Shorin, Enthusiasm pioneers the practice of producing high-quality, on-location sound as a means to further his approach of Kino-Pravda or film truth. This documentary was thus able to use the natural sounds from the coal mines, rather than rely on simulating industrial soundscapes during postproduction.

Enthusiasm is a documentary celebrating the coal mine laborers of the Don Basin community as they work toward realizing the agricultural and industrial goals established in their country's Five Year Plan. The film is not structured in chronological order but rather sets up and contrasts a series of themes surrounding the lives of the Don Basin coal miners at work and play. The first section of the film is about Russia of time past and its reliance on the Tsar and religion. The spell of religion leaves the people disoriented and drunk with idleness. The film then shifts its attention to the destruction of the church and its icons to signify the society waking up. The next section of the film focuses on the motivated laborers of the coal mine as they help move their country toward greater industrialization. Numerous shots of the workers mining coal and producing steel celebrate the hard-working Soviet people of the present and future. The final section of the film focuses on the agricultural sector of labor as people work alongside machinery to tend to the harvest and reap its benefits. Enthusiasm is one of many first Soviet sound films of the early 1930s to deal with workers and their role in constructing the Cultural Revolution. Others include Abram Room's The Five Year Plan (The Plan for Great Works), Alexander Macheret's Deeds and People, and Yuli Raizman's The Earth Thirsts. In this context Vertov's film can be seen as having a very clear political agenda. However, the means through which he used the new technology of sound distinguishes Enthusiasm from these other films.

Consistent with Vertov's theories concerning documentary film, Enthusiasm was made to demystify the process of making a sound film for the spectator. In this film Vertov combines his kino-eye with his radio-ear. Throughout the film sound and aural reality is not used as a supplement of visual reality, but rather helps to heighten the spectator's ability to register Kino-Pravda. Like the image of the cinematographer in Vertov's Man with the Movie Camera (1929), images of sound technicians and composers appear in Enthusiasm. This is illustrated at the beginning of the film with a shot of a woman actually dispatching radio sounds onto a radiotelegraph. After recording these natural and ambient sounds as they unfold, Vertov then experimented at the postproduction stage to create complex dynamics between the sound and image tracks. Such innovation is found in the seemingly infinite ways the film works to disorient the spectator's sense of the sound in relation to the cinematic space. Vertov reveals sonic and visual realities through a number of techniques, some of which are the alteration of the speed of the sounds and visuals (acceleration/deceleration), mismatching and rupture of natural sounds from its image, and use of fragmented as well as disjointed sound/visual collages alongside severe tonal and distortion contrasts. Vertov's desire for the spectator to be aware of the technology was reinforced during the film's exhibition. Vertov would often alter the level of volume of the film at individual screenings. Such techniques are meant to make the spectator see and hear what the human eye and ear on its own cannot.

Vertov's approach to sound in Enthusiasm works in direct opposition to the often cited 'Statement on Sound' by Eisenstein, Pudovkin, and Aleksandrov, which limits sound in cinema to strictly contrapunctal uses. In the journal Kino-Front Vertov states that cinema should not be divided by categorizing films as talkies, noisies, or sound films; rather the distinction should rest on whether the film is a documentary or is staged. More specifically, the filmmaker should be concerned with whether sound was produced through real or artificial means. Made at a time when recording sound on-location was repudiated, Vertov used Enthusiasm as a means to disprove sound critic Ippolit Sokolov's widely accepted caterwauling theory, which claimed that nature was photogenic but not sonogenic. Vertov did not believe that the future of sound cinema resided in artistic simulacra of natural sounds in soundproof studios. Such a process was not conducive to Vertov's emphasis on cinema as producing a new world unmediated and freed from the limitations of human perception.

In what Vertov refers to as his 'symphony of noises', Enthusiasm allows the spectator to not only see but also hear the new world created and freed by cinema. Techniques inaugurated in this film, such as the use of on-location sound, revolutionized how documentary film movements such as direct cinema and cinéma vérité construct sound/image relations. A restored version of Enthusiasm by Peter Kubelka offers filmmakers, scholars, and cinéphiles insight into Vertov's perception of visual and aural (cinematic) truth.

Epstein, Jean

From his debut in 1922, director, writer, and philosopher Jean Epstein produced a number of films and theoretical texts that are essential to an understanding of the evolution of the cinema, both from a technical and an aesthetic perspective. Epstein's filmography comprises numerous avant-garde films, documentaries, and semi-documentaries, which are the product and consequence of his conception of the cinema as a machine that is able to produce an objective and novel form of vision, distinct from the human gaze. In 1926 he broke his contract with Pathé and founded his own production company, Les Films Jean Epstein, with which he made films such as La glace à trois faces/The Mirror with Three Faces (1927) and La chute de la Maison Rouge/The Fall of the Red House (1928). In 1929, after the collapse of his production company, he began to dedicate writings and films to Brittany, to its locations, inhabitants, folklore and traditions, and in particular to the relationship between the fisherman and the sea, seen as an emblem of the struggle between life and death. Even in his commercial films he always tried to use nonprofessional actors and local inhabitants, thus revealing an anthropological attitude. He often accompanied his films with writings about the shooting locations or with actual documentaries that he made alongside the fiction films.

Especially in the first phase of his career, Epstein shared the avant-garde spirit of renovation, a position that makes him akin to theoreticians/filmmakers such as Vertov and Canudo. He took part in the discussions on the artistic value of the cinema, which characterized the intellectual debate in 1920s France. In Le Cinématographe vu de l'Etna/Filming around Etna (1926, an account of his experiences in Sicily during the shooting of the lost documentary on Mount Etna, La Montagne infidèle/The Unfaithful Mountain, 1923), taking inspiration from the writings of Delluc, Epstein presents his opinion on the notion of photogénie. Epstein defines photogénie as the opposite of literariness and immobility: the founding characteristic of the cinema, photogénie belongs to any mobile element of the world, the moral quality of which is increased by being reproduced cinematically. The close-up has the power to annul the distinction between subjectivity and objectivity. For Epstein, the camera lens first produces an objective gaze, originated by the mechanical apparatus; thus the world as it is represented on screen is independent of human consciousness. Subjectivity comes into play only subsequently. These ideas push him in the direction of a type of animism similar to that of his contemporary Ricciotto Canudo. The cinema for Epstein allows the uncovering of a universe in which each object is endowed with its own life. Epstein has full confidence in the technical possibilities of the cinema to empower human sight, freeing it from its physical and psychic impediments. In this light, the introduction of sound is useful for Epstein only if it allows an increment of our knowledge of the noises and sounds of the world. The cinema must also become a source of phonogénie. This idea urged him to experiment on the slow motion of sound in his last fiction film, Le Tempestaire (1947).

Epstein made his debut in 1922 with the semi-documentary Pasteur, which was commissioned to celebrate the centenary of the birth of the famous scientist, and which attracted the attention and praise of contemporary French documentarists and, in particular, of Canudo, who defined it as 'the first biographical film'. In 1924 the lost documentary Photogénies marks the end of the first phase of Epstein's career. Made for a specific occasion, the lecture 'A New Avant-Garde', which Epstein read at the Théâtre Raymond Duncan on April 11, 1924, Photogénies was afterward disassembled. It consisted of a series of sequences that were meant to represent the idea of photogénie.

In fiction features such as La chute de la maison Usher/The Fall of the house of Usher (1928) and Mauprat (1926), exterior settings are often the only object of the exploratory and documentary gaze of the camera, which produces panoramic views of castles, landscapes, and trees shaken by the wind. Superimpositions and mobility of the camera are the main characteristics of Epstein's style. In the same locations of the exteriors of Mauprat Epstein shot the lost documentary Au pays de George Sand/In the Country of George Sand (1926), dedicated to the valley of the Creuse, North of the Massif Central. With Finnis Terrae/End of the World (1929), Epstein moves to Brittany and starts to shoot without actors and sets, somehow anticipating Italian neorealism and cinéma vérité. He focuses on the inhabitants of the Ouessant Archipelago and theorizes for the first time a cinema in which the work of the director is to try to endow an existing reality with the characters of fiction. Epstein defined Finnis Terrae as 'a psychological documentary, the portrayal of a brief drama in episodes that really took place, of authentic people and things' (Epstein 1974–5). By portraying the truth of places and people, the cinema is the witness of a reality that the director reconstructs in dramatic form.

Epstein insists on his anthropological interests with the subsequent Mor Vran (La mer des corbeaux)/The Sea of the Crows (1930), a semi-documentary about the inhabitants of the Island of Seine, which tells the story of a shipwreck, making use of authentic characters and settings. The film opens with a map of the island—a prologue that is already a declaration of the scientific aim of the film and of its anthropological value. Epstein here analyses Brittany's traditions, myths, and folklore and produces an accurate documentation of life in the Ouessant Archipelago, in relation to the idea that the sea brings both life and death, and in light of the always impending danger of a storm (a danger of which Epstein was a direct witness, having escaped a shipwreck).

Epstein returned to Brittany in 1931, to the isle of Hoedik, to shoot L'Or des mers (1932), once again using locals for actors. He chose to live in close contact with them, sharing their relationship with the sea. During an era in which the cinema withdrew to the studios, Epstein continued to shoot on location, often in extreme conditions. He returned to Brittany once again to make the film in the Breton language Chanson d'Armor/Song of Armor (1934) and the short documentary Une visite à l'Ouest-Eclair (La vie d'un grand journal)/A Visit to West-Eclair (The Life of a Great News paper) (1934), particularly interesting for the focus on Brittany's modern aspects. He then shot two documentaries intended for the promotion of the region: La Bretagne/Brittany (1937) and La Bourgogne/Burgandy (1937), both for the Exposition Internationale des Arts et Techniques in Paris.

Ertel, Dieter

The concept of a new form of documentary in West German television was much influenced by Dieter Ertel. Having gained his first experience in the production of newsreels and as writer at the weekly magazine Der Spiegel, he had learned how powerful words could be and how important it was to search for facts and information. Ertel participated actively in the discussions about a new style at the Süddeutscher Rundfunk (SDR) in Stuttgart in the 1950s. His film Ein Großkampftag/Boxing Day (1957) became the model for the documentary serial Zeichen der Zeit/Signs of the Time, which was regularly produced until 1973. It brought a critical analysis of German society in a dynamic visual style and with ironic commentaries into private homes and was not appreciated by all viewers. However, this style, referred to as 'Stuttgarter Schule', was influential for documentary production in German television and was an alternative to the documentary films from Hamburg, which were more oriented to Anglo-American reportage style. Ertel was quite aware that a documentary could not be an objective representation of reality and grasped the opportunity to make subjective statements.

His concept was to produce films that do not just present finished results but instead try to motivate the viewers to make up their own minds. Ertel did not trust the official versions of a story, but tried to look behind the scenes and searched for other perspectives. Although today his commentaries seem to dominate his films, for him the image was more important. His style was influenced by Ed Murrow and Richard Leacock, and, together with his cameramen, he looked for specific details that could be edited in a visual rhythm and as ironic as his commentaries. He was more interested in specific qualities and developments of the times and less in the daily business of politics. Over time he produced 'something like filmic behavioural research about humanness' (Netenjakob 1968). One of his main topics was classical music and portraits of conductors, but his masterpieces are on sports; these films are self-reflexive commentaries on media and bourgeois conformism, in which growing commercialisation was criticized. Good examples are Ein Großkampftag about boxing fights and Tortour de France (1960), where he followed the Tour de France and tried to show the machinery behind the event. A portrait of a rifle club and its yearly meeting (Schützenfest, 1961) provoked massive protest because he interviewed drunken riflemen, asking them what importance guns have for them or why they shoot again after the experience of World War II; he got very open answers. In Der totale Urlaub/The Total Holiday (1967) he visited a holiday camp on the south coast of England, in which the whole day was strictly organized. After becoming responsible for the documentary department of the SDR, Ertel did not make many more films and ran into conflict with the station because he tried to retain a privileged position for documentary film. He then went on to become manager of various public stations in Germany. He is one of the founders of the Haus des Dokumentarfilms in Stuttgart.

Eternity

(Australia, Lawrence Johnston, 1994)

Eternity is significant as an Australian documentary that makes use of a nonrealist documentary aesthetic to create a portrait of a well-known and enigmatic character who holds a unique place in the national consciousness. Directed by Lawrence Johnston, Eternity traces the life and work of Arthur Stace. Known as 'Mr Eternity', Stace spent forty years of his life writing the word Eternity in chalk on Sydney's city streets. The narrative moves from Stace's struggle with alcoholism following his experiences as a stretcher bearer in World War I, through his conversion to Christianity in 1930 and his death in 1967. Motivated by his religious beliefs, an essentially illiterate Stace roamed the inner city and wrote Eternity an estimated five hundred thousand times in perfect copperplate on pavements around Sydney. Stace's identity, however, was not revealed until 1956, twenty years after the first inscription had appeared.

As a biography, Eternity is remarkable in the way that it not only charts the life of Stace but also attempts to situate him culturally and spatially. The narrative of Stace's life is constructed through a voice-of-God commentary and interviews with a number of people who knew him. These accounts offer an intimate access to specific formative events in this enigmatic character's life. The film also draws on interviews with cultural commentators such as writers, artists, broadcasters, and journalists. The differing perspectives provided by these personalities reinforce the enigma that Stace has become while also suggesting the ways in which he has influenced Sydney's artistic community and cultural psyche.

Eternity is a highly stylized documentary that uses modes of reflexivity not only to question the production of meaning but also to express the multiple personal and cultural dimensions that contribute to the symbolism that Lawrence believes Stace represents. Each of the interviews is shot against a colorful back-projected image, which include landscapes, flowers, and the word 'eternity' itself. This is a device through which Lawrence offers added insight into the experience and character of the interviewee. This device complements the move away from realist representation that characterizes the images that dominate the rest of the film, which construct a collage of archival or found footage and black-and-white recreations of Stace and his wanderings. The Sydney cityscape features prominently in these images. The noir-like scenes evoke a sense of the historical city in which the haunting figure of Stace and the myth that surrounds him can be located. The music of Ross Edwards's 'Symphony Da Pacem Domine' accentuates this ghostly quality.

Eternity stands as one of the most internationally renowned Australian documentaries of the decade. Not only did it win the prize for the best documentary at the 1995 Sydney Film Festival, but also the Golden Gate award at the San Francisco International Film Festival and the 1995 Los Angeles International Documentary Association Award for Best Documentary, among others.

Être et avoir

(France, Philibert, 2002)

One of the most celebrated feature-length documentaries of 2002, Nicholas Philibert's Être et avoir/To Be and To Have, can in some ways be seen as the polar opposite of the other big documentary of that year, Michael Moore's Bowling for Columbine.

Where Moore opts for bombast, Philibert strives for gentle tranquility. Where Moore's 'argument' about the state of the world he is examining utterly dominates his film, Philibert offers no 'argument' at all.

Not interested in making documentaries that are 'about' a subject, Philibert prefers to construct his films, as he says, 'with' subjects and locations. Être et avoir examines a one-room school in Auvergne in France, where the dozen students, who range from four to ten years old, are all taught by one teacher, M. Georges Lopez. The film takes place over the course of six months, beginning in a blustery snowstorm and ending in the bright breezes of summer. Adopting an almost entirely observational approach (with the exception of the interview sequence with Monsieur Lopez, the teacher, in which he explains why he is a schoolteacher), the film negotiates an intermediate space between those observational films that present a world as if it had not been recorded on camera and those that foreground the existence of the mediating existence of the cinematographic apparatus. Thus, there are scenes in which the teacher and pupils appear completely at ease and nonchalant in front of the camera, and others in which they seem acutely aware of it.

Philibert has expressed his deep conviction—echoing Cesare Zavattini's call for films about the poetry of everyday life—in the cinematic potential of the quotidian aspects of life. Situating his camera in a milieu in which the everyday struggles of children are, for these young humans, monumental ones—mastering basics of numeracy and literacy, not to mention the vital lessons of sociability and communication—Philibert has found ideal locations and conditions for allowing the poetry of everyday life to expose itself on film. The selection of a small school, with so few pupils and of such wide-ranging ages, allows for heightened connection with the characters. This is possible because their number and diversity allow us to know them as individuals to a greater degree than would have been the case had we been situated in a more traditional classroom—one grade level with twenty to thirty students.

As much as the film relies on audiences' willingness and ability to pay careful attention to the children, the film is centred on the quiet authority of Monsieur Lopez, the teacher. His commanding presence is felt (again to contrast with Moore's bombastic performance in Bowling for Columbine) in his gentleness and his quietness. He is one of those figures who, because he speaks so softly, demands our (and the children's) attention because he forces us to lean into what he is saying. In his dealings with the wee ones, he is a model of firm patience; with the older children, of guidance and certainty; and with the parents, of understanding and empathy.

While much of what we see takes place in the classroom, the film emphasizes that which surrounds it. We are treated not only to pretty, natural images of the local seasons but also to the farms where some of the children live, a school outing to a library, bus rides, and, significantly, the decamping of instruction from the classroom to the school's playground, tables, chairs, and all, once the warm summer breezes start blowing. The metaphor represented by this venue change by the teacher Lopez, and its inclusion in the film by Philibert, is perfectly representative of the film's expansive aspirations.

Formally, the film makes some powerfully affective choices. The first sounds and images of the film, though they contain no children and no teacher, suggestively set the tone for what follows: a blustery snowstorm, with cattle being guided through the pasture followed by a cut to a high-angle shot of the classroom floor, where gradually, leisurely, a turtle, and then another, ambles into the frame. These juxtapositions of chaotic nature with measured control illuminate the central tensions at the heart of the film—those between the individual and society, between teacher and pupil, between humankind and nature.

Phillipe Hersant's tender and calming score is used only for scenes outside the classroom; in the classroom we have only direct sound. The images of rural life that surround the village school, gorgeously photographed as the seasons turn, place the developmental milestones of the children in a natural order in which snowstorms, rainstorms, summer breezes, and dappling sunlight all converge in a sensation of the small universalities of the human experience. We were all once children and had to learn how to grow up and make our way in the world.

The title, which translates as To Be and To Have, refers on the surface to a conjugation exercise that normally comes early in a French-language education, that is, at a moment in language-learning where we find these schoolchildren. However, the film's expansion outwards from the classroom, into the rural countryside that surrounds it and further still into the universal experiences of childhood, lends this title a much weightier significance. The film's reach, then, ultimately strives to consider questions of existence in this world (being) and acquiring the means as children to navigate through it (having).

Produced partly with the participation of various French state bodies, Être et avoir was a modestly budgeted film that attracted huge audiences in France (becoming the highest grossing documentary in that country's history), as well as attracting significant critical attention around the world, winning both prestigious prizes and large audiences. Named best documentary of the year by both the European Film Awards and the National Society of Film Critics in the United States, the film was also nominated for (or won) major film prizes in Britain, France, and Spain.

PETER URQUHART

Every Day Except Christmas

(UK, Anderson, 1957)

Every Day Except Christmas was shown in the third Free Cinema programme, 'Look at Britain', at the National Film Theatre, London, in May 1957 (along with Alain Tanner and Claude Goretta's Nice Time (1957), and two earlier short films, Anderson's own Wakefield Express, and Nigel McIsaac's The Singing Street, both made in 1952). Like other Free Cinema films, all victims of the distribution difficulties of documentaries since the advent of television, even the best of the Free Cinema documentaries are not as well known or respected as they should be outside (and to some extent even inside) Britain.

The structure of the film is relatively simple, beginning with the loading of mushrooms in Sussex for transportation to Covent Garden market in central London, following the van through its late night journey—through the suburbs to the strains of the national anthem, signalling the end of radio broadcasting for the day. At the market, work is just beginning and the film follows the night's activities—laying out the produce, taking an early morning break, returning to the market for the arrival of the buyers, and ending mid-morning as the market winds down.

Free Cinema was a product of its time—John Osborne's play Look Back in Anger (1956) and the stir and storm it caused in British theatre (which also engaged Anderson's talents), and the emergence of the New Left. Anderson's 1957 manifesto for Free Cinema argued that their aim was to 'say something about our society today [...] to look at Britain, with honesty and affection'. Every Day Except Christmas and We Are the Lambeth Boys, the two 'Look at Britain' films sponsored by Ford, are probably the best examples.

Anderson's manifesto's 'if we are to interpret ...' invokes Grierson's creative interpretation of actuality, and in many ways we should see Every Day Except Christmas in a direct line from 1930s (and World War II) British documentary. In a revealing interview comment many years later, Anderson accused his interviewees of being too taken with direct cinema and having a narrow view of documentary. In his film, he says, 'even the bits that have natural sound are all composed [... direct cinema is] just an excuse for not being creative'. Though several sequences seem to want to persuade us that we are hearing what we can see, more recall the finale of Housing Problems, with conversational voices, as well as other sounds, over image, created at the editing stage. Anderson observed in a later interview that institutions like the BBC would not 'understand the creative effort or the poetic quality' of a film like Every Day Except Christmas. Certainly, the film uses sound and image in 'creative ways' much like earlier documentaries. Anderson likes to contrast busy scenes with quiet, still ones, and jaunty with slow, lyrical music. One central, striking sequence, for example, juxtaposes the bustle of Albert's café with the deserted market alleys, a stray cat, slow panning, and tracking shots over the laid-out flowers, with, first, silence and then poetic music.

One of the films shown in the second Free Cinema programme (September 1956) was Georges Franju's Le Sang des bêtes/Blood of the Beast (1949), and Anderson's creative methods are sometimes reminiscent of Franju's evocative use of music and camera (though without the characteristic Franju 'bite'). In the Free Cinema manifesto, Anderson's 'if we are to interpret ...' is followed by 'we must have an attitude, we must have values and beliefs', which he seems to see as distinguishing Free Cinema from the 'social propaganda' aspect of 1930s documentary. What are the 'values and beliefs' in Every Day Except Christmas?

Although Anderson is interested in the different kinds of activities in the market, this is not a conventionally 'polemical' film, hence, perhaps, the omission (as Basil Wright pointed out) of those podding peas in the market's dark basement. Anderson is clearly more interested in communicating what he saw as the dignity and importance of ordinary people as they go about their work, and enjoys observing the faces and simple skills of working men (particularly in relation to flowers, not without some hints of homoeroticism—compare the openly gay character in the café). The film's credentials at the class level are sustained by the voice-over commentary, spoken by Alun Owen, a prolific working-class radio and television (and later theatre) dramatist during the 1950s and 1960s, with more than a suggestion of working-class Welsh, but with a soft lilt. As the commentary concludes, things change 'but work will still be with us, one way or another, and we all depend on each other's work as well as our own, on Alice, and George, and Bill [...] and all the others who keep us going'.

At the same time, as in the Humphrey Jennings films, which Anderson so admired, there is an attachment—akin, perhaps, to Flaherty's in Industrial Britain, but more personalised—to history and tradition, and the present threat to their survival. There is a real sense of regret and loss, for example, when the film talks about the disappearance of women flower porters ('Alice has been on the job for thirty-five years, and when she goes, that's the end of it'), and the aged women flower sellers who come round as the market closes down. Of course, in fifteen years or so the markets had been removed to the concrete wastes of Nine Elms in Vauxhall, where there was precious little poetry to be had.

Exile and the Kingdom

(Australia, Frank Rijavec, 1993)

Exile and the Kingdom is a unique and comprehensive historical account of a group of Aboriginal peoples from ancient times to the present. It continues a mode of collaborative or consultative filmmaking between indigenous and nonindigenous Australians that was initiated in the 1970s. Frank Rijavec directed Exile and the Kingdom and also cowrote the film in conjunction with Roger Solomon of the Injibarndi and Ngarluma tribes. As an on-screen narrator, Solomon also plays a central role in the finished film.

Exile and the Kingdom focuses on an area in the north of Western Australia around the Fortescue River and the town of Roebourne. Elders of the Injibarndi, Ngarluma, Kurama, and Bandjima tribes of this area were involved with developing the different approaches that the film used. Exile and the Kingdom begins by outlining a number of the traditional ceremonies that have been integral to the Injibarndi and Ngarluma cultures of the area since times well before colonisation. Themes that are reiterated throughout the documentary are the importance of ancestral lands, and sacred sites in particular, and the codes of respect and discipline that compose Aboriginal law. Exile and the Kingdom goes on to chart a history of colonisation that includes forced labor, the dispossession of lands, wars against colonists or 'squatters', and an eventual massacre of Aboriginal people. This history extends into the present, with an account of the detrimental impact of alcohol, the iron ore mining boom of the 1960s and 1970s, and the ghettoization of these tribes in government reserves. Exile and the Kingdom persuasively argues for the recognition of land rights and an emphasis on Aboriginal law and spirituality as a means of restoring indigenous communities.

In addition to Solomon's narration, the film is structured around interviews with a diverse range of Aboriginal people about the history of the area, their experiences, and tribal knowledge. Written accounts by British colonists are also recited in the earlier part of the film. Exile and the Kingdom is a feature-length documentary that is divided into two fifty-five-minute parts to facilitate television screening. In contrast with another significant indigenous/nonindigenous collaborative documentary, Two Laws (1981), Exile and the Kingdom was produced for viewing by a mainstream Australian television audience.

The importance of this collaborative mode as a means of self-representation to a broader national audience can be understood in the context of a history of Australian cinema. For the past century a huge archive of film has been produced that situates Aboriginal people as ethnographic subjects, or, to a lesser extent, melodramatic stereotypes. Projects in the 1970s, such as Martha Ansara's collaboration with Essie Coffey on the landmark documentary My Survival as an Aboriginal (1979), led the way for more indigenous people to take up a position on the other side of the camera in order to represent alternative aesthetic and political strategies. This collaborative documentary mode of which Exile and the Kingdom is a part was carried on in the 1990s by indigenous directors working in a more autonomous way, such as Rachel Perkins, Tracey Moffatt, Darlene Johnson, and Ivan Sen.

Fall of the Romanov Dynasty, The

(USSR, Shub, 1927)

Assembled in 1927, Esfir Shub's The Fall of the Romanov Dynasty was the first compilation documentary ever produced. The film was the first of three compilation films she made during 1927–8 (the other two being The Great Way, 1927, and Lev Tolstoy and the Russia of Nicholas II, 1928), which introduced this new genre of documentary. Shub's creation of a documentary film out of newsreel material not only establishes her as a pioneer of compilation and radical documentary but also emphasizes her position as one of the most significant women filmmakers of the first half of the twentieth century.

After assisting Sergei Eisenstein on scripts and editing newsreels with Dziga Vertov from 1924–5, Shub saw a new direction for her work. She wrote, 'it is clear that work in newsreel must begin with artistic labor. Newsreel apart from this must begin with history, profoundly with the party chronicle of our epoch.' At the end of 1926, she received a commission from Sovkino to make an historical film for the tenth anniversary of the Bolshevik Revolution.

Shub researched the film at the Museum of the Revolution in Leningrad, where for two months she pored over sixty thousand meters of film. Her major difficulties were locating and organizing existing film material. Much of the footage had been taken out of the country, sold to foreign producers, or destroyed by terrible archive conditions. She persuaded the government to buy two thousand feet of negative film about the February Revolution (including famous shots of Lenin) from the United States. Eventually, however, she had to shoot one thousand of the total six thousand feet of the film. Her other major challenge was organizing footage with different styles, film formats, and emulsion qualities into a coherent artistic and ideological whole. In The Fall of the Romanov Dynasty Shub aims to convey in essay style her own ideological attitude without distorting the filmic documents. Her innovative method and editing skill enabled these potential problems to become the film's strengths.

From 1912 to 1917 The Fall of the Romanov Dynasty is divided into four sections: prewar Russia, international preparation for the war, the war, and the Revolution. The first part presents images of a doomed regime, opening with the title 'Tsarist Russia in the Years of the Black Reaction'. The slow, even pace recalls the rural atmosphere, whereas the images of State Duma politicians casually conversing and wealthy landowners enjoying leisure time contrast sharply with shots of industrial workers and peasants laboring in the fields. Shub's use of titles and editing patterns functions ironically to juxtapose the two social and economic spheres. The first part concludes with images of the Romanovs and other Russian nobility parading above a crowd. Whereas this procession is initially contrasted with the marching of needy peasants to prison, the parade scenes also function in contradistinction to the forthcoming images of the Bolsheviks. While the images of the nobility emphasize a static quality and distance from the crowd, shots of the Revolution articulate dynamism and an organic connection with the people, one of the central themes of the film.

In the second section Shub illustrates the Marxist argument that the war was between imperial powers and contends that, instead, Russia should be fighting imperialism itself. 'Europe at the time' is illustrated by capitalists, banks, and gold, and European leaders are visually matched with the tsar. In preparation for the war, new destructive technology is manufactured and military training becomes intense. Shub's attitude is made clear in the title 'Tsarist Russia Marched in Step with the Other Imperialist Powers'. Dramatic and violent combat footage of land and sea follows, in one stretch, uninterrupted by titles for seven minutes. The slow, even pacing of the beginning of the film has become more rapid, heightening the drama and tension. The section concludes with the most powerful intertitle in the film: 'Killed, Wounded, and Maimed in the World War—35 Million People'. The devastating impact of the war on Russians is made apparent and leads to the final section of the film.

The title '1917' opens the extensive coverage of the uprising in which Alexander Kerensky seizes power. Shub's attitude toward the subject is unambiguous. Kerensky is a member of the 'bourgeoisie, striving to use the revolution for its own purposes'. Kerensky and the Mensheviks are visually and thematically equated with the tsarists. Like Nicholas II, he is shown advocating war, and like the previous Duma, the Mensheviks are seen disengaged from the people. In contrast, Lenin is shown speaking to huge crowds while the mass demonstrations are edited together with pages of Pravda calling for 'Peace, Land, and Bread', the Bolshevik party slogan. Shub's film concludes as it must—with images of Lenin greeting and shaking hands with members of the crowd.

The Fall of the Romanov Dynasty presents the inevitability and the energy of the Revolution. The dynamism of the Bolshevik Revolution and the Party's connection with the people contrasts sharply with the pomp and circumstance of the tsarists and their distance from the people. Shub's editing and titling skill is apparent. Her montage is intuitive and associative rather than metrical or mathematical (terms often used to describe Vertov's method). She bitingly juxtaposes images and, in an innovative way, uses slogans found on flags and signs as titles. Yet while Shub's cinematic essay may be highly agitational and propagandistic, she, like Vertov, is devoted to maintaining the ontological authenticity of the filmic documents. She writes: 'authentic material is something that gives life to a documentary film, regardless of the fact that it might be composed of archival footage or shot by the filmmaker'. Shub's goal was to achieve a delicate balance between commenting on events by means of a juxtaposition of images and preserving the authenticity of each image, a goal resonating today with many compilation documentarists. Her exceptional skill and innovative method are both formidable and instructive.

Family Portrait

(UK, Jennings, 1951)

Family Portrait, Humphrey Jennings's final film, was made for the 1951 Festival of Britain. Film was an integral part of the Festival's celebration of Britain's achievements in the arts, industry, and science, so a cinema was built at the London South Bank Exhibition site for the screening of the specially commissioned Festival films. More than twenty films were made for exhibition at the Telekinema, but Family Portrait most reflects the Festival's aims of celebrating the past and heralding a bright new future. Unfortunately, these aims proved more of a limitation than an inspiration, resulting in one of Jennings's least imaginative films.

The film is constructed around the opening and closing shots of a photograph album featuring images of family holidays, a christening, and a picnic. It proceeds to showcase British artistic achievement (the plays of William Shakespeare), science (Charles Darwin and Britain's records of exploration), and industry (Stephenson's Rocket and James Watt), echoing the displays of the Festival exhibitions. Jennings regards these 'heroes' of British life with warmth and refers to them as 'local lads who used their wits and had a good laugh, and then, like Shakespeare and Newton and Watt started something at home that went right around the globe'. Ultimately this is a quietly patriotic film that acknowledges the contradictions of the British character: an admiration for invention versus a love of tradition, eccentricity versus practicality, domesticity versus pageantry, agriculture versus industry.

Family Portrait is a rather literal film. Although the sentiments expressed in the voice-over and through the narrative structure of the film are poetic, the visual execution of these sentiments is lacklustre. All too often the images are simply a literal translation of the narrator's words; for example, the evolution of British tradition, particularly democracy, is discussed over bland images of the field at Runnymede, clichéd shots of the Houses of Parliament, and council committee meetings. The images are frequently overwhelmed by the richness of the narration.

Nevertheless, Family Portrait was well received by the critical press and Jennings's fellow documentarists. In retrospect, however, it is difficult to say just how much of this praise was a result of Jennings's accidental death at the end of 1950. Many of the film's contemporary notices read like eulogies. Edgar Anstey pronounced it the most important documentary film made since the war. Monthly Film Bulletin thought it perhaps the most polished in style of all Jennings's films and Today's Cinema recommended it 'as a yardstick for contemporary documentary'. Three years later Lindsay Anderson noted that Family Portrait could stand beside Jennings's wartime films but that it lacked the passion. In a 1981 reevaluation, however, Anderson decided that the film should be dismissed as 'sentimental fiction'. He berated Jennings for his 'fantasy of the Empire' and his use of the past as a refuge' (Jennings and Anderson 1982). Although the film's patriotism is very much of its time and Jennings closes the film by recognising the impact of Britain's imperial past, he also realises that Britain's future will depend on wider global alliances.

Fanck, Arnold

Arnold Fanck's name is closely linked with the filmic image of the Alpine mountains. He is primarily known for his feature films, which he mostly shot on location in the Alps. In his documentary films he glorified the experience of sports and nature, notably in 4628 Meterhoch auf Skiern. Besteigung des Monte Rosa (1913), Im Kampf mit dem Berge (1921), and the two-part Das Wunder des Schneeschuhs (1919–20; 1922). Moreover, Fanck's production company took charge of other sports subjects such as jiu-jitsu, boxing, sailing, soccer, and rowing. Likewise exotic subjects became relevant in a number of travelogs, notably Tibet, Africa, and especially Asia. On the occasion of the shooting of his feature film, Die Tochter des Samurai (1938), Fanck produced six short documentaries that he shot in Japan, China, and Manchuria. These films dealt with the history, traditions, and culture of the Japanese people. They took on a political undertone, for example, when they legitimized, under the guise of a Kulturfilm, the Japanese occupation of southern Manchuria in Winterreise durch Südmandschurien (1938). Kaiserbauten in Fernost (1938) deals with the Chinese wall with the same emphasis as does Atlantik-Wall (1944) with the German bulwark along the coast of the North Sea.

Fanck was often accused of a certain proximity to the aesthetics of fascist film art. Although he was never a grassroots Nazi, he must be considered a protagonist of the reactionary avant-garde, as he advocated an ideology of virile strength. Still, because his feature films signified a certain lethargy vis-à-vis nature (where heroism was called for), the Nazis neutralized Fanck in 1940 and banned him from feature filmmaking. Leni Riefenstahl assigned him a documentary film on the New Berlin, a project aborted after years of work. Fanck's late short documentaries do not carry his personal style.

Biography

Born on March 6, 1889 in Frankenthal, the son of an industrialist. A frail child who, after recovering from tuberculosis, turned to skiing and mountain climbing. After studying geology (he earned a PhD in 1915), founded his own production company, Berg und Sportfilm GmbH Freiburg, which produced feature and documentary films made by Fanck and other directors. Fanck specialized in mountain films. Der Berg des Schicksals (1924) and Der heilige Berg (1926) marked his breakthrough. Together with Luis Trenker and Leni Riefenstahl, more or less single-handedly created the genre of the German mountain film. His success afforded him bigger budgets but greater dependencies. While the location shots of his feature films were still superb, the shallow storylines of his features failed to convince audiences. Der ewige Traum (1934) was the last feature he could accomplish in Germany (there followed two films shot in Japan and Chile). Concentrated on documentaries regardless of their impersonal styles, from which he made his living until the end of World War II. Postwar efforts to resume work in the film industry faltered. Died on September 28, 1974 in Freiburg.

Far from Vietnam

(France, Resnais and others, 1967)

Far from Vietnam/Loin du Vietnam is an anthology film made by a collective of French filmmakers 'to assert in the exercise of their profession, their solidarity with the people of Vietnam in their resistance to aggression' (n.a. 1968). Like other protest films made during the war by Newsreel collectives and others, its purpose is clearly polemical, underpinned by Che Guevara's manifesto of 1960s radical politics: 'one, two, many Vietnams', whereby social, national, and racial differences, likewise geographical distance, are bridged by a common cause. However, as its title suggests, while the film endorses the cause of solidarity with the Vietnamese fighting America, it tempers the easy identification and 'romantic populism' (Renov 1990) characteristic of many other anti-war films produced in the period through its reflexive formal strategies.

The film was produced by the Société pour le Lancement des Oeuvres Nouvelles (SLON, Society for the Launching of New Works), a Marxist arts collective begun by Chris Marker in 1966 specifically for the film. (Later, Marker would revive SLON and the collective would continue production into the 1970s.) In 1967 Joris Ivens and Marcelline Loridan went to Vietnam to work on what would become 17e Parallèle/The 17th Parallel. Marker persuaded them to participate in the collective and they sent back from Hanoi footage showing daily life under bombardment. Others who joined Marker and Ivens included New Wave filmmakers Alain Resnais, Agnès Varda, Jean-Luc Godard, as well as American photographer William Klein. Marker edited Far from Vietnam, which, like his previous film, Lettre de Sébérie/Letter from Siberia (1957), plays on conventions and viewer expectations of non-fiction film.

The film begins in a manner similar to other antiwar films of the period, as it compares the 'rich man's war' to a 'poor man's war', with images of high-tech warfare—the aircraft carrier, Kitty Hawk, loading bombs in the Gulf of Tonkin—contrasted to a bucolic image of rural Vietnam. However, it quickly undermines the simplicity of that opposition. What appears at first to be an empty field waiting to be torn apart by bombs is not empty at all; it comes alive when concealed soldiers emerge, advance, and then recede into the land. A simple but powerful image of guerilla warfare, it consolidates metaphorically a point addressed in various ways throughout the film—the difficulty for Europeans and Americans to understand, to clearly see the war in Vietnam. It is a point made a few years later by Frances Fitzgerald in her analysis of the war, Fire in the Lake: 'American soldiers had [...] walked over the political and economic design of the Vietnamese revolution. They had looked at it, but they could not see it, for it was doubly invisible: invisible within the ground and then again invisible within their own perspective as Americans' (Fitzgerald 1972).

The segments that follow are strikingly varied in style and quality, including vérité images of demonstrations in France and the United States in 'A Parade is a Parade', footage of a musical comedy performance by a travelling North Vietnamese theatre group in 'Johnson Cries', a monologue by a fictitious contemporary Parisian author in 'Claude Ridder', distorted and manipulated television images in 'Why We Fight', a collage of vérité images, advertisements, store window displays, American icons, and cartoons in 'Vertigo'. Surveying in this way the formal options available to the political filmmaker, the discursive range of this anthology film works to forestall any possibility of the war's authoritative representation.

The best known of these segments and the most succinct in its discussion of the problem of representing the war from a Western perspective is Jean-Luc Godard's Camera Eye. Despite the allusion to Dziga Vertov, Godard's comments on the difficulty of conceptualising Vietnam for film qualify the accessibility of what Vertov called Kino-Pravda (film truth) while maintaining its political necessity as a goal. The segment begins with a close-up of Godard addressing the camera to say what he might film in Vietnam were he a cameraman for a newsreel or television network. However, he is neither of those things and is still in Paris, having been refused entrance by officials in Hanoi. Reframed to a medium shot we see that Godard is seated behind a Mitchell camera, which functions in the sequence as a technological metonym for Hollywood and the United States. He then speaks of the difficulty of conceptualizing Vietnam for film, despite a shared struggle against the United States—his against cultural imperialism and theirs against military aggression. Godard concludes that there's really no understanding Vietnam until such time as 'we can let Vietnam invade us [...] and find out what part it plays in our everyday lives'. Such are the limits and ideals of political filmmaking, that only complete identification could close the gap between Godard and his subject. Moreover, he continues to observe that the breach between himself and the Vietnamese is the same one as that which exists between himself and the French working class, for whom he also makes films and with whom he also claims solidarity, even though they never see his films. These are the conditions of the making of protest films like

Far from Vietnam, in which ultimately all he and other filmmakers can do is 'listen and [...] relay all the screams that we possibly can'.

Like Godard in Camera Eye, the SLON collective makes its political alliance with North Vietnam clear, but Far from Vietnam focuses overall on the difficulty of representing the war, the difficulty of responding adequately to it on film, and of claiming identification as a European or American filmmaker with the struggle of the Vietnamese. In this way it is a film about the war in Vietnam but it is also about the conditions of political and nonfiction filmmaking more generally.

Field, Mary

Surprisingly, for someone with such a prolific career in educational film, little has been written about Mary Field in histories of documentary film. No doubt this is because educational film in the 1930s existed on the fringes of the documentary movement, regarded by Grierson and his followers as little more than lecture films unlikely to make a contribution to the fuller art of the documentary (Grierson 1966). However, the natural history films made by Field and her colleagues are the forerunners of the popular wildlife television programmes of today and should not be dismissed because they did not fit Grierson's definition of documentary.

Field started her career as a teacher and historian. She was an authority on seventeenth-century fishing in the West Atlantic, and it was with this specialist knowledge that she entered the film industry. Visiting Bruce Woolfe's British Instructional studios in late 1925 to advise them on the historical accuracy of one of their films, she was offered a post as Education Manager. Within a year she had become a member of the production staff, learning editing, continuity, scriptwriting, and direction while working on educational, documentary, and feature films. By 1927 she was directing for the famous pioneering biological and wildlife series, the Secrets of Nature, started by Bruce Woolfe in 1919. Working with the cinematographer Percy Smith, an expert in time lapse and macro-photography, Field helped to create a series covering many aspects of the natural world including insects, plants, animals, and sea life. Compared with the sophisticated technology available to wildlife filmmakers today, the equipment used by Field and Smith was cumbersome and noisy; the lenses were so long and heavy that braces were used to fix them to the camera and tripod. This makes the results they achieved all the more remarkable. In 1929 Field became the Secrets of Nature series editor, as well as the director of more than fifty films for the series in the next four years. Other films directed during this period include the hygiene film Deferred Payment (1929) and the comedy feature Strictly Business (1932). She also edited the World War I drama, Tell England (1931).

When British Instructional was taken over in 1933, Field worked briefly for Woolfe's new company before joining Gaumont-British Films' recently formed educational unit, Gaumont-British Instructional. When Woolfe joined her they continued to make nature films under a new moniker, Secrets of Life. Field also diversified her subject matter and began directing films for geography, history, language, physical education, and hygiene syllabi in schools. Invited on to the Board of Gaumont-British Instructional, Field exercised a decisive influence in both policy matters and in the making of the films themselves. She began experimenting with the use of animated diagrams for classroom films as is seen in two of her films, The Expansion of Germany (1936) and Changes in the Franchise (1937). She was also active in promoting the pedagogical use of film in the wider world and sat on various committees, notably the British Film Institute Panels. Her early years in teaching meant that she understood the importance of tailoring educational films to the requirements of the classroom, and the knowledge she acquired from teachers on these committees was more often than not successfully translated to the screen.

During the war, along with other documentary and educational filmmakers, Field's skills were used in making government films for the war effort. Drawing on the images of the nature series she had edited and directed, Field humorously adapted the wildlife genre to the human and political concerns of rationing, agricultural production, and the use of pigeons as messengers by the army. These home front propaganda films demonstrate a clarity of thought and assured direction that had become Field's hallmark in more than fifteen years of educational filmmaking.

In 1944 J. Arthur Rank set up the Children's Entertainment Division of the Rank Organisation to produce entertainment films for his Saturday morning Odeon and Gaumont Children's Cinema Clubs. With her background in the production of classroom films and an increasing interest in the need for children's entertainment films, Field was the logical choice to head the new division. Her initial attempts to provide stimulating entertainment for children were not well received by the industry or critics, and she was accused of not knowing what children wanted by a technician at the 1946 Association of Cinematograph Technicians' conference. Nevertheless, Field is a figure who stands out in an era when cinema was often attacked as a morally degenerative influence on children; her motivation was to broaden the experiences of children through entertaining but informative filmmaking, and this legacy remains with us today in public sector children's television programming such as Blue Peter. When financial cutbacks closed the Children's Entertainment Division, Field spent a year at the British Board of Film Classification before taking up the post of executive officer at the newly created Children's Film Foundation.

In 1954 Field was awarded an OBE for her work in educational and children's entertainment film. In 1955 she was made a fellow of both the Royal Photographic Society and the British Kinematograph Society. Two years later the British Film Academy awarded her the same status. Her final years were spent doing consultancy work for children's television programming, as well as founding an International Centre of Films for Children, of which she became honorary president until her death in 1968.

Finding Christa

(US, Billops and Hatch, 1991)

Finding Christa is an autobiographical account of filmmaker Camille Billops's 1961 decision to put her then four-year-old daughter, Christa, up for adoption. The film formalizes its episodic narrative beneath a backdrop of both conventional documentary aesthetics and lightly avant-garde subjectivity. The resulting film both challenges and conforms to its subject matter. Finding Christa successfully manages to question multiple ideologies while offering up far more questions than it answers, thereby challenging the viewer.

Finding Christa is the third in an ongoing series of collaborative projects from the husband and wife team of James Hatch and Camille Billops, including Suzanne Suzanne (1982) and Older Women and Love (1987), and shared a 1992 Grand Jury prize at Sundance. The series of films are not expressly related, yet there are various thematic threads coupled with the use of similar formal techniques. Although the couple seems to share in the production roles of their films, Billops usually takes on a more visual role. The films relay a definite female authorial voice. Even Hatch's screen role within Finding Christa is more that of supporting player to the complex dynamics of Billops and daughter Christa Victoria. The mother and daughter are not only presented in conventional dramatic installments, but multiple artistic sequences as well. Many of the formative passages also become vehicles for the participants, including numerous musical installments from both Christa and her adopted mother, Margaret Liebig.

The premise of Finding Christa, as the title implies, takes the viewer to the reunion whereby mother and child in essence find each other again after a twenty-year separation. Although the film does manage to keep the reunion as its predominant dramaturgical device, the overall focus is often that of Billops's life, displayed through moments of autobiographical reflections. The film addresses not only the complexities of the relationship between the reunited mother and daughter, but other interfamily relationships as experienced by Billops in response to her 1961 decision. Through a series of interviews with sometimes critical family members and ongoing personal commentaries (some in the form of rebuttals to her family's testimonials), Billops attempts to explain, and come to terms with, the choice to put her child up for adoption. This comes across as not being so much for herself, or even as justification of the act, but what seems to be more a type of education into the decision for the interviewees and viewers. Billops seems as secure in her decision at the end of the film as she was in 1961; it is only those around her who perhaps have changed their minds.

The title of Finding Christa reveals the complexities of the film. Among other meanings, it refers to the mother finding a child she left behind, the child finding herself through the mother, the viewer finding the child, and even the artist once again finding the mother. All of the relationships in the film seem to exist in a harmony that is anything but harmonious. This point seems to be one of the underlying currents of the narrative's questions of reality and its versions of such views. None of her family's reflections of the 1961 episode seem to be sufficient to answer the question of why Billops did what she did; yet the film and Billops herself seem content with that question remaining unanswered, instead posing the response of why is it necessary for others to feel content with something she needed to do.

One of the film's underscored revelations is found in Billops's old family home movies. Shot by her mother and father, the clips present a middle-class counterpoint to the usual iconographic imagery of 1950s and 1960s black America, as well as the same era's portrayal of the unwed mother. The film uses such footage to call all such ideologies into question including those of the middle class, for it is the breakdown of middle-class ideologies that is at the heart of Finding Christa. Just as the title questions its linguistic interpretations, the film questions those of the roles of mother, woman, child, and others in the eye of such. Such a breakdown is not one of destruction so much as of analysis, as the film is not one for answers, merely one that questions, which is one of the ways in which it engages the viewer.

The narrative structure in Finding Christa is separated into four episodes, each with its own introductory intertitle. Besides providing a means for directional switches of the narrative, they serve as effective ways to voice that of the film's subjects, while maintaining the film's ongoing dialectical conflict. The first title is that of Christa, yet the segment is about Billops. Billops voices the next two and they end with the ambiguity of the closing, 'Almost Home', title. This final title, which in essence not only reflects both subjects' voices, but exerts a certain surface level (previously exhibited in the subjective visualizations) of reflexive humor, because the film is almost over. In some ways, it is this final title that gives the viewer the most insight, being that it is the first and only title not posed in question form, allowing it to stand as more of a statement. Yet it reminds the viewer of an ambiguity that runs much deeper, as it provides no resolution, instead suggesting that the subjects never quite did get home. What this title and the subsequent scenes that follow reveal is not only that they did not reach home, but that the mere notion of such a possibility might reside only in the ideological implications that the film sets itself up to question.

Multiple interpretations of this film are inevitable, especially of Billops herself. Her demeanor throughout the film regarding the adoption is one that some might even find troubling, but that is all part of the intrigue that the film invokes. There are no easy answers to the questions addressed within Finding Christa, but that is part of the message being delivered, that of diversity and the complexities involved with such diversity.

Fires Were Started

(UK, Jennings, 1943)

Fires Were Started (1943) is considered the pre-eminent film about Britain at war. It was made by the highly acclaimed film director, Humphrey Jennings. Fires Were Started uses powerfully poetic visuals to offer a dramatic reconstruction of events associated with the Blitz on London, while at the same time offering a high degree of emotional realism in characterisation. The film has had a powerful influence on succeeding generations of British filmmakers. Leading filmmakers Lindsay Anderson and Karl Reisz, prominent figures in the experimental British Free Cinema Movement (1955–9), have singled out Fires Were Started as a unique film that had a significant influence on their approach to filmmaking. In an article on Jennings's work for Sight and Sound (April–June 1954), Anderson refers to the poetic power of Jennings's film style and argued that, 'In fact it might reasonably be contended that Humphrey Jennings is the only real poet the British Cinema has yet produced' (Jacobs 1979: 236). Reisz acknowledged the influence of Jennings's work and cited Fires Were Started as, 'the source film for Free Cinema' (Orbanz 1977: 57).

Fires Were Started was one of several films made by Humphrey Jennings under the auspices of the General Post Office (GPO) Film Unit and the Crown Film Unit. This collection of films addressed the various ways in which the British civilian population were involved and affected by the war. London Can Take It (1940), codirected by Harry Watt, represented the effects of the Blitz. Listen to Britain (1942) portrayed in a positive way the mood of the nation through descriptive sound, with scenes of high-spirited female factory workers collectively singing popular songs as they made their contribution to Britain's war effort. A Diary for Timothy (1944–5) was a more poignant film, and commented on the uncertain effects of five years of a world at war.

Fires Were Started was made in cooperation with the Home Office Ministry of Home Security and the National Fire Service, and was part of a propaganda drive to maintain high morale within civil defence organisations and the civilian population that they served. Brian Winston, in his book Fires Were Started (1999), comments on the propagandist function of the film while acknowledging the acute observation and impressive formal qualities deployed in Jennings's poetic realist style. He argues that, 'Fires Were Started, not (say) Triumph des Willens, is the real propaganda masterwork of the BFI list' (Winston 1999: 38).

Ostensibly, Fires Were Started is in the genre of documentary drama, in the sense that it is a dramatic reenactment of the type of events that the fire service encountered. Its documentary authority, however, rests more with the way in which the film communicated accurate information about how the fire service was coordinated during wartime. A variety of scenes accurately represented the levels of organisation involved in civilian defence, the functions of the chain of command, and the ways in which information was communicated to best use available resources. It offered a reassuring account of the way in which the organisations that served and protected the civilian population operated in times of crisis.

The narrative of Fires Were Started recounts twenty-four hours in the lives of the firemen of the Auxiliary Fire Service, from the time they leave home for work, through the routines of their job and everyday interaction with colleagues, to the telephone call that summons the firemen to fight a dangerous warehouse fire at the docks, which threatens to spread to a heavily laden munitions ship. The narrative culminates in the death of one of the firemen, a popular Cockney character called Jacko who is much valued by his colleagues. The film ends with scenes of Jacko's funeral intercut with shots of the ship sailing out of dock with its vital munitions cargo intact.

The film graphically depicted that although there may be a high cost in human terms to maintain Britain's war effort, the men and women on the home front were fulfilling their duties with an unquestioning bravery. This aspect of the film, a representation of the national spirit of Britain during the war, is perhaps more solidly anchored in the director's earlier interests. Jennings's friend and contemporary at Cambridge, the poet Kathleen Raines, commented that, 'What counted for Humphrey was the expression, by certain people, of the ever-growing spirit of man, in particular, of the spirit of England' (Jacobs 1979: 239). As a young man Jennings had cofounded the Mass Observation movement in 1937. The Mass Observation movement recruited a team of observers and a panel of volunteer writers who focused on British public life, attending public gatherings such as sporting events, open-air meetings, and entertainment venues.

The power of Jennings's representation of the men and women of the fire service in Fires Were Started lies in the dramatic tension created by a constant foregrounding of the ordinariness of the firefighters, which is contrasted with the unpredictable and heroic acts that the task of fire fighting requires. Winston (1999) argued that Jennings used masterly sociological or 'indirect' propaganda in the way he tapped into the mythic qualities that already circulated around the men and women of the fire service in London, who were acclaimed for their part in tackling blazing infernos and for rescuing many people from heavily bombed areas during the Blitz.

Although the basic narrative structure of Fires Were Started is unremarkable, the characterisation, as well as the visually exciting representation of dramatic firefights, have attracted much praise. Actual firemen from the Auxiliary Fire Service played the fictional characters in the film, and throughout the film Jennings maintains the sense that he is telling real people's stories. The film clearly underscores the essential ordinariness of the characters and their daily routines, in the everyday scenes of men saying goodbye to their families as they leave for work, to scenes of friendly banter with colleagues at the station house. These scenes, which foreground the unexceptional in life and the ordinariness of the characters, however, are later contrasted with visually dramatic scenes of a raging inferno at the warehouse, and acts of firefighting that necessitate extraordinary human courage as the fire spreads towards the munitions ship moored in the dock. Nevertheless, in these latter highly dramatic scenes, Jennings refrained from representing the firefighters as infallible heroes and managed to retain a sense of authentic ordinariness in the characterisation of the firemen. The firemen are shown making mistakes and having to deal with unpredictable situations as they arise in an often imperfect manner. This sense of ordinary men being called on to deal with superhuman events enables the narrative to play in the space between the mythic and the real.

The film achieves a more powerful emotional address by avoiding the depiction of the firefighters in action as invincible heroes, and instead by striving for a more authentic representation of the firefighters as ordinary men who risk their lives, and in the case of Jacko, die in the service of others. Lindsay Anderson (1954) cogently argued, 'In outline it is the simplest of pictures; in treatment it is of the greatest subtlety, richly poetic in feeling, intense with tenderness and admiration for the unassuming heroes whom it honours.' Anderson (1954) further argued that it was an exceptional film that had managed to capture an essential truth about the nature of the men and women it represented: 'No other British film made during the war, documentary or feature, achieved such a continuous and poignant truthfulness, or treated the subject of men at war with such a sense of its incidental glories and its essential tragedy' (Jacobs 1979: 241).

Jennings's film career was cut short, as he died at the age of forty-three in an accident on the Greek island of Poros, while researching locations for a film. Fires Were Started is arguably his greatest film legacy and continues to be considered a classic film of the period.

First Love

(Poland, Kieślowski, 1974)

One in a loose series of Krzysztof Kieślowski documentaries concerning ordinary people and places made across the 1970s, First Love (Pierwsza Miłość) follows a young couple as they marry and, within months, become parents. Despite the odds stacked against Romek and Jadźka—she is pregnant aged seventeen, and both are ill-prepared for their impending responsibilities and disoriented by the bureaucracy they face in terms of setting up a family home—they are resolute and determined. With severity, and just the occasional glimpse of sympathy, authority figures intervene in their lives but fail to detract from the couple's shared, unarticulated sense of joy and trepidation as they journey from 'first love' to adulthood and parenthood. Jadźka's façade only cracks after the wedding (an austere and functional ceremony that begins with the paying of a fee); she weeps silently as she receives advice and best wishes from her family. Such scenes, and Romek's fumbling phone call to his mother from the hospital announcing the birth of their daughter, suggest emotional pain equal to the pain of the actual birth, which is also recorded.

Kieślowski does not flinch in the face of these intimate and private scenes and yet, shortly afterwards, was to declare himself a trespasser on forbidden territory. Not only were such events inappropriate to film, but the act of filming itself blocked that which Kieślowski seems to have perceived as a greater, phenomenological 'truth'. From a Bazinian perspective, reality ultimately refuses to yield up such a truth for the camera. Žižek posits the resultant shift from documentary to feature films—indicative of a structural failure of documentary realism in the face of the all-too-real, something only encountered at the very limits of experience—as central to his reading of Kieślowski: 'a fidelity to the Real' is only possible via the mask of fiction (Žižek 2001). Such a tension is detectable in First Love's reconstructed scenes (Jadźka learning of her pregnancy, for example) and the lack of a methodological objective rigour. At one point, Kieślowski presents an actual and precise point-of-view shot (Jadźka absent-mindedly gazes through the glass panes of a phone booth at mothers and their children outside). Such a shot is impossible within the conceptual framework of an observational documentary.

Thus, by the 1980s Kieślowski had virtually abandoned the documentary. For contemporary viewers primarily familiar with Kieślowski as one of the most celebrated European auteurs of the late twentieth century, First Love engenders a kind of ahistorical déjà vu. The intimacy and obsessiveness with which Kieślowski frames the female 'recalls' Trois Couleurs: Bleu/Three Colours: Blue (1993); the series of events that irrevocably alter the course of a protagonist's life 'recalls' Przypadek/Blind Chance (1981); and the figure of the lone male, calling up to his partner in a high window 'recalls' the moment that closes Trois Couleurs: Blanc/Three Colours: White (1994). In such ways, Kieślowski mapped the real onto the fictional.

With none of the savvy of their aspirational reality television successors, Romek and Jadźka seem mostly oblivious to the documentary makers (a minimal crew, shooting in 16mm for thirty to forty days over the course of a year). Kieślowski favours long takes, allowing the characters to dictate the rhythm of the sequences. Nevertheless, a measure of direct manipulation is apparent, as well as one self-confessed 'clear provocation' (Stok 1993), in an engineered visit by a policeman. Kieślowski surrounds Romek and Jadźka with friends and family, creating the situation in which they would behave freely and naturally. This is achieved to the extent that the occasional glance at the camera by Kieślowski's subjects and the intrusion of the microphone into the frame serves to remind the viewer of the documentary nature of the film. Discreet jump cuts work in the same way, as do reestablishing shots from semi-hidden positions, denoting the essentially voyeuristic nature of the film.

Despite the seemingly dour subject matter, and with Kieślowski's taste for the oppressive Polish cityscape much in evidence, the aesthetic choices allow no pessimism. The colours are bright and vibrant and speak of the joie de vivre of the time and place; sunny overexposures for externals blur colour and form, joyously reimagining the Woodstock-esque cast of adolescent supporting characters with a kind of saturated pictorialism. Indeed, these characters are the benefactors of 1960s liberalism. Jadźka is met with acceptance rather than ostracism, support rather than disdain (with the sole exception of the board of school teachers, who downgrade her for lack of sexual morals). Such subject matter, only a decade before, made for some of the bleakest expressions of postwar European realism, particularly in British Northern Realism.

The defining and dominant characteristic of Kieślowski's method is his use of the tightly framed medium close-up, even with the (mostly) handheld camera. Even during the wedding ceremony and the birth, Kieślowski deftly holds the faces, rendering such events as steps on the emotional journey of the protagonists, catching fleeting and sometimes contradictory expressions as they sweep across their faces. This is the vantage point, intimates Kieślowski, from which the sociopolitical order must be examined. After all, if there is no hope for such a couple, and no sense in which their tribulations, however commonplace, can be understood to be both gracious and noble, then what hope is there for society? This could be read as a strategy of subversion in relation to the historical prerequisite of a socialist perspective (or 'optimistic facts', as Kieślowski jokingly referred to it (Stok 1993)). Kieślowski relocates the idea of socialist perspective, from the clichés of Socialist Realism (abundant farms, happy toiling workers, youths bright-eyed with ideology) to the everyman hopes of a contemporary young couple.

Flaherty, Robert

Robert J. Flaherty is a legendary figure in film history and often called the 'father' of American documentary, with a reputation that rests primarily on four feature-length works: Nanook of the North (1922), Moana (1926), Man of Aran (1934), and Louisiana Story (1948). Nanook was the first documentary feature to achieve mainstream box office success and is still considered by many as an exemplary piece of ethnographic filmmaking. Yet in recent years, Flaherty's films—and the more general construction of what has come to be known as the Flaherty myth—have been intensely scrutinized by scholars and critics. The problems most frequently found in Flaherty's work lie in two primary areas. The first relates to the question of documentary authenticity and, more specifically, to Flaherty's common practice of staging scenes and reconstructing 'primitive' life in his films. The second area of inquiry examines the extent to which Flaherty might have reproduced imperial hierarchies in his representations of racial and cultural difference. This latter issue becomes particularly difficult to ignore given the director's early career as an explorer, surveyor, and prospector in the Hudson Bay region for the industrialist and financier Sir William Mackenzie, whom Flaherty once referred to as 'the Cecil Rhodes of Canada' (Rotha 1983).

The story of Flaherty's early life as an explorer forms the backdrop to his career directing films in a mode that John Grierson and Paul Rotha would define as the naturalist tradition of documentary. Born in Michigan, Flaherty began by closely following the career path of his father, a mining engineer who often took his teenage son on prospecting expeditions to the remote regions of northern Ontario. The young Flaherty had little patience for academics, and a brief attempt to study mineralogy at the Michigan College of Mines, where he met his future wife and collaborator Frances Hubbard, ended in dismissal. In 1910, after returning to prospecting, Flaherty encountered Mackenzie, who engaged him to explore for iron ore along the sub-Arctic coast of Hudson Bay. In 1913, at Mackenzie's suggestion, Flaherty purchased a Bell and Howell camera, which he took with him on a major expedition to the Belcher Islands. One important innovation during these early attempts to film in the frozen north was Flaherty's decision to develop the negative on site and then screen the rushes to local Inuits, so that they could see the results of his efforts and work together with him 'as partners' (Rotha 1983). The practice led Flaherty to be seen as a pioneer of the collaborative feedback method, later adopted by Jean Rouch for such films as Moi, un Noir (1958) and Chronique d'un été (1961). By 1916, after several journeys and numerous failed attempts at filming in extreme conditions, Flaherty compiled seventy thousand feet of exposed negative. Editing it in Toronto, he accidentally, though some have thought intentionally, dropped a cigarette on the film and it instantly went up in flames. He was left with a single positive print (now lost), which is sometimes called the Harvard Print after his intention to screen it at the university.

The survival of the Harvard Print had at least two significant effects on Flaherty's development as a filmmaker. The first involved aesthetics and narrative: viewing it after the fire, he determined it to be an inferior piece of work, lacking dynamic visuals and a coherent storyline. The second was material, as he was able to screen the print in subsequent years in an effort to secure financing for his 'Eskimo film'. In the meantime he concentrated on writing and collaborating with Frances, and he edited the journals of his numerous northern journeys, released in 1924 as My Eskimo Friends. It was not until 1920 that another filming opportunity arose, when the French fur-trading firm Revillon Frères agreed to sponsor a trek north to their trading post in Cape Dufferin, Ungava. The relationship with Revillon Frères has since disturbed critics as it raises unsettling questions about the commercial and imperial forces behind the film. This is further compounded by the evident product placement of Revillon's furs in scenes at the trading post and inside Nanook's igloo (Rony 1996). After sixteen months of shooting in difficult climatic conditions, followed by months of editing and securing a distributor, the film was released by Pathé in 1922. With a total production and postproduction cost of $53,000, the film was a relative bargain for a feature, and it is estimated that it grossed $251,000 by September of the year of its release (Murphy 1978).

Flaherty had tapped into a growing public demand for films that not only documented travel to foreign places but also highlighted and investigated racial and cultural difference, a collective desire already partially in evidence in the ongoing success of shorter and more simply structured film travelogues. Nanook of the North's commercial success also paved the way for a range of expeditionary films, such as Osa and Martin Johnson's Simba: The King of the Beasts (1928) and Cooper and Schoedsack's Grass (1925) and Chang (1927). Though still held in higher critical esteem than these expeditionary adventures, Flaherty's film was arguably similar in relying on staged sequences and skillful editing to produce a seamless illusion of documentary reality. This practice of staging certain sequences while also filming candid scenes and events, then cutting the footage together to form a coherent episodic narrative, was to become a Flaherty trademark, evident in most of his major films. The key to appreciating Flaherty's style lies not in seeking out the strands of documentary or ethnographic authenticity, but in recognizing his skill in bridging the gap between on-site improvisation and narrative continuity on the screen. This improvisational skill is in evidence in Nanook near the end of the seal hunting sequence, where Flaherty's slight pans and tilts capture the raging sled dogs with the same fullness and immediacy as the more carefully produced moments earlier in the film, such as the dramatically staged opening shot of the walrus hunt.

Flaherty's next film, Moana, was shot in western Samoa, where he lived and worked with Frances and their children for nearly two years. The Flahertys were determined to recreate Nanook's heroic survival tale while relocating the story to a tropical climate. Nanook had defined the major themes that would dominate Flaherty's other work: the visual power of natural settings, the importance of familial bonds, nostalgia for ways of life presumed to be dead or dying, and the human struggle against nature. However, Samoan life failed to produce the latter key dramatic element, and the film that resulted was arguably the first feature-length documentary to focus to such an extent on the details of everyday life. Moana is reputed to have inspired the first written use of the term 'documentary' (Grierson 1979), though the claim has more recently been disputed (Winston 1988). Some of the film's most lasting contributions were aesthetic. Flaherty experimented with long focus lenses while in Samoa, finding that a greater distance between the camera and observed subjects helped to capture performances that appeared less controlled and self-conscious. He also rejected the standard use of orthochromatic film stock in favour of more sensitive panchromatic film, resulting in resonant images that helped to influence a shift in Hollywood practice. Perhaps even more than his other films, Moana reflects Flaherty's alignment with a modernist primitivism that arrived with the emergence of American cultural relativism, embodying Western longings for an untouched and timeless native world where one might escape from the routines of an increasingly industrialized and mechanized society.

To fund Moana, Flaherty had been offered a 'blank check' by Jesse Lasky of Famous Players-Lasky, but the film's lacklustre box office receipts meant that his honeymoon period with Hollywood was effectively over. Flaherty had, in any case, already gained a reputation for faithfully working in exotic locations with native peoples just at a moment when Hollywood was pioneering the large-scale location shoot and banking on the popularity of expeditionary films. After two smaller projects, The Pottery Maker (1925) and the elegant Manhattan 'city symphony', Twenty-four Dollar Island (1926), Flaherty entered a difficult period during which he contributed to a number of mainstream projects. Having provided a poetic image of the South Pacific as a lost paradise in Moana, he was determined to make a film that would reveal the effects of colonial exploitation upon the region. In 1927 he went to Tahiti to codirect the MGM adaptation of Frederick O'Brien's best-seller, White Shadows in the South Seas, but his slow and extravagant shooting methods fell foul of the more commercial expectations of his codirector, W.S. Van Dyke. Another opportunity in the Pacific came in 1929, when his brother David helped to cement a partnership between Flaherty and the German expressionist director, F.W. Murnau. The film was completed as the South Seas fantasy Tabu (1931), though Flaherty was also to abandon this project; he contributed to the screenplay and to the photography until aesthetic and financial disagreements led him to sell his share in the film. This episode ended what is sometimes called the first American phase of his career (Murphy 1978).

Many have argued that Flaherty's next phase, working for the head of the film unit of the Empire Marketing Board, John Grierson, marked a subtle shift in his directing style. Certainly his trust in his own visual instincts was in full force when he decided to spurn a preconceived script while shooting Industrial Britain for Grierson. The relationship between Grierson and Flaherty during this period suggests their differing approaches to the documentary form. Grierson insisted on a script, which Flaherty refused to produce, and while Grierson admired Flaherty's powers of observation, he ultimately enlisted Basil Wright and Arthur Elton to finish the photography, while Grierson himself completed the editing (Murphy 1978).

In many respects, Man of Aran widened the rift developing between Flaherty and the purveyors of the British social documentary movement. Sponsored by Gaumont, it marked a return to studio financing arrangements, which also meant that Flaherty was able to draw on the long-term filming methods, high shooting ratio, and eye for ethnographic detail he had developed while making Nanook and Moana. However, the finished product also brought to a head debates about Flaherty's escapism and his penchant for reconstructing worlds from bygone eras. Many critics saw Flaherty's 'evasive documentary' as a product of romantic idealism and even fascism (an argument exacerbated when it won the Mussolini Cup at the Venice Film Festival) (Murphy 1978). Returning to the dramatic 'man against nature' theme of Nanook, sequences such as the shark hunt episode hid the fact that such practices had ceased to exist nearly a hundred years before. Rotha would argue that the film failed to achieve the paramount objective of documentary practice: the careful examination and analysis of contemporary social problems. Grierson, however, defended Flaherty's unquestionable influence on a generation of filmmakers, noting his gift for natural observation and his highly personal style.

Critics continued to ask whether Flaherty's contributions to the documentary form were primarily aesthetic. He appeared unable or unwilling to address the political and social demands of the 1930s documentary film movement. However, his next nonfiction project, The Land, went some distance toward lessening, if not completely suppressing, these doubts. After working for Alexander Korda on Elephant Boy in India, he returned to the United States to make The Land for Pare Lorentz, who had recently become head of the United States Film Service. The Land takes as its subject the use and abuse of land, but also dwells on the themes of journey and displacement, perhaps revealing Flaherty's own preoccupations more than it examines the social and political contexts of its subject, an impression somewhat underscored by Flaherty's voice-over narration. Still, according to Rotha and Wright, this was the one film in which Flaherty had faced up to contemporary sociological and technological problems (Murphy 1978).

'Sometimes you have to lie', Flaherty once stated; 'one often has to distort the thing to catch its true spirit' (Calder-Marshall 1963). Flaherty's final documentary was the Standard Oil-financed Louisiana Story, which was clearly made in the spirit of this quote, for it is a highly stylized work that, at the same time, draws on the moods, rhythms, and ambience of its bayou setting in an effort to capture the essence of Cajun life. It followed another aborted effort working for a larger film unit during the war, Frank Capra's Army orientation unit. Like many of Flaherty's efforts, this ended in a falling out. Louisiana Story was generously financed and thus provided the more relaxed conditions under which Flaherty thrived. Working with the team of Richard Leacock on camera, Helen van Dongen as on-site editor, and Frances, Flaherty produced what many have considered his finest achievement.

As Richard Barsam suggests, Louisiana Story perhaps best illustrates the ways in which Flaherty's films defy classification within traditional notions of the nonfiction genre, suggesting that Flaherty's work is best understood as that of a realist filmmaker (Orbanz 1988). Flaherty tended to avoid densely critical or philosophical assessments of his work, but it can be said that those elements most often criticized in the films—narrative distortion, romantic escapism, and nostalgia—might have been the preconditions that made possible a distinctive documentary aesthetic, and they provide the grounds for reading Flaherty as a documentary auteur.

For Love or Money

(Australia, McMurchy, 1983)

For Love or Money is a feature-length documentary that was produced over a five-year period, from 1979 to 1983, which endeavors to comprehensively document the working lives of Australian women since colonial times. The scope of the documentary is impressive as it ranges from the exploitation of convict women and Aboriginal workers to the equal pay debates of the 1960s and 1970s.

The film was made collaboratively by Megan McMurchy, Margot Nash, Margot Oliver, and Jeni Thornley. Three of the filmmakers, McMurchy, Oliver, and Thornley, also produced a book that draws on and extends the central themes addressed by the film. For Love or Money is constructed around four sections that divide the documentary into distinct historical periods. These periods are represented through a collage of extracts from other texts such as still photographs, newspaper archives, newsreels, feature films, and documentaries. Interviews with women from diverse social backgrounds are also interspersed between this collage. For Love or Money had its genesis in the late 1970s, and the final product is concerned with the feminist issues that dominated the movement at that time. It addresses the underrepresentation of women's experience and their contribution to the world of work. For Love or Money endeavors to 'make visible', or 'recover' that which has been consistently ignored and undervalued (Moore 1987).

The voice-over is also compiled from a variety of sources drawing on testimonials, quotations, and a voice-of-God narration that was scripted specifically for the film. The juxtapositions and bricolage of sound and images lends the documentary a poetic quality that marks the film as the product of a creative authorship rather than a transparent historical record. This approach values the first person, subjective address as a legitimate form of historical knowledge, and this element again locates the film in relation to the strategies of feminist theory that developed through the 1970s and into the 1980s. However, For Love or Money also embodies the shifts and contradictions in theory and politics that were increasingly debated at this time. While many aspects of the film seek a subjective retelling of history, it also draws on an authoritative address and an objective historiography to represent the 'truth' of women's exploitation and experience. When the film was finally released, as a result of this inherent ambivalence it was afforded a mixed reception (Curthoys and Dermody 1987).

For Love or Money is not only a painstaking account of women and work throughout Australian history, but, because of what Curthoys and Dermody call an 'asynchrony' of theoretical paradigms, it also bears all the traces of the intellectual shifts of the time. It preceded a number of films produced in the 1980s that went on to use traditional modes of documentary representation such as the use of archival material and interviews, while also attempting to subvert this convention in different ways. Notable examples include Red Matildas (1985), Snakes and Ladders (1987), and A Singular Woman (1985). This fusion of formal elements became a hallmark of feminist filmmaking in Australia at this time (Blonski and Freiberg 1989).

Forest of Bliss

(US, Gardner, 1986)

Forest of Bliss is a poetic nonfiction film by Robert Gardner about death and regeneration. Set in Benares, India, the film is at once highly specific to its setting, on the ghats (stone steps leading directly into the water) of the Ganges River, and universal in its resonance. The film has been much lauded for its revitalization of the genre of the city symphony, and for the almost sublime beauty of its unsparing yet evidently reverent images. Its detractors have been primarily anthropologists, who have highlighted as the film's shortcoming precisely that quality most acclaimed by film critics and historians—its absence of verbal explication in any form. There is no voice-over narration, nor subtitling of speech, nor any direct-address interviews with the film's subjects. However, the film's largely nonverbal engagement with its subject displays a critical acumen and perceptual acuity rare in ethnographic film, which conveys respect at once for its subject (Benares and its inhabitants) and for its viewers, who are trusted to navigate through the images without any voice-over direction. Forest of Bliss resolutely refuses to condescend to the viewer after the fashion of the canonical ethnographic film, travelog, or liberal documentary. In retreating from language, Gardner is renouncing the dominant expository modality of documentary, and seeking instead to impart a more corporeal, intersubjective engagement with his subject, the willful ambiguity and open-endedness of which seeks to mirror that of human existence itself.

Forest of Bliss is also the apogée of Gardner's own oeuvre to date (which includes Blunden Harbor (1951), Dead Birds (1963), The Nuer (with Hilary Harris, 1971), Rivers of Sand (1974), Deep Hearts (1981), Ika Hands, and Passenger (1998)), in that it is his most consummate experimentation with nonrealist montage. The film moves back and forth between a number of protonarrative strands (or 'slight narratives', in Paul Rotha's memorable phrase), but tells no story and develops no character in any conventional sense. Although Forest of Bliss contains three distinct main characters, Gardner is concerned more with situating them within the larger ecology of Benares, than establishing them as individuals. This is an ecology of water, fire, marigolds, dogs, cows, boats, bamboo, sand, stone, and wood, all elements with a significance, use, and interrelatedness that we grasp only gradually through the course of the film. It is an ecology of life and death, of dirt and purification, of the sacred and the profane. Death, no less than life, is marked by a limitless series of rituals, both individual and collective. Yet at the same time, death is the local industry; Benares, as the holiest Hindu city, has for millennia been the pilgrimage site of a vast mortuary migration. If Forest of Bliss is about the ecology of Benares, it is also about the economy of death. The 'slight narratives' of the film—the sorting of the golden marigolds, the assembling of the bamboo funerary litters, the transporting of the sand, the weighing of the firewood, the caring and cleansing of the recently departed, the baptizing of a new boat—all coalesce on the Burning Ground of the sacred ghats on the banks of the Ganges.

The film is driven by a sense of constant motion, conveyed as much by the elaborate, polyphonic soundtrack as the interwoven images. The city of Benares bustles and rings with the collective activities of individuals. Gardner's gaze is simultaneously wandering and unwavering, as countless people, animals, and objects ascend and descend the extensive and elaborate flights of stairs that attach the city to its river—and life to death. Whereas the city streets resound with near collisions of vehicles and cargo, beggars and dogs, cows and children, and pilgrims and priests, the chorus of the Ganges is one of amplified splashes, squeaking boat oars, and chirping birds. The business of death is conducted both inside and outside, with each space evoking the other through sound. Early in the film a priest is making offerings in a sheltered altar. His solitude and concentration are emphasized by the sounds of his labored breathing. At the same time we hear a chorus of children's voices playing nearby; adult men talking, coughing, hammering; birds singing—all unseen, but present nonetheless. Almost all of the nonverbal or ambient sounds in the film seem amplified, while the few verbal communications appear—unlike the more guttural exclamations—to be muted somewhat. The effect is to reflect an intention on the part of the filmmaker to divert us from attending to the denotative meaning of what is being said, and to evoke in us instead a synaesthetic response to the full realm of connotations in all that we see and hear.

