Journey into Medicine followed the career of a young medical student through his years as an intern, resident, and then public health physician. With Van Dyke as director and Boris Kaufman as cinematographer, the film embarked on a new direction, having a young actor in the leading role. After all, it would not have been feasible to film a real person over a period of seven or more years. The deception was hardly noticeable. The hospital environments were real and as independent producers, Jacoby and Van Dyke had considerably more frustrations than they had had at the OWI where other people paid the bills and fought the fights.

In The Photographer, which was essentially a tribute to Edward Weston, Van Dyke's mentor and friend, self-censorship prohibited Jacoby's commentary from mentioning palsy as the reason why the aging Weston trembled visibly throughout. If they had told the State Department that Weston was ill, they felt they would not have been allowed to make the film. Films about community centers, technical aid to foreign countries, and American history were more suited to governmental regulations for overseas propaganda.

Within those limitations Affiliated Film Producers' productions were almost always above average in sensitivity and craftsmanship, although increasingly wordy. It was also a problem, Jacoby felt, that there was little audience feedback, although the films were translated into more than twenty languages.

A new format became available to Jacoby with The Marriage for Moderns series, five classroom discussion films written to accompany a McGraw-Hill textbook of that name. With nonprofessionals enacting hypothetical scenes of male/female relationships, the results were predictably uneven. However, they were taking both Jacoby and Van Dyke in new directions that would forever change their lives and their careers.

For Van Dyke, changes began with his marriage to one of the young women he had cast in the Marriage for Moderns films—and with his gradual mingling with younger filmmakers rather than those of his own generation. For Jacoby, changes began with his marriage to Alberta Altman, a mental health specialist who helped make Jacoby the virtual film guru among psychiatrists, psychologists, and social workers.

Under the aegis of the Mental Health Film Board formed in 1947, Irving Jacoby produced and wrote Angry Boy, an introduction to the then tenuous idea that children with personal and social problems could benefit, without stigma, from services available at mental health centers. Directed by Alexander Hammid, who worked with people somewhat better than Van Dyke generally, the film sold some six hundred 16mm prints in its first three years, making it a blockbuster in its time. Extensive showings of Angry Boy were credited as the major factor in gaining the public support needed to establish a child guidance center in one Wisconsin town. This was the kind of social action for which Irving Jacoby had always hoped.

Like most other documentary filmmakers, Irving Jacoby also hoped for larger audiences seeing feature-length films in real movie theaters. Already there had been several successes, among them Janice Loeb and Helen Levitt's The Quiet One, about a rejected Harlem boy, directed by Sidney Meyers with commentary by James Agee.

Jacoby's feature film The Lonely Night, which he wrote, directed, and coproduced with Van Dyke, starred actress Marian Seldes in the story of the relationship between a psychiatrist (also an actor) and a young woman driven to attempt suicide because of childhood insecurities and fears. The message of The Lonely Night was clear and useful as an introduction to the basic mental health principles. Did it succeed as art? Did it belong in movie theaters? From almost any point of view, the answers were negative.

So Jacoby and his wife Alberta resumed their film careers within the confines of standard short films designed for special audiences.

Whereas formerly the films had been produced with Irving as consultant (directors included Rodakiewicz, Francis Thompson, as well as Hammid and Van Dyke), gradually Irving took over virtually all the productions, while Alberta assured their promotion and use.

Through the years, Irving Jacoby wrote, produced, and also directed films on adolescence, old age, dropouts, home aides, father-son relationships, community health centers, public health nursing, family breakdowns, and other personal and social issues.

Irving and Alberta also had children of their own: daughter Tamar, who became a journalist/author, and son Oren, who became a filmmaker.

The clubby atmosphere that Irving Jacoby hoped to create in New York after his return from London in the 1930s had scattered in many new directions. Van Dyke became director of the Museum of Modern Art's film department. Leacock's name was synonymous with unscripted cinéma vérité. Boris Kaufman had won an Academy Award for his cinematography on Elia Kazan's On the Waterfront. Hammid and Francis Thompson were making multi-screen and IMAX productions. Aram Boyajian, the City College of New York film student Jacoby had hired at the OWI as an apprentice and at Affiliated as the house editor, was now directing and producing films on art, health, and social issues for network television.

If the Griersonian spirit was really to be found in the United States, remnants must surely have remained in Irving Jacoby. As James Beveridge had written, Irving Jacoby had had first-hand contact with the British, Canadian, and American methods and purposes of documentary filmmaking, and he remained a talented and dedicated filmmaker during all those years.

CECILE STARR

Biography

Born in New York City, May 29, 1909. Graduated from City College of New York, 1929. Studied under Max Reinhardt at the University of Vienna, 1929–30. Writer of short comedy, musical, and animated films for Warner Brothers in New York, 1931–8. Collaborated with Dr Seuss on several cartoons. Stage manager of the Fifth Avenue Playhouse; producer (with John Hammond) of several Broadway plays, including Jayhawker by Sinclair Lewis and Little Old Boy, directed by Jose Losey, 1930–6. Founder and director of Institute of Film Techniques, City College of New York, 1941–3. Chief, Non-Theatrical Film Section, Office of War Information Overseas Branch, in New York City, 1943–5. Treasurer and later president of Affiliated Film Producers, Inc. (with Willard Van Dyke and others), 1946–80. Coproducer (with Shirley Clarke and Van Dyke) of Skyscraper, Academy Award nominee in Short Documentary category, 1959. Consultant and producer-director-writer of Mental Health Film Board productions, 1948–85. Married to Alberta Altman, 1951. American Psychiatric Association's Robert T. Morse Award, 1975. Died in New Haven, Connecticut, December 1, 1980.

Selected films

- 1931 Neath the Bababa Trees: cowriter (with Dr Seuss)
- 1942 High Over the Border: producer, director, writer
- 1946 The Pale Horseman: producer, director, writer
- 1946 Journey into Medicine: (with Van Dyke) producer, writer
- 1947 The Photographer: (with Van Dyke) producer, writer
- 1950 Marriage for Moderns series: (with Van Dyke and Hammid) producer, writer
- 1951 Angry Boy: (with Hammid) producer, writer
- 1953 The Lonely Night: producer, director, writer
- 1953 American History series: (with Grayson) producer, writer
- 1954 Man to Man: cowriter, director
- 1955 Tobey and the Tall Corn: (with Leacock) producer
- 1959 Skyscraper: (with Clarke, Van Dyke) coproducer
- 1961 Miracle of Spring: (for Coca Cola TV Spectacular) producer, director
- 1966 Community Mental Health: producer, director, writer
- 1968 Snow Treasure: producer, director, writer
- 1970 Hitch: producer, director, writer
- 1973 First Friends: producer, director, writer

Further reading

- Beveridge, James and Grierson, John, Film Master, New York: Macmillan, and London: Collier Macmillan, 1978.
- EFLA Service Supplement, 'Irving Jacoby', New York, Educational Film Library Association, August 1965.
- Jacoby, Irving, The Photographer, printed text of commentary of the film, Monterey: W.T. Lee, c. 1950.
- 'Interview', in John Grierson, Film Master, by James Beveridge, New York: Macmillan, and London: Collier Macmillan, 1978.
- Starr, Cecile, 'Through the Psychiatric Looking Glass', Saturday Review, 12 May 1951.

Jane

(US, Leacock, 1962)

Jane was one of the last films that Drew Associates made for Time, Inc.'s Living Camera series, and one of the last films on which D.A. Pennebaker was the principal cameraman. It marks the beginning of Pennebaker's exploration of entertainers, which would reach its most acclaimed peaks with Dont Look Back and Monterey Pop, and is also most notable for its illustration of the complex relationship between subject and cameraman.

Jane records the rehearsals, preparations, and performances of a weak Broadway comedy, The Fun Couple, starring Jane Fonda in her first leading role for the theater. Pennebaker and correspondent/producer Hope Ryden worked long days following Fonda and her director/boyfriend, Andreas Voutsinas, as they rehearsed and traveled to several American cities in the time-honored tradition of taking the show to the road before presenting it in New York, the prestigious center of the American theater. The amount of footage was considerable. The film's clear structure belies the difficulties in making the film, and implicitly questions the veracity of filmmakers who must take one hundred thousand feet of film and shape a sixty-minute 'drama', which is indeed what Jane is.

One of the premises for direct cinema is its unobtrusiveness, its desire to minimize the effects of the camera's presence. What complicates matters is that many of the subjects of the most noted vérité films of the 1960s are used to the presence of the camera; this is likely the rationale for subject selection in the first place, but it nevertheless raises questions. Fonda herself was evidently aware of the difficulties, since she later admitted that the camera's presence made it impossible to tell when she was acting and when she was not (Mamber 1975). In this sense, Jane presents a 'performance' by Fonda being Jane Fonda. Despite this, it conveys the impression that Fonda, in her mid-twenties, is still trying to learn who 'Jane Fonda' is, and in the smaller details captured by the camera one can see glimpses of that struggle of a young woman becoming herself.

Fonda comes across as a nervous young girl. She registers shock as she realizes the first performance on the road is just days away by putting her fingers to her lips; she is then seen biting on her thumb as she gets berated by Voutsinas during rehearsal. The most compelling scenes take place in her dressing room, where she appears to be alone (though shots reveal her maid, whose quiet, nearly invisible presence says as much about race relations as the Drew films that made race their subject). At times, she appears to be speaking to the filmmakers (Pennebaker is briefly visible in a few shots, reflected in the many mirrors the dressing room has), trying to use the film to express her viewpoints about her career and its relation to her father's. Her dialogue has the ring of the confessional, as she explains that she has worked twice as hard and has taken more acting and dance classes than her father. Fonda seems constantly aware of the camera's presence and, not content to simply sit, she regularly finds things to do: some of the most aesthetically fascinating shots feature her putting on her stage makeup and doing facial exercises. Especially interesting is a mirror shot of her drinking a tiny bottle of liquor on opening night, then turning to her left, smiling (to Ryden), and putting her finger to her lips.

Fonda's reactions to the brutal reviews form what we are to take as the climax of the film. In her reaction to Walter Kerr's New York Herald Tribune review, she can barely contain her tears. This, we are to presume, is the 'real' Jane Fonda—hurt, saddened, and confused, questioning her judgment. Unfortunately, because of editing decisions, we do not see the process through which her reactions become defeatist; Leacock reports that her initial reactions were dismissive, denying their relevance, and that only over time did she 'face the truth' (O'Connell 1992). Even more interesting are the final dressing room shots: having been told that the second night will be the last, Fonda is seen twirling her hair in frustration as she has to deal with failure—and do so with a camera present.

While fascinating, perhaps even revelatory, Jane is undermined by the film's editing, which imposes a 'crisis structure' in an artificial way (the 'crisis' here has considerably lowered stakes than in films such as The Chair or Crisis, or even On the Pole, where lives are literally at stake). The pressures of bringing a show to Broadway are visible in the rehearsals and performances (aided slightly by a narration that is mostly obtrusive). The fear of failure is made manifest through the representation of Kerr. He is seen briefly at the beginning of the film, is mentioned just before opening night, and is seen leaving his suburban home driving into Manhattan, talking about the theater, typing his review at his office. At a key moment in Fonda's dressing room, as she prepares to go on, the film cuts between Fonda and Kerr's trip into Manhattan, as if there were a shoot-out about to take place. 'I have a funny feeling in the pit of my stomach' is followed by a shot of Kerr talking about how few actors can carry a play. It is somewhat laudable that Kerr is given a human face, but it ultimately detracts from the overall feeling the film is trying to convey. These editing devices weaken what is a generally fascinating glimpse into the consciousness of a young entertainer.

TOM GROCHOWSKI

See also: Pennebaker, D.A.

Jane (US, Time-Life Broadcast and Drew Associates, 1962, 54 mins). Distributed by Drew Associates. Executive producer: Robert Drew. Produced by Hope Ryden. Filmmakers: D.A. Pennebaker and Hope Ryden, with Richard Leacock, Gregory Shuker, and Abbot Mills. Edited by Nell Cox, Nancy Sen, and Eileen Nosworthy. Additional photography by James Lipscomb and Alfred Wertheimer.

Further reading

- Bluem, William, Documentary in American Television, New York: Hastings House, 1965.
- Fonda, Jane, 'Jane', Cahiers du Cinema 25, December 1963–January 1964: 182–90.
- Issari, M. Ali and Paul, Doris A., What is Cinema Verite? London: Scarecrow Press, 1979.
- Mamber, Stephen, Cinema Verite in America: Studies in Uncontrolled Documentary, Cambridge, MA: MIT Press, 1975.
- O'Connell, P.J., Robert Drew and the Development of Cinema Verite in America, Carbondale, IL: Southern Illinois University Press, 1992.

Janis

(US, Alk, 1974)

Janis has been called the most comprehensive film ever made about 1960s rock star Janis Joplin. However, in the age of the television documentary, such as VH1's Behind the Music, comprehensive seems a relative term. Critically acclaimed in its day as well as commercially successful, Janis provides ample concert footage of the rock icon and a few revealing interviews. As a compilation film, Janis portrays the public Joplin from 1967 to 1970 and consists of approximately twenty-five scenes; over half of them are devoted to performances of some of her most famous songs. More than anything, Janis is a concert film.

The most impressive aspect of Janis is the research done over a three-year period by executive producer F.R. (Budge) Crawley to secure the rights to Joplin's concert performances, rehearsals, and interviews from a variety of sources. The sources include sequences from the Monterey Pop Festival where Joplin, along with Jimi Hendrix and Otis Redding, was catapulted into international fame by D.A. Pennebaker's own critically acclaimed documentary Monterey Pop. Crawley's dedication to the project began with his own witnessing of Joplin's virtuosity during the Festival Express concert tour, which crossed Canada in 1970. Notoriously persistent, Crawley and his production company, Crawley Films Ltd, spent thousands of dollars to rescue a failing film that documented that tour, entitled Festival Express (eventually screened at the Toronto International Film Festival in 2003). Much of the Festival Express footage branched into the creation of Janis.

Although Janis was ultimately Crawley's endeavor, others contributed to its development. Howard Alk and Seaton Findlay are credited as directing and editing the film. Paul Harris worked as the production coordinator on the film, and Robert Leclair and Gary Bourgeois were responsible for sound. The film is flanked with creative touches. Mik Casey and Stephen Dennis created the psychedelic animation typical of the time period that introduces the film, and the photographic montage at the end was compiled and created by Ron Haines.

As alluded to earlier, Janis is a portrait of the public icon that Joplin created for the stage. The film never really introduces a 'backstage' Janis and never interviews anyone who might reveal that Janis to the viewer. In fact, the film never provides interviews of anyone but Joplin herself. There are three short interviews with fans about her impact, but they are negligible. A few of the Joplin interviews do hint at the despondent Joplin written about in a multitude of biographies. She is sensitive and vulnerable while being interviewed by a Texas reporter on the event of her attendance at her ten-year high school reunion in Port Arthur, Texas. The close-up shot from Joplin's side shows her eyes even as she wears her famous sunglasses for the interview. In those small windows the viewer may see a battered soul filled with hurt from never belonging. This particular interview also captures Joplin's uneven emotional state and need for approval when her sister, Laura, sitting by Joplin's side, confides that her parents describe Joplin as 'exceptional'. At this moment, Joplin's mood changes drastically, and she shrieks with delight at the discovery. There are only a few moments such as these where the viewer might get a sense of Joplin as a person. However, Joplin is always fully aware of the camera, and clearly performs for it, an act revealing in itself. Ironically, Joplin herself makes the issue of sincerity central to the film by commenting on being 'real', contrasting her identity with those women of the 1960s who wore 'cardboard eyelashes and girdles'. Janis makes this remark, about her lack of premeditation, sitting in a trademark white fur cap and coat.

Janis is an appropriate title because the film focuses on Janis exclusively and never on the members of the three bands she played with in the three short years of her celebrity. The bands, Big Brother and the Holding Company, the Kozmic Blues Band, and the Full Tilt Boogie Band, are always filmed as backup, much like their roles in her life and career. Unfortunately, documentaries function to bring relationships and their complications to life. Janis does no such thing. Bands change without notice. Only a fan or scholar of Joplin would recognize the incongruent faces throughout the film. In the compiled footage the members are given no voice. The content of the film comments on this in an early recording session of Big Brother and the Holding Company. As the producer, John Simon, stops the rehearsal to get guitarist Sam Andrew's famous introduction to 'Summertime' right, Joplin shows a lack of interest and comments that only the vocals are important. Here, the film provides another revealing moment, but these moments are few and far between.

As a concert film, Janis is impressive. The film provides footage from important historical concerts, such as Monterey Pop and Woodstock, as well as early performances by Big Brother and the Holding Company and European tour footage with the Kozmic Blues Band. As expected, much concert footage comes from the Festival Express tour in Canada in 1970. During this tour, Joplin was with the Full Tilt Boogie Band, a band reputed to be the right fit for Joplin and a band with which she might have remained, had she not died of a heroin overdose later that same year. A majority of the film is devoted to these concert moments and Joplin's famous heartfelt monologues at the end of many of the songs. Maybe these comments are the most telling; themes of loneliness and the allusive nature of love abound, and Joplin delivers each with passion. The film ends with the number one 'Me and Bobby McGee' and Haines' chronological photographic montage. It is in this moment that the viewer gets remnants of the complicated life behind a surface that was merely skimmed.

TRACY STEPHENSON SHAFFER

Janis: A Film. (US, Crawley Films, 1974, 96 mins). Directed by Howard Alk. Written by Howard Alk and Seaton Findlay. Distributed by Universal Pictures and MCA/Universal Home Video.

Japan

Cinema arrived in Japan within a couple years of its invention, and Japanese companies were quick to exploit the possibilities of the new medium. Indeed, industries across Asia were initially begun by traveling Japanese entrepreneurs. In both contexts nonfiction was a significant part of production, especially in the early years. By the late 1930s Japan featured one of the largest industries in the world, and during World War II it expanded to cover much of the Asian continent. These films served industry, journalism, and government, but early adoption of small-gauge equipment meant that Japan also enjoyed a lively amateur scene and radical, anti-establishment documentary started as early as the 1920s. Along with this vigorous production activity, many of Japan's most important critics and philosophers have turned their attention to the documentary in rigorous essays and books about the nonfiction form. In short, Japan boasts a long tradition in documentary, the history of which is every bit as complex as better-known national cinemas such as those in Britain and the United States.

There are a number of reasons why the documentary developed so quickly and thoroughly in early twentieth-century Japan. The feature film industry was one of the largest in the world, and there was certainly some synergy with the documentary. Japan had a relatively well-educated populace, thanks to a centralized education system; these educators were well informed about the latest developments in pedagogy across the globe and were enthusiastic early adopters of 'new technology' in the form of the education film. This energized domestic production led to the importation of large film libraries from abroad, and helped to create an infrastructure for reception outside of the feature film theater. Major newspapers began producing visual supplements to their papers in 1908, showing them in public parks and temporary theaters. Finally, the government discovered the powers of film propaganda at the turn of the century with actualities of the Boxer Rebellion and the Russo-Japanese War. In coming decades they would use film to justify their colonial adventures abroad to the nation and to drum up popular support for the treasures and lives their wars would require.

In the 1910s and 1920s most documentary was produced for one of two reasons: journalism or education. Production of newsreels was sporadic in the first few decades, and covered primarily political incidents and sporting events such as boxing and sumo. Newspapers set up film units for this by 1910, and there were a number of attempts at regular production (although none went beyond ten issues or so). However, competition between newspapers Asahi and Osaka Mainichi eventually led to well-produced, regularly issued newsreels in the 1910s. Soon they were fixtures of the feature film theaters, as in the rest of the world. There was a striking proliferation of newsreels in the mid-1930s, and at the height of their popularity there were even specialized theaters just for newsreels and documentary shorts. However, the government initiated a series of consolidations during the China War as a strategy for keeping tight control over both raw film stock and content, and the number of specialized theaters was reduced to a handful by the end of the Pacific War.

The possibilities of using film for pedagogy were immediately recognized by Japanese educators. The first organization to inquire into this was formed in 1901. This was the first of many organizations that would form to debate the proper use of film for education. These groups often produced films and published books and magazines about film education. The Ministry of Education's first film was a record of the massive earthquake in Tokyo in 1923. After that it funded a wide variety of documentaries for education, created 'children's film days' across Japan, and established lending libraries. As time went on, the Ministry increasingly participated in the regulation of nonfiction film aimed at youth, from exerting influence on censorship legislation to creating a 'recognition system' that nipped problematic projects in the bud (without recognition, most theaters would not show the films in the late 1930s).

By the China War, the government had established production offices in a number of ministries, established complex censorship systems aimed at the documentary, and regularly subsidized large-scale productions by the major studios. It passed laws that required the screening of documentaries—now called 'Culture Films' after the German 'Kulturfilme'—before feature films. The studios and production companies enthusiastically rose to the occasion and there was an explosion in documentary production, including large-scale, expensive projects with military support. They also collaborated with the government in running captured film studios in the new colonies. During the Pacific War, 'Japanese documentary' would have to include studios in Taiwan, Korea, the Philippines, Java, Shanghai, and Manchuria, and a distribution system for stock, rushes, finished films, and personnel rivaled in complexity only by the Americans. As the war dragged on, the government felt the need to control scarce resources and potentially damaging content. They found that a forced consolidation of the industry was a convenient resolution to these problems. Before the 1939 Film Law there were between two hundred and three hundred documentary production companies in Japan, but by the end of the war there were only four. This new, monolithic bureaucracy could easily control the flow of chemicals and raw film stock, enforce complicated and stifling censorship laws, and regulate the workplace to a startling degree.

Amidst the gradual displacement of nonwar subjects during the China War, glimpses of subversive dissent appeared at the height of the conflict. Many of the key documentary filmmakers were leftists of one sort or another, and a number of them got their start in the Proletarian Film League of Japan, or Prokino for short. This radical collective formed in 1929, thus predating analogous movements like the Workers' Farm and Photo League and its European counterparts. At the height of their activities they had about one hundred circles across Japan, published rigorous books and journals, and produced nearly fifty films before their suppression by the government in 1934. By this time, filmmakers faced a choice between cooperation with an increasingly belligerent and militaristic government, an unrelated career, or retirement. However, those who chose to stay in the film world occasionally found subtle ways to make their frustration felt within their films.

For example, the most famous documentary filmmaker in Japan was Kamei Fumio, who never joined Prokino but did visit the Soviet Union to study painting. Upon his return to Japan, he started making documentaries, a number of which were stunningly subversive. Shanghai and Peking (both 1937) look at the continental cities under Japanese occupation; the former makes the nervousness of the Chinese palpable through clever editing, and the latter becomes something of a love song to the ancient city through creative sound montage. His Kobayashi Issa (1941) was ostensibly a tourist public relations (PR) film, but it actually noted the desperate poverty of this rural area. Kamei's greatest accomplishment, however, was Tatakau heitai (Fighting Soldiers, 1939). Toho Studios 'embedded' him with the army units invading Wuhan, and Kamei masterfully deployed all the tools of cinematography, montage, and sound editing to subvert the militaristic designs of the film's sponsors. The film was suppressed and lost for decades, and Kamei was imprisoned just before the attack of Pearl Harbor.

At the end of the Pacific War the Japanese film industry lay in ruins. However, the first two films made during the occupation are among the most important in their history. In the weeks after surrender, a group of documentary filmmakers decided that the situation in those two cities must be quickly documented, and so they embarked on a project that would result in one of the most precious films in documentary cinema. Camera crews traveled to the ravaged cities, accompanied by teams of scientists. Their intention was to document the tragedy of this attack on civilians and to send their footage to the International Red Cross. These plans were scuttled when the first US troops landed in Nagasaki and promptly arrested one of the cameramen. The footage was subsequently confiscated, and then returned on the condition that the filmmakers complete their film under the auspices of the United States Strategic Bombing Survey. It was titled Hiroshima, Nagasaki ni okeru genshibakudan no koka/The Effects of the Atomic Bomb on Hiroshima and Nagasaki (1946). This was only the first of several rounds of suppression until Eric Barnouw's efforts brought the newly declassified film to the world's attention in 1968. The film narrowly escaped the oblivion of political suppression thanks to courageous filmmakers from both countries who hid prints before handing materials over to the US government. Thanks to their efforts, we all have images of the horrifying power of atomic weaponry, as these were the only moving images collected before human death and architectural reconstruction covered up the last traces of the bombings.

The other major documentary of the immediate postwar era was Nihon no higeki/A Japanese Tragedy (1946). Directed by Kamei Fumio and produced by former Prokino member Iwasaki Akira (the only other documentary filmmaker to be imprisoned during the war), this was a collage film drawing on wartime newsreels to expose the lies perpetrated by the government since the 1931 Manchurian Incident. Rather than the subtle critique buried in Kamei's wartime films, A Japanese Tragedy bristles with anger and launches a vigorous, analytical attack on the Japanese newsreel and documentary, demonstrating through editing how documentary filmmakers collaborated with the government in waging total war. Ironically, Kamei's first film after the war was also suppressed; A Japanese Tragedy was confiscated by his liberators, the Americans, and surfaced decades later when returned by the US Library of Congress. The reason for the suppression was purely political: Kamei and Iwasaki made no secret of the fact that the source of inspiration for their critique was Marxism, and the film became the first victim of the Red Purge and the so-called Reverse Course of the Occupation.

The American Occupation did, however, play a crucial role in the reestablishment of documentary in the daily lives of the Japanese. First, they poured money into the production of films that would 'democratize' the populace and reeducate them in the fundamentals of their new political system. Second, and more importantly, they sowed the countryside with 16mm projectors. This would become the infrastructure for the independent cinema of the post-Occupation era. According to the Occupation's own figures, their films were seen by 13,017,973 Japanese spectators in 1947; 92,847,545 in 1948; 280,910,727 in 1949; 342,211,521 in 1950; and reached 472,341,919 viewers by the end of the Occupation.

In those days before the widespread use of television, PR films were one of the key tools of advertising. Thus, as the industrial might of Japan grew, so too did the documentary. As these PR films became the mainstay for independent producers, a number of filmmakers returned to political subjects in their spare time after the 1952 end of the Occupation. Once again, Kamei led the way. Collecting funds from unions and political movements, he tackled subjects as diverse as the atomic bombings, radiation poisoning, and the inevitable social problems surrounding US military bases. Among the most famous of these films is the Sunagawa Series, particularly Sunagawa no hitobito—kichi hantai toso no kiroku/The People of Sunagawa—A Record of the Anti-Base Struggle (1955). In some respects this film foreshadowed the achievements of the later Sanrizuka Series by Ogawa Productions.

It was not too long before the inevitable strictures of the PR film became restricting for filmmakers. This was occurring just as television arrived on the scene, and the money available for PR films reached its zenith. The more powerful directors were able to work within wildly large budgets, even in 35mm scope and color. They brought all their creative energies to bear on the films, subsequently leading to problems with inevitably conservative sponsors. This period coincided with both the political turbulence around the 1960 signing of the joint security treaty with the United States (which put Japan under the US nuclear umbrella) and the rhetoric of auteurism in the late 1950s and early 1960s. Before long the most talented of the young directors bolted for independence and the political and artistic freedom it promised.

The most important group of these directors came from Iwanami Productions. This is where Hani Susumu produced his Kyoshitsu no kodomotachi/Children of the Classroom (1954) and Eo kaku kodomotachi/Children Who Draw (1956), which shocked audiences with their vérité-like methods (despite predated analogous developments in Europe and America). More important, the younger members of Iwanami formed a reading and experimentation group called Blue Group (Ao no kai), where they would screen rushes and debate film theory and practice. Blue Group's membership reads like a roster of the best directors and cinematographers in postwar Japan: Ogawa Shinsuke, Tsuchimoto Noriaki, Kuroki Kazuo, Higashi Yoichi, Tamura Masaki, Suzuki Tatsuo, and a couple dozen more. Scandalized by several incidents where sponsors dictated changes in work of directors (read 'authors'), the Blue Group dissolved as its members went independent shortly after 1960.

At the very same time, the professional organizations for documentary were in turmoil. Up to this point, they had been dominated by members of the Old Left (which is ironic considering the bulk of their work was for large corporations). Around the time of the security treaty renewal in 1960, younger filmmakers, such as Matsumoto Toshio, Noda Shinkichi—along with help from others like Oshima Nagisa, Tsuchimoto Noriaki, and Kuroki Kazuo—began attacking the organization's conservatism in print and in filmmaking practice. Films such as Matsumoto's AMPO joken/Security Treaty (1960) and Kuroki's Aru marason ranaa no kiroku/Record of a Marathon Runner (1964) creatively bent rules and brought critical politics and open sexuality into the PR films. Before long the organizations split under the pressure, and the scene was set for a new era in Japanese documentary.

While somewhat arbitrary, one might mark the beginning of this era in 1965 with the production of Tsuchimoto Noriaki's Ryugakusei Chua Sui Rin/Exchange Student Chua Sui Rin (1965) and Ichikawa Kon's Tokyo Orinpikku/Tokyo Olympiad (1965). Regrettably, the latter film has come to represent Japanese documentary for many outside Japan. This is unfortunate, considering Ichikawa never showed any interest in the documentary outside of this special film; indeed, from the Japanese perspective, Tokyo Olympiad represented the ultimate sponsored film with its enormous budget from the central government and some of the largest corporations in the world. By way of contrast, Tsuchimoto worked on a shoestring to make his documentary on a Malaysian foreign student being deported at the request of the Malay government. Student activists mobilized to prevent this political deportation, and Tsuchimoto allied his film to their cause. This film stood for everything that was fresh and new in the newly stimulated documentary scene.

Tsuchimoto's film became emblematic for the new political documentary gaining footing in Japan. This approach achieved national prominence with Ogawa Shinsuke's Forest of Pressure (Assatsu no mori/The Oppressed Students, 1967). Ogawa had gathered a newsreel-like group of students from various universities for his previous film, Seinen no umi/Sea of Youth (1966), which was on the problems of distance learning. They called their group the Independent Screening Organization (Jishu Joei Soshiki no Kai), or Jieiso for short, and it quickly reached national proportions with offices staffed by young activists all over Japan. They found the subject of their next film in the noisy protests of students at a regional university. This was just as the student movement gathered steam in anticipation of the 1970 renewal of the US security treaty, and radical students began barricading themselves in the school grounds. Forest of Pressure electrified the country by showing the passion and seriousness of these students, which was particularly inspiring because it was such a minor school as opposed to one of the elite national universities.