Forest of Bliss is arguably without parallel in nonfiction cinema in its exploration of the polyvalence of (aural and visual) imagery, almost unmediated by any verbal exegesis, diegetic or extra-diegetic, circumscribing their meaning. The one verbal element the significance of which the film, as it unfolds, repeatedly invites us to ponder is the opening epigraph from Yeats, itself a translation from the Upanishads: 'Everything in the world is eater or eaten, the seed is food and the fire is eater'. In its refusal of conventional notions of linearity and realism, its experimentation with montage, and its polyphonic, non-narrative soundtrack, Forest of Bliss explores the reciprocal provocations of ethnographic and avant-garde filmmaking in a fashion that had largely been neglected since the work of Maya Deren, but in a manner altogether more sensuous. Although the film was initially disavowed by anthropologists, it is now recognized as having taken ethnographic film to unequalled aesthetic and sensory heights.

Since its original release on 16mm and 35mm film in 1986, Forest of Bliss has been released on DVD as an accompaniment to a detailed exegesis of the film by Robert Gardner and his coproducer, Ákos Östör, Making Forest of Bliss: Intention, Circumstance, and Chance in the Non-Fiction Film (Harvard University Press, 2001).

Forgács, Péter

An independent media artist working in Budapest since the 1970s, Péter Forgács emerged in the 1990s as an important creative force in the shaping of documentary style. He revitalized the art of compilation filmmaking by incorporating poetic, stylistic touches more often found in the experimental sphere. As an archivist and researcher, Forgács helped to bring attention to amateur films as documentary materials to be mobilized in revising the historiography of the twentieth century, particularly that of Europe in the 1930s and 1940s.

Much of Forgács's early work was not in documentary film per se, but in eclectic parts of the fine arts: video installation, theater, and musical performance. In 1988, after five years of archiving home movie collections, he received his first commission from Hungarian television. Establishing a specialization in the revivification of amateur films, he turned to work that was more obviously, though not conventionally, documentary. He classified several of his feature-length pieces as 'video operas', for the ways in which they shape actuality footage into musical and rhythmic arrangements. The mesmeric scores of his musical collaborator, Tibor Szemző, are key to holding the patchwork visuals together. Although Forgács clearly retains the influence of experimental art movements, he has created a body of work dedicated to historical narrative and individuals living within the sweep of historical forces.

Forgács is often characterized as a 'found-footage' filmmaker, but this is misleading in two ways. He tracks down small-gauge, amateur films (8, Super 8, 9.5, and 16mm footage), but does not treat them as anonymous, mysterious 'found' objects. Rather, he does research about the owners, makers, and subjects of these home movies and other amateur productions. His short Wittgenstein Tractatus (1992), a collage of unidentified imagery and philosophical aphorisms, is the exception to his usual method of scrupulously identifying and historicizing such films. Although Forgács uses small-gauge celluloid as source material, his own production is video-based. His authorial signature is indebted to the postproduction tools available in digital video. Without overwhelming the film artifact, his work uses a full palette of layered embellishments: color graphics, freeze-frames, slow motion, tinting, superimpositions, and stylized text.

Since 1988 Forgács has produced more than a dozen hour-long documentaries in his 'Private Hungary' series. Beginning with A Bartos család/The Bartos Family, these contemplative works examine the daily life of Europeans at the time of World War II by reanimating home movies. Because amateur cinematography was an expensive hobby, the films principally record the households of privileged and bourgeois families. In addition to the expected birthdays, weddings, and holiday scenes, there are often artful, constructed passages done by filmmakers who edited, directed, and titled their silent footage. In the most remarkable episodes, such as Az örvény/Free Fall (1996), Forgács suggests a radical rereading of the history of documentary. His film reveals the process by which sophisticated amateur cineastes, such as György Pető, photographed private, domestic moments. In so doing they also created documents of the social spheres in which their lives were shaped.

Forgács sparingly uses conventional archival materials, such as newsreels, in these compilations. When he does, it is to situate 'private' films in public space and history. The contrasts between the private view and 'official' documentation are dramatic, but left open and contradictory. In De Maalstroom/The Maalstroom (1997) home movies of the Jewish Peereboom family (taken in Holland, 1933–42) take on a tragic irony that is heightened by the intercutting of films shot at home by a Nazi commissar, who oversaw their deportation to a concentration camp. At other times, amateur footage takes on a heroic, public dimension. In Angelos' Film (2000), we see footage of the Nazi occupation of Greece, which aristocrat Angelos Papanastassiou clandestinely recorded with a hidden camera: swastikas hung on the Acropolis, public hangings, and other events never shot by the official newsreels.

The legacy of Forgács's work is in both these finished tapes and the Private Film and Photo Archive that he established to save these alternate histories. The collection is housed at the Central European University and includes more than five hundred hours of amateur films (1910–85) from Hungary and elsewhere, as well as three hundred hours of audio interviews with the filmmakers' families.

400 Million, The

(Holland, Ivens, 1939)

The Dutch filmmaker Joris Ivens used his camera in his roles as both political activist and humanitarian filmmaker. Ivens is noted for having produced social and political documentaries that go beyond depictions of nature and scientific feats. He had a prolific career, directing his camera toward monumental events and helping to assert the role motion pictures can play in the recording of history. The 400 Million reflects this commitment to historical documentation.

The film was shot over four months during the spring of 1939 and documents China's struggle against invading Japanese forces. Ivens admitted that his recent experience shooting a film during the Spanish Civil War (The Spanish Earth) taught him the difficulties of documenting military conflicts; however, the experience also bolstered his commitment to giving voice to the courageous efforts being made against fascism. Production of The 400 Million forced Ivens to negotiate his way around multiple obstacles placed in his way by Chiang Kai-shek's government, testing his nerve and his commitment to the project. He was initially restricted by the Chinese military commanders from going to the forefront of the conflict, but as he has stated, he drew courage and strength from the spirit and confidence displayed by the Chinese soldiers who surrounded him, who unflinchingly continued in their roles as soldiers. Ivens mirrored this commitment as a filmmaker, unwilling to let surveillance, curfews, or personality differences prevent him from carrying out his goals in filming this important moment in history. During production, Ivens moved between guerilla units, Communist Party members, and the nationalist army (under Chiang Kai-shek), much to the dismay and suspicion of each faction. Even though they were fighting the common enemy of Japan, these groups held opposing sociopolitical views; however, Ivens's film depicts these factions as comrades united by a common cause.

After six weeks of frustrating delay, Ivens and his crew were finally allowed access to the frontlines of the war. Nonetheless, once they arrived, the general in command changed his mind and told them that they could go no further. Angry and determined, Ivens declared that he and his crew had come to China to film battles as they unfolded, informing the general that the crew was going to push on, with or without him. Ultimately, the general conceded to Ivens's demands. Such encounters continued to limit the crew's access to the battles. Ivens was constantly frustrated with such restrictions, but at the same time was sensitive to the fact that military personnel struggled to comprehend why someone would risk his life on the battlefield for no visible reward. Ivens had hoped that the film would not only garner support for the Chinese struggle but also serve in the fight against fascism and totalitarian regimes in Europe.

Ivens's critical talent for composing sequences of visual poeticism and his skillful editing to create engrossing and rhythmic sequences elevate this film above typical newsreel footage and most other early twentieth-century war documentaries. Such techniques are used to elicit sympathy for the Chinese people. The rich visuals and montage are aurally linked to commentary spoken by actor Frederic March, shifting between a subjective voice (adopting the perspective and sentiment of Chinese soldiers and civilians) and that of an authoritative, though impassioned, observer. Although the visuals are dramatic, moving, and at times horrific, the footage lacks continuity; therefore, because of the restraints placed on Ivens and his crew, the film relies heavily on the spoken word both to carry the story forward and to evoke a sense of the subjectivity and nuances of life in a nation under siege. Even Ivens himself admitted that the commentary was rather extensive. Considering the limitations that tormented Ivens and his crew, the heavy reliance on voice-over appears somewhat justified, if not consistent with most documentaries of that age. The soundtrack is artfully and illustratively textured, complementing the visuals with a quasi-polyvocal narration, Chinese folk music, the raucous sounds of war, and excerpts (in Mandarin) from military officials and youth leaders, which are accompanied by their English translations and spoken by American actors.

The film begins with a jarring image sequence of the aftereffects of Japanese bombings in northeastern China, blatantly referring to the atrocities as acts of unprovoked military aggression. The next section characterizes China as a nation with a long history whose cultural contributions have benefited the world since the time of Marco Polo. China's link with the West is hinted at as a further narrative means to stir interest and concern from Europe and North America. This section concludes by reasserting the value and import of Chinese culture on an historical and humanitarian level, while emphasizing that although it is a nation of four hundred million (one-fifth of the world's population at that time), its people are united in defending their vast and diverse homeland. The film then shows a China on the road to modernization after deposing its emperor, its emerging civil infrastructure and transportation system, and the development of modern technology and industry. These efforts at modernization, as the film suggests, may have provoked Japan's aggression, which saw China as an immense landscape of untapped natural resources.

This provocation is addressed in the next section of the film, in which Japan's history of military aggression toward eastern Asia is recounted. It is also noted that the United States was still exporting iron and steel to Imperial Japan, placing the United States in a position of complacency, if not accountability, in regard to the atrocities afflicted on the Chinese people. Ivens's own political sentiments are apparent through the film's privileging of commoners and China's former Red Army. In tribute to the hurriedly trained commoners of China, brave farmers are shown using guerilla war tactics, which were an invaluable component to China's defense strategy. Ivens suggests that the most heroic military efforts are those of the Eighth Route Army, a unit from China's former Red Army.

None of this detracts from Ivens's overall effort to create a film that emphasizes, at least temporarily, the unity of China's various political factions. One of the final sequences of the film circumvents intra-China political differences to recount and emphasize the importance of China obtaining even the smallest of victories against Japanese forces (the recapture of Tai'erzhuang, for example). The overriding message of this final sequence is that one small victory is not only the essential first step toward reestablishing a free and stable China, but one that will, ideally, help to elicit support from the West.

On completion of The 400 Million, Ivens donated his film camera to a representative of the Chinese Communist Party. Little did he know that his camera was to become the first motion picture camera owned by the Yan'an Film Group, preserved today at the Museum of Chinese Revolutionary History. Portions of Ivens's film were later used by American director Frank Capra as part of his World War II propaganda film series, Why We Fight.

France

From the famous film show of December 1895 to 1940, documentaries were considered uninteresting productions that were fine for amateurs but not worth being shown in movie theatres. Such contempt is all the more surprising, as during this initial period, theoreticians and filmmakers defined, on paper and in actual practice, the four main traits that have characterized the French documentary tradition up to the present: (1) the observation films aimed at recording what is significant in an object or a procedure; (2) the explanatory films intended not only to describe but also to comment; (3) the critical films that explored the unseen side of actions or events; and (4) the formal movies that question the nature and purpose of documentaries. The respective importance of these groups varied according to the main concerns of any period and to spectators' reactions. In a second epoch, roughly from 1940 to 1968, documentaries became fashionable. At a time when their country was in decline the French were anxious to obtain information about the world and about the new techniques coming from the United States. Film directors no longer looked down on 'factual' films. During the last decades of the twentieth century, those involved in the film industry were obliged to work for television. There was a division between the channels that made instructive movies and a handful of independent filmmakers eager to experiment with new formulae.

The Lumière brothers, authors of the first French movies, were manufacturers of cinematic equipment and raw film. Their 'views' were aimed only at showing the quality of their products. However, some of their operators, instead of merely recording ephemeral happenings, filmed relevant aspects of the current social life. The first French documentary was shot in July 1886 by an unknown operator who went to Carmaux, a then important coal mining area. He filmed the coke coming out of the oven and, more importantly, the women sorting and carrying big coal blocks. His was a typical observer's attitude. He adopted, in both cases, a unique position. His presence cannot be spotted; the workers, absorbed in their job, never look at the camera. Only a small minority of the more than 1,400 'views' shot for the Lumières are of such quality. The firm soon ceased production.

The Lumières had dispatched operators throughout the world to advertise their material. A wealthy financier, Albert Kahn, thought he could carry out the same operation to constitute a vast picture library, the Planet's Archives. Instructed to film the customs, living conditions, and resources of the countries they visited, the cameramen sent to Europe, the Middle East, Asia, and Africa from 1908 to 1931 brought back hundreds of documents that were roughly edited for people to consult. Wars, Kahn believed, are caused by reciprocal ignorance; a better knowledge of 'the other' would help the progress of universal peace. Few were interested. Later, in the 1960s, this prodigious collection became famous and was used extensively by television.

Documentaries did not appeal to French spectators during the first decades of the century. The eight thousand movies that Pathé, the main producer, diffused before 1920 were comedies or melodramas. Made in studio, they did not cost much and Pathé did not want his crew to work outside. One of his directors, Alfred Machin, personally shot, during his holidays, the pictures edited in 1913 for Pathé's only feature-length (fifty-five-minute) documentary Voyages et grandes chasses en Afrique/Journeys and Big Hunts in Africa.

Documentaries developed away from commercial circuits, thanks to various forms of sponsorship. Instead of merely recording aspects of the world, they were meant to reveal and explain precise, well-defined processes. A minority of scientists understood early on the importance of moving pictures. Subsidized by Pathé and then Albert Kahn, Dr Jean Commandon made a series of instructional movies on the functioning of the human body and on surgical operations. Accurate, surgical and detailed, his films were too difficult for the common people to follow. Another doctor, Jean Painlevé (1902–89), was less demanding and won an excellent reputation; his La chirurgie correctrice/Corrective Surgery (1926) or L'étude du sang/The Study of Blood (1935) introduced the topic clearly, displayed long shots with much contrast, and commented extensively on every image. Sometimes Painlevé proved fanciful: he treated animals—Les oursins/Sea Urchins (1925), Les crevettes/Shrimps (1930)—like humans, attributing them intention and siding with them against their enemies. Backed by the authorities, he was able to reach a wide audience of pupils and students.

Having lost their foreign clients during the World War I, French producers were obliged to turn towards the domestic market. The state and various public offices provided them with a new outlet. Gaumont launched a 'Série enseignement' (educational series) and Pathé a 'Pathé revue', both comprising shorts (ten to fifteen minutes) dealing with a highly specific topic such as the making and functioning of an engine, the strength of various types of sewing threads, and the best way of using a particular tool. More than one thousand of these items found in the Gaumont or Pathé archive have been restored and are now available for consultation at the Paris Bibliothèque Nationale. Less interested in cinema than the state, industrial firms financed few publicity films. The case of car factories is typical. The Ford Company produced more than five thousand cinematic documents from 1914 onward; Fiat and Volkswagen made extensive use of films to advertise their vehicles. In France Citroën was content to sponsor prestige operations: a film crew followed long-distance trips shooting La croisière noire/The Black Cruise (1926) and La croisière jaune/The Yellow Cruise (1933) in praise of Citroën cars' reliability. Renault, the main French manufacturer, ordered only four pictures between the world wars. The longest (fifty-seven minutes), Automobiles de France, shot by Pathé-Natan in 1934, is a good example of average publicity documentaries. A journalist calls Renault and asks to visit the factory. He is first informed about steel production and about the components of a car. He is then taken through the plant, with much emphasis on the building of the bodywork and on the assembly line. The director, Jean Loubignac, used clever tricks, for instance making a reverse tracking-shot from the end to starting point of the the assembly line to compensate for its slowness and apparently doubled its speed. Not accurate enough for a specialist but too long and complicated for the lay spectator, this movie illustrates the imperfections of most French documentaries—while not aimed at a large public, they were often of poor quality.

Oddly enough it was among these films that the first and possibly most challenging documentary theory was developed. France boasts a wealth of film experts who have never held a camera. Such was not the case of Jean Epstein (1897–1953), director of a series of fiction films and documentaries and author of several books, notably Bonjour cinéma (Good Morning Cinema, 1921). By playing with time and space, Epstein contended, by jumping from one point to another and by accelerating or slowing down, the cinema drastically alters our relationship to the world and suggests that other connections are possible. Its aim is neither to become a mechanical eye used to observe things nor to comment, but rather to go beyond appearances. Documentaries must not inform; they have to disclose a yet unknown universe. Epstein was not a loner but rather the spokesman of a small group of intellectuals hastily labelled 'avant-gardists', although no army followed them. Avant-gardists loathed informative movies and wanted cinema to break with the humdrum of daily activities. They were divided into two groups: the critics and the formalists.

The critics reacted against the smooth, alternately sentimental and comforting vision offered by fiction films. With La Zone/The Slum Belt (1928), Georges Lacombe, leaving Paris's animated centre, explored the most derelict sectors of urban periphery. Banking on surprise and disorientation, he mapped out no itinerary and wrote practically no commentary. This 'zone' was a non-city, a no-man's-land close by affluent districts but totally neglected. Refuting in advance Africa's pleasant aspect filmed by the Citroën crew, Marc Allégret (1900–73), travelling with André Gide, evoked in Voyage au Congo/Voyage to the Congo (1925) a country threatened by malnutrition and illness. While denouncing another form of destitution, the absolute poverty of Extremaduran country people in Las Hurdes, also known as Terre sans pain/Land without Bread (shot in 1932, released in 1937), Luis Buñuel (1900–83) took another course. After travelling to the village of Alberca, he lined up a series of appalling pictures: children and pigs wallowing in the only fountain, a little girl about to die, brain-damaged boys smiling at the camera, and men and women sleeping together in tiny dark sheds. In contrast to these images, Brahms's Fourth Symphony and a pompous, dry voice-over was meant to disturb the audience and make it apprehend the artificial character of documentaries shot by foreigners and projected to far-away, indifferent spectators. Jean Vigo's A propos de Nice/On the Subject of Nice (1930), played also on oppositions between rich and poor, leisure and work, life and death. Swift motions, unpredictable views, and absurd transformations (a man turned into a lobster) made up for the banality of the comparisons; the movie mocked simultaneously modish resorts and the pseudo-objectivity of documentaries.

Less satirical, other avant-gardistes were intent on exploring the potential of cinema. Alberto Cavalcanti's Rien que les heures/Only the Hours (1926) brought into fashion the city symphonies, movies attempting to visually document the frantic agitation of a big metropolis. Cavalcanti (1897–1982) fancied a 'typical' Parisian day: bizarre linkings, frozen pictures coming after accelerated motions, wipes hinted at an engulfing of time by the whimsical rhythm of urban life. Many drew their inspiration from this model in European capitals, so Marcel Carné chose to invert it. His Nogent, Eldorado du dimanche/Nogent, Sunday's Eldorado (1929) stretched the Sunday hours by accompanying in slow panning shots the idle city dwellers who had left the town centre to rest by a river. Far away, at the very end of Brittany, Jean Epstein evoked nature's timelessness in Finis Terrae (1930). The same waves assaulted in vain the same rocks; the same sky lingered over an infinite heath.

Avant-garde films have been revalued by critics, but at the time they were as despised as any other documentary. Financing them was problematic; it was only thanks to their friends' help that Buñuel or Vigo were able to work. Businessmen did not believe in cinematic advertising. Public offices gave money for didactic movies provided that they were mere illustrated lessons. French documentaries seemed not to have a future.

The year 1940, the year of France's most mortifying defeat, was a watershed for documentaries. In October the Vichy government imposed the screening of a short during any film show. Nazi Germany and Fascist Italy had made extensive use of informative movies for propaganda; the Vichy authorities thought that imitating them would accelerate France's recovery. The Republic regulated these films and decided that only those with professional qualifications could work in studios. The result was twofold: producers were no longer reluctant to finance documentaries likely to yield a profit; and the young who wanted to become qualified had no choice but to make shorts. In liberated France, the Americans organized free film shows to illustrate their way of life and later to promote the Marshall Plan. French audiences realized that documentaries were not necessarily boring by-products.

There was a rising flood of documentaries, from four hundred during the German occupation to four thousand between 1945 and 1955. There were a great deal of quota shorts and among the good ones many were factual films. The big firms—Renault, Esso-France, the Electricity Company—funded instructional movies adapted to the needs of their potential clients. Technically, their products were of excellent quality, with sharp pictures, perfect lighting, and a didactic voice-over. They were all aimed at showing how progress, symbolized by cars, tractors, fertilizers, and electricity, could improve daily life. Ministerial bodies, especially the Foreign Office and the Ministry of Agriculture, subsidized a significant number of shorts, but their funds were limited, which resulted in an uncomfortable mixture of awkwardness and pretentiousness. Paysans d'hier et d'aujourd'hui/Countrymen of Yesterday and Today (1946) is a typical example. While encountering modern farmers, backwards countrymen suddenly understand their ignorance. The film unveils a touch of scorn: the backwards men never wash their hands, and marvel at the use of electricity.

In addition to professional life, much attention was devoted to cultural activities, tourism first but also sport, mountain climbing, theatre, and architecture. One-tenth of the movies focused on animals, nature, and landscapes. The same percentage dealt with the colonial empire. Except for Indochina, nothing was said about nationalism; the commentary stressed the mutual interest of France and African countries and the necessity of assimilation. Consider Kalla, produced as late as 1955: a black student (in fact an actor) confronts his former life in Cameroon and his present life in Paris, but if the camera follows him he is not allowed to speak—it is a French voice-over that tells what he is supposed to think.

Until 1964 there was one television channel in France, which transmitted five hours a day in black and white. The programmes were also influenced by cinema because what was not broadcast live from a studio was shot on film.

The ascendancy of cinema is apparent in the choice of themes and stylistic practice. Elie Lotar's Aubervilliers (1945), a stern description of slum life in the north of Paris, and a series of documentaries made by Jean Dewever, La crise du logement/The Housing Shortage (1995) and Des logis et des hommes/On Abodes and Men (1956) revealed how archaic housing conditions were in suburbs and had a strong impact on public opinion. Television followed suit with a documentary series, A la découverte des Français/In Search of the French (1957–8); fourteen programmes explored various regions, visited families, and invited their members to talk. These documentaries were more detailed than Lotar's or Dewever's, but did not introduce data they had not already tackled. The most popular television series were La vie des animaux/Animal Life (1952–76) and Les Médicales/Concerned with Medicine (1956–84). The former adopted a cinematic approach with extensive panning shots on beautiful landscapes, animals shot at long distance, and surprising jumps from a distance to a close frame. The latter was built like a serial, a fight between human beings and illness in which every item opened with a problem (how to cure it?) and closed with a happy ending. Television was initially unable to give new life to audiovisual expression; however, it offered jobs to young filmmakers and helped to acquaint spectators with documentary films.

Hurriedly interviewing derelict families was not likely to introduce new approaches to the documentary formulae. Documentaries changed when filmmakers adopted other methods. Georges Rouquier (1909–89) was a printer. Fond of films, he succeeded in convincing a producer that it would be a good idea to make a full-length picture about a rural family that had been living for a long time in an isolated farm in Aveyron. Rouquier settled in at the farm, watched carefully, and wrote a script. A small crew of technicians then joined him, and shooting began in the autumn of 1944. Filming took a whole year. The editing process was rather painful and the film was not released until the spring of 1947. It is as stunning today as it was in its time. After the credits, the nine members of the family and their neighbours are introduced. An establishing sequence, the longest in the film, describes a day in autumn, the emphasis being on the children who have to walk several miles to the village school, care for the animals, and make bread. During the winter, long evenings allow the grandfather to tell the story of the family and its farm. In the spring, the mother gives birth to a child and the female livestock breed; the farm is furnished with electricity. The summer, as the most important season, is divided into three parts. The first section shows haymaking. The portrayal of a typical Sunday introduces important topics such as the relationship of the family with the village, the church, the café, and collective entertainment. The summer ends with harvesting and threshing. In autumn we see glimpses of vintage and tree cutting, but another topic, the division of the property between the children, is dealt with at length.

Superficial though it is, this summary gives an idea of the richness of a picture that is both clever and subtle. In 1947 audiences approved. This was the real thing, more credible than the fanciful farms of fictions. The film still appeals to contemporary spectators. They see precisely how oxen are harnessed, how they draw the plough and how people learn to build a haystack. More importantly, the film gives them a glimpse of the lifestyle, based on sociability and fairness, that brought the agricultural workers together. The relationships between the members of the family, the family and the neighbours, and the family and the village are vividly portrayed. The conflicts underlying the common life of three generations living under the same roof are not hidden but are subtly exposed throughout the movie.

Rouquier was an amateur who filmed to please himself, not to captivate an audience. In contrast, Jean Rouch, born in 1917, was a trained ethnographer. While investigating black Africa's traditions, he used a camera to record local ceremonies. He settled in a village and while they were unaware he filmed the villagers' actions and attitudes. Some Africans condemned this practice as typically colonialist; others said he had captured a trace of customs that were soon to disappear. Rouch's Les maîtres fous/The Manic Priests (1955) gave rise to much controversy. Accompanying villagers who had moved into a town, the short showed how the rituals they attempted to maintain had been distorted by contact with white people. Moi un noir/I, a Black (1958), a feature-length documentary, was discussed for other reasons. Rouch reconstructed several days in the life of three Africans in Abidjan (Côte d'Ivoire).

They were authentic workers but played their own character according to a screenplay written by the filmmaker. Moreover, the voice-over alternated between two commentaries, one by the director and the other by one of the Africans.

While breaking with the optimistic vision of mainstream colonial documentaries, Rouch denounced neither the anarchic urbanization of African towns nor the French authorities' responsibility. The tradition of critical documentaries was not lost at the time, but in a difficult period marked by the German occupation, the Cold War, decolonization, and the Algerian conflict, criticism became mostly political. Its main exponents, Alain Resnais and Frédéric Rossif, both born in 1922, had witnessed war, resistance, and the opening of the concentration camps. The memory of such dramas weighed heavily on their movies. Resnais's Nuit et brouillard/Night and Fog (1955) and Rossif's Le temps du ghetto/The Ghetto Time (1961) were shot while French public opinion tried to forget war horrors, and Rossif's Mourir à Madrid/To Die in Madrid (1963) was shot during the worst period of the Algerian war. Resnais flashed back and forth between past and present; archival footage of the camps was interspersed with clips of postwar trials and pictures taken for the film. Rossif stuck to chronology. Both raised serious questions about moral responsibility and the possibility of other mass murders. To Die in Madrid was a lampoon against Franco shot against the background of de Gaulle's authoritarian rule. Instead of merely narrating the Spanish civil war, Rossif attempted to evoke the atmosphere of a domestic conflict and to document its everyday nature by stressing civilians' suffering, their fear of aerial bombings, and their anxious wait of a predictable issue. The editing was extremely clever. Describing the defence of Madrid, the director emphasized the deep involvement of an entire population. He showed the men digging trenches, the children and women passing on stones, all social groups taking part in a common action, without leaders and without any military presence. Rossif had slanted his message to appeal to those who opposed Gaullism, but even those who blamed its bias found his account gripping.

There was something new in Resnais's and Rossif's movies. They were keen on editing their own images and underlined the importance of

'montage', which is not a mere linking of pictures but an association of correlated images. In the second epoch of French documentaries, the difference between critical films and formal films, with regard to investigating the nature and function of the cinematic language, was less and less visible.

Resnais's Les statues meurent aussi/Statues also Die (1951) wanted to make spectators think about their relationship with images but also to criticize the presence of African statues in French museums. The film opened with a pan shot of visitors looking at a museum showcase: 'Are you sure that African objects do not observe you like strange animals?' Such mixing of upsetting queries was stronger in the works of Chris Marker (born in 1921). His Lettre de Sibérie/Letter from Siberia (1957) invited viewers to become aware of the deceptive influence of commentaries by showing the same visual footage three separate times with three different soundtracks: one full of enthusiasm for the Soviet achievements, one strongly disapproving, and one purely factual. His Le Joli Mai/The Lovely May (1963) attempted to deal with happiness in a France emerging from the Algerian war. A few people gave their opinion about that idea as in any banal public opinion poll, but once the viewer is confronted with violent, appalling, or thought-provoking images and challenged by other interviews, such answers looked vague and irrelevant. Ingenious and amusing, the film brought to the fore a gap between individuals' simple desires of happiness and the larger problems surrounding them. At the same time it expressed doubts about the reliability of documentaries; the way of organizing one's images can radically transform a message.

Marker's works were often given as examples of 'cinéma vérité', or 'film truth'. This strange expression did not mean that cinema must copy life. On the contrary, it signified that truth, being never directly accessible, must be transcribed to become apparent. Any cinematic operation—framing, moving the camera, editing—is a manipulation. It is the filmmaker's duty to make spectators apprehend the manipulations and understand that what they see is partial and biased. Cinéma vérité was no more than a slogan, but most directors mentioned in this section, without forming a group, let alone a school, were convinced that they had to introduce in their films a flux of meanings and forms.

Audiences were sometimes disconcerted but never repelled. The success of documentaries in the 1950s and 1960s resulted, to a large extent, from their ability to raise challenging questions.

With the end of the state monopoly on television (1982), the number of networks increased dramatically. All channels needed factual films to include in their schedules, and some even specialized in the broadcasting of documentaries. The availability of light cameras gave political and professional organizations an incentive to produce and circulate their own documentaries. Industrial and financial corporations anxious to diversify their clientele sponsored informative movies. Filmmakers were offered several opportunities to make shorts, but these proposals, coming mostly from private companies, modified the conception and structure of documentaries. Television channels wanted the films to fit either cinema or television; they provided little money and instructed their technicians to work as fast as possible and to leave space for advertisements.

In the wake of the 1968 student revolt and factory occupations, films were considered weapons for the class struggle. Cooperatives such as Slon and Cinélutte and Dziga Vertov Group, developed a 'counter-cinema' informed by revolutionary ideologies. A few contended that by giving the most destitute the power of speech, cinema would disclose the misery of the human condition under capitalism. Militant filmmakers went to factories to ask the workers to depict their problems and demands. One of the most famous 'ciné-tract' ('cinematic pamphlet') was La rentrée des usines Wonder/The Reopening of the Wonder Factories (1968). Following a big strike a female worker does not want to return to work. In front of the factory her co-workers, the foreman, and unionists try to persuade her that the main objectives of the walk-out have been achieved. In only ten minutes and one take, this short summarizes the worker-management-union relationship in May–June 1968. The method looked so convincing that it was used by Jean-Luc Godard, already well known as a major exponent of the New Wave. In Vent d'Est/Wind from the East (1970) and Louison (1976), Godard let an individual speak at length with few cuts and no editing.

A question soon arose: Is it possible for people urged to talk in front of a camera to avoid perpetuating stereotypes? The interviewees seemed to play their role to perfection and said what they were expected to say, making the film look like a fiction. Most directors preferred 'cinéma d'intervention', a cinema that is part of an event; it does not observe it from without but intervenes and takes part in it. Marker led the way by filming a strike at the Rhodiaceta factory in A bientôt j'espère/See You Soon, I Hope (1968). Among the numerous 'intervention films' that followed, a few deserve mention. During the 1972 strike at the Penaroya factory in Lyons Penaroya, a short denouncing scandalous labour conditions, had such an impact on public opinion that the management gave in, provided that the film was no longer distributed. Other movies made by workers under the direction of a professional popularized social conflicts in Besançon (Puisqu'on vous dit que c'est possible/As you are told that it is possible, 1974) and Sochaux (Le lion, sa cage et ses ailes/The Lion, its Cage and its Wings, 1976). The economic crisis of the mid-1970s put an end to mass demonstrations and strikes. The last militant film, Lorraine coeur d'acier/Lorraine Steel Heart (1981) showed how internal dissension ruined a radio station founded by steel workers. Critical films abandoned the subject of social unrest to focus on more general concerns such as politics, education, and health.

Documentaries played a crucial part in staining politicians' reputation. Seen in retrospect, the evolution is striking. Jean-Louis Comolli's Les deux Marseillaises/The Two Marseillaises (1969) presented the June 1968 election in the light of an ideological confrontation between Gaullism and the left. Raymond Depardon's 1974, En campagne avec Giscard/1974, On the Campaign Trail with Giscard disclosed the mechanisms of a presidential election but showed much respect for President Giscard. Portraying the March 1986 election that marked the defeat of the left, Serge Moati's Chroniques de mars/Chronicles of March (1987) proved extremely ironic. Spectators could only laugh at the outgoing socialist minister's joking unnaturally and singing the Marseillaise nervously. Claude Otzenberger's La conquête de Clichy/The Conquest of Clichy (1994) was so devastating that public television postponed its broadcast for three years. In it a cynical manipulator manifested that he had no political beliefs and was only interested in winning a seat in an affluent constituency.

Political scepticism led to historical revisionism regarding the most dramatic periods of the twentieth century, the German occupation and the Algerian war. The Gaullist myth that all France had supported the Resistance was shaken by Marcel Ophüls's Le chagrin et la pitié/The Sorrow and the Pity (1971). Some believe that the film was censored. In fact, the commercial company that had produced it offered it to public television, which did not respond. It was first screened in movie theatres and broadcast in 1981. Previously historical films were compilations with a well-structured commentary. Mixing archival material and provocative interviews, Ophüls adopted a colloquial, dispassionate tone. Evoking, for instance, the German invasion, the film showed French and German audiences watching the May 1940 newsreels in 1970. The former were grief-stricken by images that they had tried to forget; the latter were satisfied but embarrassed to manifest their contentment in front of the French. Confronted with traces of their past, individuals acknowledged that for most, the main preoccupation had been to survive, not to fight. 'Official' Resistance, either Gaullist or communist, had shadowed other forms of struggle. Mosco's Terroristes à la retraite/Retired Terrorists (1983) explained how foreigners working in France, who were forced to go underground, increased the bomb attacks against the Germans but who were never called 'patriots'.

The most impressive documentary about the war was a six-hour film, Claude Lanzman's Shoah (1985). In their works on the mass murder of Jews, Resnais and Rossif had used old pictures and testimonies. Lanzman objected that such documents, taken either by the Germans or by the Allies at the end of the war, could not recreate the reality of the death camps. In his view all that had survived was the memory of both victims and executioners. Most did not want to remember, but they would soon die and it was urgent to make them talk. Taking witnesses to the former camps, now empty, plaguing them with questions, the filmmaker provoked painful reactions. People, often on the verge of crying, related what they had endured or seen. Such remembrance was not triggered by an historical account of the Nazi policy; it was stimulated by impressions coming back from the past, a walk in the forest where the prisoners worked, a song heard in the camp, an object that belonged to a companion in suffering. It was not the representation of torture and death but the unbearable sorrow of those who had remained alive that obliged spectators to feel sorrow for the annihilation of European Jews.

Documentaries on the Algerian war underwent a similar evolution. Yves Courrière's La guerre d'Algérie (1972) was a chronological account of the main events illustrated by well-chosen archival pictures. Using testimonies of fifty-year-old men mobilized during the conflict, Bertrand Tavernier's La guerre sans nom/The Nameless War (1991) exposed the doubts of a generation involved in dangerous, often brutal, and eventually ineffective operations. It was only in 2002 that Patrick Rotman's L'ennemi intime/The Close Enemy confronted Algerians and Frenchmen, posed harrowing, contentious questions such as the recourse to torture in both camps, underlined the abdication of French authorities, and attempted to evaluate the impact of the war on both countries.

The Close Enemy was broadcast to celebrate the fortieth anniversary of Algerian independence. Documentaries in the last decades of the twentieth century were often shot on the occasion of important events or to meet some general concern. While Parliament was debating abortion rights, Charles Belmont's Histoire d'A/A's Story (1973), following an anonymous person, A, disclosed the complication and dangers of illegal abortion, thereby elaborating a real dialectic of responsibility between those involved in the enforcement of a prohibitive law. For more than a decade, feminism and birth control education became ubiquitous topics. Contrasting the lives and concerns of eight women, Coline Serreau's Mais qu'est-ce qu'elles veulent?/What Do They Want? (1978) summarized the changes occurring in women's lives. In Alertez les bébés/Alert Babies (1978) and Votre enfant m'intéresse/I Am Interested in Your Child (1981), Jean-Michel Carré dealt with medical care in delivery and with primary education. Exploring the foods that make up a meal, Luc Moulet's Genèse d'un repas/Genesis of a Meal (1978) expanded on food hygiene and on the changes that take place from the producer to the consumer.

Owing to the continuing economic crisis, new anxieties surfaced in the 1990s that affected mainstream documentaries. Immigration, unemployment, mixed blood, and fear of downward mobility appeared daily on television. Continuing a tradition already present in other eras, Denis Gheerbrandt explored Marseilles' periphery in Et la vie/Life Also (1991), but instead of lingering on abandoned industrial areas and impoverished houses, he concentrated on faces. People's behaviour, their willingness or their reluctance to talk, revealed social attitudes and reactions to a depressing situation.

Filmmakers focused less on misery than on another deep preoccupation of the late twentieth century: police and policing. After spending two months in a police station where he had filmed overtly, without trying to conceal either his presence or his possible influence on questioning, Raymond Depardon produced Délits flagrants/Caught Red-handed (1994). Ignoring the spoils, fights, or aggression that had caused the arrests, he attempted to recreate the nocturnal atmosphere of the station and to interpret the relationship, half-hostile, half-conning, that developed between the police and the offenders. In the same way, Renaud Victor's De jour comme de nuit/Day and Night (1991), the result of several months spent in the prison of Beaumettes in Marseilles, focused neither on the prisoners nor on their vision of punishment, but rather on the tricks they use to survive without prospects for the future.

Many documentaries released between 1980 and 2000 were mere series of talking heads. The best tried to go beyond appearances and to suggest something that was not said but that was conveyed only visually. Yet most filmmakers were anxious to find a fashionable, up-to-date topic likely to seduce a producer and then to attract a large audience.

Once screened or broadcast, their works were left for tomorrow's historians to reedit in historical programmes. What was almost totally lost was the formalist inheritance. Not surprisingly, only well-known directors could find the funds to shoot documentaries dealing with the cinematic language itself, not with modish objects or events. Wandering through Marseilles, René Allio contrived in L'heure exquise/The Delightful Hour (1981) an unlikely but possible city where past and present mingle harmoniously. Strolling around Los Angeles, Agnès Varda photographed hundreds of advertisements. Her Murs, murs/Walls, Walls (1981) was a curious, often disturbing succession of lines, shapes, and colours linked by visual similarities. Varda also closed the century with Les glaneurs et la glaneuse/The Gleaners and the She-gleaner (2000). Gleaners were often represented in late nineteenth century paintings as emblems of rural France. Varda used the figure of the gleaner to denounce archaisms in contemporary France but also to mock the modern tendency to buy short-lived consumer goods. Change occurs so fast that no time has been left for gleaning.

Varda's film could be taken as a symbol of the fate of French documentaries. During the first decades of cinema, the public paid little attention to informative movies. They were considered mere documents to be picked up when necessary and then discarded; audiences used to 'glean' them. The 1950s and 1960s were the heyday of cinema. Being interested in all sorts of pictures, spectators stopped despising documentaries. Instead of 'gleaning' they began to take these works seriously. With the expansion of television at the end of the twentieth century, the supply of factual programmes boomed. Audiences saw documentaries daily but seldom noticed them; the wealth of information made 'gleaning' useless.

Franju, Georges

In the films of Georges Franju, the line between documentary and fiction, never all that clear in any case, seems continually on the verge of dissolution. Although his career as a filmmaker is usually described as falling into two parts—‘the early period of documentary shorts, and a subsequent period of fictional features’ (Wood 1991)—the continuities between these two periods are more significant than the differences, and Franju himself, in his films as well as in interviews and other writings, undermined any straightforward opposition between artifice and reality.

For Franju, cinematic artifice is a device for making realities visible that we have not seen, or refuse to see: slaughterhouses secreted away on the outskirts of cities (Le Sang des bêtes/Blood of the Beasts), the desolation and pain hidden behind historical myths of national honour (Hôtel des Invalides), the invisible by-products of industrialization that destroy the workers (Les Poussières/The Dust Particles). These three are among the most clearly ‘documentary’ of Franju’s films and could even be said to belong to such familiar subgenres as the industrial short (Le Sang des bêtes, Les Poussières) or travelog (Hôtel des Invalides). However, what is one to make of the ‘surrealist overture’ (Vialle 1968) of Blood of the Beasts, with its young lovers in the midst of an antique bazaar in a featureless wasteland, or the horror film visual style and music of Hôtel des Invalides, or the ghostly shadow of the worker’s hand seen through a white porcelain plate in Les Poussières, which allegorically figures the silicosis in his lungs? According to Franju, ‘we strove in our film [Le Sang des bêtes] to give back to documentary reality its artificial appearance and to natural settings their look of stage sets’ (Leblanc 1992). More broadly, he argued that ‘Dreams, poetry, the fantastic must emerge from reality itself. Every film is a documentary, even the most poetic’ (Durgnat 1967). The claim is deliberately provocative, but Franju meant it literally. Of his own unquestionably fictional feature Thérèse Desqueyroux, adapted from the novel by François Mauriac, Franju asserted that ‘the film is a documentary about a character in a novel’ (Brown 1983).

Nevertheless, if he rejected any strict differentiation between documentary and fiction, Franju recognized that there was a practical distinction, and it is the short films of the first half of his career that have earned him a significant place in the history of documentary cinema, in part because they are unlike the works of anyone else. The distinctiveness of Franju’s documentaries is rooted in the specifics of his own intellectual and aesthetic development, which was far removed from the worlds of the university, journalism, politics, or colonialism, the preoccupations and professional discourses of which have determined many of the conventions of mainstream documentary film. Franju, born in 1912, belonged to that first generation of filmmakers whose sensibilities were shaped within and by the history of cinema itself, and although his own career as a director only began after World War II, in 1949, Franju’s greatest affinities were with the work of an earlier generation: the surrealism of Buñuel, the expressionism of Lang and Murnau, and the Popular Front-influenced poetic realism of Carné and Renoir.

Franju, born in Brittany, had a conventional provincial-religious education, which fostered his anarchism, atheism, and anti-clericalism. After leaving school he evidently went to Paris, for he later wrote that ‘at the age of fifteen, I educated myself in the Bois de Vincennes with the following readings: Fantômas, Freud, and the Marquis de Sade’ (Buache 1996). Fantômas was the ‘Master of Terror’ whose exploits are narrated in a thirty-two-volume serial by Souvestre and Allain. Franju later observed that ‘the enthralling power of the novels lies precisely in their sadistic invention, the teeming violence, the spectacularly extreme cruelty’ (Milne 1975). These qualities endeared Fantômas to the surrealists, and Franju explicitly evoked Fantômas in his last feature film, L’Homme sans visage/The Man without a Face. After military service in Algeria from 1928 to 1932, Franju returned to Paris to work as a theatre set decorator. During this period he met Henri Langlois, a fellow cinephile with whom he made an experimental short film, Le Métro (1934)—later disowned by Franju—and, more significantly, with whom he founded a film club (the Cercle du Cinéma, 1935), a film journal (Cinématographe, 1937), and, in 1937, a film archive, the Cinémathèque Française.

The Cinémathèque, of which Langlois remained director until his death in 1977, was among the first and most important film archives in the world, and Franju's founding role attests not only to his centrality to the emergence of film culture from the 1930s on, but also to the formative role of older styles of filmmaking in his own aesthetic development. The clearest instance of this is his fourth short film, Le Grand Méliès, a semi-fictional or reconstructed documentary on the career of the filmmaker-magician-toyshop proprietor Georges Méliès, inventor of such fantastic story-films as A Voyage to the Moon (1902). Franju reconstructs Méliès's workshop, revisiting, in effect, the origins of fiction film itself, and particularly of that strain of the fantastic that runs through much of Franju's own work. What is the periscope in Hôtel des Invalides, for example, in which the museum visitor can impossibly 'see' scenes of trench warfare from World War I, if not a magic projector such as Méliès himself might have devised?

If Le Grand Méliès is Franju's tribute to early cinema, it is also an elegy for the individual Méliès, for 'the vanished, pre-1914 world' (Durgnat 1967), even, in a sense, for cinema itself. In 1937 Franju and Langlois had come up with an idea for a film, Le Métro fantôme, to be based on a 'fantastic and poetic' script by Jacques Prévert (screenwriter for Renoir and Carné, and later for Franju's Mon chien/My Dog). They asked Méliès, who had been forced out of the movie business through bankruptcy twenty-five years earlier, to design the sets and special effects. Méliès declined, writing to Franju that he found the story 'funereal', but when Franju went to visit him some months later, he saw that Méliès had actually made sketches for sequences set in Père-Lachaise cemetery, and that he 'was looking forward merrily to animating [...] the funerary monuments of the well-known dead' (Brumagne 1977). However, Méliès, who had been in poor health, soon grew worse, and died a few weeks later; Franju and Langlois actually called the doctor who attended Méliès during his last days.

This personal connection between the two filmmakers is not presented in Le Grand Méliès, but it seems to underlie the film's elegiac mood. Opening with a series of shots of the home where Franju had visited Méliès just before his death, Franju's documentary ends with Méliès's widow emerging from a Métro station to take a bouquet of violets to her husband's grave in Père-Lachaise. One does not need to recognize the personal associations (Franju's visits, the Métro, Père-Lachaise) to grasp that Le Grand Méliès is a film of mourning, but the private iconography of grief is characteristic of Franju, who in both his short and feature-length films—as such critics as Wood, Durgnat, Milne, and Leblanc have demonstrated—returns again and again, almost obsessively, to certain images or motifs: dead landscapes, November skies, doves, the Paris Métro, windows, and World War I. His films, for all their black humor and 'elements of rage and protest' (Wood 1991), are filled with a sense of irretrievable loss. What Durgnat has called the archaism and nostalgia of Franju's work is the opposite of sentimental, however; he does not invoke the past as a golden age but as a repository of images charged with emotion. World War I, for example, recurs in Franju's films from Hôtel des Invalides through the features Judex (1963) and Thomas l'imposteur/Thomas the Imposter (1965), not because the years preceding it were necessarily happier but because for Franju, who had grown up in its wake, it stood, simply, as the clearest embodiment of all that's most terrible, in every period, about our civilization.

Similarly, Franju's affinity for the films of the 1920s and 1930s has little to do with critical evaluation or his own intentions as a filmmaker, but testifies to the indelibility of the impression they had made on him, being, as they were, the films of his movie-mad youth. In an essay on 'Realism and Surrealism', Franju wrote, 'I've often been asked whose films—as far as my own tastes are concerned, not as to any influence they might have had on me—are the most poetic of all, and I named Buñuel; the most beautiful works of horror, and I named Murnau; the most visually expressive, and I named Lang' (Vialle 1968). Franju's essay on 'The Style of Fritz Lang', which appeared in the first issue of his and Langlois's Cinématographe in 1937, was arguably the first critical analysis of a director's whole body of work in terms of visual style and mise-en-scène, and anticipated auteur criticism by almost twenty years. However, it is most important in terms of Franju's own career for what it reveals of his overriding interest in the image, rather than in narrative or ideas in the abstract. 'I can retell the stories of movies that have bored me', Franju stated in an interview; 'of those that have captivated me, I retain images without stories' (Brumagne 1977).

Franju's own films are nothing like those of Lang, Murnau, Buñuel, or Méliès; what he developed through immersion in their work was a way of seeing, a sensitivity to the poetic density and concentration of certain images. These might be images constructed in a studio—Franju had watched Renoir and Carné at work during the filming of, respectively, Règles du jeu/Rules of the Game and Point du jour/Daybreak—but equally they could be documentary images. In the same essay in which he invoked Lang, Murnau, and Buñuel, Franju ended with a rhapsodic account of a medical documentary: Dr Thierry de Martel's Trépanation pour une crise d'épilepsie, which recorded a particularly gruesome procedure of brain surgery. 'That was an authentic horror film', Franju later recalled; 'twenty people were out flat, I've never seen anything so drastic. It was an atrocious film, but a beautiful and poetic one, because it was also realistic' (Durgnat 1967). Franju would never go so far in his own work, even in showing, for instance, the slaughterhouses of Blood of the Beasts, not out of timidity, but to keep us just this side of being knocked 'out flat', which would excuse us from seeing.

Not long after the founding of the Cinémathèque, Franju and Langlois went their separate ways. In 1938 Franju became executive secretary of the International Federation of Film Archives and, in 1945, secretary general of the Institute of Scientific Cinematography, directed by Jean Painlevé. In 1946, together with his wife, Dominique Johansen, Franju founded the Académie du Cinéma. This immersion in the films of others, especially from the domains of scientific, avant-garde, and early cinema, meant that Franju's aesthetic was fully formed before he wrote and directed his first film, Le Sang des bêtes/Blood of the Beasts, in 1949. There was no period of apprenticeship, but also, as Robin Wood has noted, no real development in Franju's own approach, even when he shifted from documentaries to fiction, and from short films to features, in 1958 (Wood 1973). In his many interviews Franju never expressed any interest in films made after his debut, other than his own—a symptom not of self-regard or an old-fashioned aesthetic (he worked with such modernist writers as Jean Genet and Marguerite Duras), but of a need to preserve a certain creative isolation, and an indifference to both controversy and fashion.

The consistency of Franju's work results in part from some sustained collaborations with the assistant director Michel Worms, the composer

Maurice Jarre, and the cinematographer Marcel Fradet. Fradet had worked on Carl Dreyer's Vampyr in 1932, and his elegantly composed medium and long shots, unhurried camera movements, and mastery of the full tonal range of greys available on black-and-white film gave Franju's works their singular atmosphere, what he himself called their 'sense of baleful, ceremonial ritual' (Milne 1975). There is an inexorable quality to the unfolding of Franju's films, and an apprehension of mortality, even when the subject matter seems banal: travelogues on Notre Dame or the Lorraine province, for example (Notre-Dame, cathédrale de Paris; En passant par la Lorraine), or an instructional film on the wearing of safety masks (Les Poussières). The films' mood of dread is linked to certain recurrent themes: hellish factories (the slaughterhouses of Blood of the Beasts, the steel mills of En passant par la Lorraine, the porcelain works of Les Poussières), dead faiths (Catholicism in Notre-Dame, military glory in Hôtel des Invalides), and the propensity for violence and cruelty barely concealed by the veneer of conventionality.

Franju's method in his documentaries is to strip objects of their familiar associations. As Durgnat writes, 'he removes the ordinary to reveal the tragic'. However, such stripping away of the visible surface is itself a form of artifice, no less than the cinematic and theatrical illusionism that Franju celebrates in his films on Méliès and the Théâtre Nationale Populaire (TNP). The filmmaker does not just turn on the camera and wait for reality to appear; instead, as he told G.R. Levin, 'you must re-create reality because reality runs away [...] you illuminate the subject, go beyond the subject—and that's documentary'.

Frantz Fanon: Black Skin, White Mask

(UK, Julien, 1996)

Isaac Julien's 1996 documentary, Frantz Fanon: Black Skin, White Mask, explores the life of West Indian psychoanalyst Frantz Fanon, a key theorist in the decolonization movement of the 1960s. The documentary investigates the significance, as well as the more problematic aspects of Fanon's writings and especially of his most influential book, An Essay for the Dis-alienation of Blacks, later called Black Skin, White Masks. Published in 1952, the book was a milestone insofar as it provided the first study of the psychological impact of racism on colonized and colonizer and of the more sexualized aspects of racism.

Frantz Fanon was born in 1925 in French-ruled Martinique. Brought up within an assimilationist environment, he fought for France in World War II and later studied medicine in France, specializing in psychiatry. In 1953 he was appointed head of the psychiatric department of the government hospital in Algeria, where he arrived to find the non-French patients kept in appalling conditions. Drawn into Algeria's struggle for independence and increasingly demoralized by his work with victims of both sides of the violence, Fanon eventually dedicated his time fully to the Algerian uprising against France. In 1960 he became ambassador to Ghana for the Algerian provisional government. In the following year he published his second book, The Wretched of the Earth, which concludes with the necessity of armed struggle to break the ties of dependency between colonizer and colonized. Fanon died of leukaemia in the United States in 1961.

One of the most significant features of Isaac Julien's documentary, Frantz Fanon: Black Skin, White Mask, is its remarkable mixture of fictional and nonfictional material. Julien draws as much on excerpts from fictional material, such as staged imagery, films, and dramatic recreations of Fanon's life, as he does on classic documentary material, such as interviews and contemporary and historical footage.

The opening scenes introduce the usage of fictional material. In the first shot the camera passes through two wooden window shutters and out onto a yard, and is accompanied by the beautiful singing of a female opera voice. The next scene shows the shadow of a man in a cell, and a male voice-over is heard nervously uttering words in Arabic. The subsequent frame discloses the frightened, sweating face of an imprisoned man. Suggestively staged scenes such as these help situate the documentary contextually, but they also set an unsettling tone, mixing anguish and reflection, that continues throughout the film.

Later, such scenes, explicitly fictional, as signaled by the lighting, staging, and camera angles, combine with so-called tableau vivants, painterly staged scenes, that depict Fanon's life. Remarkably, not a single still or moving image of the historical Fanon is used. Instead, largely as a result of the lack of historical film footage of Fanon, the film reconstructs scenes from Fanon's life. Some of these scenes center on the more problematical aspects of Fanon's thinking, such as his support of the Algerian woman's veil as a means to support the rebellion (an argument welcomed by the Algerian conservatives) and also his denial of the existence of homosexuality in Martinique. In one dramatic mixing of archival material and staged imagery, the images of French war photographer Marc Garanger are projected onto veiled Algerian women; in a similarly staged scene, we see Fanon in the foreground and two men kissing in the background who turn their heads to look at Fanon as if in challenge.

The film moves effortlessly, and at times indistinctively, between historical and fictional material. A brief scene from Gillo Pontecorvo's La Battaglia di Algeri/The Battle of Algiers (1965) mixes black-and-white and color archival and contemporary footage of Martinique, Algeria, and the Algerian War of Independence to recreate the historical background of Fanon's work. The more conventional documentary material consists of interviews with Fanon's family and friends, contemporaries, and critics of Fanon, who describe his complexities and contradictions.

The collage style of Black Skin, White Mask continues on the level of language, sound, and music. The film features English, French, and Arabic, as well as different music genres—classical opera music, jazz tunes, and drums. This constant juxtapositioning of different elements produces a Brechtian alienation effect, one likely to reinforce the audience's act of intellectual participation with the subject matter.

The British actor Colin Salmon, who plays Fanon, recites excerpts from Fanon's writings throughout the film. His highly stylized, demonstrative performance is accompanied by uncanny, high-contrast, chiaroscuro lighting from below, which gives Fanon an isolated position within the frame.

British filmmaker Isaac Julien, who was short-listed for the Turner Prize in 2001, has long been concerned with questions of race and gender and their importance within the politics of looking. He takes up these themes on multiple occasions in the film. In one scene, Julien reconstructs one of Fanon's epiphanies: his encounter with a little girl on the streets of Paris. The girl, seeing Fanon, exclaims: 'Look, a Negro! Look, a Negro! Look, a Negro! Mum, look at the Negro, I'm frightened!' The scene, in the film recounted, not staged, by Colin Salmon, triggered in Fanon a close examination of his blackness and his self-image in which he recognized the workings of an unequal, colonial relationship: Black Skin, White Mask.

Throughout, this multilayered film does not simply eulogize Fanon but examines the complexity of the historical figure and of the themes with which he dealt. Tensions between his thinking and his actions are emphasized throughout, and highlighted particularly through a series of candid interviews. Hence, Fanon's explanation for why black women fall in love with white men is implicitly critiqued in the interviews through references to Fanon's failure to examine the implications of his logic for his own decision to marry a white woman.

Frantz Fanon: Black Skin, White Mask responds to a recent rediscovery of Fanon's social and psychological theories by psychologists and critical thinkers. The skillful fusion of fictional with nonfictional material creates a stimulating and informative work of art full of intertextual references. Fanon becomes the ghostlike narrator of his own life and his urgent and direct addresses of the camera transport his ideas and their relevance directly into the present. In the final image of the film, the fictional Frantz Fanon looks straight into the camera, presenting an undeviating gaze that challenges the viewer to grapple with the themes that the historical Fanon raised more than a half century ago and that are still unresolved today.

Freyer, Ellen

Ellen Freyer, an independent producer of award-winning family films, has also produced and directed three documentary films that address social and political issues affecting women and children. Girls' Sports: On the Right Track (1975) and Marathon Woman: Miki Gorman (1980) concern changing attitudes and opportunities for women in sports, and The Splendors of Terror (2003) reveals the culture of hatred and violence that is being taught to children in the West Bank and Gaza.

Girls' Sports: On the Right Track dispels myths and explores new opportunities in girls' sports as a result of Title IX. The seventeen-minute educational film, which includes archival footage of track stars 'Babe' Didricksen and Wilma Rudolph, provides a short history of track and field, and contrasts the limited experiences of Didricksen and Rudolph with the expanded opportunities available to three contemporary high school girls. Marathon Woman: Miki Gorman, which premiered at the Lincoln Center Film Festival in New York, is an award-winning, twenty-minute film that profiles a champion Japanese/American marathon runner whose tiny size did not deter her ambition. The film was broadcast on PBS and distributed internationally. The Splendors of Terror is a fourteen-minute program that includes footage produced by the Palestinian Authority and broadcast on Palestinian television that has never been broadcast in the United States. It shows generations of Arab children being educated to hate and kill (even themselves) in order to murder Jews.

Freyer's fiction films, The Whipping Boy (1994), The Secret Garden (1995), The Summer of the Monkeys (1998), and Anatole (1998), have all been based on award-winning children's books. The Whipping Boy, winner of the National Education and Cable Ace awards, was based on the Newberry Award-winning children's novel by Sid Fleischman. Produced for the Disney Channel and starring George C. Scott, the film follows the adventures of an orphaned street urchin who supports himself and his sister as a 'rat catcher' until he is suddenly kidnapped to become the 'whipping boy' for a spoiled, rich prince. The Secret Garden is an animated musical version of Frances Hodgson Burnett's classic children's story. Produced for ABC and distributed by Paramount Home Video, the film stars the voices of Sir Derek Jacobi, Honor Blackman, and Glynis Johns, and was a Humanitas Award finalist. Summer of the Monkeys, based on the novel by Wilson Rawls (the author of the children's classic Where the Red Fern Grows), is a coming-of-age drama. Set on the western plains in the 1880s, it follows the adventures of a young boy who dreams of getting enough money to buy his own horse. Produced in Canada and distributed by Walt Disney, the film, which stars Michael Ontkean and Wilford Brimley, won the National Education Award, the Best of Festival at the Children's Film at the Breckeridge Festival, the Crystal Heart Award at the Heartland Film Festival, and the Audience Award, Best Feature Drama, at the Marco Island Film Festival. Anatole, an animated series about the adventures of a French mouse who is a 'cheese taster', his wife, and their three sets of twins, was based on the Caldecott-winning children's books written by Eve Titus and illustrated by Paul Galdone. The series was produced in Canada and was broadcast internationally, in the United States on CBS.

Before working as an independent producer Freyer was a television production executive and part of the original PBS team that created Wonderworks, a weekly family movie series. Produced for a PBS consortium under the leadership of WQED Pittsburgh, Wonderworks was described by TV Guide as the 'Best Family Drama Series', and by the TV Critics' Association as the 'Best Children's Programming'. From 1984 to 1992 Freyer supervised development, initiated and packaged programs from domestic and foreign producers, and traveled in the United States and abroad to supervise various productions. Included among the fifty productions that won an aggregate of one hundred and twenty-five awards were the international coproductions of The Little Princess and The Lion, the Witch and the Wardrobe (UK), both three-hour mini-series based on the classic children's books; The Haunting (NZ), based on the award-winning book by Margaret Mahey; and Clowning Around (AU), an original mini-series produced in Perth, Australia. The domestic productions that Freyer developed and supervised were Jacob Have I Loved, starring Bridget Fonda; Sweet 15, starring Tony Plana, Jenny Gago, and Jerry Stiller; and Necessary Parties, starring Alan Arkin, Julie Hagerty, and Mark Paul Gosselaar. The most well-known and -loved production that Freyer supervised was the four-hour Canadian coproduction of Anne of Green Gables. Directed by Kevin Sullivan and starring Megan Follows, Colleen Dewhurst, and Richard Farnsworth, the program won more than fifteen awards including the Peabody, Emmy, and Prix Jeunesse.

Freyer has written numerous articles and reviews about experimental, documentary, and children's films. She has been awarded grants from the National Endowment for the Humanities, the NYS Council on the Arts, the NY Foundation for the Arts, the Women's Fund-Joint Foundation Support, the Hoso Bunka Foundation (Japan), and Mitsubishi International.

Freyer's projects have included films based on Karen Cushman's Newberry Award-winning young adult book Catherine, Called Birdy, and Mrs Piggie Wiggle, based on Betty McDonald's classic children's book series.

G

Galan, Hector

Hector Galan is a prolific independent filmmaker, notable for his insightful and comprehensive documentation of the Latino experience in America. He has produced and directed more than thirty documentaries, most under the banner of the Austin, Texas-based Galan Productions Inc. Galan founded the company in 1984, in large part to fill a void in media representation of Mexican American culture, politics, and history. Since then Galan has won numerous national and international awards for exploring such diverse topics as illegal immigration, race relations in the military, HIV/AIDS prevention, college athletics, and women in ranching culture. His productions appear regularly on national PBS television. He has produced or directed eleven episodes of the provocative Frontline series, as well as two programs for the acclaimed The American Experience series. Galan's seminal four-part series, Chicano! History of the Mexican American Civil Rights Movement, was screened at the White House for President Bill Clinton. In 1998 a retrospective of his work was shown at the Smithsonian.

Taken as a whole, Galan's substantial body of work represents a compelling and multifaceted visual record of the Latino experience in America.

Mexican American himself, Galan must be noted as one of a growing number of indigenous filmmakers who are using media to recover and reappropriate images and ethnic identities across diverse mediascapes. Yet Galan is unique among indigenous filmmakers for two important reasons: his productions achieve a thoughtful, objective distance despite the intimacy he shares with his subjects; and national public television has offered his productions a relatively large, mainstream audience. This is a credit to Galan, whose task is particularly challenging, for his films are made both for and about his audiences, for insiders and outsiders. They intend to both salvage and incite, to reflect and to inform. Yet, in speaking to different audiences with different needs, Galan's films rarely presume too much or too little. Instead, they achieve a delicate balance that faithfully serves both audiences with equal effect.

Galan's style reflects his tendency to produce for public television. His work is understated, balanced, thoughtful, informative, and objective, even though much of it borders on the controversial or macabre. He regularly relies on archival footage, photography, and voice-over narration to complement original footage and interviews. When he has opted for vérité, as in his acclaimed production on border shantytowns, Las Colonias, his films still retain an unlikely reticence and stoicism. This subtlety is intentional. It serves his overarching goal—'to bring stories to the public that were not being told'—and modest ambition—'that a television show isn't going to change the world, but it can give you a glimpse, an insider's glimpse, that is very important'. These reticent, unyielding 'glimpses' into forgotten Latino worlds have established Galan as an important documentarian and an invaluable advocate, historian, spokesperson, and ethnographer for the Mexican American community en masse.

Many of Galan's productions have explored some of the most desperate places in contemporary American society. Examples include maximum-security prisons, shantytowns, copper mines, the foster care system, illegal immigration, life on the Mexican-American border, racism, HIV/AIDS infection, and the agrarian industrial complex and drug addiction. Galan has called these productions studies of the 'invisible', those communities whose worlds have been disenfranchised by political and cultural systems beyond their control and whose plight has been swept beneath the carpet of national attention. Frontline's Shakedown in Santa Fe is an excellent example. The documentary examines the conditions of a New Mexico maximum security penitentiary eight years after one of the most violent riots in American penal history. Twelve prison guards were beaten, stabbed, and raped, and dozens of inmates were tortured to death by their peers. Despite its wretched details and violent imagery, the documentary is delivered with a sobriety that lacks moral judgment or sentimentality. By developing complex characters, exploring the culture of prison life, initiating questions about the criminal justice system, and inviting abstract questioning regarding the nature of punishment and reconciliation, Galan creates a multidimensional production that engages its audience on a variety of levels.

Galan is as equally concerned with making visible the many attributes of Latino culture and history as with exposing the inequalities and injustice that have plagued so much of the Mexican American population. Galan appears particularly enamored by Latino musical culture. Los Lonely Boys, Accordion Dreams, I Love My Freedom, I Love My Texas, Songs of the Homeland, and The Tejano Music Awards Selena Tribute document the production, distribution, and reception of contemporary Latino musical forms. Yet they also explore how tradition has shaped and affected current trends in artistic expression. This is not extraordinary for Galan who regularly favors historicity in his work. Accordion Dreams, Power, Politics and Latinos, La Mujer en el Rancho, and Vaquero: The Forgotten Cowboy trace ideas or subjects over time. Two of Galan's most renowned productions, The Hunt for Pancho Villa and Chicano! History of the Mexican-American Civil Rights Movement, are historical reconstructions. Galan's magnum opus (when it comes to explicating Latino ethnic heritage) is the six-part series Visiones: Latino Art and Culture. It provides a definitive visual history of Latino artistic achievement and includes theater, music, dance, and visual art, as well as its relations to history, ethnic identity, and social change. The series premiered in the fall of 2004 and took four years to complete.

The films of Hector Galan shed light on forgotten worlds rich in culture and history and beset by human suffering and degradation. They explore the systems and mechanisms of oppression and refuse to deny the resiliency of cultural tradition and the fact of individual complexity. They are remarkably sober and lacking in self-consciousness, less innovative, and original as they are thorough and comprehensive. They successfully appeal to a variety of audiences as evidenced by their success on national PBS television. With Latino populations in the United States ballooning at unprecedented rates, Galan's body of work as a documentarian of the Latino experience in America will undoubtedly prove to be an important resource.

Gardner, Robert

The films of Robert Gardner represent the conjunction of science and art. Gardner has said he would choose a large measure of Tarkovsky in making up an ideal cinematic genetic inheritance for himself. We should remember that Tarkovsky argues strenuously in his manifesto, Sculpting in Time, for film as a means to knowledge. All the art and technique of film is to be brought to bear for the sake of understanding the world, as only film can understand it, and to convey understanding to audiences.

Trained as an anthropologist, Gardner has made his largest and best-known films about Native Americans, New Guineans, and African peoples living very traditional ways of life, or about an India where people withdraw, as it seems, from the country's modernity to focus attention on and to live out traditional rituals or life processes. A smaller body of films looks at artists at work: painters Mark Tobey and Sean Scully, printmaker Michael Mazur, filmmaker Miklós Jancsó, all notably resembling the many craftsmen seen at work in the films about traditional cultures. In all these films there is a deliberate shooting style that probes for meaning, alert to the symbolic and the coincidental, and a deliberate sound and image editing that draws attention to certain things, makes connections, and fashions small stories within the larger study.

In most cases there is a reflective, even poetic, voice-over commentary. Gardner seeks understanding and calls on all of film's creative powers to engage with the world, to render complex experience, and to move viewers in more than rational ways.

At the beginning of his first film, Blunden Harbor (1951), made using footage shot by William Heick and Pierre Jaquemin, the camera moves on a boat across a forested bay on the coast of Vancouver Island. A voice-over relates the story of how the Kwakiutls original godlike chief came here to establish a home, 'become a real man', and begin the way of life of these people that we observe throughout the twenty-minute film. The film approaches its subject; the first few shots take us naturally from the water to the dwellings and workplaces of the people who live along its edge and draw food from it. In the movement of the camera and in our awareness of its uncanny power to find out and to create, we sense something like the coming of the god. In the beautiful black-and-white images of the water surface reflecting various light and the surrounding forest, we have a figure for the realm of imagination and the numinous, so important to these people's life and way of understanding themselves. In the water surface we have even a figure for the film screen and the power of the medium of film. Film converges with the larger imagination here. Blunden Harbour goes on from its opening to give many images of people at work, focusing, characteristically of Gardner, on hands and their activity, as if the hand needs discovery and attention, or matters more, or means more, than the face. Also characteristic of Gardner is the voice-over's reminder, midway through the film, of the fact of death, the great counterforce to all the life and work and use of imagination that we see. The film draws to a close accumulating images and sounds of mask-making and then ceremonial dancing, as if, on the part of the filmmaker as well as the Kwakiutl themselves, to fight off oblivion.

After Mark Tobey (1952) and collaborative work with John Marshall on The Hunters (1957), Gardner made his best-known and most discussed film, Dead Birds (1963). This contemplation of the warring Dani of central New Guinea stands as the first of four major feature-length studies of the human condition, followed by Rivers of Sand (1974) and Deep Hearts (1981), both shot in Africa, and then Forest of Bliss (1986), shot in India. These films function as a tetralogy of research and meditation, or a large-scale four-movement symphony, each film with its own mood and way of tapping into layers of subrational experience. Ika Hands (1988), about a vanishing priestly culture in the high mountains of Colombia, serves as a coda to all this.

Dead Birds is a film of grandeur, in color like all the subsequent Gardner films discussed here, with wide shots of the lush valley setting, large-scale battle sequences between enemy tribes, and a homeric alternation of direct war material with the civic and domestic life that backs up the war, proceeding always in war's shadow. Here Gardner focuses on the day-to-day concerns of a few individuals whom we get to know by name. The film presents the beauty of life, great expense of energy, romantic images of human endeavor fitting into the patterns of nature, while the voice-over speaks of the grim and absurd conditions under which the Dani live, committed to immemorial war, dominated by ghosts. Overall the film is very interested in these people and is hopeful and excited about life, despite the consciousness of death and of the cultural traps people fashion for themselves. Gardner's fast, tense spoken commentary, providing names and much detailed information, seems just a partial view of a larger and richer life the film senses and registers, but knows it cannot encompass. Like Blunden Harbor this film ends with ongoing chant and dance, a lyrical outpouring that seems to transcend its cause and definition, in this case at first a grief ceremony for an assassinated child, which then turns into celebration on the news of the death of an enemy.

Rivers of Sand, about the Hamar of southwestern Ethiopia, is Gardner's darkest film, and more than Dead Birds it stresses its own fragmentariness. Various means are used: a sparse voice-over commentary, a Hamar woman's recurrent address to the camera, shots of diverse and sometimes baffling activities of the Hamar, symbolism such as the dry riverbeds these people live among and look to with hope, or the perpetual grinding of sorghum that mirrors the grinding of women's spirits. The film has the feel of making one kind of attempt after another to look into a life that cannot be comprehended, in part because it is a forbidding horror. These beautifully formed and beautifully dressed people live a life of male oppression, vanity, and ineffectiveness, and female hard labor, whippings, decorative scarring where we see the blood flow, and cutting out of teeth to please the male eye. It is a world of hunger and thirst, hunger above all on the part of men and women to be liberated, and not daring to think of taking the first step. Yet through all of this, people maintain a perverse merriment.

Gardner's handheld camera moves restlessly over distances with people and domestic animals, seeking meaning, as if seeking escape. The camera's quieter attention is drawn, as always, to the work of hands, of women at work at home, or men casting the 'sandal oracle' to see how things will go with their ostrich hunt. The vistas are of dust and sand, the desolate background to these people's lives, or of an evening thunderstorm that seems to threaten destruction. With the film's editing, animals and their sounds, mostly cattle and goats, are made present, as if a chaotic animal nature is the energy feeding human life, or as if the animal world cries out at its mistreatment by humans (there is marked contrast with The Nuer, made collaboratively a few years earlier with Hilary Harris and George Breidenbach, where the cattle seem both loved and loving, and there is an ecstatic blurring of a gentle human nature with a gentle animal nature). The film's mood of social critique, focused in the conscious and explicit feminism of the woman who talks to the camera, resonates with much thinking worldwide in the later 1960s and the 1970s, but the sense of a disturbing mystery that cannot be fathomed is more like a Faulkner novel than a confident political analysis.

Working with experimental filmmaker Robert Fulton, Gardner made in Deep Hearts, his most lighthearted film, the scherzo of the sequence one might say. The subject is the annual male beauty contest of the nomadic Bororo Fulani of central Niger, in the southern Sahara (the same subject is taken up seven years later, after devastating changes in Bororo life, by Werner Herzog in Herdsmen of the Sun). The words 'deep hearts' suggest an Iago-like concealment of feeling, and we learn that the Bororo, in fact, value a deep heart and the hiding of desire and envy behind a sunny exterior. Further, Gardner's spoken commentary, even sparser here than in Rivers of Sand, refers to the hard life of the Bororo outside these few days of festival in the brief rainy season, while the images and sounds of the film give us a world of joy and good humor, a façade, it might seem.

The power of film seems to yield to, and to be taken over by, the preparation of make-up and coiffure and costumes, the lines of men dancing and singing for days, the spectators, the everyday chores of maintaining a camp for this special period. Slow motion, freeze frames, swish pans, and altered sound all help film and viewer to get into the spirit of this prolonged lyrical outpouring that sublimates who knows what harsh experience or compromised feeling. The film brings us right into a particular event, without much distance or perspective, and yet the film works virtually on an abstract level, making the point that a great gulf lies between festival and art on the one hand, and on the other the matter of life we know must be resting there, but that festival and art transmogrify or obscure. In this film we live for a time in the pure ecstatic world.

Deep Hearts is about men who dress and behave as women, with the aim that one of the men be chosen as exemplar by a woman, who may be acting at the behest of still other men. Central to the festival is a freeing of gender identity and the camera itself enters a zone of gender ambiguity, just as it lets go of the perspectives of psychological and sociological analysis. Midway through the film Gardner's voice-over tells us that the Bororo are worried about consumption by others' eyes, and this reference makes us think of the camera, because nothing else in the film evokes such worry; we do not see it in the interpersonal relations of the people on view. The issue of the camera is raised, and a few minutes later, still in the same sequence alternating views of performers and spectators, the camera identifies itself with a woman, in a striking prolonged shot where we see a watching woman in sharp focus in the foreground, and the performing men an out-of-focus blur in the background, their visibility, their existence, as if subject to the watching woman's whim. The camera in Deep Hearts lets go in many ways, and transforms the film's subject matter overall into a dreamlike experience, perhaps a woman's experience, for the sake of getting close to, of getting to know, a certain reality.

With a complete withdrawal of voice-over commentary and subtitled translation of people's words, Forest of Bliss becomes a pure encounter of film's aural and visual sensitivities within a complex world, in this case Benares, India, and its business of care for the dying and disposal of the dead. Gardner has worked in India several times, collaborating on films about the perpetuation of ancient rituals: Altar of Fire (1976), Sons of Shiva (1985), and others. With Forest of Bliss, old and specifically Indian customs surrounding death come into play, but the film opens itself to something larger, the involvement of human activity in the metamorphoses and cycles of water and earth, feeding and excrement, wood and fire, light and dark, noise and silence. The film yields itself up to what is to be seen and heard in Benares, and to the suggestions everything makes of analogy to something else, human beings to scavenging dogs, marigolds, or the spirit vaguely sensed in kites, sails, and air. The film yields itself up, but at the same time the camera is probing and active, and the editing very deliberate, every cut seeming to start a new sentence. Some sounds are heightened, just as the camera finds visual close-ups in a larger perspective. One lives in the hospices and temples of Benares, in the lanes, along the ghats, and out on the broad Ganges. At times human faces and feeling, or the amazing funeral pyres, take over all consciousness. Yet one is aware throughout of an artist fashioning a film.

Gardner has always, and especially with Forest of Bliss, met with criticism from anthropologists who do not want to let go of words and rational understanding, and who look to film as properly a transparent medium to furnish illustration or proof for what words can comprehend. Gardner's work is impelled by belief in film as an unaccountable powerful force, which, if negotiated by an artist, will lead into areas of understanding that words cannot anticipate or be adequate to. The proof for any viewer is in the particular film, Forest of Bliss or another, opening oneself to it, reflecting, being willing to think in a new way.

In Ika Hands, Gardner confronts his way of doing things, and a race of people and way of life so strange and elusive as almost to defy filming; it is the filmmaker's ultimate interesting, important, difficult subject. The film begins with the image of Gardner talking with anthropologist Gerardo Reichel-Dolmatoff, whose writings have led Gardner to want to film the Ika. Thus these people begin as an idea for him, something on paper and imagined. Reichel-Dolmatoff's voice comes back again and again in the film, juxtaposed with what we see of the Ika and their high mountain world. Also, brief intertitles occur to name or explain actions. All of this comes to seem only a partial help to comprehend what is larger than our faculties.

The camera follows these aristocratic, long-haired, essentially pre-Colombian beings as they walk ridges, sing, meditate, and see visions; we seem to be in another time dimension, or not on this Earth. The many images of hands at work seem to want to ground the film, but there is a humanity or spirituality here widely distant from the hands, constantly seeming to take off and fly out of reach. The film takes us somewhere remarkable and makes us aware that we can never fully be there.

Biography

Born in Brookline, Massachusetts, November 5, 1925. Graduated from Harvard University in 1948. Taught history and made and produced films in the state of Washington and on Vancouver Island, 1949–52. Studied anthropology at the graduate level at Harvard, 1952–6. Established the Film Study Center at Harvard's Peabody Museum of Archaeology and Ethnology in 1956, which continues to the present as an independent entity at Harvard for research and film production. Led the Harvard research team to the Grand Valley of the Baliem in Netherlands, New Guinea, 1960–1, out of which grew Dead Birds (1963), which won the Flaherty Award and the Florence Film Festival Grand Prize and established Gardner's international reputation. Helped found Harvard's Carpenter Center for the Visual Arts in 1962, an exhibition space and teaching facility for the creative arts. Taught filmmaking and film study in Harvard's Visual and Environmental Studies Department, 1962–98. Inducted into the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, 1964. Co-authored Gardens of War with Karl Heider, 1969, about the Dani of West Irian, New Guinea. Hosted Screening Room, a Boston television series of interviews and screenings with documentary and experimental filmmakers, 1973–80. Won the Florence Film Festival Grand Prize for Forest of Bliss in 1985. Given retrospectives at the Film Forum Freiburg in 1989, the Oesterreichisches Filmmuseum in 1991, the Whitney Museum of American Art in 1992, Anthology Film Archives in 1995, the Zürich Völkerkunde Museum in 1997, and the Beeld voor Beeld Amsterdam in 1998.

Georgia O'Keeffe

(US, Miller, 1977)

Produced by WNET/THIRTEEN for the series Women in Art, Perry Miller Adato's portrait of the artist as an older woman was timed to coincide with the publication of the Viking Press edition of Georgia O'Keeffe's prints, selected by her and her assistant Juan Hamilton. Together, the film and the book relaunched O'Keeffe's career, turning her into a feminist icon of endurance, feistiness, and creativity. In the film, O'Keeffe wanders through her beloved New Mexico landscape dressed in her signature black chemise and long coat, her hair pulled severely off her face in a tight bun. She describes her life before coming to New Mexico, how she came to meet her husband Alfred Stieglitz, and how she became attached to the Southwest. Especially when she sits in her studio inspecting the negatives of the prints for the book, O'Keeffe's brief comments about her life and art resemble, almost verbatim, its text. Declaring simply, 'I tried to paint what I saw ... I can see shapes,' she explains her recurrent organic forms, her simple lines and bold colors.

Using the extensive archive of photographs made of O'Keeffe primarily by Stieglitz (she was known as the most photographed woman in the world) and pictures made by members of his circle, close-up scrutiny of the paintings, interviews with O'Keeffe, as well as commentary by leading art curators and critics Barbara Rose and Daniel Catton Rich, the film breaks no new ground cinematically. Its sixty-minute PBS format is designed to bring high culture into the living rooms of middle-brow America by emphasizing a one-to-one correspondence between objects or places and the paintings of them. Moreover, coming at a moment when feminism had been mainstreamed, and every woman was searching for foremothers who rebelled and excelled, O'Keeffe's insistence throughout the film that 'I've taken hold of anything I wanted' not only brought the artist and her art into every woman's home (a gesture repeated in the posters, calendars, and postcards hanging in college dormitories and gynecologists' offices), but offered an inspiring example of how to be a homey, independent, creative woman. O'Keeffe's ecstatic claims to landscape and space, 'When I got to New Mexico, that was mine,' provided viewers with a model of female desire to the territorial rights to one's vision, to ownership of one's desires. Later, she describes why she pursued her ten-year struggle to purchase her Abiquiu home from the Catholic Church: 'I thought that door [subject of many of her paintings] was something I had to have.'

Nothing in this film would suggest the strategic way in which O'Keeffe and Stieglitz crafted her career, or the fortuitous convergence of film and book, which seems serendipitous. However, O'Keeffe learned from Stieglitz how to market one's art and one's artistic self. Thus the picture of the spry, pixie-like O'Keeffe who just happens to have been 'lucky' masks a more complicated story of self-promotion. Barbara Rose comments that 'when Stieglitz married O'Keeffe, he not only married a woman, he married America'. This emphasis on O'Keeffe's American roots, from her birth in Sun Prairie, Wisconsin, to her early years in Texas and South Carolina, to the mistaken attribution of her name as 'Virginia' rather than 'Georgia' when Stieglitz hung her first show of charcoal drawings, to her final merger with the New Mexico landscape, is part of the original myth of O'Keeffe that this film and the book supposedly subverted through their candid revelations. In effect, the film is merely the most recent version of O'Keeffe's public persona, profiled in Life magazine in the 1930s and Time magazine in the 1940s. Early in the film, while telling about how her interest in bones led to her skull paintings, she mocks 'the great American everything' that obsessed her generation of playwrights, poets, and novelists. The stark white cow skull, suspended amid a field of blue, needed something to complete it; she shrewdly added two red stripes as borders, her sardonic commentary on the New York City men's lack of knowledge about the vastness of the country she had actually traversed and inhabited.

It is rare that film captures the full depths of paintings: usually the color is off, the texture invisible, the scale deceptive. O'Keeffe's paintings look exceptionally good in this documentary. In part, as she comments to Juan Hamilton apropos the prints for the book: 'It doesn't really matter if the color isn't absolutely right, if it feels right when you finish the print.' However, there is more to it. O'Keeffe's early training at the Art Institute of Chicago, barely glanced over except to say she was a gifted, prize-winning student there and at the Art Students League in New York, stressed magazine illustration and design. She was extremely aware, through her close working relationship with Stieglitz, of presentation. Her work reproduces well because of its monochromatic colors, its Dow-inspired properties to 'fill up space in a beautiful way', its rigorous lines, its recurrent shapes. Both she and her work were supremely suited to television: her wry, laconic affect, coupled with her determination to control the interview, disclosing only what she wants known, makes her an engaging, enigmatic figure. She appears to undo the legend surrounding her as she produces a new one for a new generation of fans. Her paintings repeat imagery with variations, much as television series depend on familiarity with a difference. As Rich comments, for O'Keeffe landscape and still life are essentially the same; they are exercises in the serial investigation of forms and color, not psychological examinations typical of portraiture.

In this, the 'portrait of an artist' made for the PBS series 'Women in Art', is also more of a study in comforting repetitive shapes, colors and forms—returning to a few key paintings, such as the New Mexico cross, the yellow and red pelvis, the red poppy, and a few melodic lines for flute—rather than a revelatory inspection of the woman. Despite the series' claims to 'interweave the artists' works and their lives', O'Keeffe manages to subvert the filmmaker's push to learn her inner workings. She remains as implacable as the 'dark place' she visits on foot and on canvas. By appearing to reveal herself—she speaks always in the first person, claiming over and over an identity: 'I was busy'—she weaves the myth of O'Keeffe that has lasted for decades. In this, O'Keeffe once again demonstrates her savvy understanding of the terms and procedures of the art market, disclosing only what she deems apt, undercutting any efforts by others to read themselves into her. As she remarks of the critics who read all sorts of sexual symbolism into her gigantic flowers: 'They were speaking of themselves, not me.'

German Democratic Republic

On May 17, 1946, the Soviet Military Administration (SMAD) handed a license over to German filmmakers for the production of new films. With it, the German Film Inc. (DEFA, Deutsche Film-Aktiengesellschaft) was created as the first German film enterprise after World War II. Four months earlier, in mid-January 1946, on behalf of 'DEFA in Formation', Kurt Maetzig had already begun shooting the newsreel Der Augenzeuge/The Eye-Witness. Its first edition consisted of ten copies that were released to Berlin cinemas on February 19. Two more sequels had appeared from March to July, before The Eye-Witness turned into the actual 'newsreel' in August 1946. This periodic film program continued until December 1980, when it was suspended.

During the course of its existence, DEFA produced five thousand two hundred documentaries and popular scientific films for the cinema, including The Eye-Witness and other periodic programs (for example, a monthly cultural newsreel and a monthly sports newsreel). In 1975 the former DEFA Studio for Newsreel and Documentary Films Berlin and DEFA Studio for Popular-Scientific Films Potsdam-Babelsberg merged and became DEFA Studio for Documentary Films. Here hundreds of commissioned films were produced for the German Democratic Republic (GDR) television until the end of the GDR. As in the case of feature films, DEFA almost had a monopoly in the production of documentary films in the GDR. Documentary productions from students of the German University for Cinematographic Art (later the University for Film and Television) Potsdam-Babelsberg, soon followed to the screen.

Besides the newsreel The Eye-Witness, the first original DEFA documentary film was also created in 1946. On behalf of the Kommunistische Partei Deutschlands (KPD, German Communist Party), Director Kurt Maetzig filmed the documentary Einheit SPD-KPD/SPD-KPD Unity (premiere, May 1, 1946), which to a large extent was an objective reportage about the unity of the two German labor parties, KPD and SPD, in the Soviet zone. The films Berlin im Aufbau/Berlin under Construction (director: Kurt Maetzig), Potsdam baut auf/The Rebuilding of Potsdam (director: Joop Huisken), Dresden (director: Richard Groschopp), and Halle/Halle (Director: Red Braun) appeared in the same year, showing the same objectivity and redeemed pathos. They chose the new beginning as the central theme, and at the same time they referred to the root of the destruction: German militarism and imperialism. Likewise in 1946, Richard Brandt directed the film Todeslager Sachsenhausen/Death Camp in Saxony about a concentration camp at the gates of Berlin.

The SED (Sozialistische Einheitspartei Deutschlands), other political parties, the Soviet Military Administration, the Metal Industrial Union, the Union of the Persecuted by the Nazi Regime (VVN, Vereinigung der Verfolgten des Naziregimes), and the Red Cross were among the early clients of DEFA's documentary films. Enterprises and authorities commissioned cinematographic documents. DEFA developed self-help reportages and productions about injured war homecomings, industrial safety, energy savings, and women's rights.

In 1948–9, after a period of relative freedom, the DEFA documentary films suffered from stronger political oppression. The cinema produced in the GDR, which was created in October 1949, had the main objective of convincing society to switch to socialism, thereby creating 'new individuals'. At the beginning of 1950 the SED's leaders took the decision of tying DEFA documentary film production closely to the party. From then on the SED guided and controlled the ideology. The SED demanded vehemently and exclusively the 'political documentary film' that supported their objectives. Besides short films, movie theaters presented feature-length film productions, whose main objective was to provide a chronicle of successes: Immer Bereit/Always Ready (1950) directed by Kurt Maetzig and Feodor Pappé, a reportage about the Free German Youth (FDJ, Freie Deutsche Jugend) meeting in Germany, and DEFA's first color documentary film, Der Weg nach oben/The Way Forward (1950) and Wilhelm Pieck—Das Leben unser Praesidenten/Our President's Life (1952) by director Andrew Thorndike. These films present neither doubts about the course of things nor questionable nuances of the social development in Soviet occupation zones and the GDR. They modeled German history and its current situation exclusively after the official propaganda format. The SED made sure that tickets were distributed throughout enterprises, schools, and institutions and that hundreds of thousands of spectators formed the impression that attending the film shows was a compulsory activity. The documentary film had become a political tool.

It was not until the mid-1950s, after Stalin's death and the institution of a 'new course', that the studio production became more polymorphic. Joop Huisken reverted to filming simple humans instead of 'heroes' in the film Turbine I (1953), in which he observed a specific working process in an electrical power station. His assistant, Karl Gass, and other directors dabbled with the production of film feuilletons Im Paradies der Ruderer/The O Paradise (1953), Vom Alex zum Eismeer/From Alex to the Polar Sea (1954). Max Jaap produced feature-length films about the life of several artists such as Ludwig van Beethoven (1954) and Friedrich Schiller (1956). Hugo Hermann, a native Austrian, let children and workers talk directly into the camera about their hopes, desires, and concerns in Träumt für Morgen/Dream for Tomorrow (1956) and Stahl und Menschen/Steel and People (1957).

The commitment of the Dutch director Joris Ivens, who produced the international full-length film Lied der Ströme/Song of Streams (1954) and Die Windrose/The Wind Rose (1957) among others on behalf of DEFA, brought a new impulse to the world of documentary films. Andrew and Annelie Thorndike were dedicated to producing international material. They produced several compilation films based on international archive material, which highlighted the course of German history during the twentieth century, the emergence of the two world wars and the career of former Nazis in the Federal Republic. For the creation of the film Du und mancher Kamerad/You and Some Comrades (1956), the Thorndikes had to sift through more than six million meters of film, and the film's final version cites approximately seven hundred different films and newsreels. Der Fall Harzmann und andere/The Case of Harzmann and Others (1957) is a critic of former Nazi judges taking total control of the West German law system; Urlaub auf Sylt/Vacation on Sylt (1957) is based on the biography of former SS officer Reinefahrt, who was involved in the abatement of the Warsaw rebellion in 1944 and afterwards became mayor of Sylt; Unternehmen Teutonenschwert/Enterprise Teutonenschwert (1958) described the role of a North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) General named Speidel in World War II and Speidel's career after 1945. The impressive assembly of these films sometimes helped to obscure the fact that the Thorndikes were not always moving on safe ground. They usually showed irrefutable facts but also suggested that simple presumptions were the truth and constantly affirmed that the West German state and its political leaders, Adenauer and Schuhmacher, were as bellicose as fascists.

On August 13, 1962, one year after the construction of the Berlin Wall, DEFA brought to the big screen the film Schaut auf diese Stadt/Look at this City (director: Karl Gass), which marked the end of the documentary film productions of the 1950s. On the one hand this film displays abhorrence toward Western development, but on the other hand it provides certainty about the historical superiority of the GDR and the socialist system. Gass merely depicted West Berlin as a simple concentration area of war mongers, old Nazis, saboteurs, and agents, like a 'stake in the flesh of the GDR'. Look at this City soon became an enthusiastic 'high song' of the GDR and its new borders; in this film there was no room for the tears and sorrow that the Wall brought to people on one or the other side of the razor wire.

The separation of the GDR raised DEFA's documentary film producers' and coworkers' hope of finally being able to operate more openly and critically, without any Western influence. A young generation of directors educated at the Babelsberg University for Cinematographic Art and interested in their own country's life and reality, started working at DEFA's studio. Karl Gass became the spiritual rector of many of these young people mainly after the presentation of his film Feierabend/Spare Time (1946), a spectacular survey that critically analyzes workers and shows them drinking and celebrating for the first time. Gass, who was temporal director of the documentary film class at the university and from 1961 was head of its own artistic working group for documentary film at DEFA, encouraged Winfried Junge to produce a film series about children from the village of Golzow, which lies on the GDR frontier with Poland. In Wenn ich erst zur Schule geh ... /When I Go To School ... (1961) Junge narrates about a first school day; in Nach einem Jahr/After a Year (1962), he takes a balanced look after one year; in Elf Jahre Alt/ Eleven Years Old (1966) he shows a group representation in which the children talk about their experiences and dreams. Up to the end of the GDR Junge produced five more 'Golzow films', which, according to the original plan, should have reflected the growing up of the 'first communist generation' until the year 2000.

The films actually emancipated themselves from this theoretical image and showed instead historical time-related and social insights. As a result of this perspective change, Junge could continue with the production of the Golzow series even after the end of the GDR and the end of DEFA. Thus far, the longest full-length international documentary series comprises almost twenty films from which the compilation of Lebensläufe/Personal Records (1980) and Drehbuch: Die Zeiten/Screenplay: The Times (1992) most attracted the attention of an international audience. In Screenplay: The Times Junge meditates on the special conditions for making films in the GDR and on censorship and self-censorship.

Like Junge, other important directors of his generation were also interested in contributing to the democratization of the community of the GDR by showing the lifestyles and hopes of people, in this way touching people's sensitivity. Outstanding films were shot from the mid-1960s by Jürgen Böttcher, Gitta Nickel, Richard Cohn-Vossen, Karlheinz Mund, Kurt Tetzlaff, and Volker Koepp. The French cinéma vérité and particularly the film by Chris Marker, Le Joli Mai (1963), which had received an award at the Documentary Film Week in Leipzig, became of enormous importance to these film producers. Jürgen Böttcher was mainly tied to productions such as Barfuss Und Ohne Hut/Barefoot and Without a Hat (1965), about young people spending their summer vacations in the Baltic Sea, Der Sekretär/The Secretary (1967) about an unorthodox party secretary, and Wäscherinnen/Laundresses (1972). In 1978 he produced the film Martha, a subtle portrayal of a sixty-eight-year-old Berlin 'rubble woman', who removes stones to pay the rent, lives a modest life, and is not interested in politics. This type of 'heroine' had hardly been seen in the GDR's documentary film until that time.

Gitta Nickel produced Heuwetter/Hay Weather (1972), which narrates a one-decade period at an agricultural production cooperative. The film begins with unpublished images from 1963, which deal with several issues such as sloppiness, alcohol addiction, and irresponsibility, until the village chronicle reaches the present day. Thus the social development is confirmed and fractioned by a countrywoman's personal memories. Volker Koepp lets young women talk directly into the camera in Mädchen in Wittstock/Girls in Wittstock (1975), his first film about female personnel in a new knitwear factory. Reflections about work, free time, and dreams integrate with a picture that shows the lack of democracy in a 'large socialist enterprise'. This Wittstock enterprise became a cinematographic research object for Koepp more or less in the same way as Golzow village had been for Winfried Junge. Until 1996 he returned to Wittstock again and again, always following the lives of three women, observing the transformation of the place and its inhabitants in the free market economy. Koepp's films are considered the best DEFA productions: the peace and tenderness of their expression, the confidence acquired through closeness, the sensitivity for landscape motifs, which also often represent the spiritual condition. The quality of the best DEFA documentary films was principally the result of the exceptional DEFA cameramen: Christian Lehmann, Thomas Plenert, Wolfgang Dietzel, and Hans Eberhard Leupold, among others, who always worked masterfully and sensitively.

Walter Heynowski and Gerhard Scheumann gained a privileged position in the documentary film business of East Germany. Between 1969 and 1982 they managed their still existing 'Studio H&S', which was financed by the State but was officially independent of DEFA. The studio was considered an independent artistic workshop in the spirit of Dziga Vertov, and provided principally 'anti-imperialistic enlightenment'. Many H&S films, principally those in which the central theme is the war and peace cycles in Vietnam, the putsch in Chile, or the genocide in Kampuchea, attracted international attention during the 1970s and early 1980s.

Retrospectives from Heynowsky and Scheumann were presented in more than forty cities all over the world.

Both directors owned their own studio principally as a result of the film Des Lachende Mann/The Laughing Man (1966), for which they put a West German major in front of the camera, who narrated his life as a mercenary in Africa. Under the influence of alcohol and unaware of the filmmaker's identity and the purposes of the film, the anti-hero chatted frankly about his war adventures. For H&S, this meant the exposure of the system in which they grew up—'West German imperialism'. As a result of this film, as well as others such as Piloten In Pijama/Pilots in Pyjamas (1968) about US pilots killed in Vietnam, Heynowski and Scheumann were considered star political directors, who enjoyed financial and material success. To aid the fight against worldwide class conflict they shot a film cycle about Chile, which began in 1974 with Der Krieger der Mumien/The War of the Mummies and continued with analytical work such as Ich war, ich bin, ich werde sein/I Was, I Am, I Will Be (1974) and Der Weißße Putsch/The White Putsch (1975), as well as some sharply pointed short films. In their films H&S analyzed the mechanisms that led to the fall of Salvador Allende's government and outlined the role of the Chilean bourgeoisie and the military. However, the films omitted, to a large extent, any objections against the left-wing movement.

For the production of Die Teufelsinsel/The Devil's Island (1976), Der erste Reis danach/The First Rice Thereafter (1977), and others, H&S returned to Vietnam immediately after the end of war to search for traces of crimes, resistance, and a new life. They analyzed in the feature-length documentary films Kampuchea—Sterben und Auferstehen/Kampuchea—Death and Resurrection (1980) and Die Angkar/The Angkar (1981) the terror regime of Pol Pot and the consequences for Kampuchea. However, neither director was interested in the GDR's contemporary life; Heynowski and Scheumann returned to their country only when they started the production of Die Dritte Haut/The Third Skin (1989), a beautifully colored homage to Erich Honecker's housing policy.

The denaturalization of the political songwriter Wolf Biermanns by the SED leaders began in autumn 1976, and this event, together with the government's attempt to discipline the GDR's artists, also left deep marks on the documentary film studio. One of the most important directors, Richard Cohn-Vossen, who produced the fascinating biography of composer Paul Dessau (1976) among other films and critically questioned the practice of socialist democracy in films like Monika (1975) and Abgeordnete in Rostock/Deputy in Rostock (1976), left the GDR and migrated to the Federal Republic of Germany. His colleagues Jürgen Böttcher, Werner Kohlert, and Heinz Brinkmann, who protested against Biermanns's denaturalization, experienced massive political pressure. During the 1980s DEFA documentary producers as a whole showed the reality of the GDR in a more critical way and staged productions that displayed taboo subjects (often despite the resistance of the State), which were financed by DEFA.

The film Erinnerung an eine Landschaft—für Manuela/Memory of a Landscape—for Manuela (1983) by Kurt Tetzlaff, a full-length survey about a village in central Germany that had to succumb to the opening of a brown coal mine, Jugendwerkhof/Industrial School (1982) by Roland Steiner about subjugated young people, Abhängig/Dependent (1983) and Rückfäellig/Recidivist (1988) by Eduard Schreiber about alcoholics, Berlin—Auguststraße/Berlin—August Street (1981) by Günter Jordan about young people in East Berlin, as well as some films from Karlheinz Mund, Gunther Scholz, and Konrad Weiss about mentally and physically disabled persons are among the most outstanding films of the last decade of the GDR.

The documentary films from Jürgen Böttcher, Rangierer/Switchman (1984) and Die Küche/The Kitchen (1987), which show intense black-and-white pictures, reflected the end time mood: symbols of hard work in an imaginary room, in which shadowy movements seemed to be produced, but no real motive is given. Jochen Krausser approached the country's condition in a grotesque way: Leuchtkraft Der Ziege—Eine Naturerscheinung/The Goat's Luminance—A Natural Phenomenon (1988) was the first surrealist contribution of DEFA's documentary film studio. The rock film Flüstern & SCHREIEN/Whispering and Shouting (1989, directors: Dieter Schumann and Jochen Wisotzki) showed for the first time sections of the GDR's subversive music scene and put a piece of counterculture on the public cultural map. ... Und Freitag in die grüne Hoelle/... And Friday in the Green Hell (1989, director: Ernst Cantzler) portrayed football fans and trouble-makers in East Berlin, while Unsere Kinder/Our Children (1988, Roland Steiner) brought punks, old gits, skinheads, and young neo-Nazis in front of the camera. In Unsere alten Tage/Our Old Times (1989), Petra Tschoertner illustrated the treatment of the elderly in the GDR, which was not always humane. All these productions are valiant films and the same can be said of Karl Gass's historic precise compilation Das Jahr 45/In the Year 45 (1985), about existential confusion in the history of the German people.

Helke Misselwitz had great success with a production that covered a complex description of the GDR's condition and the mood of its inhabitants at the end of the 1980s. She undertook a cinematographic journey across the country for the production of the documentary Winter Ade/Goodbye Winter (1987), and she outlined experiences of women of different ages and diverse social positions. Goodbye Winter became the most significant and emotional film at the end of the GDR.

The film diary Leipzig im Herbst/Leipzig in Fall from Andreas Voigt and Gerd Kroske, a reportage about demonstrators and policemen, oppositionists and functionaries, opened DEFA's last chapter. After the collapse of the prevailing state party and the fall of the Wall, there was no longer the need to say or show the facts between lines or images. Movies such as Imbiss Spezial/Special Snack (1990, director: Thomas Heise), Kehraus/Last Dance (1990: director: Gerd Kroske), Sperrmül/Bulk Waste (1990, director: Helke Misselwitz), Wind sei stark/Wind is Strong (1990, director: Jochen Krausser), Im Durchgang/On the Pathway (1990, director: Kurt Tetzlaff), Letztes Jahr Titanic/Last Year Titanic (1991, director: Andreas Voigt), Eisenzeit/Iron Age (1991, director: Thomas Heise), and Kein Abschied—Nur Fort/No Farewells—Just Go (1991, director: Joachim Tschirner, Lew Hohmann) described the mood of the GDR citizens as both agonized and optimistic and described the new difficulties that were a result of German unification. Heinz Brinkmann and Jochen Wisotzki produced the film Komm in den Garten/Come into the Garden (1990) about three friends in the Berlin municipality Prenzlauer Berg, which was in fact an homage to outsiders, who DEFA had considered before as 'cinematically unworthy'. In the film Östliche Landschaft/Eastern Landscape (1990), which was filmed entirely at a garbage site, Eduard Schreiber pleaded with viewers not to sacrifice one's own roots exclusively for a new reality.

Directors and authors also worked on the history of the GDR and the history of real socialism besides the contemporary reportages and essays. In the film Walter Janka—Aufstehen und Widersetzen/To Rise and Resist (1990), Karlheinz Mund depicted a publisher who had been under political arrest for many years. In Christa Wolf—Zeitschleifen/Time Warps (1991), Mund became known to the East German writer, who had become a positive role model for many countrymen due to her disturbed critical attitude towards politics. Konrad Herrmann revealed the biography of the GDR's first minister of culture and former expressionist poet Johannes R. Becher in Die Angst und die Macht/Fear and Power (1991). Director Sybille Schoenemann, who was arrested in the mid-1980s owing to 'subversive activities' and deported to the West, showed in her autobiographical film Verriegelte Zeit/Barred Times (1991) the role that DEFA's assistants had in the GDR political system. She outlined her own spying, arrest, and denaturalization experiences.

Jürgen Böttcher performed a special farewell to the GDR. His film Die Mauer/The Wall (1990), developed between paintings and film scenes, silently showed the slow disappearance of the Berlin Wall through long contemplative settings. One can see and hear, for example, bird swarms concentrated over the still-deserted city center, the closed underground station at Potsdamer Platz, or the multicolored graffiti, people and propaganda noise, sounds of excavators, fireworks on New Year's Eve 1989–90, and the wooden crosses for those who sacrificed their lives at the border. The director projected additional historical film passages onto the wall: from Emperor Wilhelm's ride through the Brandenburg Gate, completely lit by Nazi torches, a picture of a policeman who jumped to the West in 1961, until the day of the collapse of the Wall.

On July 1, 1990, the day of the monetary union between GDR and the Federal Republic of Germany and of the introduction of the D-mark as the unique legal currency, the DEFA documentary film studio was transformed into a limited corporation and was put up for sale by the privatization agency. To comply with the privatization conditions, the studio laid off most of its employees until mid-1991. Nearly all were directors, cameramen, and dramaturges. The rest of DEFA, mostly service providers, were in charge of TV program production and they made technology available and assisted in coproductions. The quality of the DEFA documentary films survived the new productions of the East German directors. Even though many former directors, authors, and cameramen retired, lost their jobs, or changed professions, the work of Volker Koepp, Thomas Heise, Eduard Schreiber, Peter Voigt, Andreas Voigt, Jochen Krausser, Heinz Brinkmann, and Winfried Junge are still associated with the most exhilarating German documentaries.

Jürgen Böttcher, internationally the best-known DEFA director, returned to the screen in 2001. In his film Konzert im Freien/Outdoor Concert, he assembled new pictures with old, previously unpublished DEFA material about the construction of the Marx-Engels-Forum in East Berlin, which was conceived as a monument and public park. The outcome of this work was an essay about hopes and errors, utopias and tragedies of the twentieth century.

Germany

The production of nonfiction films in Germany is comparable to other European or North American countries. From 1895 on, short local views of cities and small towns were often shot by foreign film companies, such as Lumière, Pathé, Gaumont, and Raleigh & Robert, which worked on an international level. The content of the images is quite universal in this early period and follows a similar aesthetic direction. Besides views of marketplaces, streets, and important buildings in a particular city, the official visits of emperors, kings, dukes, and tzars became regular subjects for films, as did military parades and festive processions. The German emperor, Wilhelm II, was open to the new medium and thus became one of the early movie stars. Natural disasters and sports were attractive subjects, along with exotic places and folkloristic traditions.

In November 1911, the first German newsreel, Der Tag im Film, was produced by Express Films in Freiburg. Oskar Messter, one of the most important German pioneers of film technology, had shot nonfiction films since 1897. He founded his Messter-Woche newsreel in October 1914, shortly after the beginning of World War I. With the Eiko-Woche it became the most important newsreel during the war. During World War I the important role of film for propaganda became clear, so around 1916 the state, the military, and heavy industry became interested in bringing film production companies under their control. On December 18, 1917, the Universumfilm Aktiengesellschaft (UFA) was founded by the merger of the three most successful film production companies (Nordisk, Messter, and PAGU) and with the German state as the most influential shareholder.

In June 1918 the UFA also opened a cultural department, which first produced educational films and Kulturfilme, the German term for documentaries in that period. This department was intended to produce and distribute scientific, educational, and entertaining films that which would be edifying and serve the educational system. One main activity was to produce medical training films and in the first five years, approximately one hundred and thirty-five of these films were produced for a medical film archive. In 1920 the department visited universities to promote the concept of using film for educational purposes and to get suggestions for new topics. The idea was to produce films for the huge market of universities and especially the sixty thousand schools. Some cities started or supported noncommercial film activities to create an alternative to the commercial, sensational fiction film.

However, the UFA discovered that there was no market in the educational field, because universities and schools had no budgets for film, and the costs for projectors and film rentals were quite high. The UFA changed its strategy and started to produce ten- to twenty-minute cultural films that were screened with the newsreels before the feature film. Most of these films were given good ratings for their high quality, and created a tax reduction for the whole screening. Every year, a few long nonfiction films were also produced. Examples are Arnold Fanck's Das Wunder des Schneeschuhs/The Wonder of the Snowshoe (1920–2) on skiing, Der Rhein in Vergangenheit und Gegenwart/The Rhine River in Past and Present (1922), and Wilhelm Prager's Wege zu Kraft und Schönheit/Ways to Strength and Beauty (1925) on modern body culture and sports. The Kulturfilmbuch (book on cultural film), published by Edgar Beyfuss und Alexander Kossowsky in 1924, helped to make the public aware of the broad spectrum of film production. It is a comprehensive study on the practical and theoretical state-of-the-art of nonfiction film in Germany and the subgenres that had already been developed (e.g. films on art, cities, biology, animals, geography, medicine, industry, promotion, animation, sports). The German Kulturfilm used and tested new technologies such as cameras, lenses, and film emulsions and experimented with new effects, such as slow motion, stop motion, fast motion, and dissolves. It gained an international reputation and the films were exported to various countries. In Russia the term Kulturfilm was even taken up. Besides the UFA, there were many other production companies such as Deulig, Nationalfilm, Emelka, and Dafu that concentrated on nonfiction films. Some directors also founded their own production companies. Hans Cürlis and his Kulturinstitut produced portraits of artists from the 1920s to the 1960s; such continuity despite all the political changes is more typical than the exception.

In the second half of the 1920s avant-garde directors such as Walter Ruttmann, Wilfried Basse, and Hans Richter produced the first so-called documentaries including Berlin: Die Sinfonie der Großstadt/Berlin: The Symphony of a Great City (1927), Markt in Berlin/Street Markets in Berlin (1929), and Deutschland—zwischen gestern und heute/Germany Yesterday and Today (1933). They were cross-section or montage films, which were influenced by the international avant-garde movement, especially French films and the Russian montage of Vertov and Eisenstein. In the second half of the 1920s the filmmakers knew each other and exchanged and discussed their films. Associations were founded to present new styles and modern films in the United Kingdom, the Netherlands, France, the United States, and other countries. There was an active international exchange and it is hard to discuss these films as specifically national cinematography. In 1929 there was a meeting of the film avant-gardists at La Sarraz Castle in Switzerland. Now the rhythm of the montage, the modern aesthetic of extreme camera positions and unconventional use of sound and music developed a new style, which became very influential.

In 1933 the National Socialists came to power and started to control film production through the Ministry of Enlightenment and Propaganda of Joseph Goebbels. The films of Leni Riefenstahl are the best known internationally, although she directed only seven films, as well as some propaganda films from that period. Between 1933 and 1945 approximately twelve thousand nonfiction films, mainly industrial films and commercials, approximately one thousand educational films, a few thousand cultural films, and eight hundred and fifty longer films of more than one thousand meters long (thirty-six minutes). There is a strong continuity in the style of nonfiction films and the people involved in making them, and few directors and producers were forbidden to work after 1933. Even former communist filmmakers, such as Carl Junghans, were able to make films such as Jugend der Welt/Youth of the World (1936) on the Winter Olympics in Garmisch-Partenkirchen. The visual style with the dominance of perfect images and modern montage was declared to be the new German camera style by official Nazi papers. The films of Leni Riefenstahl on the NSDAP party rallies in 1933 and 1934 and her two films on the Olympic Games were declared models for the new documentary. After 1945 the nonfiction production of the period was viewed as pure propaganda and nobody was interested in the films. Only recently have there been attempts to analyze these films again and to differentiate them more closely. Comparable to the fictional film production in Nazi Germany, where only approximately fifteen percent of the films were regarded as propagandistic, in the nonfiction production the majority cannot seriously be discussed as propaganda. Of course, the National Socialist propaganda films became famous and have been analyzed in detail. Central examples are Riefenstahl's Triumph des Willens/Triumph of the Will (1935), Fritz Hippler's Feldzug in Polen/Campaign in Poland (1940) or his demagogic Der ewige Jude/The Eternal Jew (1940), Hans Bertram's Feuertaufe/Baptism of Fire (1940), and Sieg im Westen/Victory in the West (1941) by Svend Noldan and Fritz Brunch.

However, these famous National Socialist propaganda films were not typical nonfiction productions. Of course, the state wanted to be presented in the best possible way, and in cultural films you will also find aesthetic styles very typical for the Nazi period; for example, the swastika flag is omnipresent. The flag, though, was also part of the German reality at that time and cannot be discussed only as a symptom of propagandistic purpose. The nonfiction production covers the same broad range of subgenres described for the Weimar Republic period and reflects a high technical standard. Often the films tested new possibilities of micro- and macrophotography and even X-ray films with sound were produced. Directors Walter Ruttmann, Martin Rikli, Ulrich K.T. Schulz, Svend Noldan, Willy Zielke, and others tried to break aesthetic limits and to push modern visual styles. Typical of this attempt is a mixture of real sequences, staged scenes, animation, effects and text, which now would be called hybrid forms. This form also has to do with the technical conditions. Generally the cameras were heavy and needed a tripod, and there were only a few minutes in the magazine. The speed of the film material was not very high, so it was only possible to shoot using the sun or with artificial light. Therefore, the shots had to be planned extremely carefully.

The four previously existing German sound newsreels (UFA, Deulig, Tobis, and Fox) were merged into Die Deutsche Wochenschau during World War II. Newsreel screenings were obligatory for all five thousand four hundred and ninety-two theaters in Germany from 1938 on. The number of prints was increased from about four hundred in 1939 to two thousand four hundred in 1943. So it was only during the war that newsreels were screened close to their production date, which was very professional. Special propaganda companies were formed, which were integrated in the military structure and which made it possible to shoot realistic images from the front lines. The silent shots were selected centrally in Berlin and combined with sound, an aggressive commentary, and a dynamic music score. 'Nazi newsreel music makes the motor nerves vibrate; it works directly upon the bodily feelings,' as Siegfried Kracauer analyzed as early as 1943. The Ministry of Propaganda viewed the newsreels as a perfect tool to influence the German public, but they worked well only in times of victory; from 1943 on they lost their credibility. Images from Nazi newsreels are regularly used in historical TV programs on the Third Reich; thus they still contribute to the image that we have of that time.

The years after 1945 are again characterized by continuity. Most of the people involved in the production of nonfiction film in the Third Reich were able to work again after the end of the war. Members of the propaganda companies became pioneers of German postwar television and of the various newsreels in East and West Germany. The film Michelangelo: Das Leben eines Titanen (1940) by Curt Oertel was reedited by Robert Flaherty for the American version as The Titan: The Story of Michelangelo (1950) and won an Academy Award for Best Feature Documentary in 1951. In East Germany the DEFA studio was founded in 1946 with a special documentary department. They developed their own style and regularly shot in 35mm black-and-white film. In West Germany, mostly small production companies continued to shoot the whole spectrum of nonfiction films.

Bernhard Grizmek was successful in the theaters with Kein Platz für wilde Tiere/No Place for Wild Animals (1956), on African wildlife, which also won a Golden Bear at the Berlin International Film Festival. Hans Domnick was also popular with Traumstraßen der Welt/Dream Roads of the World (1958), depicting travel through North and South America from Alaska to Chile.

In the 1950s television was established in Germany, and it became the primary source for financing documentary films. Peter von Zahn established a more reportage-like style for the NWDR in Hamburg; in 1959 Klaus Wildenhahn started at the NDR and developed a special style of an observing camera, not disturbing reality too much. In the southwest the SDR founded a documentary department, which became known as the Stuttgart School. Its films were intended to be something different from the Nazi newsreels and the more pedagogic Kulturfilm tradition. They produced very critical and ironic commentaries on West German society, which were masterpieces of montage. In the 1960s directors such as Dieter Ertel, Wilhelm Bittdorf, and Roman Brodmann were highly influenced by the direct cinema movement. During the student protest movement political documentaries were shot at the film school in Berlin, which was founded in 1966, and at the film school in Ulm, which was headed by Alexander Kluge und Edgar Reitz, and at the new film school in Munich. Most of the young directors then developed an interest in daily life in Germany and wanted to shoot films on political issues such as ecology, the socially underprivileged, or minorities including handicapped people. The declared goal of the video movement, which was very active in the 1970s, was to give such groups a voice, as well as to change society with the help of documentaries. Political content became more important than aesthetic quality and the documentaries got the reputation of being boring. In 1980 the German Documentary Association (AG Dok) was created at the Duisburg Festival. With more than seven hundred members, it has now developed into the most important pressure group for documentary filmmakers.

The documentary changed fundamentally in the 1990s, experiencing a renaissance in theatrical release and on TV. From 1990 on, the documentary film in Germany developed a whole range of different styles and narrational forms and abandoned the notion that a documentary has to be educational and boring. Often the films present subjective positions or follow a more essayistic style. The multiplicity is of course only one reason for the attraction of the genre. Also important are technical developments such as digital DV and HD cameras or digital editing, as well as because the commercial TV market, which was not introduced in Germany until 1984, is pushing new popular formats like docusoap, docudrama, or even reality TV. To be successful, a director has to develop a personal style and has to decide what she or he is willing to deliver to which system. Electronic editing as well as computer graphics and animation have an aesthetic influence and the digitization of production and postproduction enables a director to get exactly the images he or she wants. Questions of narration and storytelling become more relevant for documentaries. Sometimes these changes raise ethical questions about how far a documentary filmmaker can and should go, but these discussions have made the documentary so vivid and extraordinarily interesting and have furthered its new popularity.

Gertrude Stein: When This You See, Remember Me

(US, Miller Adato, 1971)

Perry Miller Adato's Gertrude Stein: When This You See, Remember Me was initially conceived as a documentary about the Paris art scene of the 1920s and 1930s, the working title of which was Paris, the Luminous Years. When the concept was rejected by various networks as being too broad in scope, Miller Adato decided to focus on one person whose life, she believed, symbolised and encompassed the period, and to tell the story of the age through that person. True to Miller Adato's original idea, France, as it progresses from the early twentieth century through two world wars, is the film's leitmotif. One senses throughout Miller Adato's film the profound truth of Stein's observation that, 'It was not what France gave you, but what it did not take away that was important.'

There is much evidence of Miller Adato's original, broader focus in the finished film. The film includes numerous talking head-style interviews, with such notables as Virgil Thomson, Jaques Lipschitz, Sherwood Anderson, Janet Flanner, Daniel-Henri Kahnweiler, Pierre Balmain, and Bennett Cerf. Different people knew Stein at different times in her life: Kahnweiler knew both Stein and Picasso and touches on the early 1904 period; Janet Flanner knew her in the 1920s, and Virgil Thomson in the 1920s and 1930s. An interview with a Mrs Bradley, wife of Stein's literary agent and acquaintance of Hemingway and Alice B. Toklas, discusses the later years of Stein's time in Paris, and a Mrs Chapman, who brought Stein to America, covers the American period, along with Stein's publisher Bennett Cerf. In addition to these interviews are animation stills, film footage, segments of plays by Stein, and a great number of photographs and transparencies of paintings. Approximately one thousand photographs and seventy transparencies were reduced to four hundred, and fifty, respectively, for the final edit. The film is remarkably fast-paced for a documentary, incorporating a vast amount of material into ninety minutes, and features twice as many cuts as a standard Hollywood feature film.

In editing the phases of Stein's life, Alan Pesetsky does admirable work, for despite the diverse material on which Miller Adato draws, there is little sense of fragmentation. Miller Adato counterbalances her reconstruction of the times with a tight focus on Stein herself. It is as if we see the entire period through Stein's eyes. The director works in a style consistent with Gertrude Stein's own artistic perception: the rhythm of repetition and the equalizing of elements. Repetition is a particularly important quality to the film just as it was to Stein herself, as anyone familiar with her famous rose poem could confirm. One beautiful sequence takes a single, realistic image and gradually multiplies it. A prism lens was used to fragment, multiply, and distort the shapes of the photographed images to visualise the Cubist tendencies pioneered by Braque and Picasso and reflected in Gertrude's abstract writings. A Picasso drawing of Leo Stein is animated to show him walking rapidly first in one direction, then in the other, to portray the shifting paths of his involvement.

The camera also makes use of zooms, pans, and dissolves to keep the images constantly moving and to create dynamic visual equivalencies to the sensitive narration culled from the writings by or about Gertrude Stein. Visualising Stein's 'A Valentine to Sherwood Anderson', for example, the camera dissolves from an old-fashioned valentine, resplendent with hearts, angels, and flowers, to a picture of Anderson nestled in its centre. To bring to life the section of The Autobiography of Alice B. Toklas, which describes how Alice and Gertrude found the house they would live in, Miller Adato and her crew went to Bilignin and shot a twenty-nine-second zoom, beginning with a long shot and ending with a close-up of the house. The timing and positioning of this shot accurately recreates the description of the incident in the book.

Miller Adato not only reflects Stein's work through the form of her film, but also incorporates actual segments of Stein's various literary pieces into the film. These include a sequence from Al Carmine's musical In Circles, based on Stein's play of the same name, which serves as evidence that Stein could still inspire something as contemporary as Carmine's work, and excerpts from Four Saints in Three Acts, on which she and Virgil Thomson collaborated. There is no narration, per se, for the spoken text, outside of the interviews with her friends and colleagues and quotes from people who knew her well, is composed entirely of Stein's writings. The Autobiography of Alice B. Toklas, Stein's own biographical work, is the most heavily referenced work, but there are segments and quotations from Tender Buttons, Lucy Church Amiably, and The Making of Americans amongst other works.

The film presents us with an intimate portrait of Gertrude's day-to-day life and in particular her relationship with Alice B. Toklas. Some remember Alice's exquisitely tasty cakes; others recall that in their household Gertrude never bothered to do any chores, while Alice managed things deftly and smoothly. Gertrude, the woman, is contrasted with Stein, the writer, thinker, art collector, and genius, so as to bring a touch of humanity to what might otherwise be a documentary overwhelmingly populated with historical, literary, and artistic figures about whom so much is written and filmed that they cease to have any real meaning for us. Within Miller Adato's film Stein's life and career incorporates the story of Paris in the early twentieth century as the director intended, but Gertrude never ceases to be the focus of the film as both artist and as a person. As the director herself puts it, Gertrude Stein: When This You See, Remember Me is basically, 'the story of a woman and an artist who happened to live in the right place at the right time'.

Gertrude Stein: When This You See, Remember Me received two Emmy nominations. The film has been shown numerous times on American TV, and has become WNET's most widely shown film in 16mm distribution to museums, universities, libraries, adult groups, and for film festivals.

Gimme Shelter

(US, Maysles, 1970)

Gimme Shelter depicts the intersection of 1960s rock music, the counterculture movement, and the cinéma vérité documentary. The film began as an agreement between the Rolling Stones and filmmakers Albert Maysles, David Maysles, and Charlotte Zwerin to document the band's 1969 Madison Square Garden concert in New York City. Following their instincts and using their own finances, the filmmakers traveled with the tour for about five days, and in the process they turned what began as a standard assignment into a landmark contribution to American documentary cinema.

In balancing the tensions between representing personality and representing social issues, Gimme Shelter functions structurally on two concurrent levels. On one level it features cinéma vérité concert film conventions: behind-the-scenes telephone calls and negotiations, press conferences, stage and equipment setup, the band's travel, and the fans' arrival. It also includes footage of the New York City performance and of the free concert at Altamont Speedway in California. In another technique, members of the Rolling Stones join the filmmakers in the editing room, reviewing footage and commenting on it.

This technique offers an additional form of commentary otherwise unavailable to the filmmakers, who practiced a purer variety of what Albert Maysles called 'direct cinema'. They eschewed both narration and formal interview segments; the press conference footage provides the closest substitute. By following both song performances and other instances with the bandmates' reactions, the film offers a more intimate form of insight. During 'Wild Horses', the camera cuts to band members' solemn faces. Charlie Watts, the drummer, looks directly into the camera that zooms in and frames him in close-up, breaking its fly-on-the-wall invisibility. He almost challenges the camera's presence before turning away and ignoring it.

The events at the Altamont Speedway provide the notoriety for which Gimme Shelter is well known. Approximately three hundred thousand fans attended the free concert, dubbed 'Woodstock West' in the spirit of the several peace-and-love rock festivals also held in 1969. Comparisons to Woodstock occurred, but peace was not the dominant atmosphere in the crowd that day. Instead, a certain restlessness prevailed, and performers such as The Flying Burrito Brothers and Jefferson Airplane dealt with fans rushing the stage, climbing scaffolding, and fighting among themselves. The Hell's Angels were hired to provide security and crowd control, but their sense of maintaining order involved fighting back, a tactic that at one point led to Jefferson Airplane singer Marty Balin being knocked unconscious when he attempted to intervene in a dispute. By the time the Rolling Stones took the stage behind an escort of Harley Davidson motorcycles parting the masses, tensions were running high and the crowd was agitated.

The film's structure and cinematography highlight just how deep those tensions ran and just how keenly the Angels' presence was felt. Concert footage from Madison Square Garden focuses primarily on Mick Jagger's stage presence. As he sings 'Jumpin' Jack Flash', 'Satisfaction', and other songs, Jagger prances and struts freely around the stage, and shots of the audience show adoring fans gazing back and mouthing the words along with him. At Altamont the tone changes completely. The band constantly stops its performance so that Jagger can issue pleas to the audience to settle down. The Hell's Angels dominate the scene. One shot frames Jagger singing on the left, while one Angel stares straight at the camera on the right. Another shot situates the scene from behind the band, with Jagger closest, a wall of Angels (and their logo jackets) between Jagger and the crowd, and then the obscured crowd behind them. The Angels also bodily remove anyone who sets foot on the stage.

A shot on the commotion in the crowd reveals another scuffle, and it shows a girl in a crocheted dress moving out of the way, a man in a green suit running past her, and a group of Angels crowding around someone. The distance and poor lighting make it difficult to discern what actually is happening. When Jagger in the studio asks, 'Can you roll back on that, David?', the scene cuts back to the editing room, and David Maysles rewinds the tape and plays it again in slow motion. A question about a gun is raised, and Maysles freezes the shot that shows a gun's outline against the girl's dress. At this point the events become clearer, but other than, 'It's so horrible', the film offers no commentary on them. Subsequent wrap-up scenes provide more explanation but little closure for the concert.

A bystander explains how he saw events, explaining that the Hell's Angels saw the gun, took it away from a man, and then began to beat and stab him. The man, eighteen-year-old Meredith Hunter, dies from his injuries, and the Stones are airlifted out of the fray. The Stones exit the studio, and the fans leave.

Many American cinéma vérité films use a crisis structure, wherein the crisis, or emotional high point, becomes the organizational system (see Mamber 1974). In Gimme Shelter the filmmakers document a potential moment with Hunter's murder, but they face a choice in focusing either on the crisis situation or on the personalities of the Rolling Stones. Earlier Maysles films such as Salesman (particularly in the case of Bible salesman Paul Brennan) center almost exclusively on character, and members of the Stones certainly offer much material with which to work. However, the murder brings to light the question of the filmmaker's social obligation in representing it. Gimme Shelter also raises the question of the murder's exploitation as a form of publicity for the Rolling Stones. The film did, after all, begin as a promotional film of a concert, but whether the band should be held responsible for the incidents that occurred is a debatable issue. In the end Maysles and Zwerin leave the issue open to interpretation.

In direct cinema tradition, they offer no excuses or conclusions.

Glass

(Holland, Haanstra, 1958)

Dutch film director Bert Haanstra was born May 31, 1916 in Holten, Overijssel, Netherlands, and died October 23, 1997 in Hilversum, Noord-Holland, Netherlands. He started his career in painting and photography, and eventually moved into documentary film directing in 1949.

Glass/Glas, produced in 1958, is one of the best-known films from Bert Haanstra's body of work, which includes forty-one documentary and fiction films produced between 1948 and 1988. Haanstra is considered one of the most original documentary film directors from Holland and won dozens of international awards for his films, including the Grand Prix at the Cannes Film Festival for Mirror of Holland, and the 1959 Academy Award and approximately twenty other awards for Glass.

Glass is a lyrical process documentary that examines the simple act of manufacturing glass bottles and the people who craft them. Taking place entirely in a glassmaking plant in the Netherlands, the camera observes the equipment and raw materials coming together. The film weaves a story of machine-made glass versus handmade glass and makes superb use of various filmic elements, including color, sound, camera and subject movement, musical score, and editing.

Glass is often shown in filmmaking/cinematography classes as a classic example of proper exposure and color representation, complex shooting in terms of location lighting sources, and wide variety of camera angles and distances. The editing is poetic and finely paced, with wide shots, close-ups and extreme close-up shots weaving seamlessly together in a vivid representation of human beings, machine, and raw material. Although this topic may seem somewhat pedestrian, it is the lack of guiding voice-over narration that thrusts this film out of the realm of simple 'how to' or 'educational' documentary into the domain of a truly artistic visual essay that is part film ethnography and part nostalgic, sensitive vision of a dying artform.

Godard, Jean-Luc

Operation Béton/Operation Concrete (1954) is Godard's first film and his only documentary proper in his fifty-year career. The construction of the Grande Dixence dam, shot ambitiously in 35mm, is in fact his only conventional film, with only the odd nod to Russian cinema and a seeming fascination with machinery and structure testifying to his future preoccupations as a filmmaker. Although his most famous feature films, made in the early to mid-1960s, are works of fiction, all featured documentary elements (A bout de souffle/Breathless, 1960, famously filmed its actors on the streets of Paris during Eisenhower's visit), and Godard always maintained that they were never fictional works in the standard sense: 'reportage is interesting only when placed in a fictional context, but fiction is interesting only if it is validated by a documentary context'. From the outset Godard considered himself as a creator of film essays, finding audiovisual means (with particular attention given to montage) to extend his work as a Cahiers du Cinéma critic.

As the dozen or so features he made between A bout de souffle and Deux ou trois choses que je sais d'elle/Two or Three Things I Know About Her (1966) became progressively more political in terms of content, Godard began to seek new formal means to film his essays politically. Caméra-œil/Camera Eye (1967), his contribution to the collective film Loin du Vietnam/Far from Vietnam (1967) proved a major step towards the unmistakable shape his essays would later take and provided the experimental groundwork he would continue to build on right up to the great masterpieces of the 1980s and 1990s. Caméra-œil, a film about filming Vietnam far from the war, features Godard himself with his camera (the first of his films in which authorial intervention becomes a structuring element), the machinic nature of the camera pegged to images of the war machine. The fifteen-minute essay contains archive footage, shots from the films of other filmmakers as well as from his own work, and material specially shot for the film, thereby proving a trial run for most of the elements by which his later essays will come to be defined.

Godard's finest commentator, Alain Bergala, points out how Fernand Braudel's distinction between histoire événementielle, the chronicling of events as they happen, and attention to the slower development of events over time (la longue durée) can be profitably applied to the changes Godard's essay film has undergone in the last thirty-five years.

The political films that Godard made in the decade after Caméra-œil, either alone, as part of the Dziga Vertov Group, or with Anne-Marie Mieville, are concerned with the short term and with topical events, and are addressed to the present and to an audience of the already or soon-to-be converted. These works, which have acquired a reputation for tediousness in the extreme, are not simply Maoist tracts but explorations of the medium as alternately oppressive and liberating, of desire and the gaze, of workers' and women's exploitation and of the (im)possibility of any form of representation or semiotic activity ever communicating with the 'real', in short products of the post-1968 climate of disappointment and a generalized phobia of all forms of power. However, Godard's return to fiction in the 1980s (with Sauve qui peut (La Vie)/Slow Motion in 1979) is accompanied by a major shift in the preoccupations of his essay work. Politics (in the sense of active militancy) is superseded by history as the focus moves to la longue durée as the devastating history of the twentieth century is tied to Godard's personal take on the death of cinema, not to mention his middle-aged preoccupation with the landscape of his childhood around Lac Léman. At this point it is the dead who become the primary addressees of this cinema of anamnesis seeking 'to defend the dead against the living'. The title of the Amnesty International film to which Godard contributed, Contre l'oubli/Against Forgetting (1991), could be said to exemplify this turn in Godard's work.

Godard had begun to experiment with video during his militant period but quickly discovered the aesthetic possibilities of the new medium. Beginning with France/Tour/Détour/Deux/Enfants/France/Tour/Detour/Two/Children (1978), the essays begin to display a range of techniques such as superimposition, rapid flashing, staccato slow motion, images that seem to be born from other images, and the electronic and computerized treatment of colour—in short, those formal features that have become a trademark of Godard's video works, elements retained from his militant experiments and often also incorporated into the feature films he continues to make.

However, it is with his true masterwork Histoire(s) du cinéma/History/ies of Cinema (1988–98) that his mastery of video technologies is stretched to breaking point by the vast subject-matter: no less than the history of the twentieth century conceived as a series of parallel histories: of war and the concentration camps, of cinema, of literature, philosophy, and music. In eight episodes varying in length from twenty-six to fifty-one minutes, Histoire(s) du cinéma offers an extended montage of images and sounds full of startling and often very moving juxtapositions guided by the idea borrowed from Pierre Reverdy: 'The image is a pure creation of the mind, it cannot be born from a comparison, but comes from the bringing together of two distant realities [...] An image is not powerful because it is brutal and fantastic, but because the association of ideas is distant and true.' This might appear to give Godard carte blanche to bring together arbitrarily any images he pleases, but what is incredible in Histoire(s) is that the effect of Godard's image/sound clusters need bear no obvious relation to his conscious intentions, and therefore accusations of hermeticism or solipsism completely miss the mark. For example (and I choose one that has deliberately courted controversy), an image of Elizabeth Taylor cradling Montgomery Clift in her arms in George Stevens' A Place in the Sun (1951) finds an overwhelming poignancy (one completely independent of the individual images themselves) when superimposed on images of a pile of concentration camp corpses, as well as being autonomous of Godard's explanation. It refers to the fact that George Stevens had previously filmed the camps, and this is precisely why his close-up of Taylor could 'radiate a kind of shadowed happiness'. The effect is not one of tragedy plus sentiment (since the camp images of necessity need no embellishment in order to devastate us) but a new type of hybrid affect, of emotion plus thought, and patently a result of the very incongruity of these 'distant realities'. We can see that in fact the juxtaposition of images here (as so often in Histoires) involves the images in a process of mutual interpretation, but, in this case, the viewer need not know about Stevens's experience at the camps to feel the multilayered mystery of their coexistence.

The extraordinary novelty of Godard's essay films has yet to be widely appreciated, especially in the English-speaking world. His most recent features, Eloge de l'amour/In Praise of Love (2001) and Notre musique/Our Music (2004) have continued to develop further those formal elements discovered by him in the essays, for example the second part of the former film being shot on Digital Video and its colour treated to resemble Fauvist painting. Fictional essays or documentary fictions? As Godard said on the release of Eloge de l'amour: 'They say my film is a documentary but I don't even know the meaning of the word documentary.'

FERGUS DALY

Biography

Born in Paris, December 3, 1930, to Protestant parents, his father was a doctor, his mother from a wealthy banking family. Studied anthropology briefly before devoting himself first to film criticism and from 1954 to filmmaking. Contributed to Cahiers du Cinéma on and off for many years before and during the development of his filmmaking career from the first shorts (beginning with Operation béton/Operation Concrete in 1954) to the success of his first feature A bout de souffle/Breathless (1960). Twenty-odd features and shorts later Godard turned his back on auteurist filmmaking and dissolved his identity in the work of the Dziga Vertov Group, which produced a series of politically militant films between 1969 and 1972. Following a serious motorcycle accident in 1972, Godard moved to Grenoble with Anne-Marie Mieville where they set up a small independent studio experiment with film/video relations before leaving France altogether in 1976 to settle in Switzerland. Godard returned to the commercial cinema in 1979 with Sauve qui peut (la vie)/Slow Motion. In 1988 he undertook a major video project

Histoire(s) du cinéma/History/ies of Cinema, completed in 1998. Continues to alternate between feature films and essay films largely shot on video.

Godmilow, Jill

Jill Godmilow's films straddle the boundaries between narrative and documentary, often deploying reenactment and thematizing performance. They are at once theoretically informed and visually engrossing. Beginning in 1973, her collaboration with Judy Collins on Antonia: A Portrait of the Woman brought to light the life story of an amazing, but relatively unknown, creative woman; the tale told a typical story of a lone woman struggling to make it in a sexist profession. What distinguished Antonia from many feminist films of the era was the emphasis on performance as a visual metaphor for lived experience, a theme continued in her film Nevelson in Process.

It was Far from Poland (1984) that cemented her reputation as a theoretical practitioner of documentary. Invoking virtually all the post-modern debates about realism and the reality effect, about gender and romance, about ideology and truth, about politics and representation, about socialism and democracy circulating within the cultural left during the mid-1980s, it calls attention to theoretical developments in film studies' deconstructive concerns with the apparatus, narrative, and image by foregrounding the constructedness of (among other things) 'location' shooting. 'On location' has always signified access to the real, to the true scene, against the stagy atmosphere of the studio; yet locations themselves are carefully chosen to stage meanings. When Poland became unavailable to Godmilow, location's essentialist truth was called into question, as were virtually all the shibboleths of 1960s New Left politics under Ronald Reagan's regime. The film is a stunning achievement: at once offering detailed information on the Gdansk Strike and Solidarity, as well as undercutting its form of transmission—documentary—and all done with a wry, disarming sense of humor.

Working with reenacted texts performed by actors such as Ruth Maleczek, Godmilow evolved a form of feminist 'speculative fiction' to tell the story of Gertrude Stein and Alice B. Toklas in the feature-length 1987 bioflick Waiting for the Moon, produced for PBS's 'American Playhouse', which won First Prize at the Sundance Film Festival. A crucial element of Far from Poland was the staged interviews of the striking crane operator Anna Walentynowicz and government censor K62. During these long segments, the camera reveals an intense identification between actors and their roles to the point of noting that Maleczek, who plays Anna, is crying when she concludes her life story. The concentration on performing extends as well to the interludes between Jill and Mark, directed by Maleczek as mini-soap operas. In Waiting for the Moon, the camera lingers over the faces and gestures of Linda Bassett (as Stein) and Linda Hunt (as Alice) in a series of brief sequences staged to foreground the verbal exchanges between these two difficult women. The repartee and the sets where they occur—a room, a car, a garden, a hillside—are designed to mimic Steinian poetics as they repeat with a difference the same scene visually and linguistically. These awkward moments highlight the subtleties of performing for the camera, as the tiniest facial tic magnifies mood and emotion.

Roy Cohn/Jack Smith (1994), the film interpretation of Ron Vawter's theater performance, displays another aspect of her deconstructive documentary technique. The sheer tour-de-force performance by Vawter is matched by the uncanny way in which Godmilow reassembles a piece of theater into a film. Translating stage to celluloid, Godmilow queers the record by daringly cutting up the two performance pieces about two notorious gay men, one very out, the other very closeted, who both died of AIDS in 1989. This montage is then intercut with video footage from rehearsals and of Vawter, himself HIV positive, his body covered with lesions, making up in the dressing room. In challenging the sacred unity of the performance, she also mixes media, emphasizing the differences between film and video. The film dwells on the careful collaboration between Godmilow and Vawter—the way Godmilow's editing adds a third term, Vawter himself—to the dyad Roy/Jack to enrich our understanding of performance as a process of impersonation and identification even when the figure(s) are radically other than the self.

This theoretical interest in the place of the body and identity—gendered, sexual, ethnic, and political—in performance and of the tense relationship between filmic and theatrical performing animates the project Godmilow developed in collaboration with Mabou Mines' Lear '87 Archive (2001). Working again with Vawter and Maleczek, the six-hour DVD condensed archive of workshops to develop a fully gender-reversed production of Shakespeare's King Lear celebrates the labor of the actor and of the theater company. Recording the workshop process of the experimental and radical group through close, sometimes repetitive, dissections of how movements, intonations, and gestures are calculated to evoke emotions and thus create meanings for the viewer, the two (sometimes three) different video cameras also stress the differential meanings incurred through camera position, lighting, and format. Her continuing interest in the process of reenactment led to her 1998 remake of Harun Farocki's 1969 Inextinguishable Fire. What Farocki Taught contains a perfect replica of his black-and-white German documentary, itself made with actors reconstructing documents from Dow Chemical Company, as well as Farocki's self-inflicted cigarette burn demonstrating how Dow researched and tested Napalm B for use in Vietnam, in color and in English. This deconstructive work explores documentary technologies to represent history as/through representation. In restaging the already staged piece of documentary history that has never been shown in the United States, Godmilow engages debates about film preservation, cultural memory, and the historical archive. Once again, her political engagement with the form demands that she both trumpet anti-war sentiments and analyze how war itself is synonymous with the fabric of American life, including life as an oppositional filmmaker or her audience.

Nothing simply happens in Godmilow's work; just as history becomes a staged event and actors perform other lives with their bodies, viewers are required to produce meaning through the holes left by the filmmaker. This collaboration demonstrates an extraordinary commitment to furthering awareness of our culture's investments in the visual regime. Her films ask about the conditions of their own possibility. Documentary filmmakers may seek to change the world, but their efforts are premised on technologies and desires—machinery and voyeurism—that perpetuate it. Insisting that theatricality and presence are central to the documentary project, Godmilow traverses borders between liveness and projection, truth and memory; she claims responsibility.

PAULA RABINOWITZ

Biography

Born in Philadelphia in 1943 to a Jewish dentist and a Jewish truant officer. Studied Russian literature at the University of Wisconsin, Madison; never took a film course because there weren't any back then. Made her first film, La Nueva Vida, a feature-length romp in Spanish, with her Puerto Rican boyfriend in 1968, and then her first documentary, Tales, in 1971 with an all-women crew in New York City. Recipient of two Rockefeller Fellowships and a Guggenheim Fellowship, as well as grants from the National Endowment for the Arts. Work has been featured at numerous film festivals and museums around the world, including the 2000 Whitney Museum of American Art Biennial Exhibition. Film Antonia was nominated for an Academy Award and received the Independent New York

Film Critics Award for Best Documentary. Professor of Film, Theater and Television at Notre Dame University. Lives in New York.

Gold, Jack

Jack Gold was a director of both screen and stage works, having made twelve feature films, more than forty films for television, and hundreds of short films for television. He worked in radio as a trainee studio manager, moving to television in 1955 as a trainee assistant film editor for the BBC. He eventually became the film editor on school programmes and topical interview-based investigative documentaries and news reports such as Tonight. He found directing work on the latter, producing from three to five short items a week working mainly with reporters. He left the BBC in 1964 and became a freelance documentary filmmaker, directing television dramas such as The Lump (1967), a Tony Garnett production, and his first fiction film, The Bofors Gun (1968).

Gold had a notable ability to construct a story with a filmic approach, exploiting and showing locations, and interweaving pertinent commentary and music to create film stories, while exploiting the major technological revolution that transformed the documentary—the development of the 16mm camera and the transistorised sound recorder. This made him very much part of the British Realist Tradition that followed Free Cinema.

Journalistic techniques developed during his directing of reportage programmes and documentary essays between 1960 and 1964 for Tonight permeated into the documentaries he made, enabling him to analyse and comment on subjects in observational documentary, while using different forms of counterpoint to enforce his point of view.

His documentaries found another layer of illumination and revelation beyond observation, merging varied aspects to present another synthesis.

Gold explored different documentary techniques including reportage, impressionistic tendencies, analytical vérité and docudrama. Feeling that he was in the hands of his subjects and wanting to have more control in filmmaking, he moved into drama, having already had some experience with the style with The Visit (1959). In recreating real situations in drama, Gold used his experiences from documentary filmmaking regarding technology, location, and subject behaviour. He had experience of reconstruction with docudramas such as Ninety Days (1966) a reconstruction using the protagonist as subject. Before that experience, he had used actors in other reconstructions.

His documentary films were often impressionistic, for example, Wall Street (1966), Famine (1967), and The Schlemiel, the Schlemm, and the Doppess (1990). They often had neither shape nor structure initially—that coming later in the cutting room—and the resulting film was always more than observational as Gold looked for ways to shape or comment on his subject using counterpoint, with a mix of different footage or between picture and sound.

In others, however, he organised and orchestrated his shoots to be shot in a way that meant he attained detailed coverage of a situation scripted and controlled rather than shaped in the cutting room. His move to the single drama resulted in features strong in character and storytelling with a naturalistic base.

ALISTAIR WARDILL

Biography

Born in London, June 28, 1930. Graduated from the University of North London (London Polytechnic), reading economics, in 1950, and University College London, reading law, in 1953, where he worked on amateur films for the College Film Society. In 1954 joined BBC Radio Department as trainee studio manager, where he worked on variety shows. Moved to British television in 1955, first editing then directing factual programmes including current affairs programme Tonight. Moved to feature filmmaking, forging a career that has spanned decades. Has taught at the London International Film School, the Royal College of Art, and the National Film and Television School. Goldovskaya, Marina

Marina Goldovskaya, a prominent Russian documentary filmmaker, gained recognition in the 1970s, 1980s, and 1990s for a series of landmark works documenting Soviet life and history, the collapse of communism, and its turbulent aftermath. Her father, Yevsei Goldovsky, was a cofounder in 1924 of VGIK, the renowned Moscow Film Institute, and a leading Soviet expert in film technology. Goldovskaya graduated from VGIK in 1964 with a degree in cinematography and directing. She spent the first twenty years of her professional life as a newsreel camerawoman and filmmaker for Gos-teleradio, the USSR Central Television agency.

Having found a niche in news documentaries and directed more than twenty-five films, besides working on countless others, Goldovskaya developed a style of documentary portrait using techniques similar to those favored by cinéma vérité and direct cinema in the 1960s: 16mm handheld camera, synch sound, and fly-on-the-wall approach to the material. At this time she had written accounts only of Western documentary pioneers D.A. Pennebaker, Richard Leacock, and Robert Drew.

In her 1981 book, Chelovek krupnim planom/Close-up, Goldovskaya described her method of observation, noting her preference for people obsessed with their professions. She tried this method first in 1968, as a cinematographer in Tkachihi/Weavers, a television documentary about seven alienated female textile workers. The hopelessness of their lives was made visible by this method of filming, which avoided narration or any authorial intervention. The film ran afoul of the censors and was banned. In her directorial debut, Raisa Nemchinskaya, Artistka zirka/Raisa Nemchinskaya, Artist of the Circus (1970), about an old acrobat who does not want to give up the circus, Goldovskaya had the essentials of her method in place. 'My films used to be mostly portraits; I was interested in how to grasp a character, how to reveal it, how to uncover an individual's obsessions, motives and moral principles', she wrote in a 1991 article for Iskusstvo Kino.

This strategy allowed the filmmaker to find drama outside of politics, thus minimizing clashes with the censors. Her first documentary with a clear political subject was Vosmoj Direktor/Eighth Director (1981), the profile of a factory manager who fights the system. It was shown on prime-time television, and caused a storm in the press.

The filmmaker's reputation as the leading documentarian of Soviet Russia was secured during perestroika. She took up Premier Mikhail Gorbachev's call for reform and transparency in two polemic works: Archangelsky Mujik/The Peasant from Archangelsk (1986) and Vlast' Solovetskaya/Solovki Power (1988). Both documentaries tackled with honesty and candor—and at the time, considerable personal risk—the failure of Soviet economic methods and the Leninist origins of the Gulag concentration camp system.

Archangelsky Mujik profiled a farmer, Nikolai Sivkov, who fights to take charge of sixty cows on his own farm. He speaks to the camera, extolling the virtues of private property and deploring the inefficiency of the collective farming system. 'In "the land where socialism has triumphed" it was a truly heroic deed,' Goldovskaya wrote in the Iskusstvo Kino article. Banned after its first broadcast, the documentary was later reaired under the policy of glasnost.

In 1988 it won the top national prize for best documentary.

The film was a turning point in the filmmaker's career because it showed her ability to turn a simple character into a political metaphor about larger issues. This interweaving of the personal with the political, and the historical, a trademark of the director's work since the 1980s, would reach a higher degree of artistry and complexity in Solovki Power.

A 35mm feature-length documentary produced by Mosfilm, the Moscow State studio, Solovki Power turns the double meaning of its title, Solovki as Soviet might, into a political metaphor: this medieval monastery on a remote island in the White Sea, operating as a concentration camp between 1923 and 1939, becomes a symbol of the regime's destruction of dissidence. The film skillfully combines the testimonies of survivors and prison guards, with present-day color footage of the location, and a 1927 government propaganda short about the 'reeducation' of Soviet citizens in this 'model' camp. The soundtrack counterpoints the sober voice of a narrator with heartbreaking readings from letters found in the camp and the haunting recollections of former prisoners.

Solovki Power became one of the filmic landmark events of glasnost. Initially banned, it was later released and won several top awards at the national and international film festivals. This success led to European and American funding of Goldovskaya's 1990s projects. Dom s rizariami/The House on Arbat Street (1993), for example, is another remarkable instance of her ability to capture Soviet history through individual stories. The documentary profiles the Filatov House, a luxurious apartment building of the Romanov era located in Moscow's central Arbat district. With imaginatively edited interviews, old photos, propaganda, and entertainment films, seventy years of the Soviet experiment in communism emerge. These intimate portraits, laced with vivid recollections, depict a human fresco marked by suffering and loss.

Compelled to record the seismic changes brought about by the breakup of the Soviet Union, Goldovskaya made a series of journals, in video and film, chronicling the first post-Soviet times as they affected herself, her friends in the intelligentsia, and ordinary Muscovites. The emphasis is not on the fall of the Soviet regime per se, but on the portrait of individuals caught in the collapse of the system. These video diaries marry the techniques of a vérité style with an openly subjective involvement in the subject: Goldovskaya and her ubiquitous camera become an integral part of the films. Vkus svobody/A Taste of Freedom 1991, Oskolki zerkala/The Shattered Mirror—A Diary of a Time of Trouble (1992), Povezlo roditsia v Rossii/Lucky to be Born in Russia (1994), and The Prince is Back (1999) cover a decade from the perspective of a passionate observer, who is also a cautious optimist. A Taste of Freedom and The Prince is Back profile a television journalist and an engineer of aristocratic origins obsessed with achieving goals such as truth in the news and the restoration of an ancestral palace; these efforts become, once more, a rich metaphor of the times.

Naum Kleiman, director of the Film Museum in Moscow, remarked in 1998 that Goldovskaya's work 'presents small individual lives in the larger context of history. In our cinema, we traditionally showed the larger view, with a few figures inside. Her reverse angle is very important. It's as if she's painting a fresco; you can examine each figure by itself, but together they form a panorama of the entire country.'

Now living in the United States, Goldovskaya combines a teaching career at UCLA with work on two ambitious projects: an oral history of the documentary cinema and Russian Chronicles: Diary of Change, a portrait of her generation, for which she has amassed more than four hundred hours of footage.

The artistic and historical significance of Marina Goldovskaya's body of work makes it an indispensable document to examine the life and times of twentieth-century Russia.

Goldson, Annie

Annie Goldson's career offers telling evidence of the predicament of the politically concerned documentary filmmaker in a millennial culture of globalisation, electronic media, and multinational capitalism. Her work mobilises the force of factual information, personal testimony, social commentary against the oppressive realities of social injustice, and human rights abuse. It often mounts a critique of the recording and reporting techniques of the media, thus revealing the ideological basis of their claim to objectivity and truth. From this perspective, documentary provides the means for promoting an awareness of the cultural politics of image production. It gives voice and visibility to the stories of those whose freedom of speech, political beliefs, or legal status is not recognised within the dominant system of representation.

Yet despite affirming the values of difference and self-determination, Goldson's dependence on a liberal-democratic understanding of documentary's function within the public sphere—as social and moral conscience, arbiter of justice, confessor, advocate, accuser—reinstalls the procedures of address and authority that guaranteed an earlier paternalistic and moderately progressive tradition of documentary filmmaking. Such a position fails to acknowledge the degree to which it participates in the maintenance and revision of those discursive and institutional structures that facilitate the circulation of power and knowledge in a globalised economy of information and media imagery. The inauguration of a postcolonial model of documentary practice, to which Annie Goldson's work contributes, must equally interrogate the vestiges of imperial and instrumental reason that govern its own method and message.

Goldson's development as a documentary filmmaker roughly coincides with New Zealand's steady integration and assumption of the values of a 'knowledge-based society'. Her films provide an interesting example of the role of documentary in negotiating the transition from ideological state apparatus to the conceptual hegemony of communication as a world system. They also reflect an unresolved conflict between a documentary practice that serves the interests of a local/national community and a global/multinational constituency. In Framing the Panthers (black and white, 1991), Counter-Terror: The North of Ireland (1990), and Punitive Damage (1999), Goldson takes an oppositional position against the processes of global imperialism and media (dis)information, whereas Wake (1994), Seeing Red (1995), and Georgie Girl (2001) establish a range of strategic alliances with the production of a national image and identity that is more in keeping with the restructuring of New Zealand society as a post-modern, postindustrial culture.

Between 1990 and 1993, Goldson produced and directed a number of videos that expose the practices of racism and colonialism in Puerto Rico, Northern Ireland, and the United States. These pieces possess a philosophy of social criticism, political education, and media activism. They provide an alternative source of information, interpretation, and expression for communities and causes that are ghettoised or suppressed, and supply the method and materials for a counteranalysis of historical events and current affairs. Goldson's political agenda also includes a reflexive critique of the media. To this end, she clearly shows how the act of representation is ideologically motivated. For instance, African American high school students admit their lack of knowledge about the Panthers in strictly staged interviews, the construction of news clips is analysed to reveal how the British authorities 'frame' the story of 'terrorist' incidents in Northern Ireland.

On returning to New Zealand, Goldson abandoned a direct activist stance. Rather, she assumes a critically reflexive attitude towards personal and public history. The emphasis shifts from issues to ideas, from content to concept. The language of film theory and cultural studies increasingly informs her films. Wake examines the conditions of visibility that permit a colonialist politics of looking and naming. The paintings of the early settlers and her father's home movies illustrate the immigrant's reinscription of landscape and community as markers of a displaced identity. Stylistically, the film foregrounds the codes of documentary representation with its use of narrative voice, fictional reconstruction, found footage from the family album, and popular film.

Goldson perfects these techniques of formal and theoretical reflection in Seeing Red, a film about the scandal that erupted in 1949 around Cecil Holmes, a young filmmaker with Communist sympathies. Subject matter and cinematic style thoroughly reinforce the critical project of reimagining the tradition of New Zealand documentary and redefining its place in the present. Goldson composes an historical narrative that locates her own work in a political and artistic context. The story of Cecil Holmes acts as a myth for the institution of a new chapter in the development of a national film culture. Seeing Red constitutes its subject as a means of authorising its own discourse. Its recuperation of a forgotten cinematic legend parallels the successful effort of the New Zealand Film Archive in recovering and restoring the nation's moving picture heritage. Goldson brilliantly uses archival footage, particularly from The Coaster, a film that Holmes made for the National Film Unit (NFU), to support her reading of documentary history. The NFU, established with John Grierson's advice, promoted the interests of social and national unity. Goldson accommodates for the demise of such an institutional and ideological framework by endorsing the discourse of the academy and the archive. The university and the arts sector lend credibility to the rebranding of New Zealand's past for consumption as a contemporary commodity. In the process, a state-sponsored, civically sanctioned ideal of documentary as a public service is recast as a professionally accredited enterprise in managing and marketing the national imaginary.

Punitive Damage and Georgie Girl complete the cycle of legitimation for documentary as a homegrown form of social discourse. They successfully present stories of local interest—a mother's fight for justice after the death of her son in an East Timor massacre, the life and times of the world's first transsexual, Maori MP—according to an international standard of value. An official round of film festivals, conferences, awards and prizes, funding panels, press releases, public talks, and interviews guarantee the quality of the film's documentary veracity. The global resurgence of documentary as a form of serious entertainment fosters an audience and artist with a shared set of moral and political reflexes: cultural tolerance, emotional empathy, and human understanding. Annie Goldson fits the bill well.

Good Woman of Bangkok, The

(Australia, O'Rourke, 1991)

The Good Woman of Bangkok is a controversial account of the Australian documentary filmmaker Dennis O'Rourke's nine-month involvement with a Thai prostitute named Yaiwalak Conchanakun, called Aoi. Modeled after Bertolt Brecht's The Good Woman of Szechuan, which uses the central figure of a prostitute to examine the possibility of living a good life in a corrupt world, O'Rourke's film explores the conjunctions of sex and money in the East-meets-West world of Bangkok and examines the ethical complexity of his multiple roles as client, lover, and director in relation to Aoi. Although O'Rourke remains an off-camera voice throughout the film, his work is centrally concerned with his intercession into and interrogation of Aoi's life, which culminates in his offer to rescue her from prostitution by buying her and her family a rice farm. O'Rourke provocatively positions his very personal film as 'documentary fiction', an antithesis of the objective documentary that rearranges chronology for dramatic effect and self-consciously examines the voyeuristic nature of filmmaking. Although the film centers on the life of Aoi, it indicates the elusive edges of a larger story about the intercultural, interracial, and economic complexity of postcolonial capitalism.