In the coming years Tsuchimoto and Ogawa would become iconic figures of the New Left, and each made monuments of the Japanese cinema in the late 1960s and 1970s. Tsuchimoto went to southern Japan to make a series of documentaries on the victims of mercury poisoning at Minamata, and Ogawa took his collective (now named Ogawa Productions) to a rural area outside Tokyo called Sanrizuka, where the government announced it would build a new international airport. The Minamata Series and Sanrizuka Series are powerful examples of social documentary allied to political activism.

The Minamata Series and Sanrizuka Series also mark a new conception of the documentary in Japan. Up to this point, the documentary—it was argued—allied itself to the center of political power and reduced its 'subjects' to mere objects. Tsuchimoto and Ogawa demonstrated how filmmakers could center their films on the subjectivities of the people in front of the cameras. Each series is something like an extended experiment, registering the changes in their conception of documentary in the course of their filmmaking. In effect, the films become a record of the transformations in the relationships between filmmakers and the people filmed. This change is particularly pronounced in Ogawa's work, probably because he (unlike Tsuchimoto) lived in Sanrizuka with the farmers as they protested the airport construction, and also because he aspired to make films in as collective a mode as possible. The first film of the Sanrizuka Series, Sanrizuka no natsu/Summer in Sanrizuka (1968), is a roughly hewn film filled with spectacular battles between policemen and farmers. As time wore on, the farmers and their concerns come increasingly to the center of the films. By Dai-ni toride no hitobito/Peasants of the Second Fortress (1971), Ogawa was including remarkably long discussions among the farmers over issues that were probably of more interest to the farmers than his spectators. However, in this change we see the filmmaker edging increasingly closer to the subjectivity of his 'objects'. These tendencies culminate in his masterpiece, Heta buraku/Heta Village (1973).

While the Sanrizuka and Minamata Series dominate our sense of Japanese documentary history, there was a proliferation of independent documentary during the 1960s and early 1970s. Filmmakers such as Kuroki and Higashi brought documentary codes into the feature film, as feature filmmakers such as Imamura Shohei, Oshima Nagisa, and Yoshida Kiju tried their hands at documentary (often for television, which was briefly open to innovative nonfiction films). Oe Masanori, who made the first New York Newsreel film, No Game (1968), came back to Japan and attempted to start a similar movement in Japan. Adachi Masao was one of many filmmakers to start in university film club settings and move into the blurring border between the avant-garde and the documentary. He made a number of fascinating films with other authors from the journal Eiga Hihyo (Film Criticism) before his Sekigun/PFLP: Sekai senso sengen/The Red Army/PFLP: Declaration of World War (codirected with Wakamatsu Koji, 1971) led him to join the Red Army and spend several decades in Lebanon. There was explosive growth in the independent documentary in this period, and a willingness on the part of audiences to enjoy work that tampered with conventions and took up political causes of every type.

This growth started changing in the early 1970s when the student movement began winding down. People began to lose faith in social activism due to a marked increase in violence. Three policemen were killed in a skirmish at Sanrizuka, and one of the young farmers committed suicide. As for the student movement, it had always been marred by violent internal rivalry and this climaxed in 1972 when a sect of the Red Army holed up in a mountain cabin. Over the course of a winter, they 'corrected' many of their members through torture, burying several of the most unfortunate victims in the woods. The group gave up in a ten-day hostage standoff from police, which was broadcast live on national television. Aside from breaking the back of activism by alienating people from movement politics, this also heralded the new supremacy of television news.

As television came to dominate what was the domain of the PR film, and as the openness that invited the likes of Oshima to television gave way to conventionalization and an increasingly prostrate journalism world, consumer-level video came within the grasp of independent producers. That Japan was the source for much of the equipment probably contributed to its early adoption by artists. The first rumbles of this change may be traced back to the 1970 World Exposition in Osaka, which attracted independent artists of every stripe. The fair had enormous capital behind it, and sponsored many moving image media projects. This is precisely why politicized filmmakers such as Oe and Tsuchimoto agitated against it, and there was even an 'Anti-Expo' held at a nearby park, where Oe showed his six-screen Great Society (1970), which basically summed up the 1960s. However, it must have been difficult to turn down such luxurious budgets after struggling on a shoestring, and many prominent filmmakers and video artists were happy to take the money, migrate away from social engagement, and turn to personal expression in mostly apolitical avant-garde film and video art.

At precisely this moment in the early to mid-1970s, a new form of documentary called the private film reached Japanese screens. The two filmmakers most closely identified with the change are Suzuki Shiroyasu and Hara Kazuo. The latter burst onto the documentary scene in 1974 with Kyokushiteki erosu: Renka 1974/Extreme Private Eros: Love Song 1974 (1974). The film lays the filmmaker's personal relationships out for the world to see. Having left his rather abusive wife (Takeda Miyuki) and taken up with a new woman (Kobayashi Sachiko, his present wife and producer), Hara decides to make a film, as he explains in the opening voice-over, to come to terms with his ex-wife. With Kobayashi recording the sound, they follow his former wife around the country. Hara bares all: he includes the verbal abuse he takes from Takeda (some of it well-deserved), he runs his camera while making love with her, and he films her giving birth on the kitchen floor. This indulgence in the personal, this extremely public exposure of the private, proved earth-shaking in the context of a documentary world, the values of which were formed by films like the Sanrizuka Series and the Minamata Series. Hara's subsequent films, particularly Yuki yukite shingun/The Emperor's Naked Army Marches On (1989) and Zenshin shosetsuka/A Dedicated Life (1994) also focused on charismatic individuals and were no less controversial.

Hara's emergence was followed by the arrival of Suzuki, an NHK television cameraman and prominent poet. Considering this combination of vocations it should not be surprising that the contradictions between producing corporate and personal representations proved stifling. Inspired by the work of Jonas Mekas, Suzuki began producing diary films. His Nichibotsu no insho/Impressions of a Sunset (1974) and the three-hundred-and-twenty-minute Kusa no kage o karu/Harvesting Shadows of Grass (1977) recorded the mundane events of daily life, the details of the physical spaces he moved through, and his fetishistic fascination with the camera.

Thus, the early to mid-1970s seem to constitute a break, with new filmmakers rejecting the dominant conception of documentary practice in which films were produced within organizations of people, whether collectives, companies, political parties, or the military. There have been high-profile attempts to resurrect the possibilities of this collaborative mode of filmmaking, most notably Sato Makoto's Aga ni ikiru/Living on the River Agano (1982) and Hara Kazuo's Watashi no Mishima/My Mishima (1999). Both of these projects referenced Ogawa Productions' example, with Sato having his crew live with the victims of Minamata Disease in the mountains of Niigata and Hara producing his film by forming a collective of young people called Cinema Juku. These were ambitious plans that both failed and succeeded. They are interesting on their own merits, particularly Sato's film, but they also seem anachronistic, as if the age of collective production were a thing of the past. Hara's film especially indicates the transformation in Japanese youth and its relationship to the politics and activism that independent documentary tends to embrace.

In the 1990s young documentary filmmakers demonstrated no ambivalent relationship to group; rather, they probably could not see its possibilities. This is why they fell into the footsteps of Hara and Suzuki and turned the private film into something of a strong genre. However, whereas the two older directors always located their work in relation to the engaged filmmaking of the past, particularly that of Ogawa and Tsuchimoto, younger filmmakers rarely have a strong sense of historical context. Furthermore, it is probably significant that most young documentarists work in 8mm and video, and find their training in art school settings (where many of the previous generation's most progressive artists are now ensconced as teachers), which encourage self-expression and individualized work. Uninterested in or unable to take their cameras into the social world, they retreat to the safe realm of their family and friends and the comfort of the private film.

At its best, the private film looks to the social world to explore issues of loss or the desire for social connection. By far the finest director to emerge from this approach to documentary has been Kawase Naomi. After graduating from photography school, she began making personal films in 8mm. Embracing Nitsutsumarete/Embracing (1992) is a moving documentary about her search for her father, who abandoned the family in her youth. It demonstrated a striking visual sense, and managed to be profoundly moving without devolving into a simple narcissism. She followed this with a film about the aunt who raised her, Katatumori (1994), and has since turned to documentary-inflected feature films. (Suzaku won the Camera D'Or at the Cannes Film Festival in 1997).

Outside of the private film, the movement documentary of the past continued at a smaller scale with filmmakers who would produce their work by canvassing within unions and political groups. The PR film also continued to one degree or another, although this was driven almost exclusively by filmmakers who got their start in the 1950s and 1960s. Video activism picked up after the first Gulf War with groups such as Video Act! However, since the 1980s the vast majority of documentaries are produced for television, and inevitably fit a strong set of conventions (which are particularly strict for public broadcasting in Japan). It is probably the strength of these conventions combined with the lack of alternative broadcast venues that prevented the wide variety of 1960s documentary approaches to continue to the present day.

In this regard, the Yamagata International Documentary Film Festival (and to a lesser extent, the Pia Film Festival and Image Forum Festival) has begun to open up the definition of documentary. Starting in 1989 when the image of documentary was thoroughly dominated by government television (NHK), the Yamagata festival used three main strategies for changing the documentary scene in Japan. First, it staged large-scale retrospectives of historically important documentaries, both domestic and international. Second, it created a running program of current Asian documentary, which struggled to find acceptable work at the beginning but has exploded in growth with the widespread adoption of digital video across Asia. Third, it brought the world's best filmmakers to Japan for its competition. By the turn of the century, many of the finest working documentarists had visited Japan and presented their work. These kinds of efforts have expanded the number of venues for documentary, even if television has yet to loosen its strictures, and Japanese documentary production becomes more interesting with every passing year.

ABÉ MARKUS NORNES

See also: Fumio, Kamei; Tokyo Orinpikku

Jazz on a Summer's Day

(US, Stern, 1959)

A record of one day's performances at the 1958 Newport Jazz Festival, Jazz on a Summer's Day remains surprisingly overlooked in existing explorations of documentary, music on film, or jazz. The cause for surprise lies partly in its precedent-setting influence on later concert film documentaries—Monterey Pop (1968) in particular—and partly in its singularity as a film in its own right.

Although director Bert Stern's project was in process in rough chronological parallel with the first stirrings of the direct cinema movement, the film had little in common with the movement.

Stern's background was in advertising stills photography, which, in this, his first and only film, is reflected most prominently in the heavily stylized audience shots. A number of these were placed as though in response to a different performer than was actually the case, but the artfully rhythmic editing makes these instances difficult to identify. The result, however, is a highly suggestive interface of 'artifice' and 'spontaneity'.

Shot in DeLuxe Color on color-saturated Kodachrome stock, Jazz on a Summer's Day appeared at a time when the documentary remained overwhelmingly associated with gritty authenticity, social and moral purpose, and black-and-white cinematography. Color was more readily associated with spectacle in mainstream narrative cinema (Neale 1985). The frequent close-ups of the performers and the cameras often aimed directly at the stage lights seemed to utilize both cinematic modes. In sumptuous color that would not be out of place in an MGM musical, the musicians' faces appeared to offer direct access to their thought processes.

Jazz, too, existed in the popular imagination in a milieu of monochrome, metropolitan, smoky cellars. Newport Jazz Festival, an outdoor event since 1954, was, by contrast, in Rhode Island, summer haunt of the wealthy. Coinciding with the festival was the America's Cup yacht race. The opening thirty minutes of the film juxtaposed festival performances with observational detail of the harbor and the town, as well as vertiginous aerial footage of the yacht race. The resulting collisions of social setting, age, class, and race (the latter in terms of the ethnic composition of both musicians and audience) amounted to a heady mixture with immense potential for further exploration at a time when, for example, the Civil Rights movement was gaining momentum. In Jazz on a Summer's Day, however, the cameras were largely content merely to observe, against the grain of the realist aesthetic that still prevailed among large swathes of the critical establishment of the period.

Musically, the film captures a moment when jazz was in uneven transition from popular to art music, with its richly diverse cast list including Louis Armstrong, Thelonious Monk, and Gerry Mulligan. It also featured gospel (Mahalia Jackson), R&B (Big Maybelle), and rock and roll, the newly dominant popular form, which was (somewhat controversially) represented by

Figure 7 Jazz on a Summer's Day, Louis Armstrong, 1960 (Courtesy of the Everett Collection)

Chuck Berry. Overall, the film remains a fascinating snapshot of a society on the verge of a period of social and political upheaval that could barely have been suspected at the time.

JOHN YOUNG

Jazz on a Summer's Day (US, Galaxy Productions/Raven Film, 1959, 85 mins). Distributed by Galaxy Attractions. Directed by Bert Stern. Writing credits attributed to Albert D'Annibale and Arnold Perl. Cinematography by Bert Stern, Ray Phelan, and Courtney Hafela. Editing by Aram Avakian. Featuring, in order of appearance, Jimmy Giuffre, Thelonious Monk, Sonny Stitt, Anita O'Day, George Shearing, Dinah Washington, Gerry Mulligan, Big Maybelle, Chuck Berry, Chico Hamilton, Louis Armstrong, Jack Teagarden, and Mahalia Jackson. Interviews and announcements by Willis Conover. Filmed in Newport, Rhode Island.

Further reading

Arthur, Paul, 'Jargons of Authenticity (Three American Moments)', in Michael Renov (ed.), Theorizing Documentary, New York and London: Routledge, 1993: 108–34.

- Freeman, Leonard, Jazz and the White Americans, Chicago: Chicago University Press, 1962.
- Gabbard, Krin, Jammin' at the Margins: Jazz and the American Cinema, Chicago: Chicago University Press, 1996.
- Hentoff, Nat, The Jazz Life, London: Panther, 1964: 82–95.
- Neale, Steve, Cinema and Technology: Image, Sound, Colour, London: Macmillan Education, 1985.
- Ross, Lillian, 'You Dig It, Sir?' in Ralph Gleason (ed.), Jam Session, London: Peter Davies, 1958: 194–210.

Jennings, Humphrey

Like many 1930s documentarists, Jennings came from a social and intellectual elite, imbued with high cultural traditions. However, these were transformed by his twin modern interests: surrealism and, from 1937, the very 'film-minded' mass observation (MO). Paul C. Ray has characterised MO as 'surrealism in reverse'. Surrealism sought to create 'a solidified dream image' by juxtaposing violently incongruous elements and, thus, to project the artist's symbolic imagination onto the objective world in order to transform it. Conversely, MO tried to recover the 'collective unconscious' that had produced the objects and images of ordinary waking reality, in effect, to psychoanalyse the social history of the imaginative drives behind it—what Jennings himself called the 'legacy of feeling'. (Indeed, in his 1936 essay, 'Surrealism', Jennings identified the quotidian as the widest, most democratic locus of the potentially significant: 'Coincidences have the infinite freedom of appearing everywhere, anytime, to anyone'.) These interrelated influences would be strongly reflected—though in a highly personal, warm, and lyrical manner—in Jennings's film work. His approach was consequently more cultural and anthropological than civic or socially purposive on the Griersonian model, and he never fully became part of the General Post Office (GPO) Film Unit. Grierson suspected Jennings of diletantism, and only after the former became head of Canada's National Film Board did Jennings finally gain creative autonomy.

It is certainly arguable that Jennings's early filmmaking lacked definite direction or a distinctive 'auteurial' signature, although those films did show his experimental tendencies. Starting as set designer and apprentice editor under Cavalcanti (whose influence and/or collaboration was a principal creative catalyst), he quickly went on to direct Post Haste (possibly the first nonanimated film exclusively composed of prints and drawings) and Locomotives (1934). Jennings held a lifelong fascination with mechanics/industrialism and their interaction with a more 'organic' human consciousness, as well as with semi-abstract patterning. In 1936 Jennings coproduced the avant-garde puppet film, Birth of a Robot, for Shell. After returning to the GPO, Jennings sparked controversy with Spare Time (1939), the first film clearly showing his mass-observational interest in everyday pursuits and rituals of ordinary people (summed up in MO's slogan, 'Anthropology Begins at Home') and drawing, in particular, on its documentation of leisure (centred on 'Holiday Town', i.e. Blackpool). Spare Time cross-sectioned 'mass' culture, from male-voice choir, to cinema going, to wrestling, to the fairground, to a boy reading a comic at a table. Especially because of a sequence featuring a bizarre kazoo parade on a northern wasteland, around a tableau of Britannia, Jennings was charged by mainstream documentarists with a satirical tone and lack of edifying values. However, Spare Time is now generally regarded as a rare and unpatronising record of 1930s popular culture, as well as MO's methods.

World War II's extraordinary conditions restored Jennings's professional fortunes and inspired his visual lyricism. Because of newly available Ministry of Information funding, to boost civilian morale and to promote Britain's cause to undecided neutrals, Jennings found a focus for his disparate talents and influences as the GPO was reformed as the Crown Film Unit. Jennings's output is regarded as among the best records of this 'People's War' in any national cinema. His films are driven by creative tension between affection for traditions and a symbolist's eye for the telling details of a people under the stress of modern war. Initially, Jennings's Home Front documentaries were unashamedly and (given the crisis of the time) justifiably propagandist. They played a key part in mythologising the Blitz as Britain's 'finest hour' and confirming the quiet courage, calm resolve, and common decencies of its 'national character'. However, Jennings's mid-World War II work became increasingly impressionistic, backgrounding didactic messages to elliptical subtexts.

The First Days depicted war preparations in the capital in September 1939. Although Jennings mostly contributed street footage, its overall tone points toward concerns developed more artfully in his more mature work. The film presents Britain as forced reluctantly into hostilities (opening shots show children playing on decommissioned artillery) by necessity and justice, not jingoism nor 'bogus romance'. Crucially, ordinary Londoners, waking to 'a world where everything seems strange' (epitomised by the dream-like image of a barrage balloon, half-inflated fins drooping like the tentacles of a giant cuttlefish, watched by an earthbound cat), look forward to Jennings's fuller visualising of war's forcible defamiliarisation of the texture of everyday life.

In London/Britain Can Take It (1940, approx. 8.5 mins), Jennings turned the Blitz's most celebrated image—St Paul's dome rising intact above the capital's ordeal by fire—into a metonym for defiance. Quentin Reynolds, Collier's Magazine's London correspondent, was strategically coached to lower his booming tones for the commentary. The result was downbeat, intimate, and therefore more effective, but its impact is largely attributable to ingenious matches between editing and words. Jennings showed a cross-section of civilians hurrying home to change into uniforms, to transform into 'heroes by night'. The film exemplified the notion, popularised in J.B. Priestley's Radio Postscripts (the latter voiced the British version) that a 'people's army' of volunteers were 'really fighting this war'.

As Reynolds emphasised, although daytime remained peaceful enough, 'We haven't had a quiet night now for more than five weeks'. People are shown moving into cover (some of whom, Reynolds notes laconically, will die tonight), as batteries and searchlights prepare. Jennings then cuts back and forth with incongruous simultaneity, from bombardment and retaliation, to homely images of darts players and shelter sleepers. The way the film's manipulation of soundtrack and image (over dramatic reverse shots of guns and explosions) is authenticated as 'real' remains a meta-cinematic masterstroke: 'These are not Hollywood sound effects. This is the music they play every night in London, the symphony of war.' Fires are resolutely tackled until, like malevolent 'creatures of the night', the bombers pass away. Reynolds notes that the mark of a fighter is 'getting up from the ring again' as daylight reveals devastation, but also quotidian lives stubbornly continuing—exemplified by Jennings's quasi-surreal images: a commuter train negotiating a damaged bridge, and doorstep milk deliveries. As rubble is cleared, Reynolds claims he has seen no panic nor terror and, as the RAF strikes back, inevitably concludes that the Luftwaffe cannot kill people's spirit and courage: 'London can take it'. Perhaps the most famous of Home Front documentaries because Jennings seemed to capture a public mood at the right moment, this is indubitably partly an effect of the film's discursive strategies. Until then, MOI Films Division propaganda had limited success in Roosevelt's America, but Reynolds gave the appearance of an independent viewpoint ('I am a neutral reporter ... ') converted by the evidence of his eyes, a process repeated vicariously for the viewer.

The British title aimed to placate other blitzed regions and avoid metropolitan bias. Although Jennings's The Heart of Britain (1941) strove to extend the same heroic solidarity treatment to the North and the Midlands, he had less success with the Distressed Areas of the 1930s. The film opens with a rock face, symbolising gritty provincial character, to Elgar accompaniment. However, footage of High Culture (Malcolm Sargent conducting Manchester's Hallé in Beethoven's Fifth) and RP voice-over (Jack Holmes, Crown's senior producer) sit uneasily with workers in a cross-section of industrial towns. Jennings was still to achieve the socially inclusive national vision for which his mid-war films became famous. Nonetheless, the film provided an important incidental record of the blitzing of Coventry. Similarly, in Words for Battle (1941), Jennings tried out the impressionistic method, which would fuse so successfully with a sense of cultural democracy in his best films, in creative partnership with editor Stewart MacAllister. Conscripting Britain's literary heritage, from Shakespeare to Kipling, Jennings tried to coordinate images of stoicism and battle-readiness with verse and prose excerpts read by Laurence Olivier, but the film's argument suffers from the strain of combining archaisms, didactic style, and visual symbolism. Nonetheless, Words for Battle is recognised as the first of Jennings's war pictures to have a completely distinctive identity.

However, in Listen to Britain (also of 1942), Jennings created a formally groundbreaking template for inclusive impressionistic montage, partly because of the return of his mass-observational interests. An almost symphonically structured cross-section of working and leisure routines of both civilians and service personnel, synchronised and/or counterpointed with natural and 'found' sound, Listen to Britain included many evocative popular songs and tunes of the period. Originally conceived as a short about Myra Hess's National Gallery concerts, Jennings and MacAllister developed a two-reel audiovisual mosaic, on a kind of 'free association' principle, without explicit narrative.

Listen to Britain sampled every level of wartime Britain's sound community, in both musical and social senses, resolving its contradictions through associations that suggested an underlying national unity. It ranged through Blackpool's Tower Ballroom; an ambulance station pianist; Canadians chorusing 'Home on the Range'; a school playground; a colliery; factory women enjoying Workers' Playtime, Flanagan and Allen's signature song; the Royal Marine's band; and finally back to Kenneth Clark and the Queen listening to Hess. The MOI distributed it widely overseas, the film's 'soft-centredness' typifying the difference from Nazi propaganda, with its hectoring belligerence, designed to terrorise neutrals.

Jennings's contribution to the mid-war convergence between factual filmmaking and topical features was the laconically titled Fires Were Started (1943), regarded as the acme of the understated emotionality of this narrative semi-documentary genre. Dramatic cinema specialised in empathic human interest, but the class-bound nature of British features retarded authentic reflection of the people's experience of the war. Like Ealing's The Bells Go Down, Fires Were Started was a retrospective on the National Auxiliary Fire Service, although the professional actors in the former perform awkwardly compared to the firefighters Jennings used to 'replay themselves'. His only feature-length picture (at just over sixty minutes), it proved that Jennings was also disciplined enough to direct sustained narrative, scripting the scenario himself. Fires Were Started represented ordinary Londoners doing extraordinary things, in response to extraordinary circumstances. Jennings combined laying claim to actuality, as 'straight' documentary does, with the psychological insight of fiction, reconstructing a typical conflagration from the last great fire raid of May 10, 1941.

Portraying a twenty-four-hour shift at substation 14Y, Fires Were Started focuses on new volunteer, Bill Barrett, as the perfect device for inducting the viewer vicariously into the crew's work and the working-class areas on the front-line in this kind of war. Bill, an advertising copywriter and pianist (played by novelist William Sansom, virtually a stand-in for Jennings himself by class and profession), is taken under the wing of cheery cabby, Johnny Daniels (Fred Griffiths), quickly defusing any social awkwardness. The disparate group of volunteers emphasises unity in a common cause. Jennings observed strict Grieronian decorum in the conscientiousness of his account of operational routine, as well as avoided sensational effects. During daylight hours, they drill, perform preparatory chores, and raise barrage balloons. The command structure is also shown by way of reports to the control centre. Following their evening meal, the crew, dubbed the 'Crazy Gang', briefly relax, becoming fully humanised through their humour, although commentators consider the sequence where Daniels sings 'One Man Went to Mow' as each fireman enters, to be suddenly cut off by the siren, Jennings's one rather contrived touch. They scramble to their task, with the added jeopardy that fire will spread to a docked munitions ship. The tense climax was re-created in an abandoned warehouse. 'Jacko' remains on the roof to steady the trapped crew's escape ladder, at the cost of plunging to his death. In deft simultaneity, Jennings cuts to Jacko's wife listening to the news—'It does not appear that casualties are likely to be heavy'—thus poignantly fleshing out personal tragedy behind the anonymity of official broadcasts.

Some have argued that because the enemy is offscreen and the firemen's work related only to their colleagues, Jennings presents the bombing not as culpable aggression but as a depoliticised force of nature. Conversely, he closes by cutting between the comrade's funeral and the munitions ship moving seawards, to further the struggle against its cause and symbolising 'the broader context of war, endurance, and victory' (Coultais 1989). Indeed, Jennings strives for methods of showing, not telling, creating what many deem a masterpiece of nondidactic information and persuasiveness. Simultaneously, Fires Were Started, unlike some other semi-documentaries, develops its characters convincingly, so they seem more than types in a social allegory.

The most unconventional product of Jennings's foray into the semi-documentary mode was The Silent Village (1943). The destruction of Lidice was an atrocity ordered by Hitler for the assassination of Reinhard Heydrich, 'Protector' of Bohemia, by Czech agents in May 1942. The Nazis even publicised it, in notorious footage of grinning soldiers, constituting a moment of international shock and prophetic insight into the workings of the Endlösung (final solution). Jennings transposed it onto a comparable Welsh mining village, using locals to play the victims and avoiding mere realistic reconstruction with professional actors, by imaginatively twinning Lidice and Cwmgiedd. The opening sequence of village life metonymises its innocent ordinariness. The invader then suddenly arrives at a distance, figured by a car with a loudspeaker, but virtually invisible occupants—a semi-surrealist touch characterising the film's oblique menace. Proclamations then appear, banning normal rights and activities. The miners react with a strike and sporadic sabotage, but are quelled. Jennings's narrative method is dispassionate, using minimal dialogue to advance the plot. The build-up to the massacre eschews the natural temptation to sensationalise for propaganda effect, making Jennings's tribute composed and dignified.

In 1943 Jennings picked up a story from the Mediterranean battle zone, like a surrealist objet trouvé: how a song cut across linguistic and ideological barriers to become the war's greatest international hit. Again he applied one of MO's pioneering principles, investigating cultural factors and modes of dissemination behind popular 'song consciousness' (originally conducted on the 'Lambeth Walk' craze). The True Story of Lili Marlene (1944) featured a cameo appearance by Jennings, reading the original German lyrics. The phenomenon was reconstructed: from broadcasts to Rommel's Afrika Korps; subsequent adoption by Montgomery's Eighth Army as their unofficial theme; to modification by the BBC as allied propaganda. Indeed, Jennings's mass-observation interest in modern folk rituals was pervasive in wartime. Typically, their analysis of The Pub and the People (1943) was reflected in his review of Down at the Local (1943), reminding troops in Burma about social life in Blighty. Jennings praised Richard Massingham's imaginative editing, but like his own best efforts, felt it was 'saved from cleverness by being really human'.

The influence of Jennings's audiovisual impressionism and vision of social and cultural inclusiveness is felt in other late-war documentaries, such as John Eldridge's Our Country (1945). This film follows a merchant seaman, undertaking a symbolic journey, imaging and sounding Britain's true regional, cultural, and racial diversity, on the eve of D-Day. Jennings's own Diary for Timothy (1945) was a cross-sectional record of Britain thereafter to stimulate aspirations for post-People's War social and economic reform. Some have argued that in its formal experimentation and open-endedness, Diary for Timothy is Jennings's most complex and problematic film. It combines the sound-image mosaic of Listen to Britain with the narrative drive of Fires Were Started. Beginning with the birth of Timothy James Jenkins, Jennings charts his progress, in the context of the liberation of Europe and nascence of the post-war world. The infant focuses the film's critical hopes, contrasted with the lives of a cross-section of the older generation, all intermeshing in the last year of hostilities: an engine driver, a Welsh miner, a fighter pilot, and a farmer.

Rough cut screenings provoked renewed accusations of 'artsiness' and wasting public money against MOI Films Division officials and there is undoubtedly some obscurity, or dissociation, between images. However, commentators also identify its flaws less with Jennings's audiovisual syntax than with novelist E.M. Forster's prolix commentary. Conversely, Forster himself wanted greater radicalism and objected to the choice of a child reflecting Jennings's own privileged background, rather than a representative citizen. Jennings may have done this deliberately to underscore the arbitrariness of life chances if Britain's class system continued. ('Deadly parallels', such as those between snug nursing home hearth and conditions at the face where Goronwy cuts its coal, seem to bear this out.) Perhaps uneven for both ideological and technical reasons, Diary for Timothy nonetheless includes sequences among the most celebrated in Jennings's oeuvre, for spacetime fluidity, sound-image coordination, and thematic linkage. For example, Stanley Maxted's broadcast about Arnhem cuts to the listening mother, a farmer picking it up elsewhere, then Myra Hess's hands. Jennings pans around her audience, zooms in on a girl smoothing her hair, then resumes the broadcast, telling how paratroops drank rainwater from their capes. The narrator (Michael Redgrave) then comes in, arguing the need to distinguish Germany's liberal cultural tradition from Nazism in the peace settlement. (Jennings made A Defeated People soon afterwards, a compassionate view of enemy suffering after VE Day.) Positive water images succeed, ending with the baby's baptism. The conclusive question is posed to its generation: 'Are you going to have greed for money or power ousting decency from the world as they had in the past or are you going to make the world a different place ... ?' However, this incertitude is arguably indicative of Jennings's own misgivings, just as gloomy winter footage seems metaphoric for the onset of postwar pessimism.