The film begins after the collapse of O'Rourke's marriage, when he travels to the notorious Patpong region of Bangkok to explore the nature of love and sexual desire. The forty-three-year-old O'Rourke hires the twenty-five-year-old Aoi for her sexual services and begins to film her as she tells a life story full of victimization and exploitation. The film traces the trajectory of Aoi's life: her birth into a poor peasant family, her parenting by an alcoholic father, and her pain from an untreated birth defect that has left her blind in one eye. She spent her adolescence in servitude before making a bad marriage to a man who deserted her when she was two months' pregnant. Aoi eventually moved to Bangkok at the urging of her mother and worked in the Patpong area to support her family and pay off their debts. The camera unblinkingly follows Aoi as she plies her trade at night, tells her story during the day, and performs the intimate acts of eating, sleeping, and tending to her dead father's shrine. Aoi eventually moves to the rice farm that O'Rourke has promised to buy her and her family. The Good Woman of Bangkok concludes with an epilogue that reveals Aoi's return to the sex trade underworld, from which O'Rourke attempted to rescue her. The reason for her return to Bangkok is never revealed, suggesting that there is much that O'Rourke does not know and perhaps cannot know about Aoi, bound as he is by cultural, economic, and sexual lines that frame Aoi as an ever-elusive subject.

Gorin, Jean-Pierre

Jean-Pierre Gorin was initially known for his collaboration with Jean-Luc Godard in the late 1960s and early 1970s. Working collectively under the banner of the Dziga Vertov Group, the New Left activist, who later said 'I'm a Nietzschean-Marxist ... certainly more Nietzschean than Marxist' (Walsh 1976), codirected a series of formally experimental films strongly influenced by the theoretical debates of the time, questioning bourgeois notions of representation and ideology and exploring alternatives in works such as Wind from the East (1969), Struggle in Italy (1970), Tout va bien (1972), and Letter to Jane (1972). Godard, while ultimately sharing coauthorship for these works, maintains that the majority of the initial concepts came from his younger collaborator. Gorin for his part has insisted that the creative relationship was based on a 'constant exchange of ideas'.

Poto and Cabengo (1978), his first film after leaving Paris for California in 1975, was a documentary portrait of seven-year-old identical twins, Virginia and Grace Kennedy, who had apparently developed their own private language. Stylistically a departure from the rigours of the earlier work, the project was as much an essay on language and communication as a wry outsider's commentary on the underside of the American dream as reflected in the isolated social circumstances of the German-American family. The second of the Southern California trilogy, Routine Pleasures (1986) juxtaposes the singularly unspectacular activities of a club of model train enthusiasts with an exploration of the creative process of carpenter, film critic, and artist Manny Farber (who had originally invited Gorin to the University of California at San Diego). The miniature train sets of the middle-aged men ('... in [a] hangar on Jimmy Durante Boulevard across from the Bing Crosby Hall') seem to preserve America in a nostalgic microcosm, mirrored by and in contrast to the epic landscapes and movie myths of Farber's paintings. Switching between black and white and colour, the film is a celebration of 'Flaubertian dullness', undoubtedly inspired by Farber's dictum on filmmaking that Gorin summarised thus: 'I make films in my backyard [...] the way I define my subject matter is by planting myself on the ground, whirling around my own axis, extending my two arms, and within that square foot radius, defining where my subjects are' (Seidenberg 1992).

My Crasy Life (1992), which was awarded the Special Jury Prize at Sundance in 1992, looks at the everyday lives of Samoan gangs in Los Angeles. Gorin and his producer Dan Marks wrote the film in close collaboration with the gang members, scripting scenes that were then acted out by the gangsters themselves. The formal compositions of cinematographer Babette Mangolte (who shot Routine Pleasures), as well as fictional elements such as a quasi-human talking computer in a patrol car, distance the film strongly from vérité and hark back to earlier experimentation with genres.

Although his output has been limited in quantity over the past decade, Gorin's playful exploration of the no-man's-land between documentary, fiction, and the essay form mark him as an influential innovator, one who can no longer be regarded as wholly European or American but perhaps both.

Grabe, Hans-Dieter

Hans-Dieter Grabe has had a long and varied career in documentary film, as a director, writer, cinematographer, and producer. From 1963 to 2002, Grabe worked at the ZDF (Zweiten Deutschen Fernsehen), the second national German television network, making more than fifty television documentaries during his tenure.

By the beginning of the 1970s Grabe had found his own style of documentary editing. He produces dialogue-based films, which focus on drawing out the memories and life experiences of the filmed subjects. The film's titles are frequently based on a headline drawn from the news. Grabe looks for and focuses on the real people behind the event, shunning sensationalism.

Grabe has a wide spectrum of themes. He has produced films about the Berlin Trümmerfrauen (1968), about a former prisoner at a concentration camp (1972), a Varietékünstler, who lets people shoot themselves (1972), about the wife of a child murderer (1977), the survivors of a mine disaster (1979), a German resistance fighter (1983), a Turkish worker who has killed her daughter (1986), a ZDF colleague diagnosed with cancer (1987), about the parents of a child with multiple disabilities (1990) and about the victims of war. The films are connected by their focus on the themes of responsibility, guilt, misery, and fear as they stem from individual personal experiences. 'Better more than less': with these words, Grabe summarizes his guiding principle as documentary film director (Voss 2000: 13).

An historical image is usually projected at the beginning of a Grabe film, and a brief commentary provides the necessary background information. Grabe then withdraws the explanatory information, limits the use of voice-over narration, and relies primarily on his principal characters to convey what is essential.

Grabe has worked with the same camera crew repeatedly, including Horst Bendel, Fritz Adam, Per Mustelin, and Carl Franz Hutterer, and with the same editor, Elfi Kreiter. They all refrain from making use of any sensationalistic effects. Camera movements are subtle and limited, and pacing is generally slow and consistent.

Grabe's conversation with his film subjects is a necessary step that directly impacts the outcome of the film. After a lengthy preliminary conversation, he interviews his subjects on-camera, attempting to be friendly while maintaining some degree of distance, which he calls 'positive distance'. The filmed exchange mimics a therapeutic session, in which people who have repressed their emotional reactions to past events gradually reveal their emotional wounds. Grabe creates spaces full of silence, in which he focuses on the faces of his subjects, to convey the full impact of the words previously spoken. The intense conversation slowly approaches the point at which the emotional cocoon breaks and tears run; it is a cathartic moment.

Grabe achieved the most consequential effect of this emotional close-up in the film Mendel Schainfelds zweite Reise nach Deutschland/Mendel Szajnfeld's Second Journey to Germany (1972). The film was shot exclusively on a train. Grabe documented the journey of former Polish forced laborer Szajnfeld from Oslo, where he had lived since his release from camp, to Munich, where he wants to obtain a medical certificate that will allow him to receive a higher pension based on his inability to work, which is a long-term consequence of his time in camp. During this journey, Szajnfeld slowly opens up, until he speaks of a particularly traumatic event: desperately taking a piece of bread from a deceased person. He admits that this memory still tortures him and says 'perhaps somebody would have needed it more than me'.

Grabe's films expose both psychological and physical wounds. Shots of the film Nur leichte

Kämpfe im Raum Da Nang/Only Light Skirmishes in the Da Nang Area (1970), were taken in 1970 in the German hospital-ship Helgoland. The title comes from a short press report about the Vietnam War, which had been already almost forgotten in Europe. The film shows the effects of 'light skirmishes' on the so-called 'civil population'. It is a pitiless film that is difficult to watch. Grabe shows, in precise detail, bodies destroyed by gunshots, lacerated by mines, and burned by napalm, and lets a doctor explain each of the wounds. By forcing us to look, he gives the victims their dignity back: 'we had to show the devastation of the body in precise detail—we owed it to those broken people. They offered us their bodies to film them and therefore we felt this was a way to contribute to the ending of war' (Goldsmith 2003: 50).

Hiroshima, Nagasaki—Atombombenopfer sagen aus/Hiroshima, Nagasaki—Atom Bomb Victims Speak Out (1985), Grabe's first long documentary film, was made to commemorate the fortieth anniversary of the nuclear bombing of Japan by the United States. The central section of the film is a mute sequence, which initially shows parts of American archive material. For example, doctors bend over a boy, whose back is a single bloody and purulent wound, in which they sink their cotton swabs. These images are followed by pictures of the same man in front of Grabe's camera. He shows his deformed body and explains that the skin on his back is dead, he is cold even during the summer because he has no more fatty tissue, and he may never eat until he is full because by doing so, the skin stretches intolerably.

Grabe's interest in his subjects occasionally extends past a single film. For example, Grabe met Do Sanh, a severely wounded Vietnamese boy, while shooting Nur leichte Kämpfe im Raum Da Nang. He made five films about Do Sanh over a period of twenty-eight years. Do Sanh—Der letzte Film/Do Sanh—The Last Film (1998) was completed after Sanh's death, which resulted from the long-term consequences of his wartime injuries.

Grabe viewed television as the appropriate medium for his political films because it is such a universal and populist vehicle.

Biography

Born March 6, 1937 in Dresden, Germany. In February 1945, after the destruction of Dresden, relocated to Cottbus with his family, where he attended school until 1955. From 1955 to 1959 Grabe studied film direction, specializing in documentary film, at the Deutschen Hochschule für Filmkunst (German University for Cinematic Art, today University for Film and Television 'Konrad Wolf') in Potsdam-Babelsberg. From the beginning of 1960 to the end of 1962 worked as a freelancer at Bavarian Television. From the end of 1962 until his retirement in March 2002, worked as an editor with the Zweiten Deutschen Fernsehen (ZDF, Second Channel of German Television) in Mainz. As author and director has contributed to several magazines and made over fifty full-length documentary films. Has been awarded the Special Prize of the Union of Asiatic Broadcast and TV Organizations, the Special Prize of the Film and Television Federation, the Robert Geisendörfer Prize (twice), the Eduard Rhein Prize (twice), the Adolf Grimme Prize (three times), the ARTE-Documentary Film Prize, the Peace Film Prize of the International Film Festival of Berlin, as well as the Grand Prix of all Categories at the Festival of the Independent Film in Brussels, among others. In 2002, received the Federal Cross of Merit.

Graef, Roger

Roger Graef is a highly acclaimed observational documentary filmmaker renowned for working in 'a very austere' direct cinema mode (Winston 1995: 207). Graef and his long-term film crew, which included cinematographer Charles Stewart, developed a series of work practices through which they hoped to minimise the intervention of the film crew and gain the trust of those being filmed. Their code of practice included no use of scoops, a firm agreement to film only what was previously agreed upon, and an agreement to offer a degree of confidentiality on material that the crew might come across during filming, careful consideration of camera angles, no lights, no staging of events, no interviews, but rather observation of events.

Graef's major work included the television series The Space Between Words (1972) about interpersonal and public communication; Decisions (1975–6), which observed the decision-making process and workings of powerful institutions, such as The British Steel Corporation and Occidental Petroleum, as well as Hammersmith Council; and, State of the Nation (1973–5), which included two programmes filmed inside the headquarters of the Common Market, in Brussels, and the Department of Industry.

One of Graef's later television programmes made for the BBC in 1981 was to prove controversial and was at the centre of a public outcry on police procedures. A Complaint of Rape, an episode from his series Police (1981), showed the insensitive handling of a rape victim by three Thames Valley police officers and provoked change in the way that the police deal with rape cases. Twenty years later Graef returned to make another film about the Thames Valley Police, Police 2001, which proved to be less contentious and, in a departure from previous practice, Graef appeared on screen.

Graef's documentary films set out to demystify the power brokers in society and, in doing so, made an informed contribution to the democratic process. Through the use of classic observational filming conventions, audiences were offered insight into the decision-making processes that affect ordinary people's lives.

Granton Trawler

(UK, Cavalcanti, 1934)

The shot list of the National Film Archive for Granton Trawler is as follows: 'The work of a trawler on the Viking Bank in the North Sea [...] The trawler Isabella Greig moored at Granton. She sets off. On the outward journey the crew check and prepare the nets. On arrival at the fishing grounds the trawl is lowered. A storm blows up and the trawler has to ride out the rough seas. The seagulls circle the ship. When calm returns the nets are hauled in by the crew and the catch hoisted on board, as the seagulls flock round. The fish are tipped out on the deck. The crew gut the fish and throw them into baskets. The trawler on the homeward run, the pilot at the wheel, sunset over the sea.'

Granton Trawler can be thought of as a shorter version of Drifters, lyric rather than epic in its intentions and form. Grierson himself shot it on a busman's holiday in the North Sea. Edgar Anstey edited it under his supervision (as he had Industrial Britain). Though shot during the Empire Marketing Board (EMB) period, it was finished after the unit had been transferred to the General Post Office (GPO). Cavalcanti added the sound, one of his first creative acts after arriving at the GPO Film Unit. The soundtrack is made up of the rhythmic thumping of the ship's engine, the creaking of its rigging, the cries of gulls, the harsh metallic sound of a winch playing out cable, muffled shouts of the men as they pull the nets, a repeated fragment of a plaintive tune played on an accordion and another whistled, and random and mostly unintelligible comments from members of the crew. There is no commentary. The sounds were all post-recorded, simulated in the studio (one of the 'fishermen's' voices is Grierson's).

The sounds are laid over a succession of impressionistic views of parts of the ship, the fishermen's activities, and the shifting horizon, which becomes vertiginous in high seas. It is as if the makers of the film, and therefore the viewers, were standing on the trawler looking about as their eyes are led to one thing or another while their ears register certain sounds. Simple as it is, the track is a remarkably strong component of the picture. This montage of seemingly natural sounds arbitrarily modified and arranged is what would come to be called musique concrète. Not only was it an aesthetic experiment ahead of its time, but it represents the kind of poetry that can be achieved by a stylized rendering of reality completely controlled by the creator(s). It has not dated and is still in active nontheatrical distribution.

Grass

(US, Schoedsack, Cooper, Harrison, 1925)

Along with Robert Flaherty's Nanook of the North (1922), Ernest B. Schoedsack, Merian Cooper, and Marguerite Harrison's Grass (1925) helped to define the explorer-as-documentarist tradition in nonfiction film. Filmed under dire circumstances, as well as financial difficulties, Grass, nevertheless, is a unique example of an attempt, in the words of the filmmakers themselves, to 'dramatize exploration'. That it is not as well known as Flaherty's ethnographic film can be attributed to its filmmakers' hardships in compiling their footage into a cohesive narrative framework. The subject of human beings living and surviving in conflict with their natural surroundings is the primary attraction of these films. In the case of Grass, that subject is not an individual, as in the titular hero of Flaherty's film, but a nomadic tribe.

Ernest B. Schoedsack and Merian C. Cooper first formulated the idea of making an epic film set in some little-known region of the world in London. The original plan was to film a nomadic tribe during their annual migration for survival. The Kurdistans were the people of choice for their initial film project. Schoedsack had served as a second assistant cameraman for Mack Sennett at Keystone studios and also as a news photographer in Europe during and after World War I. Cooper was a decorated pilot during the war, as well as a worker for the American Relief Association after the war. After a brief stint as a reporter for the Daily News and The New York Times, Cooper signed on as first officer on the schooner Wisdom II. The purpose of the voyage was to collect information on little-known areas of the world for a book, magazine articles, and motion picture films. When the expedition's cameraman left, Cooper contacted Schoedsack, whom he had met on several occasions in Europe. When the expedition ended after the Wisdom II was disabled during a storm, Cooper and Schoedsack began making plans for their own epic film.

With a financial capital of $10,000, the two explorer-photographers, now accompanied by Marguerite Harrison, a journalist, made their way to Ankara, Turkey. The plan was to cross Anatolia to Turkestan and join with the Kurds to accompany their migratory route. The Turks, who had recently driven both the French and German forces out of Anatolia, were highly suspicious of all foreigners and delayed the intended expedition for several weeks. By the time they had crossed the border into French-occupied Syria, the only nomadic tribe they encountered were the Beduins. A British official, Sir Arnold Wilson, told Cooper about the Bakhtiari tribe in southern Persia. These nomadic people made an annual trek through mountainous terrain in search of green pastureland. Cooper, Schoedsack, and Harrison met with the khans at Shustar, the capital of Arabistan, and were given permission to join one of their tribes on its annual migration. The Great Trek of the Bakhtiari, accompanied for the first time by foreigners, began on April 17, 1924. The migration involved thirty thousand men, women, and children, with herds totaling approximately two hundred and fifty thousand animals including sheep, goats, cattle, horses, asses, and camels.

The people traveled along five separate routes; about one-sixth of this number was represented by the Baba Ahmedi tribe, which Cooper, Schoedsack, and Harrison elected to accompany because their route was the most difficult. Grass was the filmed record of that expedition.

Grass is the account of the annual migration of the Bakhtiari people in what is now Iran. The film begins with an opening shot of a camel caravan traveling east. A map of the region denotes Constantinople, Persia, and Arabia. The caravan encounters several natural obstacles including a sandstorm and mountains before meeting up with the 'Forgotten People', the Bakhtiari and their tribal leader, Haidar Khan, and his son, Lufta. The Bakhtiari are preparing to migrate to the east for more fertile lands. They first encounter the river Karun, which the Bakhtiari cross by constructing rafts supported by inflated goat skins. They also cross through several mountainous terrains and finally come to the dreaded Zardeh Kuh, described by the filmmakers as 'twelve thousand feet of defiance in rock and snow and ice'. The ascent is accomplished when the Bakhtiari dig a path through the snow and ice, and climb barefoot, because shoes were as 'useless as bedroom slippers in a blizzard'. The final descent from the mountain top into the fertile valley below ends the epic trek and the film.

The lack of a specific subject for their 'natural drama' cost the explorer-filmmakers both time and footage. When Cooper, Schoedsack, and Harrison met up with the Bakhtiari, the tribe were making preparations for their journey, and the filmmakers had used a considerable amount of film while they were delayed in Ankara. Much of the footage that was shot of the trek had to be taken during a short time span, as the tribe slept during the hot hours of the day and traveled at night. When the migration ended after the crossing of Zardeh Kuh, Schoedsack had only eighty feet of film left and quickly shot an ending for the film. When the filmmakers were in Paris, they realized that it was far from a finished product. Cooper and Schoedsack decided that one of them would return to the Bakhtiari to record additional footage, while the other would try to raise more money by writing articles about their expedition. The additional footage would focus more clearly on the tribal chief, Haidar, his two wives, and his son. This film footage was never shot and consequently, the resulting film, according to many critics (as well as the filmmakers themselves), lacks a central human focus.

The economic market for travel films (which necessitated that the filmmakers shoot whatever they thought would make an interesting subject) initiated a hasty and disjointed filmmaking process. Travel films, particularly of exotic places and peoples, were extremely popular in the 1920s. Travelogs or 'scenics' were popularized by Burton Holmes, whose short films usually situated a Western adventurer in exotic settings.

Robert Flaherty, with the success of Nanook of the North (1922), proved that the personalization of a subject for a documentary could be as exciting as a fiction film. Although it does have some footage of Haidar and his son, Lufta, Grass, out of necessity, concentrates on the Bakhtiari tribe itself, primarily in long shots of the migration. These are dramatic, particularly the crossing of both the river Karun and the mountain Zardeh Kuh, but the overall effect is weakened by the lack of human interest.

Once the film was bought for distribution by Jesse Lasky at Paramount Studios, additional footage (of the filmmakers themselves) and inter-titles were added. Though the film was not a huge box office success, it did allow Schoedsack and Cooper to finance and eventually produce other projects of a more fictive nature, primarily Chang (1927), The Four Feathers (1929), The Most Dangerous Game/The Hounds of Zaroff (1932), and a film in which they lampooned themselves, as well as appearing as biplane pilots in the climatic sequence, King Kong (1933). Grass, nevertheless, still remains a good example of the early romanticist documentary style, which offered its audiences a glimpse into another culture and its epic struggle for survival.

Great Adventure, The

(Sweden, Sucksdorff, 1953–5)

Arne Sucksdorff's feature-length debut, his best-known effort, and almost certainly his greatest, most influential achievement, Det stora äventyret/The Great Adventure occupies an important yet troublesome spot in documentary history, because it seems like one of his least documentarian films. It has been claimed that it founded 'the style that stretches the definition of a documentary to its absolute limits. It is held together by a continuous narrative where the images illustrate the voice's narration, and creates a closed world that is built on assumptions about the state of things rather than their reality' (Soila, Soderberg Widding and Iversen 1998). The film strikes many as a break in Sucksdorff's work, given its fictional framing story, narrated by an adult voice as the movingly poetic memory of the elder of two brothers. Sucksdorff, acting for the only time in his films, plays a small role as the father of two boys, Anders and the younger Kjell (played by Sucksdorff's own son Kjell), who capture an otter and secretly try to raise it as a pet. Others, however, productively read the film as the summation of Sucksdorff's work up to this point, imposing a slight narrative framework and themes consistent with his oeuvre upon footage essentially documentarian in its shooting, style, and spirit.

The film is justly noted for many individual shots and sequences. Sucksdorff's penchant for water imagery is evident from the early shots of water beads on reeds to those on a spider's web, to later shots of icicles and water ripples evoking nature's vibrant delicacy. The work and the world of humans can be beautiful, too, as with shots of a threshing machine. Most famous, however, are the animal scenes, often presented without narration; the film does not show a human until seven minutes in, and the story of the boys and their otter does not commence until the film is half over. The mating of the wood grouse combines fascinating footage with the careful, foregrounded use of sound typical of Sucksdorff. His legendary patience in seeking shots, many in close-up, shows in shots of an owl swooping down to catch a dormouse, a fox cub tugging at a sibling's corpse, or in the best-known example of a lynx waiting in a tree. One is left to wonder if the boys were indeed close to a lynx as one swish pan seems to indicate. Such effects blend seamlessly into those created by editing, or the stylized montage of spring's return.

The film succeeds remarkably at balancing its documentary and fictional aspects. The extended nature scenes, so rewarding in themselves, never make the story of the boys seem perfunctory or forgotten, while the 'adventure' of the boys never imposes itself so strongly as to make one feel that this is not a nature documentary. Given that the division between the world of choice-making humans and that of instinctual animal nature is so important to Sucksdorff (viz., A Divided World), perhaps this is why he had such insight into children, those creatures who most closely span the divide, driven more by base desires and impulses. When the boys slide down a snowy hill, we then hilariously see 'Ottie' belly-wop as well. At the same time, the interaction between humans and animals is at the heart of his work, whether in the story of the boys and their pet, the nuisance and economic threat the fox presents to farmers, or even a shot of an owl appearing to watch airplanes skywriting. Sucksdorff's flair for simulating point-of-view shots from animal as well as human perspective is on display, lending credence to the nonjudgmental claims he made: 'I try to show an acceptance of life and other human beings. After all, one of the main human rights is the right to make mistakes!' (quoted in Cowie 1985).

That said, mistakes by animals or humans can prove fatal, and Sucksdorff, in typical form, never flinches from the cruelty of circumstance, the constraints that humanity places on animals, and the harsh ironies of the wild. The most piercing example occurs as the fox escapes with its takings from the henhouse. The dog pulls away from his post and dashes after the fox, who seems doomed, given his size and the burden he carries. Ironically, the dog's dangling chain gets caught on a branch, trapping the dog, who soon falls prey to a lynx. Linking the animals with humans, the film reminds us of the lynx when Anders is startled by suddenly falling snow clumps. The parallels, however, are even richer, for Nature appears to give its replacements. By February 'Ottie' is tame enough to know his own name and to follow the boys around like a dog. Still, the otter and the foxes responsible for the dog's death play together, and Ottie, too, pilfering food, becomes a menace to the fishermen. The boys' toughest realization of that lingering division, though, comes near the end. For all of Ottie's apparent bonding with them, he is also content to simply run off and return to the wild. The powers of recovery in nature, however, be they human or animal, are considerable. Kjell's blabbing to others about Ottie's existence is forgiven, and it only takes a flock of cranes on the wing to enchant the boys once again. The gentle narration, highlighting the theme of 'life as a great adventure', is not as sentimental as it might first seem: 'No happiness of ours exists without heartache [...] no love without anxiety[...] In the forest so little time for grief, and joy is short-lived too.'

(US, Bach, 1994)

A celebration of the famous photograph of nearly sixty jazz luminaries posing in front of a Harlem brownstone apartment block, taken by Art Kane for Esquire magazine in 1958, A Great Day in Harlem has some striking parallels with Jazz on a Summer's Day (1959). Kane had been a magazine art director hitherto, this being his first photographic assignment; Bert Stern had been an advertising stills photographer before directing his first (and only) film. The photograph was another instance of the interface, in the late 1950s, between commercial art and jazz iconography. Where it differs, however, is in the kinds of iconography deployed. The bustling inner-city backdrop captured in pristine monochrome contrasts sharply with Stern's boldly coloured juxtaposition of old money and youthful exuberance.

A Great Day in Harlem pays tribute to as many of the musicians featured in the photograph as can be crammed into its sixty minutes, ranging from veteran stride pianist Willie 'The Lion' Smith to then-younger musicians on the rise, including Sonny Rollins and Horace Silver. That it avoids feeling repetitive can be attributed to skilful pacing. It can also be attributed to the different kinds of footage utilised. Jean Bach, the director, conducted contemporary interviews with surviving participants on their reminiscences of the day and of the other musicians featured in the photograph. A sometime journalist in Chicago, later a radio and television producer, Bach had a long-standing acquaintance with many of her interviewees. The ensuing mutual respect resulted in a series of engaging interviews, by turns moving, elegiac, hilarious, with musicians whose experiences, in most cases, made them reluctant to talk expansively with the uninitiated.

The somewhat visually bland interview footage is combined with home movie photography, in colour, shot on the day by veteran swing bassist, Milt Hinton, or his wife, Mona. The vibrancy of this material is, again, reminiscent of the quality of immediacy in the cinematography of Jazz on a Summer's Day. This, in turn, is interposed with black-and-white archive footage of the musicians being discussed, mostly from 1950s television, characterised by low-key lighting and grainy film stock.

In these ways, the effect is of cumulative layers of an artfully constructed authenticity: in the iconography of the photograph, in the other contemporaneous photography capturing the event, and in the direct testimony of those who were there. Hearing the music on the sound track, of which improvisation was an important component, alongside the awareness of the intervention of several decades since its recording, is analogous to the film overall, in its chronological distance from Kane's photograph, and in its fusion of the here and now and the elegiac. Once an artefact of glossy contemporaneity, the photograph now acts as a springboard to a multifaceted oral history. As such, the film is not only an invaluable resource for those wishing to know more about jazz; it is also a nuanced meditation on the nature of time and memory.

Great White Silence, The

(UK, Ponting, 1924)

The Great White Silence was the first feature documentary version of the footage shot by the photographer and cinematographer Herbert Ponting (1870–1935) during the failed attempt to reach the South Pole on foot by a team lead by the naval officer and explorer Robert Falcon Scott in 1910–12.

Scott was the best known of a group of polar explorers who mounted expeditions on foot across the Arctic and Antarctic continents during the late Victorian and early Edwardian period. The 1910–12 expedition—his last, as it would turn out—followed a previous unsuccessful attempt to reach the Pole in 1901–4, and voyages by others including his arch-rival Ernest Shackleton and the Australian Sir Douglas Mawson. Their work coincided with the rapid growth of still photography as a mass medium and of cinema as industrialised entertainment, hence the reason both Scott and Shackleton enlisted the services of cameramen on their later journeys. Fundraising was always a problem, and advance sales of the distribution rights for both still and moving images provided much-needed income (it took Scott more than a year to raise the £40,000 needed to finance his attempt on the Pole).

Scott's second voyage was an unmitigated disaster. His colleagues were largely inexperienced, and the party relied heavily on untested motorised sledges, all of which broke down at an early stage in the expedition. Scott and his party of five colleagues had to manually haul their supplies almost eight hundred miles from Ross Island to the South Pole. They achieved this on January 18, 1912, only to discover that Scott's rival, the Norwegian Roald Amundsen, had got there first. As a result of a combination of exhaustion and unusually bad weather on the return trip, Scott's party became stranded and all eventually died.

Despite the expedition not only having been a failure, but one that could have been easily foreseen and prevented (as demonstrated by Amundsen's having reached the Pole with relatively little difficulty), Scott was celebrated as a national hero when news of the expedition's outcome reached Britain in February 1913. A memorial service held the following month characterised Scott's attempt as a 'heroic failure', rhetoric that would characterise the commercial exploitation of Ponting's footage over the next two decades.

Herbert Ponting was born in Salisbury in 1870 and emigrated to California in the early 1890s. Within a decade he had gained a formidable reputation as a documentary photographer, largely as a result of his visits to Japan in 1902–5. It was on the strength of this reputation that he persuaded Scott to hire him to photograph and film the 1910–12 expedition. Ponting was not among the group of five who died on the return march from the South Pole, and on his return to London he devoted the rest of his life to publicising the work of Scott through the medium of his photographs and films. He presented more than a thousand lectures during the following years, illustrated by both slides and film, and in 1921 published The Great White South, the first of many illustrated books documenting Scott's final expedition.

The Great White Silence, released in 1924, was the first of three stand-alone feature versions of Ponting's edited film footage. The continuity is clumsy and relies heavily on intertitles, and the film was not shown widely (nor is it readily available for viewing today). The second version, 90° South (1933), featured recorded music and a synchronised commentary by Ponting. It is far more fluently edited and uses animated diagrams to recount the details of Scott's final march (on which, given that Ponting did not take part, no actual footage was shot). A shortened version was released in 1936 as The Story of Captain Scott, shortly after Ponting's death the previous year.

The two decades that Ponting spent in tirelessly promoting his Scott footage undoubtedly established the 'heroic failure' genre as a mainstay franchise in British documentary and realist cinema, especially in depicting military conflicts with negative outcomes. Its influence can be seen in settings as diverse as the politically controversial account of Edith Cavell's execution in Dawn (UK, 1927, director Herbert Wilcox) and the Arnhem landings in Brian Desmond Hurst's reconstruction, There is the Glory (1946).

The image of Scott as the gallant loser was further cemented in a highly budgeted and publicised biopic (shot in Technicolor and featuring music by Ralph Vaughan-Williams), Scott of the Antarctic (UK, 1948, director Charles Frend). Though a fictionally re-created account of Scott's last expedition the film appears to have been based heavily on Ponting's work, including staged versions of some of the more memorable scenes in both The Great White Silence and 90° South. With this film Scott's final expedition took its place alongside the Charge of the Light Brigade or the battles of Trafalgar and The Somme as a distinct strand in the British cultural memory, which the historian Jeffrey Richards argues is characterised by an emphasis on self-belief and on trying rather than succeeding. It is perhaps for this reason that Scott of the Antarctic was a box office failure in the United States. Interestingly, the Ealing version does explicitly note a number of key errors made by Scott as having contributed to the eventual disaster (most notably the decision to rely on motorised sledges); the Ponting films give a more simplistic impression of a visionary battling elements beyond his control.

In this respect, therefore, both The Great White Silence and 90° South have been seen as overtly propagandist in the context of Ponting's largely unproblematic and sycophantic depiction (at times bordering on worship) of his protagonist, and the hindsight of what we now know to be a number of serious errors on Scott's part. That having been said, it must be borne in mind that Ponting (and, for that matter, his counterpart on the 1914–16 Shackleton expedition, Frank Hurley) was primarily a photographic ethnographer by trade, and did not approach filmmaking with the same institutional and cultural baggage as Grierson's generation of documentary-makers and the 'social realist' tradition of British filmmaking that followed.

Greece

In the early decades of the twentieth century, the practice of documentary was hardly thought of as an important aspect of Greece's cinematic output (relatively slim, at any rate). The considerable value that has since been attached to the many newsreels produced in that era is attributable to the country's tumultuous history, the political and military events of which are evoked in those documentaries. These documentaries were made beyond any notion of adherence to the various evolving international theories and practices of 'addressing the real', and being (for the most part) uninformed by formal concerns of an aesthetic or diegetic order.

Nevertheless, Greek cinema actually begins with documentary, arguably via the pioneering work of the Manakias brothers, Greek Vlachs, who inaugurated Balkan cinematography in May 1905 with Yfantres/The Weavers, featuring their one-hundred-and-sixteen-year-old grandmother in their native Macedonian village. This was the first of sixty-seven films of mainly ethnographic interest. It should be pointed out, however, that the Manakias's output did not belong to the Greek 'national cinematography' to start with, given that their work coincides historically with the upheavals that resulted in the formation of Greek Macedonia. The Manakias brothers' story has become familiar to the international viewing public mostly by way of its recent incorporation into the plot of Theo Angelopoulos's 1995 fiction film To Vlemma tou Odyssea/Ulysses' Gaze.

Also worthy of mention is the work of Dimitris Meravidis, a Greek based in Istanbul, Turkey, whose earliest (1903) newsreels actually predated those of the more celebrated brothers, but were neither produced nor exhibited on the Greek mainland. From 1905 onward Meravidis produced several such films, which he sent to the Gaumont and Pathé companies in Paris for exhibition. Later he became the first important Greek director of photography, and, in 1928, he filmed Prometheas Desmotis/Prometheus in Chains in Delphi, capturing the attempted revival (by the poet Angelos Sikelianos and his wife Eva) of Delphic Mysteries. That document, funded by a French company for the promotion of ancient drama, was coupled with a later (1930) performance of Prometheus, this time in Athens, a pairing that remains of great historical interest, insofar as it constitutes the first full-length film on Greek tragedy.

Particularly notable are the 1917 film I Katastrofi tis Thessalonikis/The Destruction of Thessaloniki by an unnamed director (a work that, in ten minutes and thirty-five seconds, captured by purely cinematic means the fire that ravaged a part of Thessaloniki) and M. Dorizas's Meteora, of uncertain date. These films are of special value, insofar as they are among the few of that period that have survived integrally.

Of the important early makers of Greek newsreels, the Hungarian Joseph Hepp merits mentioning, as do Costas Theodoridis, the Gaziadis brothers (Dimitris and Michail), and especially the painter Yorgos Prokopiou, with his remarkable films on the campaign to Asia Minor and the 1922 catastrophe that followed, resulting in the expulsion of the Greek community (approximately one-and-a-half million refugees). Many of the episodes captured by Prokopiou reveal a coherence and singularity of purpose that lends them a diegetic quality with strong humanist overtones.

Before World War II, those Greek documentaries that did not fall under the 'newsreels' label aimed at capturing the singularities of the indigenous landscape. This continued after the war, notably via the shorts made by Prodrimos Meravidis (Dimitris's son), photographed, edited, and produced by himself. Other directors who worked in this field include Elias Paraskeuas and Gavriil Loggos, whose films also registered the spectacle of countryside, by now wounded by the recent wartime experience. It is precisely this factor, as well as the tendency evident in the works of such filmmakers, to focus on the unexpected as opposed to the typical, that often differentiated their work from a facilely picturesque and folkloric treatment of the natural spectacle. The latter ideologically charged option, aiming from the outset at the passive acceptance, consumption, and tourist exploitation of the said spectacle, contrasts sharply with the surprising or disturbing aspects revealed by highlighting the peculiarities of the Greek landscape.

The aforementioned recent experience, of course, included not only the Nazi occupation of Greece, but also the events immediately following its liberation. The country's allegiance to the Western bloc, and the consequent defeat of the Left in the catastrophic 1945–9 civil war (a matter the complexity of which is beyond the scope of this essay), meant that by the end of the 1940s Greece was at once politically divided and materially devastated. At the same time, the conservative political powers that, under various guises, ruled almost uninterruptedly until the advent of the 1967–74 colonels' junta, imposed, among other things, a Cold War policy regarding freedom of expression.

This overview illustrates the evolution of Greek cinematography, as well as the problems faced by documentary makers in the first decades after the war. Although a number of developing companies produced innumerable generic fiction films, thereby giving rise to a 'tradition' with a popular following, albeit lacking the foundations of a film industry proper (hence the tradition's gradual demise on the advent of television in the late 1960s), the documentary mode was plagued by limitations, both on the level of expression and on production, distribution, and exhibition.

Put simply, the 'short' format was deemed non-lucrative by commercial producers and cinema owners alike and useless save for special cases funded for propagandist purposes by the state itself (ministries and public companies). This was a sector in which directors such as Yannis Panagiotopoulos produced some notable work in the early postwar period. This resulted in the majority of documentaries being self-funded and made with few prospects regarding consumption. A Law on Cinematography, which passed in 1961, imposed on all film theatres the obligation of projecting at least four indigenous short films per month, but was never put to practice.

A potential outlet for documentary work appeared in 1960, with the inauguration of the Thessaloniki Film Festival. Yet this type of exhibition (which was much later systematized via the shorts-only annual festival held in the town of Drama) did not guarantee an actual career. Certain directors thus resorted to projects designed for propaganda purposes, such as those promoting Greek tourism. Television's appearance, as well as the 1970 inauguration of the Greek Film Center (EKK), entailed further possibilities that will be addressed later.

One of the earliest important documentaries that appeared after the civil war was Daphni (1952) by the art historian Angelos Prokopiou (son of the aforementioned Yorgos), a film unrelated to the country's recent history, albeit of special interest, as it was the first documentary on Greek art. The film explored the mosaics of an eleventh-century Byzantine church near Athens, with an English commentary (translated from Prokopiou's text by Aldous Huxley) and a voice-over featuring Ethel Barrymore and Maurice Evans. It inaugurated a long line of documentaries that dealt with the indigenous cultural heritage and that proliferated in the following decades, notably via several works made especially for TV, from the 1970s onward.

Roussos Koundouros became the first Greek filmmaker exclusively occupied with the documentary mode. In 1953 he founded the Institute for Educative and Scientific Cinematography and went on to produce a multitude of films, many of which corresponded precisely to the 'educative' principle, insofar as they dealt with matters of medical and scientific information. Others explored the countryside-centered themes of previous filmmakers. His 1965 film Aluminio tis Ellados (Greek Aluminum), however, was a formally experimental documentary, focusing on an industrial topic and funded by the aluminum factory, the construction and function of which it captured. The film adopted an aesthetic attitude toward its topic by stressing the symmetry of the machines' geometrical shapes beyond any sentimental or social rhetoric and replacing commentary with atonal music. This formal treatment, which suppressed work conditions in favor of abstraction and highlighted a quasi-metaphysical transformation of the machinery into a kind of enigmatic sculpture, coupled an apparent lack of social concerns with a bold experimental tendency, foreign to the history of Greek documentary and actually reminiscent of the Soviet constructivist films of the 1920s.

Leon Loisios directed certain documentaries in 1959–61, addressing the everyday activities of islanders: Psarades kai Psaremata/Fishers and Fishing, I Zoi sti Mytilini/Life in Mytilene, and Lesbos. These films, which purported to readdress the familiar theme of 'provincial life', while rejecting the option of folklore, were produced and distributed by Loisios's own documentary company and later represented Greece in international festivals. Following John Grierson's dictum on documentary as a 'creative treatment of actuality', the films contained prewritten commentaries, albeit informed by experience and thereby aspiring toward a synthesis of aesthetic construction and factual authenticity.

In the early 1960s Loisios collaborated with Koundouros's institute, which at the time made certain state-funded films. By 1964–5, however, Loisios also attempted a series of political newsreels on behalf of EDA, Greece's major left-wing party at the time. That series, named Elliniki Zoi (Greek Life) and otherwise known as Ta Epikaira tis EDA (EDA's Newsreels), was not completed, but the surviving documentaries are of prime historical importance, given the era's political upheavals, which would soon culminate in the abolition of the parliamentary system by the junta. Loisios would reemerge in the 1980s via TV work, the series Panorama tou Aiona/Panorama of the Century (1982–6), an historical project based on old Greek newsreels.

The long-standing tradition of documentaries focusing on the Greek landscape and provincial life informs part of Vassilis Maros's work as well. This exceptionally important director, however, has also touched on urban themes, as in his first two documentaries, Uranoxystes/Skyscrapers and Rock and Roll stin Athina/Rock and Roll in Athens, both made in 1957. The second of these films in particular attempted a social approach of the rock and roll phenomenon and its early reception in Greece, while predating the first films of the nouvelle vague, which it largely resembled stylistically, while its semifictional, diegetic character presaged a tendency developed by later filmmakers, as we shall see.

Maros has expressed his debt to the modernist documentaries of the Dutch filmmaker Joris Ivens and to certain works of the British (Griersonian) school. These influences may illuminate his simultaneously social and lyrical tendencies. The latter are mostly apparent in his films of ethnographic aspirations, such as Hydra (1958), Kalymnos, to Nisi ton Sfouggaradon/Kalymnos, the Island of Sponge-fishers (1963), Pascha sto Agio Oros/Easter on the Holy Mount (1966), Sina: Enas Theos, Treis Prophites/Sina: One God, Three Prophets (1968), Criti kai Neoellines Poietes/Crete and Modern Greek Poets (1978), and Meteora, oi Katakombes tou Ouranou/Meteora, the Sky's Catacombs (1992). Maros has also directed numerous portraits of painters, actors, and other public personalities.

Yet Maros's most important work is probably the diptych I Tragodia tou Aigaiou/The Tragedy of the Aegean (1961) and I Ellada xoris Kolones/Greece without Columns (1964). The former consisted of early newsreels capturing important moments of Greece's history between 1912 and 1945, which Maros synthesized into a seventy-five-minute narrative presenting the tumultuous fate of a small, war-torn, and manipulated country. The commentary used in the film was written by Angelos Prokopiou, the original material having been largely supplied via the archive of Prokopiou's father, Yorgos, whose films on the Asia Minor campaign have been previously mentioned. This montage of historical fragments was highly acclaimed, gaining prizes in various world festivals and later being transmitted by the BBC, NBC, and other international TV channels. The film's political aspects, however, resulted in its Greek release being almost jeopardized by state censorship because of its implicitly critical attitude toward the treatment of Greece by those world powers on whose side the country had been firmly placed after the Nazi occupation and the Left's defeat in the civil war.

Greece Without Columns (the title of which may as well be cited in English, given that it was a BBC production, not projected in Greece until 1995) was in its way a sequel to the earlier film, albeit with a crucial difference. Rather than a montage of preexisting material, this was an original work of social observation, free of the limitations imposed by censorship and addressing in a pioneering mode several crucial problems of contemporary Greece, such as poverty and unemployment and its side effects, forcibly felt in the 1960s (movement toward the urban centers, bureaucracy, and mass immigration). The film used a kind of poetic irony in its critical treatment of the topic, whereby an impeccably thought out, quasi-musical editing expressed the rhythms of a troubled social body. Here, as elsewhere, Maros displayed a directorial clarity of purpose, partly obtained via his long previous experience (as a maker of newsreels) vis-à-vis the treatment of immediate reality, yet also involving a technical and formal sophistication in addressing the inner, perhaps hidden, side of this same reality. Maros's method was thus a combination of the aleatory and the preplanned, in the sense that his abstract principles preclude any resort to facile spectacle, while allowing the registration of unpredicted factors occurring in the course of the filmmaking process.

The first female director of Greek documentary was Lila Kourkoulakou, who, having first appeared in the late 1950s with fiction features, went on to direct a number of works on historical themes. Her documentary debut, Eleutherios Venizelos (1965), was a portrait of perhaps the single most important Greek political figure of the early twentieth century, based on newsreels from that era. Made in a period of great political instability, Kourkoulakou's film involved an underlying stance in favor of the challenged (and soon to be abolished) parliamentary democracy. In 1973 Kourkoulakou made another documentary, Dionysios Solomos, on the most celebrated poet of modern Greece and later went on to produce TV work.

Starting with Takis Canellopoulos's 1960 film Makedonikos Gamos/Macedonian Wedding, an innovative and experimental approach would mark the work of several young filmmakers, who made their first appearances in the course of that crucial decade. One could even speak of a clearly modernist tendency, echoing the situation brought about in poetry and the plastic arts by the 1930s generation. Thematically, nevertheless, documentary would continue to verge toward a twofold preexistent tradition, namely, the recording of ritualistic movement within a rural context. There was still a kind of hesitation on behalf of Greek filmmakers toward the complexity of the urban landscape, although the popular districts of cities were filmed with considerably greater ease, albeit seen as metaphors-cum-transformations of village life. Given that such areas, populated by the more destitute portion of the new urban crowd, were themselves gradually transformed by the struggles of their inhabitants, however, these films are situated at a crucial position regarding the documentation of the struggles in their successive stages.

The problem nevertheless remains as to the reasons for which this emphatic preference for rural themes continued to be apparent, as much in the choices of certain documentary makers whose works may be said to promote both research and experimentation, as in those of others, who seem more academic and unquestioning in their approaches. One possible reason is the evocation, through the medium of documentary, of the 'Greek-ness' issue, an ideological factor that has marred many discussions of the aforementioned 1930s generation (whose modernist elements are often interpreted in tandem with the 'ethnocentric' inclinations of some of its representatives).

At the same time, the survival of ancient, ritualistic forms of collective behavior in the context of agricultural production was open to study, entailing as it did the individual's harmonic incorporation into its particular society, thereby determining (up to a point, as we shall see) the actual character and function of the said society. Herein lies the value of certain ethnographic films by Yorgos Zervoulakos and Nestoras Matsas.

Another factor that may account for Greek filmmakers' reluctance vis-à-vis urban themes is the nature of the Greek urban landscape itself. Rather than being at once an emblem of the industrial revolution and a token of high modernity, thereby encouraging a treatment analogous to that adopted in numerous classic Western European documentaries (but also in Soviet films, such as Dziga Vertov's Man with the Movie Camera), the Greek city is a chaotic, arbitrarily structured space, in the context of which those revolutionary developments that shaped modernity are late imports rather than organically evolved features. At the same time, Greece's 'modernization' has tended to destroy or obscure the available evidence of the urban centers' historical past.

Takis Canellopoulos, on the other hand, had stressed the survival of the ritual in his debut, Makedonikos Gamos. By capturing the ancient wedding customs of a Macedonian village, a process of initiation whereby the newlyweds are accepted into the adult world, but also a reaffirmation of the community in its collective and circular function, Canellopoulos internalized in the very filmic form the depersonalized nature of social myth. The role of commentary was assumed by folksong, and the recording of the events evaded all intellectualization by its extreme concision and literalness. At the same time, the processes of production (the ritualistic preparation of the wedding banquet) were seen to attain a religious-cum-magical character via their incorporation into an organic whole, whereby myth and social life seemed inextricably linked. This line of documentary would find an echo in the work of another director, Takis Hatzopoulos, who made films such as Prespes (1966) and Gynaikokratia/Women's Rule (1969), which recaptured the theme of the Macedonian landscape and of the customs surviving therein.

In Apostolos Kryonas's 1973 documentary Itan Mera Giortis/It Was a Feast Day, a film thematically similar to Makedonikos Gamos, the viewer faces a countryside that has suffered the devastation effected in the course of the 1960s by its population's move toward the cities and the gradual abandonment of the local landscape and architecture to decay. Here, too, the 'feast' ritual was seen to survive, albeit this time in spite of the factors that challenge a no longer self-evident community. Kryonas (who, like Hatzopoulos, served his apprenticeship as an assistant of Canellopoulos) also directed the lyrical Anemoi/Winds (1967), as well as Entos ton Teihon/Within Walls (1977), a film that dealt boldly with the custom of circumcision as celebrated by the Muslim minority of Didymoteicho, the town closest to the Greco-Turkish northern border.

Another example of a countryside-set documentary, also made in the midst of the junta, which registers this change in the organic experience of the ritual, while being radically innovative in form, is O Thiraikos Orthros/The Matins of Thera (1968) by Costas Sfikas and Stauros Tornes. Focusing on the island of Santorini, the film presented a traditional community alienated by tourism, industrial production, and the exploitation of crops. Here, the ritualistic life of an agricultural society disappeared in the maddening rhythm of sounds and images, wholly deprived of commentary. The form, at once elliptic and dynamic, attained the precision of an essay.

Among the earliest examples of urban documentaries made in the 1960s by younger filmmakers, one may single out those testifying to specific sociopolitical problems of the era such as Ekato Ores tou Mai/One Hundred Hours in May (1963) by Dimos Theos and Fotos Lambrinos. This film deals with the recent assassination of Grigoris Lambrakis, an EDA MP (an event that would later inspire Costa-Gavras' semi-fictional French feature Z). Gramma apo to Charleroi/Letter from Charleroi (1965) by Lambros Liaropoulos dealt with mass immigration, describing the personal lives of Greek coal miners in Belgium. The same overall topic was addressed by Mily Giannakaki's Achilleas (1965), describing immigrants in France, and in Alexis Grivas's 750000 (1965), set in Germany. These three filmmakers were the first to produce, almost concurrently, films on this burning issue, while maintaining a modernist attitude in their treatments. On an even more experimental level, Theodoros Adamopoulos' almost surrealist I Roda/The Wheel (1964) focused on bizarre aspects of urban reality, with a tone of sarcastic, rather cynical humor, regarding the city's decay following a wheel's revolutions.

Also of note is Gazi/Gas (1967) by Dimitris Stavrakas, a film on the life of workers in a gas factory, with special emphasis on their visible alienation vis-à-vis the production procedures. In total contrast both to Koundouros's Aluminio tis Ellados (in which the industrial functions were subjected to an aesthetic/abstract treatment) and to Maros and Loisios's ethnographic films on island life (where the community was seen to participate in the double ritual of life's cycle and the work process), Stavrakas's documentary at once pointed out the human factor involved in industrial production and implied the transgression of ritualistic integration (as a mythic notion that had here ceased to function) in favor of class solidarity, apparently the sole potential token of community in the context of modern work relations.

A tendency to recapture Greek history in tandem with its contemporary repercussions was evident in two documentaries by Lakis Papastathis. Periptoseis tou Ochi/Instances of 'No' (1965), a montage of photographs, drawings, and comments from the World War II era, made in collaboration with Dimitris Augerinos, was complemented by Papastathis's 1972 film Grammata apo tin Ameriki/Letters from America, wherein the same method was used to address the first wave of Greek immigration to the United States in the early years of the twentieth century. Apart from the innovative technique of construction used in these films, Papastathis also adopted a semi-fictional approach, harking back to Maros' Rock and Roll stin Athina, but also apparent in Liaropoulos' Gramma apo to Charleroi. He incorporated documentary evidence into a loose diegetic context by framing the nonfictional aspect within an elementary fictional 'story'. This tendency, the continuation of which may be detected in such recent films as O Dromos pros ti Dysi/The Way West, also incorporated documentary footage into essentially fictional films, an example of which is the film made by Papastathis in collaboration with Avgerinos, Odos Ermou 28/28 Ermou Street (1968).

Finally, with regard to the documentary makers who made their early appearances in the early 1960s let us also mention the work supervised by Roviros Manthoulis in collaboration with Fotis Mesthenaios and Heraklis Papadakis. Between 1958 and 1965, this group made a number of films, either state-funded or in collaboration with Koundouros's institute such as Acropolis ton Athinon/Acropolis of Athens, Leukada, to Nisi ton Poieton/Leukada, the Poets' Island, Prassinio Chryssafi/Green Gold, and Anthropoi kai Theoi/Men and Gods, mostly involving a highly aesthetic treatment of the Greek landscape, with particular emphasis on classical monuments. Manthoulis, also a notable director of fiction features, went into self-exile in France after the colonels' coup d'état, and went on to produce some important documentary work there.

In the course of the seven-year junta, a great deal of material regarding social struggle was filmed clandestinely by certain filmmakers of the younger generation, such as Pantelis Voulgaris and Costas Zirinis. These documents were used after the reinstatement of the parliamentary system in the production of politically engaged works. The latter current, a predictable development given the circumstances, gave rise to numerous films, some of which were even projected commercially as features in the years that followed. These dealt with the regime's rise and fall, its consequences and the experience of its victims, including footage from that period and from its direct aftermath, as well as interviews, filmed extracts from the colonels' trial, and related forms of evidence.

Of particular note are Martyries/Testaments (1975) by Nikos Kavoukidis, Ellas Ellinon Christianon/Greece of Greek Christians (1976) by Diagoras Chronopoulos, Megara (1974) by Yorgos Tsemberopoulos, and the collective work Agonas/Struggle (1975), a politically engaged montage of filmed events by a group of six filmmakers. Meanwhile, the almost four-hour-long film Parastasi gia ena Rolo/Performance for a Role (1978) by Dionysis Grigoratos was an experiment in historical documentary that used newsreels footage to address Greece's recent history within the wider context of the country's positioning vis-à-vis the international events of the twentieth century and its function within the geopolitical developments of the period.

Otherwise, the general thematic tendencies apparent in the first post-1974 efforts of Greek documentary may be roughly divided into the following main categories, with several overlaps and variants: first, a number of films that attempted to extend geographically the ethnographic aspirations of earlier works and second, an increasing presence of social and political issues within a spatial and thematic framework that also acknowledged and developed that of the pioneering works made in the 1960s. Of prime (tone-setting) importance in this context were the documentaries of Dimitris Maurikios and Lefteris Xanthopoulos.

Maurikios made his first appearance with Polemonta (1975), a feature-length film on the surviving Greek-speaking community of South Italy. The film depicted the harsh realities of their agricultural life, which transcend ethnic boundaries, as well as their cultural and linguistic suspension between a fading if ancient tradition and their problematic integration into the specificities of time and place. An underlying problem on the meaning of 'Greek-ness', as implied by the survival of rituals and challenged by historical change and geographic diversity, echoes the concerns of the earlier ethnographic films addressed previously. The film created a sensation at the Thessaloniki Film Festival, but was never projected commercially.

Maurikios went on to make a number of documentaries, including some important work for the national TV network (ERT)—the latter having evolved into the most prominent factor in matters of documentary production and exhibition after the watershed year of 1974. Amongst the films that Maurikios directed for TV in the 1980s and 1990s, it is worth mentioning Oi Gefyres tou Ioniou/The Bridges of the Ionian Sea, a series of documentaries made in the early 1980s dealing with the correspondence exchanged between Greece and South Italy. Also worth noting is Mesogeiako Triptycho gia ta Pathi/Mediterranean Triptych on the Passion (1986), a comparative study of the rituals pertaining to the Holy Passion in Spain, Italy, and Greece. Finally, Aenigma Est (1990) was a feature-length portrait of the Greek-born Italian painter Giorgio de Chirico that was even exhibited on the commercial circuit.

This last film captured de Chirico's cosmopolitanism along with the enigma of his work's and thought's origins, a theme that remained indirectly related to the persistent questioning of Greece's social/cultural past and present, vis-à-vis an increasing acknowledgment of 'global' concerns.

Lefteris Xanthopoulos first made his mark with a trilogy of films on the Greek diaspora, the first of which was funded by the community of immigrants whose everyday lives and testimonies it addressed. These films were Elliniki Koinotita Haidelbergis/Greek Community of Heidelberg (1976), O Yorgos apo ta Sotirianika/Yorgos from Sotirianika (1978), and Tourkovounia (1982). The films focused on both the living conditions of immigrant Greeks and the situation of the abandoned provinces that they had left behind (and, rarely, came back to). They also attempted to examine the reasons and consequences of immigration. The persistence and indeed flourishing of these themes attests to the long-term effects of the mass immigration first evoked in documentaries made in the 1960s. Xanthopoulos, also a director of fictional features on related topics, has since worked widely on TV. The 1970s documentary works of filmmakers such as Yorgos Antonopoulos and Yorgos Karypidis have moved along similar thematic lines.

Of the other documentary makers who appeared in that period, Takis Papayannidis has produced films that testify to a special sensibility, starting with Yorti sti Drapetsona/Feast in Drapetsona (1977), whereby a local feast was used as a pretext for an attempt to capture the history of a marginal urban district. Papayannidis's feature-length I Ilikia tis Thalassas/The Sea's Age (1978) developed this tendency by using the marine element (so obviously pertinent to various notions of 'Greek-ness') as a catalyst between myth and historical experience via the evocation of the major events that had shaped modern Greece in the course of past decades.

Of the filmmakers touching on urban themes, with a social-centered perspective, albeit deprived of a political stance or a standardized formal approach, Gaye Aggeli made two original works, the idiosyncratically structured and purposely fragmentary Monastiraki (1976) and the direct and precise in its rough material and perspective Thessaloniki 6.5 Richter (1976). With Karvouniarides/Coalmen (1977), Alinda Dimitriou created a plain-styled and convincing social portrait. Let us also mention the historical, essayistic in scope, documentaries of Yorgos Dizikirikis, such as Ellines Laikoi Zografoi/Greek Folk Painters (1974).

Tasos Psarras, a politically minded filmmaker who has also directed several fiction features, made a number of documentary shorts in the 1970s, notably Mellele (1972), a film on the life of a gypsy community. Using methods of pointed immediacy, such as a handheld camera (not a common practice at the time) and interviews, Psarras provided a prototype for much of his later work in which the ethnographic or biographic perspective contained a latent political element in the shape of detectable social factors and processes. Psarras has worked extensively for TV from the early 1980s onward, and his documentaries touch on topics as diverse as the Greek communities of the former Soviet Union and the lives of celebrated Greek writers, albeit maintaining a consistency in their attempts to register and illuminate the underlying presence of the historical conditions framing the primary subject matter.

The first urban Greek documentary that had the country's capital as its sole topic, while attempting to address it in all its complexity, was made by Theo Angelopoulos, best known in Greece and abroad for his fiction features. Athena/Athens (1982), a made-for-TV work, was informed by a tendency, apparent in the early 1980s, toward an increasingly idiosyncratic type of documentary, touching on a set of specialized topics, whose treatment registered an emphatically structural and formal approach. This current, essayistic in scope, addressed reality in its elusive or chaotic aspects, abandoning the certainties of a granted common 'mythology', and thereby perhaps also signaling a move away from earlier 'rural' and 'ritualistic' themes. Thus, Angelopoulos's film had no precedent in its wandering, labyrinthine structure. The various contrasting layers of history (from archeological findings to architectural remnants bearing testament to stages in the development of modern Athens) captured a complex 'whole', whose ultimate meaning was suspended over a void, as evidenced by the absence of people and hence of indices regarding historical continuity and meaning.

A short while before Athena was released, Costas Vrettakos had finished his important documentary Stroma tis Katastrofis/Layer of Destruction (1980), which had been three years in the making. Here, the provincial setting entailed an approach somewhat similar in principle, if not in form, to that of Angelopoulos. The film's topic was the archeological search for an ancient town under a village, a town revealed but momentarily, before sinking into the waters of an artificial lake. Again, archeology was used at once as a link with the historical past and as a sign of temporal divergence underlying spatial contiguity.

Other directors have used the documentary mode in the last three decades, with notable results. Of the older names, Fotos Lambrinos (former collaborator of Dimos Theos) has made several interesting films, and Lakis Papastathis, having started with documentary, has continued to incorporate elements of that mode in his fictional works. Yannis Smaragdis's TV series Ide Polis elalisen/Thus Spoke the City (1990) revealed a new genre—a cinema deprived of fictional intrigue, rather in the form of an essay. Menelaos Karamaggiolis, with the feature-length Rom (1989), marks a search for new aesthetic principles, while addressing the topic of national definition, identity, and otherness, its focus being the relations between ethnic and religious minorities in Greece. This question is touched on in certain previous documentaries, as we have seen, albeit one that will become increasingly crucial in the 1990s and beyond.

Significant work has also been produced by filmmakers such as Eleni Alexandraki, Popi Alkouli, Nikos Anagnostopoulos, Soula Drakopoulou, Yannis Ekonomidis, Kleoni Flessa, Stauros Ioannou, Stavros Kaplanidis, Marios Karamanis, Despoina Karvela, Stathis Katsaros, Yannis Lambrou, Pandora Mouriki, Olga Panagopoulou, Antonis Papadopoulos, Maria Papaliou, Thanassis Rentzis, Yorgos Sifianos, Memi Spyratou, Eva Stefani, Minas Tatalidis, Stella Theodoraki, Yanna Triantafylli, Antonis Voyazos, Dimitris Yatzoutzakis, Layia Yourgou, and others.

Meanwhile, the problems of funding, distribution, and exhibition have never ceased plaguing Greek documentary, albeit not without significant improvements, reflecting the country's political situation and the increasing respectability film culture has attained from the viewpoint of official cultural institutions. The catalytic role played by national TV has already been mentioned. Yet while providing a solution in terms of funding, that institution's policy regarding the mode of production (given that from the early 1990s onward, recording on film has been replaced by video) all but precludes the works' consumption beyond the medium of TV, that is, their commercial exhibition and participation in international festivals. The Greek Film Center also evolved into a seminal funding source, albeit at a relatively late stage. However, the actual consumption of films not made specifically for TV transmission has remained an unsolved issue. So has the question of adjusting documentary to the demands of a commercially exploitable venture, given the prevalent (after the combined influences of TV production and age-old tradition) tendency to associate that filmic mode with the 'short' format.

After the inauguration, in 1978, of the aforementioned Shorts festival in the town of Drama (originated by the local film club, but now an international event sponsored by the Ministry of Culture, as well as by the European Community project Media, and involving a wider if brief distribution of prize-winning films), there has been a proliferation of fiction and nonfiction works alike, of which documentaries form a substantial and constantly increasing minority. To this there must be added the Athens festival, 'Cinema and Reality', which has been operating for the past twenty-seven years, and the Thessaloniki Documentary Festival, 'Images of the 21st Century', which started in 1999.

In recent years a few feature-length documentaries have been screened commercially with a considerable degree of success. Most notable in this respect was Agelastos Petra/Mourning Stone (2001) by Filippos Koutsaftis, already a director of documentary shorts. The film, widely praised as an aesthetic achievement, was actually informed by several precedents in the history of Greek documentary, but was still original in its approach. It focused on Eleusis (a district universally known because of the Eleusinian mysteries) by juxtaposing the still-enigmatic remnants of antiquity with views of contemporary life, thereby revisiting the earlier themes of landscape and the problematic relation of modern Greek society with ancient ritualistic traditions.

Another documentary that met with warm public reception was Stelios Haralambopoulos' Yorgos Seferis—Imerologia Katastromatos/Yorgos Seferis—Logbooks (2003), a film on the poet, diplomat, and Nobel Laureate Seferis, addressing its subject's relation both to the landscape and poetic tradition of Greece and to the political events that shaped the country's history in the past century. Finally, let us mention a feature film that may be classified as a semi-documentary, and that is also notable for touching on a topic peculiar to the past decade. Kyriakos Katzourakis's O Dromos Pros ti Dysi/The Way West (2003) deals with the problems of illegal immigrants (a community created after the collapse of the Eastern bloc and the mass immigration to Greece from the early 1990s onward), focusing in particular on the female experience and mixing fictional representation with real-life documentation. All these films were either produced or coproduced by the Greek Film Center; whether their success will mean the beginning of a new era for Greek documentary, perhaps entailing a degree of involvement on the part of private producers remains, of course, to be proven.

Greek documentary has registered in various (and still evolving) ways the country's history over the course of the past century, as well as its collective or contrasting concerns regarding self-definition and relations to international processes. The discernible themes, practices, and aesthetic and ideological attitudes reflect a wider network of discourses operating parallel to cinematic production. The open question is the films' international potential—a question pertaining to a combination of the country's geopolitical situation and the extent to which the situation (and/or its images and representations) affects the forms and perspectives of works.

Greene, Felix

Felix Greene, filmmaker, journalist, and author, played a crucial role in opening the tightly closed doors of Asian society to Western eyes. As a filmmaker he sought to expose and publicize the realities of life found within the Communist world. Seeing himself as a counterbalance between the prevailing assumptions he believed were often deliberately engendered by Western governments, Greene sought to ease the Western fear of Communism through the documentation of not the Communist government, but the people beneath the governmental shroud.

The driving catalyst of Greene's documentary films formed during his first visit to China in 1957. Armed with Western misapprehensions common to the era, Greene began his Communist venture prepared to see a vast expanse of squalor, disease, and impoverishment, and although those conditions did exist in varying degrees, he did not find a nation of embittered people broken by the rigid coercions of a police state. Instead, he found a buoyancy in the people, an optimism, a tangible vitality that directly opposed the brutalized peasant/oppressive militant binary nurtured within the Western press.

Having walked among, spoken to, and dined with the people of China, Greene found himself bewildered at the contradiction his China experience suggested of his cultural conditioning. His films depict this tension through his continued commitment to focus not on the negatives to be found within a Communist-ruled country, but on the universality of humanity. Armed with a crew of three—himself as photographer, his wife Elena as sound technician, and his daughter Ann as production assistant—Greene departed with films that allowed Western audiences to view their political enemy completing the simple tasks of daily life during a time in history when Chinese imports did not exist. His universality in presenting the Chinese to the West pioneered new views on old preconceptions that aided the eventual modification of both general and official attitudes toward China culminating in the 1970s with President Nixon's dramatic reversal of his own anti-China policies, as well as his historic visit to China.

Greene's first visit to China, moreover, awakened an awareness in the filmmaker that China was on the cusp of a momentous social and industrial explosion that was being ignored by the West. Granted, mutual mistrust existed between the Western nations (primarily America and England) and China, but the tragic outcome resulting in a virtual breakdown in communications would only serve to further hinder what he viewed to be a desperate situation. To Greene, this Communist country did not simply encapsulate one-fourth of the world's population; it contained the most relevant story in the world, one he was determined to report despite bureaucratic tangles or Western criticism.

Although Greene's concept of documentary film envisaged the role that documentary would play in providing a medium of communication between two states with vastly contrasting political ideologies, he found hardship both in the making of his documentaries and in bringing them to the American public. In China, authorities tried to dictate the subjects and scenes depicted within his films, and government 'chaperones' accompanied Greene during filming, often exposing film to the sunlight to destroy the images that might reach Western viewers. In the West, Greene reached an impasse when authorities refused to grant him a license to show the film China in Carnegie Hall, which he had rented at his own expense. The legal maneuvering that followed resulted in a remarkable sixteen-week run for the documentary. American audiences filled the theater seven times a day eager for a glimpse into a world previously banned for reasons of national security and found, as Greene did, an enemy with the same basic needs, wants, and joys that combated the same basic struggles. By putting a face to Communism through documentary, Greene humanized political difference.

Although Greene used the documentary as a tool to mediate two diverse cultures, critics charge that his writings, all of which hold socio-political themes, served only to further his anti-capitalism beliefs. The Enemy: What Every American Should Know About Imperialism, written in 1970, reads as a sharp polemic. Following a lucid and well-documented critique of imperialism, Greene explains how imperialism distorts our thinking, and why—unless the people revolt against it—imperialism will destroy all that is best in humanity and society. Critics assailed the anti-American implications of the book, yet Greene's self-appointed role as apologist for modern China provided him with a 'voice' in the Western world. He discovered in the Vietnam War a new plight needing public exposure. His films and writing, however contrary to the American ideology of the time, acted as seeds sown for the emerging peace movement that was to sweep the country. Again, the eyes of the American people were opened to a view beyond the 'good propaganda' generated by the government's war machine, and again, the documentary medium served to awaken debate.

Grierson, John

John Grierson, the founder of the British documentary film movement, played a pivotal role in the development of British film culture during the 1930s and 1940s. Grierson's theory of documentary film was fashioned against the backdrop of World War I, economic recession, and the build-up to war during the 1930s, and his ideas were closely linked to the events and intellectual terrain of the inter-war period. During this time conservative political convictions on the value of laissez-faire free enterprise and limited state intervention in the economy dominated social and political discourse within Great Britain. From 1931 to 1939, however, various strands of intellectual opinion gradually converged to form an emergent social democratic consensus, which eventually achieved political ascendancy in 1945 with the formation of the first postwar Labour government. It is this configuration of political and cultural discourse, designated by its champions as a 'middle way' between unfettered capitalism and a nationalizing state socialism with which the documentary film movement, and Grierson in particular, must be associated, and Grierson is best understood as a social-democratic, corporatist reformist, rather than a socialist, or proto-Marxist thinker.

Grierson's theory of documentary film was conceived against a dual context of national and international instability and the growth of social-democratic corporatist thought, and was premised on the belief that the documentary film could both play a vital role in preserving social stability and act as an effective medium of communication between the state and the public. Grierson's social democratic corporatist ideology, however, was also influenced by neo-Hegelian ideas, derived from philosophers such as F.H. Bradley and T.H. Green, which asserted the importance of the state and corporate institutions within national life. This influence led Grierson to the conviction that the needs of the individual must be subordinated to the requirements of corporate institutions and structures that possessed an intrinsic historical legitimacy and that guaranteed the unity and progress of society.

The origins of Grierson's conception of 'good totalitarianism', whereby the principal role of the documentary film was to promote an understanding of the essentially unified and interdependent character of society, rather than the transient, idiosyncratic conceits of individual filmmakers, can be located in this neo-Hegelian model of the corporate state (Aitken 1998). Similarly, and closely associated with this, is Grierson's conviction that the documentary filmmaker must be constrained by the 'degree of general sanction': the consensual ideological and ethical framework that ‘imposes a clear limit upon the creative artist’ (Aitken 1990). Such a formulation appears to rule out any fundamental criticism of the status quo. However, in a key distinction—again drawn from Bradley—that he drew between the agents and institutions of state, Grierson argued that, during the 1930s, the agents of state (the government and ruling class) had turned against the needs of the people and had subverted the institutions of state to promote sectional interest (Aitken 1990). This led Grierson to argue that the documentary film must both criticize the agents of state and represent the interests of the exploited working classes. Grierson’s theory of documentary film, therefore, was motivated by a desire to reshape British society in closer accord with an ideal of ethical social cohesion and unity and was derived from the Hegelian ideas of the ‘Absolute’, and ‘universal will’.

Grierson’s theory of documentary film envisaged that documentary would play a role in providing a medium of communication between the state and the people. Although Grierson acknowledged that ideally this should be a two-way process, however, he paid little attention to the means by which the views of the people were to influence the actions of the state. As a consequence, Grierson’s theory of documentary film implicitly endorses a hierarchical practice of social ideology production, in which social communication is passed down from a bureaucratic elite, via the documentary film, to the public. Similarly, and despite his belief that democratic representation was the principal means through which the agents of state were to be prevented from recasting a liberal corporate society into ‘something else’ (that is, totalitarianism), Grierson’s conception of a society managed by mandarins and public relations experts can only be characterized as ‘democratic’ with some difficulty (Aitken 1990).

Although Grierson’s theory of documentary film was concerned to a considerable extent with the issue of the civic and social purposiveness of film, it was also centrally preoccupied with questions of aesthetic technique and judgment, and many of his ideas can be traced back to aesthetic theories that have their origins within the idealist philosophy of Kant, Hegel, Bradley, and others. Grierson’s first systematic elaboration of his theory of documentary film appeared in a memorandum he prepared for his then employers, the Empire Marketing Board (EMB), in 1927. In the second part of this memorandum, ‘English Cinema Production and the Naturalistic Tradition’, Grierson postulated two different categories of film production, one consisting of films between seven and nine reels long, the other of films four reels long. The first of these categories was based on the theory of ‘epic cinema’, which Grierson had elaborated in America in the mid-1920s. Here, in addition to their usual preoccupation with matters of individual characterization and psychological motivation, commercial feature films would also contain representations of national social and political institutions and would demonstrate how individuals were indissolubly connected to such institutions within an overarching social totality.

Grierson initially developed his theory of epic cinema in response to a number of right-wing, anti-democratic theories that he encountered during the 1920s. In 1924 Grierson was awarded a Rockefeller scholarship to study the impact of immigration on the United States. When he arrived in the United States he came into contact with theorists who argued that restrictions should be placed on immigration, and that the voting franchise should be limited to members of the professional classes. Grierson rejected the disavowals of democracy then being promoted by figures such as Harold Lasswell and Walter Lippmann, however, and argued, instead, that film could be used to sustain democracy by providing the public with crucial social information.

Grierson’s ambitious model of epic cinema, however, bore little relation to the limited budget and resources available to the EMB and, in the second part of his 1927 memorandum, he suggested the development of a form of cinema more appropriate to such circumstances. This second category of film production would consist of shorter films, the principal objective of which would be to represent social interconnection in both primitive cultures and modern industrial society. Grierson believed that these films would mark a ‘new phase’ in cinema production, and that, in them, the visual features of often prosaic, everyday subject matter would be orchestrated into expressive cinematic sequences through the sophisticated use of montage editing and visual composition (Aitken 1998). Such an approach would necessarily involve the abandonment of rudimentary documentary naturalism, and many of the processes of narrative construction common to the commercial feature film, as well as the adoption of more modernist stylistic techniques.

Although this original model of the Griersonian documentary emphasized modernist, formative editing technique, the actuality content of the documentary image also remained an important factor for Grierson. This is well illustrated by a key distinction that he drew between the 'real' and the 'actual'. Writing about Drifters shortly after it was premiered, Grierson argued that the empirical content (the actual) of the film's documentary images was organized so as to express general truths (the real) that existed at a level of abstraction beyond the empirical, and that could not, therefore, be directly represented (Aitken 1990). Grierson's definition of the real is not fully theorized, but was essentially derived from the Hegelian notion of Zeitgeist, or 'spirit of the age'. From this Grierson arrived at a conception of the real that consisted of those general determining factors and predispositions specific to a particular historical stage in the development of human society, and argued that documentary imagery should be so organized as to express this underlying reality. Grierson's first definition of documentary film, therefore, was based on the revelation of the real through the manipulation of documentary footage by formative editing techniques.

Although Grierson believed that the principal objective of the documentary film was to represent the 'real', he also argued that the documentary image was able to signify that underlying reality more profoundly than the image produced within the artificial environment of the film studio because it transcribed the 'phenomenological surface of reality', and because, for Grierson, an existential relationship existed between the phenomenal world (the actual) and the real (Aitken 1998). The origin of Grierson's conceptualization of the relationship between the empirical image of reality and underlying, more abstract realities can be traced back to his influence by Kantian aesthetics. However, it can also be related to models of film theory that emerged in Europe during the 1920s and 1930s, and, in particular, to the ideas of the Hungarian Marxist theorist Béla Balázs.

Grierson's early theory of documentary film consisted of three principal elements: (1) a concern with the content and expressive richness of the actuality image; (2) a concern with the interpretive potential of editing; and (3) a concern with the representation of social relationships. All of these can be found in his early film theory and in his first and perhaps only film as a director: Drifters (1929). Drifters reveals the influence of idealist aesthetics in its elevation of symbolic expression over more rudimentary forms of naturalistic representation and is replete with impressionistic imagery of natural forces and phenomena. Here, Grierson uses symbolic expression to depict the 'real' through the 'actual', and to imply the existence of an underlying unity (the real), which bonds the labour of fishermen to a surrounding natural order. Later in the film this concern with the depiction of wholeness is also extended to include representations of commercial and technological forces within a filmic 'Absolute'. The underlying idealist imperative within Drifters led to a prioritization of essence over appearance, and Grierson spoke of 'exalting' each sequence in the film and 'attaching splendour' to the film as a whole (Aitken 1990). One consequence of this stance is that Drifters makes extensive use of metaphor, allegory, and impressionistic suggestion. Drifters can best be defined (as Grierson himself did in 1932) as an 'imagist' film, influenced by the formalist imperatives of avant-garde film theory and by the philosophical idealist distinction between the real and the phenomenal (Hardy 1979). Drifters was to be Grierson's only major film as a director, however, and, after 1930 he put his energies into the role of producer, rather than director. Nevertheless, the 'imagist' approach embodied in Drifters can be observed in a number of important films made by the documentary movement between 1929 and 1936, including The Song of Ceylon (Wright, 1934), Granton Trawler (Grierson and others, 1934), Coal Face (Cavalcanti and others, 1935), and Night Mail (Wright, Watt, Cavalcanti, and others, 1936).

After 1936 the poetic montage style of films such as Drifters and The Song of Ceylon gradually gave way to a more didactic, journalistic style, and the earlier concern with philosophical aesthetics gave way to a discourse grounded in issues of propaganda and civic education. The preoccupations and concerns of this later period are most clearly expressed in Grierson on Documentary, the collection of Grierson's essays first published by his official biographer, H. Forsyth Hardy, in 1946. In 'The Documentary Idea: 1942', the essay within this collection that embodies Grierson's later position on the documentary film most uncompromisingly, he argues that the documentary film movement was an 'anti-aesthetic movement', and that what was now required was instrumental filmmaking that would abandon depictions of the 'beautiful' and that would play a more directive role in processes of social persuasion (Hardy 1979). Between 1939 and 1945 Grierson was employed as the first Film Commissioner of the National Film Board of Canada and was in charge of the production of documentary series such as The World in Action and Canada Carries On. At the National Film Board he took every opportunity to champion the more didactic, instrumental style adopted by such films; in 'The Documentary Idea: 1942' and elsewhere he criticized the more 'aesthetic' work of earlier colleagues such as Alberto Cavalcanti and Humphrey Jennings.

It is arguable that not only the 1942 essay, but most of Grierson's writings of the war period should be considered as uncharacteristic of his true position, and as a temporary and strategic response to the pressing demands of the time. Such an argument is, however, undermined by the fact that what is particularly striking about Grierson is that his general ideology remained largely unchanged from the 1920s to the 1970s. This unusual degree of continuity makes it unlikely that any sort of epistemological shift occurred during the war period and demonstrates the importance of understanding the ideological continuity that underlay Grierson's pre- and post-1936 positions on the relationship between the aesthetic and the sociological.

The radical change of emphasis in Grierson's ideas from the pre- to the post-1936 period was influenced by the increasing emphasis he gave to authoritarian tendencies that were always implicit in his ideology, but that before 1936 were dialectically linked with more progressive tendencies. This change of emphasis can also be explained in terms of a shift from a concern with the phenomenological naturalism of the image to a more directive stance always implicit in Grierson's notion of the creative interpretation of reality. In the later period this more directive approach became increasingly allied to the cardinal objective of representing unified social relationships, while the earlier aesthetic of the image was increasingly discarded.

There is evidence to suggest, however, that towards the end of his life Grierson returned to his earlier concerns and increasingly emphasized the importance of the aesthetic within documentary. In I Remember, I Remember, the film he made for BBC TV in 1970, he described documentary almost entirely in terms of its artistic qualities and abandoned the instrumental discourse that characterized his middle period. This indicates that the dialectical tension between the aesthetic and the sociological, a tension always implicit in his ideology and one that was skewed decisively in one direction during the 1937–67 period, had reverted once again to the kind of balance that had characterized the 1929–36 period.

Grigsby, Michael

Michael Grigsby is an important figure in British documentary, having ploughed a doggedly individual path over the last forty years. Grigsby has worked almost exclusively within television and has managed to retain his commitment to serious documentary work despite the increased commercial restrictions that have come to characterise television during the 1990s. Grigsby's ability to sustain an individual voice over so many years within television can be likened to figures such as Roger Graef and Denis Mitchell. In a sense, Grigsby is a figure who straddles the approaches of these two figures: Graef's rigorous vérité style is evident in some of Grigsby's work, while Mitchell's attempts to poeticise the margins of everyday life is also apparent in many films he has made.

Although Grigsby's work is not at all homogeneous and does vary in style, it is marked by a number of recurring themes and stylistic approaches. The most striking of these, and the one that Grigsby himself would stress, is his dedication to documenting the working classes and other voices that are usually denied access to the media. He thinks that it is important to give the 'voiceless' a voice and to allow the working- and under-classes a chance to speak on their own terms, rather than have another class speak for them.

Grigsby joined Granada as a trainee cameraman after leaving school, a post he found unsatisfactory because it was studio-based. In his spare time, with friends, he formed a filmmaking group, Unit Five Seven. After purchasing a Bolex camera, they managed to shoot Engine-men (1959), a documentary about the transition from steam to diesel on the railways. The film was shot over two years in spare time and was eventually finished after Lindsay Anderson and Karel Reisz saw rushes and managed to secure money from the British Film Institute (BFI) Experimental Film Fund to complete the film. A romantic documentary, the film was very much in the tradition of the more poetic films made within the British Documentary Film Movement. It was actually shown on the final Free Cinema programme at the National Film Theatre on March 22, 1959.

Grigsby made one more film with Unit Five Seven, Tomorrow's Saturday (1962), before the group disbanded. He then began to make a name for himself within television. At Granada he directed the Inside series (1965), which examined prison life. Grigsby was still unhappy with his lack of freedom, however, and at this point managed to persuade Granada Chairman Denis Forman to allow him to make a film on his own terms. The result was Deckie Learner (1965), another film about rail workers, which was nominated for a British Film Academy Award. Grigsby argues that this was his first 'proper' television excursion because it was conceived as a film, rather than a piece of television journalism. Grigsby's connection to the cinematic documentary school is betrayed in such comments; while his work is investigative, he criticises many television documentaries because they tell stories with words and are too journalistic. For Grigsby, films must tell stories with images; whilst this does not mean that the soundtrack is of no importance, it does mean that the selection and composition of images should be carefully thought out.

Grigsby's approach to documentary filmmaking is rather different from that of American direct cinema, although he started to make television films when the influence of that style was becoming marked. His methods are not totally removed from such an approach. His dedication to filming on location, his tendency to shoot using only available light, and his belief in an image-driven form of documentary are similar to methods associated with direct cinema. Yet, there are two major areas where Grigsby diverts from such filmmakers. First, he does not claim any position of 'objectivity' within his films. He believes films must be made from a specific viewpoint, his being 'marginal' interventions within the dominant power structures. Second, he thinks that the form of a documentary should be carefully planned out, so that methods 'appropriate' to the subject matter at hand are deployed.

Grigsby's commitment to allowing 'marginal' figures to speak runs through his work. A Life Apart (1973) and A Life Underground (1974) expose the isolation of trawlers and miners, respectively. They examine the fragmentation of industrial communities by unlocking the thoughts of community members and, alternately, focusing on their work. The Silent War (1990) uncovers the fear and resentment of communities in Belfast living with sectarian violence and the continual presence of the British army. In Lockerbie—A Night Remembered (1998), he looks at the effects of the Lockerbie plane crash of 1988 on the community, revealing how the lives of its residents were turned upside down.

The formal methods that Grigsby used are not so consistent as his themes, but two main approaches mark his work. The first is a rather minimal approach, in which careful, long, static takes of communities predominate. This formal approach can be found in films such as A Life Apart and Eskimos of Pond Inlet (1976, part of the Disappearing World series), the latter depicting the life of an Eskimo community whose traditions have been disrupted by growing consumerism. The second main approach evident in Grigsby's work is a more poetic, montage-based aesthetic. Probably the most impressive example of this style can be found in Living on the Edge (1986), an ambitious, collage-style film that cuts between historical moments and uses archive footage to build up a rich, intertextual picture of lost hope. The film is undoubtedly inspired by Humphrey Jennings, even pictorially 'quoting' Listen to Britain (1942) in one sequence. Jennings' depictions of national unity are replaced, however, with a more pessimistic portrait of social fragmentation. These two approaches certainly do not exhaust Grigsby's formal palette, and he has occasionally worked outside of them, as with the documentary-drama SS Lusitania (1967). Yet much of his work can be seen to fall somewhere between the two extremes already outlined.

Grigsby has been criticised in some quarters; his obsession with troubled communities, for instance, has been seen as nostalgic. This nostalgic tendency is not offset by his formal approach, which refuses to supply easy answers to the problems depicted (Grigsby steers clear of using 'objective' narration). Grigsby claims that this would be an arrogant manoeuvre. Whether or not one agrees with him on this issue, it cannot be denied that his body of work is impressive and consistent, and is welcome in that he continually airs the views of those who are often left unheard, thus adding a different dimension to events often covered very differently (or not at all) in media journalism.

Groulx, Gilles

Born into a large working-class family in Montreal, Gilles Groulx worked his way up to the middle class by obtaining an office job. Unhappy in the corporate milieu, he turned his back on the mainstream (a choice to which he remained true all his life) and started moving in artistic and intellectual circles, including Paul-Émile Borduas's radical Automatist group.

He tried his hand at poetry and painting, made a short experimental documentary in 1954, Les héritiers/Heirs (released 1998), and worked as a film editor for the CBC television news service. He was hired as an editor at the National Film Board of Canada (NFB) after its move from Ottawa to Montreal in 1956. In 1958 he made his directorial debut at the NFB, with his documentary, Les Raquetteurs/Snowshoers, which he codirected with Michel Brault. This seemingly simple reportage on a congress of snowshoeing clubs became a landmark in the evolution of direct cinema. The visual style of the film (owing primarily to Brault's camera work and use of a wide-angle lens) and its ironic structure (owing primarily to Groulx's editing) made it a film that revealed a side of French-Canadian culture that had rarely been acknowledged: the mundane but important rituals and customs that make Québec unique.

During the few years after the release of Les Raquetteurs, Groulx directed a handful of shorts in the direct cinema style, the best of which are Golden Gloves (1961) on an unemployed aspiring boxer; Voir Miami ... /To See Miami (1963), which analyzes the Quebecker's fascination with, and resistance against, American culture; and Un jeu si simple/Such a Simple Game (1964), on hockey.

Late in 1963 Groulx was commissioned by the NFB to direct a documentary on how young people spend their time during the winter. Groulx used the budget for this project to make Le chat dans le sac/The Cat in the Bag (1964), a feature-length fiction film on the nationalist awakening of a twenty-something French-Canadian and the disintegration of his relationship with an English-speaking Jewish woman. Blending a documentary look with New Wave self-referentiality, and examining contemporary issues such as nationalism, feminism, and Marxism, Le chat dans le sac became a model for subsequent engagé features and is often acknowledged as marking the beginning of modern fiction film in Québec (Harcourt 1980).

Groulx moved again from documentary to fiction in Où êtes-vous donc?/Where Are You? (1968), an experimental narrative on the evils of consumerism. A similar theme is explored in another experimental fiction, Entre tu et vous/ Between 'tu' and 'vous' (1969).

Groulx returned to a more 'traditional' mode of documentary with 24 Hours or More (1973) a passionate study of Québec politics and society in the early 1970s. The film was deemed subversive by the NFB's conservative commissioner, Sydney Newman, and was banned from circulation until 1976. After making a commissioned documentary on education, Place de l'équation/The Place of the Equation (1973), he directed a coproduction with Mexico in 1977, Première question sur le bonheur/Primera pregunta sobre la felicidad/The First Question on Happiness, on the struggle of Mexican farmers against bourgeois landowners.

In all of his films Groulx remained critical of capitalist society and of the inability of Quebeckers to escape a culture saturated with vacuous images and useless products. As he was finishing his surrealist fiction on a selfish businessman, Au pays de Zom/In the Land of Zom (1982), Groulx was involved in a serious accident that put an end to his career. Richard Brouillette made the documentary Trop c'est assez/Too Much is Enough (1995) on Groulx's life.

Guzmán, Patricio

Chilean Patricio Guzmán is one of the foremost directors of Latin American and worldwide political documentary cinema. During his ongoing and internationally acclaimed career he has directed more than fifteen award-winning documentary feature films and has successfully combined his political militancy as a committed Marxist with his concept of the filmmaker's role. His primary contribution has been to document certain aspects of Chile's political history from 1970 forward, including the country's socialist revolution, Salvador Allende's three-year presidency, the violent coup d'état by General Augusto Pinochet's army in 1973, Pinochet's seventeen-year reign of terror as a military dictator, eventual exile in 1992, and the legal proceedings that led to his arrest in London in 1998.

Guzmán has made six films documenting this turbulent period in Chile's history: Primer año/The First Year (1971), La Respuesta de octubre/The October Answer (1972), La batalla de Chile, Parts I, II, and II/The Battle of Chile (1975–80), Chile, la memoria obstinada/Chile, Obstinate Memory (1998), El Caso Pinochet/The Pinochet Case (2001), and Salvador Allende (2004).

In 1971, after making several shorts, Guzmán directed and wrote his first documentary feature, Primer año, which covers the first year of Allende's presidency. The film includes topics ranging from land reform to the nationalization of various industries, to the empowerment of workers and peasants, to the state visit of Fidel Castro. In 1972 Guzmán directed and wrote La Respuesta de octubre, a film about the first management strike against Allende's government. Although neither film was circulated widely outside of Allende's Chile, they were well received by working-class audiences.

In 1973, using stock footage donated by Marker, Guzmán began coproducing (with Marker), directing, and writing La batalla de Chile Parts I, II, and III, an epic trilogy that documents Allende's final period, the violent right-wing counterrevolution against his government, and the accession of Pinochet's military junta. Using just one 16mm Eclair camera and one Nagra tape recorder, Guzmán, aided by five associates, filmed events during ten weeks immediately before, during, and after the military coup. On the first day of the coup, Guzmán was imprisoned in the National Stadium and filming was halted. After his release fifteen days later, he left for Europe and began to live in exile. One by one, four of the other five filmmakers escaped the country, and the film was smuggled safely out to Europe and then Cuba. The last filmmaker, Jorge Muller, was seized by the secret police in 1974 and was never heard of again. Over a period of four years, Guzmán completed the film in Cuba with funding and support from the Instituto cubano del arte y industria cinematográficos, the Cuban national film institute. The three parts were released in 1975, 1977 and 1979, and established and secured Guzmán's international reputation as a documentary filmmaker.

In the trilogy Guzmán found and developed his distinctive documentary style. He uses a rich mixture of direct cinema observation and investigative reporting. Deciding to use actuality footage rather than archival footage and the compilation method, he was able to obtain extraordinary footage by skillfully combining his rigorous and disciplined production techniques with his ability to understand, foresee, and immerse himself in the flow of political events. Guzmán frequently uses the sequence shot, a cinematic device that allows viewers to see events unfold without breaks in the flow of the images. The four-hour film, a poignant work of historical testimony, conveys both a sweeping drama of the historic events portrayed and an emotional texture that gives the footage multiple dimensions. While the film strongly favors Allende's efforts and does not pretend to be objective, it does present and convey a high level of information in a balanced manner and is not uncritical of the Left.

Part I, La insurrección de la burguesía/The Uprising of the Bourgeoisie (1975) documents the final days of Allende's presidency through the first day of the military coup. Part II, El golpe de estado/The Coup d'État (1977) documents the 'Popular Unity' period of Allende's government, the tumultuous events leading up to the coup, and Allende's controversial death (some believe he committed suicide and others that he was murdered by Pinochet's henchmen). Part III, El poder popular/The Power of the People (1979) documents the thousands of local groups of 'Popular Power' that were created during Allende's presidency by ordinary workers and peasants to perform various services in the country. Guzmán, following the Marxist concept that views classes as the protagonists of history and conflict as an inherent dimension of class societies, frames events in terms of class conflict. Parts I and II track the military's drift to the right and the anti-Allende activities of the legislature, and Part III centers on workers organizing as a class so that they can achieve emancipation from, and the transformation of, the bourgeoisie-dominated world.

The trilogy is considered by most international critics, Marxist and non-Marxist alike, to be one of the major political documentaries of the period, and, by some, to be one of the most important political documentaries ever made. The film has been screened internationally in more than eight countries, has been shown commercially in more than thirty-five countries, has won seven Grand Prizes in Europe and Latin America, has been distributed in more than twenty countries, and has been televised in more than ten countries.

In 1998, twenty-eight years after the death of Allende, Guzmán returned to Chile for the first time and screened La Batalla de Chile to students and to those who actually witnessed and/or participated in the battle. Their reactions formed the subject of his next documentary, Chile, la memoria obstinada/Chile, Obstinate Memory, which he directed, wrote, and narrated. Guzmán's premise is that the memory of those times and events that were captured in the trilogy was largely barred from the collective consciousness of the Chilean people, and the film investigates this political amnesia and the reawakening of memory in the Chilean people.

In 2001 Guzmán coproduced, directed, and wrote El Caso Pinochet, a film that examines the landmark legal case brought against Pinochet in Spain, both before and after his arrest in London in 1998. In 2004 Guzmán directed and wrote Salvador Allende, a film that documents the political career of the fallen leader by exploring both his rise to the presidency and the forces that collaborated against him to remove him from office.

Guzmán also has made a number of other types of documentaries, including several that have focused on Chilean and Latin American historical and religious concerns. In 1983 he directed and cowrote La Rosa de los vientos/The Compass Rose, a mythological fable about Latin America. In 1985 he directed and wrote Precolombian Mexico, a Spanish television series about the ancient times of the Mayan and Aztec cultures. In 1987 he produced, directed, and wrote En nombre de Dios/In the Name of God, a film about the Catholic Church's fight for human rights in Chile under the Pinochet regime. In 1988 he directed and wrote El proyecto aclarado de Carlos III/The Enlightened Project of Carlos III, a Spanish television series about the age of Enlightenment in Spain and the United States.

In 1992 he produced, directed, and wrote La Cruz del Sur/The Southern Cross, a Spanish television series about the discovery of America and the popular religions in Latin America. In 1995 Guzmán directed and wrote Las barreras de la soledad/The Barriers of Loneliness, a film about history and memory in a Mexican village. In 1999 he directed and wrote Isla de Robinson Crusoe/Robinson Crusoe Island, a film about Daniel Defoe's novel, and the remote island with the same name that lies off the Chilean coast. In 2001 he codirected and wrote Invocación/Invocation, and in 2002 he directed and wrote Madrid, a film that explores Spain's capital.

Guzmán is also a cinematographer, writer, and actor. In addition to working as a cinematographer on several films in the 1960s, he has published four books, several short stories, and numerous articles, and has acted in three films: Vivir al día/To Live a Day (1996), El Cobrador/The Collector (1994), and Moon Over Parador (1988). He also worked as the cinematographer on 11'09'01/September 11, 2001 (2002) and Salvador Allende (2004).

Guzzetti, Alfred

American filmmaker Alfred Guzzetti has been a central figure in the documentary film culture of the United States from the 1970s to the present day. Since the early 1970s he has examined how the realm of the subjective and the role of personal reflection were perceived as challenging obstacles to established models of documentary form. Guzzetti’s interest in the nuances of personal experience has resulted in a long career of simultaneously building on as well as dismantling the general understanding of the roles of filmmaker and audience of nonfiction film. His body of work spans four decades and is often divided into three distinct yet interwoven types of nonfiction form: personal documentary, political documentary, and experimental film and video.

For Guzzetti, the subject and the realm of the subjective complicate rather than challenge the potency of the indexical nature of documentary. His emergence into documentary filmmaking began at a moment when he saw both American culture and artistic practices meld aspects of the personal with the political. The political and social issues of the 1960s such as the Vietnam War, as well as the civil rights and the women's movements helped mark a shift on what had previously been considered private or personal topics into the political arena. This fusion of the personal and political also took hold in many arts. Much of Guzzetti's earlier work and ideas were influenced by well-known photographers such as Henri Cartier-Bresson and Henry Callahan, as well as revolutionary and experimental filmmakers such as Jean-Luc Godard, Peter Kubelka, and Jean Rouch.

In the 1970s and 1980s Guzzetti made a cycle of autobiographical documentaries that included private moments filmed by and about his family. Although it was not commonplace for filmmakers to combine 8mm archival footage and 16mm contemporary images from their personal lives in their documentaries, Guzzetti was not alone in this practice. In his catalogue essay for the 1993 Cinéma du Réel, 'The Documentary Gets Personal', he proposes that the personal documentary is not the practice of a single filmmaker but rather a mode that spans decades, social classes, genders, and continents. By evoking examples from a broad range of filmmakers such as the Lumière brothers, Martin Scorsese, Robb Moss, Maya Deren, Ross McElwee, Ed Pincus, and Su Friedrich, Guzzetti demonstrates how private images, although present in nonfiction films, often remain unsung in criticism on documentary film history. This essay provides a much needed historical mapping of the legacy behind the personal and autobiographical cinema.

His model of personal documentary filmmaking challenged filmmakers, not only to interact and observe their subjects but to use their own experiences and relationships with them to guide the filmmaking process. For instance, the second film of Guzzetti's autobiographical cycle, Scenes from Childhood (1977–80), was inspired by a staple of cinéma vérité film, Jean Rouch's and Edgar Morin's Chronique d'un été (1961). Guzzetti chose to use conventions of direct cinema such as synchronized sound, as well as an avoidance of interviews and voice-over narration to convey the intimacy of his personal relationship with the film's subjects, his child and his child's playmates. In this sense Guzzetti's personal documentaries can be seen as both a continuation of and a radical response to what are often considered more social and public issue-oriented modes of nonfiction filmmaking such as direct cinema and cinéma vérité.

By the late 1980s, Guzzetti became involved in a series of collaborative political film projects. In the 1990s he also worked on two anthropological projects with Lina Fruzzetti, Ákos Östör, and Ned Johnston: Seed and Earth (1994) and Khalfan and Zanzibar (2000). Such collaborations reflect the interests and skills of their coauthors, but strong connections can be made between these documentaries and Guzzetti's other nonfiction projects. Many of Guzzetti's sensibilities and preoccupations resurface in his second collaboration with Susan Meiselas and Richard Rogers, Pictures from a Revolution (1991), a film that combines cine and still photography to convey the social unrest in postrevolutionary Nicaragua. This film, as in his earlier autobiographical film, Family Portrait Sittings (1971–5) and in many of his later experimental films and videos, uses many formal devices and motifs found in much of Guzzetti's works: the role of the filmmaker and subject as eyewitness, the employment of various techniques that destabilize common assertions about the medium of photography while refusing to flatten out its power as artistic beauty or relativize its use as historical record, fragmenting and mismatching sound from its image to complicate the audience's sense of temporal order, and a preoccupation with the passage of time.

Guzzetti's writing on documentary positions fiction film as working, in part, to compensate and distract the spectator from the 'disruptive forces' of the cinematic medium. In his 1996 critical essay, 'Notes on Representation and the Nonfiction Film', Guzzetti asks: 'Might it not also be true that it was only through fiction that styles could have been evolved capable of managing the disruptive forces that Lumière let loose? Was fiction among other things a defense erected against all that is disquieting and problematical in the moving image?' This concern for tackling 'all that is disquieting and problematical in the moving image' is found not only in his personal and political documentaries but also in Guzzetti's more experimental nonfiction films and videos such as A Tropical Story (1998) and The Tower of Industrial Life (2000). He posits his later more experimental films and videos as a species of nonfiction consistent with his earlier approach to documentary. He began to use first Hi8 and later digital video formats to convey, in his words, 'the daily experience of contemporary life, its assaults on us in public places, in television, our ineffectual refuge in the private and the distant’.

Guzzetti’s consistent personal vision and diverse approaches to nonfiction form provide insightful ways for individuals concerned with the ‘disruptive forces’ of documentary film to mobilize questions of medium specificity (how cinema represents) alongside questions of identity politics (who gets represented and in what manner). His critical and filmic explorations offer historical records for not only how we lived but what in our lives we choose to document and archive. In his words: ‘For when future generations try to understand our civilization, it will be films such as these that provide the most vivid record of who we were and how we lived.’ Such a democratization of history-making places Guzzetti’s past and current projects alongside contemporary scholars and filmmakers dedicated to revealing personal experiences seldom told or heard in nonfiction works.

H

Handsworth Songs

(UK, Akomfrah, 1986)

The importance of Handsworth Songs can be located within the politics and aesthetics of its form, but also within the specific context of Britain in the 1980s. The formation of the Black Audio Film Collective in 1982, and its subsequent membership in the workshop movement, resulted in a genuinely collective filmmaking practice that emphasised formal experimentation, but also tried to anchor it in some kind of cultural and political address (Petley 1989). Handsworth Songs represents a documentary that investigates the inner-city riots that occurred in the Handsworth area of Birmingham and in other British cities during 1985 and the period of the Conservative government of Margaret Thatcher.

One of the repeated motifs of Handsworth Songs is that 'there are no stories in the riots, only the ghosts of other stories'. The ghosts of other stories are voices and experiences of the black population that arrived at the shores of the mother country from the Caribbean colonies in the 1950s.

An excavation of archival sources that ranges from British movietone news, to Birmingham Central Library and Yorkshire television documents this historical moment and the official response to it. A series of poetic ruminations on this journey to the heart of Empire reflexively inscribes a diasporic subjectivity onto this footage.

Through an aesthetic of assemblage and juxtaposition Handsworth Songs discursively exposes the gaps and silences in the response of politicians to the riots and the media reporting of the riots. For example, there is a sequence that brings together the newspaper headlines such as 'this bleeding heart of England' with a number of versions of the song 'Jerusalem'. The combination of dub reggae together with a brass band extract of 'Jerusalem' set against the images of newspaper extracts unfixes and hybridizes the language of English. The assembly of audio and visual sources in Handsworth Songs constructs a document with a syncretic dynamic (Kobena 1994) that fuses issues of race and ethnicity with the cultural tradition of the English working class so that black experience is articulated through the documentary form as an experience of England (Kobena 1988).

The structure of Handsworth Songs combines sources from the archival past and the present context of the riots and refuses a linear narrative trajectory. One of the recurring motifs is a black bus conductor in a museum gazing at the rotating wheels, axles, and cranks of machinery from the Industrial Revolution. The use of recurring imagery, the returning to the present context of the riots, and the use of oral songs lend the documentary a circular structure. Underlying this is a movement across the archival sources that represent black experience of England. Ambient and asynchronous sound that functions as counterpoint to the image denaturalizes the footage and accentuates the reflexivity of construction.

Handsworth Songs also generates a resonance between the archival footage and the coverage of the riots through interweaving a number of poetic and unauthored songs. The voice-over of the songs express a diasporic subjectivity that combines a feeling of displacement with an innocent faith in the mother country. Overlaying archival film describing a moment of arrival, they replace the voice-of-god commentary that might be expected from such footage. This strategy is reflexive and reflects a collective desire to find a structure and a form to deconstruct the hegemonic voices of British television newsreels. This not only corrects the blind spots of the archive but also lends a degree of subjectivity to part of the population who have not been granted access to this mode of expression within the history of British documentary. Handsworth Songs is a reflexive documentary where the consequences of reflexivity are rooted in the particular context of black British experience where the power relation that underpins the subject of knowledge assumed by documentary becomes part of the process of documentary (Nichols 1991; Trinh 1990).

The reception of Handsworth Songs generated a critical debate about the relationship between the film and its representational constituency between Salman Rushdie and Stuart Hall (Kobena 1988). The legacy of this debate is an ongoing opposition between the struggle to find a new language of documentary and the imperative to represent sufficiently the black population (Malik 1996). Rushdie highlights the successive generation of subjectivities and Asian subjectivities that are not represented by the film, while others have questioned the relevance of the aesthetics of Handsworth Songs and other workshop films (Kobena 1988; Lovell 1990).

Handsworth Songs and the work of the Black Audio Film Collective question the assumption that there exists a singular and correct mode of articulating black experience. The problem of being seen to only address an elite audience is not only a recurring issue within British film culture but also an issue of how documentary films such as Handsworth Songs are distributed and viewed. Black Audio succeeded in producing a documentary that places black British filmmaking within an international context and at the same time eludes the discourse of auteurism that characterises European art cinema (Pines and Willemen 1989).

Handsworth Songs revisits one of the central traditions of British cinema—the documentary. In its refusal to serve as a realist riot film, Handsworth Songs poses the question of whether a concern with form and with modernist and avant-garde techniques can be legitimately claimed by black filmmakers during a period of assumed postmodernity (Kobena 1988).

Happy Mother's Day, A

(US, Leacock, 1963)

A Happy Mother's Day is the first film that Richard Leacock made after leaving Drew Associates. He was assigned by the Saturday Evening Post to make a film about the Fisher quintuplets, the first surviving quintuplets born in the United States. Leacock and Joyce Chopra filmed the family and the events surrounding the publicity of the births in Aberdeen, South Dakota. The Post was not pleased with the finished product, and eventually ABC acquired the rights to Leacock's footage and created its own film, Quint City, U.S.A., which is significantly different from Leacock and Chopra's—a funny, yet disturbing, report on the mass media's obsession with, and crass commercialization of, a remarkable event.

The film opens with news footage of Mrs Fisher leaving the hospital after the births (taken before Leacock and Chopra's arrival). She is then seen two weeks later, attending a 'Gypsy Day' parade. The aerial shots of Aberdeen and of the parade work to establish a 'typical', small-town American scene, and the folksy tone of the film continues as we are shown the Fisher home: shots of Mr Fisher tending his cows and of the older children playing affectionately with newborn kittens. The mood begins to shift here, as a Ladies Home Journal reporter arrives, along with a Post photographer, who will arrange a picture of all the gifts that the family has received. Although Mrs Fisher insists that her children will never be on display, the second half of the film clearly shows us that the local leaders have every intention of exploiting this event; the official reaction to the births becomes the focus of the film.

Businessmen meet to discuss the influx of tourists to Aberdeen. At a meeting of the Chamber of Commerce, the sales of quintuplet souvenirs are discussed, although the idea of running newspaper ads for them is deemed by some as 'too commercial'. It is suggested that the ads could indicate that proceeds will go to the Fisher Foundation, but someone points out that there is no such foundation. The wife of the Chamber of Commerce leader takes Mrs Fisher clothes shopping, where, seeming embarrassed, she tries on a mink coat. Later, a women's club member makes suggestions to Mrs Fisher as to what she should wear at the upcoming luncheon being held in her honor. The film finishes with the celebration of the quintuplets' first month: the Fisher family poses for pictures, and the mayor of Aberdeen delivers an 'extraordinarily inflated speech' (Mamber 1975). A woman then sings a terrible song; the parade begins but abruptly ends when it starts to rain. The Fishers, along with everyone else, run for cover. 'It was a typical celebration in Aberdeen, South Dakota, USA,' the narrator concludes.

A Happy Mother's Day gives pleasure to the spectator yet makes one feel uncomfortable at the spectacle. We are shown the foolishness and excessive attention being given to this event, yet in viewing this, we are also contributing to the spectacle. Implicitly we contrast Leacock's desire to objectively report what he sees, consciously refusing to ask the Fishers to do anything for the camera, with the way others in the community and the news media direct them. Leacock's sensitivity to detail is impressive. As the Post photographer directs the Fishers and their older children in the family Model T Ford, making sure he can see everyone, Leacock frames three geese in the foreground and even follows the animals as the photographer speaks to the family. A press review of the parade is held before the actual one (to facilitate the reporters' deadlines, the narrator says), and amid the insistent directions given to the family, who pose with a local official and an Indian chief, Leacock films a nun taking a picture.

The tension the city leaders feel between commercializing the quintuplets and giving them privacy is reflected in the tension the spectator feels between laughing at the hypocrisy and feeling inappropriately superior to it. A question arises as to whether or not the film judges those who seek to exploit the births, rather than merely reports their actions. The businessmen come off as well-meaning, but nonetheless willing to exploit the commercial possibilities surrounding the infants. The mayor is represented as a pompous fool. The narrator's tone is especially sarcastic throughout, adding to the sense of mockery.

The central contrast that makes the film work is between the town and the Fishers themselves, especially Mrs Fisher. She is clearly a modest woman, not comfortable in the spotlight but willing to endure it, at least briefly. She is at times embarrassed at the attention, as when she is trying on the fur coat. When the head of the ladies' club asks her if she has a favorite color, Mrs Fisher shrugs and says no—she has clearly never thought about such matters. Finally, at the luncheon, during the awful song, Leacock pans through the crowd, and Mrs Fisher, noticing him, smirks, conveying her understanding of the absurdity of all this attention lavished on her.

It is obvious why the Post and ABC could not really accept Leacock and Chopra's cut of the film. It too accusingly points the fingers at all institutions seeking to exploit the quintuplets' births, including the news media. ABC constructed a different film, sponsored by a baby food manufacturer, and broadcast what 'looks like a half-hour baby food commercial' (Mamber 1975). All references to commercialism are qualified, minimizing the effect in Leacock's film. ABC uses more baby footage, including material not shot by Leacock. Long scenes in Leacock are cut, also distorting the effects of the original. Studying both films offers interesting insights into the difference between a filmmaker working in the Flaherty tradition of non-preconception and a commercial network whose motive, like the businessmen in Aberdeen, is profit.

Heart of Spain

(US, Kline, Karpathi, 1937)

Heart of Spain was one of the major contributions of Frontier Films, based in New York, to the Republican cause during the Spanish Civil War. The history of Frontier Films (sometimes referred to as the New York Documentary School) is generally associated with a type of film that went beyond any box office gains and added a social counterbalance to Hollywood's way of filmmaking. Until 1941, when the group disbanded as a result of World War II, Frontier Films imitated Russian film, which had a great impact on left-wing circles worldwide, to narrate the American reality emotionally by including the audience in the filmmaking experience.

Herbert Kline, a writer who was involved in theatre, and the photographer Geza Karpathi had the idea to make a documentary in Spain and eventually found a topic for their film. Norman Bethune had left his comfortable position at a Montreal hospital to assist the Republican cause by setting up a blood bank in Madrid to supply the front-line hospitals with blood. In New York, Paul Strand and Leo Hirtwitz remade the first cut of Heart of Spain with the help of John Howard Lawson, who did not appear in the credits, and Ben Maddow, who was featured as David Wolff. In the final cut, some newsreels were added to enhance the expressiveness of the final product. The topic had to be health-related to justify the $5,000 that the North American Committee to Aid Spanish Democracy granted to produce the documentary. Heart of Spain, however, went beyond the original central idea and, applying the theory of emotional impact of Frontier Films, constructed a defence of the need for American military intervention in favour of the Republican cause.

Heart of Spain renders an epic description of the people of Madrid, who bravely endure the siege of the city, during which normal life is impossible. Madrid is a front line of the war, and its inhabitants carry conventional weapons to defend themselves. They also carry symbolic weapons, however, such as solidarity and sacrifice. The film starts with scenes of Madrid as a city in ruins, devastated by the bombardments that, as a leitmotif, are omnipresent throughout the documentary. Facing the physical destruction of the city, its people rise up in arms as a collective hero who defends the freedom of all; Madrid is not just the scene of a specific war, but of an all-out, universal war. A banner expresses the underlying statement of the entire documentary: 'Our cause is the cause of the whole of civilized and progressive mankind.'

In Heart of Spain the Spanish enemy does not exist. It does not contain a single reference to the fraternal standoff between the Spanish and renders a Manichaeian representation of the war between the forces of good (the Republicans) and evil (the Fascists). The objective is clear: to show an unequal war in order to stir the international conscience. The Republican militia has its power base among bakers, carpenters, or those forced to go to war: the 'people's army' helped by men from all over the world, including Italy and Germany, to fight for democracy. The enemy is a dehumanized antagonist. Through their actions, the fascists resemble villains in a feature film: their cruelty shows through the mutilation and death caused by their bombs. Even Red Cross vehicles are perfect war targets and must go about camouflaged to elude any attacks.

The climax of the documentary's political argument, which criticizes the international hypocritical attitude of neutrality, is summed up in the scene where a black nurse takes off the bandage from the stump of the arm of a militia member, mutilated by an Italian grenade.

The commentator anticipates the feeling of repulsion that such a harsh image provokes in the audience by directly addressing the viewers, asking them not to turn away at the sight of this and see for themselves the effects that the policy of nonintervention, 'the Italian way', causes.

Heart of Spain wishes to batter the viewer emotionally, encouraging him or her to take action for the cause. To this end, the story of the defence of Madrid is centred on the most defenceless, the protagonists from whom the maximum emotional effect can be obtained: the women and children. A woman weeping while helping recover bodies is a metaphor for the grief of all Republicans. Children are constantly used to enhance the cruelty of the situation: children crying and dying in the bombardments, children playing war games, children helping to put up barricades, and so on.

Heart of Spain was never released in Spain, unlike The Spanish Earth by Joris Ivens, which did make it to the Spanish cinemas. In 1937 it was shown in the Playhouse, in New York, for seven weeks. Garrison Film distributed the documentary and took care of the distribution of another Frontier Films production, Return of Life (1938), which broaches the subject of hospital life during the defence of Madrid. Kline and Karpathi's film, which attracted approximately two million American viewers during the war, has gone down in documentary history as a paradigm of the exploitation of emotions for propaganda purposes.

Hearts and Minds

(US, Davis, 1974)

Released the year after peace agreements ending the Vietnam War were signed in Paris, Hearts and Minds is particularly significant in an American context, as its production and reception history mark shifts in popular attitudes toward the war by its end. During the war most anti-war documentaries made in the United States were low-budget films with limited exhibition, and most anti-war documentaries made outside the United States were never seen by Americans. By contrast, Hearts and Minds had a budget of $900,000 from Columbia Pictures, was released theatrically to a relatively large, mainstream audience and won the Academy Award for Documentary in 1974. A cultural landmark in these terms, Hearts and Minds still divides critics in their assessment of its efforts to show the devastating effects of war on the Vietnamese, to expose the corrupt origins of the war in American culture, and to communicate the moral and emotional fervour of the anti-war movement to mainstream America.

Hearts and Minds was produced by Bert Schneider whose previous projects with his company BBS (an affiliate of Columbia Pictures) had included anti-establishment fiction films Easy Rider (1969) and Five Easy Pieces (1970), as well as The Monkees television show (1967-69). Interested in making an anti-Vietnam War film, Schneider chose Davis to direct on the strength of his 1971 CBS documentary The Selling of the Pentagon. Broadcast in primetime, The Selling of the Pentagon marked a departure in US television from its previously held stance of uncritical support for government policy, as Davis exposed the methods by which the US Department of Defense promoted military intervention in Vietnam. Before Hearts and Minds the Hollywood industry had largely ignored Vietnam, preferring to leave the representation of this problematic and unpopular war to television. Thus it was not too surprising when Columbia Pictures dropped Hearts and Minds before its release because of the bad publicity it garnered for the studio.

Hearts and Minds is a compilation film that combines archival material of various kinds—horrific combat footage, segments from Hollywood films, domestic scenes from the United States and Vietnam, clips of political speeches—with interviews of American and Vietnamese politicians, veterans, civilian leaders, Vietnamese victims of American bombs, and ordinary Americans at home. There is no voice-over narration, but Davis's perspective on the Vietnam War as the product of American racism and militarism is made clear. To the end of exciting emotional responses in the viewer against the war and against those who promoted and supported it, Hearts and Minds is organized thematically in patterns of binary opposition and ironic juxtaposition: daily life in the Vietnamese countryside juxtaposed with images of American military technology at work; interviews with US pilots who praise advancements in war technology followed by images of destruction caused by US bombing raids; the Saigon office and industrial holdings of a self-proclaimed war profiteer compared to a small business that fits prosthetic limbs on injured veterans. It saves its most devastating juxtaposition for its conclusion. In one of its best-known and most effective sequences, General Westmoreland's explanation of the difference between American and Vietnamese attitudes towards death ('the Oriental doesn't put the same high price on life as does the Westerner') is intercut with images of bereaved families in a South Vietnamese cemetery in intimate moments of grief. Key interviews with veterans and other expert witnesses opposed to the war, such as Daniel Ellsberg, are likewise edited to build to a climax by the end of the film, when terrible physical injuries and emotional scars from the war are revealed and mourned.

The film has been justly praised for its ability to generate sympathy for both Vietnamese victims and US veterans who opposed the war through such striking juxtapositions and carefully paced revelations, but its strengths are inextricably bound to its weaknesses as a documentary account of the war. Because the film privileges affect over analysis and works largely by personifying war's origins and effects through its witness-participant interviews, it does little to address social, political, and economic contexts. For instance, owing perhaps to its objective to reach as broad an audience as possible in the United States where anti-communist sentiment still ran high or perhaps to Davis's stated interest in psychological rather than political origins of the war, the film fails to recognise the political and military organization of communist forces in Vietnam. Instead, the Vietnamese in Hearts and Minds are movingly depicted as passive victims, powerless and largely apolitical, the embodiment of pure human suffering, an oversimplification that ultimately reverses but does not actually correct the racist stereotypes (of the Oriental-as-in-human-menace) familiar from government propaganda and Hollywood film. Likewise, Davis's representations of those Americans who supported the war and the nature of US war culture that informed their actions offer little insight into the war's causes. For instance, Davis draws no distinction between those politicians who led the country into war and those veterans who were conscripted and persuaded, and remained persuaded, of its justice. Davis appears to imply, in fact, that war's violence is somehow natural to, and emerges from, blue-collar and small-town America, as demonstrated in the sequences that compare a high school football game in Ohio to combat in Vietnam. This assumption likewise underpins the film's representation of Lt Coker, a prisoner of war who returns from Vietnam to his working-class neighbourhood in Linden, NJ after six years of imprisonment with a message of gratitude and patriotism for his neighbours. Coker appears a brutal buffoon, particularly when placed in opposition to the more sophisticated and articulate anti-war veterans. For Davis to simply demonize, rather than attempt to understand, a veteran like Coker and the community who welcomed him home is a significant failing in a film whose stated purpose was to explore the psychological basis of the war in American society. It also effectively demonstrates both the power and limitations of Davis's preferred formal strategies in representing the Vietnam War and its causes and effects.

Hearts of Darkness: A Filmmaker's Apocalypse

(US, Bahr, Hickenlooper, Coppola, 1991)

During the two hundred and thirty-eight days that it took for Francis Ford Coppola and company to finish principal shooting of Apocalypse Now in the Philippines (chosen as a location for its physical resemblance to Vietnam), Coppola's wife Eleanor documented on camera and in writing the nightmarish trials experienced by the film's cast, crew and, perhaps most profoundly (certainly on the most levels: physical, psychological, economic, spiritual), its renowned director. The astounding commercial and critical success of Apocalypse Now after its eventual release in 1979—a share of the Palm D'Or at Cannes, three Golden Globes, two Academy Awards, more than $150 million at box offices worldwide—resulted in its attaining almost immediately the status of a contemporary American classic. Contributing mightily to the legend is Hearts of Darkness: A Filmmaker's Apocalypse (1991), directed by Fax Bahr with George Hickenlooper, which chronicles and reflects on the turbulent making of Coppola's film. Hearts of Darkness seamlessly blends together the on- and off-set footage shot by Eleanor (as well as private conversations between her and her husband that Coppola was unaware at the time were being taped) with more standard 'talking head' interviews with numerous people involved in the production (conducted by Bahr more than ten years later). Also punctuating the documentary are outtakes and scenes left on the cutting-room floor, as well as brief but effective aural snippets of Orson Welles narrating Joseph Conrad's 1901 novel Heart of Darkness (on which the Apocalypse Now screenplay was loosely based) for the Mercury Theater radio programme in 1938.

Hearts of Darkness is widely considered to be among the very best entries in the subgenre loosely known as 'making-of' documentaries, in large part because of its creators' access to primary source materials that would normally be extremely difficult to obtain, much less receive permission to use. These were among the highlights (lowlights for those involved): interruptions on set by the Filipino military; increasingly grim confessions of insecurity and despair by the director, whose artistic/commercial reputation and financial well-being were very much on the line, to his wife; a serious heart attack suffered by the film's main actor, Martin Sheen, during the middle of shooting; and heated discussions between Coppola and two of his key cast members, Dennis Hopper (seemingly stoned the entire time and incapable of remembering his lines) and Marlon Brando (who showed up on-set grossly overweight, without having read Conrad's source novel and costing the already way over-budget production a cool million dollars a week). Add to all this the sacking of the originally contracted lead, Harvey Keitel; a massive typhoon that destroyed numerous sets; Coppola's endless dissatisfaction with his film's conclusion; and the fact that a project originally scheduled for sixteen weeks of shooting ended up taking more than three years to complete (Bahr and Hickenlooper insert shots of trade paper headlines at the time snidely asking, 'Apocalypse When?'), and one has to figure that the creators of Hearts of Darkness must have known they had a 'making-of' goldmine on their hands.

Reviewers such as Roger Ebert have gushed of Hearts of Darkness that 'the making of a film has never been documented with more penetration and truth'. A running joke (not without a hint of seriousness) even has it that Bahr and Hickenlooper's documentary is more cogent and entertaining than the film it is about. For all its much-deserved credit, however, Hearts of Darkness is actually highly atypical for a 'making-of' documentary and, in fact, bears a problematic relationship with this species of nonfiction filmmaking. Because the principal shooter had so much personally at stake in her subject—she was, after all, married to the larger-than-life auteur in charge of the entire production/circus she was covering—any aspiration on her part to provide an objective recording of events would of necessity be compromised from the start. As Eleanor wrote at the time in her subsequently published Notes on the Making of Apocalypse Now, ‘I was watching from the point of view of the observer, not realising that I was on the journey too.’ The viewer of Hearts of Darkness may well wonder why, despite all of the amazing behind-the-scenes footage that Eleanor managed to obtain, there is nothing of Harvey Keitel and very little by way of explanation for Coppola’s decision to fire his well-known star; why there is hardly any indication of Coppola’s notoriously bad temper on set; or why the seriously strained relationship between Eleanor and her husband goes unnoted. (By way of contrast, in Notes Eleanor writes of Coppola’s numerous affairs during the shoot, his general lack of interest in her, and their discussion near the end of production as to whether or not to get a divorce.) As an online analysis of Bahr and Hickenlooper’s documentary astutely puts the point, ‘despite the fact that Hearts of Darkness is not Eleanor’s documentary, Hearts of Darkness is still very much the “official Coppola family” version of events’.

Not addressed in previous writing on Hearts of Darkness, but one of the documentary’s most fascinating aspects, is the way it effectively (though almost certainly unintentionally) reveals the paradoxical nature of auteurism as a critical concept in film scholarship, as well as in popular thinking about Coppola’s career as a maverick director with a unique and uncompromising artistic vision. On the one hand, and as the documentary labours to make clear beyond the shadow of a doubt, Apocalypse Now could only have been a Coppola picture (we learn from Eleanor’s voice-over narration that Orson Welles, another genius auteur, from a different era, failed in his efforts to adapt Conrad’s novel for his directorial debut, so he made Citizen Kane (1941) instead). On the other hand, it is just as clear that Apocalypse Now could never have been anything near the masterpiece it turned out to be had Coppola not received such magnificent contributions from his cast and crew—not to mention from Eleanor, who, if Hearts of Darkness is at all to be trusted, had much more faith in her husband than he had in himself.

Hegedus, Chris

Chris Hegedus has been actively engaged in the direct cinema style of filmmaking since the mid-1970s. Her work as half of the well-respected team of Pennebaker-Hegedus has brought much to the discussion of documentary style and technique. Hegedus began her personal and professional relationship with D.A. Pennebaker in 1976, first as an editorial assistant and later as a codirector, editor, and sound technician.

The filmmakers were married in the 1980s. Hegedus embraced notions of documentary form championed by Pennebaker and his colleagues Richard Leacock and David and Albert Maysles.

The Energy War, released in 1978, was the first major work of the Pennebaker-Hegedus team. The three-part PBS series explores the eighteen-month battle over the National Energy Plan put forth by the Carter administration (Thompson 1993). During this time Hegedus had also begun work editing the raw material Pennebaker had shot in 1971 of the historic debate between Norman Mailer and such feminist activists as Germaine Greer, Jill Johnston, Susan Sontag, and Jacqueline Ceballos (president of the National Organization for Women at the time). The filmed footage had been shelved for years, and Hegedus saw the potential within the reels for an exciting work. Her editing, according to Pennebaker, gave the film a life: 'Chris did a really good job of editing. It's pretty ratty, probably as badly shot as anything I've ever done. Chris edited it for content, and content always wins over form. Nobody ever pays attention after the worst five minutes of the most horribly shot movie you can imagine, even if it's about something interesting' (Gordon 2001). Hegedus found that the material lent itself to the aesthetic cultivated by the Direct Cinema movement. 'In some ways [...] it was appropriate that it took place in Town Hall. Everyone was participating, screaming and yelling back, and they were as much a part of the event as those on stage. I felt when I edited it, it was important to keep that feeling of excitement. Those swing pans were helpful for knowing this person made that comment or look' (Gordon 2001). This film, like others in the Pennebaker-Hegedus oeuvre, creates an environment in which viewers feel very much a part of the action. There are no questions asked of the subjects, no canned responses from press release-style preparations, and the actions that occur are filmed as they happen. Little interaction exists between the filmmaker and the subject in the area of content.

The team received an Oscar nomination for their 1993 documentary work The War Room. This film began as an invitation to create a work about the presidential election of 1992 but quickly evolved into a more specific investigation of the public relations machine behind the Clinton candidacy. Pennebaker and Hegedus were not allowed to directly follow or constantly film the presidential hopeful, but they were allowed unlimited access to the activities of George Stephanopolis, the communications director, and James Carville, chief political strategist for the campaign. The film gives the viewer an intimate look at the process behind the candidate, the frustrations and triumphs within the daily activities, and the very human elements of the political landscape. Hegedus said, 'I never understand why people let us film them, because I hate to be filmed so much. But people do see some reason for showing this, for people to see this process' (Thompson 1993).

These stylistic concerns are apparent in the various works done by the filmmaking team, as well as in works directed by Hegedus herself. Startup.com is a work codirected by Hegedus and Jehane Noujaim. The work, released in 2001, chronicles the 'spectacularly speedy rise and fall of an internet company called govWorks.com. Conceived and developed by Kaleil Isaza Tuzman and Tom Herman, friends since childhood, govWorks was designed to facilitate interaction between local government, citizens, and businesses and began during the dotcom boom' (Fuchs 2001). Noujaim was the roommate of Tuzman at the time the film was conceived, so the filmmakers had, again, an amazing level of access to the subjects. Hegedus explains her approach to contemporary documentary filmmaking: 'We're always looking for a story where we can follow some person through something in their life that is important to them, that has some kind of risk and built-in dramatic structure, so that we can make a film in a style that is as similar to a fictional feature as possible, and gives the viewer the sense that he's dropped in that world and gets to experience it. That's what has always been interesting to me in filmmaking, and quite often you can't do that, you don't get the dramatic arc or a character that is interesting' (Fuchs 2001). The concept is solidified in the approach to production: 'We don't do much interviewing along the way' because the subjects 'start seeing themselves as actors in their own lives'. The relationship that is created between the filmmakers and the subjects by the constant presence of the camera is one in which trust is a necessary by-product. Hegedus says, 'You don't deny that you're there. But if you are there enough, you really are part of their life and they can't be bothered with you after a while.' The piece was shot entirely on a small DV camera, thus adding to the ability to work in an unobtrusive fashion to capture the story. Says Hegedus, 'I am striving for films that give me the same excitement that the first cinéma vérité films gave me. Those were films where I felt I was inside this world getting a peak at it, the primal voyeurism that we all have that early vérité films gave, with a story as dramatic as any story can be' (Gordon 2001). Hegedus's works since include 2002's Only the Strong Survive, which features performances by Wilson Pickett, Issac Hayes, and other soul artists, and her 2003 work Elaine Stritch at Liberty, which documents a theatrical performance.

Heidi Fleiss: Hollywood Madam

(UK, Broomfield, 1995)

Nick Broomfield's progress as a documentary filmmaker has in many ways mirrored wider aesthetic, political, and production/distribution trends in the genre. Early films such as Behind the Rent Strike (1974) and Juvenile Liaison (1975) (both codirected with Joan Churchill) are good examples of a direct cinema or vérité style of polemical filmmaking; middle-period films such as Tattooed Tears (1978) and Soldier Girls (1981) (still with Churchill) are more like—though not quite like—Frederick Wiseman-type observational films; the sole directed films since the late 1980s, with Broomfield playing a large on-screen role, might be called self-reflexive or postmodern. There is a sense that in them he established a persona and found a distinctive personal style (so much so that this persona—Broomfield with headphones and microphone, asking awkward questions and casting conspiratorial looks at the camera—featured in a series of 1999 Volkswagen commercials).

Clearly, Broomfield belongs among those documentary filmmakers, including Errol Morris, who are reacting against claims that documentary may have made in the past to objectivity and the capacity to capture the real. Instead, viewers experience the encounter and negotiation between the filmmaker (whether on-screen or, like Morris, not), the camera, and the subject. This echoes the cinéma vérité tradition associated with Jean Rouch and Edgar Morin's Chronique d'un été, in which Rouch and Morin are frequently seen and heard on camera setting situations up, orchestrating encounters to be filmed, and discussing what they are doing. Several commentators, including Stella Bruzzi, have called this mode the 'performative documentary'.

Like Michael Moore, whose films also feature an on-screen persona whose relationship to any 'real' Michael Moore is essentially unknowable, Broomfield's commercial success (or perhaps we should say his ability to continue making films) seems to have depended on the combination of controversial subjects—serial killers, rock star suicides, fascist leaders, sexual fetishists—all of which seem to lure him, whether from perversity or for purely commercial reasons and humour. Certainly in Heidi Fleiss Broomfield demonstrates a fascinated, prurient interest in the Los Angeles/Hollywood underworld of pornography, drugs, call girls, and crime.

Two insistent motifs recur. First are the images that open the film—shaky, slowed-down television footage of Fleiss, smiling, at her first court appearance, which are linked with the film's quest to discover who is/was the real Heidi and why she did what she did. Second are the images of that quest, through Broomfield's car window, driving forward, to the sound of expectant music (reminiscent of Morris's Thin Blue Line) and Broomfield's voice explaining what leads are being followed; however, the impression of investigative journalism is misleading. Even quite early on, bereft of ideas and leads, Broomfield, introducing a sequence of random meetings with street prostitutes, comments that 'in desperation, we drove down Sunset Boulevard looking for clues'.

As this implies, the film relies quite heavily on irony and understatement. At another point, his lead collapsing, Broomfield concedes that he 'could tell things weren't going so well'. Later, he asks a thug, over the telephone, sweetly and reasonably, 'I just wanted to ask you if you put the bullet holes in Ivan's ceiling'. Much humour derives from the tension between Broomfield's polite, ingratiating English manner, verging on the disinterested and smug, and the more brash, vulgar style of his subjects; it is striking that most of Broomfield's recent subjects have been American.

One way to think about Broomfield's films, and Heidi Fleiss in particular, is as documenting the preparatory processes for documentary filmmaking before actually shooting the film—researching, interviewing, trying to find an appropriate structure. Broomfield goes out of his way, for example, to show the cash transactions that underpin the interviews. These preliminaries, which we would not normally see, provide the substance for the film. Most filmmakers, after the 'research' process we witness, would have reached the conclusion that there was not really a film here—that not enough had been, or could be, discovered—and abandoned it. With Broomfield, reaching this conclusion is the film. Early on, Alex, former madam and FBI informer, comments that 'Hollywood doesn't want to be revealed', nor is it. Thus, though the film starts as 'investigative journalism', it discovers very little (although, obliquely, we begin to guess a good deal about Heidi, Alex, and Ivan Nagy and the milieu in which they operate). Indeed, the film leaves us with precious few means to make much sense of the sound-over conversation between Heidi and Ivan as the end credits play out.

Bruzzi highlights the question of directorial or authorial 'control' in our responses to Heidi Fleiss. To a certain extent, we feel initially that Broomfield is in control—following leads, connecting, revealing. By the end, however, the film is clearly going nowhere investigatively, and Broomfield, or his persona, is lost. Still trying to follow up pointless leads, he is told by Alex that he is a 'greedy pig', by Ivan that he is a 'fool' and 'rube', 'flogging a dead horse' and 'there is nothing to understand'. Heidi ends with 'You're missing something, Nick [...] It's so funny, you're way off', and walks out on him.

How we should read this apparent floundering remains uncertain. Is this an invitation to ironic reflection on the filmmaker's incompetence? Is it a conceit, a carefully engineered descent into confusion and chaos? Is it innocent evidence of Broomfield's defeat and loss of control? The pattern of failing to achieve objectives is so familiar from other Broomfield films that we must take it as willed here, too. Either way, Broomfield succeeds—fascinatingly and entertainingly—in reminding us of the artificial nature of the documentary enterprise and its inherent contradictions.

Hell Unlimited

(UK, McLaren, 1936)

Hell Unlimited was made by Norman McLaren and Helen Biggar to protest against profits in armaments during a period when fascism was growing throughout Europe. McLaren had already made a few artistic experiments on film that were largely formalist in nature and would become a renowned abstract filmmaker, undertaking the majority of his work at the National Film Board of Canada. Biggar was a sculptress and an active member of the British Communist Party, and went on to make Challenge to Fascism in the following year. Though McLaren is not generally known as a political filmmaker, this was a period when many international avant-garde artists became more socially aware, and when documentary filmmaking and the avant-garde film became somewhat intertwined. McLaren briefly became involved in overtly political films and had also been the cameraman on Ivor Montagu's Defence of Madrid (1936), which documented Franco's attack on the city.

Made with help from students and tutors at the Glasgow School of Art, Hell Unlimited is one of the most interesting films to merge avant-garde formalism and direct political protest in the interwar period. In the 1930s there was a rise in political workers' film movements, and a number of exhibiting outlets, distribution units, and production bases arose, such as Kino and the Workers Film and Photo League. While the primary activity of this movement was to distribute and exhibit films of a left-wing, political nature, a number of films were also produced in this milieu. For the most part, these were 'alternative' newsreels: documents of left-wing activities. There were, however, a few films made that were more ambitious in nature, such as Bread (1934), which used experimental montage sequences to comment on class inequalities. While Hell Unlimited was not made directly under the auspices of the workers' film movement, it was indirectly relate to this movement. It should also be seen as part of the more modernist, experimental activities occurring in Britain at the time, activities that can be traced back to the formation of the Film Society (in 1925) and the existence of the journals Close Up (1927–33) and Film Art (1933–7).

Hell Unlimited is both extremely experimental in nature and highly didactic in tone. It uses a mixture of animation, stock shots, and rapid montage to protest against profits made from armaments and implores citizens to do everything that they can to protest the war. It begins with a chart reflecting spending on health, education, and armaments over the years. As the years peel away into the 1930s, the armaments bar gets higher and higher, eventually bursting out of the chart. The situation is explicitly linked to World War I, and a depiction of events that took place in 1915 follows. Titles such as 'die' and 'to make a world safe for democracy' are flashed across the screen, followed by scenes of dead bodies, intercut with a stop-motion sequence of money piling high, eventually rising out of the screen, and titles declaring the statistical costs of war (both monetary and human). The titles reflect the contradictory ideology that is bandied about by governments in times of crisis, while the graphics and footage attempt to portray the chasm between rhetoric and actuality.

The film continues to attack the government for its links with capitalist concerns and for placing profits above human concerns. It relentlessly mocks the 'official' truth propagated by governments, as well as by the mainstream media, by using dialectical montage and animation. For example, at one stage in the film a title reads 'Prosperity is returning'. This is followed by headlines reporting an economic revival, with a chart showing a rise in financial prosperity. Shots of factories are then shown, whilst a government official shouts (via titles): 'we have reduced the absolute limit whilst other countries have been rearming'. This sequence, though, is a parody of 'official truth'. The next sequence shows a man listening to the speech through his radio, followed by a cut to models in his room watering plants that sprout monstrous growths, such as grenades and fighter planes. Here, pixillation methods reveal a deeper truth than official newsreels and question the often-accepted veracity of such newsreels (and, by extension, of naturalistic/actuality aesthetics). Animation and 'tricks'—by conventional methods connected to illusion (while actual footage was connected to reality)—are associated with a deeper, unspoken 'truth'.

Although Hell Unlimited may seem slightly naïve in its politics, in that it fails to address the issue of what would happen if nobody confronted fascism, it does address serious issues, such as the undemocratic operations of supposedly democratic governments and the underhand ways in which they go about business. It does not shy away from attacking particular targets, and although it may be dogmatic and propagandistic, it also questions any 'innocent' or 'transparent' representation, placing doubt on the ability of images to be equated with 'truth'. It may be dogmatic and propagandistic in one sense, but its use of animation to reveal deeper truths behind newsreel images opens up room for scepticism toward any form of 'transparent' representation.

Although arguments that aesthetics and politics did not merge within British culture during this period have most definitely been overstated

(because of a simplistic appreciation of what is 'political'), there was hostility in some areas between 'bohemian' formalism and direct political agitation. Hell Unlimited brings together such areas, probably because, as Marris has pointed out, the film emerged from the 'intersection of two apparatuses (filmmakers with Communist Party connections in an art school context)'. Apart from the two films that I have mentioned, as well as Peace and Plenty (Montagu/Kino, 1939), there is little evidence that workers' film groups adopted aesthetic formalism on many occasions.

Heller, Peter

To locate the world in the personal, immediate reality, to use the micro to explain the macro—these are central strategies adopted in the films of Peter Heller. This filmmaker concentrates on the developing world, and the media images from that region that are made available to the rest of the world. Heller's work also focuses on the underprivileged in German society. For Heller, as a political filmmaker in the tradition of the student movement, these seemingly disparate realities are related, and he continually draws attention to similarities among seemingly different societies. He is convinced that Europeans are not able to teach other societies anything, but should respect the culture and knowledge of those other societies. He considers it a privilege of his profession, that he is allowed to search out these similarities in regions around the world, and report on what he finds via film.

A commitment to in-depth research is the backbone of his work; often, the shoot itself is the shortest portion of the overall filmmaking project. In his films, Heller often challenges cliché images of poor Africans decimated by famine and war, which dominate mainstream news. He wants to propagate other images that convey the dignity of African lifestyles, although he sometimes faces challenges, as in the making of the film Adalil (1991). In this film, his protagonist, a strong woman he wants to show as independent, reneged on the film contact in objection to the hectic pace of filmmaking, as he disclosed in articles that he later wrote.

Beside his numerous films on Africa and Latin America, one of his strongest pieces is a film series on a poor family with eight children in Cologne, whom he filmed for a number of years starting in 1976. It is an intimate chronicle of poverty in Germany and a testament to the strength needed to maintain a cohesive family unit in the face of such circumstances. Peter Heller visited the family without the camera as well, and essentially became a part of the family. It is an ethnographic view on an aspect of German reality that is not often of interest to filmmakers.

In his first film on the family, Arm würd' ich nicht sagen (1977), he had to transfer the small apartment into a studio with lights and other film equipment. It was followed by ... arm würd' ich nicht sagen oder die Kunst zu leben (1986) and Mama General (1997). The use of additional cameras in the later films made it possible to follow the daily life of the family much more closely and intimately. After the death of the mother, the family fell apart, as depicted in Mutter Jahre (2004).

Herzog, Werner

Along with Wim Wenders and Rainer Werner Fassbinder, Werner Herzog was the most internationally prominent member of the New German Cinema. He is popularly associated with a remarkable series of fictional narrative films from the 1970s and early 1980s that won him the reputation of being the movement's 'romantic visionary'. Yet even in that period of his career he was as active in documentary as in fiction. With his fiction output decreasing in quantity and consistently failing to match the standards or attract the acclaim of his earlier work, the 1990s and 2000s saw him concentrate increasingly on the documentary with often happier results.

Both strands of his oeuvre are thematically linked by a preoccupation with 'visionary' characters whose perceptions of the world leave them alienated from mainstream society and often existing at the limits of human (in)communication. Grandiose dreamers, madmen, dwarves, vampires, the physically and mentally handicapped, and survivors like Dieter Dengler in Flucht aus Laos/Little Dieter Needs to Fly (1997) and Juliane Köpcke in Julianes Sturz in den Dschungel/Wings of Hope (1999) whose traumatic experiences have in some way set them apart, are representative of the characters from whose extreme modes of being Herzog has posited an expanded vision of existence consistently challenging to the perceived spiritual blindness of societal norms. His major trope in creating images of these characters' subjective existences is his Romanticist use of landscapes, which while real, take on the attributes of 'landscapes that exist only in our dreams [...] inner landscapes' (Cronin 2002). Such documentaries as Fata Morgana (1970) and Lektionen in Finsternis/Lessons in Darkness (1992) even dispense with a central human focus altogether in favour of 'dreaming' pre- and post-human desertscape through existing locations. Crucial to the process of endowing his landscapes with oneiric qualities is Herzog's careful selection of accompanying music track. Whether opera in a jungle, Leonard Cohen in an African desert or the formerly ubiquitous sounds of Florian Fricke's group Popol Vuh, the music often supplies a decisively enriching contrast to the image. La Soufrière (1977) marks Herzog's most lucid and self-reflexive exploration of his work with apocalyptically inflected landscape. Accompanied by two cameramen, he visits the evacuated island of La Soufrière, which is on the verge of an apparently inevitable volcanic disaster. The volcano's eventual nonexplosion frustrates the confessedly embarrassed filmmaker's desire to record the island's destruction. The landscape has for once rejected his 'dream' of it, even as it appeared as appropriately unworldly. This leaves comically transparent the manipulative dynamic involved between artist and landscape even in an ostensible documentary.

Yet Herzog is clear in his refusal to view his documentary output as distinct from his other work, and he has profitably explored fiction/documentary interfaces to the benefit of both forms. He sees no harm in, for example, falsely claiming in voice-over that firemen are reigniting recently extinguished oil wells out of madness, in order to have something to put out again, in Lessons in Darkness, or in hiring local drunks to play pilgrims in Glocken aus der Tiefe/Bells from the Deep (1993). His poetic conception of the 'truth' of a situation takes precedence over its factual details. In filming Herz Aus Glas/Heart of Glass (1976), a fiction film, with the entire cast under hypnosis or in starring ex-asylum inmate Bruno S. in two other nondocumentaries that both, to varying degrees, draw on his troubled character, Herzog takes risks that are arguably more appropriate to the more flexible documentary format. Yet it is possible that the psychodrama of Bruno S.'s performance in Jeder für sich und Gott gegen alle/The Enigma of Kaspar Hauser (1974) foreshadows Herzog's leading Vietnam survivor Dieter Dengler to recreate the circumstances of his captivity while blindfolded in the documentary Little Dieter Learns to Fly. The desire to surmount the incommunicability of his protagonists' experiences is clear in both cases, but the presence of Herzog as interacting interviewer/narrator in the latter film personalises his wish to empathetically engage with his 'characters'. This process of identification, although not common to all his film portraits, is most pronounced in Die Grosse Ekstase des Bildschnitzers Steiner/The Great Ecstasy of Woodcarver Steiner (1973) in which Herzog, ski-jumper manqué, possessively hounds his taciturn ski-jumper hero even in his most stressful moments. Communication with (and among) the alienated becomes the explicit theme of Land des Schweigens und der Dunkelheit/Land of Silence and Darkness (1971), his moving study of deaf and blind woman Fini Straubinger and some of her fellow sufferers.

Aesthetically, the documentary has aided fiction in Herzog. For example, it has been more than once noted that the jungle adventures Aguirre, der Zorn Gottes/Aguirre, the Wrath of God (1972) and Fitzcarraldo (1982) draw much of their power from documenting their own gruelling and hazardous shoots; a vérité edge that endows the fiction with an effective textural vividness. Equally, the artistic failure of Invincible (2001) can be largely attributed to his adoption of a slicker style that sits awkwardly with his fundamentally raw approach to filming people and spaces. Yet he has theorised against the ethics of cinéma vérité as a documentary practice, denouncing the approach as superficial,

'the truth of accountants', and has used scenes of overt visual stylisation in his nonfiction work such as the famous extreme slow motion images of Woodcarver Steiner ski-flying. It is, beyond a doubt, the sometimes paradoxical dialectic between documentary and fiction inherent in Herzog's style that dynamises his entire filmmaking.

Heyer, John

In recent times, amongst the talk of 'global cinema' John Heyer is a salient reminder of how, from its earliest days, Australian documentary film was an international medium.

Like many others of his generation, Heyer established his connection to the international documentary community in the 1930s and 1940s through the cinema publications he read.

He read journals such as Close Up, Cinema Quarterly, Experimental Cinema, and corresponded with the State Film School in Moscow, with British documentary filmmakers, and with counterparts in the United States. Heyer also watched imported films such as the Soviet classics that were at this time becoming available through the cultural arms of embassies.

John Grierson and Robert Flaherty provided, respectively, lasting models for Heyer's agitation for documentary film sponsorship and a poetic vision for his documentary films. Heyer began his career as a factotum on a range of Australian features in the late 1930s. During this period he also made advertising films as well as his first documentary film, New Pastures (1940), for the New South Wales Milk Marketing Board. This documentary saw the emergence in Australia of the sponsored documentary that looked to nationalist concerns tempered with an aesthetic framework.

Like many documentary filmmakers internationally, World War II provided the focus on propaganda that realist filmmaking could provide. During the war Heyer was appointed producer for the Allied Works Council and member of the Prime Minister's Propaganda and Morale Committee. In 1944 he worked as second unit director and shooting script collaborator with Harry Watt on the Ealing production The Overlanders. Heyer was given the difficult task of following an authentic cattle drive across the Australian outback to provide the documentary footage that was to be interspersed with the footage of Chips Rafferty, John Nugent, and Daphne Campbell in the dramatic sequences.

After the war Heyer took on another significant role for the documentary community: that of the promulgation of the film society movement. Heyer was appointed president of the Australian Society of Film Societies and of the Sydney Film Society. The work of these organisations culminated in the establishment of the Sydney and Melbourne Film Festivals. Heyer's passion for cinema included both producing and making available little-seen films from around the globe. Following Grierson, he also understood film to have an educative purpose, lobbying through his 1940 appointment to the Documentary Films Committee of New South Wales for the use of films in schools and universities and for the development of a national movement such as Britain's of the 1930s and 1940s. Heyer's participation in this agitation for government involvement in film production in no small way contributed to the formation of the Australian National Film Board (ANFB, later the Commonwealth Film Unit) in 1945 to which he was appointed its first senior producer and director.

For the Film Board Heyer was to produce the institution's international award-winning Native Earth (1945), Journey of a Nation (1946), The Cane-cutters and Men and Mobs (1947), and The Valley is Ours (1948), through which he gained international renown, leaving the ANFB to head the Shell Film Unit (Australia).

Heyer's Shell appointment led to the production in 1954 of one of Australia's sentimental favourites, The Back of Beyond, one of the most important films to be made in Australia since the war. The film, a documentary about a weekly mail-truck run along the Birdsville Track, follows its driver, Tom Kruse, through the numerous stations and natural obstacles along the way in a poetic rendering of the relationship between the people and the place they inhabit. Seen by an estimated seven hundred and fifty thousand Australians in the first two years of its release and with subsequent television and film festival retrospectives and tertiary education screenings, it is familiar to generations of Australians. Internationally, the film has led another life. In its year of release the film won the Grand Prix Assoluto at the Venice Biennale Film Festival in competition with Flaherty's Louisiana Story. The Back of Beyond continued to work its way around the globe, with hundreds of prints being distributed by Shell to countries as far away as Finland, Hong Kong, Venezuela, Canada, and the Philippines.

In 1956 Heyer was appointed executive producer, Films and Television, Shell International, London. During the 1950s and 1960s Heyer produced or directed more than sixty films for Shell, all of which were promotional vehicles. Having left Shell, he set up the John Heyer Film Company in 1967 and he produced and directed a series of documentaries including a series on the technological achievements of the government in Dubai and The Reef (1978) for the Australian Conservation Foundation.

In 1970 Heyer was awarded the Order of the British Empire for achievements in cinema, in 1986 he became a member of the European Academy of Arts, Sciences and Humanities, and in 1997 he was awarded an Order of Australia.

John Heyer had an enormous influence on Australian documentary film culture, not only through his film production but through his advocacy of and support for film societies, festivals, and film schools that support the international film culture in which Australia participates.

High School

(US, Wiseman, 1968)

Frederick Wiseman's High School is a direct cinema account of life in a Philadelphia public school that exemplifies a theme that pervades the filmmaker's work: the way power is exercised and manipulated by institutions. High School provides a compelling study of the public education system's role in molding free-thinking adolescents into blindly obedient adults during an era of generational revolt against prevailing economic, political, and social institutions. Enough documentaries had been made about the problems of inner-city schools, the filmmaker argued. To choose one would have led to heavy-handed caricature and one-sided condemnation of the public school system. Instead, Wiseman chose Northeast High because its reputation as one of the best schools in the city provided him with an opportunity to explore the values being taught in a highly touted educational setting.

High School opens with the camera riding in a car, on the way to school in the morning, as Otis Redding's 'Dock of the Bay' provides one of the film's few instances of nondiegetic commentary on the discrepancy between the myth and the reality of the American dream of freedom from conformity. With its fenced-in perimeter, jutting smokestacks, and boxlike shape, the school bears a striking resemblance to a General Motors plant. Inside, students take their places in classrooms as the day begins with announcements and a regimented schedule of activities, including lunch. The camera remains indoors until a scene late in the movie during which a soldier home on leave talks with the gym coach. The movement from exterior to interior suggests that the film will penetrate the institution and analyze its inner workings rather than observe it from an outer perimeter.

Wiseman's hunt for the places where power is exercised in the school leads to a focus on the contrast between the values of openness, democracy, and sensitivity the school espouses and its actual operating practices, which are strikingly authoritarian. During a classroom discussion, one of the few students of color in the school praises its facilities as first-rate but denounces its pedagogy as morally and socially archaic. Thus, High School indicts the public school as a factory that strips students of individuality through an assembly-line process of ideological indoctrination under the rationale of grooming them into responsible, middle-class adults.

Style and authorship sometimes receive short shrift in direct cinema criticism because the form is perceived as a recording of profilmic reality that subordinates the filmmaker's 'vision' to an ethical obligation of relating experience as truthfully as possible. High School's stylistic choices underscore Wiseman's subjective fascination with bureaucracy's ruthless efficiency in socializing willful adolescents into docile adults. The relationship between generic form and directorial vision constitutes an additional aspect of the film's subjectivity. Acknowledging that his movies play against the clichés of Hollywood genres, Wiseman evokes the coming-of-age movie by focusing on the generational politics involved in the rite of passage from adolescence to adulthood.

This opposition forms a structural logic that alternates between the didactic 'school as factory' theme and a roughly chronological 'day in the life' approach. Wiseman skillfully explores the tension between these perceptions by using shot selection, editing, and sound to construct a series of striking dialectical contrasts within such routine activities as classes, student/teacher interactions, sports activities, and a variety show. The director frequently isolates the wagging fingers, menacingly large mouths, and droopy-eyed faces of teachers (almost exclusively) in close-ups. When shot in close-up, faces of silent students suggest passivity because they are accompanied by a voice-over of a counselor barking 'don't you talk and you just listen!' or a Spanish teacher reciting a phrase for a class that dutifully repeats it.

A lunchtime conversation in the teacher's cafeteria lapses into garbled noise under the clamor of dishes and other distractions. Wiseman's inclusion of the ambient sounds surrounding the teachers' conversation implies that their talk is so much noise, void of significance during peer discussions as it is in the classroom. A shot of a music teacher keeping the beat during a percussion lesson by repetitively conducting a group of students forcefully conveys the idea that there is no place in the public school for those who challenge the norms of this assembly-line system of education that teaches one to obey rather than question the status quo.

Lessons in sexual difference complement this exploration of the contradiction between American values of individualism and conformity incumbent in the school's force-fed ideology. During a variety show in which boys dress as buxom cheerleaders, the obviousness of the costumes reminds the students of the intractability of sexual difference and condones sexist caricatures of women as both humorous and socially acceptable. A boys' health class during which a gynecologist draws laughs by using his thrusting pointed finger as a sexual metaphor is followed by an assembly of girls being lectured about the importance of remembering that 'you can't always have what you want when you want it'. Boys learn to objectify women in physical terms while girls learn to think of themselves as passive recipients of male attention.

The final scene, which equates high school education with the military, makes painfully evident the inherent contradictions in a system that conflates learning with unquestioning conformity to a prescribed role. A female principal reads to a teacher assembly a letter from an ex-student in Vietnam about to go to the demilitarized zone. The graduate urges teachers and students not to worry because 'I am not worth it. I am only a body doing a job'. The irony in the teacher's response ('When you get a letter like this, to me it means that we are very successful at Northeast High School. I think you will agree with me') underscores the human costs of a system that conflates achievement with unthinking conformity to bureaucratic norms. According to Wiseman, a film that begins by showing a factory process of institutional indoctrination ends with a view of the perfect product (Rosenthal 1971).

Hiroshima-Nagasaki, August 1945

(US, Barnouw, 1970)

Hiroshima-Nagasaki, August 1945 is a documentary chronicle of the destruction and suffering wrought by the atomic bombings of the Japanese cities of Hiroshima and Nagasaki at the close of World War II. A black-and-white film short on running time (sixteen minutes) but long on visceral impact, it was produced by pre-eminent filmmaker, author, and media critic Erik Barnouw, who in turn carefully assembled it from hours of footage shot by a Japanese film crew within days of the bombings. The film depicts not only the devastated wasteland that used to be two thriving urban centers but also the bombing victims, including many who are showing the effects of advanced radiation sickness. As an advocate of activist documentary, producer Barnouw, who died in 2001, lived to see his own documentary acclaimed by media critics as one of the most influential anti-war statements ever committed to film.

As the producer of this understated but powerful anti-war documentary, Barnouw had already ensured his place in media history by 1970. He was born in 1908 in The Hague, Netherlands, and emigrated with his family to the United States in 1919. Educated at Princeton University and the University of Vienna, he then began a career in the media as a program director and advertising writer. By the early 1940s Barnouw advanced to writing and editorial positions with CBS and NBC. In 1943 he became an overseas commentator and worked for the US War Department and the Armed Forces Radio Service. He began accumulating the first of his many prestigious media awards when his NBC radio series Words at War garnered the George Foster Peabody Award for Achievement in Radio or Television. After World War II he became a faculty member of Columbia University in New York City, founding the department of film, radio, and television. He was a professor of dramatic arts by the time of Hiroshima-Nagasaki's release.

The documentary is a compilation of images taken primarily from footage shot by film producer Akira Iwasaki in August of 1945. Iwasaki had been imprisoned by the Japanese government during the war for his anti-war stance. At war's end, at the behest of a Japanese research council, he took a film crew with him to the ruins of Hiroshima and Nagasaki. With the permission of the American military authorities in charge of the area, Iwasaki shot three hours of silent, black-and-white footage. Then, on October 17, 1945 the American military suddenly arrested one of the cameramen and confiscated Iwasaki's film. A US Strategic Bombing Survey lieutenant named Daniel McGovern persuaded the American government to allow Iwasaki to continue filming. The finished footage was edited together into a three-hour documentary entitled The Effects of the Atomic Bombs against Hiroshima and Nagasaki. Once the film came to the United States in May of 1946, however, the American government classified the documentary and held it in secrecy for the next twenty-five years.

In 1968, in response to an official Japanese request, the United States sent a copy of the film to Japan. As recounted in his book Media Marathon, Erik Barnouw read about the film's existence and requested a screening from the Pentagon. He then obtained a copy of the film for Columbia University. In collaboration over a year with writer and editor Paul Ronder, Barnouw selected the most gripping of the images and placed them within a scripted framework that opens with images of city rubble and builds toward the revelation of the men, women, and children gruesomely but stoically dying from radiation sickness. A New York screening attracted wide attention and many colleges and libraries placed orders for the film. Television networks were reluctant to air the documentary, however, most likely because of the graphic images of bomb victims. Only National Education Television broadcast the film to high ratings in August 1970 on the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Hiroshima bombing. Some controversy centered on the question of whether the documentary in its exclusive focus on the Japanese as victims failed to provide historical context for the decision to drop the bombs. For his part, Barnouw believed (and at least one 1972 study of audience reaction to the film tended to bear out his belief) that if the film had been available for public viewing in the past twenty-five years, it would have been much more difficult for the US government to find the support and funding for nuclear weapons. Finally, producer Iwasaki was able to see at least some of his film released to the public through Barnouw's version. His response is quoted in Media Marathon: 'I was [...] deeply moved by this film [...] I was speechless.'