Jennings's films record and celebrate creative tension between historical tradition and modernity, brought to crisis by the war and its adaptational challenge to Britain's national character. His best appear to effortlessly re-create the peculiar mood and circumstances of their time, although this is as much a matter of skilfully crafted documentary poetics as neutral verisimilitude. Consequently, Jennings is usually considered the screen's leading exponent of the populist, left-leaning patriotic mythology that emerged mid-war, comparable not just to Priestley but also to George Orwell's texts, such as The Lion and the Unicorn (1941) and The English People (1947). Jennings ultimately came to see his job as mediating across the dissociation between 'mass civilisation and minority culture', one of the more pernicious legacies of British capitalist industrialism, to create a truer picture of the nation's cultural and psychic identity and enable it to recognise itself. However, Jennings undoubtedly romanticises and, with rare exceptions, downplays explicit class frictions. It remains debatable how far unanimity against external threat was historically representative, when compared to alternative accounts: prejudice against evacuees, resentment at officiousness, civil disorder, looting, and so on (some, ironically, filed by MO for the Department of Home Intelligence). His sentiments evidently seemed less convincing after hostilities, during the austerity of welfare state-building and reopening of political divisions, which led to the ousting of the Attlee government in 1951. Jennings's postwar documentaries had little public impact, though Family Portrait (1950), his last, was appropriately for the Festival of Britain.

Jennings's failure to recoup his distinctive touch suggests an obscure awareness that Britain's wartime experience could not be repeated. Nonetheless, Jennings was exceptional in that his products of state propaganda managed to transcend the expedencies of their making as works of art. His mature films remain virtually unique experiments, arguably never successfully imitated and carrying British documentary's capacity for poesis and cultural observation further than any other. Although Lindsay Anderson and other British Free Cinema directors of the 1960s acknowledged their debt, their own projects are formally less complex and radically different in their national vision, darker and more satiric.

KEITH WILLIAMS

See also: Cavalcanti, Alberto; Diary for Timothy, A; Family Portrait; Fires Were Started; Grierson, John; Listen to Britain; London Can Take It

Biography

Born Frank Humphrey Sinkler Jennings at Walberswick, Suffolk, in 1907. Graduated in English Literature from Pembroke College, Cambridge, in 1934. Joined the GPO Film Unit in 1934. Worked with Len Lye at Shell Films from 1936. Founded Mass Observation in 1937 with poet Charles Madge and anthropologist Tom Harrisson (Jennings led MO's southern team, based in Blackheath, with Madge). Rejoined the GPO in 1938 (reformed as Crown Film Unit in 1940), remaining with it for duration of the war. Directed for Wessex Films in 1949. Commissioned for the series, 'The Changing Face of Europe', died on location, falling from a cliff at Poros, Greece, in 1950.

Selected films

- 1934 Post Haste: director
- 1934 Locomotives: director
- 1934 The Story of the Wheel: editor
- 1936 Birth of a Robot: coproduced with Len Lye, colour decor
- 1938 Penny Journey: director
- 1939 Spare Time: director and (with Cavalcanti) writer
- 1939 The First Days (released in America as A City Prepares): codirected with Harry Watt and Pat Jackson

- 1940 Britain Can Take It (US title London Can Take It): codirected with Watt
- 1941 The Heart of Britain: director
- 1942 Words for Battle: director, writer
- 1942 Listen to Britain: director, coeditor
- 1943 Fires Were Started (US title I Was a Fireman): director, writer
- 1943 The Silent Village: director, writer, producer
- 1944 The True Story of Lili Marlene: director, writer
- 1944 The Eighty Days: director, producer
- 1945 Diary for Timothy: director, writer
- 1946 A Defeated People: director, writer
- 1947 The Cumberland Story: director, writer
- 1949 Dim Little Island: director, producer
- 1950 Family Portrait: director, writer
- 2000 Humphrey Jennings: The Man Who Listened to Britain: Kevin MacDonald and Fran Robertson, producer and director (Figment TV for Channel 4, 23 December)

Further reading

- Aitken, Ian, The Documentary Film Movement: An Anthology, Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press, 1998.
- Aldgate, Anthony and Richards, Jeffrey, Britain Can Take It: The British Cinema in the Second World War, second edn, Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press, 1994.
- Calder, Angus, The Myth of the Blitz, London: Jonathan Cape, 1991.
- The People's War: Britain 1939–45*, London: Jonathan Cape, 1969.
- Colls, R. and Dodd, P., 'Representing the Nation: British Documentary Film 1930–45', Screen 26, no. 1, January/February 1985: 21–33.
- Coultass, Clive, Images for Battle: British Film and the Second World War 1939–45, London, Toronto and Delaware: Associated University Presses, 1989.
- Grierson, John, Humphrey Jennings: A Tribute, London: Humphrey Jennings Memorial Fund Committee, 1951.
- Harrison, Tom, Living Through the Blitz, Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1990.
- Harrison, Tom and Madge, Charles (arranged and written), Britain by Mass-Observation, 1939; reprinted London: Cresset, 1986.
- Hodgkinson, Anthony and Sheratsky, Rodney, Humphrey Jennings: More than a Maker of Films, Hanover, NH: University Press of New England, 1982.
- Jackson, Kevin (ed.), The Humphrey Jennings Film Reader, Manchester: Carcanet, 1993.
- Jennings, Mary-Lou and Anderson, Lindsay (eds), Humphrey Jennings: Film-Maker/Painter/Poet, London: British Film Institute, 1982.

- Maclaine, Ian, Ministry of Morale: Home Front Morale and the Ministry of Information in World War II, London: Allen and Unwin, 1979.
- Nowell-Smith, Geoffrey, 'Humphrey Jennings, Surrealist Observer', in Charles Barr (ed.), All Our Yesterdays, London: British Film Institute, 1986.
- Rattigan, Neil, British Film and the People's War, 1939–45, London: Associated University Presses, 2001.
- Ray, Paul C., The Surrealist Movement in England, Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1971.
- Richards, Jeffrey and Sheridan, Dorothy (eds), Mass-Observation at the Movies, London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1987.
- Stansky, Peter and Abrams, William, London's Burning: Life, Death and Art in the Second World War, London: Constable, 1994.
- Tomicek, Harry, Humphrey Jennings, Vienna: Austrian Film Museum, 1989.
- Vaughan, Dai, Portrait of an Invisible Man: The Working Life of Stewart MacAllister, Film Editor, London: British Film Institute, 1983.
- Winston, Brian, Fires Were Started, London: British Film Institute, 1999.

Joli Mai, Le

(France, Marker, 1963)

Filmed in May 1963, Chris Marker and Pierre Lhomme's Le Joli Mai/The Lovely May is an investigation of the familiar—here (Paris, home) and now (this month, the historical present) as if viewed through the eyes of a stranger.

In the opening voice-over (adapted from Giraudoux, and read by Simone Signoret in the English version) Marker writes of Paris that 'one would like to see it for the first time, at dawn, without having seen it before, without memories, without habits'. It is a device that Marker has used in much of his work: both La Jetée/The Jetty and Sans Soleil/Sunless feature travelers from the future for whom our strange manner of living in the present is anything but obvious. In Le Joli Mai there is a tension between this desire to see a fresh and a more nuanced apprehension of social connections and contradictions founded on an intimate knowledge of a specific place, Paris, and its history, which is also implicated in other histories—notably in May 1962, the history of European colonialism. Combining elements of cinéma vérité, the attention to details of place of such earlier French documentaries as Lacombe's La Zone and Lotar's Aubervilliers, and Marker's own meditative, essayistic approach to filmmaking, Le Joli Mai is a kind of time capsule that refuses its viewers the comfort of nostalgia.

Credited jointly to Marker and the cinematographer Pierre Lhomme, Le Joli Mai is divided into two parts: 'Prayer from the Top of the Eiffel Tower' and 'The Return of Fantômas'. Fantômas is the criminal mastermind whose exploits were brought to the cinema by Louis Feuillade in 1914, and who functions as an emblem of the political violence that threatens to overshadow the city. Although the film's second part places somewhat more emphasis on large-scale public events, both parts combine cinéma vérité-style interviews with a very wide range of Parisians—their aspirations, their ideas of happiness, their responses to events from the Renault strike to John Glenn's orbiting the Earth—with a variety of other footage of the street life and neighborhoods of Paris. The handheld camera prowls through the narrow alleys of an Aubervilliers slum or a shanty town near Saint Ouen; looks down from the top of the Eiffel Tower on the birds and people below; catches a poet reciting couplets on the Place des Vosges; observes people dancing at a nightclub (and dances with them); sneaks into a gallery opening; and travels by car through the streets at dawn. Some of this footage is used to introduce new sequences; some is used to comment on or as counterpoint to an interview in progress; and some is worked in associatively, or linked to Marker's voice-over commentary, which itself frames and reflects on the vérité sequences. The juxtaposition of these disparate elements—the different verbal textures of commentaries and interviews, Lhomme's extraordinarily fluid and expressive cinematography, and Michel Legrand's music, itself an alternately melancholy and acerbic commentary on what's spoken and seen—produces a collective portrait of the city at a moment of both renewal and unease.

An opening title informs or reminds us that May 1962 was 'referred to by some, at the time, as "the first springtime of peace"', but the qualified phrasing invites us to question the apparent optimism of the description (and of the film's title). The Algerian war had ended the year before, but in an interview at the end of the film's first part, a young soldier, standing with his fiancée on the Pont de Neuilly, reveals that he's leaving for Algeria in a fortnight. 'I don't dare to think about anything, and I don't want to,' he says; 'Leave [political events] alone and they'll be forgotten.' However, the forgotten, the repressed of history, keeps forcing its way back into the light. Hostile to any negotiations that might lead to Algerian independence from France, Raoul Salan (the French military commander in Algeria in the late 1950s) had founded, in 1961, the OAS (Organisation de l'Armée Secrète) to conduct terror campaigns in France in an attempt to bring down the government and reassert French colonial power. Le Joli Mai includes footage of the mass anti-OAS demonstrations of February 1962, which ended with the deaths of eight demonstrators at the hands of the police, and of the memorial service in the Place de la République five days later, attended by five hundred thousand mourners. 'For the first time in the history of Paris one could hear a bird sing at noon on the Square of the Republic,' Signoret reads (and one does hear the bird on the soundtrack), but the lyrical note is unsettled by the reminder that 'thus, at the beginning of 1962, Fantômas made his return, and France had some reason to believe itself on the brink of civil war'. In May 1962 Salan was put on trial in Paris for his terrorist crimes. This trial, which ended with the commutation of his original death sentence to life in prison (he was released six years later, and pardoned in 1982—historical amnesia at work), runs as an undercurrent throughout the film, a reminder of the inescapability of history and of the consequences (including terrorism and the repression of dissent) of the attempt to forget it.

Its concern with history and politics is one of the qualities that distinguish Le Joli Mai from a film it also in some ways resembles, Jean Rouch and Edgar Morin's Chronique d'un été (1961). As in that film, the interviews in Le Joli Mai often begin by asking some version of the question, 'Are you happy?' and then probe the speaker's responses, not always gently: 'A bit limited, all that—no interest in other things?' Or, to the soldier about to go to Algeria, 'Are you only worried about your own problems?' Unlike Rouch and Morin, Marker and Lhomme do not set up confrontations among the people they interview, nor do they really aim to get at the 'truth' of the people they encounter; their approach is dialogic rather than analytic. The interviewers' manner is skeptical, but also genuinely curious and generous. In the film's final sequence, Marker writes that 'we tried to look through the eyes of a prisoner on his first day of freedom, when he, himself, tries to understand how these strange phenomena—free people—live'. The voice-over continues to reflect on the differences between free people ('those who are able to question, to refuse, to undertake, to think, or simply to love') and those who carry their prisons inside themselves. Both have been met in the film. Certainly some of those interviewed in the second part would be counted among the free: a Dahoman student who describes his encounters with the often unconscious racism of the French; a worker priest who ended up leaving the church and devoting his life to the struggle of his fellow workers; a young Algerian worker who, despite racist attacks by coworkers and police, has overcome his own impulse to hate in return, and who looks forward to a free Algeria in cooperation with France. For all the anxieties and acts of violence it registers, Le Joli Mai affirms the hopes of its most generous characters by adopting their clear-sightedness as its own method.

HAL GLADFELDER

See also: Chronique d'un été; Marker, Chris

Biography

Le Joli Mai (France, 1963, 165 mins; according to filmographies, the available English-language version is 120 mins). Directed by Chris Marker and Pierre Lhomme. Executive producer Gisèle Rebillon. Commentary read by Yves Montand (French version) and Simone Signoret (English version). Script by Cathérine Varlin. Cinematography by Pierre Lhomme. Music by Michel Legrand. Interviews conducted by Henri Belly, Henri Crespi, and Nathalie Michel. Sound by Antoine Bonfanti and René Levert. Camera by Etienne Becker, Denys Clerval, and Pierre Villemain. Edited by Eva Zora, Annie Meunier, and Madelaine Lecomère.

Further reading

- Kustow, Michael, 'Chris Marker's Le Joli Mai', in Lewis Jacobs (ed.), The Documentary Tradition, second edn, New York: Norton, 1979: 395–7.
- Marker, Chris et al., 'excerpts from Le Joli Mai, Le cinéma et la vérité, issue 2 of Artsept (ed. Raymond Bellour), Lyon: La Proue, 1963: 88–92.
- Tailleur, Roger, 'Parisiennes', Le cinéma et la vérité, issue 2 of Artsept (ed. Raymond Bellour), Lyon: La Proue, 1963: 83–7.
- Thirard, P.-L., 'review of Le Joli Mai', Positif 54–5, 1963: 110–14.

Journey, The

(UK, Watkins, 1987)

Peter Watkins's monumental documentary The Journey (1987) is a unique piece in film history. A fourteen and a half-hour documentary shot during four years, from 1983 to 1986, filmed in a dozen countries, it raises fundamental worldwide questions about 'time, money, and how we spend them'. While describing the escalating nuclear arms race, we visit communities where children do not have enough money to buy shoes or to eat conveniently every day. One could say that The Journey is not just an anti-nuclear war film about the multiplication of arms and nuclear weapons in all parts of the world; it also offers in many ways a deep analysis of the lack of information about these issues, even when newspapers and TV news coverage refer to events related to these questions.

Director Peter Watkins often uses a comparative approach, juxtaposing scenes of some wealthy people with others, showing groups from the Third World, or sometimes matching people unaware of the consequences of the arms race with other persons who precisely work to build nuclear weapons. The film begins with the presentation of rarely seen photographs of the actual bombs falling on Hiroshima and Nagasaki in August 1945. These photographs from the Museum of Los Alamos will be shown to various groups in different countries through the film. For instance, we see a group of citizens living in Scotland who protest against the North Atlantic Treaty Organization's (NATO) presence at the Alba Aerodrome, in Stornoway, on Lewis Island. We also visit a sort of profane mausoleum built under the site where the first atomic bomb actually fell, in Hiroshima, containing countless little boxes with the ashes of some hundreds of unidentified Japanese who were killed in August 1945.

In another scene, we see another group of angry citizens living in Bangor (in Washington state) who are opposing the assembly lines during the construction of Trident missiles. Other scenes present groups that resist, and people who ignore the actual race for arms, or the victims of nuclear testing made by France in the 1970s and the 1980s—for instance on the atoll of Murarowa, near Tahiti.

Through discussions with families or groups of people in various countries, the director asked 'average citizens' if they were aware of the world arms race, and the possible effects of nuclear weapons. We also follow a US family corresponding with a Soviet family, exchanging messages on video and finally meeting for the first time in the USSR. We understand that people and families do not talk much about the consequences of a nuclear war.

The narratives used in The Journey are innovative, bringing a slower rhythm and avoiding useless editing. After some forty minutes, the narrator explains that from now on, all the cuts made in the TV clips seen in the film will be highlighted, by using a specific noise to make us aware of the increasing number of cuttings and editing in television coverage of public affairs. In fact, these cuts are made in the mainstream media to make sentences shorter. This unusual, 'underlining' method used in The Journey is explained for almost a minute, on a totally black screen; it brings a difference of tone between 'the official discourse' and the deconstructive analysis brought by Watkins.

In an important analysis of media coverage, we observe how the local Canadian reporters commented on the actual meeting between the President of the United States, Ronald Reagan, visiting the Prime Minister of Canada, Brian Mulroney, in a much mediated event (the 'Shamrock Summit') that took place in Québec City, on March 17, 1985. We follow the local reporters alongside their shooting—how they discuss the agenda, which information they selected, and how they represent the dissidents and protesters who were outside the meetings. Some local journalists filmed the protesters from the police's side and made interviews with activists, but these were not broadcast on the Canadian television network; in The Journey, we see and hear these discussions in the makings. We understand that the journalists had no interest for the protesters and did not mention their presence; they mainly referred in an anecdotal tone to the protocol and high-security measures around the city. Since the media concentrated on the funny, if not spectacular, side of the event (after a televised musical concert, the Reagan and Mulroney team went on stage at the end of the show to sing hand-in-hand a verse from an Irish song), none of the local reporters mentioned the real reason for this meeting: the replacement of the Distant Early Warning (DEW) line radar bases in northern Canada by the new North Warning System sites, which gave the United States full control of the military protection in that Canadian region. In that segment, Watkins quotes peace activist William Arkin, who protested against the meeting and highlighted the true reasons for the meeting that were not mentioned by the media.

In another scene, during a public debate made in Gaelic, Watkins will comment on his own editing process, explaining that he will insert images and faces to reduce the length of a scene. In The Journey, we see many sources: archival stock-shot, TV news broadcasts, animation, many discussion groups, and actual images of political leaders and opponents. Although a 'serious' film, The Journey is also creative: a few animated stories are included, some verses from folk songs are heard, and many children are seen.

Watkins explains that for every minute that the film lasts, $1.5 million are spent in military expenditures. Even though the East–West conflict does not exist as such anymore between the United States and communist countries, arms races still remain today in various ways, and media coverage of public affairs has not improved in the last two decades.

In sum, The Journey confirms what scholars such as Louis Althusser, Noam Chomsky, and Pierre Bourdieu have written about television: it hides even when it shows images of political issues, because the media focus only on superficial elements. A unique film, The Journey remains essential in various ways: for media studies it illustrates how TV news is constructed and biased; for those concerned with peace education, the film demonstrates how groups for peace can act and why they are rejected; if used in citizenship studies, it would show the lack of the citizens' presence in public affairs; and from an international relations perspective, it shows how political issues are related in a globalizing world. The film also brings to 'risk studies' an illustration of how people can get along with constant dangers near them; finally, the whole documentary is an eloquent example of how media literacy and media education should be made.

There were only three broadcasts of The Journey on television (WNET in New York City, and two local Canadian stations); it was presented and praised in many film festivals and retrospectives, and remains available on 16mm and video, either in English, French, or Swedish versions.

YVES LABERGE

See also: Watkins, Peter

The Journey (Sweden-Canada, Swedish Peace & Arbitration Society, with Svenska Fredsoch Skiljedomsföreningen, Films for Fred, the National Film Board of Canada, and many local support groups, 1987, 870 mins). Distributed (in the United States) by Canyon Cinema in San Francisco; on video by Facets Multimedia. Distributed (in Canada) by the National Film Board (Montréal). Produced by Peter Watkins. Directed by Peter Watkins. Production co-ordination by Catharina Bragee. Post-production by Peter Katadotis, Daniel Pinard, George Dufaux. Produced by the Swedish Peace & Arbitration Society and the National Film Board of Canada. Shooting script by Peter Watkins. Cinematography by Martin Duckworth (Canada), Aribert Wies (Germany), Kim Dok Chul (Japan), Miguel Garzon (Mexico), Jaems Grant (Tahiti and Australia), Christian Guillon (France), Odd-Geir Saether (Norway), Leif Neibon (USSR), Skip Roessel (Utica, NY, US), Eric Edwards (Portland, OR, US), Anders Nilsson (Mozambique), Jan Fester and Tom Hilton (Glasgow), and Gary Payne (Seattle, WA, US). Animation camera by Pierre Landry, Jacques Avoine, Raymond Dumas, Claude Lebrun, and Robin L. Bain. Darkroom technician: Jean-Pierre Joly. Sound by Claude Beaugrand (Canada), Uwe Cardaum (Germany), Yagone Hioraki (Japan), Fernando Camara (Mexico), Ann-Marie Chandler (Tahiti), Frédéric Ullmann (France), Magne Mikkelsen (Norway), Anatoly Stefanov (USSR), Larry Scharf (Utica, NY, US), Phillip Healy (Australia), Wayne Woods (Portland, OR, US), Gabriel Mondlane (Mozambique), Donald McLennan (Glasgow) and Jan Cyr (Seattle, WA, US). Production managing by Gwynne Basen and Christine Burt (Canada), Tillmann Scholl (Germany), Yamagami Hiromi (Japan), Roberto Lopez Marquez (Mexico), Daniel Scharf (Tahiti), Francis Fourcou (France), Jan-Eric Gammleng (Norway), Madlen Aboyan (USSR), Penny Robins (Australia), Jan Baross (Portland, OR, US), Penny Thompson (Glasgow), and David Rosen (Seattle, WA, US). Music (for titles) by André Duchesne. For Utica, New York, US: Associate producing by Scott McDonald and Don Tracy; assisted by Robert Baber and Patricia O'Connor. Project manager (in Seattle, WA, US) by Bill Wahl. In Toulouse (France): Associate producing by Guy Cavagnac and Jean-Jacques Hoquard. Edited by Peter Watkins, Petra Valier, Manfred Backer, and Peter Wintonick. Assistant editors: Michel Juliani, Anna Fudakowska, and Gerry Vansier. Sound-editing by Peter Watkins, Manfred Backer, Raymond Vermette, Vida Urbonavicius, and Tony Reed. Assistant sound editors: Nancy Hughes, Mathew Ennis, Alison McGilivray, and Ron Lee. Re-recording by Jean-Pierre Joutel. Translations by Daniel Desmarais, Tochi Honda, Patricia Nazal, Howard Scott, and Stuart Stilitz. Information systems by Mark Achbar. Graphic design by Jane Churchill and Joan Churchill. Assistant designers: Paul Rosenbaum and Heidi Quedneau. Animation by Jonathan Amitay, Hubert Den Draak, Pierre Hébert, Don McWilliams, Robert Mistysyn, and Richard Slye. Phototypesetting by Serge Gaudreau. Titles and credits by Louise Overy. Post-production by Peter Wintonick. Commentary by Peter Watkins. Narrated by Peter Watkins (for the English version). In the French version narration was by Canadian actors Jean-Louis Roux, Frédérique Colin, Jean-Pierre Cartier, and others. Filmed in numerous locations: Quebec City, Hiroshima, Leningrad, Glasgow, Scotland, Seattle (US), West Germany, Cuernavaca (Mexico), Maputo (Mozambique), Tahiti, Toulouse (France), Sweden, Norway, Utica (NY), Portland (Oregon), and Australia. Total series: 870 mins, multilingual with English subtitles, color, 16mm. Episodes 1–6: 274 mins. Episodes 7–13: 308 mins. Episodes 14–19: 288 mins.

Further reading

Laberge, Yves, 'La télévision au cinéma: exercice d'anti-propagande dans le film documentaire Le Voyage de Peter Watkins', in Catherine Saouter (ed.), Le Documentaire: Contestation et propagande, Montréal: Editions XYZ, Collection Documents, 1996: 85–91.

—'Le Vrai et le faux au cinéma: entre la fiction vraisemblable et le réléquivoque', Vice-versa, no. 37, Avril 1992: 43–5.

Watkins, Peter, Media Crisis, Paris: Editions Homnosphères (Collection 'Savoirs autonomes'), 2004.

Joyce at 34

(US, Chopra and Weill, 1972)

Joyce at 34, codirected by Joyce Chopra and Claudia Weill, was one of the first important autobiographical portrait documentaries emerging from American feminist film efforts during the second-wave women's movement of the 1960s and 1970s. It was also among the first group of women's autobiographical films employing synchronous sound and the cinéma vérité style. Joyce at 34 features Chopra in her ninth month of pregnancy, the birth of her child, and how she deals with issues she must face in balancing her new role of motherhood and child-rearing while also continuing in her professional role as a filmmaker. Chopra's husband, the playwright and screenwriter Tom Cole, and other family and friends appear in the film as well. 'For the next several months she nurses the baby, travels between Boston (her home), and Brooklyn (her parents' home), directs a movie and admits that she loves the first but doesn't want a second baby' (Greenspun 1975: 20). 'We see the hassle of juggling telephone, bottles, diapers, movie reels, and having all come out in a life that somehow works together' (Nash 1974: 205).

Joyce at 34 opened on February 15, 1973, at the Whitney Museum in New York. It also aired on PBS television and received screenings at the 1973 Robert Flaherty Film Seminar at the Museum of Modern Art in New York City and the National Council on Family Relations Film Award Competition. It has also been used in screenings for study and consciousness-raising in university feminist film courses. Often categorized as a film on family and career, scenes in Joyce at 34 allow additional categorization of this film into the genre of films about filmmaking, in that it documents Chopra's efforts as she continues making films after becoming a mother.

The Chopra/Weill directing/producing team was subsequently invited to collaborate with Shirley MacLaine on the much-publicized documentary of MacLaine's visit to China entitled The Other Half of the Sky: A China Memoir (1975). The Other Half of the Sky was screened at the Cannes Film Festival and received an Academy Award nomination for Documentary Film (Feature). This film documented the visit to China of an entourage that included MacLaine and seven other women delegates, plus four women film crew members. It was a result of the Nixon administration's efforts to reopen Chinese/American relations.

Confusion involving credits on Joyce at 34 and The Other Half of the Sky has surfaced, most likely because of shared credits and the close approximation of the films to each other. Joyce at 34 was codirected by Chopra and Weill. Presumably, because of her appearance in Joyce at 34, emphasis on Chopra as the director dominated early discussions of the film. However, emphasis shifted to Weill in later years. On The Other Half of the Sky Chopra served as a producer and Weill split codirecting credits with MacLaine. Weill was also cinematographer and editor for both Joyce at 34 and The Other Half of the Sky. Joyce at 34 sound operators were Peggy Guggenheim, Anne Lewis, and Miriam Weinstein.

Joyce at 34 was well known for its 'spectacular birth scene' (Rosenberg 1983: 66), a graphic representation of Chopra's delivery of her daughter, Sara (born in 1971). It was considered an unusual film in that it documented an actual live birth outside of the medical/educational film arena. 'The film was a breakthrough feminist film in that the filmmaker documented her own experience on camera, rather than being an objectified body in another's film' (Foster 1995: 76). Cinematic devices in Joyce at 34 include the use of family photographs and home movies, voice-over, on-camera commentary about how certain individuals feel about their respective roles as parents, intercutting between on-camera commentary about the past juxtaposed against visuals of present-day activities, and a documentary structure that has been observed to more closely resemble narrative structure in that it uses seamless documentary realism, rather than self-reflexive devices that would draw attention to itself as a documentary.

Often embraced by feminist film circles, reception to Joyce at 34 was mostly positive. Discussion on the film by Jan Rosenberg reflects this positive attitude. However, Joyce at 34 did not escape negative criticism from feminists. Feminists E. Ann Kaplan and B. Ruby Rich are among critics of the film and/or the filmmakers. Kaplan scrutinized it in a 'structuralist, semi-logical criticism of realism' for, among other reasons, assuming a position of knowledge that forces spectators into passivity, its heavy use of techniques of realism and lack of self-reflexivity, and perpetuating a 'bourgeois illusion' (Kaplan 1983: 127). Rich described it as a 'feebly feminist signature' and criticized Chopra for 'selling out' to Hollywood when she directed Smooth Talk (1985), maintaining a conservative position on the female sexuality of young women (Rich 1998: 337). However, Chopra stated early on, 'I didn't go to make documentary films; I wanted to make movies' (cited in Rosenberg 1983: 35). Weill also directed Hollywood movies, breaking in earlier than Chopra with Girlfriends (1978) and It's My Turn (1980). Chopra and Weill have since continued as directors for numerous television projects.

Joyce at 34 was not always perceived by spectators through a feminist lens. In a positive review, The New York Times film critic Roger Greenspun stated, 'This is not a feminist film, though [it is] clearly aware of feminist positions' (Greenspun 1975: 20). Mental health practitioners, anthropologists, and sociologists also reviewed the film positively, albeit for different reasons than feminists. Mental health practitioners found it a valuable tool for discussion on a number of issues involved in the adjustments made when a new baby arrives concerning parental and spousal relationships and roles, as well as considering how individuals function when new feminist-oriented ideas of reversing traditional parenting roles between husband and wife are implemented. Anthropologists found the film valuable as one example of ethnographic documentation of women in modern American society. It was also recommended for inclusion in film library collections.

D. JAE ALEXANDER

Selected films

Joyce at 34 (US, New Day Films, 1972, 28 mins). Produced by Joyce Chopra and Claudia Weill. Directed by Joyce Chopra and Claudia Weill. Photography by Claudia Weill. Additional photography by Al Fiering and Eli Noyes. Production associate: Tom Cole. Editing by Claudia Weill. Sound by Polly Guggenheim, Anne Lewis, and Miriam Weinstein. VHS, color/black and white.

1975 The Other Half of the Sky: A China Memoir: directed by Claudia Weill and Shirley MacLaine; written by Shirley MacLaine (color, 74 mins).

- 1978 Girlfriends: directed by Claudia Weill; written by Vicki Polon (color, 86 mins).
- 1980 It's My Turn (aka A Perfect Circle): directed by Claudia Weill; written by Eleanor Bergstein (color, 91 mins).
- 1985 Smooth Talk: directed by Joyce Chopra; written by Joyce Carol Oates (story) and Tom Cole (screenplay) (color, 92 mins).
- 1989 The Lemon Sisters: directed by Joyce Chopra; written by Jeremy Pikser (color/black and white, 93 mins).