Barnouw's documentary, as the distilled essence of Iwasaki's footage, confronts the spectator with a brutal succession of images of destroyed buildings and human beings dying in hospitals. As Patty Zimmerman writes in States of Emergency, 'Like Night and Fog (Alain Resnais' 1955 Holocaust documentary), Hiroshima-Nagasaki emphasizes details that chart the senses, in an attempt to reposition the dropping of the bomb from the ground'. The graphic nature of the images is foreshadowed in the film's opening title card, which reads: 'The Scenes of Hiroshima and Nagasaki which you are about to see were withheld from the public for more than 20 years'. The title credits are superimposed over brief images of idyllic, pre-bombing Hiroshima. The film's narrator (Paul Ronder) ironically notes that from overhead, the bombing crew about to destroy Hiroshima could see flowers in the gardens below. Archival footage of the American bombing mission (including a glimpse of the iconic mushroom cloud rising over the city) quickly gives way to various images of the destruction from the ground, recorded by Iwasaki's crew. The narrator lists a series of grim statistics about the bomb: it weighed nine thousand pounds, its explosive force was equivalent to twelve and a half thousand tons of TNT, it created a fireball eighteen thousand feet across with a center temperature as hot as the sun, and it generated a cloud of smoke forty thousand feet high and black raindrops the size of marbles. Then, against a series of panoramic vistas of the devastated cityscape, a female survivor in voice-over describes losing her friend in the smoke and dark as people died all around. She says, 'I think if I knew hell, it is like this.' The film next shows the shadows of leaves, flowers, ladders, and a human being burnt by the bomb blast onto wood and stone surfaces. As the film then begins to show for the first time, the human victims transported to hospitals, the narrator observes that there was no panic in Hiroshima that day and in the days that followed, only silence—including an official silence that prevented the citizens from learning the true nature of the weapon that had destroyed their city.

The film moves on to the destruction of Nagasaki three days later, in which fifty thousand people initially died. The narrator's voice catalogues what the camera silently records: statues at a cathedral burned black six hundred yards from the bomb's epicenter, a destroyed Mitsubishi factory at which six thousand two hundred men were killed or injured nine hundred yards from the epicenter, a collapsed medical center six hundred yards from the epicenter, and burnt trolley cars and a field of human skeletons six hundred and fifty yards from the epicenter. The film's climactic focus on the human body tortured by atomic radiation begins with images of kimono patterns burnt onto women's backs. Within twelve to fourteen days after the bombings, burns and other wounds that had begun to heal opened back up, and people otherwise unaffected began to vomit, bleed from the gums, and slough off portions of their skin. These 'special victims of the atomic bomb', in the narrator's words, are shown one by one. The narrator observes that vegetation was paradoxically hyperstimulated by this same radiation: 'As people died of radiation sickness, the cities were blanketed with flowers'. This section of the film concludes with two unforgettable images: a living child's face partially eaten to the skull and jawbone by radiation, and a woman's staring dead eye exposed as her lids are pulled back by forceps. The film ends with stock footage of atomic explosions and the famous quote from Robert Oppenheimer (one of the bomb's creators) in voice-over: 'I am become death, the destroyer of worlds.' The narrator leaves the viewer with the unsettling fact that single nuclear weapons are being tested that are as powerful as two thousand five hundred of the first atomic bomb, a single blast equivalent to thirty-one million tons of TNT.

After the release of Hiroshima-Nagasaki, the versatile Barnouw continued to work in various media and write numerous classic works in the field of communications studies. In his capacity as critic and curator, he earned the praise and recognition of filmmakers and academics around the world. His documentary about the effects of the atomic bombings became a fixture in film classrooms, seminars, and conferences around the world. He died at the age of ninety-three in July 2001. His legacy, in addition to his written scholarship, is a film that briefly but eloquently reminds the world of exactly what horror befell the citizens of Hiroshima and Nagasaki that August in 1945.

Honigmann, Heddy

Heddy Honigmann gained Dutch nationality in 1978 and lives in Amsterdam. Her internationality is reflected in her cinematic work. Her status as an inhabitant of different countries seems to enable her to connect with people of different traditions, cultures, and life circumstances. In most of her work, Honigmann emphasizes the common emotional responses of people in varied situations and locations, be they poor inhabitants of Brazilian suburbs (O Amor Natural), Bosnian women whose sons and husbands were killed in war (Good Husband, Dear Son), or soldiers facing the horrors and difficulties of military life (Crazy). In most of her films, the audience hears Honigmann's voice asking questions off camera or sees the filmed subject addressing her by name and talking to her in an intimate matter.

In Metal and Melancholy (1993), her first internationally acclaimed film, Honigmann returned to her birthplace of Lima twenty years after she left. The film depicts a society marked by a disappearing middle class, in which people struggle to live on meager wages. Metal and Melancholy is shot mostly from the inside of taxi cabs, and focuses on the taxi drivers of Lima.

In O Amor Natural (1996) Honigmann continues her examination of everyday life in Latin America. The film's foundation is the erotic poetry of Carlos Drummond de Andrade (1902–87). Starting from his work, the filmmaker challenges people to open up and comment on human sexuality, love, and erotic fantasy. The film is humorous, but also bold in its depiction of sensual—but also macho—Brazilian culture.

Honigmann's recent documentaries are about migration and global exchange. The Underground Orchestra (1997) is about the flow of refugees and economic migrants to the West. By conquering the tunnels of the Paris Métro, musicians (mostly highly educated) seek shelter from the political and economical misery of their homelands of Mali, Yugoslavia, Algeria, and Romania.

In Crazy (1999) Honigmann depicts Westerners working in developing nations ravaged by war. This memorable documentary allows, for example, the Dutch Blue Helmet soldiers to express their hidden fears and frustration. Honigmann addresses the topic of violence, but the violence itself is not shown in the film; however, its impact is still conveyed by the soldiers. During long conversations Honigmann succeeds in drawing out the deeply felt emotions each soldier has contained within himself.

Although Honigmann often uses the interview format, she moves beyond the traditional limitations of this approach and establishes a real and open conversation with her subjects. She manages to create a personal, deep bond with her film subjects. Honigmann's editing technique sets a calm rhythm that emphasizes the focus on the inner lives of the subjects. By keeping the camera on an individual's face, Honigmann reveals the inner emotional state. For example, in Good Husband, Dear Son (2001), she depicts wives and mothers who have survived the massacre in central Bosnia. In this moving documentary on war, the enemy is almost not mentioned. No archive material or news footage of war events are shown, but the horror of what happened is nevertheless painfully present. The agony of loss is especially vivid when wives speak about their sensual and sexual experiences with their husbands who have died in the war.

Honigmann's movies address human tragedy while avoiding pathos. She communicates via ordinary human conversations and records the subtle changes on people's faces as they speak. Her films display an almost ethnographic precision in their portrayal of people of specific traditions and cultures.

Honigmann has directed two fictional feature films. Her work has been screened worldwide, and she has had several retrospectives at film festivals. She recently started to work as a producer at the company Appel & Honigmann, which she runs with Dutch filmmaker John Appel.

Hoop Dreams

(US, James, 1994)

Hoop Dreams follows two aspiring African American basketball players, Arthur Agee and William Gates, from their 'discovery' on the playground and then their next four years of high school, as they set upon the statistically improbable venture of using a career in professional basketball as a way to transport themselves and their families out of their low-income world in Chicago's inner city. What was first planned in 1986 as a thirty-minute documentary on the 'street basketball' culture of urban playgrounds became a multi-year epic as the filmmakers met fourteen-year-old Agee and Gates, both then in the eighth grade and recruited by a private suburban high school (Saint Joseph High School). Six days of shooting became one hundred and sixty, and then it required several years of editing to shape the two hundred and fifty hours of footage. The commercial release and consequent media flurry of Hoop Dreams came at a moment where categories of 'fiction' and 'documentary' filmmaking were encountering particular scrutiny in mainstream media culture, as films like Schindler's List and Forrest Gump exploited the shrewd blending of real and fictional on their way to critical and commercial successes. Hoop Dreams, snubbed by the Academy during the nomination process, may have garnered even more publicity because of its omission from the Best Film and Best Documentary categories. It enjoyed a healthy life as a commercial product, grossing close to $8 million in ticket sales and generating spin-offs (such as novelizations, music recordings, and a 'fictional sequel' in the form of Spike Lee's He Got Game) typical of a new Hollywood blockbuster.

The film has a complicated generic status: it invokes the expectations of both cinéma vérité documentary and melodramatic sports movies such as Hoosiers. William and Arthur's pursuit of their NBA dream provided a compelling narrative for the filmmakers, full of surprises and reversals. Arthur does not develop as quickly as William as a basketball player, and midway through his sophomore year of high school, Saint Joseph High School drops him from their team, revokes his scholarship, and refuses to release his transcript until his tuition debts are repaid. He transfers to the public Marshall High School in Chicago and gradually regains his self-confidence. William, on the other hand, enjoys early successes in his young athletic career. Some saw him as the next Isiah Thomas, who was earlier 'produced' by the same Saint Thomas program, but he finds his trajectory toward professional basketball stymied by a serious knee injury. By their senior years, William has signed an early letter of intent to receive a scholarship and play basketball at Marquette University, but his high school team loses early in the postseason tournaments. Arthur's team enjoys a surprising and deep run toward the state title. The dialectical editing, the continual crosscutting between William and Arthur, accounts for many of the film's judgments. While William spends the summer before his senior year playing at prestigious all-star camps (where one scout grins at what he calls the 'fresh meat'), enjoying pizza at night in his dorm room, Arthur occupies his summer earning minimum wage at a pizza shop. Most jarring may be the contrast between the Agee family's darkened apartment, after electricity bills have gone unpaid, and William's MRI procedure, which required considerable electricity and money provided by athletic boosters. Except for a rare handful of moments where a filmmaker will ask a question off camera, the filmmakers chose to assume a fly-on-the-wall perspective on the lives of William and Arthur. The novelization of the film goes one step further and tells their story while completely writing out the fact that for nearly five years these two African Americans were followed around the housing projects by a white camera crew. Later interviews and presentations by the filmmakers contained tantalizing revelations about these interactions, such as the filmmakers' decision to aid the Agees with their own money when they discovered that the family's electricity had been discontinued.

The film has been criticized for participating in the same culture of commodified marginality that it purportedly exposes. For instance, to what extent is nonphysical education presented as a viable method of escape from the ghetto? Sheila Agee's successes in a nurse's aid program are offered up, and her graduation scene marks one of the emotional highpoints of the film, but both Arthur and William struggle in the classroom, and Arthur's decision to attend Mineral Junior College seems to represent a change more in the size, not the nature, of his marginalization (at Mineral he lives with six of the seven black students at the entire college in an isolated house set apart from the rest of the campus). However, while William may have figured out that he is being treated well by coaches and schools simply for the entertainment value of his body (at the end of the film he explains that 'playing' basketball has become more like a job than a game for him), the filmmakers seem hesitant to cast too harsh an eye toward the NBA and the wildly improbable carrot it dangles. Indeed, the film seems to suggest that William's disillusionment with the dream of playing professional basketball represents a kind of failure next to Arthur's continuing belief in the lottery system of the NBA. Some writers argue that the film undermines any attempted critique of the basketball/entertainment industry by valorizing Arthur's successes and particularly by profiting from a voyeurist glimpse into a lower-income world. (Some of the financial profit from the film was eventually disbursed to William, Arthur, and even the high schools, the latter after a lawsuit from Saint Joseph.) Still, coming from a country where politicians sometimes ridicule welfare recipients as 'lazy' and 'entitled', Hoop Dreams allowed the rare opportunity for someone like Sheila Agee to respond, as she does directly to the camera after Arthur's eighteenth birthday and the automatic revocation of a hundred dollars from her family's monthly budget, even though he was still in school: 'Do you all wonder sometime "how am I livin'?" or "how do my children survive", or "how they living?" It's enough to make people really wanna go out there and just lash out and hurt somebody.'

Hospital

(US, Wiseman, 1970)

Hospital, the fourth film by American filmmaker Frederick Wiseman, takes as its subject the emergency room of New York City's Metropolitan Hospital. The film shows a constant stream of patients suffering from a variety of physical and emotional ailments crowding into the emergency room (ER), and the hospital staff trying desperately to deal with them.

Wiseman does exploratory surgery on his subject, and the malignancies he finds in the hospital's ER are seen as symptomatic of more general social ills. The remark by the doctor giving a lecture on musculature to a group of interns, that 'Man is not born with disease. He acquires these disorders when he tries to adapt to a certain level of civilization,' addresses the film's concern with viewing Metropolitan Hospital as a social microcosm.

Wiseman has said that he is interested in revealing the gaps between an institution's mandate and how it works in practice. The biggest gap revealed in Hospital, however, is not between the ideology of the institution and its practice, but rather between the rich and poor. Hospital was filmed in a large, overburdened public health facility located near Harlem and Spanish Harlem. Many of the patients seen in the film suffer from drug-related problems, injuries received in fights, or from family or social neglect, problems of course not restricted to a particular class, but certainly more prevalent among the economically underprivileged.

Economic issues are therefore inevitably foregrounded in the film, as these patients are obtaining medical service at Metropolitan not by choice but because of economic necessity.

Towards the beginning of Hospital, Dr Schwartz telephones another hospital that had authorized the transfer of a patient, to complain about the sloppiness of the procedure. The patient seems to have been regarded as so much baggage, a situation that is apparently all too common. With stoic resignation, Dr Schwartz says, 'This is the sort of thing that we see all the time, and whenever it happens, I make it a habit of calling the administrator and voicing my complaint.' Near the end of the film, similarly, an ambulance driver and a policeman discuss the case of a woman just brought into the hospital. The driver had searched for several hours without success for a hospital to admit her. He says repeatedly that 'It don't make sense', but the policeman diagnoses the problem as an economic one: 'I guess that's what happens when you don't have no money at all. You have to take what comes.' These two sequences bracket most of the medical procedures in the film, lending them all a sense of economic determinism.

Perhaps the film's most visually striking instance of this theme is the sequence of the psychiatrist's interview with the young, gay, black man. Throughout the interview the man is seated against a wall, on which hangs above him a picture of then mayor of New York, the dapper John V. Lindsay. The gay man and the image of Lindsay within the film's image offer a striking contrast: one is black, the other white; one is poor, 'freakish', and disempowered, unable to obtain welfare assistance and rejected even by his mother; the other is wealthy, glamorous, and politically influential. The stark contrast between them is amplified by the fact that the gay man's body, arm, and head are arranged in a manner almost identical to Lindsay's pose in the photograph. The patient can never attain the cultural ideal literally hanging over his head in this scene, because of his skin colour, economic status, and sexual orientation.

The film extends its social criticism to the viewer as well, particularly in the conclusion, one of the most powerful moments in all of Wiseman's work. This last sequence shows patients praying in the hospital's chapel, followed by a cut to a long shot of the hospital taken from a nearby highway. The hospital seems to recede with the slow reverse zoom of the camera, while cars travelling on the highway enter the frame in the foreground, zipping by. The voices of the patients singing a hymn in the chapel can still be heard, but they gradually diminish in volume and are replaced by the rush of the automobiles driving past the camera. In the peripatetic rush of daily experience, the film suggests, we tend to forget spiritual values, just as when we are healthy we prefer not to think about illness. The end of Hospital reminds us of our common social responsibility: that no matter how busy we may be, we remain responsible for the health and welfare of the body politic.

From Hospital's very first image—a high-angle shot of an anaesthetized patient—Wiseman seeks to wake up his viewers to the dire social problems evident at Metropolitan Hospital. In one scene a psychiatrist tries desperately to get welfare assistance for a psychologically disturbed patient, only to get the run-around on the telephone from an aloof administrator at the welfare office named, appropriately, Miss Hightower. In exasperation the psychiatrist seemingly appeals to the camera (actually he speaks to a resident in the room with him, but kept entirely out of frame and thus invisible to the viewer), a moment that directly connects the viewer to the film.

Hospital is a clear example of what Bill Nichols has called Wiseman's 'tactlessness', for some viewers might well find such scenes as the one of the young man who had taken mescaline and vomits profusely to be deliberate violations of 'good taste'. Yet, despite the many unpleasant sights in the film, Hospital generally avoids a sensationalistic approach. Most important, the film does not condemn the staff of Metropolitan Hospital by showing them brutalizing patients or being indifferent to their plights.

Hôtel des Invalides

(France, Franju, 1951)

The third of Georges Franju's documentaries, Hôtel des Invalides, is at once an apparently conventional guided tour of the French Musée de l'Armée and the most implacable of horror films. Indeed, for Franju the horror lies coiled within conventionality itself. Like the surgeon-antihero of his later (fictional) feature Eyes Without a Face, the filmmaker uses his own instruments to peel back the surface of the visible and expose the gruesome, painfully vulnerable reality that conventions of visibility exist to mask. In the case of Hôtel des Invalides, the conventions of the guided tour, drawing the viewer's or visitor's attention to a carefully selected set of venerated objects—Napoleon's tomb, the armour of Louis XIV, and the like—are strictly maintained even as they are undermined by Franju's almost surgical deployment of lighting, framing, camera movement, editing, and sound to construct an anti-militarist way of responding to such objects. By juxtaposing, at certain key moments of the film, the two functions of the Hôtel des Invalides, army museum and veterans' hospital, Franju ensures that 'every object in the museum becomes an emblem of pain, mutilation, or cruelty' (Wood 1973). All the same, he is under no illusions as to the efficacy of his representations. Just as the museum visitors within the film fail (with perhaps one exception) to see what's right in front of their eyes, so, Franju seems to imply, the film's viewers may fail to make the connection between this visual spectacle or entertainment and the self-destructive veneration of warfare and aggression that still prevails in our own culture.

The film's structure is simple. Hôtel des Invalides begins with a prologue (read by the actor Michel Simon, best known at the time as the anarchist-tramp of Renoir's Boudu Saved from Drowning) locating the Hôtel among the monuments of Paris and narrating its history. The prologue continues, but abruptly changes tone: 'Legend has its heroes; war has its victims', Simon recites, as the camera pans from a low-angle view of a statue of Napoleon to a long shot of a wounded veteran being pushed along in a wheelchair, followed by a close-up of his stricken, paralyzed face. The commentary informs us that the Hôtel houses not only these human wrecks but the army museum, and we see a series of shots of cannon, one of which, oddly, is being laughed at by two young lovers (a similar couple appeared in the prologue of Franju's Le Sang des bêtes/Blood of the Beasts, and these two will reappear, equally incongruously, at two later moments in Hôtel des Invalides). Their laughter provokes the prologue's final voice-over: 'Some of these engines of war may, by their strange appearance, amuse the visitor; but when one considers the dangerous growth of an industry that is pushing up like a poisonous mushroom'—here Franju wipes from a close-up of the woman laughing to a newsreel shot of a mushroom cloud—'one must recognize that there's really nothing to laugh about' (Franju 1964). Another wipe shifts us to an interior, a closed door: the door opens, and the tour of the museum, the main body of the film, begins. The voice-over from this point consists almost entirely of the actual commentary of two museum guides, both wounded veterans of World War I.

According to Franju, the idea for the film came to him accidentally, in the office of Henri Claudel, director of the film branch of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. When Claudel asked if he had an idea for a short film, Franju looked out the window, saw the dome of the Hôtel, and said, 'That!' As Franju later reflected, 'I didn't know the Hôtel des Invalides and it's probable I'd never have thought of making a film about it if, at the moment Claudel asked his question, I hadn't seen it framed in his window' (Brumagne 1977: 26). This story, which Franju told many times, may seem suspect, but the film's opening image is an iris shot of the dome, and certainly one of Franju's concerns is the contrast between the Hôtel's status as monument—an instantly recognizable, tourist attraction and attractive part of the Parisian skyline—and the realities of war it memorializes. The fortuitous framing of the Hôtel's dome may have given Franju his subject, but only insofar as this resonated with already-rooted moral and political convictions. 'I told [Claudel] I wanted to make a pacifist film' (Leblanc 1992: 81), Franju recalled; as he later elaborated, the film laid bare 'my horror of war, the pathetic and senseless beauty of its ruins, its tattered remnants, its weapons, the wounds of its victims. It laid bare, above all, the terrible evidence of death without meaning' (Brumagne 1977: 26–7).

For Franju, such evidence, some five years after the end of World War II, was everywhere; however, in his films, from Hôtel des Invalides through such later features as Thomas the Imposter and Judex, his primary historical point of reference is the 1914–18 war. The casualties we encounter—the veteran in his wheelchair, the two museum guides, the broken-down, shattered congregation in the hospital chapel—all came out of that conflict, and the climax of the museum tour is the '14–18 Room', where, weirdly, the detritus of war is transformed into a cinematic device. A young woman, the same whose earlier laughter either ignited or was annihilated by the atom bomb, picks up a trench periscope, and after looking at her own image in one of its mirrors, readjusts it so that we now see, as if framed by the periscope, jerky newsreel footage of trench warfare. Over shots of explosions and 'soldiers running like cockroaches', statistical titles are superimposed: 'French war casualties, 1914–18. Wounded: 3,594,889. Disappeared: 314,000. Dead: 1,071,000 ...' (Franju 1964). For Franju, this war, the scale of violence of which was unprecedented, defined the modern world. It is telling that the two artistic movements the influence on Franju's work of which is most apparent—German expressionism, traceable in the dreamlike slow tracking shots and heightened contrasts of shadow and light of his cinematographer, Marcel Fradetal; and surrealism, with its strategies of disorientation and juxtaposition underlying the periscope/newsreel and other sequences—both emerged in the wake of that war as responses to the breakdown of cultural confidence it signaled. In the eerily peaceful confines of the army museum Franju's disruptive and paradoxically anti-realist documentary cinema, in the shape of a trench periscope, can make the terrible reality of war visible; however, within the film neither the young lovers nor any of the other visitors ever see this reality, any more than they ever see the crippled or shell-shocked war casualties kept isolated from the public space of the museum. With one possible exception, as I suggested earlier, a little girl in the 14–18 Room, who stops in front of a soldier's statue, is frightened, and flees. Flight, as exemplified also by the crazily wheeling doves of the film's final shot, is perhaps not a sufficient response to the horrors adumbrated in Hôtel des Invalides, but it is at least an acknowledgment of them, and thus a beginning.

Hour of the Furnaces, The

(Argentina, Solanas, 1968)

The Hour of the Furnaces/La Hora de los Hornos was one of the most influential 1960s films, a three- (or four-) part documentary about the politics and history of Argentina, Latin America, and the 'Third World' in general. Its major parts are: (1) 'Violence and Liberation: Notes on Neocolonialism', itself broken down into thirteen sections (ninety-five minutes); and (2) 'Act for the Revolution', subdivided into 'A Chronicle of Peronism' (twenty minutes), concerned with the 1945–55 period of Juan Perón's period in power, and 'The Resistance' (one hundred minutes), an account of the period from 1955 to the time of the film's making (1966–68). The broader final section, 'Violence and Liberation' (forty-five minutes) includes interviews and letters and looks at liberation struggles more generally, including those in Africa.

Much in part two (such as interviews with Peronist activists) is particular to Argentina and of less interest to non-Argentine and non-Latin American audiences. Part one, more concerned with general issues of underdevelopment, has been most widely seen and is the main focus here. If the film's analysis of Argentine history is unashamedly Peronist in orientation, this seems to be less a matter of political ideology than of practical politics; Peronism is seen as offering Argentina the best practical chance of social and political change.

As Getino later recognised, Hour of the Furnaces makes proper sense only in the context of its time, when real change in the world order seemed not only possible but imminent (with African states achieving independence, the United States struggling in Vietnam and, vitally for this film, the Cuban revolution in 1959), and when cinema seemed in the vanguard of change, with a transformative role. Emblematically, the film is dedicated to Ernesto Che Guevara, the Argentine-born, Cuban revolutionary leader who also fought for independence in the Congo and died fighting with revolutionaries in Bolivia. In Cuba documentary film became a privileged revolutionary form, and Cuban filmmakers looked to earlier examples of revolutionary film practice, not least the Soviet filmmakers, to adopt and adapt. In some respects, The Hour of the Furnaces borrows ideas from Cuban work, notably that of Santiago Alvarez.

It is difficult to consider The Hour of the Furnaces without also considering the influential manifesto, Towards a Third Cinema, published by Solanas and Getino shortly after the film's appearance—a sort of theorisation and justification for the form(s) the film takes, and a very useful framework for thinking about it. Much of the film was made either in secret or under the guise of a different kind of film, and both the making and the initial screenings of the film fulfilled one of the objectives of the manifesto, functioning as a pretext for bringing disparate progressive forces together. It was, as 'Towards a Third Cinema' puts it, a time of 'hypothesis, rather than of thesis, a time of works in process—unfinished, unordered, violent works made with the camera in one hand and a rock in the other'.

The film's title is taken from the cooking fires seen by the first explorers of the continent, taken up in the 1960s as an anti-imperialist war cry by Guevara: 'Now is the hour of the furnaces: let them see nothing but the light of the flames.' This idea, linking the European 'discovery' of Latin America with contemporary struggles, strongly informs the film's prologue, which combines black screen with often violent and/or confusing flares or flashes of action and captions from anti-colonialist thinkers and fighters such as José Martí and Frantz Fanon—'Colonised man frees himself through violence'—while a drum-beat, rhythmic soundtrack increases in volume. This is in some ways a very didactic opening, but at the same time one trying to find the images, words, and sounds appropriate for representing the need for revolutionary change.

Having risen to a crescendo, the film calmly proceeds into the first section, 'History', which is an account—via voice-over commentary and both historical and contemporary images—of the neocolonialist relationships between Europe/North America and Argentina/Latin America. Here, as elsewhere, as in the prologue, The Hour of the Furnaces is primarily a film of montage, both within sections and as a whole, a montage requiring spectators to make connections. Pauline Kael found the contrast between the voice-over historical commentary and the contemporary images of the leisured classes playing golf 'risible', but this is simply the dynamic, complex juxtaposition of history and its consequences in the present. Section two, 'The Country', adopts a very different radical strategy. While the camera tracks through landscapes and zooms in on isolated inhabitants, a voice-over reads out statistics, including a long list of the European countries that would all fit into Argentina, a 'making strange' designed to shake up the perceptions of both Argentine and European spectators.

There are many other examples of striking juxtapositions: images of factory workers accompanied by the sounds of sirens and 'gun-fire' that turns out to be the (distorted) sound of clocking-in machines (Section three: 'Daily Violence’); images of police rounding-up demonstrators while an elite voice-over speaks of ethics and cultural values (Section five: ‘The Oligarchy’); images of a national military parade while a voice-over speaks of the difficulty, unlike the Vietnamese, of recognising an enemy ‘disguised as an Argentine’ (Section six: ‘The System’).

Two final examples within the same section demonstrate the radically experimental range of the film. Section nine: ‘Dependence’ begins with a high three hundred and sixty-degree pan around the city, which, as Brecht said of a photograph of the Krupp works, tells us nothing, accompanied by voice-over information about US, British, and Spanish control of the economy. This is followed by perhaps the most conventional, yet powerful, example of montage in the film: images of cattle and sheep being slaughtered in an abattoir juxtaposed with US-style advertising for a modern, ‘cool’ lifestyle—soft drinks, cars, and ‘cool’ music. The debt to the final images of Eisenstein’s Strike—the slaughter of the workers cut against cattle being slaughtered—is clear, but all the more telling here, for an economy so dependent on the export of meat products and other raw materials to finance a bourgeois lifestyle—for a few, at least.

Though primarily a montage film, other sequences depend on quite different documentary strategies. Section eight, ‘Neo-racism’, for example, exploits the intrusive potential of cinéma vérité-type camera work to give a sense of the abused and embattled situation of the Indians. Most striking of all, perhaps, is the official photograph of Che Guevara’s face in death, which concludes part one. Guevara was killed while the film was being made. Audaciously, the filmmakers hold this still image on screen for more than three minutes, during which time the spectator’s response and relationship to it undergoes several changes. Though we know it is an image of Guevara in death, a death mask that was circulated as evidence of his death, the image seems to take on life, become alive, as the accompanying drumbeat from the prologue increases in volume. We are reminded that if the film’s confusing, fragmented prologue were searching for an image for revolution, then its end has found it in this image of Guevara in death/life.

Housing Problems

(UK, Anstey, Elton, 1935)

In the mid-1930s the British gas industry was persuaded to sponsor socially purposive projects like Housing Problems, even though gas supply is only briefly mentioned when designs for new housing are represented in the film’s second section. The primary focus of this film, directed by British documentary movement filmmakers Edgar Anstey and Arthur Elton, is the issue of slums and slum clearance. Given the equipment available then, shooting and particularly location sound recording posed considerable difficulties for the filmmakers (Sussex 1975). They rose to the challenge, and Housing Problems achieves its impact through an austerity of means: utilitarian rather than elegant cinematography and editing, and an absence of music. Clear and direct in its address to the viewer, the film nevertheless has quite a sophisticated rhetorical structure.

Housing Problems' historical significance is considerable. Its identification and discussion of a social problem and its victims can be seen as a precursor to the investigative documentary that later became a staple of television production (Winston 1995; Corner 1996). In its time Housing Problems combined social extensiveness with innovative application of film technique. Its inclusion of direct-to-camera testimony from slum dwellers can be seen as a distant ancestor of public access television and video diary formats. Responses to the film now encompass continuing recognition of the immediacy of these personal testimonies and a critical stance towards the social reformist discourse informing its rhetorical structure.

The film's basic structure defines a problem and points toward a solution. Its first section is a visual record of dilapidated exteriors and four domestic spaces in which slum dwellers deliver their testimonies. The second section shows model designs for new housing. The absence of working-class voices in this section demarcates the solution as entirely a matter for design and planning experts. The third section is a visual record of some of these new exteriors and includes positive testimony from tenants located within two of the new interiors. Closing images remind viewers of current conditions in some slums. Speech in the film operates on three levels: a briskly authoritative, southern, English, white male middle-class voice-over narration that introduces and helps to structure the film; a subsidiary voice-over from Councillor Lauder, Chairman of Stepney Housing Committee, which provides more specific detail about slums and slum clearance; and the testimonies of slum dwellers.

The speech of the slum dwellers is best described as testimony rather than interview, because it resembles public speaking addressed directly to the viewer rather than responses to an interviewer's questions. For several of the speakers the novelty of this situation manifests itself in a certain awkwardness of delivery; however, this can be seen as underwriting the integrity of their speech insofar as it suggests relatively minimal coaching by the filmmakers (Corner 1996).

The testimonies supply a compellingly subjective dimension but the anonymous voice-over introducing the film, regulating transitions between shots and sequences, and defining the problem in its most general terms, provides an authoritative position from which to comprehend the social issues that Housing Problems raises (Higson 1986). Councillor Lauder's voice-over provides more localised expertise that mediates between these subjective and apparently objective dimensions.

The interplay of different levels of speech enables Housing Problems to elaborate a multi-layered yet tightly integrated argument: that is, that slums are a temporary rather than endemic problem, which can be solved only by enlightened local authorities planning and building new housing. Issues such as land ownership, the relationship between capital and labour, the culpability of slum landlords, and the option of tenants' action groups do not form part of Housing Problems' agenda. The logic of the film's argument requires slum dwellers to be defined primarily as victims of conditions beyond their control or resistance, compliant with local authority plans, and deserving of the efforts made on their behalf (Winston 1995). The testimonies selected for inclusion in the first section are largely confined to statements about the immediate environment: overcrowding, unhygienic living conditions, and lack or dilapidation of basic amenities. The authoritative and expert voice-overs outline the preferred solution to this and also provide reassurance that the new housing will be kept clean and orderly by the rehabilitated slum dwellers.

To a certain extent representations of slum dwellers in Housing Problems relate to a tradition originated by Victorian middle-class social explorers venturing into degraded environments and using data recorded there to make a case for improved conditions for the deserving poor (Harvey 1986). The only hint of an alternative, more confrontational socialist perspective is provided by Mr Burner, whose testimony is strategically placed at the end of the first section just before the preferred solution is outlined. His more assertive self-description is as a 'working-class man' and he challenges Stepney Council to 'liven their ideas up'.

The rich vernacular of the testimonies in Housing Problems bears traces of other ways of understanding and responding to the experiences described (Cowie 2001). Overwhelmingly, however, the testimonies are deftly integrated into the central thrust of the film's reformist argument. The affective power of slum dwellers' speech is reasserted and recuperated at the end of the film in a sound montage of their comments about present conditions. The final words spoken over the end credits are of an unidentified female slum dweller's voice, strategically placed there to elicit an implicitly middle-class outsider's sympathy. Describing the fact that some children go to school infested with vermin, she states: 'it's no fault of ours, but still, they don't always look at that, do they?'

Recent discussions of voice-over narration have emphasised how, in many cases, it can be a complex and shifting rather than reductive or didactic mode of address (Bruzzi 2000). Although it assumes a certain authority over them, the anonymous voice-over in Housing Problems introduces slum dwellers as 'Mr' or 'Mrs', people potentially able to attain middle-class respectability. The film replicates the dominant 'regenerative' perspective of 1930s literature on the slums. This writing emphasised how the health and progress of the nation depended on the elimination of 'abnormal' environments so that even former slum dwellers could perpetuate middle-class ideals of 'normal' family life (Crothall 1999).

Housing Problems endorses this perspective by recording images of women and children susceptible to degeneration or rescued from this threat. A significant number of the film's exterior shots record children playing in the street. That four of the six slum dwellers who give testimony are women and four of the five voices in the closing sound montage are female must in part be due to Ruby Grierson's contribution to selecting and preparing people for inclusion in the film (Cowie 2001). At the same time, this selection also fits neatly within the 'regenerative' discourse. The danger that slums pose to domestic respectability in the first section, contrasted with its attainment in the final section, is highlighted through wide shots of women, associating them with interiors. For example in the final section, Mrs Reddington sits in wide shot in her living room praising her new flat. At the end of the first section, Mrs Burner stands holding a young child, while Mr Burner comments on how hard slum conditions are for his wife in particular.

Hughes, John

John Hughes has directed and written documentaries on a broad range of subjects. From 1998 to 2001 he was commissioning editor, Documentary, for Australia's Special Broadcasting Service (SBS) commissioning agency. His films are 'committed' political studies in the ethics of representation both at the level of governance and of textual practice. During the 1980s he made a number of 'sponsored' short documentaries in the context of the trade union movement, and Moments Like These (1989), which examines race relations between Aboriginal and nonindigenous Australians through the representation of aboriginality in Australian cinema. His independent filmmaking continues his exploration into ways in which power is manipulated in society; using a wide array of filmic and narrative devices, his films consistently confront their audiences with an abiding awareness that a film's content is inextricably concerned with filmic form.

Hughes's work is concerned with 'the production of meaning and of knowledge [...] the problematic nature of the text audience relation [...] the fluidity of the boundaries between fiction and nonfiction' (Hughes 1993: 48). These concerns manifest through a Brechtian sense of performance that combines several textual modes: music, song, symbolic image, the polemic force of direct address to audience and various other devices of distanciation. The two most arresting of these devices are: (1) his interweaving of 'fictional' narrative drama with 'nonfictional' footage of social actors and historical events; and (2) the use of 'found' footage. Hughes's use of 'found' footage extends beyond the conventional documentary technique of well-sutured compilation. It confronts an audience with several, often conflicting, representations of a particular social issue. For example, in After Mabo (1997), Hughes uses footage from the fiction film Bitter Springs (Ralph Smart, 1950). His quotation of conversations between a 'frontier' pastoralist (Chips Rafferty) and a policeman (Michael Pate) describes two opposing but passionately held positions on Aboriginal land rights (or dispossession) from the nineteenth century, positions that Hughes's documentary shows as continuing to be locked in unresolved conflict. The early 'fiction' film not only resonates with contemporary politics, it vibrates with illuminating relevance. It simultaneously calls into question the notion that 'history' only speaks to the 'past' and the place of fictional drama in documentary practice.

The idea that history also speaks to the future is explicitly taken up in All That is Solid (1988), as people are asked to speculate on the future through free association with a number of small objects from the 'present' and 'past': a bullet, an angel snow dome, a globe, and a plastic wedding cake decoration. Hughes's films do not 'blur' fiction and nonfiction; they offer a narrative montage that aligns both forms within a single documentary text. They progress through polyphonic montage, Sergei Eisenstein's idea of 'a simultaneous advance of a multiple series of lines', which, although compositionally independent of each other, contribute to the overall composition of a sequence. Hughes's combining of fictional drama with observational footage performs a sense of immediacy, of copresence between viewer and events depicted, which brings to mind Jane Gaines's note that 'the "creative treatment of actuality" describes fiction as well as nonfiction film' (Gaines 1999: 84) and her understanding of 'political mimesis' in documentary film: a film is 'radical' when it 'derives its power (magically) from the political events that it depicts' (Gaines 1999: 95). In this sense, Hughes's films are radical.

In Traps (1985), the fictional story thread is overwhelmed by footage of political events and the musings of senior journalists and politicians about their role in representing such events to the general public. All That is Solid whimsically locates feminism, the anti-nuclear debate, consumerism and religious fundamentalism via dramatic vignettes and an array of socially prominent 'talking heads' whose testimony is embedded within a politicised matrix of Karl Marx's philosophy and the lyric contradictions of David Byrnes's song 'In the Future'. Film Work (1981) archives political documentary filmmaking sponsored by the Australian Waterside Workers' Federation (1953–8). One Way Street draws its radical (Benjaminian) 'aura' from the persecution of Jews in Nazi Europe during and before World War II. After Mabo presents an unequivocal documentation of Australia's dramatic debates about Native Title during the years 1992–97. In River of Dreams, Hughes writes and directs a powerful polemic that argues against the damming of the Fitzroy River in northwestern Australia for the purposes of cotton farming. These last two films are cross-cultural in the sense that they argue from a subjective position of aboriginality. They evoke an Aboriginal perspective whilst including testimony (often conflicting, sometimes contradictory) from both indigenous and non-indigenous people. The Bakhtinian concept of dialogical communication well describes the ways in which Hughes's work textually interrogates multiple 'speaking positions'. The political coherence that nevertheless pervades all his films both indicates his own political and ethical position that all textual practice produces the overall performance of a particular point of view, even when a film's overall textual address is one of inquiry.

The many 'voices' that are represented in his four later films, however, certainly offer a complex range of meanings, and they open out his texts into sites for speculation and further inquiry. His format of split screen, masking, freeze frame, and visual (and audio) overlay in After Mabo and River of Dreams strongly suggest interactive websites. Hughes acknowledges that his frozen frames could 'work as "action images" providing access to a kind of annotation beyond the frame' (personal communication, May 22, 2002). These two films perform complex layers of information across a constantly moving narrative stream. The inclusion in After Mabo of news broadcasts and segmented reportage of meetings between frustrated indigenous committees and beguiling politicians rather suggest 'more information to come' rather than a closed, completed view of the world. This sense of speculation and excessive information can also be sourced to Hughes's explicit fascination with the work of Walter Benjamin, whose own poetic, speculative writings in the 1930s on the rising prominence of visual over written forms of communication have strongly influenced many contemporary theories of representational practice. Benjamin's words first appear in Film Work and they become the central focus of One Way Street (1992). This film is a documentary study in and tribute to the jouissance of Benjamin's texts; it performs Benjamin's vividness of thought and his generous, simultaneously optimistic and pessimistic, commentary on the turbulent time and place in which he lived. All of Hughes's films locate broad debates and complex philosophies at the level of individuals who are striving to understand their own participation in historical events. His localisation of complex social issues transforms historical situations from disempowering stories to accessible sites for understanding. Hughes's filmmaking does not offer an observational or expository 'window on the world'. His eclectic use of documentary and dramatic filmmaking modes, however, does provide access to many 'windows' for reflection and further inquiry.

Biography

Born in Coburg, Melbourne, Australia in 1948. Left school early and worked in a wide variety of casual labouring jobs culminating with work as cinecamera operator in the 1970s for the Australian Broadcasting Association. During this period worked as a media activist, developing public 'video access' sites. While working out of the Trades Hall in Melbourne during the mid-1980s, made films for Australian trade unions, established a Trade Union Video Unit and made a number of experimental works for art gallery installations. Completed his MA in Critical Theory and Cultural Studies at Monash University in 1992 and lectured in Film Theory, Documentary and Television Studies for the Visual Arts Department at Monash University 1990–3. In 1996 first narrative drama, What I Have Written, was released in Competition in Berlin. Consultancies include feature film and documentary script assessment for the Australian Film Commission and script consultancy with the Australian Screen Directors' Association (ASDA) 1996–8. In 1998 was a board member of ASDA, and 1998–2001 commissioning editor, Documentary SBS Independent (television).

Human, Too Human

(France, Malle, 1972)

About the manufacturing and selling of automobiles, Human, Too Human/Humain, Trop humain is organized in thirds, with seamless transitions among them. The first third deals with the overall process of manufacture. The second focuses on promotion and selling at a large auto show. The third, back at the factory, concentrates on the workers and the nature of the work they do. So, most of the time is spent in the factory observing the making of automobiles.

The machines, materials, and processes are curiously handsome. The workers are attractive, sophisticated-looking for the most part, and predominantly young. We see them through their machines; they seem dominated by them. However, then they also appear to be beautifully in control of their tools and materials, athletic and energetic. They have the ability to make splendid things, strong, complicated things. They engage in a kind of ensemble performance; the camera becomes part of the choreography.

This film does not permit one to compute the pros and cons of its attitude about this work and these workers into an inarguable sum. Are we seeing exploited laborers in an inhumane economy that destroys them physically through mindless repetition of a single mechanical task? Or are we seeing members of a new race who somehow have learned to soar above routine and repetition of their tasks to make them into a graceful and soothing ballet of a sort?

The reality offered is being mediated, to be sure. The images are selectively chosen and strikingly composed. The artistry of the hand-held cinematography is exceptional. The light, the color, and the fluid grace are lovely; the sensitivity in response to the workers' motions goes beyond mere skill. There is lots of camera movement (with constant alteration of frame and focus) including a number of long tracking shots.

The sound is all source sound and recorded synchronously with the image, it seems, even when it need not have been. There is no commentary; the only words we hear are bits of conversation at the auto show, mostly between company representatives and potential customers. In the factory we hear no conversation and see very little of it taking place.

When presented in this way, actuality becomes strangely opaque and unrevealing or ambiguous. The effect may not stem from an ambivalence on Malle's part; his approach is seemingly one of openness, of unemotional response to what he is observing. However, whereas most Anglo-American documentarians attempt to answer the question of what a film is about so clearly and emphatically that the question will never be raised, Malle presents audiences with seemingly insurmountable difficulties in arriving at the essential meaning of Human, Too Human. In this respect, it is rather more like the 'difficult' fiction films of Malle's New Wave contemporaries like Jean-Luc Godard or Jacques Rivette. In spite of its apparent 'reality', Human, Too Human is ultimately sensuous and abstract.

Hunters, The

(US, Marshall, 1957)

An early classic in ethnographic film, The Hunters is the first of a number of films made by John Marshall among the !Kung Ju/'hoansi in the Kalahari desert of southern Africa. At the time Marshall began filming, in 1952, the !Kung were one of the few surviving peoples who lived largely, if not entirely, as nomadic hunter-gatherers. Marshall's subsequent work, in particular the film !Nai: The Story of A !Kung Woman (1980), follows the !Kung through the transition from hunting and gathering, through agriculture, to their problematic incorporation into the capitalist economies of modern-day South Africa, Namibia, and Botswana. In addition to The Hunters and !Nai, Marshall has made more than twenty shorter films about the !Kung, many exemplifying an editing technique he and fellow ethnographic filmmaker Timothy Asch developed called 'sequence filmmaking'. These were short, single-event films designed for teaching key anthropological concepts such as a 'joking relationship' or 'reciprocity'. In 2002 Marshall completed a five-part, six-hour documentary series, A Kalahari Family, which includes footage shot over 1951–94, and follows the drastic changes in the lives of the !Kung over the second half of the twentieth century. In addition to his filmmaking, Marshall and Claire Ritchie have been advocates for the !Kung, setting up a private development agency called the Ju/wa (Bushman) Development Foundation.

Marshall's longstanding relationship with the !Kung began with a series of family expeditions. The first one was undertaken with his father, Laurence, who had made a fortune during World War II as a founder of Raytheon Corporation, developing radar and other defense technologies. In 1949 the two set off 'to find the Lost City of The Kalahari'. Before departing, they consulted the director of the Harvard Peabody Museum who advised them "to look for "Wild Bushmen"" (John Marshall 1993: 136), conceived, in what by now are anachronistic evolutionist terms, as a 'window onto the Pleistocene'. They reached the eastern edge of Nyae Nyae and met two Ju/'hoansi who lived by hunting and gathering. All were sufficiently impressed with each other that they made arrangements for the entire Marshall family, as well as a number of scientists, to return in 1951.

Filmmaking was just one of a number of ethnographic projects on the !Kung undertaken by the Marshall family over the following years. Although none of them had had formal training in anthropology, their work is regarded as important in the field. Lorna, John's mother, conducted extensive ethnography on kinship, writing The !Kung of Nyae Nyae in 1976. John's sister Elizabeth, who would later become an accomplished nonfiction writer, also undertook written ethnography, publishing the classic The Harmless People in 1959. John himself took thousands of photographs, and learned how to film motion pictures. Laurence asked John to provide a film record of !Kung technology and equipped him with Kodachrome film, a wind-up Bell and Howell 16mm camera, and the 1929 edition of Notes and Queries in Anthropology by way of a script. As John has written, 'For two years my shooting in Nyae Nyae was stiff and distant, like old snapshots. I followed the rules in the Eastman Kodak How to make a Movie guide with which the company encouraged aspiring filmmakers in those days. The instructions said: "First take an establishing shot; then a middle shot; then a close up"". Marshall admits that the results of this were somewhat stilted, saying, 'it is often hard to see people's expression in the miles of hardy Kodachrome. Major events are covered with a middle shot or missed. It is almost impossible to meet anyone as a person in the early record of Nyae Nyae' (Marshall 1993: 35). After many reels dispassionately depicting !Kung technology, however, John had what filmmaker-critic David MacDougall has described as a 'kind of epiphany'. While John was filming a man making a carrying net, a !Kung woman he knew took off for the bush (to relieve herself, he assumed). Instead, she gave birth to a baby, and returned with it. From this point on, John's interest turned away from technology to informal moments of interaction, and a concern to depict their subjective, emotional lives.

The structure of The Hunters follows the classic narrative of a hero's journey, a fight for survival against 'Nature'. Food is scarce and they have been without meat for a month. Women, and babies especially, will suffer. Four valiant !Kung men, Ao, Toma, Qui, and Xao—dubbed by film critic Bill Nichols the Headman, the Beautiful, the Shaman, and the Clown, for their allegorical identities—embark on foot on a long and arduous giraffe hunt, armed only with spears, bows, and arrows. The climax of the film occurs when after days of skillful tracking, they confront their prey. The giraffe looms over the men as they battle to take her. Finally she falls. The men then return to their families, as heroes, having gotten enough food to sustain them for quite some time. The giraffe is cut up and distributed carefully among the !Kung. The story of this hunt is recounted and passes into legend, both for the !Kung and for viewers of the film.

The film is striking because of its sincere efforts, just before the invention of portable synchronous sound, to evoke the subjectivity and humanity of its Fourth World subjects. !Kung men are depicted equally as highly skilled hunters and devoted fathers, tenderly kissing their babies goodbye as they set off to find food. While many ethnographic films of that era presented their subjects as an anonymous, primitive mass, Marshall took great pains to depict the !Kung as individuals, with at least somewhat nuanced and culturally inflected subjectivities. To this end, Marshall used a third-person voice-over narration that has since been criticized for its godly omniscience. The narration not only recounted the characters' sentiments, but even anthropomorphically imputed thoughts to the giraffe, with such lines as 'She no longer had her predicament clearly in mind.'

More important, the film's ethnography has also been criticized because it foregrounded (male) hunting rather than (largely female) gathering. At the time the !Kung subsisted much more on gathering than on hunting and were not as short of food as the film implies. In addition, the realism of the film has also been called into question, as Marshall now freely admits that what the film presents as a single hunt is actually a synthetic compilation of shots from numerous hunts. Marshall himself has remarked, 'The reality of what I was seeing while the men were hunting was far less important to me than the way in which I was shooting and interpreting the reality to reflect my own perceptions [...] If I had used the rules of filming I use today, The Hunters would have appeared as a slowly expanding series of events rather than a narrow story' (Marshall 1993: 36). However, at an angle to this directorial mea culpa, filmmaker-critic David MacDougall has contended that: 'The film is notable for presenting itself implicitly as a cinematic version of a San hunter's tale, of a sort that might well be repeated and poetically embroidered around a campfire. In this respect, its form and semi-fictionalized construction, although later dismissed by Marshall as a Western overlay, may not necessarily be greatly at odds with San narrative practice' (MacDougall 1998: 108).

Hurley, Frank

In the silent era of cinema Frank Hurley was one of the best-known Australian documentary filmmakers and the only Australian producer to achieve commercial and international success. Hurley ran away from home at the age of thirteen to avoid a bullying schoolteacher and became absorbed in photography. Self-taught, he travelled six times to the Antarctic where he documented the expeditions of the Australian explorer, Sir Douglas Mawson (Home of the Blizzard, 1913, and Siege of the South, 1931), and the British explorer, Sir Ernest Shackleton (In the Grip of the Polar Ice, 1917, and Endurance, 1933). Hurley described this period as the 'Homeric age of Antarctic exploration'. He travelled to Australia's remote north to produce Into the Unknown in 1914, and was an official photographer with the Australian armed forces in both World Wars. In 1919 he filmed the exploits of pioneer aviator Ross Smith (The Ross Smith Flights, 1920) and in the 1920s, eschewing the deep polar chill, focused on tropical British New Guinea in the successful travelogue Pearls and Savages 1921 (screened in America as The Lost Tribe and expanded in 1923 as With the Headhunters in Papua). 'Hurley's arrival with movie cameras and two sea-planes and his brilliantly shot footage make Pearls and Savages memorable[... T]he film was widely seen in the United States and Britain (Baxter 1970: 34). Pearls and Savages was also praised at home for maximizing audiences by appealing to both educationally middle-brow and working-class people, as dramatic spectacle (Tulloch 1982: 33).

Later Hurley combined documentary footage with fiction to produce two commercially successful feature films: The Hound of the Deep (1926), shot on Thursday Island, and The Jungle Woman (1926), filmed in what was Dutch New Guinea. In Australia in the 1930s the best-recognized documentaries were those of Frank Hurley. 'Several, like Fire Guardian (1931) and Treasures of Katoomba (1936) give intriguing glimpses into the period's parochialism' (Shirley and Adams 1983: 129). Hurley's output for most of the decade consisted largely of travelogues (Jewel of the Pacific, Oasis, Here is Paradise) and industrials (Pageant of Power, Brown Coal to Briquettes) (ibid.). Also in the 1930s, Hurley shot feature films for the Australian production company Cinesound, and was a documentary maker for the British Ministry of Information.

Hurley was 'a visual perfectionist' (Bertrand 1989: 72) and an artist. He said in 1910 at the age of twenty-five, 'Your camera is only a piece of apparatus. To copy nature, as seen in the viewfinder, has nothing to do with pictorial art' (Snow, Sand and Savages). Hurley was always a showman. In making his feature film Jungle Woman, Hurley stressed dramatic realism. His actress Grace Severi 'had to be actually bitten by a snake' (Tulloch 1981: 289). During World War I, Hurley was strongly attacked by C.E.W. Bean, the respected official Australian war historian, who described Hurley's composite photographs of battle action, with their superimposed 'transcendental' or 'divine' clouds and sunbeams breaking through, not as 'truer images' but as 'fakes', but Hurley remained convinced that representation should also capture the feeling of the action, even if artistry had to be applied. Perhaps the consensual view is that Hurley's 'composite pictures fail as realist representations; they mean little to soldiers who were at the Front' (Legg and Hurley 1966: 12).

Tulloch observes that 'Hurley's early documentaries [...] were, for all their "factual" quality, direct descendants of popular melodrama as it had developed from the nineteenth century stage to the twentieth century picture show', characterized by a highly romantic, eventful adventure in tension with a pictorial

'realism' of setting (Tulloch 1981: 288). In Southward Ho! With Mawson, documenting Mawson's 1929–30 expedition to the Antarctic, Hurley added sounds to the images to increase the 'realism' of the story. For a fight between sea lions, with flocks of watching penguins, Hurley rang bells rendering it like a prize fight (Bertrand 1989: 157).

However, Hurley's Antarctic achievements as a hardy explorer stand apart from his successful Antarctic documentary films and photographs. In 1911, on his first expedition, Mawson sent Hurley and two others on a six-hundred-mile dash to locate the South Magnetic Pole. During a ferocious blizzard, Mawson lost two companions to exposure and later described Hurley's surviving party as 'supermen'. Hurley filmed in blizzards in appalling conditions. Blown off his feet by the subzero wind, he built a wind break of ice for outdoor filming. The resulting Hurley film, Home of the Blizzard, did well financially in London. A film rights offer of £20,000, on condition that Hurley did the filming, helped to finance the next polar expedition with Shackleton. On this trip their ship, the Endurance, was crushed in the pack ice and Hurley shot its destruction in minus seventy degrees, lighting the scene with flares. The subsequent survival of Shackleton's party is a famous epic of exploration and resulted in Hurley's epic film, In the Grip of the Polar Ice.

Hurley's work exemplified the spirit of high modernism of the British Empire. He was 'certainly in the David Livingstone and Richard Burton school of adventure' (Thomas 1990: 15). In his 1938 documentary, A Nation is Built, Hurley described Australia as 'the natural setting for the new Anglo-Saxon Empire under the Southern Cross', and 'a white settlement [with a] national destiny provided by God' (Thomas 1990: 17). Pearls and Savages is 'boys' own adventure stuff [...] composed in adventurous, bombastic style' (Thomas 1990: 14). Thomas sees Hurley's films as a showman's adventure serial where he constructed himself commercially as an adventurous explorer within the heroic convention popular in 'Australia and the West' (Thomas 1990: 7). In his films 'there are no people coming close to the filmmaker [...] and, in a sense, codirecting the film' (Thomas 1990: 15). Hurley 'wanted glory and he wanted to make money' (Thomas 1990: 15). Hurley's trips to Antarctica were made possible by a combination of imperial rivalry, scientific interest, and the huge popularity and profitability of Antarctic photography (Thomas 1990: 7). While Thomas's judgements are perhaps overly severe, Hurley's style did go 'out of fashion in his own lifetime' (Snow, Sand and Savages). In the 1930s Hurley's images, with their hard, flat lighting, became outmoded when Hollywood moved to composing detailed psychological characterizations through varying light and shade, the mode of representation of bourgeois art, especially based on the Rembrandtian code of painting (Tulloch 1982: 156).

However, 'Hurley is important because, in a sense, he delivered some of the most beautiful pictures of our early years [...] He really had an eye for composition [...] His work deserves to be seen; it's artistic—he is salvaged only for that reason' (Calvert 1997: 13–15).

Huston, John

In April 1942 John Huston left Hollywood to volunteer for military service in World War II, accepting a commission as a lieutenant in the US Signal Corps. He was one of many to do so, including such heralded directors as Frank Capra, John Ford, and William Wyler. The shift to nonfiction had an impact on these craftsmen, especially Huston, who joined the army at a formative moment in his career. Though he had a decade of experience as a screenwriter, he had only just completed production in September 1941, on The Maltese Falcon, his first film as a director.

In the Signal Corps Huston completed three documentaries. Report from the Aleutians (1943, forty-seven minutes) chronicled the building of a base in the northern Pacific and an air attack against the Japanese; The Battle of San Pietro (shot in fall–winter 1943–4, released in 1945, thirty minutes) portrayed the assault on a town in the Italian campaign; and Let There Be Light (1946, release delayed until 1980, fifty-nine minutes) observed the rehabilitation of mentally disabled veterans. In addition, Huston worked on another production, Tunisian Victory (1943), which was under the general supervision of Frank Capra. As John McCarty and David Desser have pointed out, the three Huston films fall into a trilogy focusing on the preparation for combat, combat itself, and the consequences of combat.

The reputation of Huston's documentaries rests on The Battle of San Pietro. Report from the Aleutians has been dismissed as competent but conventional war propaganda. Let There Be Light was withheld from public exhibition for thirty-four years by the military, so its impact was limited. The Battle of San Pietro was touted on release in May 1945 as a remarkable film, most conspicuously by James Agee. Over the years it has continued to garner attention and praise.

No war documentary, Agee declared, has been so attentive to the grim cost of battle in terms of the men who were actually fighting and the people and place caught in the line of fire. Gary Edgerton called San Pietro 'unique in that the winning is constantly underplayed while the suffering and sacrifice is accorded tantamount attention'. The narration, spoken by Huston himself, begins with shaded irony as he introduces the Liri Valley; his camera presents fields pockmarked with shell holes, orchards torn by rifle fire, and a Renaissance church destroyed by bombs. Once the assault begins, the voice-over assumes a dispassionate tone as we see the stalled infantry assaults, thwarted flanking maneuvers, and tanks destroyed by enemy fire. 'Volunteer patrols made desperate attempts to reach enemy positions and reduce strong points,' the narrator intones. 'Not a single member of any such patrol ever came back alive.' The footage recorded by Huston's camera crews rings with authenticity. The soldiers pinned down in an olive grove under fire, or the infantry lounging after the battle portray episodes distinct from the drive toward victory, but invests the film with conviction. Finally, after a week of fighting, Allied troops dislodge the enemy from a key defense position, and the Germans withdraw. One regiment alone required more than one thousand one hundred replacements, Huston reports, as the graves are dug. In spite of the carnage, the film testifies to the courage, discipline, and self-sacrifice of the soldiers without hyperbole. Heroism appears ordinary and widespread. A generous humanity arises in counterpoint to the destruction. The expression of dignity, respect, and affection extends to the Italian civilians returning to their village after the fighting. The shots of women, children, and the old emerging from hiding after their homes have been destroyed invest this film with an abiding compassion for all people victimized by war. Agee describes the wordless images of children as 'the first great passage of war poetry that has got on the screen'. At the same time, the film never retreats from the necessity of the campaign, even as it acknowledges that the cost is dear.

Let There Be Light portrays a unit of mentally traumatized troops moving from arrival at a military hospital through diagnosis and therapy toward rehabilitation. Huston's camera watches soldiers struggling to describe their mental anguish and undergoing various therapies, including hypnosis and drug treatments. Compassion arises from the simple observation of suffering. At times the transformations—one soldier regains his ability to speak, another overcomes paralysis—are astonishing. Though the valorization of the military doctors smacks of propaganda, the portraits of agony and hope are genuinely moving. Huston's strength as a documentarian lies in understatement, to trust his camera and allow the extraordinary sights of battle or psychic turmoil to make themselves known. (This requires the resources necessary to be patient; Let There Be Light is reported to have had a shooting ratio of 72:1.) Huston's war documentaries are characterized by attention to the humanity of the common soldier. In Let There Be Light he finds fortitude and determination even in men broken by the trauma of combat.

The relationship between Huston's films and the military was troubled. Commanding officers walked out of the initial screening of San Pietro and blocked its release. The combat was too harrowing and the movie was described as 'anti-war'. Eventually the controversy attracted the attention of General of the Army George Marshall, who requested a screening. He applauded the picture as an excellent means of training soldiers for combat, but asked, and gained Huston's consent, to cut a number of the most disturbing sequences. With that, praise followed and Huston was promoted to major. The filmmaker wasn't as lucky with Let There Be Light. The Army refused to allow the film to be released, and even blocked a screening personally arranged by Huston at the Museum of Modern Art in New York. Public exhibition was delayed until 1980.

Back at Warner Brothers in 1947 John Huston insisted that The Treasure of the Sierra Madre be shot on location in Mexico. There he made what many believe to be his most successful film. After his military service, Huston was eager to work outside the studio and no doubt incorporated into his work other aspects of human fortitude and suffering that he had encountered during the war.

LEGER GRINDON

Biography

Born August 5, 1906. Son of actor Walter Huston and Rhea Gore, a journalist. First stage appearance at three years of age. Little formal education. Had a distinguished record as an amateur welterweight boxer (1921–3) and served briefly in the Mexican cavalry (1926). Worked as a journalist, playwright, and short-story writer before rising as a Hollywood screenwriter during the 1930s, most notably at Warner Brothers where his credits included Jezebel (1938), Juarez (1939), and High Sierra (1941). The Maltese Falcon (1941) was his first film as a director. Served in US Signal Corps 1942–5, where he directed three documentaries, was promoted to Major, and was awarded the Legion of Merit. Formed Committee for the First Amendment in 1947 to counteract the House on UnAmerican Activities Committee investigations. Academy Award for Best Director and Best Screenplay for The Treasure of the Sierra Madre (1948). Moved to Ireland in 1952, to Mexico in 1972, but remained active in Hollywood. Other noteworthy productions include The Asphalt Jungle (1950), The African Queen (1951), The Man Who Would Be King (1975) and Prizzi's Honor (1985). Father of Anjelica Huston. American Film Institute Life Achievement Award (1983) among many others. Died August 28, 1987 in Middletown, Rhode Island.

I Do Not Know What It Is I Am Like

(US, Viola, 1986)

Since the early 1970s, Bill Viola (born in the United States in 1951) has been a pioneering figure in the development of video as a medium within fine art practice. In both his installation and tape-based work he has readily engaged with innovations in media technology to explore themes of sensory perception and the body as the locus of consciousness and spiritual discovery.

I Do Not Know What It Is I Am Like is one of Viola's most ambitious and significant tape-based works. Created for the Contemporary Art Television Fund, with support from a number of other agencies, it was broadcast in 1987 by WGBH Boston as part of their 'New Television' season. It was made from footage gathered over a period of several years, during part of which Viola was artist in residence at San Diego Zoo. During this time he also visited and recorded religious festivals in Fiji and spent many weeks following a herd of bison in Wind Cave National Park, South Dakota. The title is taken from the Sanskrit text Rig Veda, which reflects Viola's long-term interest in Eastern religions. The work is a highly personal meditation on the cycles of life and death, animal consciousness and the human condition, with humanity being considered as bound to the natural world, yet also striving to understand and transcend this reality through art, technology, and spiritual quest.

I Do Not Know What It Is I Am Like is structured thematically in five chapters: 'Il corpo scuro (The Dark Body)', 'The Language of the Birds', 'The Night of the Senses', 'Stunned by the Drum', and 'The Living Flame'. It commences with the camera sliding slowly beneath the surface of a mountain lake, suggesting the submersed body and drowning imagery, which is a familiar visual theme in Viola's work. This sense of slippage into another realm is compounded as the camera explores the underground world of a cave system, followed by a series of close-ups of a flyblown animal carcass and a sequence of long, mainly static, shots of a bison herd in a wilderness landscape. The second chapter, 'The Language of the Birds', comprises a series of close-up shots of the eyes of a variety of captive birds, the section closing with an emblematic image of the artist reflected in the eye of an owl. This self-reflexive imagery is developed in the following chapter, 'Night of the Senses'. In a play of reflections and direct shots, Viola is seen working at a desk at night where he studies various books, views footage of birds on a video monitor, and eats an elaborately arranged meal.

The work shifts in form throughout the chapters. The long durational shots and naturalistic sound of the early chapters convey both a strong sense of time unfolding in the present as well as the timelessness of natural cycles. This meditative pace is violently disrupted in 'Stunned by the Drum'. Here, a rapid-fire succession of images of news footage, natural disasters, urban scenes, landscapes, and reprises of previous imagery is cut to a thumping drumbeat, and culminates in a pulsing black and white screen. There is a further shift in the final chapter, 'The Living Flame', which documents a Hindu religious festival where devotees mortify their flesh with skewers and walk on hot coals. This dramatic visualization of the transcendent power of ritual and spirituality is enhanced by the use of slow-motion images and ceremonial music. Viola's willingness to use a range of techniques and effects to develop his themes is further demonstrated by the time-lapse sequence that concludes I Do Not Know What It Is I Am Like. Here, a dead fish is shown being slowly devoured by animals and decaying away until no trace remains.

Situating I Do Not Know What It Is I Am Like as a documentary practice raises a number of interesting questions. Meaning is generated through a highly evolved personal lexicon of symbols and the observation, or organization, of events which in themselves have a strong metaphorical resonance. In this way, the work perhaps evokes comparisons with earlier generations of 'poetic' documentarists, such as Joris Ivens and Jean Vigo. The numerous reflexive strategies seen here, which highlight the functioning of the medium and the subjectivity of the artist as a central organizing element, also indicate the evolution of Viola's work from the overtly conceptual approach of US experimental filmmakers of the 1960s, such as Stan Brakhage.

In documentary terms, bereft of an obvious expository strategy or organizing narrative device (such as voice-over or personal testimony), the work is open to criticism as obscurantist. If a large percentage of the footage is more clearly documentary in nature, much is also meticulously constructed. Viola's work here is a useful illustration of the collapsing distinctions between seemingly discrete areas of cultural practice. As artists increasingly use electronic media and make use of the same distribution and exhibition systems, there is perhaps an inevitable merging, or at least overlaying, of traditions, understandings, and methods between individuals working within the differing institutional practices of fine art, television, and cinema. In many ways this work can be seen as prescient of recent shifts in documentary practice, which now appears much more open to the use of fictional construction as part of its constituent elements.

Viola has stated his desire for audiences to engage with his work in a total bodily or sensory manner and this is perhaps served less well by this tape-based work. Images and techniques, which may be affecting in the more determined environment of a gallery installation, or site-specific work, may prove less so when viewed on a television monitor. However, I Do Not Know What It Is I Am Like is a significant piece of work that demonstrates Viola's ability to engage convincingly with a wide range of audiovisual technologies and forms. Through images of great beauty and mystery, Viola creates here a highly challenging, provocative, and often moving meditation on the fundamentals of existence.

Iceland/Greenland

Alone at the top of the world, both Iceland and Greenland have shared a common history as Danish colonies and are the common parent for their national cinemas: the Danish film industry. Danish filmmaker Peter Elfelt represented Greenland first in his short, Kørsel med grønlandske hunde/Trip with Greenlandic Dogs (1897), in which the island's most populous inhabitants, a pack of sled dogs, drove a sled around a Copenhagen park. Nine years later another Dane, Alfred Lind, brought his camera to the North and shot the earliest known motion picture footage of Iceland. Although P. Petersen projected his own amateur movies in his Reykjavík cinema, it took almost twenty years for the first Icelandic feature-length film to be made, the documentary Ísland ilifandi myndum/Iceland in Moving Pictures (dir. Loftur Guðmundsson, 1925). Greenlanders, however, remained mostly in front of the camera as subjects for foreign anthropologists until the 1990s. With no access to filmmaking equipment or training, they seldom had any say in their cinematic representation.

The ethnographic 'Eskimo film', a genre popular with Europeans that depicted how these exotic Northern people lived, began with the three-part Grønland 1914, a collection of research and photographs obtained by the Copenhagen linguistics professor William Thalbitzer. Robert Flaherty's documentary on the Hudson Bay Inuit, Nanook of the North (1922), soon became the cornerstone of these ethnographic films, although critics pointed out that Flaherty had staged traditional Inuit rituals of hunting, sealing, and fishing. A 1934 docudrama, The Wedding of Palo (1934, dir. Friedrich Dalshiem), produced by the famed half-Danish, half-Greenlandic explorer Knud Rasmussen, was a rare exception to the other Eskimo films in that he allowed the Inuit to make most of the creative decisions. Rasmussen had nonprofessional Greenlandic actors improvise a scenario based on one of their classic oral stories about rivals for the same girl.

In the 1930s and 1940s a steady diet of American and Scandinavian films prompted more Icelanders to experiment with the medium. Óskar Gíslason, considered the father of modern Icelandic film, began his career shooting events like the establishment of the Icelandic Republic in 1944. For his acclaimed documentary Björgunarafrékið við Látrabjag/The Great Látrabjag Sea-Rescue (1948), he scaled the treacherous Látrabjag cliffs with his 16mm Bolex to capture the fishermen and farmers who saved the lives of shipwrecked British sailors. He combined dramatic and documentary scenes in Iceland's first sync-sound feature, Nýtt hlutverk hlutverk/New Role (1954), which looked at the lonely life of a retired harbor worker.

The Danish government prohibited most filmmakers and journalists from traveling to Greenland up until the 1940s, fearing a public outcry at its perceived treatment of the Inuit. Instead, newsreels of the Arctic expeditions of Robert Peary, Eigil Knuth, and other explorers sated audiences' interest in Greenland. Films became the main method of publicizing and verifying expeditions to the extent that 16mm cameramen accompanied explorers. In Med Leo Hansen på Østgrønland/With Leo Hansen in Greenland (1935), cartographer and producer Lauge Koch compiled the footage that cinematographer Leo Hansen shot on his travels across the polar north with Knud Rasmussen and Peter Freuchen. Other film crews flew over the vast mountains and glaciers to capture the impassable terrain. The 1931 British Air Route tours under H.G. Watkins filmed Greenland from above for their English-language dispatch, Northern Lights. Charles Lindbergh's flight over Greenland in 1933 provided aerial footage for Pan American Airlines.

The Danish government's fears proved accurate when it permitted journalists' entry into Greenland in 1946. Newspapers ignited a widespread debate concerning the poor living conditions and commercial exploitation of the Inuit. Nevertheless, films continued to legitimize Danish control over Greenland, particularly in a documentary about preparations of the Pearyland expedition, Vejen med Nord/The Way Towards the North (directed by Hagen Hasselbach, 1948). Hasselbach portrayed the Danish explorers as if they were heroes from the sagas, undertaking a dangerous journey in the north. Greenland itself was referred to as one of Denmark's 'possessions', while the Inuit population received only the barest mention in excavation of an ancient 'Eskimo' house. An anomaly to these expedition films was Paul Hansen's portrait of Greenlandic musician Andreas Hendriksen in Grønland i Sommer og Sol/Greenland in Summer and Sun (1942). Hagen Hasselbach used the music from Hansen's film eight years later in Grønland i sol/Greenland in the Sun (1950).

Around the same time, Ósvaldur Knudsen started to chronicle Iceland's volcanoes. His work established a genre that dominated Iceland's international releases for much of 1950s and 1960s. In 1947 Ósvaldur covered the eruption at Mount Hekla, followed Askja's activity in 1961, recorded the birth of the Surtsey volcanic island in his prizewinning Surtur fer Sunnan/Birth of an Island (1963), and returned to another Hekla eruption in 1970. His most well known documentary was a thirty-minute short he made with his son, Vilhjálmur. Eldurí Heimæy/Fire of Heimæy (1974) detailed the unforeseen 1973 eruption in the Westmann Islands, which buried a town in ash and forced an immediate evacuation. Their film and a similar short about the Heimæy disaster, Eldeyján/Days of Destruction (produced by Kvik Co., 1973), reached the height of the volcano genre's success. Both of the Heimæy shorts garnished numerous awards at film festivals in Hollywood, Poland, and Atlanta.

Barring the volcano films, Icelandic documentaries received little international attention during the 1960s. The silence concealed the stirrings of a new generation. One of Iceland's first foreign film school graduates, Þorgeir Þorgeirsson, returned to his homeland to make many shorts, among them Maður og verksmíðja/Man and Factory, and Róður/Rowing. A national training opportunity for motion picture production arose with the debut of Icelandic television in 1966. The station devoted much of its programming to noncontroversial films about Iceland's natural history, such as Magnús Jóhannsson and Magnús Magnússon's documentaries on Icelandic birdlife, although occasionally it commissioned programs of a more radical bent such as Reynir Oddsson's epic two-part docudrama about the US military in Iceland, Hernámsárin/Iceland under Occupation (1967 and 1968).

The escalation of the Cold War also informed documentaries about Greenland. The US Army Signal Corps produced the twenty-four-minute Operation Blue Jay (1952), which recorded the building of the US military base in Thule. It argued that the US presence in Greenland was necessary to protect the West and curb the influence of the Soviet Union. The film was nominated for an Academy Award in 1953, but lost in the short subject category to another film about the far north, Walt Disney's The Alaskan Eskimo. Fifty years passed before the other side of the story was told on film. Ulrik Holmstrup and Jørgen Pedersen's Hingitaq/The Outcasts (2003) showed how the Danish and US governments pressured the native Inuit to leave their home in the Thule mountains so that the US military base could be built.

Although Frank Wenzel made shorts about Greenland's natural beauty, Moskusoksen/The Musk Ox (1967) and Ved bræens rand/By the Edge of the Glacier (1969), most filmmakers in Greenland concentrated on the political controversy that saw Danish commercial interests abusing the indigent Inuit population. To soften the criticism, a governmental committee, Danish Kulturfilm, hired the husband and wife team of Bjarne and Astrid Henning-Jensen in 1955 to shoot two documentaries that would present Greenland in a more positive light. Astrid Henning-Jensen's nostalgic short, En sælfangsti Nordgrønland/A Sealing in North Greenland (1955) documented the vanishing Inuit tradition of harpoon hunting that the rifle had replaced. Her husband's featurette was much more politically overt. Hvor bjergene sejler/Where the Mountains are Sailing (1955) highlighted the benefits of Danish involvement in the life of a Greenlandic boy, Mikisoq. Doctors at a Danish-built hospital cured Mikisoq from the deadly tuberculosis epidemic that had killed his mother, while Danish authorities provided a new house for his family, and gave his father, an unemployed seal hunter, a more reliable job as a fisherman.

The optimism found in Henning-Jensen's film about Greenland's future did not last. Ten years later, Christian Kryger's breakthrough television series investigated Danish policy toward Greenlanders and caused another storm in the press. The Danish Foreign Ministry again called on filmmakers to rectify the situation. Among them was Carl Th. Dreyer's former cinematographer, Jørgen Roos, who would become one of Greenland's most prolific documentarians. Along with experimental biographical shorts of Hans Christian Andersen and Tristan Tzara, Roos had made Fiskere på Grønland/The Fishermen of Greenland (1950) and Knud, an award-winning 1965 portrait of arctic explorer Knud Rasmussen. However, his resulting film, Sisimiut (1966), which focused on the difficulties of Greenlandic family living in a subsidized Danish town, did not impress the Foreign Ministry.

Roos heeded the Ministry's requests the second time and combined old material with new in a bland, uncritical 17 minutters Grønland/17 Minutes Greenland (1967). He continued to refrain from judgment in En fangerfamilie i Thuledistriktet/A Hunting Family in the Thule District (1967), although his subsequent effort, Ultima Thule (1968), condemned the American presence that had brought tourists and had crashed an H-bomb plane in the district of Thule. In 1970 Roos dissected his hometown, Copenhagen, to look at the lives of young city-dwelling Greenlanders in Kaláliuvit?/Are You a Greenlander?, one of the first films primarily in Greenlandic. Roos made three short documentaries in 1972: To mænd i ødemarken/Two Men in the Wilderness retold the 1909 expedition to the northeast of Greenland;

Udflytterne/The Settlers looked at a group of Greenlanders who left their village and returned to hunting; and Ulrik fortæller en historie/ Ulrik Tells a Story recorded one of the last Greenlandic storytellers.

The establishment of the Icelandic Film Fund (Kvikmyndasjóður) in 1979 broke new ground in the financing and development of Icelandic cinema. Nevertheless, documentary filmmakers still found themselves in the same quandary. The Film Fund supported feature fiction films almost exclusively at the expense of the documentary. One of the few documentaries that received a grant, Mörg eru dags augu/The Day has Many Eyes (dirs Guðmundur P. Ólfasson and Óli Örn Andreassen, 1980), was a five-year photographic project that questioned why inhabitants left the once-bustling isles of Breiðafjörður. Otherwise, outside of shooting nature programs for Icelandic television, Icelandic filmmakers continued to make documentary shorts rather than full-length features because of the financial demands.

Some filmmakers turned to industry to bankroll their films, while others preferred to use loans and second mortgages to make personal, political films. The Icelandic Freezing Plants Corporation hired Sigurdur Sverrir Pálsson to shoot industrial shorts that illustrated the stages of fish processing, from catching to packaging to marketing and distribution (Fagur fiskur úr sjó/From the Ice-cold Deep, 1981, and Med kvedgau frá Íslandi/With Compliments from Iceland, 1982). Heiðar Matreinnsson stayed on board for Humarveiðar/Lobster Fishing (1978) and detailed a three-man crew trawling the waters of the Westmann islands for lobster. Jón Hernannsson and Þrándur Thoroddsen's Will There Be Salmon Tomorrow? (1982) examined salmon-catching at a government farm and in two Icelandic rivers.

German filmmaker Wim Wenders served on the jury of the first Reykjavík Film Festival in 1978, which awarded its top prize to a half-hour documentary short, Bóndi/Farmer (directed by Þorsteinn Jónsson, 1975), about a lone farmer in an isolated northern fjord who refused to abandon his traditional methods. A similar theme inspired director Friðrik Þór Friðriksson's short about an eighty-year-old blacksmith who crafted the first multigear bicycle (Eldsmiðurinn/The Blacksmith, 1981). For his film about a Danish officer's trek through the rocky center of Iceland in the nineteenth century, Águst Guðmundsson used his talents as a feature director to re-create historical scenes in his picturesque Yfir Kjöl/ Across the Interior of Iceland (1982). Jón Björgvinsson ventured out to Iceland's other great frontier, the ocean, where he filmed a modern expedition of Icelandic sailors collecting Siberian driftwood (Fast þeir sóttu rekann/From Siberia with Love, 1981).

The mid-1970s saw a surge of documentaries about Greenland, a few produced in the political battle between competing Danish sponsors, KGH (The Royal Greenland Trade Department) and SFC (Statens Filmcentral). KGH wanted to promote a better image of Greenland to the trade community, whereas SFC sought to balance their commercial agenda. Sune Lund-Sørensen's two KGH shorts, Emilie fra Sarqaq/ Emilie from Sarqaq (1972) and Havet ved Grønland/The Sea around Greenland (1972), showed young Greenlanders, a prawn peeler and a fisherman, upbeat about their future in the Greenland-Danish economy. The SFC feature-length documentary, Nálaqkersuissut oqarput tássagôq/Da myndighederne sagde stop!/The Authorities Said Stop! (1972), took the opposite angle. Directed by Arqaluq Lyngé and the Danish painter, Per Kirkeby, the provocative film denounced Danish policy in Greenland more than any previous film had. Native women voiced their complaints about the low wages and working conditions of a KGH prawn factory in Lene Aidt and Merte Borker's Arbejderkvinder i Grønland/Working Women in Greenland (1975). On the other hand, Umá naq 75 (directed by Jeppe Mendel and Jørn Kjer Nielsen, 1975) showed Greenlanders grappling with the decision of how to spend an influx of money that the new local mine had generated. An interesting footnote in this battle over Greenland's image was the Icelandair production, They Shouldn't Call Iceland, Iceland (1977), which described Greenland as a 'primitive' island and promoted Iceland as the green country of happy vacations.