Further reading

- Acker, Ally, 'Joyce Chopra', in Reel Women: Pioneers of the Cinema, 1896 to the Present, New York: Continuum, 1991: 45–6.
- 'Claudia Weill', in Reel Women: Pioneers of the Cinema, 1896 to the Present, New York: Continuum, 1991: 32–3.
- Carstens, Leone H., '1975: Seventh Annual NCFR Film Awards Competition', The Family Coordinator 25, no. 1, January 1976: 75–85.
- Felando, Cynthia, 'CHOPRA, Joyce, American Director', in Gwendolyn Audrey Foster (ed.), Women Filmmakers and Their Films, Detroit, MI: St James Press, 1998: 74–6.
- 'Weill, Claudia, American Director', in Gwendolyn Audrey Foster (ed.), Women Filmmakers and Their Films, Detroit, MI: St James Press, 1998: 448–50.
- Foster, Gwendolyn Audrey, 'Chopra, Joyce (1938–)', in Women Film Directors: An International Bio-Critical Dictionary, Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1995: 75–6.
- 'Weill, Claudia (1947–)', in Women Film Directors: An International Bio-Critical Dictionary, Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1995: 368–9.
- Greenspun, Roger, 'A New Consciousness', in The New York Times Film Reviews, New York: New York Times and Arno Press, 1975, 20 (reviewed in The New York Times February 16, 1973, 17).
- Kaplan, E. Ann, Women & Film: Both Sides of the Camera, New York: Methuen, 1983.
- Lamphere, Louise, 'Women in Film: An Introduction', American Anthropologist, New Series, 79, no. 1, March 1977: 192–3.
- Lieberman, Leslie and Lieberman, Leonard, 'The Family in the Tube: Potential Uses of Television', The Family Coordinator 26, no. 3, July 1977: 235–42.
- Melton, Hollis, 'Joyce at 34', Film Library Quarterly 8, no. 2, 1975: 34–5.
- Nash, June, 'Joyce at 34', American Anthropologist, New Series, 76, no. 1, March 1974: 205.
- Rich, B. Ruby, Chick Flicks: Theories and Memories of the Feminist Film Movement, Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 1998.

Rosenberg, Jan, Women's Reflections: The Feminist Film Movement, Ann Arbor, MI: UMI Research Press, 1983.

Schneider, Irving, 'Film Reviews', Community-Mental Health Journal (ed. Edward A. Mason), 12, no. 1, spring 1976: 109–10.

Julien, Isaac

Isaac Julien is an acclaimed contemporary artist, equally accomplished in his challenging film and television work as in his inventive gallery installations. He holds a singular position in British image culture as a male, gay, black artist, whose works are a complex meditation on history, memory, and identity, seeking to articulate the diversity of black experience in Britain. His work in documentary has been unconventional and often departs radically from traditional handling of the form. He claims Derek Jarman, Antonioni, Maya Deren, and Godard as his main influences.

In the early 1980s Julien helped establish the black filmmaking collective called Sankofa, along with Nadine Marsh-Edwards, Martina Attile, and Maureen Blackwood. The black workshops, which also included the Black Audio Collective and Ceddo, developed out of funding support from the Labour-controlled Greater London Council, which aimed to support black cultural work, and the Workshop Declaration, an agreement between Channel 4 television and the trade union that sanctioned independent film and video on a nonprofit-making basis. The black workshops created a radical practice that contested both the dominant representations of race and the conventional cinematic approaches to those representations. The struggle over being black in Britain was not only seen to be material but it was also symbolic, and the most challenging of this cinema was formally innovative and questioning. Territories (1984), directed by Julien and produced at Sankofa, is a provocative documentary about the Notting Hill Carnival, the principal cultural event staged by the Caribbean community in Britain. The film is a barrage of experimental technique. Its juxtaposition of newly realised and archive footage, as well as its emphasis on the act of looking, introduces stylistics typical of the filmmaker.

The most significant films made by Sankofa and Julien in the 1980s were The Passion of Remembrance (1986) and Looking for Langston (1989). They share characteristics with other radical cinemas of the avant-garde: a self-conscious acknowledgment of the filmmaking process; a free and uncertain mixing of fiction and documentary; a stylistic eclecticism; and a rejection of spectatorial identification for a critical engagement with the text. The films go beyond the traditional 'race relations' agenda of documentary, wherein black filmmakers try to 'explain' themselves to white audiences, and attend to experiences within the black community. This is most apparent in The Passion of Remembrance, which seeks to represent the diversity among blacks in Britain and give voice to different black experiences, such as those of women and gay men. The film is highly stylised, offering two only partially related dramas, and this loose narrative flow is woven around documentary and archive material, the latter being subjected to a process of poetic translation. The film invites reflection on both the status of its historical imagery—problematising the notion of the past as merely a representation—and its own materiality, confirming cinema as complicit in this very process.

Julien is equally concerned to explore questions of sexuality and gender as well as race and class. Looking for Langston (1989), a 'meditation' on the black poet Langston Hughes and the Harlem renaissance in the 1920s, brings these concerns even further to the forefront. The effect of the stylised combination of varied archive sources, dramatic scenes, poetry, readings, and music has been described as 'a dream-like montage', and justified by Julien who aimed to:

illuminate the necessary contestation which takes place over the memory, the legacy and the representation of an important cultural icon like Langston Hughes [...] to explore the possibility of having a sexual identity that many blacks would identify as a betrayal of their racial authenticity [...] and [...] to popularise [...] interesting debates [...] around the history of black literature and cultural expression.

(Quoted in Hill 1999: 230)

His first feature, Young Soul Rebels (1991), funded by the BFI, while more accessible, further pursued Julien's interests in music, pleasure, politics, and desire, but it was not as successful, critically nor commercially, as many had hoped or expected.

Since then, Julien has mainly worked in television, music video, and gallery-based work. He has made Black and White in Colour: Television, Memory, Race (1992) for the BBC, which addresses the representations of race on British television from 1936 to 1992, and The Question of Equality (1995), a four-part series for US television. His gallery installations include Trussed (1996), The Conservator's Dream (1999), and Vagabondia (2000). A recurring motif of this later work is the interracial male couple, and Julien offers an intriguing and informed interplay of art historical references.

Julien's work in each form is concerned with the positioning of the spectator. The act of looking is central to his work, not least in his film Frantz Fanon: Black Skin, White Mask (1995), set during the Algerian war of liberation and where the meeting of looks is avoided as the consequence is likely to be violence. Furthermore, he explores the equivalences between the cultural forms; so, for example, the museum is featured within a number of films, videos, and installations.

ALAN BURTON

See also: Frantz Fanon: Black Skin, White Mask; Looking for Langston

Biography

Born in London, February 21, 1960. One of five children of parents who migrated to Britain from St Lucia. Studied fine art and film, Central St Martin's School of Art and Design, London. A founding member of Sankofa Film and Video Collective in 1983 and of Normal Films. Visiting lecturer at Harvard University and the Whitney Museum of American Art's Independent Study Program. Research Fellow, University of London, Goldsmith's College, and Oxford Brookes University. Trustee of Serpentine Gallery, London. Nominated for the Turner Prize in 2001 for his triple-screen The Long Road to Mazatlan.

Further reading

Bourne, Stephen, Black in the British Frame: The Black Experience in British Film and Television, London: Continuum, 2001.

Diawara, Manthia, 'Power and Territory: The Emergence of the Black British Film Collectives', in Lester Friedman (ed.), British Cinema and Thatcherism, London: UCL Press, 1993.

Hill, John, British Cinema in the 1980s, Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1999.

Julien, Isaac, 'In Two Worlds', Sight and Sound, July 1999: 33.

Mercer, K. and Drake, C., Isaac Julien with Essays by Kobena Mercer and Chris Drake, London: Ellipsis, 2001.

Junge, Winfried and Barbara

Winfried and Barbara Junge are best known for directing the longest running documentary film project in the world. Die Kinder von Golzow (1961–) follows the life stories of a class of pupils born between 1953 and 1955 in the village of Golzow in the easternmost part of the former German Democratic Republic (GDR): the Oderbruch. Starting in August 1961, when the wall between East and West Berlin had just been erected, the filmmakers chronicle the lives of the first generation brought up according to socialist ideals in the GDR. They film their protagonists' kindergarten and school days, exams, weddings, and award ceremonies. The thirteen six-to-seven-year-olds go on to become a painter and decorator, a cook and major, an electronic worker and FDJ (Free German Youth) functionary, a chemical worker, a carpenter, an engineer, an army officer, a truck driver, a locksmith, and a dairy hand. Like in the other less extensive, long-term documentary study named after a town in the GDR, Wittstock, by fellow DEFA filmmaker Volker Koepp, the filmmakers accompany the former GDR citizens into unemployment and reeducation after the collapse of the regime. The cycle of Die Kinder von Golzow manifests how under a change of political systems the same subjects changed in their response to documentary observation.

The first documentaries were short studies of the class, of between fourteen and thirty-six minutes' duration. These were screened in cinemas as supplements to the main films. Once the pupils left school, the course of their lives parted. Anmut sparet nicht noch Mühe (1979) was the last attempt to contain their life stories in a group portrait. With Lebensläufe—Die Geschichte der Kinder von Golzow in einzelnen Portraits (1980) the format changed to nine single portraits in one film. Through an extensive array of references interrelating various moments in time, Junge explains the history of the project and its subjects. With the filmmakers intentionally refusing to close an ongoing life story in spite of its perceived insignificance, the intricacies of selection and combination remain a problem. However, the project adheres to the confines of each family tree and blocks other potential narrative threads.

The availability of a vast amount of material permitted cuts between the same subject at different ages, and to a new generation who now play in the same sandpit. These children serve as reference points for the protagonists, but remain deliberately unknown. This meant that not only did the time represented become longer but also the duration of the single films stretched to over four hours; as the time narrated extended, so did the time of narration. Intertitles became necessary to bracket the diverse strands of narrative, as in Drehbuch: Die Zeiten (1992). From then the 'heroes' of the Golzow cycle—nicknamed 'Dallas East' by the DEFA studio—starred in their own spin-offs, often of over two hours' duration. In the course of time the narrative structure of the films continued to vary. On the whole, suspense was created by employing a forward-flowing chronological order, eliciting curiosity about what the subject would do next. In da habt ihr mein Leben. Marieluise—Kind von Golzow (1997) and in Jochen—ein Golzower aus Philadelphia (2001), the protagonists reflect in retrospect on episodes of their lives as they watch them on the video recorder.

From a Western perspective it may seem surprising that a continuous endeavour such as Die Kinder von Golzow is produced for film rather than television. When a similar venture subsequently began in Great Britain, the acclaimed 7Up (1964–) series, which follows the lives of a group of people at seven-year intervals, it was commissioned by Granada Television. Die Kinder von Golzow has been filmed on 35mm, nowadays combined with BETA video blown up to 35mm. In the GDR, as television became more important in the 1960s, the gaze of the censors shifted from film to television. The then premier of the GDR, Erich Honecker, ordered that Anmut sparet nicht noch Mühe (1979) be shown on television after he had personally approved it.

Lebensläufe—Die Geschichte der Kinder von Golzow in einzelnen Portraits (1980) was broadcast only on GDR television because it had already been bought by West German television. Documentary films could be made with more creative freedom at the DEFA, but were often shown only outside the country. Likewise, the only opportunity for GDR filmmakers to see Western documentaries was the international documentary film festival in Leipzig, where Junge came across the films of Joris Ivens, Robert Flaherty, the French cinéma vérité, the American direct cinema, the British free cinema, the Polish cinema of the 1960s, and Italian neorealism. He further recounts as his influences Dziga Vertov, Walter Ruttmann, Andrew and Annelie Thorndike, and Jürgen Böttcher.

Unlike the British 7Up series (Michael Apted, 1964–), the Golzow films are not ordered according to a structured schema of visits in seven-year intervals. The cycle intentionally relies on the filmmakers being invited by one of the protagonists and follows diverse strands of personal and public events, such as the anniversaries not only of the protagonists' first day in school, and therefore of the documentary series, but also of the GDR. The inclusion of political dates was sometimes motivated by the necessity of getting the films funded and approved. However, with the collapse of the GDR, the former state and its party, the Socialist Unity Party of Germany, had their life data chronicled in the film like a deceased protagonist would have: 'SED 1946–89'. In addition, the date of release of the films is irregular.

The idea for a long-term documentary series was conceived at the DEFA Studio for Documentary Film by Junge's superior, Karl Gass, eighteen years his senior, who felt it necessary to hand the project over to a younger man. Junge is twenty years older than his subjects. Barbara Junge has worked on the project since 1978 as an archivist, since 1983 as an editor, and since 1992 as a coauthor and codirector. Winfried Junge's voice carries the narration, but from Drehbuch: Die Zeiten (1992) onwards his wife interviews as well, if in a less provocative manner. The project had the same cameraman from 1962 to 1991, Hans-Eberhard Leupold, followed by Harald Klux from 1989. Leupold, who was a camera assistant on the first film, suggests that the creation of content is more dependent on the camera in documentary than in fiction film. Often the camera operator has to react quickly without directorial decisions, as the documentary film director cannot see the framing and the potential meaning it contains.

The camera does not only produce images, but content.

The more his subjects advanced in age, the more their encounters had to be planned in advance and the more they expected to be questioned after the event rather than observed in action. From 1978/9 their meetings became more stationary and verbal. However, rather than aspire to interviews with comprehensive answers, Junge is often found in an exchange where he says more than his curt counterparts. Even though he tries to provoke his subjects when he teases them about their weight or choice of marriage partner, his interventions are not confrontational. Western interviewees often react defensively to an interviewing strategy that aims at alienation—for instance that employed by Nick Broomfield. By contrast, Junge is provocative, but does not alienate. Questions that might be understood as malicious intrusions in a capitalist society were not perceived as such by his GDR subjects, who appear unperturbed. However, the positive responses of the GDR citizens were effectively constrained by a system that did not allow any criticism. Furthermore, Junge occasionally pursued opportunistic answers to preempt censorship and get his films approved. Pre-FRG, the series had a harmonising and entertaining, even sentimental, effect when passages without interviews were underlined with music. Nonetheless, the children of Golzow were deliberately by and large not socialist heroes.

In the 1950s GDR documentaries were made to illustrate a socialist realist fiction and reality had to comply with socialist planning (Zimmermann 1995). Documentaries about social and historical context were regarded as ideologically threatening and so invited censorship. While the representation of societal processes could be censored, the expressions on the faces of the individuals could not. By the time of the Golzow cycle, documentary film in the GDR had turned to the everyday and to 'the people'. For Junge, documentary should not be about a problem, but about a person. The former pedagogy student saw in film a didactic tool, so school children were ideal as subjects. As in other countries with state censorship, filming children was seen as ideologically uncontroversial. Junge would go on to make several other films about the lives of learners and teachers: Kinder lernen in aller Welt/Children Learn all over the World (1964), Vom lernenden Menschen/About the Learning Human Being (1964), Studentinnen—Eindrücke von einer technischen Hochschule/Students—Impressions from a Technical University (1965), his only fiction film Der Tapfere Schulschwänzer/The Brave Truant (1967), and Keine Pause für Löffler: Ein Lehrer und seine 6c/No Break for Löffler: A Teacher and His 6c (1974). Before the expansion of the Golzow project absorbed his time, Junge was further able to make documentaries on other topics—for instance, several films about Syria, Somalia, and Libya; another documentary series, this time about a pumping station (Sagen wird man über unsre Tage, 1974; Termin Spirale I, 1977; Markersbach—Energie des Wassers und des Menschen, 1981); and one about the pioneer organisation 'Ernst Thälmann': Ich bin ein Junger Pioneer/I Am a Young Pioneer (1973). The Junges visited northern England for the first part of a two-part comparison of the living conditions among working-class families in the Newcastle area, which Rostock coproduced with the Amber group (From Marx and Engels to Marks and Spencer, 1987/88). Winfried Junge has made over fifty documentaries altogether.

After the first film the filmmakers renounced the ostensibly 'hidden camera'. For Wenn ich erst zur Schule geh (1961) the film team looked into the class through the windows from outside, but the pupils were obviously under full 35mm lighting. This method was dismissed as it created distance and was not likely to cultivate trust. Junge has described his approach to documentary filmmaking with a phrase merging ethics and aesthetics: 'aesthetics of trust' (Zimmermann 1995). The ethics of filmmaking is affected by the temporal dimension. Due to the longevity of the cycle it could not rely on the usual 'smash-and-grab' approach of short-term filmmaking. As staging and role-playing cannot usually be sustained over a longer period of time and thus would be noticeable, performance is at odds with any long-term observation. Furthermore the director of the film and the director of the school declined official offers to supply the school with better performers in the shape of exemplary teachers. The sample had to be ordinary. As the project has spanned over forty years and more than two generations, Junge claims that it has more influence in life than in art.

The filmmaker is protective of his subjects and left out compromising rushes from the films.

In a society guided by the concept of the collective—an artificial family of sorts—the Junges and their protagonists compared their relationship to that of relatives. After all, those filmed had known their filmmakers since kindergarten. The title Die Kinder von Golzow/The Children of Golzow is thus a particularly powerful metaphor. Whereas Western documentary saw a subjective and deconstructive reaction against an overly 'objective' and impersonal observational mode, in the GDR the subject had to carry the burden of objectivity. In a Marxist society, 'history from below' meant that the working class was to lead the society. The model citizen in the workers' and peasants' state came from below, not from above. This contrasts with the notion of the marginalized populace at the bottom of a capitalist society, who eventually had their voices heard in 'minor' documentaries or through identity politics. Moreover, GDR private life was organised by the state and, like the one-party system, filming was for all: 'We all make a film about our class together with the DEFA.' After unification, the social philosophy changed from the particular as an expression of the general in the GDR to the singular as an expression of difference in the FRG. Speaking against documentary as a deductive methodology, and by implication through his actual works, Junge argues for the singularity of his subjects and allows entrusting the viewer to make of this something universal.

After the fall of the Iron Curtain and with the new rise of the 'self', the chronicle became self-reflexive. When the protagonists became Western subjects, the idea of performing a self emerged and even their names are 'privatised'. In the credits of Drehbuch: Die Zeiten (1992) they 'act' as themselves with their full names given as their 'real' identity and their first names as their character names: 'Dieter Finger as Dieter'. Persistently the protagonists are asked why they still want to continue, how the film-making influences them, and if they would like to ask the filmmakers questions too. We eventually see the filmmaker while we hear his dry reflections about himself and about the form and methodology of the films: 'This film has a commentary. I know this can cost him sympathy.' He reflects on the staging in the former films: 'Winfried puts his hand up exceptionally often because he has got the microphone round his neck.' He comments on the deception of appearances: 'Gudrun is not as self-confident as she wants to look.' He continues to reveal reconstructions either by showing the repeated efforts of the protagonists at getting to act as themselves or by laying bare the device through his dead-pan comments: 'We reconstruct a scene which happened like this a few minutes before.' Insight into the stagings of the GDR government are given when the film reveals how Golzow had to pretend it was a different town for a visit of the premier of North Korea at the time, Kim Il Sung.

With unification, not only did the project become self-reflexive, but its protagonists became self-conscious. After conversion from state socialism to democracy, the protagonists are uniquely reminded of their existence as GDR citizens. However, this traceability is a burden like an open Staats file. The historical subjects of Golzow cannot deny their GDR past as so many others did, as Barbara Junge acknowledged (Kunath 1993). As GDR subjects, some of the children of Golzow were as untroubled about their careers as they were by their images on film. After unification, their fear of repercussions rose. What was rewarded under one system was punished by the next. Their affirmations under the eye of state censorship were replaced by fear that a company superior might see them. Whereas some children in the 7Up series acted as grown-ups, in the Golzow cycle what had been fully trained and employed adults under one system became learners again under the next. Their old certificates were not acknowledged and most became unemployed. Many were trained in endless reeducation programmes and taught that self-realization and motivation is everything. Reasons were individualised as well. Barbara Junge witnessed the loss of government approval that guaranteed a positive image as causing a retreat into the private; or as Winfried Junge phrased it: 'The new situation closes mouths in a different way' (Richter 1993). Thus for several reasons the reactions of the children of Golzow changed after unification of the two Germanies. The last documentary of this potentially infinite chronicle has the title Und wenn sie nicht gestorben sind ... Die Kinder von Golzow—Das Ende der unendlichen Geschichte/And If they Did Not Die ... The Children of Golzow—The End of Infinite History (2006).

Biography: Winfried Junge

Born Prenzlauer Berg, Berlin, Germany, July 29, 1935. A-Levels, 1953. Pedagogic faculty of the Humboldt Universität Berlin, reading German literary studies without graduating, 1953–4. Graduate of the German Film Academy, Potsdam-Babelsberg, 1958. Film journalist for the student magazine Forum, 1955–61. Dramatic adviser and assistant director for Karl Gass at the DEFA Studio for Popular Science Films, 1958–61. Director at the DEFA Studio for Documentary Films, 1961–91. Director at JOURNAL Film Klaus Volkenborn KG, from 1994 with à jour film and television, 1991–. Married Barbara Becher, 1968. Deputy chairman of the documentary film and television communications section of the Association of Film and Television Workers of the GDR, 1979–90. Member of the Executive Committee of the Association of Film and Television Workers of the GDR. President of the National Documentary and Short Film Festival of the GDR for Cinema and Television, 1985–87. Vice-President of the International Documentary Film Festival Leipzig, 1990. Member of the Academy of Fine Arts Berlin-Brandenburg, 1996–. Opened a permanent exhibition about Die Kinder von Golzow, Golzow, Germany, 2000.

Biography: Barbara Junge

Born in Neunhofen, Thüringen, Germany, November 14, 1943. Graduate of the Karl-Marx-University, Leipzig, as an English and Russian translator. First in charge of foreign-language translations, later archivist, editor, co-author, and codirector at the DEFA Studio for Documentary Films, 1969–91. Married Winfried Junge, 1968. Co-director at JOURNAL Film Klaus Volkenborn KG, from 1994 with à jour film and television, 1991–. Member of the Academy of Fine Arts Berlin-Brandenburg, 1996–.

Selected films

- 1961 Wenn ich erst zur Schule geh (Some Day, When I Go to School/When I Finally Go to School)
 1962 Nach einem Jahr (One Year Later/Observations in a First Class)
 1966 Elf Jahre alt (Eleven Years Old)

- 1969 Wenn man vierzehn ist/When You Are Fourteen 1971 Die Prüfung/The Exam
 1975 Ich sprach mit einem Mädchen/I Talked to a Girl
 1979 Anmut sparet nicht noch Mühe/Spare No Charm and Spare No Passion
 1980 Lebensläufe—Die Geschichte der Kinder von Golzow in einzelnen Portraits/Biographies—The Story of the Children of Golzow
 1984 Diese Golzower—Umstandsbestimmungen eines Ortes/These People of Golzow—Analysis of the Circumstances of a Place
 1992 Drehbuch: Die Zeiten/Screenplay: The Times
 1994 Das Leben des Jürgen von Golzow/Jürgen of Golzow: His Life/The Life of Jürgen from Golzow
 1995 Die Geschichte vom Onkel Willy aus Golzow/The Story of Uncle Willy from Golzow
 1996 Was geht euch mein Leben an. Elke—Kind von Golzow/My Life is My Own Affair. Elke—Child of Golzow
 1997 Da habt Ihr mein Leben. Marieluise—Kind von Golzow/I'll Show You My Life. Marieluise—Child of Golzow
 1998 Brigitte und Marcel—Golzower Lebenswege/Brigitte and Marcel—Lifestyles of Golzow
 1999 Ein Mensch wie Dieter—Golzower/A Guy Like Dieter—Native of Golzow
 2001 Jochen—ein Golzower aus Philadelphia/Jochen—A Golzower from Philadelphia
 2003 Eigentlich wollte ich Förster werden—Bernd aus Golzow/Actually I Wanted to Be a Forrester—Bernd from Golzow
 2006 Und wenn sie nicht gestorben sind ... Die Kinder von Golzow—Das Ende der unendlichen Geschichte/And If They Did Not Die ... The Children of Golzow—The End of Infinite History

Further reading

- Alter, Nora, 'Epilogue. History in the Making: The Children of Golzow Project', in Nora Alter (ed.), Projecting History. German Nonfiction Cinema, 1967–2000, Ann Arbor, MI: The University of Michigan Press, 2002: 195–210.
 Byg, Barton, 'GDR-Up: The Ideology of Universality in Long Term Documentary', New German Critique, no. 82, winter, 2001.

- Eiffler, Ulrich and Halbhüner, Dietmar, 'Lebensläufe. Interview mit Winfried Junge und Hans-Eberhard Leupold', Forum, no. 21, November 1, 1981: 14.
- Jordan, Günther and Schenk, Ralf (eds), Schwarzweiss und Farbe. DEFA-Dokumentarfilme 1946–92, Berlin: Filmmuseum Potsdam & Jovis Verlagsbüro Berlin, 2000.
- Junge, Winfried, 'Papier und Realität', Deutsche Filmkunst, no. 11, 1962: 431–2, 441.
- 'Enthüllungen des Besonderen', Sonntag, no. 7, February 13, 1972.
- 'Drehbuch: Das Leben. Die Geschichte der Kinder von Golzow als Zeitdokument', Film und Fernsehen, no. 8, 1979: 4–8.
- 'Der Widersprüchliche Mensch (Parts 1–3)', Film und Fernsehen, no. 11, 1981: 3–9 (also no. 1, 1982: 11–14; no. 2, 1982: 20–4).
- 'Vom Wollen, Können, Dürfen, Müssen. Versuch einer Umstandsbestimmung des dokumentaren Films', Film und Fernsehen, no. 5, 1983: 11–13.
- 'Besuch bei Joris Ivens', Film und Fernsehen, no. 12, 1986: 28–9.
- 'Erfahrungen anderer Art', Film und Fernsehen, no. 10, 1989: 6–10.
- 'Ästhetik des Vertrauens', in Peter Zimmerman (ed.), Deutschlandbilder Ost: Dokumentarfilme der DEFA von der Nachkriegszeit bis zur Wiedervereinigung, Konstanz: UVK-Medien/Olschläger, 1995: 133–45.
- Junge, Winfried and Junge, Barbara, Lebensläufe—Die Kinder von Golzow. Bilder—Dokumente—Erinnerungen zur ältesten Langzeitbeobachtung der Filmgeschichte, Marburg: Schüren-Verlag, 2004.
- Kunath, Sylke, 'Der längste Dokumentarfilm der Welt', Der Tagesspiegel, August 30, 1993.
- Richter, Erika, 'Drehbuch: Die Zeiten', in 23. Internationales Forum des jungen Films Berlin, Berlin: Internationales Forum des jungen Films/Freunde der deutschen Kinemathek, 1993.
- 'Die Geschichte vom Onkel Willy aus Golzow', in 26. Internationales Forum des jungen Films Berlin, Berlin: Internationales Forum des jungen Films/Freunde der deutschen Kinemathek, 1996.
- 'Da habt Ihr mein Leben. Marieluise—Kind von Golzow', in 27. Internationales Forum des jungen Films Berlin, Berlin: Internationales Forum des jungen Films/Freunde der deutschen Kinemathek, 1997.
- Voigt, Jutta, 'Eins plus eins. Winfried Junge und Hans-Eberhard Leupold im Gespräch', Sonntag, no. 47, 1981: 5.
- Zimmermann, Peter (ed.), Deutschlandbilder Ost: Dokumentarfilme der DEFA von der Nachkriegszeit bis zur Wiedervereinigung, Konstanz: UVK-Medien/Olschläger, 1995.

Junghans, Carl

Although Carl Junghans's fame rests solely on his 1929 feature So ist das Leben, on a closer look his actual significance in film history is in the field of the so-called compilation films that were abundant with leftist filmmaking during the Weimar Republic. The films Junghans made for the Communist Party were compiled from various preexisting sources, to which he rearranged and added numerous intertitles, thus giving the films a rather didactical appearance. These films served immediate purposes (elections, rallies, etc.) and usually did not have a long exhibition.

The style of Junghans's compilations changed with the advent of sound. Drawing on American newsreel material, he experimented for his Kamera Reporter rast durch New York (1930) on the textual discrepancies between images and sounds. Later on, he would do away with verbal commentaries altogether. His first attempt at a purely visual sound film, Fliehender Schatten (1932), was compromised by the addition of a fictional frame story that led to Junghans's withdrawal from the project, maintaining that he was solely responsible for the documentary footage shot in Africa.

His 1936 account of the Winter Olympiad, Jugend der Welt, for which he was in charge of the entire editing, deviates largely from a newsreel-like report, thus not covering the events chronologically, but rather grouping images in visual associations. Moreover, the film does not have any verbal or written commentary. The result is a 'symphonic poem', as he referred to it, tipping his hat to Ruttman's Berlin: The Symphony of a Great City. Jugend der Welt, when compared to Riefenstahl's Olympia, is often seen as being less reverent to the Nazi elites. Also, Junghans showed images of defeat and failure, contradicting the notion of heroism, which would later signify Riefenstahl's film. Despite Goebbels's reservations, the film achieved worldwide distribution to great acclaim. At the Venice Film Festival it was awarded the Cup of the Luce Institute for Best Documentary.

Although he once again pulled out of Geissler's rebellion against the Spanish government, the final version still carried Junghans's concept: idyllic Spain, the uprising of the Popular Front, then the reinstatement of order by Franco.

Jahre der Entscheidung was to be an homage to the Nazis' rise to power. Once again, Junghans planned to make a 'symphonic film' that would appeal more to the audiences' emotions than to their reason. Delays in the finishing of the film, brought about by official interventions, plus the ‘falling from grace’—his communist past kept being a burden for Junghans—caused the cancellation of his contract. The final version of the film did not mention his name in the credits.

Junghans was an exile by then, struggling to find new assignments. In the United States he turned to color photography in which he preferred documentary styles, foregoing artificial lighting, flash, and so on. His new interest in American Indian culture led him to make two documentaries: one on a healing ceremony presented by a Navajo medicine man, Sand Paintings (1947), and the other on the living conditions of southwestern Pueblo Indians, Monuments of the Past (1947). Both are, as Thomas Tode suggests, indicators of Junghans’s late interest in spirituality.