Iceland's biggest splash on the international documentary scene happened in 1982 with Rokk í Reykjavík/Rock in Reykjavík, Friðrik Þór Friðriksson's gritty feature-length music collage that strung together church basement performances from nineteen Icelandic rock groups. It offered the rest of the world a peek at Icelanders who did not think of themselves as removed from global popular culture, drugs, and punk rock. A fourteen-year-old singer named Björk, and her band, Tappi Tíkarrass, stole the film's spotlight in one of her first recorded concerts. Friðrik followed up on his success with another documentary, Kúrekar norðursinns/Icelandic Cowboys (1984), which covered the first and only Icelandic country music festival held in a northern Icelandic village.

Documentaries boomed in the early millennium, particularly in Iceland. The affordability of digital video technology attracted young filmmakers and produced countless shorts and videos about Iceland's renowned music scene. Directors scavenged the Reykjavík streets to trail a petty criminal (Lalli Johns, directed by Þorfinnur Guðnason, 2001), explored the World War II barracks left by the British army (Barracks, directed by Ólafur Jóhannesson, 2001), found a new frontier in Europe Vardi Goes Europe (directed by Grímur Hákonarson, 2002), and took stock of alcoholics at the Hlemmur city bus station (Last Stop, directed by Ólafur Sveinsson, 2003). Erlendur Sveinsson turned his camera on his ailing father in Passio—A Painter's Psalm of Colors (2002) and blurred the lines between reality and creation. One documentary was even banned by the Icelandic Supreme Court. The court considered Hrónn Sveinnsdóttir's video diary of her journey in the 2000 Miss Iceland competition, I skóm drekans/In the Shoes of the Dragon (2002), a violation of the other contestants' privacy.

Greenland continued to be a spectacular stage for science documentaries such as the IMAX film, Journey into Amazing Caves (directed by Stephen Judson and Greg MacGillivray, 2001). The genre of the 'Eskimo film', however, had changed considerably since Flaherty's Nanook. Jørgen Roos and other directors of the 1960s and 1970s gave Greenlanders the chance to express their own views about themselves and their nation in their own language, and both foreign and Greenlandic filmmakers continued this approach into the 1990s. Ivar Silis's 1996 film, Greenland on its Way—Home Rule Since 1979, analyzed how semi-independence from Denmark changed and challenged the lives of ordinary Greenlanders. Silis's son, Inuk Silis Høegh, broke stereotypes about the Eskimo people in his 2002 film, Eskimo Weekend, which followed a young rock band enjoying their weekend like other Western youths.

Not all filmmakers presented a glossy view of Greenlandic life. Danish director Morten Hartkorn called attention to the problems of alcohol, suicide, and violence among the East Greenlanders in Den sidste koloni/The Last Colony (1997). Sasha Snow illustrated similar dilemmas in Arctic Crime and Punishment (2002), which many Greenlanders considered too harsh.

The turn of the millennium saw more women making documentaries about Greenlandic issues. Director Karen Littauer interviewed fourteen elderly Inuit storytellers who vividly relate a Greenland that the camera cannot capture for her film, Jeg husker ... Fortællinger fra Grønland/I Remember ... Tales from Greenland (2003). Ulla Boye Rasmussen focused on a single Inuit woman in Dage of Katrine/Days with Katrine. The first Greenlandic female director, Laila Hansen, attempted a sequel of sorts to Jørgen Roos's Are You a Greenlander? with Inuk Woman City Blues (2002), which probed the dislocation of Greenlandic women in Copenhagen.

Documentary production is poised to prosper in the twenty-first century as video becomes more accessible. Iceland has already experienced a national renaissance; perhaps the most interesting work will happen in Greenland, as the emphasis on the exotic declines in favor of an original, personal cinema produced by native artists.

Ichikawa, Kon

Although Kon Ichikawa's documentary films are minimal, compared to his nondocumentary feature film output, they nonetheless reveal visual aesthetics and thematic motifs present throughout his work. A significant contributor to the sports documentary, Ichikawa's Tokyo Orinpikku/Tokyo Olympiad (1965), Youth (1968), and his segment on the one-hundred-meter dash in the omnibus film Visions of Eight (1973) emphasize a humanist approach to this documentary form. The primary focus for Ichikawa is on the athletic event itself and the athlete's endurance of pain and suffering in order to test both the human body and spirit. Stylistically, Ichikawa's camera movements and editing contribute to the reinforcement of this humanism. Movement and the breaking up into individual shots of a particular action are predominant in this style—a reflection of his early film career as a manga cartoonist. Similarly, Ichikawa's non-sports-related documentaries, Kyoto (1969) and Japan and the Japanese (1970), follow the form of the 'city symphony' with subtle additions of the director's irony.

Ichikawa's first documentary film, Tokyo Olympiad/Kiroku chusein eiga (1965) presented a one-hundred-and-seventy-minute, formally innovative record of the 1964 Olympic Games in Tokyo. Unlike the television coverage of the event, Ichikawa's technical staff of five hundred and sixty-six, including one hundred and sixty-four cameramen, focused more on the human element of the games—most often the losers of some athletic events, as well as the spectators themselves. Their barrage of techniques, including the use of telephoto lenses (even at some points a 1600mm ultra-telephoto lens), wide-screen (Italian Techniscope), and slow-motion photography contribute to a depiction of the effects of physical toil and suffering to the human body. The film is also a paean to the new Japan—a Japan that was to experience an economic upsurge in the 1960s and 1970s. This upsurge is indicated in the opening scenes when buildings are laid waste to make way for the Olympic Games. Ichikawa's focus on the spectacle of parades and the crowds of spectators hints at Japan's own restoration as a national identity following the end of World War II. Since Japan itself lost the war, it seems clear that Ichikawa's focus on several losers of athletic events stresses the fact that there is more than simply winning. When the film does focus on an athletic victory, such as that of Abebe Bikila (1932–73), the Ethiopian marathon runner, it is masterful in its technical artistry. Ichikawa's film is a tribute to the pain and suffering that athletes endure simply from competing with one another and themselves. Following the success of Tokyo Olympiad at the Cannes Film Festival, Ichikawa became typecast as a maker of 'official' documentaries. What followed was a brief period of short documentary films, after which the director returned to narrative features and television.

Both Seishun/Youth (1968) and Vision of Eight (1973), the director's other sport-related documentaries, utilize similar approaches to the genre. Youth is concerned with the Japan High School All-Star Baseball Series. The prologue shows the empty Koshien Stadium. Ichikawa then cuts to a history of the series from its beginnings in 1914, through 1924, when Koshien Stadium was built, to 1968 when the fiftieth game in the series was played. The training of the participants is shown, as well as the local contests in which the field is narrowed to forty-eight participants, one for each prefecture and one for Okinawa. The finale of the fiftieth game concludes the short documentary. Ichikawa's slow-motion segment of the one hundred-meter dash for the film Visions of Eight, titled 'The Fastest', a feature-length documentary on the 1972 Munich Olympics, expanded on his previous treatment of the event at Tokyo Olympiad. Both utilized slow-motion photography in order to stress the physicality of the event itself and the depiction of the human form in motion. In order to slow down the ten seconds of the event to six minutes of screen time, twenty thousand feet of film was used. Ichikawa utilized thirty-five cameras to cover the ten-second race, all concentrating on different details, such as a leg or thigh movement. The color footage was shot at high speed while the black-and-white footage, representing real time, was shot at twenty-four frames per second.

Both Kyoto (1969) and Nihon to Nihonjin/Japan and the Japanese (1970) offer impressionistic views of the country and its culture. Kyoto, commissioned by the Olivetti typewriter company, is segmented into six sections, revolving around the ancient city and its customs and people. The first section of the thirty-minute documentary focuses on the rock garden of Ryoanji. Ichikawa's camera emphasizes the texture of the rocks themselves. The film also shows

Zen Buddhist priests in training, the moss garden at Saihoji, an apprentice geisha being dressed, the empty Imperial Villa Katsura, and the celebration of the Gion Festival. The conclusion of the film shows the Japanese islands in the distance with a setting sun. Japan and the Japanese, made for the Osaka '70 Exposition, similarly creates an impressionistic depiction of the land and its people.

Kon Ichikawa is often viewed as a link in the postwar 'golden age' of Japanese cinema and the emerging New Wave directors of the 1960s. In much the same way, particularly in regard to Tokyo Olympiad, Ichikawa's documentary films illustrate an attempt to show the new postwar Japan reentering the world scene as a competitor and an equal.

In the Company of Men

(UK, Dineen, 1995)

This three-part television documentary about the Prince of Wales Company within the the Welsh Guards regiment, an elite regiment of the British Army, was made for the BBC in 1995 by Molly Dineen. In the Company of Men continues Dineen's preferred method of documentary filmmaking based on a close and sustained observation of, and interaction with, her chosen subject matter that was previously demonstrated in Heart of the Angel (1989) and The Ark (1993). Dineen occupies a position behind the camera and works with a single sound recordist in accumulating a large amount of raw footage. The final three-hour cut of In the Company of Men was formed from eighty-five hours of footage and a sustained editing process.

Dineen combines expositional background to the functions of the company with observational and interactive exchanges between herself, the officers, and the guardsmen who form the exclusively male company. The regiment was formed at the height of World War I by King George V, who expressed the wish to recruit the Welsh as a part of his household troops. This colonial demarcation of power is replicated in the organization of the regiment, where it is soon apparent that most of the officers are white, middle-class English men and educated at institutions such as Harrow School and Cambridge University, and the Guardsmen are mostly working-class men from Wales. Dineen films the regiment at various locations in Northern Ireland where the company guards a police station and patrols farmlands on the border. Dineen summarises the role of the regiment as one where 'twenty five years in Northern Ireland has taught the British Army to fight a war in which it was supposed not to take sides'. While questions of Empire, colonialism, and the reasons for the British military presence in Northern Ireland are implied by the documentary, it is also clear that these wider political and historical questions will not determine the argument of the documentary. Dineen's documentaries are constructed out of the relationship that she forms with her subjects and, in the case of In the Company of Men, over the course of the eighteen-month period spent with the regiment. The first two parts of the documentary—The Commander and The Novice—reveal the roles of Major Crispin Black and the less experienced Second Lieutenant Bruce MacInnes, who has recently completed his officer training at Sandhurst. Their differing responses to Dineen's presence and to her questioning not only reveal how Dineen's scrutinizing proximity to her subjects generates familiarity and informality but also how the presence of the camera affects the behaviour of men whose working lives involve a degree of public display. The assurance and measured candour of Black is contrasted with the naivety, inexperience, and hesitation of MacInnes and the alienation of some of the Guardsmen. Because Dineen does not conceal the nature of the interaction between the filmmaker and the subject, her documentaries have been located within the performative mode (Nichols 1994; Bruzzi 2000). The degree of performativity in In the Company of Men is mitigated by the strong elements of observation and interaction as well as the expository factor of Dineen and her sound recordists' presence as women making a documentary within the operational military context of Northern Ireland.

The implications for the spectator of Dineen's documentaries is that there is less a sense of a rhetoric of telling and argument than a process of revealing the nature of the interaction between the filmmaker and her subjects and its implications. The imbalance between the unseen presence of Dineen and the voice of her questions and the responses and answers of her subjects draws attention to the apparatus of inaction and observation and the level of trust that has to be acquired for this mode of documentary. Through the combination of interaction and observation, Dineen occupies—in her own particular style—a mediating space between the public perception of an institution such as the Welsh Guards and the much less public beliefs, hopes, and personalities of the individual role players that form that institution and the values and rituals that define the company and its functions. The role of the British Army in Northern Ireland does not form part of Dineen's questioning but it nevertheless implicitly emerges from the documentary along with the hierarchy of social class within the structure of the regiment. As a result of privileging interaction and observation, Dineen is open to the accusation of vindicating a masculine institution and masculine behaviour (Bruzzi 2000). In this way, In the Company of Men is symptomatic of that trend in British television documentary in the late 1990s that problematizes the value of the knowledge that the documentary form is traditionally assumed to disseminate (Corner 1999; Dovey 2000). However, in contrast to the serial production of the docusoaps, Dineen's documentaries are single productions and are also legitimized by the discourse of authorship.

In In the Company of Men continues Dineen's propensity for investigating and interacting with masculine subjectivities as well as confirming her inclination to confound any assumption that she will assume a preexisting political stance in relation to her subject matter. This concentration on the combination of the personal and the public continues to inform Dineen's documentaries while simultaneously exercising the tenets of documentary criticism.

In the Year of the Pig

(US, de Antonio, 1969)

Emile de Antonio established the genre of collage or compilation documentary, developing it specifically as a form of historical reconstruction and politically charged historiographic inquiry. Following Point of Order (1963)—a documentary comprising footage from the Army-McCarthy hearings that was rejected from the New York Film Festival because it was 'not a film'—and Rush to Judgement (1966), In the

Year of the Pig was de Antonio's third compilation film, and the point at which he refined the form. In this intricately wrought film, de Antonio combines lengthy interviews with experts together with archival materials and stock footage. Despite the fact that he is neither seen nor heard in the film, his perspective on the history of Vietnam and its struggle for independence, and his belief in the heroism of Ho Chi Minh and the culpability of the United States and its leaders is made clear. On its release in the United States, it was well received, although many critics called the film propaganda. This was a term that de Antonio accepted as praise rather than censure, observing that 'you cannot edit film without indicating prejudice' (Rosenthal 1980).

Despite de Antonio's views as an admirer of Ho Chi Minh being made clear in the film, In the Year of the Pig is not polemical in the same manner as many other protest films made during the Vietnam War. Instead, it appears by contrast coolly analytical in achieving its political and aesthetic objectives, making an appeal to the intellect of the audience. Notable for the depth and breadth of its coverage of Vietnamese history, it offered what no film or television coverage of the war had offered previously. While contemporary historians would undoubtedly contest aspects of de Antonio's scholarship, it remains today as one of the most thorough critical accounts of the background and historical context of the conflict put on screen.

In the Year of the Pig, like many other de Antonio films, was funded by various wealthy, high-profile liberals in the United States, and along with Point of Order and Painters Painting (1973), it was one of de Antonio's commercial successes. Much of the footage used in In the Year of the Pig had never been seen before by US audiences, as de Antonio collected (or 'scavenged') it from a variety of sources worldwide, including the NLF offices in Prague as well as Hanoi, the ABC and BBC television networks, and the French Army. Deeply critical throughout his career of cinéma vérité as being inappropriate to a filmmaker with political convictions, de Antonio credited the idea of working with 'dead footage' or 'collage junk' (Rosenthal 1980) to the contemporary artists and painters with whom he socialized in the 1950s and 1960s, such as Robert Rauchenberg and Jasper Johns.

De Antonio's collage method and his reliance on lengthy interviews with a variety of experts and witnesses—including journalists and academics, as well as politicians and military leaders—along with his suppression of conventional didactic features such as voice-over narration, support his political and aesthetic ideal of 'democratic didacticism' (Waugh 1985). De Antonio's complex use of archival materials on both the sound and image tracks in In the Year of the Pig not only asserts the film's historical authority, but likewise moves the film into the realm of historiographic inquiry, as the viewer is encouraged to engage in interpretation and critical thought. De Antonio's perspective on historical events is always clear through the choice and arrangement of materials, but these yield not so much a singular truth baldly stated as an image of history as a series of competing discourses that demand analysis.

Organized overall as a chronological account of the build-up to and escalation of the Vietnam War beginning with Vietnam's colonial history and Ho Chi Minh's family background, In the Year of the Pig is not strictly linear in its structure, but instead organises itself as a series of debates over key historical events, concepts, and personalities, such as the battle of Dien Bien Phu, the domino theory, Ngo Dinh Diem, Ho Chi Minh, and the bombing of North Vietnam. Addressed particularly to an audience whose understanding of the world is dependent on, and circumscribed by, television news, these debates are not only between and among those experts interviewed for the film but also between and among archival sources of various kinds. To this end, de Antonio often layers sound or voice-over with disparate images, to force critical reevaluation of what otherwise might be considered reliable sources of historical truth, in such a way that the authority of news media in particular is placed into question. For instance, Hubert Humphrey's statement to the press that prisoners are not being mistreated is intercut with and used as a voice-over for an image of a Vietnamese being beaten and kicked; this is followed by an interview with a US soldier who recalls orders to execute prisoners. Thus, at the same time that de Antonio carefully outlines trajectories of cause and effect, he also effectively undermines institutionalized versions of history, particularly those limited historical accounts, those authoritative statements by political and military figures that circulated as justification for the American entry into Vietnam and the escalation of its military presence.

India

Colonized India discovered cinema as early as 1896, when Marius Sestier, one of the Lumière brothers' operators, organized a show in a Bombay hotel. These pioneering short films, including The Arrival of a Train at a Station, tried to capture and record contemporary events in a detailed and vivid manner. Although this session was exclusively organized for a European audience, Indian interest in the invention was immediate. Harishchandra Sakharam Bhatavdekar purchased a movie camera in 1899 and shot his first newsreels, each a series of real events recorded on a single reel. His film The Wrestlers, shot in 1899 during a wrestling match in Bombay, can be considered the first documentary ever made by an Indian filmmaker. However, these factual films were not only made in Bombay. Other cities like Madras and Calcutta, the then capital of the British colony, also became active film production centres. Very early on, Hiralal Sen shot street life in his hometown, or rituals along the local river. Life in India, made in Bengal in 1906 with the help of a Pathé crew, showed a moving tramway, the ghats (stone steps leading directly into the water) where Hindus perform ablutions, and cremation sites. From 1906 on, Madan, an entrepreneur who worked with his son in Calcutta, played an important role in producing regular newsreels, capturing local industry, religion, and daily life. Initially, nonfiction films mainly displayed dazzling images of the colonial Empire, or Raj, to Indian and British audiences. These included the coronation ceremonies, or Delhi Durbar, of Kings Edward VII in 1903 (Delhi Durbar) and George V in 1911 (With Our King and Queen Through India). These projects were filmed by British crews, who travelled to India for the occasion.

The colonial authorities promptly understood that this new medium could serve as a powerful propaganda tool. During World War I, they circulated images of the war effort in India, as the country supplied men and raw materials essential to victory. In 1918, facing a growing independence movement, the local government passed the Cinematograph Act to control the content of the films, using censors' boards based in Calcutta, Bombay, Madras and Lahore, composed of members devoted to the Empire's interests. Newsreels were thus produced locally, but in a biased manner, so that any dissent amongst the Indian population would always present the British in a favourable light. While the Empire's political unity prevailed over local production, the nonviolent resistance movement led by the Mahatma Gandhi captivated independent foreign newsreels agencies, such as the French Gaumont Graphic or the American Universal Newsreel. In 1930 his march against the British salt tax became the subject of unprecedented media coverage. As moving images of Gandhi defying the British Crown travelled around the globe, Indian films on the subject (Mahatma Gandhi's March to Freedom, Mahatma Gandhi's March, and Mahatma's Historic March) were immediately censored and kept from public view, leaving the Indian audience deprived of these historic images. Although the introduction of sound in 1931 increased the documentary's power of persuasion, the accurate representation of the local social life was set back by both censorship and film industry's growing focus on entertainment and commercial profitability. After living for a few years in France, P.V. Pathy returned to his homeland in 1935 with a new approach to documentary cinema. He made commissioned films for British Paramount and Universal News, and travelled across the country, unswerving in his dedication to detailed and instructional reportage on subjects as diverse as political events, social matters, and natural disasters. However, his approach was rare: most documentary film production in the 1930s remained patronizing and out of touch with local living conditions.

In 1939 the Bombay film industry organized a meeting to discuss the importance of documentaries and newsreels, which until then had been neglected by both politicians and exhibitors alike. Being left in the hands of the colonial ruler, these images of India were invariably limited to exotic or backward ways of life, or luxurious fauna and flora, and reinforced arguments for the British occupation. That same year, Great Britain entered World War II, dragging India with it. The Ministry of Information in London once again used newsreels for propaganda purposes, either to support the war effort or the so-called progressive British colonial policy in India. Keeping this objective in mind, in 1940 the Raj created the Film Advisory Board (FAB), the first state documentary production and distribution company in India. At that time, most of the films were sent from Great Britain or made in India by British crews, before being dubbed in Hindi or other regional languages. The Indian participants were trained by the FAB only to be assistants to foreign filmmakers. In 1943 London, determined to maintain control over this powerful medium, unilaterally dismantled the FAB. It imposed the showing of one government newsreel program prior to any feature-film screening, and restricted reel quotas to authorized Indian films. The FAB was replaced by a new organisation based in Bombay, which soon also included members from Calcutta, Madras and Lahore. It became a tripartite, pan-Indian body, overseeing Information Films of India (IFI), Indian News Parade (INP) and the Army Film Centre (AFC). Under the INP, the Indian newsreels agency, a team established India Today, a series of six films projecting images of India grappling with modernity and eager to compete with developed countries (The Changing Face of India, in 1941, The Grand Trunk Road, The Dak, Four Hundred Million People, Women of India, and Youth of India in 1942). In the meantime, the AFC, based in Bombay, produced around one hundred films in support of the war effort.

These three institutions finally realized that their productions were having little impact and started to develop projects made by Indian people for Indian audiences, such as Ezra Mir's films on local health, industry, agriculture, communications, but also on arts and architecture. Films on Indian traditional art forms, like Tribal Dances (1944), demonstrated unprecedented ethnographic interest in entire sections of Indian society, which were usually ignored by the media. However, controversial films, especially those dealing with the rise of nationalism in India, were systematically censored and never reached their audience. These seized films are now lost, and were most likely destroyed by the authorities. Between 1941 and 1945 the FAB and IFI produced around one hundred and seventy films, mainly for the war effort, and for the first time about social and economic issues. Exploring new themes was futile, though, due to the reluctance of the local film industry to be associated with a colonial institution, but also in view of the mass audience, more and more supportive of pro-independence ideas. After World War II, the British Empire was in decline in India and decided to close down its local documentary production units, depriving the population of a record of Independence for posterity. British newsreels focused on the protocol related to the passing of powers, ignored Jawaharlal Nehru's first speeches to his free people, but emphasized bloody images of the Partition or of Mahatma Gandhi's assassination, presenting them as tragic consequences of the British leaving the country, and justification for their colonial policy.

The Films Division, founded in 1948, rose from the ashes of the IFI and INP to lead the production and distribution of information films, enlisting documentary cinema for the larger project of nation-building and integration. Its first task was to gain the acceptance of both audiences and exhibitors, who were still required to show newsreels before each feature film. They planned to produce as many films as possible at reduced prices, to reach a wide, heterogeneous audience, urban and rural, educated and illiterate, speaking various regional languages. These films favored themes related to the development of India (hygiene, family planning, agricultural productivity), and promoting patriotic feelings. While getting rid of the cultural influence of the West, they never really dealt with the yet unsolved challenges of the country (poverty, illiteracy, communalism). The main idea was to glorify the government's policies towards its people. Although the Films Division pioneered the ethnographic documentary genre (The Adivasis of Madhya Pradesh in 1948, Our Original Inhabitants in 1953), its objective was to include diverse ethnic groups within the restrictive limits set by the Indian nation-building project. Film crews knew very little about regional customs and habits in their own country, and did not hesitate to stage tribes' daily lives, so that they fitted neatly into the national project of unity, modernization and development. These documentaries can be criticized as exotic voyeurism, but they remain some of the first images reporting the sociocultural diversity of India. During the 1950s the Films Division produced about one hundred and fifty documentaries per year, as well as a weekly newsreels programme in thirteen languages. It also did so in bureaucratic fashion, earning the nickname 'Files Division'. During this period documentary films were produced by self-taught individuals, without any profound and reflective thoughts on the medium, and without any substantial contact with world cinema. Independent documentarists struggled to find a place of their own in this very limited environment. The German director Paul Zils took some major initiatives to encourage Indian documentary cinema: he created the Indian Documentary magazine in 1949, the Indian Documentary Producers' Association in 1956, which founded the first Indian documentary film festival in several cities in 1958. These were the first signs of interest in independent films, made outside the Films Division circuit, but still in its shadow. The films of Roberto Rossellini (L'India vista da Rossellini, 1957, which combined a documentary approach with fictional elements) and Louis Malle (L'Inde fantôme, 1969, which added Malle's explanatory voice-over to observational images), or the international programmes selected by film societies (membership film clubs), exposed Indian directors to new working methods and invited them to rethink the documentary genre. During the prolific 1950s many films were also financed by foreign agencies, such as the United States Information Service, the American Technical Cooperation Mission, the Shell Film Unit or industrial companies like Tata and Dunlop. With this support, complacent images of human, industrial, and agricultural development were again brought to the foreground.

Bureaucratic slowness prevented the Films Division from capturing the fast-changing society of the 1960s. The reforms recommended by the Chanda Committee in 1966—aimed at solving the situation—failed to turn into action, despite the introduction of lighter equipment and new technologies, such as synchronized sound techniques, that allowed filmmakers to get closer to their subjects and reach out for more spontaneity. Under the European influence of cinéma vérité and direct cinema, some documentarists opted for an observational approach and strove to give viewers sensations of immediacy and intimacy. These innovative directors included Fali Bilimoria, with films like The House that Ananda Built (1967), which recounts a peasant's daily life in Orissa and the generational divide between a man and his sons after migrating to the big city, or Sukhdev and his eclectic films, such as India 67, about the complex negotiation between tradition and modernity in contemporary India, told through details gleaned at the four corners of the country. S.N.S. Sastry, in his unique I Am Twenty (1968), discussed with Indian youths the subjects that mattered to them (their love stories, dreams, visions of the future), in the style of Jean Rouch in Chronique d'un été. Both films are still very influential to Indian documentary filmmakers today. In the same vein, to celebrate twenty years of Independence, K.S. Chari and T.A. Abraham asked students, workers, and intellectuals to reflect on the notion of democracy in India in Face to Face (1967). These documentaries sought to revitalise the medium, not only in terms of content, by dealing with the deep doubts and hopes of the people, but also in terms of form, by using direct sound, fewer voice-overs, or kaleidoscope images, with the objective of breaking through the academic and rather tedious conventions used by the Films Division. Their work is particularly noteworthy, given that they had to work under the supervision of this official body. These films marked the birth of activist documentary cinema in India, but were only seen by a very limited audience. In the 1960s film exhibitors were still forced to show newsreels in their theatres, regardless of the audience's disinterest for these official versions of Indian current events, and the abandonment of this tradition in Western countries. Every foray into controversial issues was still opposed by authorities. During this period, directors who are now best-known for their feature films also joined the documentary filmmaking scene. In 1967 Shyam Benegal shot A Child of the Streets, about a young boy in need of affection who wanders around until he is institutionalized in a juvenile reform centre, with the intention of providing both a social message and an artistic experience to the audience. In 1974 Mani Kaul directed his first documentary film, The Nomad Puppeteers, chronicling the hardships of travelling puppeteers across the state of Rajasthan, as well as a disappearing art form.

With every project Kaul mixed fiction and non-fiction to document on reels aspects of Indian reality at odds with the enshrined notion of progress. Many documentarists started to break the twenty-minute duration rule imposed by the Films Division, choosing longer durations according to the needs of specific projects. In 1972 Satyajit Ray experimented with the genre and made The Inner Eye, a film dedicated to the Bengali painter Binode Bihari Mukherjee, which demonstrated the growing interest in the form among Indian filmmakers as it broke free from its formal and narrative stranglehold.

In the 1970s India went through a multi-faceted crisis that led the population to demonstrate against unemployment, inflation and political corruption. Overwhelmed by the scale of the protest, Prime Minister Indira Gandhi declared the State of Emergency in the name of national security and the media fell under her heel from 1975 to 1977. The Films Division reverted to a mere propaganda tool and broadcast films praising Indira Gandhi and her iron-fisted politics on public television—now considered the new mass medium for education and development. These restrictions provoked resistance. Other voices started making themselves heard and helped to redefine the tarnished notion of ‘nation’. However, they mainly did so using the conventional aesthetics and instructional tone of earlier films.

As the 1980s began, India marked a shift away from Nehru’s socialist redistributive development model to one friendlier to private businesses and foreign investors. Television sets started to spread around the country. Programmes were still driven by an official mission of information and education, yet they started to experiment with entertaining formats, such as TV serials, and became stronger competitors to the mainstream fiction films. Facing this growing interest for profitability, consumerism and entertainment, many documentarists reassessed the role of their film form and used it to question history. The 1980s saw the consolidation of political documentary filmmaking. Anand Patwardhan’s work embodied this period. His immediate involvement in political, social, economic or religious events made him a role model for an entire generation of Indian filmmakers. His work helped documentaries gain respect as a medium and creative form in India. His style is rough, direct, fly on the wall. His first film, Waves of Revolution (1976), recounted the non-violent, popular and student anticorruption movement that led to the State of Emergency. Bombay: Our City (1985), produced with the help of individual and public funding, countered the government’s and middle class’s marginalization of slum dwellers by arguing that they fully participate to the economic life of the city (industry, construction, house staff). One of his most acclaimed films, In the Name of God (1992), investigated the motivations behind the destruction of the Babri mosque in Ayodhya by Hindu fundamentalists, and the efforts of secular Indians to fight against the rise of religious fanaticism. His work denounced injustice and intolerance, from patriarchal and communalist violence (Father, Son and Holy War, 1994), to the Narmada dam project and the eviction of neighbouring tribal communities (Narmada Diary, 1995), and the danger of nuclear proliferation (War and Peace, 2002). His university years in Canada gave him the necessary international visual literacy, distance from his native country, and financing and distribution networks that his Indian peers often lacked.

Since the 1980s female documentarists like Bhashika Datta, Manjira Datta, Meera Dewan, Deepa Dhanraj, Reena Mohan, Suhasini Mulay, Uma Segal, or Nilita Vachani also raise their voices. Mediastorm, a group of female filmmakers, worked on social and political problems related to women, from the right for divorce to the illegal practice of sati (immolation of widows). These committed and bold filmmakers directed uncompromising films about the living conditions of women as well as other neglected social issues, with the persistent objective of fighting against stereotypes and taboos. Shelter, by Uma Segal (1984), followed homeless people in their daily activities to condemn the eviction of the poor in favour of middle-class housing projects. By filming a woman possessed by a spirit in Eyes of Stone (1988), Nilita Vachani scrutinized female resistance options against Indian’s patriarchal society without ever judging. Viewers were free to draw their own conclusions—a new development in Indian documentary filmmaking. Manjira Datta, in The Sacrifice of Babulal Bhuiyan (1988), reexamined the killing of a labourer who recycles coal waste. The film highlighted the social oppression and exploitation happening in the mining region of Bihar, explored the devastating environment of these migrant villagers, and allowed the blackness of the coal to invade the screen with a striking visual impact. The film reflects a possible analogy between these workers who tirelessly battle for solidarity and the struggle for solidarity of independent documentary makers who harvest forgotten snatches of existence and bring them back to life by turning a spotlight on them. In I Live in Behrampada (1992), Madhusree Dutta captured on the spot riots between Hindus and Muslims in Bombay, but went further than breaking news to tackle the complexity of caste and community relations in urban slums. The originality of the film lay in her decision to expound these major social issues through little details from the lives of the protagonists and offer a female point of view of the situation. In this case, history with a little 'h' took over History with a capital 'H'. In the same year, Reena Mohan shot Kamlabai, and reinvented documentary narration by letting the main character, one of the first Indian actresses, play to the camera and reveal herself on the screen, delivering a film that was both intimate and moving. Through the account of her tumultuous life throughout the twentieth century, the audience (re)discovered entire sections of Indian contemporary history. These films generally shared a common characteristic: they offered audiences a new experience (cultural, emotional, political), but did not lecture them.

This style is often labelled as activist because it unveils situations of crisis and emergency. In the 1980s, and even later in the 1990s, no training in documentary filmmaking was available in India, filmmakers were either self-trained, trained by foreign TV crews shooting in India, or went abroad to pursue film studies. They were not financed by the State, but mainly by private foreign (TV networks, the Ford Foundation) or local (non-governmental) organisations, which made the position of the Films Division obsolete, yet they still suffered from government censorship. Joining the cause of the underprivileged or marginalized led them to address darker aspects of society, from police abuse of prisoners (An Indian Story by Tapan Bose in 1981) to the multinationals' responsibility in the world's worst industrial disaster in Bhopal (Bhopal: Beyond Genocide, by Tapan Bose, Suhasini Mulay and Salim Shaikh, 1985), or the popular and non-violent protest against nuclear tests in Orissa (Voices from Baliapal, 1988). This documentary, directed by Ranjan Palit, recorded the struggle through interviews with the villagers. It was praised by the Ministry of Information and Broadcasting, but has always been banned from TV broadcasts by the same Ministry, in the name of national security. These films called sensitive official statements into question and provoked double-edged political reactions, including manipulation and censorship. More recently, Sanjay Kak took part in this alternative and confrontational form of filmmaking, with films about the struggle against the controversial construction of a dam in the Narmada Valley (Words on Water, 2003) and the impact of freedom fighting on the lives of civilians in Kashmir (Jahsn-e-Azadi: How We Celebrate Freedom, 2007). His films stood out both for their political statements and stylish camera work. Access to events and affected people influences the final form of these films, but it also reflects the independent point of view of distinctive directors without claiming to be comprehensive or totally objective.

In the 1990s the drive towards liberalization and modernization has transformed a quarter of the country into urban areas, and a growing part of the population into consumers. The satellite TV boom marked the end of public monopoly and opened new perspectives on audiovisual forms and contents. Taking this new challenge seriously, the film sector became a proper industry in 1998, allowing the main production, distribution and exhibition companies to be financed by banks, to work more closely together, to reinvent marketing and optimize profits. Documentary cinema kept standing aside from this context of liberal economy and mass entertainment. Some mature films started to have a global resonance, such as Seeds of Plenty, Seeds of Sorrow (1992), which focused on the dark side of the Indian Green Revolution and anticipated the way in which globalization would change the agrarian sector. Until the 1990s documentaries mainly addressed collective issues, adopting a didactical tone, while the last two decades refocused on individual and personal dialogues. Filmmakers followed one or several protagonists, mixed forms, recycled images, layered meanings, indulged in introspection. Political commitment no longer meant pleading a cause or looking at the underprivileged from a distance, but also getting involved in formal experiments, giving free rein to one's creativity, opening oneself to ambiguity and humour. This kind of filmmaking often followed from a genuine willingness to explore different ways of reproducing the 'real', as well as a desire to create an alternative visual culture in India. Filmmakers took advantage of up-to-date cinematic technologies, which helped them to capture the invisible, the overtones more easily. Allowing oneself to constantly break rules became the new political activism. Paromita Vohra makes films that resemble her. Unlimited Girls (2002), for instance, questioned one's individual commitment through feminism, skilfully blending nonfiction with fiction, popular or kitsch images, animation, screens of an Internet chat room, interviews, and wrapped up the final piece with a humorous and ironic tone, but one always opened to question and interpretation. More than recording aspects of Indian reality, Vohra took her audiences into unknown territory. Rejected by most film festivals, the film became a success through word of mouth. Recently, filmmaking has become easier worldwide through the introduction of video and digital technology. In India it has relieved filmmakers of the burden of reel quotas and expensive budgets. Digital technology and the Internet have allowed a wider range of people to grab a camera to shoot and circulate images of their everyday life, but also to unleash their creative instincts and flirt with intimacy. In 2005 a student couple from Mysore in South India filmed their sexual frolics. The video, Mysore Mallige, first circulated in the VHS underground circuit before being anonymously uploaded to the Internet, creating a conspicuous yet sizzling hit in the conservative country.

At the crossroads of artistic and industrial interests, documentary filmmakers are currently confronted with three major challenges: funding, censorship and distribution. In 2000 the public TV network partially took over from the Films Division and commissioned small-budget films under the banner of the Public Service Broadcasting Trust, but suggested conventional themes and aesthetics. Independent documentarians responded by taking action to emancipate themselves from government guardianship. In 2004 when the Mumbai International Film Festival (MIFF) rejected documentaries that were denied their official censorship certificate, filmmakers immediately reacted by organizing VIKALP, a counter-festival dedicated to documentaries but free from any state supervision. The Magic Lantern Foundation, founded in New Delhi in 1989, or the company Indiepix, based in New York since 2004, distributes these films in DVD format. Humanities departments in North American and British universities also offer interesting opportunities to show Indian documentaries abroad, but mainly rely on the filmmakers' networks and time. These films are thus mainly restricted to alternative distribution and exhibition networks, including film festivals at home and abroad, film societies, private screenings, and online platforms. These initiatives have shaped a niche market for independent documentaries. Over the past decade the construction of multiplexes has also sustained the showing of documentaries on the big screen. Theatres ranging from fifty to one hundred seats are open to options other than popular Bollywood productions. In 2010 Leaving Home, a mainstream documentary film recounting and praising the career of the famous rock band Indian Ocean, was shown in several multiplexes across the country. Likewise, the development of cable and satellite TV created a new market for documentaries, although these TV channels are mainly interested in filling their programme grids and require strict film formats.

A documentary film movement, defined by a specific style, recurrent characteristics and themes, does not exist as such in India, although a community has been able to unite on certain occasions. Documentary makers do not strive for any aesthetic harmony, but try to genuinely match their subject, or the mood of the moment. This position marks a new era for the Indian documentary film: the willingness to open up to a multitude of voices, to shine new light on current or past events. Freed from restrictions, be they political propaganda, collective memory, or the obsessive quest for realism, today's documentary filmmakers wish to chronicle India, little by little, to local audiences most of all. On the margins of the prolific yet manufactured Bollywood film industry, they embody the artistic and democratic vitality of India.

Industrial Britain

(UK, Flaherty, 1931)

Industrial Britain, a film begun by Robert Flaherty for John Grierson at the Empire Marketing Board (EMB) Film Unit, is an example of a state-sponsored documentary that emphasized people and work in an uneasy combination of the world-views of both men. Grierson brought Flaherty over from Berlin, where the American was trying to start a film project. In late 1931 the EMB Film Unit had obtained some credibility and, more important, an increased budget, enabling John Grierson and Stephen Tallents, the Unit's leaders, to employ the highest-profile documentary maker of the period (Aitken 1990: 121).

Flaherty brought with him not only a status as the crafter of great works such as Nanook of the North and Moana, but also a reputation for loose production methods, such as a high ratio of shot footage to usable material. Grierson wanted to employ Flaherty not only to make Industrial Britain but also to draw attention to Britain's documentary film movement as well as to teach upcoming filmmakers such as Basil Wright and John Taylor about filmmaking. Grierson was well aware of Flaherty's methods and managed to obtain a large working budget of £2,500 (Calder-Marshall 1963: 135). Nevertheless, the production quickly ran into trouble when Flaherty ran out of money and film stock. Caught between Flaherty's comparatively extravagant production methods and the civil service constraints of government filmmaking with which Grierson had become used to dealing, the production was always going to be a difficult one. It seems that the film was edited by Grierson with Edgar Anstey's assistance. The final film was eventually put together with half a dozen two-reel documentaries to form what became known as The Imperial Six, which British Gaumont distributed theatrically. Flaherty had nothing to do with the narration, which sounds more like Grierson's words.

Nevertheless, Industrial Britain manages to reconcile the aims of on the one hand Grierson and Tallents' Film Unit—which wanted to produce socially purposive films that were not sponsored, product-based films, but publicity films with a wider market appeal—and on the other hand Flaherty's premodern romanticization of folk life. The film that Flaherty envisaged posited that the craftsmen of England were the real heroes of the Industrial Revolution; that it was the people who enabled fine products to be realized, rather than the then contemporary emphasis on machinery. At the same time, Industrial Britain straddles the strikingly composed images of large-scale industry and the close-ups of men toiling at their craft.

It is possible that Flaherty was not responsible for all of the footage that found its way into the finished film, and that Basil Wright and Arthur Elton were brought in to shoot extra footage (Calder-Marshall 1963: 139). Nonetheless, this awkward production history does not diminish the film's appeal. In what seem to be Flaherty's images of rows of chimney stacks and urban residences clouded in smoke and grime there is a classical quality that meshes with the intense close-ups of working men.

In this insistence of these images, on the personalising of the Industrial Revolution, alongside the broader industrial landscape images, Industrial Britain employs a 'poetic ambiguity', containing the 'metaphoric and associative possibilities of the montage juxtapositions' (Higson 1986: 79) in a somewhat haphazard organisation of numerous images of workers and their workplaces. In attempting to reconcile Grierson's socially purposive aesthetics with Flaherty's premodern romanticism, the film can be read as a paean to modernity. The broader images of an industrial landscape in which the British worker performs his noble work creates a filmic world that is not only about the craftsmanship that lies behind the façade of chimney stacks and production lines, it is also about how these workers are a part of a human army of craftsmen who maintain their grace and humanity in the face of the mechanisation of industry, at the same time as they become machinelike. The images of workers in Industrial Britain are not images of the automatons of capitalism but rather they are remnants of a time past, a time when craftsmanship belonged to the kinds of folk culture that Flaherty locates in Nanook of the North, Moana, and the later Man of Aran.

It is difficult to say whether Industrial Britain is a Robert Flaherty film or a John Grierson film; perhaps a more interesting proposal is that the film produces resonances representative of both worldviews, in an uneasy commingling of romantic celebration and the kind of sponsorship imperatives to which Grierson was beholden.

Introduction to the Enemy

(US, Wexler, 1974)

In the spring of 1974, with President Nixon besieged in the White House, the anti-war political activist Jane Fonda traveled to Hanoi (for the second time) with her husband and fellow activist, Thomas Hayden, and the cinematographer and director Haskell Wexler to make a documentary in liberated Quang Tri province. When Introduction to the Enemy had a limited release later that year, The New York Times praised it as a 'quiet, modest film', while Haskell called it 'a tiny jewel'. Variety, however, disagreed. Citing the sequence in which a crowd of locals watch Fonda and Hayden toss around a Frisbee, the scene in which Fonda argues with a North Vietnamese man who defends the US people, and the actress's 'constant use of an incongruously dippy smile to show her fondness for the peasantry', the reviewer charged Fonda with a tendency toward self-dramatization.

Introduction to the Enemy presented the 'new Vietnam' as a peasants' paradise. Fonda, Hayden, and Wexler, an avowed Communist, traveled to Vietnam when the US bombing of North Vietnam was at its peak. The trip was publicized as a tour in support of the Vietnamese people. The tour was filmed, and the footage was eventually released as Introduction to the Enemy.

Jane Fonda married Tom Hayden in 1972, and began her anti-war activities in earnest then, although she had been making appearances at rallies since 1969. She earned the moniker 'Hanoi Jane' due to her 1972 trip to Hanoi and her broadcast on Hanoi radio, in which she appealed to American pilots to end the bombing of North Vietnam. In that year, she made several anti-war skits on film. Tom Hayden was first leader of Students for a Democratic Society (SDS), which was founded at the University of Michigan in 1960. This group first protested within the Civil Rights movement, but in 1964 began to organize campus protests against the Vietnam War. By then, SDS was divided in factions, with some members embracing Communism and some joining the Weathermen. Hayden and Fonda divorced in 1989. Hayden went on to serve in the California State Assembly and Senate.

Iran

Mozaffareddin Shah, the fifth Shah of the Ghajar dynasty, during a visit to Europe, ordered his photographer, Mirza Ebrahim Khan, to purchase motion picture equipment and shoot a carnival (the Festival of Flowers) then taking place in Ostend, Belgium, circa 1900. This was the very first documentary shot by an Iranian. The film equipment brought to Iran soon afterwards was for royal entertainment, but then became mass entertainment similar to what occurred in Europe and the United States. According to film scholar Mohammad Tahaminezhad, the first movie theatre was opened in Iran at the same time.

The first Iranian filmmaker who pursued documentary filmmaking, Khanbaba Motazedi, brought a Gaumont camera to Iran after completing his studies in France. His earlier films, produced in the 1920s, are more like newsreels, documenting major political events and the country's development projects. Footage of his own family, the royal family, and the 1925 swearing-in ceremony of Reza Shah Pahlavi (the first Shah of the Pahlavi dynasty), are examples of his scope of activity.

After World War I a number of foreign ethnographic film crews entered Iran. In 1924 three Americans, Merian C. Cooper, Ernest B. Schoedsack and Marguerite Harrison, produced the very first ethnographic film, Grass (1925), depicting the annual migration of a nomadic tribe in Iran, the Bakhtiari. Many scholars agree that this is the first serious documentary produced by foreign nationals about Iran. The government banned the screening of the film in Iran (although it may have been shown briefly at the time), apparently interpreting it as not being in line with the country's developmental goals and objectives. Years later, after adding music and a new voice-over, the film was shown in Iran.

In 1930 a German crew produced a documentary chronicling the construction of Iran's northern railroad system. This film was also criticized for the depiction of poverty in Iranian society. In 1931 a French crew, accompanying a group of French scientists in Asia, crossed Iran on their way to Afghanistan and China and produced a film, The Yellow Caravan. This film was shown in France and apparently some Iranians living abroad wrote a letter complaining about various scenes in the film.

After these experiences with foreign filmmakers, the Iranian government adopted a censorship law to curtail what they deemed to be the negative portrayal of the country. Meanwhile the screening of documentaries and newsreels along with fiction films, which had started in 1904 with the establishment of the very first public movie theater by Mirza Ebrahim Khan Sahafbashi, continued in Iranian movie theaters.

With the beginning of World War II, screening of war newsreels became routine in Iranian movie theaters. After the arrival of American, British and Russian armies in Iran, the accompanying cameramen shot a substantial amount of footage of many political meetings as well as the armies' advances. These films were also shown in Iranian theaters. Following the tradition of the world's armies, the Iranian army also established 'the Army Studios', which produced a number of government propaganda films.

The beginning of the 1950s marked a series of political events that led to the nationalization of the Iranian oil industry. During a showdown between Mohammad Reza Shah and Mohammad Mossadegh (the popular Iranian prime minister), the Shah left Iran for a short period of time and returned to Iran following a coup-d'état backed by the United States to oust Mossadegh and reclaim his throne. Foreign media rushed to Iran to report on these events and consequently produced an unprecedented body of work. Later, the government used some of this footage to produce propaganda films.

Earlier, in 1949 a film crew from Syracuse University (aka the Syracuse Group) traveled to Iran to produce a series of informational and instructional films on a variety of subjects ranging from health and hygiene to agricultural issues. In 1953 the group was asked by the government to stay on and train Iranian filmmakers. Among the very first directors trained by the group were Hooshang Shafiqi (Shaghayegheh Soozan/Burning Poppy, 1963) and Mohammad Gholi Sayyar (Isfahan 1957). Films made by the Syracuse Group trainees are in simple narrative form, maintaining a chronological order along with an enhancing voice-over, a film style still present in today's Iranian documentary traditions. This is a precursor to the development of systematic documentary filmmaking in Iran.

The two decades between 1950 and 1970 encompass an important period in Iran's documentary cinema. The first group of Iranian film students returned from abroad hoping to establish a rich environment for cinema, among them Farrokh Ghafari and Hassan Shirvani. They began by educating other filmmakers, and the public, with screenings of the world's best documentaries. Other emerging filmmakers of this period who enriched Iranian documentary filmmaking with their own styles, techniques and methods were Ebrahim Golestan, perhaps the pioneer of the poetic documentary. He produced a memorable series of documentaries on the interaction of the oil industry with the environment. Among them are Az Ghatreh ta Darya/From Drop to the Sea (1957), Yek Ātash/A Fire (1957), Cheshm Andāz/Outlook (1957), and Mouj, Marjan, Va Khara/Wave, Coral, and Rock (1962). Forough Farrokhzad captivated audiences with Khāneh Siah Ast/The House is Black (1962), a sensitive, riveting work on the life of people with leprosy. Nāder Afshar Nāderi produced Baloot/Acorn (1966), the very first methodically significant anthropological documentary of this period. Man-ouchehr Tayyab's interest in architecture inspired him to make some of the most visually impressive documentaries about Iranian cultural heritage, among them, Masjed-e Jāme/Grand Mosque (1970) and Memari-e Safavieh/Safavid Architecture (1974). Tayyab with over ninety films and Khosrow Sinai with over seventy films in their respective portfolios are the most prolific Iranian documentary filmmakers. Sinai also studied architecture, music and cinema abroad. Upon his return to Iran in 1967, he joined the Ministry of Culture and Arts and remains one of the most prominent documentary filmmakers today. Among Sinai's most significant works is the production of the award-winning Marsye Gomshodeh/The Lost Requiem (1970–83), a documentary about Polish refugees in Iran during World War II. Later, Sinai was commissioned by the British Channel 4 to make a film about Kurdish refugees in Iran, On the Borderline (1991). He has directed also a number of narrative features including Talking with a Shadow, a docudrama on one of the most influential Iranian contemporary writers, Sadeq Hedayat. Sinai and Tayyab have made stylistic films covering a wide range of subjects, from ethnographic to Iranian cultural heritage and from arts to industrial. Among other memorable filmmakers of this period are Ahmad Faroughi (Toloo-e Fajr/Dawn), Kamran Shirdel (Oon Shab ke Baroon Oomad/The Night it Rained, 1967–74), and Hazhir Dariush (Goud-e Moghaddas/The Sacred Pit, 1964).

Many documentaries of this period are either about Iranian crafts and cultural heritage or archeological discoveries. This trend may relate to a passion for rediscovering a national identity by searching through the past or, as some critics claim, gratifying the sponsoring entities of the films.

After the 1953 coup d'état and the return of the Shah, the government scrutinized all aspects of art and media production. The works of filmmakers were no exception. Critical treatment of any subject depicting the realities of Iranian life with sociological or political underpinning, or screening of any film directly or indirectly critical of the government, was subject to censorship, resulting in a self-censoring trend among film producers in order to protect their investments (a tendency still prevalent in Iran). Kamran Shirdel's Tehran Pietakht-e Iran Ast/Tehran is the Capital of Iran (1966), and Oon Shab ke Baroon Oomad/The Night it Rained (winner of the Gran Prix at the Third Tehran International Film Festival in 1974), were among the first documentaries banned by the government. The censorship caused intellectual filmmakers to turn to 'safe' subjects, reluctantly distancing themselves from relevant social and historical issues. Nevertheless, films of this period are highly stylistic and impressive to watch.

In 1966 the National Iranian Radio and Television Organization (NIRTV) was established and immediately began to attract documentary filmmakers. Television, along with the Ministry of Culture and Arts, was the main entity supporting documentary filmmaking in Iran. Feridoun Rahnema, a French-educated intellectual, was lured to Iran to establish a research center and to produce a program, Iran Zamin/The Land of Iran, showcasing documentaries on Iranian cultural heritage. Rahnema, perhaps the pioneer in methodical documentary filmmaking in Iran, began to emphasize research-oriented documentaries, something frequently ignored by many filmmakers that had led to the superficial treatment and consequently a more formalistic approach to documentary production. Rahnema's leadership attracted a number of great filmmakers to television, including established filmmakers with great portfolios: Parviz Kimiavi (Peh Mesle Pelican/P Like in Pelican, 1972), Nasser Taghvaei (Arbaein/Fortieth, 1968), Mohammadreza Asalani (Jam-e Hasanlu/Hasanlu Bowl, 1967), and a number of other well-known filmmakers. Rahnema himself directed a memorable documentary, Takht-e Jamshid/Persepolis (1962), an attempt to find historical and national identity in the ruins of Persepolis. Rahnema, a scholar and a visionary, believed that a government or private entity must support documentary cinema in Iran. He concluded that documentary filmmaking would not flourish without sustainable financial support and systematic investigation of the subject. Rahnema did not dispute the importance of documentaries on health and industrial development, but he insisted on a serious look at the roots of being an Iranian and a search for a true identity. Unfortunately, he did not live long enough to see his ideas fully implemented.

A number of early graduates from the School of Television and Cinema, a NIRT TV affiliate, also made their career in making documentaries. Among them, Gholamhussein Taheridoost (Baloot/Acorn, 1973), Houshang Azadivar (Andre Malraux and Iran's Civilization, 1975) and Ebrahim Mokhtari (The Jockey, 1975). Mokhtari later established himself as one of the most successful documentary filmmakers in the postrevolutionary period with films about women's plight, including the award-winning Mokarrameh: Memories and Dreams, produced in 1999.

It is essential to acknowledge some of the remarkable anthropological films made during this period: Nasser Taghvaei's Bād-e Jen/The Wind of Jinni (1971), a startling yet informative film on a mysterious disease in the Persian Gulf region believed to be caused by evil possession of the body, and the ritual for removing it, and Parviz Kimiavi's Ya Zamen-e āhoo!/Oh, the Protector of Deer! (1970), a poetic portrayal of the pilgrims' prayers captured in the shrine of the eighth Imam of Shi'i Moslems in Iran.

After the revolution of 1979, Iranian cinema was in limbo waiting for direction to be given. A cultural reform implemented by the Islamic revolution imposed new policies on production and foreign imports. Although these changes seemed an impediment, in reality they initiated a new era in Iranian cinema. Within a few years Iranian cinema emerged with a new face and gradually captured the attention of the world by producing some of the most memorable films in the world's cinema. Some Iranian filmmakers who became staples at the world film festivals were Abbas Kiarostami, Mohsen Makhmalbaf, Majid Majidi, Jaffar Panahi, Rakhshan Bani

Documentary cinema, despite not having the same international exposure, has continuously progressed alongside narrative cinema. Government and government-subsidized agencies remain the main supporters of documentary filmmaking in Iran. Many documentaries now feed six television broadcast channels in Iran.

A remarkable body of work immediately before and after the revolution in Iran (late 1978 and early 1979) was produced either by amateur filmmakers using 8mm and simple 16mm cameras, Iranian television, or the Audio/Visual Unit of the Ministry of Culture and Arts. Street demonstrations, strikes, political gatherings and street clashes between the revolutionary forces and government forces were captured. Examples of films from this period are Hussein Torabi's Baray-e āzadi/For Freedom (1980) and Mohammad Ali Najafi's Lylatol Ghadr/The Night of Ghadr (1980). Immediately after the revolution, renowned Iranian filmmaker Amir Nāderi produced two documentaries about people who went missing during the revolution, Jostoju Yek/ Search 1 (1979) and Jostoju Dou/ Search 2 (1979). According to Shahaboddin Ādel (2001), the Iranian film scholar, the revolution and its immediate consequences are responsible for the appearance and expansion of two types of documentaries in Iran: the political documentary and the news documentary. He also believes that using the direct camera technique for making documentaries and collecting and archiving information for developing documentaries are the consequences of the social change.

In the period leading up to the Iran-Iraq war and immediately afterward, documentary filmmaking caught the attention of many filmmakers. A series of films seem to set a new direction and tone. Kāreez/The Canal, Continuation of Life (1985) by Mohammad Moghadasian is a study of people participating in providing for their own needs. The film documents the cooperation of people dredging a canal vital to their water supply. The other notable works are two comprehensive series, methodically researched, one on the history of Iranian calligraphy (Khat/Calligraphy), and the other on Iranian architecture (Memari-e Irani/Iranian Architecture). These series are currently used as instructional material in schools.

The Iran–Iraq war of 1980–8 also created a new documentary style that was completely unexpected in Iranian history: war documentaries. Iranian filmmakers' experiences during the war resulted in some of the most remarkable footage from this gruesome war. Many of these films were shot in the cinéma vérité style: Pol-e Piroozi/The Victory Bridge, Karbala Panj/Karbala Five, and two series, Haghighat/The Truth and Ravayat-e Fath/The Narrative of Victory. Some filmmakers, like Mortaza Avini (who worked on Ravayat-e Fath), lost their lives in the process of documenting the war. A number of filmmakers of this period who learnt about cinema through war documentaries, went on to become professional filmmakers in postwar cinema, including Ebrahim Hatami Kia, Ahmadreza Darvish, and Rasool Mollagholipour.

After the war, numerous films were produced documenting the rebuilding of the country and progress in the industrial and scientific sectors. Government-supported entities like Foolād-e Mobarakeh (Mobarakeh Steel Company), as well as private companies, continue to support veteran and emerging filmmakers in their efforts. Nevertheless, the filmmakers' attention was not removed from ethnographic films. Many established and emerging filmmakers continue their work in this area. Farhad Varahram (Ghatl-e Shotor/Killing of the Camel, 1991), who worked with the late Nāder Afshar Nāderi (a pioneer of ethnographic documentaries) continues his career in this genre. Farhad Mehranfar and Ali Shah Hatami have directed some of the most memorable anthropological episodes of Koodakan-e Sarzamin-e Iran/The Children of Iran, a series for Islamic Republic of Iran Broadcasting (IRIB) documenting the lives of Iranian children in various parts of Iran under unusual circumstances and extraordinary conditions.

Serious and scholarly documentary studies have emerged in postrevolutionary Iran. Mohammad Tahaminezhad, Zaven Ghookasian, Mohammad Saeed Mohasesi, Pirouz Kalantari, Robert Safarian, and other scholars, have enriched the research and analytical field with their insightful writings.

Documentary filmmaking in Iran is alive and well, and largely supported by government agencies. Many young Iranians fascinated by the power of cinema are absorbed by nonprofit organizations that provide video equipment for their experiments. No doubt, affordable and accessible video equipment is also responsible for the democratization of cinema in Iran. As Rahnema rightly observed, Iran does have many talented filmmakers who are searching for the opportunities and support needed to flourish. Currently, organizations like the Documentary & Experimental Film Center (DEFC) support production and organize an annual documentary film festival, Iran International Documentary Film—Cinéma Vérité. The Iranian Alliance of Motion Picture Guilds has two affiliate societies focusing on documentary production: the Iranian Documentary Filmmakers' Association (IRDFA) and the Association of Iranian Documentary Producers (AIDP). The Iranian Youth Cinema Society (IYCS), with offices around the country, supports young filmmakers' unquenchable desire to express themselves through film. The post-revolution generation is well educated, well read, and politically conscious. They are the ones who will chart the future course of new Iranian cinema.

New information technology has also influenced documentary filmmaking in Iran. Young filmmakers, being cyber-literate, obtain information about international film festivals and take it upon themselves to enter their films and videos into many festivals around the world. Interestingly enough, Rahnema's vision of supporting and nourishing documentary tradition in Iran is augmented by many theoretical discourses in newspapers, journals, and even in government-run television. On a television show, Mostanad-e Chahar/Documentary 4, critics and scholars discuss world documentaries and exchange ideas on film theories. In March 2011, with the beginning of a new year in the Iranian calendar, the state television inaugurated a new channel fully dedicated to showcasing documentary productions. As the filmmaker/scholar Mohammad Tahaminezhad (Iranian Cinema from Constitution Revolution to Sepanta, 1970) has remarked, the third generation of Iranian documentary filmmakers is on the rise. Many of these filmmakers are women with bright careers ahead of them. Indeed, five out of the ten best documentaries produced in 2008 were made by women.

It is indeed very remarkable that with so many obstacles to producing films in Iran, spirited Iranian filmmakers somehow manage to make their films, although the audiences still have to read between the lines. Much of the criticism pointing at the lack of depth and research may be unjustified, considering that many talented Iranian filmmakers, before and after the revolution, have tried to communicate with their audiences through symbols, metaphors and allegorical expressions. Many capable filmmakers have not been mentioned in this brief history, but their efforts are noted and appreciated.

Ireland

Cinematic documentary began in Ireland with Lumière films shot in 1896 and 1897. The cinematograph recorded an urban environment largely undifferentiated from others that it had filmed elsewhere. Dublin and Belfast were simply Victorian cities complete with horse guards, firemen, vehicles, pedestrians, buildings, and monuments; a later film even recorded Queen Victoria's own visit to the capital city. Lumière cameramen neither sought nor found either quaintness or rurality in Ireland, but a series of travelogues followed, including London to Killarney (Cooper, 1907) and Whaling Ashore and Afloat (Paul, 1908). The landscape became the defining feature of Ireland on screen, and its people little more than peasants. Such scenes, recorded in response to the demand for exotic imagery in early cinema, corresponded with popular impressions of the country in paintings and writings dating back to the seventeenth century.

Domestic practitioners, including Louis de Clerq and the Youghal-based James and Thomas Horgan, did not offer anything to detract from the impression of the country as picturesque and quaint. They recorded scenes of Irish people in largely rural environs: attending religious functions, participating at sporting events, engaging in farming activities, all of which made entertaining visuals. The ambitions of filmmakers in this period were understandably limited by predocumentary forms of nonfictional representation. Such films were intended and able to provide only the most cursory of overviews of any place and its people. As such, these travelogues and actualities did not contribute greatly to an understanding of Ireland although they certainly contributed to how people saw it.

Newsreels and newsreel cameramen registered events transpiring on the island of Ireland throughout the first decades of the twentieth century, including the growing political ferment. A specifically Irish newsreel entitled Irish Events ran between 1917 and 1920. The struggle for political independence brought with it a great deal of visual representation, but nothing comparable with the newsreel compilation work pioneered in the Soviet Union by Esfir Shub and Dziga Vertov. There was no analogous sense of the political possibilities of the medium.

By the early 1930s a relatively lively amateur filmmaking community had taken up the challenge of representing the newly independent Ireland. Individuals such as Richard Hayward, Norris Davidson, Desmond Egan, and the famous stills photographer Fr Frank Browne made several short films, but none touched on political subject matter or attempted a more comprehensive overview of issues affecting Ireland and the Irish. On the contrary, as documentary form evolved throughout the 1920s and 1930s, the majority of Irish nonfiction films still concerned themselves with agrarian and touristic subject matter. A notable proportion of these films were directed by priests or other religious leaders. Because they possessed the resources to purchase the equipment, they became the documentarians of contemporary Irish life. It is therefore unsurprising that films such as Aran of the Saints (Catholic Film Society, 1932) and Eucharistic Congress 1932 (Browne, 1932) should depict Ireland as a predominantly religious culture.

Although funded abroad, produced by an Englishman, and directed by an American, Man of Aran (Flaherty, 1934) was initially endorsed as if it were a product of an indigenous Irish cinema. The image of the islanders as rugged, self-reliant people untouched by the concerns of modernity was met with enthusiasm by government officials, who envisioned Ireland on the whole in much the same terms. This position was subsequently treated with indignation by commentators and observers who did not share this view of either the country or of its representation. Few native filmmakers possessed the skills, financial resources, or personal vision of Flaherty, however, meaning that there was little that could be shown as a rejoinder.

In 1936 The Irish Film Society was established. This body attempted to coordinate the activities of indigenous fiction and nonfiction filmmakers. The Film Society encouraged a critical engagement with the medium, which could lead to the evolution of a cinema committed to social and political change. It organised workshops, invited guest speakers from abroad, including Paul Rotha and Michael Powell, and screened European films that the society felt were being neglected in favour of Anglophone cinema. Some of their own films even aspired to political agitation, such as Aiséirghe (O'Leary, 1941), a polemical attack on the love of self-glorification in Irish politics.

State involvement in the production of documentary films began in the 1940s. The National Film Institute (NFI) was established in 1943 and became the official intermediary between filmmakers and government departments. The NFI was initially established with a grant from the department of education, but it was also financially, logistically, and morally supported by the Catholic church. Although not all films produced by the NFI bore the explicit ideological stamp of either church or state, all of them were the product of a tacit collusion between the two, which defined the range and nature of the subject matter.

The first high-profile documentary produced by the NFI was A Nation Once Again (Stafford, 1946), a celebration of the life and ideals of nineteenth-century nationalist Thomas Davis. The film informed audiences that the story of Davis's life was 'not just the story of a man, but the story of a Nation'. The generally modern and progressive portrayal of life in contemporary Ireland was undercut by its constant referral to the past as the moral and ideological centre of that life. The film explicitly linked the political ideals of nineteenth-century nationalism with the modern, industrial, and independent nation of 1946, arguing by inference that the latter owed its existence to the former.

A Nation Once Again set the tone for subsequent state-sponsored films, but it was immediately followed by a counterattack in the form of Our Country (O'Leary, 1947). Director Liam O'Leary was one of the founders of the Irish Film Society. Like Grierson, whom he referred to as 'the brilliant Scot', he was convinced that film could participate in social progress. Writing in Invitation to the Film (Laoghaire 1945), he argued that the cinema needed to be harnessed not to support an 'official' interpretation of Irishness, but to ask questions of it that would encourage improvement. He wrote, 'Our people need the assurance of an inner freedom which we have not yet won.'

Our Country was a direct attack on the government of the day, financed by a newly founded oppositional political party eager for publicity. O'Leary was influenced by Pudovkin and Eisenstein, and sought to shock his audience with raw imagery and juxtaposition through editing. The film featured scenes of children playing barefoot in the slums of inner-city Dublin and scenes of adults seeking passports and emigration visas to leave the country. It dramatised rising inflation using actors and spoke out on health, trade, and the lack of industrial development. Landscape scenes were used only for ironic counterpoint. The Irish countryside was portrayed as an underused resource, not a picturesque panorama.

The film confronted the Irish people with an image of themselves that they had not seen before on screen. It had such an impact that it was debated in the Irish parliament and its maker accused of being a propagandist. Unsurprisingly though, its success as a polemic further galvanised the state's support for sponsored nonfiction films. A series of public information and political propaganda films followed throughout the 1950s, including Housing Discrimination (George Fleischmann, 1953), which used inequalities in the housing policies of the Omagh Rural District Council in Northern Ireland to launch an attack on partition; and Voyage to Recovery (Healy, 1952), an influential docudrama on the treatment of tuberculosis.

Unproblematic nationalism arguably reached its apex with the historical documentary Mise Éire/I am Ireland (Morrison, 1959). Although not a state-sponsored film, it bore all the hallmarks of the rhetorical approach favoured by the majority of NFI documentaries. Director George Morrison assembled what amounted to the official history of the evolution of the Irish State to 1919, which he compiled from newsreels and newspaper clippings. Bolstered by a lush orchestral score composed by Seán O Riada and a voice-over in Gaelic, the film was a nationalist document in every sense. It was both a record and an example of the prevailing attitude to history. Mise Éire was followed by a less popular sequel, Saoirse?/Freedom? (Morrison, 1961), which partly documented the turbulent years following independence. Morrison claimed that its more critical attitude towards its subject led to its box office failure and in effect planned a trilogy that would bring history up to date and examine the failure of 'the bourgeois revolution of 1916'. This claim is not supported by the films as they stand, though, which reinforces the ideology of the 1916 generation on an epic scale.

The introduction of television in 1961 marked the next and most significant turning point. As it did elsewhere, television provided a new market for nonfiction. Although the majority of material produced for television fell within the news/journalism category, the medium provided training and opportunities for a new generation of filmmakers. It also offered a forum for new ideas about the nature of Irish society, usually articulated through chat shows and panel discussions. The early years of television were marked by an oscillation between conservatism and radicalism. Telefis Éireann (later Radio Telefis Éireann, RTÉ) was a semi-state body answerable to a board of political appointees and was permitted to operate subject to the terms of a public service broadcasting mandate. This led to uncertainty as to exactly how much the station could challenge the status quo; most often it chose not to.

Radharc Films was an important contributor to this environment. Radharc was headed by two priests, Fr Joseph Dunne and Fr Des Forristal, and run entirely by religious personnel. The company, which was independent of RTÉ, produced a weekly series entitled Radharc, which dealt with local and international issues. It produced programmes on homelessness and poverty, shot the first film inside an Irish prison, and interviewed prostitutes when such subjects were still extremely taboo. The Radharc philosophy, drawing its inspiration from the parables of Christ, was to allow such stories to teach moral lessons without explicit commentary. The result was, among other things, a document of the changing face of modern Ireland. Inevitably though, the provocative films alternated with less challenging material on missionary work by religious orders, church openings, and pilgrimages to holy shrines.

The most groundbreaking Irish documentary of the 1960s was not made for television, nor has it ever been broadcast. In 1968 Irish-born Peter Lennon, a correspondent for The Guardian, based in France, directed The Rocky Road to Dublin (Lennon, 1968). The film was an angry, personal assault on the crippling effects of church and state on the minds of Irish people. It specifically targeted censorship and education, both of which demonstrated the collusion between the two institutions. Free-form in style, combining elements of cinéma vérité, rhetorical form, and personal cine-essay, the film was influenced by the experiments of the French New Wave. It used a combination of observation and direct address to point out how hypocrisy and 'bad habit' had made the people of Ireland incapable of thinking for themselves. Among its more striking images was one of a small boy so indoctrinated by religious education that he is able to recite a damning condemnation of humanity's predilection for sin. The film later poses a rhetorical question on the subject of this boy and his classmates: 'What will they grow up to be?'

The Rocky Road to Dublin was financed by freelance American producer Victor Herbert and photographed by acclaimed cinematographer Raoul Coutard. It achieved some notoriety following its screening at the Cannes Film Festival. Its defiant attack on such powerful institutions and its call for radical change made it something of a mascot for the striking students of May 1968, who screened it at the Sorbonne. The film was hailed by Cahiers du Cinéma as a masterpiece. Suspicious of its status as a tool of rebellion, the mainstream Irish media were largely unresponsive. Although Lennon appeared on television, where he was attacked for his attitude towards the church, the film itself ran only in one art house cinema in Dublin. It was never distributed to rural areas. Many cinema owners had either direct links or strong friendships with clergy. Without any specific words being spoken, the film was quietly banned from theatrical distribution. RTE chose not to broadcast it because of the 'sensitive' nature of the subject matter.

The 1970s saw a great deal of activity in Irish documentary, if little further radicalism. Filmmakers such as Bob Quinn, Louis Marcus, Kieran Hickey, and Patrick Carey directed films that won attention and awards at international film festivals. There was also a steady stream of corporate-produced and magazine-style film and television work that documented and explored much of the history, heritage, and traditions of the Irish nation. Very little of it attempted to interrogate or question. Some of those that did—such as The Family (Quinn, 1978), charting the alternative lifestyle of a hippie commune living in the west of Ireland, and the docudrama Our Boys (Black, 1981), featuring interviews with men who suffered physical abuse at Christian Brothers Schools in their childhood—were not broadcast.

In the 1980s a number of films began to find new ways of circumventing censorship and conservatism. Bob Quinn succeeded in challenging convention with his three-part documentary Atlantean (Quinn, 1984), which used humour to mask its serious concerns about the nature of representation. On the surface it covered similar ground to many of its less radical predecessors. The film purported to explore the anthropological and sociological history of the Irish people, but Quinn used his audience's familiarity with this material to confound expectation.

He argued in favour of an 'Atlantean' culture that embraced roots in North Africa and Europe. He was able to use this historical investigation to question assumptions about the ethnic and cultural uniqueness of the Irish race. He used irony as a polemical tool to undermine both form and content, ultimately turning the focus on history itself and the processes of ideology that define that history.

The Road to God Knows Where (Gilsenan, 1988) took up the mantle of postmodernist fragmentation as a tool of political and aesthetic radicalism. Twenty-eight-year-old Alan Gilsenan directed the film as part of a series of Irish-themed documentaries broadcast by Channel 4(UK). The film focused on the experience of being young and Irish in the 1980s, a time of widespread unemployment and high emigration. Like Lennon and Quinn before him, Gilsenan applied a mixture of techniques to draw attention to paradoxes and contradictions. Like O'Leary, Gilsenan used shocking imagery to strip away the illusions proffered by state-run promotional authorities. Shots of dirty-faced children, rubbish-strewn fields, and abandoned factories were intercut with upbeat commentaries on the traditional values and hospitality of the Irish nation. Bizarre, surreal inserts and cut-aways featuring irrelevant title cards, musicians, and a routine by a stand-up comic contributed to the atmosphere of parody and self-reflexivity. The reaction from official sources was predictably hostile. The Industrial Development Authority, charged with encouraging investment in Ireland at home and abroad, publicly criticised the film, which nonetheless received a screening on Irish television and became a focal point for discussion of the issues it raised.

The 1990s was a time of widespread change in Ireland and there was a corresponding shift in the subject matter tackled by nonfiction film. Issues such as AIDS, prostitution, abortion, homosexuality, and divorce were addressed by filmmakers, including Gilsenan, Liam McGrath, Hilary Dully, Trish McAdam, and Donald Taylor Black. Quinn and Marcus continued to produce work, whereas Belfast-born John T. Davis eschewed what he termed 'wallpaper' documentaries in favour of more personal and reflective subject matter in films like The Uncle Jack (Davis, 1996). Dear Daughter (Lentin, 1996) was arguably the most influential film of the decade because of its opening up of the issue of the abuse in state-run institutions during the early and middle decades of the twentieth century. Dear Daughter was stylistically notable for its use of reflexive reconstruction. The flashbacks were filmed with the adult women in the actual locations reenacting routines and rituals from their childhood while describing their feelings then and now. This device made explicit the links between past hurt and present trauma and won sympathy for the subject. The film marked a turning point in the debate on these issues in public and led to several others, including States of Fear (Raftery, 1999), that implicated the government as well as the religious orders.

Although documentarists consequently enjoyed unprecedented freedom to tackle contentious subject matter, they often chose uninteresting ways to do so. Stylistic innovation declined. The feminist historiography Hoodwinked (McAdam, 1997) was little more than a string of talking heads, and the much hyped five-part series The Irish Empire (Gilsenan, Walsh, Roberts, 1999) was more like a tourist documentary than a study of the neocolonial mind of the 'Celtic Tiger' Irish. Even the long-anticipated sequel to The Road to God Knows Where, Road II (Gilsenan, 2001) was conventional and unrewarding. Gilsenan's other efforts, such as Julie's Story (Gilsenan, 1999) on crime writer Julie Parsons, and Private Dancer (Gilsenan, 2001) on lap dancing in Dublin, were indistinguishable from any number of magazine-style programmes broadcast by RTÉ. The new documentary of revelation and investigation was arguably as much the product of a hyper-stimulated postmodern televisual environment as it was the result of an awareness of the potential of the medium to penetrate beneath the surface. In spite of a century of development, Irish documentary had not progressed much beyond the unproblematic relationship between the utterance and its meaning established seventy years earlier. Documentary therefore still operates on a primarily rhetorical level in contemporary Ireland, and remains part of an infrastructure of public discourse incorporating radio, television, print, and cinema. Many individual films and filmmakers are remarkable in the context of the national production environment, but only a few have embraced the medium with sufficient passion and enthusiasm to produce outstanding work on a global scale.

Isaacs, Jeremy

Sir Jeremy Isaacs has contributed to documentary film as producer, filmmaker, executive, and even film subject.

Isaacs is recognized as an accomplished documentary producer and filmmaker, having worked on the celebrated The World at War (1974–5), Ireland: A Television History (1981), and The Cold War (1998).

As Controller of Features at Thames Television until 1974, Isaacs made a lyrical programme very much in the tradition of Humphrey Jennings and John Gray. Till I End My Song celebrated the river Thames and demonstrated Isaacs's ability to combine engaging narrative and storytelling with attention to detail, accuracy, and realism.

Subsequently, he was the driving force behind The World at War, which was based on the earlier newsreel All Our Yesterdays, on which Isaacs had worked. The series offered a variety of perspectives articulated by combatants from opposing sides and used previously unseen footage. A significant number of World War II participants, witnesses, and policymakers were interviewed for the film. In its weaving together of a narrative that paid attention to the human as well as the strategic and the political, Isaacs produced a documentary series that holds our attention and holds up well.

Later, Isaacs produced The Cold War for Turner Broadcasting. Again, he sought to create a pluralist model that allowed for a diversity of voices to be heard and represented. The programme makers were able to interview an extraordinary variety of people, including former spies, heads of state, policy advisers such as Robert McNamara, and soldiers.

Isaacs was also the founding Chief Executive of the UK's Channel 4 from 1981 to 1987. During his tenure he ensured that Britain's broadcasting culture became more diverse and innovative. As Chief Executive of Channel 4, Isaacs was instrumental in allocating broadcasting slots. Although Channel 4 is not generally recognized for groundbreaking documentaries, some notable documentaries did reach the screen during Isaacs's tenure. These include Vietnam—A Television History (1983), Redbrick (1986), 11th Hour (1997), and Writing on the Wall (1996).

Isaacs went on to act as General Director of London's Royal Opera House from 1988 to 1996. However, he remained connected to the world of documentary during this time. He was a primary subject of the documentary film The Royal Opera House—Behind the Scenes (commonly referred to as The House), in which the cameras were trained on the day-to-day operations of the opera house. The resultant series exposed the dramas and melodramas behind the stage as infighting on camera exposed the political and creative tensions inherent in the running of an opera house.

In this, as in the other aspects of his career, Isaacs can be said to have contributed to and enhanced our understanding of contemporary Britain through entertaining and informative documentaries and programming.

ROBERT BEVERIDGE

Biography

Born in Glasgow in 1932. Educated at Merton College, Oxford. Went on to produce some of the most significant historical documentaries made for British television, such as The World At War (1974–5, 26 episodes), Ireland: A Television History (1981), and The Cold War (1998). After being Director of Programmes at Thames Television, appointed as the founding Chief Executive of Channel 4 (1981–7), where he established its character. Between 1988 and 1996 Isaacs was General Director of London's Royal Opera House, where he allowed filming for the documentary The Royal Opera House—Behind the Scenes.