ULI JUNG

Biography

Born on October 7, 1897, in Dresden, the son of a tailor. His early interest in music led him to become a pianist in a Dresden movie house when he was only ten years old. Working as an extra, film critic, and editor, he eventually made his first film, Der Cowboy im Wedding (1925), an advertising film for the trade unions. By this time he had already joined the Communist Party. Keeping up work with the accommodation of foreign films for the German market and designing advertising films for the KPD, he eventually managed to find the funding for his long-held project, So ist das Leben (1929), the film that would secure him his place in film history.

After 1933 Junghans was banned from work for some time before he was assigned to the film of the 1936 winter Olympiad, Jugend der Welt, which heralded the beginning of a long series of official assignments by the Nazi state or party. In 1938 Junghans was hired by the UFA, where he made Altes Herz geht auf Reisen (1939), an adaptation of Hans Fallada’s novel of the same title. This film was banned because some parts contradicted official Nazi attitudes. Junghans left Germany for the United States, where he made only two documentary shorts on the life of the Navajos and otherwise turned to still photography. Upon his return to Germany in 1963, he supplied his So ist das Leben with a soundtrack. In the 1970s he made public appearances at festivals and the like and traveled extensively to Africa. He died on November 8, 1984, in Munich.

Selected films

1925	Der Cowboy im Wedding
1927/8	Lenin 1905–28/Der Weg zum Siege
1928	Weltwende. Zehn Jahre Republik—Zehn Jahre Sowjetunion
1928	Was wollen die Kommunisten?
1928	Rote Pfingsten/Rote Pfingsten 1928/Roter Frontkämpferbund 4. Reichstreffen in Berlin am 27. Mai 1928
1929/30	So ist das Leben (feature film)
1930	Tonfilmconference
1930	Kamera-Reporter rast durch New York/Amerika, du hast es besser
1932	Fiehende Schatten
1936	Jugend der Welt
1936	Die Geißel der Welt (Kampf in Spanien)
1938	Altes Herz geht auf die Reise (feature film)
1939	Jahre der Entscheidung
1939	Helden in Spanien/España heroica/Arriba España
1947	Sand Paintings (USA)
1947	Monuments of the Past (USA)
c.a. 1965/1971	Kärnten in vier Jahreszeiten/Die vier Jahreszeiten

Further reading

- Hanisch, Michael, Carl Junghans—Biographie eines Außenseiters, Prisma, Nr. 11, Berlin/DDR: Henschel, 1980: 257–85.
- Hoffman, Hilmar, ‘Jugend der Welt’, in H.H. Mythos Olympia: Autonomie und Unterwerfung von Sport und Kultur, Berlin/Weimar: Aufbau 1993: 87–92.
- Tode, Thomas, entry and essay on ‘Carl Junghans’, in Hans Michael Bock (ed.), CineGraph: Lexikon zum deutschsprachigen Film, Munich: edition text + kritik, 1984.

K

Kamei, Fumio

Kamei Fumio's innovative editing and composition and bluntly political postwar documentaries changed filmmaking in Japan from the 1930s into the 1960s. Acknowledged within his own country as the central figure in the history of Japanese documentary filmmaking, Kamei is less well known outside of Japan. His ability to push the boundaries of conventional form as a film editor led to a key part for him in creating the role of director within the wartime studio system at a time when the authorship of documentaries was being contested.

The two years that Kamei spent immersed in Leningrad's film culture (1929–31) in tandem with his initiation into the Japanese film world at a time of rising cultural nationalism and brutal colonial expansion proved a difficult mix that led to a year spent in prison in 1941–2 and the subsequent curtailment of his filmmaking activities until the end of the war. His first postwar filmmaking endeavor, a compilation film made with Iwasaki Akira (a leading film critic and former head of Prokino, the Japan Proletariat Film League) called Nihon no higeki/A Japanese Tragedy (1946) was so critical of the wartime regime that American Occupation authorities, probably at the behest of Japan's then Prime Minister Yoshida Shigeru, would not allow its release. That film contains a controversial dissolve in which the Showa Emperor transforms from full military garb into a suit and tie-clad everyman. The suggestion in this sequence that the Emperor was actively behind Japan's wartime military malevolence was sacrosanct to conservative forces.

In the postwar period, Kamei has been associated with a persistent myth that casts him as Japan's only anti-war wartime filmmaker, but the truth is considerably more complex. Although Kamei's airing of discontent with the war may not make him an all-out resister, his wartime films do represent a boldly innovative negotiation with a severe if inconsistent censorship apparatus. Kamei virtually dissected wartime conventions in his 1939 film Tatakau heitai/Fighting Soldiers while simultaneously producing them. In 1938, while employed by Toho Film's Culture Film Section, Kamei agreed to edit footage of the Japanese march to Shanghai that other Toho filmmakers thought was too bleak to pass muster with the film world and military authorities. The result, Shanghai (1938), was a perfection of long-form documentary that found box office success and also met with critical acclaim. His next film, Peking (1938), made charmingly lyrical use of both synchronized and non-synchronized sound. The film, rediscovered in 1997, includes an extended traveling shot down a vibrant market street matched to a masterful montage of the exoticized sounds of local commerce.

That same year, Kamei was sent to China for four months with cinematographer Miki Shigeru and a film crew to make the army-sponsored film, Fighting Soldiers, about the Japanese advance to Wuhan. In one regard Fighting Soldiers must be understood in the context of the writing of Hino Ashihei, the popular chronicler of the daily lives of ordinary Japanese soldiers in China in the late 1930s. Hino is the lead expositor of a documentary literature whose reportage style shares definite resonances with socialist realist literature from the previous decade. However, when human-scale heroes whose toils were so captivating on the page were shown on the screen, and when the images projected were those of real fighting soldiers, it was too much for the military sponsors of the work to tolerate.

The completed work was shelved by Toho and not seen publicly until after its rediscovery in 1975.

Fighting Soldiers has no narration. It is as easy to see what is so compelling about this film as it is to understand what the Army found so objectionable. An extreme close-up of the distraught face of a Chinese peasant whose house is in flames, a cavalry pack animal lingering and then toppling, having succumbed to some battlefield hazard, Japanese infantry shown by a roadside in such a state of exhausted slumber as to look like corpses—these images are stitched together in such a way that they recall the controlled montage theories of Pudovkin and convey very plausibly the sense of how unpleasant the ‘daily-ness’ of war is for the people who fight it as well as those noncombatants who are victimized by it.

When he bent the framework for sponsored filmmaking in his three commissioned tourism films in 1940 and 1941, Kamei prefigured the creative interpretation of the limits of public relations filmmaking that was to take place at Iwanami Productions two and three decades later, an experience that would give rise to independent, socially engaged filmmaking in the 1960s. Fighting Soldiers was cited two years later as an example of Kamei’s proclivity to inculcate dialectical materialism into his films, a charge supposedly substantiated by time that Kamei spent studying film and art in the Soviet Union and by his depictions of peasants in Kobayashi Issa (1941). That film, ostensibly a piece commissioned by local officials in Nagano Prefecture to promote tourism to the area, integrated the haiku of eighteenth-century ascetic poet Kobayashi to create an historically contextualized and compelling caricature of the people, their struggle to eke out a livelihood in farming and sericulture. In the margins of the beautifully shot 35mm film are the wealthy tourists, who enjoy the rugged beauty of the harsh landscapes, and rich pilgrims, who are patronizing a large temple complex and then vying to become, like Yasukuni Shrine in Tokyo, a repository for the souls of Japan’s war dead. Critics at the time described Kobayashi Issa as a cine-poem. The Ministry of Education refused to certify the film as a bunka eiga, or culture film, but the studio used this refusal to tease audiences into seeing a supposedly controversial film.

Throughout his filmmaking career, Kamei’s willingness to break with convention in big and small ways would repeatedly place him at the center of one controversy after another. His wartime filmmaking has consistently drawn more attention than his two and a half very active postwar decades. In fact, the political films made after 1945 have proven to be as influential on other filmmakers as his wartime films. Making Sunagawa no hitobito: kichi hantai tosô no kiroku/The People of Sunagawa: A Record of the Struggle Against the Military Base (1955), Sunagawa no hitobito: mugi shinazu/The People of Sunagawa: Wheat Will Never Die (1955), and Ryuketsu no kiroku: Sunagawa/Record of Blood: Sunagawa (1956), a trilogy of protest films about the struggle to forestall the expansion of an American air base in post-occupation Japan, led Kamei and his crew to spend a great deal of time with their filmic subjects and ultimately to depict their struggle from the insider perspective of the protestors. This lesson was absorbed by Tsuchimoto Noriaki, Ogawa Shinsuke, and Hani Susumu, who would commit themselves to their own subjects in much the same way a few years later.

Another well-regarded filmmaker (and artist), Teshigahara Hiroshi worked on two of the Sunagawa films as well as several of Kamei’s films about atomic bomb blast survivors. Indeed, Kamei was the leading filmmaker of record for the nascent anti-nuclear movement in Japan in the 1950s. Beginning with Ikteite yokkata/Still It’s Good to Live (1956), he made five films that documented the aftereffects of radiation, demonstrated the limits of government support afforded those who had been exposed to radiation at Nagasaki and Hiroshima, and showed the organizing activities of victims and their supporters. He was also the first documentarian to take up the highly volatile issue of discrimination against Japan’s so-called Buraku people by making a film about one such community in Osaka in 1960.

Throughout his career, Kamei showed a capacity to find inspiration in and borrow from unlikely spheres. In the late 1930s he successfully integrated montage theory into the process of making a war record film with Fighting Soldiers. In the postwar period, he was the first in Japan to attempt filmic forays into the then raging debates on shutaisei (subjectivity) in his Sunagawa films. These achievements earned him a claim to being among the world's least known but most accomplished documentary filmmakers.

JEFFREY ISAACS

Biography

Born on April 1, 1908 into a locally prominent Catholic family in Fukushima Prefecture, Japan. Left his studies in fine arts at Bunka Gakuin in Tokyo in 1928 to go to the Soviet Union the following year to study art. Soon began studying film as an auditor at what became in 1931 the Leningrad Institute of Cinema Engineers (LIKI), during which time he was influenced by Grigori Kozintsev, Sergei Yutkevich, and Fridrikh Ermler. Became ill with tuberculosis, prompting his sudden return to Japan in 1931. In 1933 entered Photo Chemical Laboratory (later PCL and then, in 1937, Toho.) At PCL and Toho in the Culture Film Section, distinguished himself as an editor, scenario writer, and then director of documentaries. Arrested in October 1941 and charged with inculcating Komintern ideals into films, spent just under a year in detention and was released on probation in August 1942. Was a leader in the Toho labor disputes in 1947–8. Directed or codirected five feature films from 1947 to 1953. Began producing independent documentaries in 1953 establishing Japan Document Film in 1955. Opened an antique shop in Shibuya and continued to make occasional public relations films for corporate clients during the 1980s. Returned to engaged filmmaking with two ecologically concerned films in the 1980s. Died February 27, 1987 in Itabashi, Tokyo.

Selected films

- 1937 Dottô o kette/Through the Angry Waves: composition and editing
- 1938 Shanghai: composition and editing
- 1938 Peking: composition and editing
- 1939 Tatakau Heitai/Fighting Soldiers: director
- 1940 Ina bushi/A Song of Ina: director
- 1941 Kobayashi Issa: director
- 1945 Seiku/Security of the Skies: story
- 1946 Nihonnohigeki/A Japanese Tragedy: director
- 1953 Kichi no kotachi/Children of the Base: director
- 1955 Sunagawa no hitobito: kichi hantai tosô no kiroku/The People of Sunagawa: A Record of the Struggle Against the Base: director
- 1955 Sunagawa no hitobito: mugî shinazu/The People of Sunagawa: Wheat Will Never Die: director
- 1956 Ikiteite yokkata/Still It's Good to Live: director
- 1956 Ryuketsu no kiroku: Sunagawa/Record of Blood: Sunagawa: director
- 1957 Sekai wa kyôfu suru: shi no hai no shôtai/The World Is Terrified: The True Nature of the 'Ash of Death': director
- 1958 Araumi ni ikiru: maguro gyomin no seitai/Living in Rough Seas: The Lives of Tuna Fishermen: director
- 1958 Hato wa habataku/Fluttering Pigeons: director
- 1959 Hiroshima no koe/Voice of Hiroshima: director
- 1960 Ningen mina kyodai: buraku sabetsu no kiroku/All People Are Brothers: A Record of Discrimination in the Buraku: director
- 1961 Gunbi naki sekai o/Toward a World Without Armaments: director
- 1984 Minna ikinakereba naranai: hito, mushi, tori, nôji minzoku-kan/All Must Live: People, Insects and Birds: director
- 1987 Seibutsu mina tomodachi: tori, mushi, sakana no komori uta/All Living Things Are Friends: Lullabies of Birds, Insects, and Fish: director

Further reading

- High, Peter B., The Imperial Screen: Japanese Film Culture in the Fifteen Years War, 1931–45, Madison, WI: The University of Wisconsin Press, 2003.
- Hirano Kyoko, Mr Smith Goes to Tokyo: Japanese Cinema Under the American Occupation, 1945–52, Washington, DC: Smithsonian Institution Press, 1992.
- Kamei Fumio, Tatakau eiga: dokyumentarisuto no showa-shi (Fighting Films: A Documentarist's History of the Showa Era), Tokyo: Iwanami Shoten, 1989.
- n.a., 'Documentarists of Japan, No. 6: Kamei Fumio', introduction by Makino Mamoru, trans. A.A. Gerow, Documentary Box No. 6, Tokyo: Yamagata International Documentary Film Festival Organizing Committee, March, 1995, www.city.yamagata.yamagata.jp/yidff/docbox/6/box-6-2-e.html
- Nornes, Abé Mark, Japanese Documentary Film: The Meiji Era Through Hiroshima, Minneapolis, MN: University of Minnesota Press, 2003.

Tsuchimoto Noriaki, 'Kamei Fumio: Shanghai kara Tatakau Heitai made' (Kamei Fumio: From Shanghai to Fighting Soldiers), in Imamura Shōhei, Satō Tadao, Shindō Kaneto, Tsurumi Shunsuke and Yamada Yōji (eds), Kōza Nihon Eiga no. 5, (seminar in Japanese Cinema no. 5), Tokyo: Iwanami Shoten, 1987.

Tsuzuki Masaaki, Tori ni natta ningen: hankotsu no eiga kantoku—Kamei Fumio no shōgai (The Human that Became a Bird: The Life of Rebellious Film Director Kamei Fumio), Tokyo: Kōdansha, 1992.

Yasui Yoshio (ed.), Kamei Fumio Retrospective, Tokyo and Osaka: Amagata International Documentary Film Festival Organizing Committee Tokyo Office and Planet Bibliothèque de Cinema, 2001.

Karlin, Marc

Marc Karlin was a singular figure in British documentary over the last thirty years of the twentieth century, on two counts: his political commitment and his innovative approach to documentary aesthetics, two facets of his work that he himself saw as a unity and that remained constant, even in the 1990s when these things were no longer fashionable.

Karlin's earliest work grew out of the political and aesthetic ferment of the 1960s. The child of a family of Russian-Jewish origin who grew up in Paris, he was sent to school in England and then attended the Central School of Speech and Drama in London, where he had his first taste of student militancy. He joined the Stop It Committee, formed by Americans in Britain against the war in Vietnam, and at the same time opted for film instead of theatre; his first two films were about an American deserter. For the second of them he had to go Paris, where he had just started editing when the events of May 1968 took place, and he found himself swept up in the political ferment. As a result, he met Chris Marker, who would deeply influence his aesthetics, and with whom he would later collaborate, preparing the English versions of The Train Rolls On and The Grin Without a Cat.

Returning to England, Karlin first joined Cinema Action, a London-based collective of political filmmakers, and then, seeking a different way of working, formed the Berwick Street Film Collective. The group's first major production, Nightcleaners, completed in 1975 (with a sequel, The Seven Dreams of Myrtle, a year later), began as a solidarity film for the campaign to unionise office nightcleaners but turned into a complex, exploratory, and (especially within the women's liberation movement) highly controversial essay on representation. Instead of documenting events, the film presents fragments of these events, often cut off quite arbitrarily, repeated, or interrupted by a blank screen, with similar incongruities on the soundtrack. This experimental aesthetic has the effect of emphasising what is normally suppressed in conventional styles of documentary, including the distance between the lived experience of those who are being filmed and those who are doing the filming. In this case, it also highlights the distance between the middle-class women of the women's liberation movement and the working women they were trying to organise. The intention was to challenge the viewer's normal passivity in front of the screen, but it is also a hallmark of Karlin's approach, in all his subsequent work, to question from within the doxa of the left—the pieces of conventional wisdom that are used to hide the internal contradictions of leftist thinking. Because of this combination of experimental aesthetics and political questioning from within, Karlin has been described as 'a film-maker's film-maker and a leftist's leftist' (Ellis 1999).

Given this political orientation, it is remarkable that Karlin became one of the first independent filmmakers of his generation to find a space for his work on television. For Memory, which was shot in the late 1970s as a coproduction of the British Film Institute (BFI) and BBC2 but was not screened until 1982, explored: (1) how memory is preserved and handed down in such a way that socialist history is excluded from the prevailing culture; and (2) the efforts that serve to record and hand down working-class history. The film moves from the memories of concentration camp survivors to sufferers from Alzheimer's, by way of episodes about the Levellers, the Battle of Cable Street, and the miners of Clay Cross, set against an imaginary city of the future built out of architects' models, where the past becomes ever more elusive. In two films for Channel 4, Utopias (1987) and Between Times (1993), Karlin extended this examination of the fragility of socialist dreams, attempting to understand the fundamental shifts that had occurred within the labour movement and the left in the long period of Conservative rule.

Karlin also searched out sources for alternative visions of socialism. A series of four films about the Nicaraguan revolution, shown on Channel 4 in 1985, examined the dilemmas of putting socialism into practice. Rigorously avoiding the conventions either of television reportage or of the solidarity film, these films puzzled many viewers. His omitting to portray the Sandinista leadership earned Karlin the displeasure of both the Nicaraguan authorities and the Nicaragua Solidarity Campaign. Nevertheless, he returned to make Scenes from a Revolution (Channel 4, 1990) just before the elections in which the Sandinistas were defeated.

His last two major completed films, The Outrage (1995) for BBC2, and The Serpent (1997) for Channel 4, show his aesthetic adopting a lighter touch and moving in new directions. The former is almost an anomaly in Karlin's work, an 'arts documentary', in which a thinly fictionalised offscreen voice tries to understand the puzzling work of the American painter Cy Twombly. In the latter, another thinly fictionalised character, this time on screen, becomes obsessed by Rupert Murdoch and sets out, Don Quixote-like, to resist him as much as he can. At the time of his untimely death, he was working on a typically quirky fiction film for BBC2 entitled Milton (The Man Who Read Paradise Lost Once Too Often).

Karlin played a leading role in independent film culture. He was involved in setting up the Independent Film-makers' Association (IFA) in 1974, in the independent distributor-exhibitor The Other Cinema, and in the Channel 4 Group, which helped to determine the shape of the new television channel as a public service broadcaster with a commitment to independent production. Through the film journal Vertigo, founded in 1993 (www.vertigomagazine.co.uk), he helped to hew out a critical space for radical films. Less visibly, he provided endless cooperative support to colleagues through advice and technical facilities.

MICHAEL CHANAN

See also: Marker, Chris

Biography

Born 1943 in Paris; studied at the Central School of Speech and Drama, London. Joined Cinema Action in 1969, and a year later formed the Berwick Street Film Collective with Richard Mordaunt, James Scott, and Humphrey Trevelyan. Active in the Independent Filmmakers' Association and The Other Cinema in the 1970s and helped to found Vertigo magazine in 1993. Died in London in 1999.

Selected films

- 1975 Nightcleaners
- 1982 For Memory
- 1984 A Voyage of Discovery
- 1987 Utopias
- 1990 Scenes from a Revolution
- 1993 Between Times
- 1995 The Outrage
- 1997 The Serpent

Further reading

- Ellis, John, 'Conscience of Radicals', The Guardian, January 25, 1999.
- Johnston, Claire, 'The Nightcleaners Part 1', in Margaret Dickinson (ed.), Rogue Reels, Oppositional Film in Britain, 1945–90, London: BFI, 1999.
- Karlin, Marc, 'Making Images Explode', in Sheila Rowbotham and Huw Beynon (eds), Looking at Class, Film, Television and the Working Class in Britain, London: Rivers Oram Press, 2001.
- 'A Passion for Images', transcript of an interview with Patrick Wright (BBC Radio 3, February 2, 1999), Vertigo, 1, no. 9, 1999.

Karmen, Roman

Although Roman Karmen has a good number of films to his credit as a director, his primary claim to a place in the history of cinema is as the exemplar of a particular type of cinematographer: the newsreel correspondent, Soviet style. Karmen's name is closely associated with war reportage in Spain, China, and Vietnam and is also known for his work during World War II.

The footage he shot during the year he spent in Spain was used not only for a series of newsreels for home consumption in the USSR, but also in documentaries for foreign distribution with titles such as In Defence of Madrid (1936). The same material was quickly incorporated into other films produced elsewhere in solidarity with the Republicans, including the compilations put together in Paris by Buñuel and in New York by Helen van Dongen. Many years later Karmen's images would reappear in Frédéric Rossif's documentary To Die in Madrid (1963). Karmen is thus the author of many of the best-known icons of antifascist struggle in the 1930s.

Karmen was born in Odessa in 1906. His father was a popular writer who was killed by the White Guards during the Civil War. The income from the publication of a book of his father's writings allowed the family to move to Moscow, where the boy set about studying photography and got a job with the magazine Ogoniok, one of a series of illustrated journals that published the work of the new Soviet school of photography of the 1920s. Karmen's work appeared in practically all of them over the next few years, including Tridtsat Dniei, where he published a series of photo-documentaries on students, fashion, an automobile factory, and other topics, and which anticipated his later practice as a cinematographer in building up a sequence of shots around the subject he was filming, each shot composed on the move with an expert eye. Nor, as he puts it in his autobiography, did he escape the influence of Rodchenko, and some of his work was published in Lef in 1927. Two years later he entered the Moscow film school, stimulated by documentaries such as Vladimir Erofeev's Towards a Happy Haven (1930), the cinematography of its cameraman Yuri Stillianudis, and the early films of Joris Ivens, who made his first visit to Russia at this time.

Karmen's first break was an invitation to work with Erofeev on a film in Central Asia as second cameraman, which also gave him his first experience of sound filming. He became an early enthusiast of filming in sound—although in Spain, where he was sent in August 1936, he was to shoot without sound. Karmen's time in Spain overlapped with that of both Joris Ivens, who was filming The Spanish Earth with his cameraman John Ferno, and Ivor Montagu, who brought Norman McLaren as his cameraman to film The Defence of Madrid. However, whereas Ivens and Montagu, with their meager funds, had to come and go as quickly as possible, Karmen's role as a newsreel correspondent allowed him to stay in Spain for a year, and inevitably he conceived the idea of a long documentary of his own. In the end the project was realized by Esfir Shub under the title España; it was released in 1939, four months after the end of the Civil War. This film incorporated additional material from other sources and carried a tendentious commentary enshrining the official Soviet version of the Civil War, but the combination of Karmen's cinematography and Shub's skills as an editor gives the film enormous visual impact. Thirty years later Karmen returned to Spain to make his own retrospective documentary on Spain, Granada, My Granada (1967).

By the time España came out, Karmen had left for another tour of war duty on the other side of the world, to film the Chinese struggle against the Japanese invasion. When the Nazis finally launched their attack on the Soviet Union in 1941 Karmen already had two wars behind him, and he spent the next four years in the thick of it, filming the battles at the gates of Moscow, the siege of Leningrad, and the fighting at Stalingrad. This time Karmen had his own screen credit as director for Leningrad at War (1942), a film structured as a chronicle of the siege, from the first aid convoys, through the terrible winter without fuel, to the arrival of spring, which brings the first military victories against the invaders and the chance to bury the dead. Again, Karmen is the author of some of the key icons of the times. The end of the war saw him entering Berlin with the rank of major, together with the Russian forces. It was Karmen who filmed the Nazi Act of Capitulation in Karlshorst.

Nine years later, after various assignments within the Soviet Union—films virtually unknown in the West and probably forgotten in Russia—he went off to war again in Vietnam, following the French defeat at Dien Bien Phu. Once again he shot iconic images, this time of Ho Chi Minh in his bamboo hut in the jungle, and a remarkable interview with the captured French General De Castries calling on France to end the war. He reached Cuba, however, only after the Revolution had taken power, but still in the first flush of Soviet solidarity, a few months after Mikoyan made the first official Russian visit.

MICHAEL CHANAN

See also: Ivens, Joris; To Die in Madrid

Biography

Born 1906, Odessa. After the family moved to Moscow, began studying photography and started working for Ogoniok and other illustrated magazines. Entered the Moscow Film School in 1929 and soon established himself as a newsreel cameraman of exceptional sensibility. Sent to Spain in 1936 for his first foreign assignment; his work there has been compared to Robert Capa's photography. He subsequently worked as what Sadoul calls a 'film journalist' in China, Vietnam, and Cuba, as well as throughout the USSR during World War II and at the Nuremberg Trials after the war.

Much of his footage was used repeatedly, eventually becoming iconic images of the events portrayed. Also credited with directing a number of films, though sometimes these were compiled from his material by others. Died in 1978.

Selected films

- 1932 Moscow
- 1936 Salute to the Spanish Pioneers
- 1939 Spain (compiled by Esfir Shub)
- 1939 China Defends Herself
- 1943 The Defence of Leningrad
- 1947 Judgment of the People
- 1954 Vietnam
- 1960 Cuba, Island in Flames
- 1967 Granada, My Granada

Further reading

- Barberis, Patrick and Chapuis, Dominique, Roman Karmen: Une légende rouge, Paris, Seuil, 2002.
- Crusells, Magí, La Guerra Civil Española: Cine y propaganda, Barcelona: Editorial Ariel, 2000.
- Karmen, Roman, No pasarán, Moscow: Editorial Progreso, 1976.

Kauffmann, Stanley

As the resident film critic at The New Republic for more than forty years, Stanley Kauffmann established and has maintained a reputation as one of the most acute American critics of an art form that was only two decades older than himself. The author of numerous plays and of seven novels, and an active reviewer of both books and theater, Kauffmann relied, in his hundreds of weekly film reviews, on a broad cultural education and a dramatist's linguistic abilities and narrative instincts. Although he acknowledged the value of purely formal film criticism and occasionally wrote on the distinct aesthetic properties of the cinema, Kauffmann insisted in his film reviews on a plausible storyline and strong acting. His writings, and his publication of an anthology of contemporary reviews of early American films, also demonstrate a consistent interest in the history, and the future, of the medium. Film, for Kauffmann, met a singular cultural need and represented what he called the most inescapable, through its basic indexicality and its seductive immediacy, of art forms.

Working from the premise that inventions appear exactly when they do because of intense social pressures and expectations, Kauffmann assumed that film was inherently modern. Its history was related to developments in nineteenth-century photography and theater, but for Kauffmann, the appearance of moving pictures in the 1890s could be fully explained only as a response to popular will. This interest in the populist appeal of film informed, in 1966, his best-known essay, 'The Film Generation', in which he argued that current enthusiasm for film was due in part to a proprietary sense, on the part of young filmgoers, that film belonged to them because it was the art least tangled with the past. More abstractly, he suggested that the film generation could evoke the films that it wanted or needed. In a dismayed update written in 1985, however, he claimed that the appetite for film among young people had diminished, and he traced this erosion of interest to several causes, including a decline in the production of quality international films. Finally, in 1997, he stated that 'the situation is inarguably dark', although he pointed to several recent releases as evidence that quality films were still being made and could find audiences. For Kauffmann, a consistent proponent of international cinema, the heady days of 1960 were unknown to a new generation of potential cinephiles.

The vast majority of his reviews concerned fiction films, but Kauffmann did treat major documentary works—or, to use the term that he sometimes preferred, nonfiction films. He never codified his thoughts on the form, but he openly distinguished between nonfiction films in which the subjects are unaware of being photographed, and those in which the subjects are well aware of the camera's presence. For Kauffmann it was the second type that was especially provocative, or even troubling. It was not the aim of such works that was elusive; the goal of documentary films, visible even in the early work of the Lumière brothers, was related in Kauffmann's mind to a basic interest in voyeurism that was tied more to a desire for self-understanding than to any prurient interest. Seemingly uninterested in exploring the exact contours of such a desire, however, Kauffmann chose instead to emphasize what he saw as the paradox at the heart of the documentary project: the impossibility of a nominally voyeuristic cinema. Arguing that the very fact of observation altered the observed phenomenon, he concluded that the mere presence of the camera could significantly alter the behavior of a filmed subject.

This did not preclude, in Kauffmann's opinion, a successful documentary film. Even as he accented the visible influence of the lens, he also stressed the possibility and the importance of filmed subjects who might, through a rote familiarity with the camera, act or speak almost naturally. Pure naturalism was perhaps never possible in film, but moments of relative honesty could justify attempts at transparent reportage. In a 1989 review of High Fidelity, in fact, Kauffmann tried to describe the path to such a state, arguing that filmed subjects pass through an early self-consciousness and semi-forgetfulness of the lens, and then through a seeming forgetfulness still combined with performance, before emerging into nearly complete forgetfulness. Skilled makers of documentaries should thus concentrate on the last, or the last two, stages in this evolution of the subject. By extension, the most important aspect of shooting documentaries is, for Kauffmann, a simple sense of credibility, as the filmmakers must earn the trust of the subjects in order to move past the opaque intrusiveness of shot film. This credibility was never clearer for Kauffmann than in Allan King's 1967 Warrendale, but he argued that it was also the indirect product of a general cultural fluency in film and television conventions, which allowed all consumers of images (and by extension nearly all filmed subjects) a basic confidence and familiarity with the camera.