Israel

This entry follows chronologically the evolution of documentary filmmaking in Israel. Through key directors and films it pays particular attention to their various modes of address: from the early propagandistic Zionist Socialist films that dominated documentary film production until the 1950s, through the self-reflexive and politically detached artistic films of the 1960s, to the radical and critical politicization found in documentaries of the 1970s and 1980s, culminating in the more recent postmodern, subversive, multicultural documentaries. It also follows the films' evolving treatment of the ongoing dominant themes of Israel's conflict with the Palestinians, of interethnic tensions among Jews, and of the figuration of the Holocaust. Finally, whenever relevant, the films are placed within their extra-textual historical context.

Israeli documentary filmmaking began well before Israel's independence in 1948. It can be traced back to the beginnings of the twentieth century with the cinematic documentation of the land of Israel/Palestine and its people from a Zionist perspective. The early documentaries, made by solitary pioneers dedicated to the Zionist cause, such as Murray Rosenberg (Ha'seret Harishon Shel Palestina/The First Film of Palestine, 1911) or Ya'acov Ben-Dov (Eretz Israel Ha'mit'oreret/The Awakening Land of Israel, 1923), were commissioned for production or contracted for distribution by Zionist organizations, and were mostly screened in front of Jewish communities worldwide or at Zionist conventions. (The First Film of Palestine was shown to enthusiastic delegates to the 10th Zionist Congress held in Basel, Switzerland in 1911.) The thirst among Jewish communities abroad for sights of the 'Holy Land', along with the strong ideological orientation of the filmmakers and the bodies that sponsored them, led to an embellished image of the land and documentaries took the form of travelogues. The Awakening Land of Israel, for example, commissioned by the Jewish National Fund, follows a Jewish American tourist (Mr Bloomberg) and his local guide (Pnueli) as they tour the country—a tour that persuades the wealthy Bloomberg to settle in the country. This storyline serves as an excuse to show an overall sequence of documentary images that move from different Jewish historical sites such as the Wailing Wall in Jerusalem (emphasizing the historical connection of Jews to the land), through images of the general desolation of the land (presented as primeval, mostly empty and wild, generally disregarding the Arab population), and on to Jewish new towns, kibbutzim, and prominent political figures of the Yishuv ('settlement') as the growing Jewish community in Palestine called itself (emphasizing the redemption of the land of the forefathers by the Zionist movement).

The strong Zionist ideological orientation of these early documentaries was reproduced in the more prolific documentary filmmaking of the 1930s. The main divergence of these latter documentaries consists in their explicit formal and thematic framing of the Zionist project as socialist, and in their focus on Sabras (native-born Jews) or on Jews who had 'shed' their diaspora and 'nonproductive' way of life, in favor of communal life and manual, mostly agricultural, labor. This ideological reorientation resulted both from the growing predominance of Zionist socialist parties in the Yishuv, and from the fact that the major filmmakers of this period, Nathan Axelrod and Baruch Agadati, were Russian Jewish immigrants strongly influenced by the Russian revolution and by the montage experiments of Soviet filmmakers. Hence, Agadati's Zot Hi Ha'aretz/This is the Land (1933) is complexly and dynamically structured along the lines of Vertov's and Eisenstein's montage sequences. Shifting back and forth from past to future it contrasts the past aridity of a ruined and uninhabited land with images of a present filled with a vast multitude of Jews and of industrial plants working at full steam, culminating in a call to leave the cities in favor of collective agricultural work on the kibbutz. The fetishization of work recurs in other films of the period, particularly in Helmer Lerski's impressive film Avoda/Work (1933), which is dominated by close-ups of workers' shoes, legs, muscular hands, and smiling heads in dynamic cross-cuts with parts of modern machinery. Likewise, one of the dominant scenes in Axelrod's travelog Oded Hanoded/Oded the Wanderer (1933), about a Sabra boy who travels the land after having wandered away from his classmates during a school trip, shows images that emphasize the fertility of the Valley of Jezreel and offers a Soviet-styled montage sequence of collective agricultural work. The sequence contrasts other images showing the backwardness of the Bedouins and the arid terrain they inhabit. This emphasizes the social and material progress that the Zionist project will bring to the region, a theme recurring in other films of the period, such as in Alexander Ford's Tzabar/Sabra (1933). This latter film, the fictional part of which focuses on an escalating conflict between Jews and Arabs over water during a drought, a conflict resolved when water gushes from the Jews' well for the benefit of all, culminates in a documentary Soviet-styled montage epilogue showing tractors plowing the land and harvesting rows of orange trees and other images of the fertile land, overlapped by the silhouettes of agricultural workers marching up a hill toward a utopian future. This early 1930s blossoming of documentary film production sharply declined during the second part of the decade and throughout 1945. This was due to lack of funds for production, mostly brought about by the Zionist organizations' allocation of funds to secure and expand the Yishuv during the Arab riots that spread throughout the country from 1936 to 1939, followed by the economic burden on the Yishuv brought about by World War II. During these difficult years the major venue for documentary production came in the form of Axelrod's weekly newsreel Carmel (after Agadati's competing Aga Newsreel Company went bankrupt). Differing from most documentary productions, Carmel newsreels were funded through commercials and offered a constant flow of news about building projects, road construction, political events, and other aspects of life in the Yishuv. The Carmel newsreels enjoyed high popularity among moviegoers who craved local news. They continued to be produced almost uninterrupted well into the 1950s. (In 1951 Baruch Agadati's brother Yitzhak and others started a competing newsreel called Hadshot Geva/Geva News.) Newsreels were one of the most enduring and prolific documentary sources at the time. They signaled the ongoing importance of news for Israelis still evidenced today in the ever-expanding time slots allocated to television news.

Following the end of World War II and the arrival of Holocaust survivors in the Yishuv, several semi-documentaries were produced that dealt with them. Henceforward the Holocaust became one of the major themes in Israeli filmmaking. The fictional part of these early films on the subject was aimed primarily at justifying the need for a Jewish State following the Nazi atrocities, hardly mentioning the horrors of the Holocaust. There was concern with the integration of the emotionally scarred survivors into Israeli society through their transformation into Israelis by fighting in war or working the land within a collective (e.g. Helmer Lerski's film Adama/Earth, 1946, or Herbert Klein's Beit Avi/My Father's House, 1946). What stands out in these semi-documentaries is the plethora of documentary images panning an open and fertile land, literally engulfing the fictional protagonists. These images, apparently unrelated to the narrative, are presumed to infuse into the survivor a sense of liberation from the claustrophobic, terrifying past of the ghettos and death camps still resonating in his mind. The films, however, by not offering a view of the land from a survivor's point of view, maintained an image of the survivor as alien to the land, hence inadvertently countering the ideological thrust of the fictional narrative and indexing the failure of the latter's societal integration at the time.

The establishment of the State in 1948 amid war with the Arab world generated deep changes in the socioeconomic and political structure developed during the pre-State period. These changes were due to Israel's new geopolitical situation within the region and the doubling of the Jewish population within three years of independence (1949–51) following the massive immigration of Jews from Islamic lands. (Jews from Islamic lands are known as Mizrahim in Israel, as opposed to Jews from Eastern European or Western origin, who are called Ashkenazim.) Heading these drastic shifts in Israel's sociopolitical structure and undergoing a correlated political and ideological change was the Mapai (Hebrew acronym for Workers' Party of the Land of Israel) party, under the leadership of David Ben-Gurion. The Mapai shifted its pre-State hegemonic yet sectarian Zionist-socialist policy to what was termed Statism (Mamlachtyut). Statist policy resulted in the consolidation of Mapai's dominance over the State apparatus and allowed for the rapid industrialization of the country in the course of absorbing the massive immigration. This process, one of the major consequences of which was the correlation of ethnic origin and class, led to a reorientation of the State's dominant ideology. Hence, statist ideology, while still clinging to socialist rhetoric, shifted the image of the Sabra from being the native-born socialist revolutionary agent of Zionism to his becoming an ethno-mixed Jew who is a loyal citizen and soldier. This policy found cinematic expression in a civil servant attitude by Israeli documentaries. Gone were the embellished utopian revolutionary images. These documentaries, mostly funded by governmental agencies and Israel's leading workers' union (Ha'Histadrut) often recorded in neorealist style the hardships of the daily life of recently arrived immigrants, as in Leopold Lahola's docudrama Ir Ha'Ohalim/Tent City (1955), or in Nathan Gross's Brit Damim/Blood Covenant (1954). However, these hardships were explained away by the use of optimistic music and a patronizing voice-over narration that absolved the government of any wrongdoing by blaming the diaspora past for present hardships and ethnic strife, and by presenting through low-angled shots the government's officials and bureaucrats as detached, authoritative, and yet kind and dedicated civil servants. The films also promised a brighter future by showing through accelerating rhyming editing patterns the ethnically varied citizenry harmoniously joining hands in different projects carried out during the 1950s rapid industrialization of the country.

The expansion of the urban middle class in the early sixties—brought about by the types of trades characterizing the post-State massive immigration, along with the gradual shift in the government's econopolitical orientation toward a free market economy, and the relative geopolitical calm of the period—outdated the Statist pseudo-socialist rhetoric of the government and distanced the cultural establishment from the government. Notions of art for art's sake began to gradually exchange the politically committed and propagandistic characteristics of cultural production during the Yishuv and the first decade of the State. A new generation of filmmakers influenced by the French New Wave began to produce self-reflexive films dealing with interpersonal relations rather than large sociopolitical or geopolitical issues. This new approach also influenced the documentary films commissioned by governmental agencies, which expected effective propaganda but received instead self-reflexive and subjective films such as David Greenberg's documentary Sha'ar Ha'Gai (1965), or David Perlov's Be'Yerushalaim/In Jerusalem (1963). In Jerusalem, for example, rather than showing in an 'objective' manner the holy places with appropriate pathetic voice-over narration, showed beggars in the holy city (based on the Midrash that says the Messiah will appear from among them), documented hidden corners from oblique angles, interviewed incidental bystanders in the streets about their daily personal affairs, and offered experimental correlations of sound and image (as in a jump-cut edited sequence where a group of children smile at the camera and repeatedly ask the filmmaker to picture them). This often led to the commissioning bodies' rejection of the films produced and the further alienation of the filmmakers from the Establishment. Perlov, in particular, having experienced institutional rejection (In Jerusalem was rejected on the grounds that it showed beggars in Jerusalem), after the October War in 1973 began producing a personal low-budget diary. For over ten years he recorded his daily life, his family and friends, the streets surrounding his apartment, the television screen in his salon through which he inserted sociopolitical events, and different visual experiments dealing with the relation of film to other arts and to life. He accompanied his images with a poetic first-person narration, creating in sum a series of films called Yoman/Diary that offer a fascinating document about the relations between private and public life in Israel.

While fiction films of the 1970s continued the personal and sociopolitically detached self-reflexive experimentation that had begun in the 1960s, some of the same filmmakers began to produce documentaries in which they inscribed a growing criticism of Israeli society and politics. In films such as Igal Burstyn's Muhammad Yktzor/Muhammad Will Harvest (1972), and Judd Ne'eman's Histaklut Al Acco/Observing Acre (1975), they reacted to the drastic changes brought about by Israel's occupation of the West Bank and Gaza Strip along with its million and a half Palestinian inhabitants following the War in 1967. Even earlier, as in Tzempel Yeshurun's film Beur Ha'Ba'arut/Eradicating Ignorance (1965), they reacted to the escalating ethnic social unrest brought about by the growing resentment felt by Mizrahi Jews toward the Labor government, which they considered responsible for their low income and inferior social status. What characterizes these documentaries is their use of the formal disruption characteristic of French New Wave films to articulate a poetical and personal sense of an incumbent catastrophe awaiting a fragmented unjust society. Ne'eman's documentary Observing Acre, primarily located in a mental hospital, likens the situation of the Arab-Jewish mixed city of Acre to that of the mentally ill patients observed by the camera at the hospital. These observation sessions are intercut with two other major locations: the enclosed apartment of a bourgeois Jew comfortably disconnected from his surroundings, and the poor crowded house of a resentful Arab family whose property was confiscated by the government. The abrupt intercuts, the use of jump-cuts, and the often asynchronous combination of sound and image impart a sense of troubling disharmony and looming catastrophe.

The 1970s documentaries predicted the political overturn in the 1977 elections that brought to power for the first time the right-wing Likud party after the sixty-year hegemony of Labor parties. The main reasons for the latter's downfall were the disillusion of traditional Labor party voters by a government that had failed to predict the outbreak of the 1973 October war (which resulted in unprecedented casualties on the Israeli side), the government's undecided stand on the future of the territories occupied after the 1967 war, and the translation of the resentment felt toward the Labor party by Mizrahim into a massive vote for Likud. This overturn shocked the Labor-leaning parts of the populace and led to a radical politization of culture in general and of films in particular. The main focus of a barrage of fiction films produced during the 1980s was on criticism of the unjust ramifications of the Israeli occupation of the densely Palestinian-populated West Bank and Gaza Strip, particularly following the right-wing government's intensification of Jewish settlements in these territories and Israel's invasion of Lebanon in 1982. However, while the criticism of fiction films was confined to a narrow melodramatic moral resentment and reflected the overall paralysis of the left in their dead-end tragic conception of reality, documentary films of the period offered a complex, critical, and detailed analysis of the situation and its history using innovative documentary strategies of articulation. The most radical, comprehensive, and cinematically complex documentary production dealing with the Israeli–Palestinian conflict during the 1980s can be found in Amos Gitai's trilogy Wadi (1980), Bait/House (1980), and Yoman Sadeh/Field Diary (1982). In House, for example, which also means 'home' and even 'homeland' for Israelis, Gitai inquires into the changing ownership of a house in ruins currently in the midst of intense renovation. As it turns out, the house, recently purchased from a Jewish Mizrahi couple by an Ashkenazi economics professor, was originally the property of an Arab Palestinian family that had fled the country during the war in 1948 and was declared absentee property by the government. The house history, concisely encapsulating the main geopolitical and sociopolitical conflicts and power relations generated by the Zionist project, is articulated through a series of interviews shot on location. These are carried out with an impassive camera that records the interviewees, the house, and its surroundings in very lengthy, often recursive long shots. The camera, often leaving the interviewees in order to wander around on its own, comments, recontextualizes, and 'relativizes' the different perspectives of the house owner, the Palestinian workers who are rebuilding the house, and others, while clearly placing the camera on the side of the repressed Palestinian workers whose poor dwellings in a refugee camp are inserted into the film.

The 'surprising' outbreak of the first Palestinian intifada in 1989 also marked the end of the 1980s massive Israeli film production on the subject of the Israeli–Palestinian conflict. This may have been due to the shock of recognition on the part of Israeli filmmakers that their moralistic stand was somewhat futile, that the Palestinians had now taken matters into their own hands, and that for the Palestinians the Israeli leftist Labor positions articulated in most fiction films were part of the problem and not its solution. In any event, documentary films of the 1990s evidenced a process of introspection and historical revision, along with a postmodern-typed problematization of documentary production. These films, produced by a new generation of documentary filmmakers, are low-budget and are often personal diaries, such as Amit Goren's film about his ramified family, entitled '66 Haita Shana Tova Le'Tayarut/'66 Was a Good Year for Tourism (1992), or Dan Katsir's Yatsati Lechapes Ahava ... Techef Ashuv/Out for Love ... Be Back Soon (1997), which correlates his personal story with the events that led to the assassination of Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin in 1995. Other filmmakers give voice and images to society's silenced 'others'. Hence, Michal Aviad's Jenny ve Jenny/Jenny and Jenny (1997) documents from a feminist perspective the oppressed mentality of two lower-class sisters growing up in a broken home; Tsipi Reibenbach's Ha'Bchira Ve Ha'Goral/Choice and Destiny (1993) offers disturbing and moving testimonies of Holocaust survivors focusing on the psychological traces left by the Holocaust experience; David Ben-Shitrit's Ruach Kadim/East Wind (2002) and Mi'Baad le Realat Ha'Galut/Through the Veil of Exile (1992) gives voice to militant Mizrahi Jews and Palestinian Women; July Shlez's Sanjin (1992) documents the hardships and alienation felt by recently arrived Ethiopian Jewish immigrants; and Asher Tlalim's Al Tig'u li Ba'Shoah/Don't Touch My Holocaust (1994) deals among other things with the effects of the dominant state discourse on the Holocaust upon three of society's others: an Israeli Arab and a Mizrahi Jew who had never experienced it nor had family members involved in it, and a female Holocaust survivor. One of the more original filmmakers of the past decade, whose peculiar filmmaking evidences the new postmodern trends in Israeli documentaries and which returns to cardinal societal conflicts, is Avi Mugarbi. His films Eich Hifsakti Lefached ve'Lamadeti lehitgaber al Ha'Pachad Ve'Le'ehov et Sharon/How I Learned to Overcome My Fear and Love Arik Sharon (1997) and August (2002) are radical, first-person, disjunctive narratives often telling deceitful stories about the filmmaker's personal life, political positions, and lies that nevertheless reveal some deeper truth (e.g. he deceitfully depicts how, as he documents his following of Arik Sharon's election campaign, he slowly becomes one of his devotees, while his wife decides to leave him). In addition, through the use of various cinematic devices such as back motion or loops, he provides powerful commentaries on political aspirations or realities (e.g. using reverse motion to ironize the unfeasible, though perceived as morally justifiable Palestinian desire to cancel the Zionist project, or looping a conflictual encounter between Palestinians and Israeli soldiers in order to convey the deadlocked situation of both peoples). Mugarbi's self-conscious, self-reflexive, nomadic, deceitful, funny, ironic, and intrusive mode of filmmaking, using the home-movie format (he usually wanders alone with his camera, intruding into various forbidden places and interviewing people in a provocative way, which often leads to his being expelled or hit), depicts a disturbing clownish character of our time, offering a postmodern yet effectively subversive approach to Israeli reality.

Italy

Italian critics have long deplored the inability of their country to offer serious, engrossing documentaries comparable to those of English-speaking nations. However, statistically, Italy is able to compete with the cinematic production of most countries. Reliable figures for the first half of the twentieth century are lacking, but it is known that after 1950 more than twenty thousand shorts were produced for the cinema only, without including those made for television.

Money was never lacking. Documentary filmmakers met with permanent support from public authorities and private sponsors. The Italian government began early to collect and circulate shorts likely to improve the country's image abroad. In 1924 various offices created l'Unione Cinematografica Educativa (Cinematic Union for Education), the acronym of which, LUCE, means Light. The Union aimed to produce and diffuse documentaries. Fascism nationalized it two years later to make LUCE its propaganda tool. The Luce Institute has often been paralleled with the General Post Office (GPO) Film Unit. Both were state institutions entrusted with informing and educating the public by way of film, but LUCE had no Grierson and its staff fluctuated according to fascism's wavering politics. Theoretically it echoed official instructions and many of its pictures were mere celebrations of Mussolini. The aim of its documentaries was to obtain mass approval for the projected deeds of the regime. Many were artistic transformations of reality. For instance, boys in uniform worked industriously to let the camaraman shoot enough material and then left.

However, the lack of a coherent management gave filmmakers relative independence. As a public institution LUCE benefited from abundant funds; the members of the GPO Film Unit could envy the technical facilities granted to the LUCE. Working there was easy and the LUCE films, even when they were basely sycophantic, were of outstanding quality. One of the prerequisites for becoming a film director was to have made a documentary, and many who would participate in the revival of Italian cinema after the war acquired their skills at LUCE.

LUCE's movies aroused spectators' interest in documentaries, and soon private production companies found it profitable to invest in shorts. In 1938 a group of journalists and technicians founded the Industria Corto Metragio (Shorts Industry, known as INCOM), which emulated LUCE. The screening of a documentary in any film show became compulsory in 1941 and five years later it was stipulated that shorts should get three percent of the takings. This meant that a short that had cost its producer two million lire could bring in ten times the initial investment. The production of documentaries boomed, reaching its peak in 1955 with one thousand one hundred and thirty-two films. INCOM made much money by leasing its pictures at bargain prices; exhibitors jumped at the offer and the three percent amply covered the cost. Sponsored by big firms, INCOM became the employers' mouthpiece. Anxious to hold the scales even between workers and employers, in 1951 the government opened the Centro di Documentazione Della Presidenza del Consiglio (Prime Minister's Documentation Centre), which produced documentaries such as Braccia e lavoro/Arms and Work (1952), Terra nova/New Land (1954), and Conquiste del Sud/Conquest of the South (1954), advertising the governmental efforts to maintain the traditions while modernizing the country. The Prime Minister had fifteen lorries traveling throughout the southern provinces and projecting shorts in villages deprived of cinema. Their screenings were said to have been attended by three million spectators in 1953. In 1956 a special office was created entrusted with making documentaries for the newly born television. Television has since been a voracious client of factual films.

Critics' pessimism about Italian documentaries can be linked to the fact that film experts have always relied on neorealism to represent Italian reality. Cesare Zavattini (1902–89), who was the main theoretician of neorealism and of documentary films, laid down strict rules. Cinema, he wrote, 'must tell reality as if it were a story', any fact 'creates its own fiction, in its own particular sense'. Take a real event, a real situation that 'lasts perhaps two minutes'; with such material you must 'make a two-hour film' so as to open 'a vast and complex world rich in importance and value, in its practical, social, economic, psychological motives'.

There were two periods in the evolution of Italian factual films, the divide occurring in about 1960. However, the most significant types of documentaries developed all along the twentieth century. Their typical features are best explained by the situation of the country when the movies were born. The political unification achieved in 1871 was purely nominal; the peninsula was split in unequally developed and often isolated provinces. In the richest regions, Piedmont and Lombardy, motor industry, chemistry, and hydroelectricity were as advanced as in Britain or Germany. In search of clients, these factories soon had to recourse to using film to advertise their goods within and without Italy's frontiers. Tourism—prosperous in the Alps, in Tuscany, and on the Riviera—did the same. The shipping industry, religious missions, and the search for employment took many Italians abroad, some of whom used films to account for their traveling.

Industrial publicity, tourism, and observation of local customs were the themes of the first documentaries and created traditions that are still in place today. Before World War I not only big companies (e.g. chemical conglomerates, department store chains, and car manufacturers) but also small firms making ceramics and furniture ordered advertisement shorts. The sponsoring of big firms resulted in the making of a series of remarkable documents. Ilva metal works subsidized Col ferro e col fuoco/With Iron and Fire (1926), which described the whole process of iron production from the mine to the manufactured article. Giorgio Ferrari's I figli del carbone/The Sons of Coal (1939) was a highly sophisticated film filled with technical information about coal's chemical by-products. Gianni Paolucci's La nave/The Ship (1935), developed in a diary fashion against the background of shipping docks and the building of a liner, and Umberto Barbaro's I cantieri dell'Adriatico/Adriatic Shipyards (1932) asserted the bright situation of Italian shipbuilding. The long series of movies sponsored by Fiat exemplified the quality of industrial documents. In the first (1922), two newlyweds visit the Fiat factory and follow the construction of a car; when it is finished they jump into it and leave. The film managed to show an assembly line, which was new to Europe in the early 1920s, and a vehicle built personally for Fiat's customers. In the second movie (1926), a plane flies over the test-drive platform on top of the gigantic Lingotto plant; then spectators see the new cars and rush onto the same platform before going all over the workshops. This movie was regarded as being so good that it was widely circulated in foreign countries. No other European car factory did the same at the time.

After the war the impressive takeoff of Italian industry was emphasized by a wealth of documentaries. One of the most significant operations was the order of a three-part film given to the famous Dutch filmmaker Joris Ivens by ENI, the state petroleum company. L'Italia non è un paese povero/Italy Is Not a Poor Country (1959) was a brilliant picture, an evocation of the exploitation of methane in the peninsula, told as a grand epic and likely to put Italy at the head of modern, rich countries. Ivens's work was the most conspicuous among a long series in which stood out Vittorio Gallo's Acciaio/Steel (1951), Ugo Suiata's Zolfara/Sulfur mine (1949), and Virgilio Sabel's Ricerche del metano/Searching for Methane (1951). For the Edison plant in Riva Ermano, Olmi shot Costruzioni meccaniche Riva/Mechanical Engineering Factories Riva (1956) and Venezia città moderna/Venice Modern City (1958), in which the changes affecting a laguna were illustrated by a parallel editing between San Marco and the factories. Managerial advertisement looked so important that film companies, banks, and big firms created an international festival of industrial films held in Monza since 1957. In the 1960s no fewer than twelve shorts dealing with steel were sent to Monza. Television offered factories new opportunities, especially from 1957, when Italian public television networks became partially financed by publicity. Enumerating all the programs dealing with industry, trade, and agriculture would be tedious. Suffice it to say that well-known directors participated in this endeavor, most notably Luciano Emmer with Noi e l'automobile/Us and the Car (1962) and Bernardo Bertolucci with Le vie del petrolio/The Routes of Petroleum (1966).

Tourism, which had long brought Italy great wealth, had been carefully advertised abroad since the beginning of the nineteenth century. Cinema was spontaneously used to supplement posters, leaflets, and press articles. In about 1910 shorts describing the most renowned cities and landscapes were available and were distributed in foreign countries. When Messina was destroyed by an earthquake in 1908 a film company was able to edit a picture comparing the state of the city before and after the tragedy. Taking into account visitors' prejudices, most directors, indulging in stereotypes, reduced the peninsula to the Alpine lakes and summits, the Tuscan pines and hills, and the Riviera seaside resorts. Only a few attempted to go beyond such routine. Luca Comerio's impressive views of the Alps gave birth to an important vein of mountain films. Corrado d'Errico, with Stramilano/Supermilan (1929) and Ritmi di stazione/Station's Rhythms (1933), and Mario Danicelli with La storia di ogni giorno/Everyday Story (1942) portrayed Milan as a center of frenzied activity. Conversely, Marios Costa's Fontane di Roma/Fountains of Rome (1938) and Pini di Roma/Pines of Rome (1941), disregarding Rome's historical past and religious present, disclosed the most intimate, popular aspects of the city. Luciano Emmer's Racconto da un affresco/Story Taken from a Fresco (1938) and Il paradiso terrestre/The Earthly Paradise (1941) visited old paintings as if they were telling entrancing stories. These were exceptions. Hastily shot, using typical landscapes to produce a sentimental or dramatic impression, mechanically exploring a monument or a statue, completing countless films in studios with classical music and boring explanations have been screened in cinemas and continue to this day. As a whole, they equate to two-fifths of the documentaries made in Italy.

Missionaries sent abroad, explorers or officers commissioned by the state or by a trade company to explore parts of Africa had formerly taken photographs and converted quickly to cinema. Missionaries hoped that their images would move the wealthy, politicians, and business people to persuade public opinion that it was worth building a colonial empire in the black continent. The Salesians went as far as to register a film production company that edited and circulated their pictures. Others worked with commercial studios. Numerous shorts on missions were shown in church halls during the first half of the century. Military films such as the anonymous La presa di Zuara/The Storming of Zuara (1913) or Romolo Marcellini's Legionari al secondo parallelo/Legionnaires at the Second Parallel (1938) illustrated Italian presence in Africa. In the late 1930s many documentaries were shot exclusively for the domestic audience and served to reinforce its self-confidence. The impression left by such films was that Mussolini had launched a victorious colonial policy, the success of which was assured because of the technical superiority of the Italian army and economy. Beside these propaganda works, a few pictures documented local traditions and lifestyles, notably Gino Ceruti's Fiamme abissine/Abyssinian Flames (1921) and an interesting description of old customs in Eritrea and Attilio Gatti's Siliva Zulu (1928) on ritual dances in Zululand.

Exploration documentaries met with a favorable response. Anthropology had developed early in Italy—the first university chair was founded in 1870 and a museum opened a few years later in Florence. Anthropologists were photographers, making constant use of pictures in their research, giving it the same importance as the gathering of data. However, since anthropology was conceived as a study of 'primitive' countries, little was done in Italy. The only serious attempt was Giacomo Pozzi Bellini's Il pianto delle zitelle/The Spinners' Lamentation (1939), a documentary on a yearly procession from the village of Vallepietra in Lazio to the sanctuary of the Holy Trinity in the neighboring Abruzzi. The commentary was reduced to a few introductory words, the soundtrack was filled with the cantilenas sung by women. Shooting as close as possible, the camera focused on faces, legs, arm gesticulation, and body attitudes. Such simplicity was rare at the time.

World War II put an end to the colonial dream; attention shifted from Africa to remote parts of Italy considered unexplored territories. Michelangelo Antonioni is often seen as a pioneer in the field. In 1943 he shot Gente del Po/People of the Po (only edited and released in 1947). Visiting the lower valley of the Po River, Antonioni had been struck by a muddled landscape where he could find no structure and where the few, very poor inhabitants seemed lost in dampness. Starting from the river, wandering through marshy grounds, he conjured up a cold, humid, hopeless landscape and observed a small group of fishermen, always taken from afar as if they were emerging from their hostile environment. Sober, perfectly framed, cleverly contrasting the water of the river, a pale and cloudy sky, the film was of exceptional quality. However, it was not the first. In 1942 Fernando Cerchio's Comacchio and Basilio Franchina's Gente di Chioggia/People of Chioggia dealt with small villages built on lagunas where other fishermen survived with difficulty, a long way from the urban centers that could have bought their catch. It is not by chance that in wartime three filmmakers took an interest in the life of neglected people. What critics called 'neorealism' was in part the discovery by city dwellers of forsaken communities on which they cast a benevolent but distant glance. The most famous film was Mario Lizzani's Nel Mezzogiorno qualcosa è cambiato/In the South Something Has Changed (1949), a political lampoon financed by the Communist party and aimed at denouncing the crass poverty of the southern population. In this work pictures hastily shot in a violent light gave everybody a ghostlike appearance, the editing was random, and some people were interviewed but not heard, their voices being replaced by an overwhelming, grandiose commentary. Others were less bombastic. Florestano Vancini's Delta padano/The Po Delta (1951) visited three villages where the inhabitants, attacked by typhus, often too feeble to work, spent long, idle days only looking at the skyline. The film created a strong contrast between carefully shot pictures and people's dull eyes and sickly bodies. A similar investigation was carried out by Vittorio de Seta in Sardinia and Sicily with Lu tempu di li pisci spata/The Time of Swordfish (1954), Isole di fuoco/Islands of Fire (1955), and Pastori di Orgosolo/Shepherds of Orgosolo (1958), where he emphasized the relationship between people and landscape. In Cristo non si è fermato a Eboli/Christ Did Not Stop at Eboli (1952) and Non basta soltanto l'alfabeto/The Alphabet is not Enough (1959), Michele Gandin stressed the necessity to eliminate illiteracy and to build roads to unblock the south and open it to modernity.

Italians who were witnessing a quick economic improvement (the so-called 'miracle') soon tired of films showing miserable images. Anthropologists offered them a less depressing image of their country. Italian anthropology was then led by Ernesto de Martino (1908–65), who maintained that preindustrial ways of life would look mysterious as long as researchers did not settle for a long time among the natives and did not let them talk.

The investigations were carried out in southern Italy by author de Martino. His books, which were met with an enthusiastic reception, inspired a series of directors, notably Luigi di Gianni and Gianfranco Mingozzi, whose films have been wrongly clustered under the name of 'de Martino documentaries' although they were shot independently and not by a 'school'. Luigi di Gianni illustrated southern traditions in Magia lucana/Lucanian Magic (1958), Nascita e morte nel Meridone/Birth and Death in the South (1959), and La possessione/Possession (1971). Mingozzi began with La taranta (1962), a film he remade and completed twenty years later as Sulla terra del rimorso/On the Land of Remorse (1982). The taranta, a small, innocuous, black spider was said to bite young women who then felt obliged to dance to the point of exhaustion. After a brief presentation of the land, Mingozzi filmed the rituals, offerings, and dances lit by candles and accompanied by songs and cries that surrounded the hysterical crisis and were meant to cure the sick women. Mingozzi's main work, Col cuore fermo Sicilia/Sicily in Good Heart (1965), explored the past of the island in order to explain what had made mafia possible. In the wake of Giacomo Pozzi Bellini Fernando Cerchio's Ave Maria (1947) followed a procession in a small village of Abruzzi. Antonioni's Superstizione/Superstition (1949) demonstrated how magic rites and archaic forms of religious expression had survived up to the present day. Vittorio Baldi described the festivities traditionally associated with summer works in La notte di San Giovanni and Vigilia di mezza estate/Saint John's Night, Midsummer Watching (1958). Vittorio de Seta's original project in Un giorno in Barbagia/A Day in Barbagia (1958) consisted of observing the daily lives of women in a Sardinian village where men were absent during the grazing season. The film showed them working in the fields, kneading and cooking bread, looking after the children. L'isola di Varano/Varano Island (1962), directed by Carlo di Carlo in the dry hills of Gargano, explained why the countrymen were obliged to leave their villages, deprived of water and power. Old habits and conventions vanished rapidly after television had reached the most remote parts of the south and anthropologists were anxious to record what still survived. With Liz Dantone being the only inhabitant of Vera, the highest village in the province of Trentino, Renato Morelli hurried to interview her. In his film Le stagioni di Liz: Ciclo dell'anno contadino in alta Val di Fassa/Liz's Seasons: The Cycle of the Rural Year in Upper Val di Fassa (1984) she talked about local traditions, reviewed the decline of the village from the war to the present day, and described the cycle of agricultural works. Gabriele Palmieri's Descrizione di un matrimonio/Description of a Wedding (1990) analyzed the disappearing ritual that an engaged couple had to observe in a Sardinian village from the early days of their engagement to the final ceremony.

Filmmakers were not only interested in rural communities; they also focused on urban, isolated groups that could be the object of anthropological curiosity, such as lunatic criminals discovered by Luigi Comencini in L'ospedale del delitto/Crime Hospital (1950), people obliged to stay in town during holidays filmed by Raffaele Andreassi in La città calda/The Hot City (1959), retired people visited in Ermano Olmi's I pensionati/The Pensioners (1958), and Gian Vittorio Baldi's La casa delle vedove/The Widowers' House (1960). In the postwar era many filmmakers were preoccupied by the number of orphans. The question was tackled by Comencini, whose Bambini in città/Children in Town (1946) explored the most disadvantaged sectors of Milan to show how children living in desperate plights managed to survive. Francesco Maselli's Bambini/Children (1951) and Zona pericolosa/Dangerous Area (1952) pictured the young living on the outskirts of Rome and attempted to gauge the influence that violent spectacles had on them. It is interesting to contrast these shorts with the more optimistic but more superficial Racconto del quartiere/Talking about the District (1950), in which Valerio Zurlini skimmed across the Roman Trastevere. Florestano Vancini's moving Uomini soli/Lonely Men (1959) drew spectators' attention to the Roman tramps. Beginning in a dormitory where vagrants had found a night shelter, the film recorded their evening meal; in the morning it followed their vagabondage, attended their conflicts with each other and, above all, registered their desperate idleness. In the same way, but on a more superficial level, Cesare Zavattini's I misteri di Roma/The Mysteries of Rome (1962) investigated the nocturnal life of the capital in order to disclose its most secret aspects, but indulged in trivial events such as the clandestine slaughtering of a cow or the crazy talk of a young man waiting for the arrival of flying saucers.

In the 1950s feature-length geographic or ethnographic documentaries became a specialty of Italian studios. Gian Gaspare Napolitano's Magia Verde/Green Magic (1952), a casual but pleasant ride through the United States, was a significant success. Soon came Folco Quilici's Sesto continente/Sixth Continent (1953) and Oceano/Ocean (1971), which focused on oceanic islands and maritime life; Giuliano Tomei's Eva nera/Black Eve (1954), which was a provocative survey of the conditions of females in Africa; Giulio Macchi's India favolosa/Fantastic India (1954); and Mario Craveri's Continente perduto/Lost Continent (1955) and L'impero del sole/Empire of the Sun (1955), two elegant, enthralling rides, the former throughout China and Indonesia, the latter in Peru. Most travelogs were perfectly shot. The true quality of these films—which illustrated the places visited by an imaginary traveler and related his supposed experiences—lay in their attempt to present an agreeable, undemanding story apt to please different audiences and to seduce all generations.

Documentaries about distant countries and atypical people were winning general acclaim during the early years of television. The new medium was quick to adapt to such a popular vein. Well-known directors were given exceptional facilities for long-distance investigations. Rossellini could shoot a five-hour program, L'India vista da Rossellini/India Seen by Rossellini (1959) in which he mixed beautiful landscapes and personal considerations about oriental wisdom and religious conceptions. Antonioni's Chung-Kuo Cina (1972), which was less touristic and much more critical, was violently attacked by the Chinese authorities because it went to the roots of social problems in order to reveal their causes and brought to the fore the more blatant failures in agricultural and sanitation policies. Other less famous filmmakers were obliged to stay in Italy. Mario Soldati received a lot of praise for his investigations on food and 'popular' culture throughout the peninsula, Viaggio nella valle del Po alla ricerca del cibo genuino/Trip through the Po Valley in Search of Genuine Food (1958) and Chi legge? Viaggio lungo le rive del Tirreno/Who Reads? Trip along the Tirenian Shore (1960). In Viaggio nel Sud/Ride in the South (1958), Virgilio

Sabel emphasized the permanence of traditions in southern Italy but two decades later Vittorio de Seta, reediting his previous pictures but completing them with new images, explained in La Sicilia revisitata/Revisiting Sicily (1979) how much Sicily had changed. Stefano Silvestrini's Il Sud Salento/South Salento (1987) confirmed such impressions by exploring an area where the economy had undergone a considerable development and where new industries had been set on the basis of traditional artisan production. In connection with the shooting of his feature films, Pasolini made a series of shorts that were simultaneously bright films and meditations on otherness. In Appunti per una orestiaide africana/Notes for an African Orestia (1970) he explored the way in which age-old habits persist in the modern world and stressed the clash between different strands of civilization. In Le mura di Sana'A/The Walls of San'A (1974) he depicted San'A, capital of Yemen, as threatened to be ruined by building speculation and he denounced the brutal intervention of Western capitalism in underdeveloped countries.

Established at the very beginning of cinema, the three main types of Italian documentaries—namely industrial films, tourism pictures, and social-anthropological movies—expanded throughout the twentieth century and are still functioning. There were changes, at times unimportant and at times significant according to the way things went. For instance, ethnological films emphasized the problems of small, destitute communities in the hard times that followed World War II but returned to the depiction of domestic or foreign traditions and folklore when hardships were over. Business pictures were always numerous but boomed during the 'miracle' years. Such exceptional continuity is all the more impressive in that important transformations occurred during the 1960s. These were partially attributable to television. Public channels, which had a monopoly from the beginning of broadcasting in 1954 until 1977, created new documentary programs. Starting with the idea that Italian culture, because it gave greater priority to arts, disregarded science and technology, television directors favored scientific information. Several prime-time programs mixed interviews on set and movies. The favorite series, Quark, dealt with language, space, the brain, human behavior, energy, and other topics easily illustrated by shorts. With the expansion of commercial and local channels after 1977, the demand for factual films was so strong that all products could be sold.

However, the most important alterations took place before the television boom. The main factor was the dramatic character of political conflicts that led, in the 1970s, to terrorism. During its first decades the Italian republic had been ruled by the Christian Democrats. In the early 1960s economic prosperity, the decline of the Catholic party, and the revival of fascism brought about harsh debates on the recent past and on the responsibility of political leaders. Cinema and television began to revisit fascism and the Resistance. It must be recalled that at the time contemporary history was not taught at school. Since the young knew nothing about the first half of the century, documentaries became a substitute for inadequate instruction. Relating events from the past to situations of the present, and drawing lessons from the study of history, these works were successful but also attracted violent criticism.

The most famous and one of the first examples of this trend was Lino Del Fra, Cecilia Mangini, and Lino Micciché's All'armi siamo fascisti/To Arms! We Are Fascists (1961). Going beyond the purely mechanical concatenation of events, this film related the evolution of Italy from the outset of the twentieth century through 1960. Archival images created a highly evocative visual background that did not monopolize the audience and allowed them to hear the narrator's voice. Although careful attention was paid to rhythm and the pictures created impressions, it was the commentary that offered a partial, questionable, but perfectly clear interpretation of recent history. Made at a time when neofascism was a real threat, the film tried to show a generation born after the war how Mussolini's rise to power had ended in a national disaster. After the 1968 events the debate shifted to the revolution and the end of capitalism. Ivan Palermo's Torino: la coscienza operaia/Turin: The Working-Class Consciousness (1972) attempted to explain how the memory of the resistance to Nazism could help to organize labor movements in the factories. Contrasting pictures taken during the war and contemporary interviews, the movie refused to give an ideal vision of the past. The conflicts among the members of the Resistance, between the rank-and-file and the cadres of the movement were exposed with a violence that had not been toned down by the ensuing years. Palermo's work touched on the question of historical memory but did not examine it. Using a massacre committed by the Germans as a starting point, Damiano Damiani's Piazzale Loreto/Loreto Square (1980) tried to ponder the nature of remembrance. There was a certain amount of audiovisual documentation of the slaughter but what could it show? Only victims who looked just like many other victims. Damiani based his film on the memory of the present, a lively memory capable of going forward. Confronting survivors or relatives of murdered partisans with people who had not witnessed the drama, he showed how knowledge, or the lack of knowledge, subconsciously censored the war.

Social tension grew up in the 1960s together with the political debate and culminated after 1968 in a series of often violent strikes. Previously, little had been done to observe walk-outs because spectators and even workers were not used to drawing lessons from social conflicts. Carlo and Paola Gobetti's Scioperi a Torino/Strikes in Turin (1962), which documented labor unrest in the Fiat and Lancia factories, was an exception and met with a weak response. Ten years later there was a wealth of such movies shot in the heat of some event, hastily edited and circulated throughout the peninsula. Such militant documentaries were meant to distance themselves from the mainstream cinema functioning on the basis of illusionism. They often consisted of discussions with workers recorded in video and then projected to the participants who were asked to react critically. Ugo Gregoretti's Apollon, una fabbrica occupata/Apollon, A Factory Taken Over (1969) and Contratto/Agreement (1970), based on a series of interviews on location, were not content with offering a collection of talks but spoke of strikes and their favorable issues in a dramatic way, elaborating a dialectic or responsibilities between the various protagonists. Ettore Scola's Trevigo-Torino, viaggio nel Fiat-nam/Trevigo-Turin, a Trip in the Land of the Fiat (1972) accompanied an unemployed countryman who was obliged to leave his village and emigrate to Turin in search of a job. Guido Lombardi and Anna Lajola's Enua ca simu a forza du mundu/We, Who Are the Strength of the World (1971) expounded how unskilled workers employed on building sites were exposed to potentially fatal situations. After explaining how, during the second half of the nineteenth century, mining had become an alternative to the declining farming economy in Sardinia, Piero d'Onofrio and Fabio Vannini's Noistottus (1987) reconstructed the background of what has been called a 'mining culture' by moving from contemporary eyewitness accounts to shots of work in mines still operating today and to historical records, either newsreels or reconstitutions. Armando Ceste and Mimmo Calopresti's Alla Fiat era così/At Fiat It Was Like That (1990) brought to light the slow but irreparable exhaustion of those working at the Fiat factory.

After the 'hot' 1970s and 1980s the filmmakers who had witnessed the events and often taken part in them were able to evaluate their consequences. Interviewing communist militants at the time when the Soviet Union was collapsing, Nanni Moretti reconstituted in La cosa/The Thing (1990) the trajectory of the Italian left in the course of the past half century, while Marco Bellocchio's Sogni infranti: ragionamenti e deliri/Broken Dreams: Reasoning and Delirium (1996) expounded the hopes, mistakes, and crimes of terrorists.

Filmmakers soon turned toward ill-known, often hidden aspects of contemporary society. Their method was profoundly different from the approach that dominated the 1950s. Repudiating any aesthetic temptation, they aimed to give a right to speak to those who had never been heard. In their view what mattered was an unaffected picture of the interviewees' surroundings as well as the sound of voices likely to convey the impression made by a direct testimony. A good example of this manner was Giacomo Ferrante's Real Falchera FC (1990), a report on an amateur football team based in the Turin suburbs. Details from the life of the single players were interspersed with sequences of the collective ritual of the game, a mosaic of fragments attempted to make spectators enter into a world of human contacts and friendship, interviews were substituted by informal chats exchanged with the film crew during the moment when they were not noticeably 'a film crew'.

Such documentaries took as their premise that they were subjective visions rather than objective observations and sought actively to implicate the viewer in the process of interpretation. This new trend had been anticipated by Pier Paolo Pasolini whose Comizi d'amore/Love Meetings (1964), in spite of an eye-catching title, was a lecture and a meditation on the nature and functions of documentaries. After questioning a panel of Italians about their experience of love, Pasolini edited his interviews to show how misleading a talk can be and how difficult it is to use such material honestly, without deforming or misinterpreting its significance but also without being too long or boring. It took Pasolini's lesson ten years to be understood but its influence became obvious in the mid-1970s. Bernardo Bertolucci's La salute è malata/Health is Ill (1970), Marco Bellocchio's Matti da slegare/Raving Mad (1974), Gianni Serra's Fortezze vuote/Empty Fortresses (1975), and Silvio Soldini's Voci celate/Shut Voices (1986) denounced the pitiful situation of Italian hospitals, asylums, and health services. AIDS sufferers were interviewed in Villa Glori (1988) by Luigi Faccini and in Come prima, più di prima t'amerò/I'll Love You As Before, More Than Before (1995) by Daniele Segre, who let also transsexuals speak in Vite di ballatoio/Outside Lives (1996). The sufferings of those living on the fringe of society appeared in Giuseppe Bertolucci's Pani sporchi/Dirty Clothes (1980), Pasquale Pozzessere's Altre voci/Other Voices (1991), and Silvano Agosti's Frammenti di vite clandestine/Pieces of Hidden Lives (1992), whereas Enrico Coluso's Fine pena mai/Endless Penalty (1995) showed how prisoners serving life sentences managed to survive.

Pasolini did not merely influence what can be called social investigation documentaries; rather, his shorts opened new ways for art films. Previously filmmakers explored paintings or sculptures from without and often used a voice-over to signal the most important features of the work. Acquainting spectators with his enthusiasm, his surprise, and his hesitations, Pasolini involved himself in his films. Art films blossomed in the wake of his experiences. Making a pretext of a night ride through Rimini Pier Angellini's Bessie My Man (1985) confronted music and nocturnal images. Introducing a painter in Diario di Manarolo/Manarolo's Diary (1987), Gianni Amico composed a visual poem where canvas and landscapes mixed not because they were related to each other but because they provoked surprising sequences or contrasts. This technique was reused by Pasquale Misuraca in a 'symphonic' documentary, Progetto poesia/Poetry Project (1993), made of archival images thematically assembled. Emilio Castelli's Hodi Mlalugoma (1990) wandered among the statues that Tanzanian villagers place on tombs to communicate with the deceased. Introducing spectators to Giotto's frescos in the Paduan Scrovegni chapel, Luciano Emmer alternated his presence and voice with the painter's supposed presence and voice. The first part of his Dramma di Cristo/Christ's Drama (1994) was a dialogue between the director and the painter, whereas in the second part the characters represented in the frescos told of Christ's Passion. Stella Leonetti's Vernissage! 1607, Caravaggio/Varnishing Day (2002) contrived a private view of Caravaggio's new works during which seventeenth-century amateurs who commented on, admired, and criticized the canvas behaved like twenty-first-century visitors.

Such examples illustrate the vitality of Italian documentaries. However, it must be acknowledged that they are exceptions, since mainstream Italian shorts have always been more factual than experimental. This is one of the reasons why critics do not generally care for them, and why spectators are not enthusiastic about them, even though television documentaries have good ratings. Italy cannot boast world-famous documentary filmmakers. Many directors started in the cinema business by making shorts but made feature-length films as soon as possible. If the country never had an avant-garde movement, Italy maintained a rare continuity in three directions—namely, business movies, art and landscape pictures, and the study of small communities. In so doing, documentaries manifested a few highly typical features of Italian life and culture.

Ivens, Joris

Of the pioneers of documentary film, Joris Ivens can be considered as one of the most emblematic figures. His professional career spanned almost the complete documentary film history of the twentieth century. He made films on five continents and had a major influence on several national documentary film movements. His film work is very much intertwined with the sociopolitical history of the twentieth century—he was almost nineteen years old at the time of the October Revolution of 1917 and died just before the final collapse of communism, filming several of its social, political, and military battles. Furthermore, throughout his career, he continued to develop his style and techniques, and thus remained an important exponent of the documentary film world.

Ivens made his first film, De Wigwam/Wigwam, in 1912 at the age of thirteen, but even in his early twenties he was not thinking of a career as filmmaker. He was to manage a branch of his father's chain of photo shops, and followed the appropriate education for this career: economics in Rotterdam, and photo technique and photo chemistry in Berlin. Berlin had both a cultural as well as a political influence on him. He saw the German expressionist films and the avant-garde experiments of Walter Ruttmann, and through his friends he became immersed in socialist ideas. These experiences can be found in the films Joris Ivens made throughout his life: most of his films can be characterized by their mix of artistic intentions and sociopolitical engagement, but often with a different balance between the two. Within the documentary context, Ivens's work can be considered as a perfect illustration of Kracauer's film theory, in which he distinguishes the realist from the formative tendency (Kracauer 1960). Kracauer recognized the interrelation between these tendencies that he opposed, and between

Around 1927 Ivens started to develop his first film plans and experiments, using the equipment that was available in the Amsterdam shop he was managing. Inspired by, and having analyzed Eisenstein's Potemkin (1925) and having seen Ruttman working on his Berlin film with an old, incomplete camera and hardly any special skills, Ivens became more serious in studying film techniques and aesthetics, which resulted in De Brug/The Bridge (1928). For him, this film was primarily a study in movement, composition, and film language. However, after its first performance, the film was received with wide acclaim and was marked as an avant-garde masterpiece, putting the Netherlands on the map of European cinema. More or less unintentionally, De Brug started Joris Ivens's professional film career. Certainly after making Regen/Rain (1929) his reputation as a filmmaker was established. These films fulfilled Ivens's artistic curiosity and aspirations, and fit in the formative tendency, defined by Kracauer, since Ivens was mainly concerned with composition, movement, and editing. These led to assignments from a workers' union (Wij Bouwen/We Are Building, 1930) and from Philips. This company wanted to promote the modern technology of its products—especially, the radio—as well as of its production line. Philips Radio (1931) became the first Dutch sound film, and Ivens's artistically most successful avant-garde film of this period. Philips Radio was also an expression of Ivens's interest in industrial progress, which may be found in some of his other works, too. Ivens also wanted to pay attention to the laborers, but Philips did not allow him to film outside the factories and to 'disturb the private life of the personnel' (Schoots 2000). Social critique, if it exists, is only implicit in this film.

However, during these same years Ivens tried to give his social and political engagement a place in his work. In 1929 he made his first socially engaged film with Leo van Lakerveld (a Communist Party member), Arm Drenthe/Poor Drenthe, which was probably (for the film is considered lost) a good illustration of Kracauer's realist tendency, and a forerunner to Misère au Borinage/The Misery of the Borinage (1934). In 1933 Henri Storck asked Ivens to join him to make a film about the misery of the miners in the Borinage region of Belgium. In style this film is quite the opposite of the Philips film. Storck and Ivens tried to avoid any aesthetic approach: 'We felt it would be insulting to people in such extreme hardship to use any style of photography that would prevent the direct honest communication of their pain to every spectator' (Ivens 1969). The realist style of Borinage led Kracauer to say that 'human suffering, it appears, is conducive to detached reporting; the artist's conscience shows in artless photography' (Kracauer 1960). Although this underlines the attempt of Storck and Ivens to avoid beauty, it remains an aesthetic choice: they had to work to get to this realist style. Despite this realist approach, Storck and Ivens didn't mind staging several scenes. Borinage can be considered one of the first social documentaries, a genre within documentary of which Joris Ivens was the pioneer, and throughout his career a major exponent.

In most of his subsequent films, but also in some of his earlier ones, the relationship between a realist and a formative approach is more in balance. Directly after the Philips film Joris Ivens got the chance to combine his fascination for industrial progress with his socialist and communist sympathies. With the film Pesn o Gerojach/Song of Heroes (1932) he was able to represent his political beliefs in the socialist utopia and at the same time to explore his artistic capacities. Cooperating with, among others, composer Hanns Eisler, who produced the soundtrack, he made a film about the building up of the socialist Soviet-state on the basis of the construction of the blast furnace town of Magnitogorsk by the Komsomol youth. 'It was exactly what I was looking for: young people and steel' (Ivens and Destanque 1982). The film sparkles with enthusiasm and propaganda for the cause of socialism and displays powerful imagery combined with strong editing. Eisler also contributed his music to Nieuwe Gronden/New Earth (1933), a film that is more a hybrid combination of a formative and a realist approach: Ivens used older footage that he had filmed for Wij Bouwen to complete it with new material of the polder works. The scene of the closing of the Zuiderzee dyke, in particular, with Eisler's stirring music, is one of the marvels of Ivens's films. However, he added a reel of a more militant character, to protest against the capitalist practice of destroying crops for market speculation instead of feeding the people who made those crops possible.

Joris Ivens left for the United States in 1936, where his films had a major impact on US film directors: his films provoked the spectator more than the films of other noted documentarists of that time, but it would be difficult to say that his films were a touchstone for them. Documentarists influenced each other, and the films of Joris Ivens matched the idea of documentary that was formed in the 1930s and further shaped in the 1940s and 1950s by 'the great documentarists' of that time, like the films of Grierson's Film Unit (e.g. Night Mail, 1936), Pare Lorentz with The River (1937), Flaherty with Louisiana Story (1948), Humphrey Jennings's Listen to Britain (1942), and, of course, the films of Joris Ivens himself, such as The Spanish Earth (1937) and Power and the Land (1941).

In the United States and after the outbreak of the Spanish Civil War, Contemporary Historians, Inc. was founded to enable the production of The Spanish Earth. Filmed at the republican front in Spain, and made to raise money for ambulances, this film is still seen as one of Ivens's most important works, characterized by powerful photography and editing, sober commentary by Ernest Hemingway, and a clear partiality against Franco's fascism. This partiality was one of the strong points of his films, but it also elicited much criticism. The Spanish Earth is also a good example of the dialectics between realist and formative tendencies: the film is a truly realist account of the events on the republican front, but Ivens uses his cinematographic skills to shape this realist account into an aesthetically strong, and therefore maybe even more convincing, film work. Such a practice defines his style, for we can discern it in many of his films, not only his political films (e.g. Le 17ème Parallèle/The 17th Parallel, 1968), but also in his poetic films (e.g. ... À Valparaiso, 1963).

A year after The Spanish Earth Ivens made another antifascist film, this time on the Sino-Japanese War, The 400 Million, supported by the music of Hanns Eisler. Subsequently Joris Ivens made a number of films in the United States, alternating his antifascist convictions (Our Russian Front, 1941, and Action Stations!, 1943) with his fascination for industrial progress (Power and the Land, a New Deal propaganda film for rural electrification, 1940, and Oil for Aladdin's Lamp, a publicity film for the Shell company, 1941).

In 1945 and in spite of his communist sympathies, Joris Ivens was appointed by the Dutch government to film the liberation of Indonesia as Film Commissioner for the Dutch East Indies. However, in Ivens's opinion the Netherlands were not concerned with the liberation of Indonesia, but with its recolonization. He considered this a breach of contract on the side of the Dutch, resigned his position, and went on to make a filmic pamphlet against the Dutch policy in Indonesia. Indonesia Calling (1946) meant a breach with the Netherlands: Ivens was considered persona non grata by the Dutch government, which took his passport for a short period and gave him renewals for only three-month periods. His first official return to the Netherlands after 1936 was in 1964. He was assigned a film job in the Netherlands (not by the government) in 1965 (Rotterdam Europort, 1966), but was only officially rehabilitated in 1985, when the Minister of Culture, referring to Indonesia Calling, stated that 'history proved you're right more than your adversaries then'. This did not hamper Ivens's film work, however. He had already filmed in various corners of the world and was now given an assignment from Eastern Europe to film the reconstruction of the countries stricken by World War II, which were now on the brink of a socialist future (The First Years, 1949). Ivens thus found himself in the center of a place where his ideals for a better society could be realized.

Until 1957 Joris Ivens continued to work in East Germany, making one of the largest productions in the history of the documentary cinema there (Das Lied der Ströme, 1954), but the films of this period were predominantly characterized by propaganda for communism and less by his artistic qualities. This occurred not only because Ivens still followed his passionate convictions and let them partly drown out his artistic aspirations as a documentary filmmaker, but also because he was given less freedom to develop them. He never was very explicit in his reactions to the events in Budapest in 1956, but it is probable that here the first cracks in his Stalinist beliefs appeared, maybe enhanced by Khrushchev's process of de-Stalinization. To his brother he wrote: 'What a long, worrying, and sometimes horrible period is necessary in order to come to a better world, to change an economic and a social system to achieve better and more humane relations between people' (Schoots 2000). He never wanted to comment on the events in Prague in 1968, but his turn toward China and Maoism probably illustrates his disillusionment with the failing Soviet ideology in which he so believed.

In 1957 Joris Ivens returned to Western Europe and made the poetic La Seine a rencontré Paris/The Seine Meets Paris, in France. This, however, did not mean that he turned away from his political and social engagement, for his films that followed were characterized by the alternation of poetry and politics, realist and formative tendencies, 'free' productions and commissioned films. In 1958 he made, apart from his work as lecturer at the Beijing Film Academy, both the poetic Before Spring and the political pamphlet 600 Million with You. After a commissioned film for the Italian state oil company, ENI (L'Italia non è un paese povero/Italy Is Not a Poor Country, 1960), once again stressing his fascination for technology, he made both the pro-revolutionary Pueblo armado/An Armed People, as well as the more poetic travel letter to Charles Chaplin, Carnet de voyage/Travel Notebook, in Cuba (both 1961).

Here he was also asked to teach at the ICAIC, and this invitation, in 1960, was a chance to dive into that fresh revolutionary climate, which promised to be the new hope and example for the socialist world, especially the Latin American world, and which closely matched Ivens's ideas and hopes for socialist progress. This was also the period in which the Cold War peaked, with Cuba as a temporary center.

Communism seemed to be in fashion in parts of Asia and Latin America. The latter was especially threatening for the United States. The possibility of socialist democracies in Latin America, as well as the American aggression in Asia, led Ivens to follow his convictions and translate them into film. In 1964 he made an election film, Le Train de la victoire/The Victory Train, for Salvador Allende to stress this hope. Allende didn't win the election, however. During the second half of the 1960s he made several militant films in Asia to demonstrate against the politics of the US, and to support the people of Vietnam: Le Ciel, la terre/The Threatening Sky (1965); Le 17ème Parallèle (1968) with Marceline Loridan; Loin de Vietnam/Far From Vietnam (1967), a collective work; and in Laos, Le peuple et ses fusils/The People and Their Guns (1970), also a collective work.

For Le 17ème Parallèle, Ivens used for the first time a 16mm synchronous sound camera, this being Marceline Loridan's choice, for she had already some experience with it. Initially Ivens had some reticence toward these new techniques presented by direct cinema and cinéma vérité: 'We should remain alert to the fact that with the possibility of quick observation and increased mobility comes the danger of remaining on the surface of truth, of skimming reality instead of penetrating it, of showing it without any force, daring or creative power' (Delmar 1979). Marceline Loridan and Joris Ivens show this awareness in Le 17ème Parallèle, which presents powerful photography and a skillful combination of direct sound and synchronized sound. In this way they introduced a more conscious use of the new techniques that had become so popular and easy to handle, but which also endangered professionalism. On the other hand, these new techniques were also cheaper and therefore available to more people. This had its influence on the documentaries of the 1960s, and a movement in which Joris Ivens was again an example to others (especially in France), because of his lengthy experience: militant cinema. This time his contribution was not as an innovator, but more as an agitator. With Chris Marker he became one of the exponents of political and militant cinema.

The 1960s are furthermore characterized by the two extremes in Ivens's work as a filmmaker, for before the previously mentioned militant films Ivens also made two special film poems: ... À Valparaiso (1963) and Pour le Mistral/The Mistral (1965). His close collaboration with Marceline Loridan began with Rotterdam Europoort in 1965, and continued until his death in 1989. This cooperation resulted, among other things, in the monumental series lasting twelve hours, Comment Yukong déplaça les montagnes/How Yukong Moved The Mountains (1976), about the influence of the Cultural Revolution on everyday life in China. Ivens had witnessed the promise of the Great Leap Forward in 1958, without seeing the great famine of the following two years. In filming the Cultural Revolution, and especially its influence on the daily life of the Chinese people, Joris Ivens and Marceline Loridan wanted to provide answers to the questions of ignorant Westerners by letting the Chinese speak: 'It is important that in this film it isn't me or Marceline who does the talking but that 80 percent of it is the Chinese people' (Delmar 1979). Sudden changes in China's political situation made it almost impossible to film additional material, but new changes in 1976—Mao's death and a more moderate political course—made the longing for information on China greater. Yukong offered much of the information wanted, although the films were soon outdated.

Combining fictive with factual elements in his last film, Une Histoire de vent/A Tale of The Wind (1988), Joris Ivens, together with Marceline Loridan, contributed once more, but for the last time, to the documentary form. Chris Marker had already shaped this kind of personal film, especially with Sans Soleil/Sunless (1982), but Une Histoire de vent extrapolates this in extremis, being in this way not only a reflection on Ivens's own life and work and the history of changes in the world in the twentieth century, but also a reflection on documentary, truth, and the boundaries of the genre.

Toward the end of his life Joris Ivens distanced himself from the passionate convictions that largely determined his film work. His historical experience and the many changes in the world moved him to a more reflexive position. In an interview with his biographer, Hans Schoots, he stated: 'I used to say that communism was not a faith, but there is much of it in it. I stuck too long to my utopias, until I saw that History is not developing according to a book that was written at the beginning of this century.'

Ivens crossed a world that underwent many radical changes during this period. He witnessed and filmed many of those changes, giving his interpretation of reality, and always giving hope for a better world, a socialist world. His films reflect the beauty and the atrocities of this world, the poetics and the sorrow. His films are also illustrations and examples of the different tendencies in documentary film history, of which he was one of the designers and one of the main characters.

Biography

Born November 18, 1898, as George Henri Anton Ivens in Nijmegen, the Netherlands.

Studied economics at Higher Commercial College in Rotterdam and photographic technique in Berlin, apprenticeship in several photographic laboratories. Started working in the Amsterdam branch of his father's CAPI photo shop in 1924. Married German photographer Germaine Krull in 1927. Cofounder of Film Liga in the same year. Worked in the Soviet Union in 1931–2 and 1934–5 before going to the United States in 1936. Married Helen van Dongen and became Film Commissioner of the Dutch East Indies in 1944. Moved to Australia to discover that the Dutch interests in Indonesia were other than the liberation of that country. Resigned his position of Film Commissioner in order to make Indonesia Calling! Persona non grata in the Netherlands, he started working in Eastern Europe, where he married the Polish poetess Ewa Fiszer in 1951. Awarded the World Peace Prize in 1955. Worked on several films for the DEFA, before returning to Western Europe in 1957, where he settled in Paris. In the following years, taught and made films in China, Mali, Cuba, and Chile. Made a campaign film for Salvador Allende in 1964. Received a Lion at the Venice Film Festival for Pour le Mistral in 1966. Started collaborating with Marceline Loridan, whom he married in 1977. Made several films against the American aggression of Vietnam in the 1960s, and worked in China in the mid-1970s to make a twelve-hour series on the Cultural Revolution. In 1984 President Mitterand made him Commander of the Légion d'Honneur. Received the Dutch Film Prize in 1985, and made his last film in 1988 with Marceline Loridan. Received in that year the Golden Lion for his complete oeuvre. Decorated with a Knighthood in the Order of the Dutch Lion. Died June 28, 1989, in Paris.

Jackson, Pat

Pat Jackson made an important contribution to the development of the story documentary in Britain in the late 1930s and 1940s. He had assisted Harry Watt on pioneering films such as The Saving of Bill Blewitt (1937) and North Sea (1938), which departed from the Griersonian tradition through the use of dramatically scripted scenes played by nonprofessional actors, before making his own significant mark with the seminal feature-length documentary Western Approaches in 1944.

Jackson joined the General Post Office (GPO) Film Unit on his seventeenth birthday, gaining entry through his mother's distant friendship with the postmaster general. Starting as a lowly messenger boy, he rapidly progressed to stills work and then into the cutting rooms, where he assisted Basil Wright on the celebrated The Song of Ceylon (1934). He first accompanied a shoot during the making of Night Mail (1936), once again assisted in the cutting and read the prose part of the commentary. Working with Harry Watt on this classic documentary was a major influence on Jackson. In 1937 Watt introduced the story documentary with The Saving of Bill Blewitt, adopting a characteristically novel approach to the mundane subject of Post Office savings. Jackson again worked closely with him as assistant, and gained further experience in the dramatic approach to documentary as part of Watt's team on North Sea, an account of ship-to-shore radio. As Jackson later recalled, 'Harry Watt was writing a history of England by the careful use of the non-actor'.

Jackson's directorial debut was The Horsey Mail (1937), a one-reel information film about the postal service in a small Suffolk village, although previously he had made a substantial directorial contribution to Watt's earlier Big Money (1937), which went uncredited. Of more significance was Men in Danger (1939) and in retrospect he remained particularly proud of the final sequence where the apprentice miners, who started work as young as age fourteen, were trained in the dangers of their craft. In the early war years, Jackson collaborated on numerous productions as part of the team effort at the GPO/Crown Film Unit, doing some shooting on London Can Take It (1940) and codirecting The First Days (1939) alongside Humphrey Jennings and Harry Watt. His own films were the shorts Health in War (1940), The Builders (1942), and Ferry Pilot (1941), a medium-length documentary about the transport of US planes to Britain. The uninspiring prospect of a film on the building industry actually confirmed Jackson's belief in the dramatic approach as he discovered a genuine 'vitality' in the workmen that no actor could master. In particular, a bricklayer, Charlie Fielding, and his ability to effortlessly lay bricks while conversing to camera impressed him. Jackson later commented on the scene and revealed his approach:

Imagine asking an actor to do that! To lay bricks professionally and at the same time spiel away to the camera. Nobody could do it. Of course, you have to take trouble to test them, and cast them with great care. And we did; I tested Charlie Fielding as carefully as if I were testing a new starlet.

Jackson's greatest achievement occupied him throughout much of the later war period, and Western Approaches (1944) remains one of the finest of the wartime documentaries. The film, made on location under incredibly demanding conditions, was unusually shot in Technicolor and used a cast of real sailors who had experienced the hardships depicted on screen. As a result, Jackson realised some remarkable performances and imagery, and left a vital document of the wartime merchant service.

After a frustrating few years at MGM in Hollywood, which resulted in only a minor thriller, Shadow on the Wall (1949), Jackson returned to Britain and a modest career in commercial cinema and television. He maintained a documentary approach to his drama and encouraged a naturalistic style in performance, continuing to cast nonprofessionals for some minor roles. This was most evident in White Corridors (1951), adapted from a best-selling novel about a young female doctor in a provincial hospital and for which Googie Withers drew strong critical praise. Jackson had a less rewarding time on Virgin Island (1958), where his demand for spontaneity and naturalism in performance conflicted with method actor John Cassavetes's desire for exhaustive rehearsal. Through the 1960s Jackson directed some minor sponsored documentaries, but is better appreciated for his work in TV with Patrick McGeehan, on the cult TV action series Dangerman and The Prisoner.

Pat Jackson will be remembered for his tremendous efforts and skill in bringing the wartime feature-documentary Western Approaches to the screen. Despite often unsympathetic circumstances he retained a faith in the naturalistic performance and the marriage of documentary and drama. Although not participating himself, he was a significant influence on the celebrated renaissance in docudrama that formed in British television in the 1960s and 1970s.

Biography

Born in Eltham, London, 1916. Educated in various local schools, including Bryanston. After a brief period as an assistant cameraman at Welwyn studios, he joined the GPO Film Unit in 1934 as a messenger boy and quickly worked his way up to more senior roles. He remained with the Unit when it became the Crown Film Unit in 1940. After the war he spent an unfruitful period in Hollywood with MGM, but returned in 1950 to work in British features. From 1959, he worked on British TV series, sponsored films, and television advertisements. He died on June 3, 2011.

Jacobs, Lewis

Critic, editor, filmmaker, teacher, and activist, Lewis Jacobs's place in cinema history rests primarily on his reputation as an historian. His groundbreaking text, The Rise of the American Film, first published in 1939, has been reprinted six times. He also edited several collections, including The Documentary Tradition, The Emergence of Film Art, The Movies as Medium, and The Compound Cinema, the last a collection of critical writings by Harry Alan Potamkin, his colleague in the Film and Photo League.

Jacobs came to film from painting, joining an amateur film club called the Cinema Crafters of Philadelphia, and his early works such as Transition (1927) and Mobile Composition No. 1 (1928) were collaborations with other members in that group. From 1930 to 1934 Jacobs was coeditor of Experimental Cinema with David Platt and Seymour Stern. This innovative periodical championed the cinema and theories of Eisenstein, Pudovkin, and Dovzhenko. The Film and Photo League, a collective of politically radical filmmakers and critics, exploited its pages as a forum. The period from 1931 to 1933 also marks Jacobs's involvement with that organization. Jacobs traveled through the southern USA, collecting footage that found its way into several of the League's productions, notably Western Pennsylvania and Kentucky Miners' Strike (1931), Scottsboro Trial (1932), and The Scottsboro Boys (Leo Hurwitz, 1933). He also taught at the League's Potamkin Film School during its brief existence.

While working in New York editing movie trailers and shooting footage for the Film and Photo League, Jacobs began an independent project entitled As I Walk, consisting primarily of material captured while strolling around the city during his lunch break. This work remained unfinished but yielded a fragment entitled Footnote to Fact (1934). That film's candid shots of urban poverty effectively capture the desperation of the Great Depression. Alternating with close-ups of a young woman, these brutally realistic images are presented as disturbing memories from which the woman escapes only by killing herself. Formally, the film owes a debt to the Soviet cinema Jacobs admired, particularly in the accelerating montage sequence that builds to the climax of the woman's suicide.

Jacobs's achievements as a writer and editor have tended to obscure his worth as a director. Consequently, critical commentary on his films has been largely self-penned. The two articles on experimental cinema in the United States (originally published in Hollywood Quarterly and reprinted in later editions of The Rise of the American Film) provide an excellent resource. Here, Jacobs tends to draw parallels between his personal development and that of experimental cinema. He describes himself initially as 'another devotee of French films', a tendency evident in early works such as Mobile Composition, which, he insists, was essentially realistic despite its modernist title. Nevertheless, this flirtation with abstraction would continue with Synchromy (1933), a joint effort with Mary Ellen Bute and musical composer-theorist Joseph Schillinger. Writing on the postwar situation, Jacobs distances himself from both the photographic realism of the trance film and nonobjective abstraction to ally himself with those experimental filmmakers who offer personal observations and comments on objective reality. He devotes a couple of pages to his films From Tree Trunk to Head (1939), a documentary of sculptor Chaim Gross's woodcutting technique, and Sunday Beach (1948), for which Jacobs contrived technical tricks to study people's weekend leisure activities without their knowledge.

As a writer, Jacobs tends to group individual works and broader trends into convenient totalities. For example, The Documentary Tradition is not simply a collection of essays organized chronologically but an attempt to render a synoptic view of documentary film that reads roughly as follows. Documentary cinema developed from modernist experiments of the 1920s into a cinema of social responsibility and political commitment in the 1930s. In the following decade, the need to battle fascism and promote the war effort eclipsed domestic issues and labor struggles. Increased professionalization in the 1950s was accompanied by bloodless content, but by the following decade new technologies such as television, portable cameras, and tape decks capable of sync sound had facilitated heightened truth, immediacy, and engagement. During the 'sober seventies' documentary kept political upheavals, civil rights struggles, and antiwar movements in front of an increasingly apathetic viewing public. For Jacobs, each period produced a cinema of fact engaged with its historical moment.

The broader survey in The Rise of the American Film relates a similar story: The economic crisis of the Great Depression prompted Hollywood cinema to address social, political, and economic issues. However, whereas the avant-garde turned from abstract formal experiments toward political engagement, Hollywood responded with a tepid realism diluted by romance and sentimentality. To support this claim, Jacobs contrasts Joris Ivens's The Spanish Earth (1937) with Hollywood's treatment of the Spanish Civil War as mere setting for melodrama. For Jacobs, several factors—particularly the increasing call for censorship from groups like the Legion of Decency—strangle the urge toward truth in commercial cinema. During the decade his voice often joined the chorus opposing censorship and the Production Code.

Despite his long career, Jacobs's creative heyday seems bound by the period from 1930 to 1939, yet he continued writing, teaching, and making documentaries well beyond that decade. Some films, such as The Rise of Greek Art (1960), appear uninspired and of little interest beyond their value as artifacts of educational documentary. Others, such as the 1978 film on Marcel Duchamp (Marcel Duchamp: In His Own Words) suggest an unimpaired vitality. This corpus of films awaits greater scholarly attention.

THOMAS COHEN

Biography

Born in 1905 in Philadelphia. Studied painting at the Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Art and the Art Students' League of New York. From 1930 to 1934 was coeditor of Experimental Cinema. During this period, became involved with the Film and Photo League. Moved to New York, landed a job as an editor of movie trailers, and taught briefly at the Potamkin Film School. In the early 1940s worked as screenwriter for MGM and Columbia. While holding teaching posts at the City College of New York, the Philadelphia College of Art, and New York University's Graduate School, continued to publish books and make documentaries, primarily on art and architecture. Died February 11, 1997.

Jacoby, Irving

Two people gave special meaning and direction to Irving Jacoby's life and career in film. The first was John Grierson, who met Jacoby in London in 1936 and inspired him to play a major part in the American documentary film movement. The second was Alberta Altman, who met Jacoby in 1948 and inspired him to play a major part in the American mental health film movement. Grierson became his lifelong friend and mentor. Alberta became his lifelong partner and wife.

Before meeting Grierson, Irving Jacoby had moved in New York's film and drama circles, working with Joseph Losey, Helen Grayson, and Jay Leyda on social-issue theater projects and writing scripts for Warner Brothers' short commercial films. On a visit to London in 1938, Jacoby was the right person in the right place at the right time, filling the writer's job that W.H. Auden had vacated at Grierson's General Post Office (GPO) Film Unit. Four decades later he told James Beveridge that it was like going to heaven. What he loved most were the camaraderie, the devotion to film as art and communication, the overriding concern with social problems, and the atmosphere of fun for all involved. It was a wonderful, exciting club, Jacoby felt, and he had become a member.

Back in New York City after his stay in London, Jacoby continued his life as an independent producer. Grierson went to Canada and set up the National Film Board (NFB) in Ottawa to make films and help train young Canadians in the art that would give Canada new visibility around the world. For the NFB, in association with the New York Zoological Society and the Office of Inter-American Affairs, Irving Jacoby produced, directed, and wrote High Over the Borders, an appealing, straightforward film about bird migration between North and South America. Tinged with the spirit of internationalism, Dutch filmmaker John Ferno gave Jacoby firsthand experience in balancing the exigencies of organizations and government agencies with his own artistic and social concerns. High Over the Borders was a major success in every way.

Back in New York, as the United States was drawn into the war, Jacoby persuaded City College officials to let him establish the Institute of Film Techniques to train students in the production and use of nonfiction films to promote the country's democratic ideals. With Joris Ivens and Jacoby as the major instructors, Grierson and Ferno, Willard Van Dyke, and Robert Flaherty were among the notable guest speakers during the Institute's first year, starting in February 1942. Jacoby hoped that the film courses would attract women students because he believed that 'girls are needed in virtually every branch of film producing'. Over one hundred and eighty students were enrolled in the program, and in one form or another the college's film program continued.

After two years at City College, Jacoby chose artist/filmmaker Hans Richter, a recent European emigré, to replace him as the Institute's director. Jacoby moved on to become Chief of the Non-Theatrical Section of the Office of War Information (OWI) Overseas Branch. In the Grierson tradition Irving Jacoby brought in the best people he could find—ace cameraman Boris Kaufman, noted pinboard animator Alexander Alexeieff (who designed the OWI's film logo), and costume designer Helen Grayson, who later became the OWI's only female director. They were additions to a staff that was a veritable who's who of documentary filmmaking: Willard Van Dyke, Alexander Hammid (formerly Hackenschmied), John Ferno, Henwar Rodakiewicz, Irving Lerner, Sidney Meyers, Heln van Dongen, Helen Levitt, Peter Glushanok, and many others. While at the OWI Jacoby wrote and produced Capital Story, a film about the US Public Health Service, informational in substance with a wraparound mystique to hold audiences' attention.

The end of World War II in 1945 gave Irving Jacoby the opportunity to make a second internationalist film that was purely documentary in form and content. The Pale Horseman starkly presented the realities of human suffering in postwar Europe and the Orient, and convincingly portrayed the role of the United Nations in providing food, clothing, shelter, and medical relief to combat famine, pestilence, and death. Although rarely shown since, it should be remembered.

To continue the advantages they had enjoyed as a group at the OWI, Van Dyke, Jacoby, Ferno, and Rodakiewicz joined together in 1946, as Affiliated Film Producers, Inc. Ferno and Rodakiewicz soon left, and Jacoby and Van Dyke remained as partners, but the group spirit still prevailed in the presence of Hammid, Glushanok, Grayson, Kaufman, and even Rodakiewicz, who continued to work with Affiliated on a freelance basis.

As an officer of Affiliated Film Producers, Jacoby functioned first as treasurer and later as president. As a working partner, he functioned mainly as producer and writer. Jacoby's first Affiliated film, Journey into Medicine, was sponsored by the US State Department, which had assumed the overseas peacetime authority that the OWI had held during the war. Affiliated Film Producers, Inc. (Van Dyke and Jacoby) received a handsome share of the State Department assignments.