In his writings on documentary films Kauffmann also weighed the morality of aestheticized shots and nonlinear editing practices, and he generally concluded that such strategies could be condoned if they contributed to a reasonable dramatic line. In his review of Warrendale, for example, he approved of changes to the chronology of events in order to place the death of a woman nearer the end of the film. A year later, however, he objected, in a review of In the Year of the Pig, to pairings of public remarks with subsequent events, arguing that they created a misleading sense of history. Ultimately, then, for Kauffmann there could be no such thing as utterly objective reporting, but there was such a thing as objective intent, and the best documentaries acknowledged their lack of transparency, while also adhering to conventionally dramatic or artistic traditions. For this reason, as he noted, the best documentaries often chose intrinsically dramatic subjects. 'A documentary', he concluded in a 1968 review of A Face of War, 'might be defined as fact dramatized but not distorted by either prejudice or zeal.'

KERR HOUSTON

Biography

Born April 24, 1916. Published eighteen plays between 1933 and 1944; wrote eight novels between 1941 and 1960, and edited early manuscripts by Walker Percy. Began writing film criticism for The New Republic in 1958 after sending in an unsolicited review. Spent eight months as theater critic for The New York Times in 1966, before returning to The New Republic as associate literary editor. After writing lead book reviews for The New Republic from September 1966 until February 1968, returned to film criticism and was named the magazine's theater critic. Wrote regular film and theater criticism until 1979, when he reduced his involvement. Taught at the Yale University School of Drama from 1967 to 1973 and later at York College, Adelphi University, and Hunter College. Received the Outstanding Teacher Award from the Association for Theater in Higher Education in 1995 and the Telluride Film Festival Award for Criticism in 1998. Appeared as interviewee in The Tramp and the Director, 2002.

Further reading

- Cardullo, Bert, Before His Eyes: Essays in Honor of Stanley Kauffmann, London: University Press of America, 1987.
- Kauffmann, Stanley, A World on Film: Criticism and Comment, New York: Harper & Row, 1966.
- Figures of Light: Film Criticism and Comment, N York: Harper & Row, 1971.
- American Film Criticism: From the Beginnings to Citizen Kane: Reviews of Significant Films at the Times They First Appeared, New York: Liveright, 1972.
- Living Images: Film Comment and Criticism, New York: Harper & Row, 1975.
- Persons of the Drama: Theater Criticism and Comment, New York: Harper & Row, 1976.

- Albums of Early Life*, New Haven: Ticknor & Fields, 1980.
- Before My Eyes: Film Criticism and Comment*, New York: Harper & Row, 1980.
- Theater Criticisms*, New York: Performing Arts Journal Publications, 1983.
- Field of View: Film Criticism and Comment*, New York: PAJ Publications, 1986.
- Distinguishing Features: Film Criticism and Comment*, Baltimore, MD: John Hopkins University Press, 1994.
- Regarding Film: Criticism and Comment*, Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2001.

Kawase, Naomi

Although it is her fiction films that have made her Japan's most famous woman filmmaker, Kawase's documentaries have come to symbolize personal documentary in Japan since the 1980s. Her work stems in part from her unique family situation: she was adopted by her great-aunt and great-uncle at a very young age after her parents divorced. Films such as Ni tsutsumarete/Embracing (1992) and Kya Ka Ra Ba A (2001) specifically search for and approach those missing parents, particularly her father, but the general theme of absence unifies much of the rest of her work as well, including her fiction films such as Moe no suzaku/Suzaku (1996) and Shara so'ju/Shara (2002). In cinematic terms this has translated into a concern for the trace, and thus with such forms of recording as photography and audio recording. As in Ni tsutsumarete, she will present photographs on screen and seek out their origins, or, as with Mangekyo/Manguekyo (1999) and Tsuioku no dansu/Letter from a Yellow Cherry Blossom (2002), she will investigate the photographer and the process of tracing the image. There is an evident desire to restore that which is absent in, but indicated by, the trace, as well as to authenticate tracing itself. The sun and the shadows that it produces, the marks left by a hand on a cold window pane—such images feature prominently in her work. One can argue that Kawase seeks to fill this absence, rooted in personal history, with a system of feeling founded in what many consider the gentle gaze of her camera, epitomized by the many close-ups shot with an 8mm film camera, as well as in an interaction between filmmaker and the filmed that creates a community of emotion in works like Kaze no kioku/Memory of the Wind (1995). The lessons she has learned from filmmakers such as Ogawa Shinsuke and Fukuda Katsuhiko about involving herself with her subject were realized in both the fictional Moe no suzaku and its documentary sequel Somaudo monogatari/The Weald (1997).

What also appears to fill this absence is an animistically viewed nature, ruled by a circular, virtually ahistorical temporality. The cycles of nature and the traditional geography and rituals of the ancient capital of Nara, her birthplace, figure prominently in such films as Katatumori (1994) and Hotaru (2000). The citation of a transcendental, eternal time could be seen to obviate both the absences generating her cinema as well as the possibilities of political change by postulating an eternal, national culture. Kawase's voiced aversions to the political rhetoric of, for instance, feminism could lead one to link her with a tendency within personal documentary in Japan that has pursued personal subjectivity without politically theorizing it (Nornes 2002). Yet her works have consistently exhibited a tension that refuses to gloss over the absences that anchor them. This is not simply because loss and rupture continue to define her recent work, from the disappearance of a twin in Shara so'ju to a photographer facing the loss of his own life in Tsuioku no dansu, nor is it because she has elaborated on her notion of tradition in Hotaru and Shara. Rather it is because her work has always been cognizant of the limitations of representation, exhibiting both the conflicts the camera can create (for example, her quarrels with her great-aunt in Hi wa katabuki/The Setting Sun (1996)) and the general inability of this medium of traces to find the source of the trace (evinced by her refusal to fully show the father searched for in Ni tsutsumarete, even after he is found). This can reflect a profound uncertainty over the subjectivity explored in personal documentary, to the point where, even in her most narcissistic documentary Kya Ka Ra Ba A, the self itself may become merely a trace, represented by the tattoos that Kawase's body bears at the end. Although she does not exhibit the theoretical acumen of some of her American colleagues, Kawase continues to explore the absences of existence and the limitations of cinema by documenting them in her own personal way.

Biography

Born in Nara, Japan, May 30, 1969. Graduated from the Osaka School of Photography in 1989. Her independently made films Embracing (1992) and Katatsumori (1994) won the FIPRESCI Prize and New Asian Currents Jurists' Special Mention at the 1995 Yamagata International Documentary Film Festival. Her first fiction feature film, Suzaku, won the Camera d'Or at the 1997 Cannes Film Festival; her second, Hotaru, was awarded the FIPRESCI Prize at the 2001 Locarno Film Festival. She has continued her production activities in part through her own production company, Kumie.

Selected films

- 1988 Watashi ga tsuyoku kyo^mi o motta mono o o^kiku fix dekiritoru/I Focus on That Which Interests Me
- 1989 Tatta hitori no kazoku/My Sole Family
- 1992 Ni tsutsumarete/Embracing
- 1994 Katatsumori
- 1995 Ten, mitake/See the Heavens
- 1995 Kaze no kioku: 1995.12.26 Shibuya nite/Memory of the Wind: At Shibuya on December 26, 1995
- 1996 Hi wa katabuki/The Setting Sun
- 1997 Somaudo monogatari/The Weald
- 1998 Tayutau ni kokyo^: hitorigurashi o hajimete, sannenme no aki ni/Wandering at Home: The Third Fall Since Starting to Live Alone
- 1999 Mangekyo^/Mangekyo
- 2001 Kya Ka Ra Ba A
- 2002 Tsuioku no dansu/Letter from a Yellow Cherry Blossom

Further reading

- Kawase, Naomi and Gerow, Aaron, 'Documentarists of Japan, #14: Kawase Naomi', Documentary Box, November 16, 2000: 2–16.
- Nornes, Abé Mark, 'The Postwar Documentary Trace: Groping in the Dark', positions, October 1, 2002: 39–78.
- Novielli, Maria Roberto (ed.), Kawase Naomi: i film i cinema, Torino: Effata Editrice, 2002.
- Yomota, Inuhiko, Nihon eiga no rajikaruna ishi, Tokyo: Iwanami Shoten, 1999.

Keiller, Patrick

As an architect and documentary filmmaker, Patrick Keiller is one of the most distinctive visual artists to have emerged in Britain in the 1980s and 1990s. His particular interest is in landscape and the built environment, seen as markers for the changing conditions of British life. Keiller's documentary technique involves the defamiliarization of familiar spaces and common topographical images in an attempt to make early twentieth-century critiques of modernity relevant to contemporary Britain. Inspired by the example of La Jetée (Chris Marker, 1962) and the unusual juxtapositions of the Surrealists, his first five short films shot in monochrome on 16mm (Stonebridge Park, 1981; Norwood, 1983; The End, 1986; Valtos, 1987; The Clouds, 1989) combine a montage of urban and rural images with interior monologue: a technique that Keiller developed in colour in his two major feature documentaries, London (1994) and Robinson in Space (1997).

Keiller's first full-length film, London, documents the city from the perspective of an off-screen, unnamed narrator (with the voice of actor Paul Scofield) and his sometime lover Robinson, a part-time lecturer in art and architecture at the University of Barking. Robinson's presence in the film is limited to his being featured in the narrator's travel journal, through which Keiller seeks to locate the 'problem of London' in the early 1990s. Comprising three journeys across London, the montage of (largely static) urban images is interrupted by momentous events such as the 1992 general election (the Conservative Party won against the odds, which greatly disturbs Robinson), IRA bomb attacks, and miners' demonstrations. Searching for the roots of English Romanticism, Robinson is enraptured by the French poetry of Baudelaire, Rimbaud and Apollinaire, and by the Parisian figure of the wandering flâneur, but he feels that this role is impossible to adopt in London with its lack of communal spaces and café culture. Keiller describes London as 'a film about a city in decline', suggesting that it is not simply the embodiment of T.S. Eliot's 'unreal city' but also 'the first metropolis to disappear'. In his attempt to 'unmask' the spaces of London, Keiller used a handheld and versatile 35mm Eclair Cameflex camera, but he has commented that the film stock actually ‘flattered the subject’, reducing its smog and ‘sense of degradation’ and lending the city an aesthetic vitality that he (and his characters) believe has been lost in the contemporary metropolis.

Robinson in Space also follows the psycho-geographical exploits of Robinson through the eyes of his researcher and travelling companion, again with the voice of Paul Scofield. Modelled on Daniel Defoe’s travelog and meditation on the state of the country, A Tour Through the Whole Island of Great Britain (1724–7), and preceding the release of another travel documentary, called Gallivant (Andrew Kötting, 1997), which follows the coastal route around the British mainland, Robinson in Space leaves the topography of London for a tour of the regions. Now based in Reading, Robinson has been commissioned to study ‘the problem of England’, and the film examines aspects of public space, culture, industry, manufacture, architecture, and housing in what Keiller calls an attempt ‘to locate some of the economic activity that no longer takes place in [metropolitan] cities’, exploring instead the hinterlands and outskirts of regional cities. The political subtext of the film is similar to that of London: it details the unequal distribution of wealth that occurred under the Conservative Government of the 1980s and early 1990s and regrets the UK’s lack of interest in its (unexpectedly surviving) manufacturing industry. Keiller has written that he initially envisaged the film as ‘a critique of English “gentlemanly” capitalism’ but that instead it revealed the new landscape of an international, deregulated economy.

The narrative comprises seven picaresque trips around England: the first along the Thames to London; then to Oxford, Cambridge, and the West Country; to the Midlands; Birmingham, and Liverpool; to Manchester and Hull; to Scarborough and Whitby; and finally to Blackpool and Sellafield. The images that accompany the narrative range from the banal (shopping centers, landfill sites, and traffic signs), the iconic (the view of London from Purfleet and the Clifton Suspension Bridge in Bristol), and the industrial (particularly multinational firms such as Toyota near Derby and Samsung on Teeside), to the intriguing (a ‘Brain Haulage’ sign in Dagenham and a photograph of Hadrian’s Wall on an English Heritage phone card). As Paul Julian Smith comments, these images mark ‘the passing of the industrial era [that] is mourned and celebrated in its pathetic and curious ruins; and the narrator’s earnest repetition of official statistics mirrors the modest ambitions of English life, composed as it is of continual disappointments and compromises’. The narrative resists nostalgia for a lost Britain, relying on a detached and wry tone that moves from the serious and the literary (with references to Rimbaud, Wilde, and Defoe) to the humorous and the quirky, with the voice-over and the images often juxtaposed ironically. Although Robinson remains an elusive figure, glimpses of his biography (we know he was born in Blackpool, and he claims that he has relatives in Newcastle), his aesthetic and literary interests, his health (both companions get sick after weeks of hotel food), and his sexuality (he finds a partner on the Internet) offer enough information to personalize the tour. The narrative finishes not long after the pair visit the carnivalesque Blackpool and the threatening nuclear plant at Sellafield (representing the best and worst of the northwest), ending suddenly when the two companions are told that their research ‘contracts had been terminated’ following the apocalyptic report of a Tornado jet crashing into the North Sea.

Keiller remains skeptical that film can capture the detail of large-format architectural photography, and he is aware of the difficulties of representing three-dimensional structures within the flat space of film (see his interview with Joe Kerr). Nevertheless, he continued to develop his documentary interests in his film The Dilapidated Dwelling (2000), which examines ‘the predicament of the house in advanced economies’. A fictional researcher (with the voice of Tilda Swinton) returns from a twenty-year sojourn in the Arctic to find that, although the UK is an electronically advanced nation, the houses are among the most dilapidated in Western Europe. Keiller suggests that his subject matter was unfashionable in the late 1990s, claiming that ‘the definitive experiences of modernity, or postmodernity, seemed to involve movement’, whereas to stay at home was to marginalize oneself. Taking the tension between movement and stasis as its conceptual focus, the film explores whether there is a close relation or, indeed, an opposition between the state of housing and the economies of developed countries. The film contains archive footage of Buckminster Fuller, Constant, Archigram, and Walter Segal, together with interviews with

Martin Pawley, Saskia Sassen, Doreen Massey, and Cedric Price.

MARTIN HALLIWELL

Biography

Born in Blackpool in 1950. Studied at the Bartlett School of Architecture and, after working for a time as an architect in the 1970s, in the Department of Environmental Media at the Royal College of Art, London, where he began to make films and other topographic works. He released his first short films in the early 1980s, and his first audiovisual installations were exhibited at the Tate Gallery in 1982. He has also exhibited in the 1990 British Art Show, and his films are distributed in the United States and Europe. In 2002 he was an Arts and Humanities Research Board Fellow in the Creative and Performing Arts at the Royal College of Art, working on a three-year project called 'The City of the Future', which uses archive footage to explore the ways in which the city has been represented during the first century of film.

Selected films

- 1981 Stonebridge Park (21 mins, 16mm, black and white)
- 1983 Norwood (26 mins, 16mm, black and white)
- 1986 The End (18 mins, 16mm, black and white)
- 1987 Valtos (11 mins, 16mm, black and white)
- 1989 The Clouds (20 mins, 16mm, black and white)
- 1994 London (85 mins, 35mm, color)
- 1997 Robinson in Space (82 mins, 35mm, color)
- 2000 The Dilapidated Dwelling (78 mins, beta sx, color)

Further reading

- Keiller, Patrick, Robinson in Space and a Conversation with Patrick Wright, London: Reaktion Books, 1999.
- 'Port Statistics', in Iain Borden and Joe Kerr (eds), The Unknown City, Cambridge, MA: MIT Press, 2000: 443–57.
- 'Architectural Cinematography', in Kester Rattenbury (ed.), This is Not Architecture, London: Routledge, 2002: 37–44.

—'Sexual Ambiguity and Automotive Engineering', in Peter Wollen and Joe Kerr (eds), Autopia, London: Reaktion Books, 2002.

Kerr, Joe 'To change life, however, we must first change space' (interview with Patrick Keiller), in Architecture + Film II, ed. Bob Fear, Architectural Design 70, no. 2, January 2000: 82–5.

Martin-Jones, David, 'Interview with Patrick Keiller', Journal of Popular British Cinema 5, 2002: 123–32.

Smith, Paul Julien, 'Review of Robinson in Space', Sight and Sound 7, no. 1, January 1997: 44.

Yates, Robert, 'Review of London', Sight and Sound 4, no. 6, June 1994: 54–5.

Kiarostami, Abbas

One fascinating aspect of Kiarostami's feature films is their blurring of the boundary between documentary and fiction. Nama-y Nazdik/Close-Up (1990), which perhaps ought simply to be called a documentary, is about true events, with those concerned appearing as themselves in reenactments and sometimes in what may be a filming of events as they first happen. The degree of art at play is kept constantly in question in this film. Other films, with invented stories, use nonprofessional actors in their own familiar worlds, many of them children at school or at play. Shooting is done on location, which often means on a car trip or walking trip. Kiarostami films are very much outdoors. Zen-degi va digar Hich/Life and Nothing More (1992) takes in—indeed bases itself upon—the devastating earthquake in northern Iran that occurred shortly before the film was shot, and which we see in all its aftereffects. With Khaneh-ye Dust Kojast/Where is the Friend's House? (1987), Life and Nothing More, and Ta'm-e Gilas/Taste of Cherry (1996), one feels repeatedly that the film leaves, or drifts out of, the realm of imagined story and becomes just observational. The film seems to surprise itself, losing its bearings and finding itself in a new mode.

In the 1970s and 1980s Kiarostami made short experimental films using nonfictional footage for meditations on ethical, artistic, or political issues, or even using nonfiction to form a fiction. Mashq-e Shab/Homework (1990) and A.B.C. Africa (2001) are feature-length documentaries on brutalized schoolchildren in Iran and on the plight of orphans in the AIDS crisis in Uganda, respectively. In the short films and longer documentaries, as in Close-Up and the other features, crisis and even cataclysm draw Kiarostami's attention, as if this is the tenor of life now, or as if such crisis asks especially for the intervention of civilized and inventive filmmaking. Children draw this director's attention, as though defining his civilized sensibilities and giving life to his inventiveness.

In the short films, documentary images and sounds are the grains of truth around which, or out of which, a series of thoughts or a fantasy spins itself. Yet the documentation remains what it is, never giving way entirely in the dialectic with creativity. Rang-ha/Colors (1976) offers us a woman's voice-over in a cheerful lesson on color identification for children, aimed at such important understandings as how to read and obey a traffic light. However, the film we see is a series of integral images of human-made objects, fruits, goldfish, and so on, where things insist on an existence of their own. Kiarostami's editing imposes humorous juxtapositions, seeming open to the world of things in a spirit of anarchy, against the grain of the traditional teacher's sense of order. In Beh Tartib ya Bedun-e Tartib/Regular, Irregular (With or Without Order) (1981) the film's ostensible makers discuss in voice-over the virtues of doing things in an orderly way, and how best to film and edit the orderly and disorderly action: boys exiting a classroom or loading onto a school bus, or of pedestrians and traffic in a busy intersection. The words seem almost to dictate what we see. Yet what emerges in the relatively long takes is a raw energy in people and a disposition toward violating rules, attributes that ask to be accepted with good humor as a fact of life. Dandandard/Toothache (1980) is presumably a fiction about a little boy who suffers a toothache and gets treatment, but the footage at school looks real, with outdoor games, the classroom, and the boy breaking down in tears with pain. The dental clinic footage looks real, showing us a busy and bustling place with many people getting treatment. Then the documentary focus shifts as a senior dentist speaks, offering instruction on dental hygiene, aided by intercut illustrations. The cries of the boy in the dentist's chair continue in counterpoint to the instructional presentation. This film, which was made just in the wake of the Islamic Revolution, seems a metaphor for the whole idea of trauma and what is to be made of it.

Picking up on Avvali-ha/First Graders (1985), about disruptive children sent to confront the school principal, and on the feature Where is the Friend's House?, which begins and ends with seemingly real, stressful schoolroom scenes, Homework faces more fully and directly than any of Kiarostami's other work on what is done to children in the name of bringing them up to fit into society—in contemporary Iran, yes, but the film's concerns seem broader than that. Homework opens with the camera panning and moving along with boys on their way to school in snowy streets, noisy and full of high spirits. We then see them massed in their schoolyard for exercises and religious and patriotic chants. Thereafter, for more than an hour of screen time, the film is confined to a darkish room where Kiarostami questions six- to eight-year olds one by one about their problems with homework. The room has the feel of a police interrogation center, and in prolonged confinement here the viewer is made to feel a captivity like that inflicted on the children by the ideas and practices of their educational system. Kiarostami is a very gentle questioner, eliciting information about confusing assignments, unhelpful but demanding parents, beatings at home and at school. Even though he is gentle and seems progressive, however, he also aligns filmmaking with the powers that be. There are numerous cuts to an ominous close-up of a staring camera lens, what the boys are facing constantly, and the whole situation makes them nervous and fearful, so different from the way they appeared outdoors. It is as if this documentary must acknowledge and use film's violent and oppressive power in order to understand and convey an ongoing problem of violence and oppression.

There is great variety in the children's faces and in the potential for feeling that they show, and yet a sameness haunts what they say of their experience and their values, a sameness in what they seem to think they ought to think. There are glimpses of an alternative to this life during a cutaway to group religious chanting, when Kiarostami turns off the sound and the camera registers the disorderly force running through the bodies and faces of the young people. 'Let us go', these images seem to cry out. More ambiguous and disturbing is the release that comes at the end of the film, when the boy who has been most upset by the questioning begins to recite a Hymn to the Creator that he has memorized very well. Clearly the achievement of what can be learned, what the mind can be opened to, compensates in some measure for the trauma of the passage to learning. Or is what we see merely meaningless and rote recitation?

After Homework Kiarostami's films turn more to the world of adults, beginning with Close-Up. A man was arrested for impersonating the film director Mohsen Makhmalbaf and cheating a well-off family with hopes of participation in a film, and upon hearing the news, Kiarostami pursued a film project on the subject, not sleeping, he says, for forty days and nights, scurrying to interview people and do reenactments of events with them. Kiarostami's film project clearly affects the people involved, including a trial judge, and how they choose to resolve things with one another, so Close-Up becomes, among other things, a documentary on how documentary affects life. The film shows us modern Tehran high and low, the worlds of journalism (including film journalism), and the justice system. The film probes the human heart, the longing of people to escape life as it is and to become involved in a creative venture, here film, whether the impersonator's bogus film or Kiarostami's film. Close-Up is one of the crucial documentaries of recent decades; it is discussed at greater length elsewhere in this volume.

After his series of features brought increasing recognition and praise in the 1990s, Kiarostami answered the call of an international agency to make a documentary about a Ugandan organization for the aid of foster families taking in children orphaned by AIDS. A.B.C. Africa, shot in digital video, is Kiarostami's first film outside Iran, and he stresses his status as an outside observer, using voice-overs of local officials to explain things, showing himself and his crew repeatedly, keeping almost constantly in motion—touring, filming from moving cars, filming while walking about. There are beautiful long takes from a slightly high angle, the point of view of an adult looking down at children, the camera slowly exploring open market areas, little shops, and a hospital compound, finding the faces of children, all of whom engage with the camera. As always in Kiarostami, children mean life and stand as a contradiction to the way of the world that would hand them their destiny (a toddler's cheerful T-shirt reads 'ABC', a mark of what the world has in store for her to learn, but also, in the way she wears it and moves about, an expression of her energy and openness to adventure). The film becomes more and more serious as it goes along. Death becomes ever-present, as the camera discovers the seriously ill and at last a corpse. The use of freeze-frames in a hospital sequence seems almost a withdrawal from what is unbearable to contemplate in living time.

In the middle of the film all comes to a halt as the filmmakers talk at their hotel in total darkness after the routine midnight shut-off of electricity, and then fall silent. Their talk is of malaria, AIDS, and adaptation to darkness, and at last they seem at a loss for words and go to their respective rooms, the camcorder with one of them still running. It registers darkness and silence and, eventually, the sound of rain and thunder and the occasional illumination of a lightning flash. Throughout the film thunder rumbles; it seems a sign of impending doom, or relief. This night episode is a way for the film to evoke death in film's own terms, as a matter of light and dark, sound and silence, the viewer being forced to focus, for a few long-seeming moments, on nothing. Kiarostami is able to come to terms with the material about which he has been asked to make a film, because he is willing to identify film with death, here nakedly, poetically. However, throughout A.B.C. Africa the filmmakers remind us that they are an outside force, intervening, moving about freely, like the visitation of disease or the storms on the horizon. In the film's acknowledgment of its outsideness, even its negativity, it is able here, as in Homework, to meet life and give it space to define itself, provide it with something to work against and thereby to flourish.

CHARLES WARREN

See also: Close-Up

Biography

Born in Tehran on June 22, 1940. Studied fine arts and graphic design at Tehran University. Worked in advertising and made television commercials in the 1960s. Set up a filmmaking program for the Institute for the Intellectual Development of Children and Young Adults in 1969, which produced his films over the next two decades. Established himself as a well-known film director and major cultural figure in Iran with The Traveler in 1972. Became well known internationally with Where is the Friend's House? in 1987, the first of the 'Koker Trilogy'. Wrote the screenplay for Jafar Panahi's The White Balloon, released in 1995. Given a retrospective by the Film Society of Lincoln Center in 1996. Won the Palme d'Or at the Cannes Film Festival for Taste of Cherry in 1997. Published Walking with the Wind, a book of poems, in 1999.

Further reading

- Cheshire, Godfrey, 'How to Read Kiarostami', Cineaste 25, no. 4, 2000: 8–15.
- Dabashi, Hamid, Close Up: Iranian Cinema, Past, Present and Future, London and New York: Verso, 2001.
- Kiarostami, Abbas, 'With Borrowed Eyes', Film Comment 36, no. 4, 2000: 20–5.
- Lopate, Phillip, Totally, Tenderly, Tragically: Essays and Criticism from a Lifelong Love Affair with the Movies, New York: Anchor Books/Doubleday, 1998.
- Perez, Gilberto, The Material Ghost: Films and Their Medium, Baltimore, MD and London: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1998.
- Saeed-Vafa, Mehrnaz and Rosenbaum, Jonathan, Abbas Kiarostami, Urbana-Champaign, IL: University of Illinois Press, 2003.

Kieślowski, Krzysztof

Krzysztof Kieślowski, a prominent representative of Poland's 'Cinema of Moral Anxiety' in the 1970s and 1980s, started his film career directing documentary shorts for Polish state organizations. He graduated from the Lodz Film School in 1968, with a degree in direction. This prestigious institution produced the leading Polish directors of the postwar era: Andrzej Wajda, Roman Polanski, Jerzy Skolimowski, and Krzysztof Zanussi.

The experience and camaraderie of this intense four-year learning period, in the political context of 1960s communist Poland, shaped Kieślowski's view of the profession. It not only marked his approach to documentary cinema but also guided his later evolution toward fiction cinema. 'Film school taught me how to look at the world. It showed me that life exists and that people talk, laugh, worry, suffer, steal in this life, that all this can be photographed and that from all these photographs a story can be told,' he pointed out in Danusia Stok's book-length interview Kieślowski on Kieślowski (Stok 1993).

Working for the State Documentary Studio (WFD) and Polish television, Kieślowski made during the 1970s more than twenty-five shorts about Polish contemporary life. On the surface, these are straightforward accounts of ordinary people in everyday occurrences, but—as in the case of Marina Goldovskaya, Kieślowski's contemporary in Soviet Russia—by casting an unblinking look at reality, these portraits expose the flaws and contradictions of the socialist experiment. In Kieślowski on Kieślowski he commented on the unique role of Polish documentary in the 1970s:

At that time, I was interested in everything that could be described by the documentary film camera. There was a necessity, a need—which was very exciting for us—to describe the world. The Communist world had described how it should be and not how it really was. We—there were a lot of us—tried to describe this world and it was fascinating to describe something which hadn't been described yet.

(Stok 1993)

Kieślowski utilized the documentary format as a powerful tool to 'construct' the reality denied by the nomenklatura (the Polish ruling class), astutely exploiting its editing possibilities for irony and revelation. In the documentary I'm So-So (1995), directed by his collaborator Krzysztof Wierzbicki, he points out: 'Our descriptive tools had been used for propagandistic purposes[...] Outside Poland, you don't know what it means to live in a world without representation.'

Kieślowski's views on documentary were first examined in his 1968 graduation thesis. He referred to the 'dramaturgy of reality' and the possibilities that the form offers to record reality, discussing the work of French critic André Bazin and of filmmakers Robert Flaherty and Richard Leacock. In an interview, years later, he reaffirmed the training value of documentary filmmaking, 'a very good school for synthetic thinking in the cinema.'

This steadfast adherence to realism as the way to reveal the truth about people and things connects Kieślowski's documentary work to that of cinéma vérité cultivators, with their preference for fly-on-the-wall methods of observation and for avoidance of an authorial style. However, the director's vocation to record a reality outside of the official communist discourse make this corpus of shorts a powerful political and historical document to examine the bleakness of life under the Stalinist regime.

These documentaries, as well as the reality-based fiction dramas Kieślowski made for television starting in the mid-1970s, need to be seen as part of a larger political project, that of filmmakers such as Wajda, Zanussi, and Agnieszka Holland who were probing the history, politics, and mores of a nation much battered by events of the twentieth century. Working doggedly within and against the constraints of the communist regime, the best postwar Polish cinema challenged the status quo in intelligent ways and spoke, beyond censors and obstacles, to a public eager to listen. Kieślowski's documentaries, then, play a double role, artistic as well as political. They constitute, as Danusia Stok observes, a precursor of the 'Cinema of Moral Anxiety', a series of fiction films examining the social and spiritual malaise of the Polish society, from the mid-1970s to the early 1980s. The bulk of Kieślowski's documentaries were made before the emergence in 1980 of Solidarity, the workers' dissident movement, which ultimately triggered the collapse of the communist regime.

Kieślowski's shorts are deceptively simple observations of ordinary Polish citizens whose limitations, be they material, social, or ideological, define their possibilities, as noted by Annette Insdorf in Double Lives, Second Chances (1999). Many of them focus on individuals involved with State institutions. They reveal a profound compassion for the people he portrays—factory workers, doctors, tuberculosis patients, newlyweds, car racers, dancers, passengers in a train station, bureaucrats—as well as his interest in the complexities of life and politics. To some fellow countrymen at the time, several of these films seemed ambiguous toward the communist regime. To others, they were a way to survive and resist within the rules of the game. A case in point was Zyciorys/Curriculum Vitae (1975), a fictionalized account of a former secretary of the Communist Party Control Committee who appeals his expulsion. What emerges from this combination of drama and documentary is the confrontation between the reality described by the protagonist and the twisted logic of the party officials. It is also a drama about the value of the human person who faces a dehumanizing ideology.

A common thread runs through these documentary shorts. Kieślowski himself summarized it to Danusia Stok: 'All my films from the first to the most recent ones, are about individuals who can't quite find their bearings, who don't quite know how to live, who don't really know what's right or wrong and are desperately looking.' These observations about life's uncertainties and the limitations placed upon the individual are central to some of his most relevant documentaries: Murarz/The Bricklayer (1973), Pierwsza miłość/First Love (1974), Szpital/Hospital (1976), and Z punktu widzenia nocnego portiera/From a Night Porter's Point of View (1977).

In The Bricklayer, the voice-over of a forty-five-year-old Warsaw mason preparing for the May Day workers' parade reveals a poignant story of political disillusionment, party bureaucracy, and ideals betrayed, but he is proud of his work as a bricklayer, a fact that gives meaning to his life. The young unmarried couple of First Love is expecting a child. Kieślowski follows them for eight months, recording their modest wedding, the birth of their daughter, the struggle to find suitable lodging. The harsh realities of life supplant notions of romantic bliss. The irony of the title is tempered by the filmmaker's compassion in handling the difficult beginnings of family life and by the couple's realistic assessment of their possibilities. Hospital shows orthopedic surgeons at work in a Warsaw hospital during a thirty-two-hour shift. The severe limitations under which they operate become a source of black humor, especially the use of makeshift surgical instruments. The humanity of the film is restored by the sympathetic portrayal of doctors working on the edge. A more complex view of a flawed human being is displayed in From a Night Porter's Point of View, the profile of a fascistic-minded factory guard who believes that 'rules are more important than people' and whose hobby is to verify other people's fishing permits. 'The porter wasn't a bad man [...] He just happens to think that it would be a good thing to hang people publicly because that would make everybody afraid to commit crimes,' he observed to Danusia Stok.

Kieślowski gave a persuasive explanation of why he abandoned the documentary genre by the mid-1970s. He came to believe, especially after First Love, that there were boundaries that filmmakers cannot cross because 'we risk causing harm to the people we film. That's when we feel the need to make fiction features.'

Siedem dni w tygodniu/Seven Days a Week (1988) was the director's last documentary. Made as part of a Dutch collective film about cities of the world, it follows several seemingly unrelated Warsaw people from Monday through Saturday, in a cinéma vérité style. On Sunday, when they sit at the breakfast table, we realize that they are a family.

Seen in perspective, the documentary work at the beginning of Krzysztof Kieślowski's career allowed the Polish director to hone his craft while creating a human and political record of everyday life under Communism.

MARÍA ELENA DE LAS CARRERAS-KUNTZ

See also: First Love; Goldovskaya, Marina; Poland

Biography

Born in Warsaw, Poland, June 27, 1941. Graduated from Lodz film school in 1968, with a degree in direction. Worked for Wytwornia Filmow Dokumentalnych (the State Documentary Film Studio) and Polish television, making some thirty documentaries chronicling Polish life, 1968–80. Began making fiction films with a strong documentary component in the mid-1970s. Gained international recognition with Amator/Camera Buff (1979), a fiction film about a factory worker turned documentary filmmaker, who uses the camera as an instrument to critique the shortcomings of the communist regime. His ten-part Polish television series Dekalog/The Decalogue (1988) and the French-Polish coproduction trilogy Trois Couleurs: Bleu, Blanc, Rouge/Three Colors: Blue, White, Red (1993–94) cemented his reputation as one of the leading European filmmakers of the 1980s and 90s. Died, following heart surgery, in Warsaw on March 13, 1996.

Selected films

- 1966 Urzad/The Office: director, writer
- 1968 Zdjecie/The Photograph: director
- 1969 Z miasta Lodzi/From the City of Lodz: director
- 1970 Bylem zolnierzem/I Was a Soldier: director, writer
- 1970 Fabryka/Factory: director
- 1971 Przed rajdem/Before the Rally: director
- 1972 Refren/Refrain: director
- 1972 Miedzy Wroclawiem a Zielona Gora/Between Wroclaw and Zielona Gora: director
- 1972 Podstawy BHP w kopalni miedzi/The Principles of Safety and Hygiene in a Copper Mine: director
- 1972 Robotnicy '71: nic o nas bez nas/Workers '71: Nothing About Us Without Us: director
- 1973 Murarz/Bricklayer: director
- 1974 Przeswietlenie/X-ray: director
- 1974 Pierwsza milosc/First Love: director
- 1976 Szpital/Hospital: director
- 1977 Z punktu widzenia nocnego portiera/From a Night Porter's Point of View: director
- 1977 Nie wiem/I Don't Know: director
- 1978 Siedem kobiet w roznym wieku/Seven Women of Differing Age: director
- 1980 Dworzec/Station: director
- 1980 Gadajace Glowly/Talking Heads: director
- 1988 Siedem dni w tygodniu/Seven Days a Week

Further reading

- Amiel, Vincent (ed.), Krzysztof Kieślowski: Textes réunis et présentés par Vincent Amiel, Paris: Positif/Jean-Michel Place, 1997 (includes his graduation thesis).
- Insdorf, Annette, Double Lives, Second Chances. The Cinema of Krzysztof Kieślowski, New York: Hyperion, 1999.
- Stok, Danusia (ed. and trans.), Kieślowski on Kieślowski, London and Boston: Faber & Faber, 1993.

King, Allan

Allan King is among the best known of Canadian documentarians and rightly so; over his forty-five-year-long career, King has not only brought international critical attention to the nation's otherwise obscure film industry but has also repeatedly challenged his audiences with his socially conscious, thought-provoking brand of documentary filmmaking. Like many of Canada's filmmakers, King got his start through a government-sponsored organization, although in his case the organization was not the National Film Board (NFB) of Canada but the CBC. King found his opportunity when the CBC expanded to Vancouver in the 1950s. He quickly worked his way up from the entry-level position of production assistant to director, and by 1956 he had produced his first major film, Skid Row. This film, an early piece of direct cinema dealing with homeless men in Vancouver, would become emblematic of King's entire career as a documentary filmmaker.

Stylistically, Skid Row was direct cinema that predated any other film of the form in North America, including the works of the Drew Associates in America and those of the famed Unit D of the NFB. In fact, the film predated much of the sound-recording technology that marked the direct cinema revolution, resulting in a film that in parts seems to be a silent film. Nonetheless, Skid Row shows that King was becoming aware of the potential of direct cinema, and he would soon utilize the form to create some of the great observational films ever produced. His most famous films, made during the direct cinema period of his career, Warrendale (1967) and A Married Couple (1969), were to bring King international acclaim as one of the world's leading avatars of the style.

Direct cinema will always be seen as King's trademark cinematic style, but it is important to note the many variations in style that marked his career both before and after the international successes of the Allan King Associates films. Although Skid Row had established him as one of the true pioneers of direct cinema, King made documentaries that varied widely in style. In the period just preceding Warrendale, King made two notable biographical films, one of famous Canadian actor Christopher Plummer, simply titled Christopher Plummer (1964), and Bjorn's Inferno (1964), a poetic profile of a struggling anarchist poet and King's personal favorite among his films. King also showed his ability to work in the interview-driven format with Running Away Backwards (1964), an ironic interview-based profile of Canadian expatriates living on the Spanish island of Ibiza. In the films that followed A Married Couple—Come on Children (1973), Who's in Charge? (1983), and The Dragon's Egg (1999)—King employed a stylistic approach entirely different from the one he used in the films that had made him famous. Instead of continuing in the direct cinema tradition, in these films King boldly took a cinéma vérité approach by making the filmmaking the diegetic catalyst in each film. In Come on Children, the film's subjects, ten teenagers, have been invited to stay on a farm, isolated from all outside influences, and are expected to form their own community; the formation of this community is the subject of the film. Likewise, in the controversial Who's in Charge? thirty unemployed people are invited to an open-forum symposium of King's creation, which is the heart of the film. In The Dragon's Egg King stages a house-building competition, complete with cash prizes, that pits mixed teams of ethnic Estonians and Russians, traditional rivals, in Estonia against one another in a cooperation contest. These films are obviously a far cry from the fly-on-the-wall style that marked Warrendale and A Married Couple. King's foray from the world of direct cinema into cinéma vérité was one that not only presented fresh new films but also embroiled him in one ethical controversy after another.

From an ethical standpoint, the controversy that greeted Skid Row, mainly having to do with the problem of observing and exhibiting such obviously self-destructive characters, presaged the controversies that would plague his career. Most of his direct cinema films would face some sort of ethical outcry. Warrendale was criticized, and even boycotted by the CBC, for its graphic portrayal of emotionally disturbed children whose lives were too violent and whose language was too vulgar for Canadian television censors at the time. A Married Couple was likewise criticized for language and violence, but also for its frank depiction of an unhappily married couple, a depiction that was considered a possible indictment of the institution itself. Later films would raise more troubling ethical questions as the filmmaker's hand in provoking performance became more pronounced in Come on Children and Who's in Charge? Here King faced sharp criticism for isolating and manipulating his subjects for the sole purpose of filming them within situations that he himself created; this was especially the case in the latter film, which brought together thirty unemployed Canadians for a conference on their socioeconomic conditions, a conference that was arranged as more of an open forum but, in the end, was designed solely for the purpose of King's film. The outcry over the film led to King's being labeled a 'media monster' for his alleged making a spectacle of the poor and unemployed at the 'conference'.

Regardless of the controversy they aroused, King's films have always achieved their primary goal of fostering debate about their content, whether it be the social place of the willingly homeless, the treatment of the emotionally disturbed, or the institution of marriage itself. When King found his brand of filmmaking ill-suited to the institutional environment in which they were initially produced, he had the courage to go outside the CBC and form his own production company, making him, for a time, Canada's leading independent documentarian. It would have been easy for him to continue working in the realm of direct cinema that had brought him much international acclaim, but King instead chose to continue making films that challenged not only social forces and institutions but also the discursive forces of documentary itself. Despite the ethical censure he incurred for these films, he remains Canada's greatest documentary filmmaker.

CHRISTOPHER MEIR

See also: Canada

Biography

Born in Vancouver, Canada, in 1930. Graduated with honors from the University of British Columbia with a degree in philosophy. Worked and lived in England for several years before returning to Vancouver to work as a production assistant at the CBC. Made several short films for television before the breakthrough success of Skid Row in 1956. Following this King made several films, notably Pemberton Valley (1957), Rickshaw (1960), Bjorn's Inferno (1964), and Running Away Backwards (1964). King later tired of the restraints of institutional filmmaking and formed his own production company, Allan King Associates, which independently produced his documentary films and sold broadcasting rights to television networks, usually the CBC. Achieved his greatest international successes in the late 1960s with Warrendale (1967), which shared best picture honors at the Cannes Film Festival with Antonioni's Blow-Up, and A Married Couple (1969). After these masterpieces, King's production company slowly succumbed to financial pressures and declared bankruptcy, whereupon King did freelance work and eventually moved into fiction film production, while intermittently producing documentary films such as Come on Children (1973) and Who's in Charge? (1983). His documentary The Dragon's Egg (1999) aired on the CBC to critical acclaim.

Selected films

1956 Skid Row
 1957 The Pemberton Valley
 1960 Rickshaw
 1964 Bjorn's Inferno
 1964 Christopher Plummer

1964 Running Away Backwards
 1967 Warrendale
 1969 A Married Couple
 1973 Come on Children
 1983 Who's in Charge?
 1999 The Dragon's Egg

Further reading

Harcourt, Peter, 'Allan King: Filmmaker', in David Helwig (ed.), The Human Element: Critical Essays, Ottawa: Oberon Press, 1978.
 Marsolais, Gilles, L'Aventure du Cinéma Direct Revisitée, Laval, Québec: 400 Coups, 1997.
 Martin, Bruce, Allan King: An Interview with Bruce Martin, Ottawa: Canadian Film Institute, 1971.
 Rosenthal, Alan, The New Documentary in Action: A Case-book in Film Making, Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1971.
 —'A Married Couple: An Interview with Allan King', in Seth Feldman and Joyce Nelson (eds), Canadian Film Reader, Toronto: P. Martin Associates, 1977.

Kirchheimer, Manfred

Manfred (Manny) Kirchheimer was born in 1931 in Saarbrücken, Germany, and came to the United States in 1936 when his family fled the Nazis. From 1948 to 1952 he studied film production at Hans Richter's Institute of Film Techniques at the City College of New York. Subsequently he spent twenty-four years in the New York film industry as editor, director, and cameraman, while at the same time self-financing his own independent films. In 1955 he worked with Richter to complete 8X8 and The Passionate Pastime. Also in 1955 he assisted Jay Leyda in reconstituting Eisenstein's ¡Que Viva Mexico! footage into study reels for the Museum of Modern Art.

While working in New York City's film industry, he was the editor on over three hundred films, many for the documentary departments of American television networks, CBS, ABC, NBC, and National Educational Television. The subjects ranged from cultural programming, such as Leonard Bernstein in Venice for CBS, to biography for Time-Life Films, as in Krushchev Remembers. Beginning in 1963, he was the cameraman for a number of films directed by Leo Hurwitz.

In Kirchheimer's own films there is a decided tendency to explore various aspects of urban life. The subjects he chooses, be they the city's architectural environment or its graffiti or the docking of an ocean liner, not only reflect the lives of people implicated in these subjects but also create a frame for a larger understanding of city life. His films are hopeful, yet they admonish for the future. He develops a strong point of view by giving full scope to opposing arguments. Kirchheimer often presents competing claims with such appeal that audiences cannot always tell which side he is on. Often, as in the glass façades of Claw, he brings his ambivalence directly to the viewer. About this he has said, 'I trust my audience. I am eager for the audience to work, and not lose themselves while they are watching my films [... they should be] able to hold on to their own integrity and insights so they don't leave their intelligence behind. When viewers leave the theater they will be walking into the same world they just left, not one unconnected to the film they've seen.'

Kirchheimer's films adopt a somewhat poetic form that hews to an earlier filmmaking standard: iconic imagery is favored over 'live-with-sound' snatchings. Montage is worked and played out to the full, in preference to illustrative single shots. Uninterrupted on-camera talk is indulged rather than the juxtaposition of short statements and visual inserts. Tangential meanderings are cherished over 'straight-line' narratives. The complex layering of sound, to the extent of creating 'fictional' environments (sometimes with manufactured effects) is frequently used instead of the random pickup of the on-the-scene microphone. He prefers written commentary, efficient and literate, over the often discursive style of a spontaneous voice-over.

The history of Kirchheimer's films begins with Colossus on the River in 1963. This is a documentary that celebrates the docking of a large ocean liner, the United States, while at the same time it becomes an epitaph for the passing of an era of transoceanic travel. Haiku (1965), made in collaboration with Leo Hurwitz, captures a set of dances by the choreographer Jane Dudley. Leroy Douglas (1967) concerns the reaction of fellow workers in New York's garment district to the death in Vietnam of a young black colleague. Claw (1968), photographed with Walter Hess, is a fable in the guise of a documentary. The film argues that styles of contemporary urban development subordinate human values to economic ones. Claw was chosen to launch the Museum of Modern Art's landmark exhibit, 'The Machine as Seen at the End of the Mechanical Age'. It went on to theaters, museums, and public television. Short Circuit (1973), a semi-documentary made at the height of the Black Power movement, examines the reaction of a white, middle-class male with liberal politics to the encroachment into his Manhattan neighborhood of a black population and culture. Bridge High (1975) is a choreographed paean in black and white to a suspension bridge.

Stations of the Elevated (1980) and We Were So Beloved (1986) are Kirchheimer's most celebrated films. Stations is a lyrical documentary that follows elevated subway trains that are illicitly painted, by slum youths, with such messages as Crime, Hate, Slave, Pusher, Earth is Hell, Heaven is Life. Images of fire, whores, and guns are juxtaposed to what Kirchheimer calls the 'legalized vandalism' of prisons, artifacts of war, and advertising billboards. In We Were So Beloved (1986), a two and a half-hour film based on interviews, Kirchheimer probes the experiences and attitudes of Jewish refugees and survivors from Nazi Germany, who had created a community in northern Manhattan's Washington Heights. Tall: The American Skyscraper and Louis Sullivan (2004), is a lyrical documentary that tells the story of the development of the early skyscraper in Chicago and New York—and of its first great architect. The film's central conflict is the clash between adherence to principle and expedient compromise.

Kirchheimer, who is also a film teacher, has spelled out some of his filmmaking theories in a series of papers with such titles as 'Truth Without Vérité', 'The Dangers of Improvement (in oral history films and videos)', 'Beyond the Clichés of the Holocaust', 'Unadvertised Side Effects (of the new film technology)', and 'The Soul of Structure'.

WALTER HESS

Biography

Born in 1931 in Saarbrücken, Germany. His family emigrated to the United States in 1936 and settled in New York City. Educated in New York's public schools. Graduated from New York's City College (CCNY) in 1952 with a BA and a major from Hans Richter's Institute of Film Techniques at City College. His film career began with editing work for several of the city's industrial film producers. Early on, assisted Hans Richter with several of Richter's films and worked with Jay Leyda in the restoration of Eisenstein's ¡Que Viva Mexico! Associated with Leo Hurwitz for many years, primarily as cameraman. His independent films have received numerous awards in both the United States and Europe. Has taught film at CCNY, Columbia, and New York University and is today professor of film at the School of Visual Arts in New York City.

Selected films

- 1965 Colossus on the River: producer, director, writer, camera, editor
- 1967 Leroy Douglas: co-filmmaker with Peter Eliscu
- 1968 Claw: producer, codirector (with Walter Hess), camera (with Walter Hess), editor
- 1973 Short Circuit: producer, director, writer, camera (with Warren Johnson), editor
- 1975 Bridge High: producer, director (with Walter Hess), writer, camera (with Walter Hess), editor
- 1980 Stations of the Elevated: producer, director, writer, camera, editor
- 1986 We Were So Beloved: producer, director, writer, editor, camera (with James Calanan and Steve Juliano)
- 2004 Tall: The American Skyscraper and Louis Sullivan: producer, director, writer, camera, editor

Further reading

- Barnouw, Eric, Tube of Plenty: The Evolution of American Television, New York: Oxford University Press, 1982.
- Indorf, Annette, Indelible Shadows: Film and the Holocaust, third edn, New York: Cambridge University Press, 2003.
- Kirchheimer, Gloria de Vidas and Kirchheimer, Manfred, We Were So Beloved: Autobiography of a German Jewish Community, Pittsburgh, PA: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1997.
- n.a., 'An Interview with Manny Kirchheimer', Wide Angle 6, no. 1, 1984: 42–9.
- n.a., 'Rappin', Writin' and Breakin'', Centro Spring 1988: 34–41.

Klein, James

James Klein was a prominent producer and director in the social issue documentary movement that developed in the 1970s and early 1980s. Of particular note during that period are four documentaries that he codirected with Julia Reichert. Growing Up Female (1971), the first documentary study of the societal forces in America that mold female identities, influenced subsequent feminist documentaries through its combination of interviews, advertisements, and popular music. Methadone: An American Way of Dealing (1975) critiques the use of methadone as a method of combating drug addiction. His next two documentaries were Oscar-nominated: Union Maids (1976) blends feminist and labor history through oral interviews with three women who played roles in the unionization drives in the United States during the 1930s; and Seeing Red: Stories of American Communists (1983) records the personal oral histories of American Communist Party members from the 1930s to the 1950s. Following his work with Reichert, Klein worked as a writer, editor, and director on dramatic films and directed two documentaries that premiered on PBS. The first, Letter to the Next Generation (1989), is filmed on the campus of Kent State, where the National Guard shot and killed four students during anti-war protests on May 4, 1970. Klein uses the site to explore the ways in which today's students differ from those on campus during the shooting. The second, Taken for a Ride (1996), documents the role of General Motors in the destruction of America's public transportation system.

Like many social issue documentarians, Klein is motivated by a particular political activism. His early films with Reichert address gender and working-class life from a socialist perspective, but his activism is not limited to the choice and treatment of these subjects. Although his early films are not technically innovative, he and Reichert pioneered novel approaches to production, marketing, and distribution. In the early 1970s Klein was a founding member of New Day Films, which was originally created to promote the women's movement. New Day was the first American cooperative distribution company operated entirely by and for filmmakers.

Many of Klein's early films with Reichert were made for particular working-class audiences and distributed to them directly through a variety of political institutions and organizations, such as unions, schools, YMCAs, and health care providers. Because of this control, Klein could focus on his explicit goal of promoting discussion and social change. To that end, his films are often accompanied by discussions or meetings and often include complementary handouts and discussion questions. Methadone incorporates a midway break for discussion, and some of his work is so audience-specific that it is produced for particular working-class neighborhoods and is never distributed beyond them.

Klein also attempts to incorporate his socialist, nonhierarchical politics into the production and structure of his documentaries. His collaborative models, such as codirecting many of his films with Julia Reichert, undermine common hierarchical structures in film production. In Union Maids, for example, he and Reichert chose to work with video, despite the compromised quality, because video allowed more extended, collaborative interviews and because it enabled them to work with less experienced students. Video not only allowed more shooting but also made it possible for them to direct inexperienced cinematographers by intercom while watching on a monitor. Union Maids also exemplifies Klein's aversion to heroic figures. He and Reichert have argued in interviews that focusing on individuals and aggrandizing their actions leads the audience to believe that such people are unusually gifted and unique and that they drive history. He seeks, rather, a model of collective agency. Consequently, Union Maids mixes the testimonies of three women of different ethnicities to demonstrate the wide range of people who collaborated in the cause of unionizing American industry.

Klein's focus on agency led to an early shift in his filmmaking. His first major film, Growing Up Female, depicts the problem of gender roles in the United States but doesn't develop possible responses to the problem. His next film, Methadone, begins in a similar vein with a critique of the societal response to drug addiction, but the second half of the film explores possible solutions to the problem. In his subsequent documentaries, Klein incorporates positive role models and opportunities for agency.

Critical reception of Klein's documentary films has focused on his use of direct cinema techniques. Because Klein's early documentaries generally eschew voice-over narration and employ oral interviews extensively, they are less able to develop the broader context of the topics they explore. Further, despite Klein's aversion to portrayals of individual heroism, critics have claimed that his films aggrandize the few people interviewed. Union Maids and Seeing Red, for example, are criticized for oversimplifying social relations by giving an incomplete, uncontested story primarily through oral interviews of small numbers of like-minded people. Such an approach can be read as a legitimate form of counter-history, and recent critics have argued for the recuperation of such direct cinema techniques for the creation of counter-histories that dispute conventional representations of authority and give more heteroglossic alternatives. However, other critics have argued that Klein tends to present oral histories as independent arguments and not as primary source material in need of a broader explanatory frame. The lack of such a context, it is claimed, can make his films appear naïve—an endorsement of a partial, self-protective history rather than a meta-critical response to previous histories (Nichols 1991: 252).

Klein's next documentaries, Letter to the Next Generation and Taken for a Ride, move away from most of the direct cinema techniques of his early work. Oral interviews remain prominent, but voice-over and contextual information impose an explicit explanatory frame on the material. Letter to the Next Generation is presented as Klein's subjective, personal consideration of the differences between students of the early 1970s and those of the late 1980s. There is frequent first-person voice-over narration in the form of rhetorical questions and ruminations, and Klein appears on camera periodically, commenting on the content of the film. Taken for a Ride abandons the subjective frame of Letter to the Next Generation and instead employs frequent voice-of-God narration to argue that General Motors sabotaged the public transportation system in America during the 1920s and 1930s. Oral interviews are still employed, and those interviewed are primarily like-minded in their critical view of General Motors. However, the film complements these interviews with extensive archival research, including records of antitrust court cases, corporate television promotions, and broadcast news reports.

PAUL MILLER

See also: Reichert, Julia; Seeing Red; Union Maids

Biography

Cofounded New Day Films in 1971. Graduated from Antioch College in 1972. Union Maids nominated for Academy Award for Best Documentary Feature, 1978. Won Critics Award from the French Syndicate of Cinema Critics for Union Maids, 1978. Named (with Julia Reichert) Artist of the Year by the Ohio Arts Council, 1983. Seeing Red nominated for Academy Award for Best Documentary Feature, 1984. Won Best of Festival Award at the Nashville Independent Film Festival for Taken for a Ride, 1997. Former Professor of Theatre Arts/ Motion Pictures in the Department of Theatre Arts at Wright State University.

Selected films

- 1970 Growing Up Female: codirector
- 1975 Methadone: An American Way of Dealing: codirector
- 1975 Men's Lives: coproducer
- 1976 Union Maids: codirector, editor
- 1983 Seeing Red: Stories of American Communists: codirector
- 1989 Letter to the Next Generation: director
- 1996 Taken for a Ride: coproducer, director

Further reading

- Boruszkowski, Lilly Ann, 'An Interview with Documentary Filmmaker Jim Klein', Journal of Film and Video 46, no. 1, 1994: 34–42.
- Georgakas, Dan, 'Seeing Red', Cineaste 13, no. 2, 1984: 27–8.
- Kleinhaus, Chuck, 'Julia Reichert and Jim Klein', Jump Cut 5, 1975: 11–12.
- Nichols, Bill, Representing Reality, Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press, 1991.
- Rosenthal, Alan, 'Union Maids', in Alan Rosenthal (ed.), Documentary Conscience, Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1980.
- (ed.), New Challenges for Documentary, Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1988.
- Rubenstein, Lenny, 'Who's Who in Filmmaking: Julia Reichert and James Klein', Sightlines 20, no. 2, 1986–7: 22–5.
- Shafransky, Renee, 'Seeing Red: An Interview with James Klein and Julia Reichert', Cineaste 13, no. 2, 1984: 24–6.
- Waldman, Diane and Walker, Janet (ed.), Feminism and Documentary, Minneapolis, MN: University of Minnesota Press, 1999.

Kline, Herbert

In the late 1930s and 1940s Herbert Kline's work represented an important part of the American documentary movement's unofficial international wing. His leftist stance, similar to that of Frontier Films or Roosevelt's New Deal filmmakers, found expression in filmic essays of humanitarian crises abroad, especially in support of Popular Front antifascism. Kline hoped that these films would change Americans' perception of the world. He believed in the importance of artistic illustration and eloquent narration, leading him to consistently partner with experienced photographers and writers, but Kline maintained no set theory of documentary realism and did not even regard himself strictly as a documentarian (even though he was a member of the Association of Documentary Film Producers). For his documentaries, Kline mixed actuality footage with material he directly influenced or staged on location, a practice common among his contemporaries. However, his use of fiction increased with his production of 'story documentaries' and entirely fictional films, demonstrating his assertion that the social effect of a film was much more important than the means by which he made it.

Kline's political perspective found its most influential expression in his four films representing the broad Popular Front movement, an amalgam of liberals and leftist groups in favor of social reforms and especially opposed to fascism. These films, made between 1937 and 1940, reflected an outlook that Kline developed in travels as a young man in Depression-era America and in his association with leftist theater, including the Group Theater and playwright Clifford Odets, and editorship of the critical journal New Theatre (later New Theatre & Film). Heart of Spain (1937) and Return to Life (1938) rallied support—moral and financial—for the Loyalists fighting against the fascists in the Spanish Civil War and accused Hitler and Mussolini of cynically orchestrating the conflict for their material gain. Crisis (1939) depicted the oppressive German occupation of Czechoslovakia, earning Kline thanks from President Franklin Roosevelt for the film's visual support for the White House's grim assessment of the Nazis. Lights Out in Europe (1940) showed Nazis taking over Danzig and invading Poland and decried the inhumanity of the coming war.

As he made his Popular Front films, Kline described his position as 'foreign correspondent of the screen'. Kline felt that by making these documentaries, he and Joris Ivens, then making The Spanish Earth (1937) and The 400 Million (1939), could 'do more to damn fascist governments than all the tirades of the world'. Kline relied on what he referred to as 'candid camera' actuality shots, including some horrific and heart-wrenching scenes of warfare. On some occasions, Kline guided the subjects to better reflect the reality he observed; an example is his request to Nazi storm troopers that they stop smiling at the camera and look more serious as they ousted Czech families from their homes.

Kline also staged entire narratives in a style he referred to as 'story documentary', a term suggestive of the approach of Robert Flaherty or The Ramparts We Watch (1940). For The Forgotten Village (1941), Kline and associate Alexander Hackenschmied (later Alexander Hammid) scouted Mexican locations, cast locals, and shot from a story conceived by John Steinbeck. By some definitions, only the absence of professional actors justifies the label 'documentary'. Kline filmed My Father's House (1947), concerning the emigration of Holocaust survivors, under similar circumstances. It was shot in Palestine with nonprofessional actors in scripted roles, and advance publicity stressed the film's hybrid nature, claiming that 'fact and fiction are mingled together, as though in a single heartbeat'. Kline's planned location filming of John Gunther's Inside Africa would similarly have been a 'semi-fictional treatment'.

In addition to his fictionalized documentaries, Kline ventured into fiction films, demonstrating a documentary style and examining leftist and socially conscious subjects. These films followed the example of The Grapes of Wrath (1940), a film that The New York Times critic Bosley Crowther described as 'reportorial as any documentary and strictly in the spirit of the school', and anticipated similar moves by the likes of March of Time's Louis de Rochemont, producer of House on 92nd Street (1945). For Kline, a brief term at MGM ended fruitlessly, but he completed fiction films on diverse subjects, including Yugoslav resistance to the Nazis (in English and Spanish) and the Cleveland Indians' social outreach program. In 1952 Kline directed The Fighter from a Jack London story about a Mexican boxer during the 1910 revolution, a film shot by James Wong Howe and former documentarian Floyd Crosby.

Kline's partnership with Crosby and Howe reflected Kline's prioritization of photographic artistry supported by literate prose narration. In his earlier documentaries, Kline partnered with renowned still photographers Geza Karpathi, Henri Cartier (later Cartier-Bresson), and Alexander Hackenschmied (also an accomplished filmmaker) and recruited the young Douglas Slocombe in 1939. Kline felt that strong photographic content allowed greater freedom in the narration, and he augmented the images with the written words of Vincent Sheean (Crisis), James Hilton (Lights Out in Europe), John Steinbeck (The Forgotten Village), and Meyer Levin (My Father's House).

Kline's interest in the visual arts endured through his career, eventually prompting a return to documentary filmmaking after a break of over two decades. Branded a communist by the House Un-American Activities Committee in the early 1950s, Kline suffered through a series of unrealized film projects, including Inside Africa, a biography of Clarence Darrow, and 'Of Love and Terror', about Arab and Israeli conflicts. In 1971 Kline completed the documentary Walls of Fire about Mexican muralist David Alfaro Siqueiros's 'The March of Humanity in Latin America', with additional material concerning Siqueiros's political struggles and those of Diego Rivera and José Clemente Orozco. Kline followed with The Challenge ... A Tribute to Modern Art (1974), featuring an array of contemporary artists (from Chagall to Pollock) and their artwork. In the 1980s Kline revisited his formative years in the leftist theater of the 1930s, directing a film about the Group Theater's Lee Strasberg, Acting: Lee Strasberg and the Actors Studio (1981), shortly before Strasberg's death and initiating a project to film great theaters of the world.

Depression-era, leftist theater and the contemporary subjective and stylistic traditions of documentary film greatly informed the work of Herbert Kline, whose most influential films extended his Popular Front's antifascism from the pages of New Theatre to the screen. Kline opposed fascism and war in humanitarian terms, a position not central to the didactic 'information films' that the US government would later commission to address the same events. From his Popular Front documentaries to his later films, Kline traversed and often blurred the boundary between documentary and fiction film. Regardless of the method of filmmaking, Kline always strove to express his concept of reality and, as he said in 1942, to use 'the great medium of the twentieth-century as it should be used—in the fight for a better world!'

MICHAEL D. ROBINSON

See also: Heart of Spain

Biography

Born March 13, 1909, in Davenport, Iowa. Largely self-educated on authors including Whitman, London, Dostoevsky, Dos Passos, and O'Neill. Held odd jobs in early Depression, including putting to sea from San Francisco. Followed his brother, Mark Marvin, into leftist theater, writing for The Left and Left Front and writing a one-act play, John Henry—Bad Nigger in 1933. From 1934 until January 1, 1937, edited and wrote for New Theatre, later New Theatre & Film. August through September 1935, toured European dramatic theaters, including several in USSR. Active in the New York Film and Photo League. Promoted leftist theater and Popular Front politics across the country and in Hollywood, including staging Bury the Dead in the Hollywood Bowl in 1936. Traveled to Spain in 1937 to write about the Civil War for New Masses and broadcast for EAQ Loyalist radio. Worked with Frontier Films from Spain and joined Association of Documentary Film Producers in New York. Signed with MGM in 1941 but departed while on his first project, Journey for Margaret. Independent producer, director, and writer for the rest of his career. Named a communist by the House Un-American Activities Committee in 1952, refusing to testify. Active in Los Angeles art scene from 1960s onward, associated with Bart Lytton. Walls of Fire and The Challenge ... A Tribute to Modern Art received Academy Award nominations for Best Documentary. First wife: Rosa Harvan (Kline). Second wife: Josine Ianco (Kline) (Ianco-Starrels). Children: Ethan Kline and Elissa Kline Gillberg. Died February 5, 1999 in Los Angeles.

Selected films

1937 Heart of Spain: director, photographer, producer

1938 Return to Life: director, writer
 1939 Crisis/Crisis: A Film of the Nazi Way: director, producer, editor
 1940 Lights Out in Europe: director, producer, editor
 1941 The Forgotten Village: director, producer
 1947 My Father's House: director, producer
 1971 Walls of Fire: director
 1974 The Challenge ... A Tribute to Modern Art: director, writer, producer 1981 Acting: Lee Strasberg and the Actors Studio: director, writer, producer

Further reading

- Alexander, William, Film on the Left: American Documentary Film from 1931 to 1942, Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1981.
- Campbell, Russell, Cinema Strikes Back: Radical Filmmaking in the United States 1930–42, Ann Arbor, MI: UMI Research Press, 1982.
- Crowther, Bosley, 'Matter of Fact: Joris Ivens and Herbert Kline Focus Their Cameras on the Conflicts of Today', The New York Times, March 12, 1939: 154.
- Hilton, James and Kline, Herbert, 'Lights Out in Europe', Look, May 7, 1940: 24–9.
- Kline, Herbert, 'Films Without Make-Believe', The Magazine of Art, February 1, 1942: 58–63, 87–8. (Reprinted in Lewis Jacobs, The Documentary Tradition, New York: Norton, 1979: 148–57.)
- , New Theatre and Film 1934 to 1937: An Anthology, San Diego, CA: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1985.
- Steinbeck, John, Harvan Kline, Rosa and Hammid, Alexander, The Forgotten Village, with 136 Photographs from the Film of the Same Name, New York: Viking, 1941.

Kluge, Alexander

Alexander Kluge's films mount a sustained critical assault upon the principles of cinematic realism. They dismantle the conventions of plot, character, and style that guarantee the coherence of classical narrative cinema. They discredit the credibility, veracity, and authenticity of the documentary image. Fiction and nonfiction film alike establish a system of representation that conforms to generic norms and conceals its own ideological construction. The documentary form carries a set of assumptions about its status as factual record, its value as truthful evidence, and its role as objective witness. Consequently, it certifies a particular organisation of power and knowledge. It institutes a rhetorical order of description, demonstration, exposition, argumentation, and analysis that is consonant with the dictates of instrumental reason and political economy. The documentary also screens out other possible methods for interpreting or assembling information about history, society, and culture. As a result, it naturalises the existing conditions of knowledge and belief and denies the social production of meaning by asserting the absolute identity of filmed image and real life.

For Kluge, on the other hand, human wishes and desires are the medium through which facts are perceived. The documentary method compounds the discrepancy between experience and expression because it devalues the reality of subjective fantasy or collective agency. The motive for realism, therefore, is 'never a confirmation of reality, but rather a protest'. The tasks of cinematic representation and cultural renewal are inseparable. The reconstitution of the institutional, economic, and aesthetic practices of the film and television industry is a necessary element in the project of reconstructing society. Against the official statements of cultural and legal institutions such as the media or the state, Kluge's films contribute to the creation of a Gegen-Öffentlichkeit, an oppositional public sphere. He has developed a range of theoretical and pragmatic strategies in order to promote institutional, conceptual, and political change through his work in film and television.

At the level of form and style Kluge's most favoured gesture for countering the 'conceptual imperialism' of the dominant mode of film production is to challenge radically the separation between documentary and fiction. He fractures narrative continuity by inserting documentary sequences into his fictional scenarios. He shatters documentary authenticity by framing real events within a fictional context. In the process, the film assumes an episodic and fragmentary structure that frustrates the spectators' attempts to impose a unified meaning on the diverse material. The coexistence of fictional and documentary imagery produces sudden shifts in perspective, interruptions, digressive or contradictory observations, and unexpected conclusions. Kluge applies the principle of montage in order to construct an alternative context (Zusammenhang) for understanding the relationship between history and memory, culture and politics. The capacity to differentiate, to make distinctions and associations, which Kluge marshals against the totalising logic of the 'bourgeois public sphere', is reflected in the hybrid structure of his own discursive method. Accordingly, Kluge's spectator plays an active role in making connections between the various elements of the film and providing a context for their evaluation, thereby participating in the critical project of reimagining the terms of political and social life.

Kluge collects documentary images from a wide range of sources and reassembles them in different combinations and configurations. His material includes pictures from children's books and folktales, old prints and paintings, operatic and theatrical tableaux, postcards and photographs from the nineteenth century, stills and sequences from early cinema, archival footage of historical events, World War II newsreels, maps, diagrams, architectural drawings and plans, instructional or educational films, televised recordings, interviews, vérité images of current events, and reconstructed treatments of imaginary 'case histories'. Kluge and his editor, Beate Mainka-Jellinghaus, punctuate the film with short documentary passages that, as a result of the process of juxtaposition, produce unexpected critical connections among images, ideas, and information. In addition, video technology permits a further level of manipulation and modification; in his television programme 10 to 11, Kluge will mask, insert, superimpose, colourise, or animate the image in such a way as to suggest further layers of meaning within and across the frame. More simply, he remotivates found footage by altering or adding sound; in Artists Under the Big Top: Perplexed (1967), a Nazi Party rally is accompanied by the Beatles tune 'Yesterday'. He places unusual imagery in an incongruous setting; a crudely illustrated rhyme about a resuscitated mammoth follows Anita G's imprisonment in Yesterday Girl (1966). The lives of invented characters are illustrated by still photos or archival film. Most famously, Gabi Teichert, the heroine of The Patriot (1979), observes events at the Social Democratic Party convention and interviews actual delegates about her plans to change the way that German history is taught in school. All of these examples reveal the precariousness of documentary's claim to represent the truth.

The voice of the narrator often supplies a documentary with its tone of authority. The commentary presents a series of reasonable propositions about the images on screen.

Its statements are moderate, balanced, and seemingly neutral. In this manner, the logic of the film's argument and the validity of its interpretive method appear persuasive and credible. Kluge, however, constantly undoes the obvious equating of narration to reliability and fidelity. The word does not always illustrate or explain the image. In Kluge's films the narrator's comments appear puzzling, puzzled, amusing, annoying, wry, dry, arrogant, ignorant, sympathetic, or ironic. The voice-over acts both as a point of identification for the viewer and as a means of distancing. It seems to possess an excess of knowledge and a lack of meaningful sense. For instance, in The Patriot, the knee of a soldier who died at Stalingrad reflects upon history, Germany, and the act of representation itself, as well as offering prosaic details about the visual material gathered by the film. Kluge also shows that the conventional use of narration as an instrument of verification can serve the function of falsification or fabrication. He invents facts, devises imaginary reports and records, and produces false documents. The commentary provides such a perfect imitation of bureaucratic and legal discourse in its efforts to classify, describe, analyse, and interpret the actions of characters or the significance of images and scenes that the distinctive mode of address employed in documentary film—impartial, objective, rational—assumes the characteristics of an authoritative statement of truth, a purely redundant and self-referential utterance. The voice of the narrator mediates the production of factual authenticity. Documentary, ultimately, verifies its own discursive techniques.

Even in his earliest short films, despite their more traditional style, Kluge interrogated the processes of documentary representation. Brutality in Stone (Kluge and Schamoni, 1960) confronts the repressed past by revisiting the monumental sites and symbols of the Third Reich. Kluge deploys the modernist strategies of citation, alienation, and montage, as practised by Benjamin, Brecht, and Eisenstein, in order to, in Miriam Hansen's words, '[open] up historical perspectives on the present' and to initiate the process of Trauerarbeit [Grieving]. The film combines and contrasts the twin poles of documentary realism: the camera observes and records, and the editing interprets and analyses. Music and sound contradict the mute testimony of the visual images. Voices and film footage from the past are juxtaposed with fragments and ruins of the traumatic legacy of the Nazi times, including the now desolate set for the Nuremberg Rally featured in Triumph of the Will (Riefenstahl, 1935). In this way, according to Eric Rentschler, 'the structures of the past are recycled and worked over [umfunktioniert und aufgearbeitet], ceasing to serve their original function' (n.a. 1990: 35). The film's aesthetic method, therefore, carries a political meaning.

Kluge's cinema is committed to artistic experimentation and social criticism. The creation of a counter public sphere, as previously noted, demands new forms of communication and expression if it is to interrogate the historical forces that shape contemporary reality. It will transform the system of representation, as well as establish an alternative practice of filmmaking. Since the days of the Oberhausen manifesto (1962), which proclaimed the economic, ethical, and political 'collapse of the conventional German film' industry and led to the establishment of a system of federal funding boards, filmmakers' cooperatives, and production companies, as well as an independent research facility at Ulm, Kluge has argued for a politicised form of film culture. He has advocated the filmmaker's complete autonomy in the direction and production process, as well as the development of a collective approach to film politics. Germany in Autumn (1977–8), a film that involved a number of prominent authors and directors, including Kluge, Fassbinder, Böll, Schlöndorff, and Reitz, is the most accessible attempt to implement the principle of Gegen-Öffentlichkeit and to intervene directly in the political discourse on the fateful events of October 1977. The authoritarian response of the state to the terrorist acts perpetrated by the Red Army Faction against the capitalist system created a climate of violence, fear, and paranoia, and provoked a crisis of legitimacy for both the left and the ruling classes. The situation reached its disastrous climax with the kidnapping and murder of Hanns-Martin Schleyer, former SS officer and head of Daimler-Benz; the alleged suicides of Andreas Baader, Gudrun Enslin, and Jan-Carl Raspe in the maximum security prison of Stammheim; and the storming of a hijacked plane at Mogadishu by special forces and the eventual release of the hostages. As an example of Kluge's notion of a 'strategy from below', Germany in Autumn offers an initial response to the official account of events.

The film, as usual, contains a mixture of documentary and dramatised/fictional scenarios. Each director is responsible for a sequence, but Kluge's presence is evident throughout. He takes the role of narrator and, in tandem with Mainka-Jellinghaus, has structured the material in a discontinuous, elliptical fashion. The content and form of the film challenge the programmatic and sensationalist format of television, as Hansen astutely observes (Hansen 1981–2: 52–3). Indeed, the media functioned as a mechanism of censorship and control during the crisis. Kluge's footage of the funerals of Schleyer and the terrorists, on the other hand, reveals the limited scope of television reporting. He focuses on what generally escapes the frame or exceeds the allotted span of attention. He stays at the graveside after the camera crews have left. A young boy watches as a trailer full of earth is dumped into the hole in the ground. In the background, policemen mounted on horseback, like Siegfried in Fritz Lang's film, survey the scene. The spectator is free to make a judgement about the images, rather than, as with the television news, forced to accept their inevitability.

Kluge's own television output continues the project of countering the power of the media, only this time from within. Since 1986 he has been contracted to provide weekly programming for a number of privately owned channels. Kluge's alliance with the media conglomerates and state broadcasters allows him to open a 'cultural window' within commercial television, an alternative mode of address that supposedly offers a critical perspective on the production and consumption of visual images. He has not compromised his working method for a popular audience, which, despite the channel's complaints that ratings drop during his screening time, numbers around one million viewers. The twenty- to thirty-minute pieces for his series 10 to 11 are condensed versions of the essayistic style that he has developed over the years. Their heterogeneity of form and subject matter, which ranges from opera to fireworks and from the avant-garde to advertising, recall the aesthetic of early cinema and the montage of film attractions, while reproducing the look of the magazine format, complete with interviews, news readers, graphics, and assorted video clips. Kluge applies Adorno's suggestion that the structure of the revue and the circus provide cinema with a model for breaking the spell of illusion and inventing a critical practice capable of contesting the products of the culture industry. Surprisingly, the continuous flow and fractured temporality of the televisual medium provide a conducive environment for Kluge's experiment in public broadcasting. The esoteric nature of Kluge's enquiry is balanced by the intriguing and unusual manner of its presentation. High modernist art meets postmodern culture in a productive exchange. The work for television stands as a crowning achievement in an impressive and influential career.

ALAN WRIGHT

Biography

Born February 14, 1932, in Halberstadt, Germany. Attended high school in Berlin. Studied law, history, and music in Marburg and Frankfurt am Main. Awarded a doctorate (in law) in 1956. As a university student, became acquainted with Theodore Adorno. Worked as both an attorney and a university professor before turning to writing and film. Married in 1982, has two children. Has worked exclusively in television since 1988.

Selected films

- | | |
|--------|--|
| 1960 | Brutality in Stone (Kluge and Schamoni) |
| 1966 | Yesterday Girl |
| 1967 | Artists Under the Big Top: Perplexed |
| 1977–8 | Germany in Autumn |
| 1979 | The Patriot |

Further reading

- Alter, Nora, 'Framing Terrorism: Beyond the Borders', in Projecting History: German Nonfiction Cinema, 1967–2000, Ann Arbor, MI: University of Michigan Press, 2002: 43–75.
- Corrigan, Timothy, New German Film: The Displaced Image, Austin, University of Texas Press, 1983: 95–119.
- Elsaesser, Thomas, New German Cinema: A History, London: BFI, 1989.
- Flinn, Caryl, The New German Cinema: Music, History and the Matter of Style, Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 2004: 107–69.
- Hansen, Miriam, 'Cooperative Auteur Cinema and Oppositional Public Sphere', New German Critique, fall–winter 1981–2: 36–56.
- Kaes, Anton, 'In Search of Germany: Alexander Kluge's The Patriot', in From Hitler to Heimat,

- Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1989: 105–35.
- Kluge, Alexander, 'On Film and the Public Sphere', New German Critique, fall–winter 1981–2: 24–5.
- Liebman, Stuart (ed.), Essays by Miriam Hansen, Andreas Huyssen, Fredric Jameson, Stuart Liebman, and Heide Schlüppmann and an interview and texts by Kluge, October 46 (fall 1998).
- Lutze, Peter C., Alexander Kluge: The Last Modernist, Detroit, MI: Wayne University Press, 1998.
- n.a., Special Issue on Alexander Kluge, with essays by Miriam Hansen, Timothy Corrigan, Eric Rentschler, Helke Sander, Heide Schlüppmann and Gertrud Koch and texts by Kluge, New German Critique 49, winter, 1990.

Koenig, Wolf

Wolf Koenig began his forty-six-year career at the National Film Board of Canada (NFB) as a film splicer, and he ended it as a still-active producer and much-loved mentor of younger filmmakers. Along the way, he was involved in some of the key films and movements at the NFB. He was stylistically inventive and cinematically adventurous. That his contribution to the Film Board documentary is not widely known may be due in part to his retiring personality: he does not merely shun publicity; he flees it.

In 1952 Koenig photographed Norman McLaren's Oscar-winning Neighbors, an eight-minute experimental film using live actors photographed frame by frame. Although far removed generically from documentary, the film was arguably as significant in the development of the Film Board documentary as it was for Film Board animation. Its anti-war message became a recurring theme in Film Board documentaries, and its playful inventiveness informed and inspired filmmakers who worked primarily in documentary.

In 1953 a cel animation cartoon film, The Romance of Transportation, which Koenig codirected and cowrote, helped to establish another characteristic often found in NFB documentaries: self-deprecation, a willingness of the NFB to poke fun at Canada, its government, and itself. Koenig directed It's a Crime (1957), an animated film made for the Canadian Department of Labour. The film parodied with great effect and affection The Third Man, and it included a send-up of the typical NFB educational documentary of the time.

In the 1950s animation was administered by Unit B, of which Koenig was a member. Koenig's involvement in both animation and documentary facilitated the former's contribution to the latter at the Film Board. As cameraman for the lyric Corral (1954), Koenig broke two rules: a bureaucratic one stipulating that all documentaries were to be shot by members of the NFB's Camera Department, and an aesthetic one requiring that the camera be mounted on a tripod (Corral was shot in 35mm). Foreshadowing the later development of freer-form documentary, Koenig shot much of the film with the camera on his shoulder; this allowed him to mingle closely among the restless penned horses he was filming. He did the camerawork for City of Gold (1957), a film made mostly from still photographs but which, because of the camera's movement within the material, makes the viewer sometimes forget that the images are not live action.

Koenig was a director, editor, and cameraman with the team that created the NFB's watershed Candid Eye series, which lasted from 1958 through 1961. The series was made possible by the NFB's invention of a lightweight 16mm synchronized sound recording system. It was influenced aesthetically by the photographs of Henri Cartier-Bresson, whose work Koenig, especially, felt had captured the spontaneity of real life. Koenig also argued forcefully for a fluid, role-crossing production team structure that would include cameramen as fully equal members of the production team, rather than as individuals assigned to a project merely for the shooting period. Koenig was one of three credited directors for the series' prototype, The Days Before Christmas (1958), which he shot with two young French Canadian cameramen, Georges Dufaux and Michel Brault. Brault has identified Koenig's handheld tracking close-up of a Brinks guard's holstered handgun as 'a turning point in the liberation of the camera in cinema'.

Shot without a script, The Days Before Christmas is a vital mosaic of sharply observed actions and emotionally subtle edits. It catches people unawares and in unguarded moments. However, some members of the Candid Eye team felt that the film verged on the voyeuristic. Another well-known Candid Eye film, The Back-breaking Leaf (1959), directed by Terence Macartney-Filgate and produced by Koenig, was in part a rejoinder to the perceived detachment of The Days Before Christmas. Its more participatory photography employs many more close-ups of people and emphasizes the grueling character of the work of harvesting tobacco. The camera's presence is acknowledged, people speak to the audience, and off-camera questions from the director are heard. Its structure is more rhythmic and rough-hewn than the delicately nuanced The Days Before Christmas.

Although technically not a Candid Eye film, Lonely Boy (1961), which Koenig photographed and codirected, stands as a capstone for the series and a milestone in the development of scriptless documentary. A half-hour portrait of Paul Anka, the film fashions revealing direct cinema footage into a tightly structured, minimally narrated examination of Anka as an individual and as a phenomenon. The film is by turns funny, disturbing, mocking, and poignant. It incorporated reflexivity long before reflexivity became de rigueur, and it did so in a hilarious and self-deprecatory way that still contrasts with the sanctimonious, self-important tone in which reflexivity typically is introduced into films.

After the demise of Unit B in 1964 Koenig worked as a producer and executive producer in the animation department, now separated from documentary production. Among the films he produced or coproduced are: King Size (1968), an anti-smoking film aimed at children; The House That Jack Built (1967), a moral tale about the pursuit of satisfaction; Hot Stuff (1971), a cautionary film about the dangers of fire; and The Street (1976), Caroline Leaf's award-winning adaptation of a Mordecai Richler short story. In the 1980s Koenig was involved in several programs of short dramatic films directed at young people and often serving as training grounds for young filmmakers, but his last major project at the NFB was a documentary, Kanehsatake: 270 Years of Resistance (1993), an in-depth, closely observed film on a tense confrontation between native Canadians and the government over a land-use issue. The film manages to convey the anger of the protestors without demonizing the forces of order. It was directed by Alanis Obomsawin, whom Koenig had been instrumental in bringing into the Film Board years earlier.

D.B. JONES

See also: Brault, Michel; City of Gold

Biography

Born in Dresden, Germany, October 17, 1927. Emigrated with his family to Ontario, in 1937, where the family settled on a farm. Joined NFB in 1948 as a film splicer. Retired in 1994.

Selected films

- 1952 Neighbors (with McLaren): camera
- 1953 The Romance of Transportation in Canada (with Low): animation
- 1954 Corral (with Low): camera
- 1957 City of Gold: codirector, camera
- 1957 It's a Crime: director
- 1958 The Days Before Christmas: codirector, coproducer
- 1959 The Back-breaking Leaf (with Macartney-Filgate): coproducer
- 1961 Lonely Boy: codirector, camera
- 1967 The House That Jack Built (with Tunis): coproducer
- 1968 King Size (with Pindal): coproducer
- 1971 Hot Stuff (with Grgic): coproducer
- 1976 The Street (with Leaf): executive producer
- 1987 Wednesday's Children (with series): producer
- 1993 Kanehsatake: 270 Years of Resistance (with Obomsawin): coproducer

Further reading

- Cartier-Bresson, Henri, The Decisive Moment, New York: Simon and Schuster, 1952.
- Elder, Bruce, 'On the Candid Eye Movement', in Seth Feldman (ed.), The Canadian Film Reader, Toronto: Peter Martin, 1977.
- Harcourt, Peter, 'The Innocent Eye', Sight and Sound, winter 1964: 19–23.
- Jones, D.B., Movies and Memoranda, Ottawa: Deneau, 1982.
- , The Best Butler in the Business: Tom Daly of the National Film Board of Canada, Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1996.
- Marcorelles, Louis, Living Cinema: New Directions in Contemporary Filmmaking, New York: Praeger, 1968.
- Pâquet, André (ed.), How to Make or Not to Make a Canadian Film, Montréal: La Cinémathèque canadienne, 1967.

Kopple, Barbara

Barbara Kopple entered the world of documentary filmmaking as an assistant to the renowned Albert and David Maysles. The influence of their approach surely affected the evolution of Kopple's own unique style. Her first major work, Harlan County, USA (1976), was a provocative look at the coal miners' strike in Harlan County, Kentucky, against the Brookside Mine of the Eastover Mining Company. The company refused to sign a contract when the miners became members of the United Mine Workers of America. For over a year, Kopple documented the strike, living among the miners' supporters and witnessing firsthand the violence brought about by the tension between the opposing sides. The film illustrates the turmoil in the small community in a deeply personal way. The viewers are placed on the picket line with the striking workers.

They see the hatred felt both for and by the strikers and their families as the camera assumes the point of view of the viewer. The interactive nature of Kopple's approach to the subject matter makes this a strong cinematic exploration of humanity; the union here is asking for a modest increase in wages and for some improvements to ensure the safety of the workers. The film won the 1977 Academy Award for Best Documentary Feature. In 1991 the work was selected to be a part of the National Film Registry by the Library of Congress and was designated an American Film Classic.

Kopple followed the success of Harlan County, USA with some work in television as both a producer and a director. Her return to feature filmmaking led to a second Academy Award in 1991 for American Dream, a work that deals with a meatpackers' strike at the Hormel plant in Austin, Minnesota. This film investigates the struggle of Hormel employees as the company drops the pay rate by more than two dollars and then, when the packers strike, hires 'replacement workers' at the lower rate. The end of the film shows that after a settlement was reached between the company and the workers, Hormel sublet the plant to another company, this one paying workers nearly two dollars below the earlier reduced rate (four dollars under the initial pay rate). The exasperation of the packers is conveyed in such a way that the viewer's response is visceral. The personal here is made universal. American Dream also won the 1992 Director's Guild of America Award for Best Feature Documentary and captured the Grand Jury Prize, the Filmmaker's Trophy, and the Audience Award at the 1991 Sundance Film Festival. In addition, the film won the IDA Award from the International Documentary Association.

Kopple then returned to television, directing an episode of Homicide: Life on the Street in 1993. This episode won a Director's Guild of America award in 1998. In 1993 Kopple released Fallen Champ: The Untold Story of Mike Tyson, the first documentary ever featured as a Movie of the Week on NBC. The Director's Guild of America honored this film in 1994. This was followed by work as a director on a television miniseries called A Century of Women.

This continual work in television indicates that Kopple is a filmmaker interested in sharing information through all available media. While working chiefly as a documentary filmmaker, she has done directing work on various television series that feature fiction. In addition to her directorial work on such shows as Homicide, Kopple worked on the prison drama Oz in 1997, and she continues to explore the television medium.

Wild Man Blues is a 1997 work about Woody Allen's European tour with his jazz band. The film investigates the relationship between Allen and his wife (and former stepdaughter) Soon Yi Previn. The intimate nature of Kopple's approach to her subjects again places the viewer in the role of participant, a kind of non-threatening voyeur at once engaged and distant. This film was named Best Documentary by the Broadcast Critics' Association in 1998 and was honored by the National Board of Review that same year.

In 1998 Kopple released the Woodstock '94 project, documenting the 1994 Woodstock festival. This fueled the work done for My Generation, released in 2000, which investigates the legacy of Woodstock and its influences on Generation X. This work includes the 1999 Woodstock festival and relates its current cultural role to that of the 1969 and 1994 events. The film explores notions of community and the place of ritual in each of these time periods.

The Hamptons is a four-hour miniseries produced in 2002 for ABC. The work looks at the activities and thoughts of people in this affluent Long Island community from Memorial Day to Labor Day, 2001. Perhaps there is some connection here to the 'reality television' genre that is so popular in contemporary America, but the work is decidedly anthropological in its approach. The study is respectful and the representations insightful; this is genuine social investigation.

Kopple produced another television film, American Standoff, in 2002 for HBO. This work, directed by Kristi Jacobson, looks at the present-day Teamsters Union and its President, Jimmy Hoffa, Jr. Kopple's work continues to delve into areas of human experience in very personal, well-constructed films.

TAMMY A. KINSEY

See also: Maysles, Albert

Biography

Born in New York City on July 30, 1946. Assisted with projects for Maysles Brothers. Received Academy Award 1977 for Harlan County, USA. Film added to National Film Registry, 1991. Awarded Sundance Grand Jury Prize, Audience Prize, and Filmmakers Trophy for American Dreams, 1991 (the only film in history to win all three awards). Film also received Academy Award, as well as Director's Guild of America award, 1992. Won Maya Deren Film and Video Artists Award from American Film Institute, 1994. DGA Award for Fallen Champ, 1994. IDA Award, 1998, for American Dreams. DGA Award, 1998, for episode of television series Homicide. Lifetime Achievement Award, Human Rights Watch International Film Festival, 1998. Won Best Documentary, 1998, from National Board of Review and Broadcast Critics' Association, for Wild Man Blues.

Selected films

- 1976 Harlan County, USA
- 1990 American Dream
- 1993 Fallen Champ: The Untold Story of Mike Tyson
- 1994 A Century of Women
- 1997 Wild Man Blues
- 1999 A Conversation with Gregory Peck
- 2000 My Generation
- 2001 The Hamptons

Further reading

Chagolian, Steve, 'Woodstock "Generation" Floats in Limbo since '94', Variety 375, no. 9, July 19–25, 1999: 10.

Patterson, Troy, 'What a Beach', Entertainment Weekly 656, May 31, 2002: 24.

Stubbs, Liz, Documentary Filmmakers Speak, New York: Allworth Press, 2002.

Warren, Charles (ed.), Beyond Document: Essays on Nonfiction Film, Lebanon, NH: University Press of New England, 1996.

Kossakovsky, Viktor

The St Petersburg-based film director Victor Kossakovsky studied in Moscow and began his documentary work at the Leningrad Documentary Film Studio as a cameraman, editor, and director's assistant. His first documentary, Losev (1990), is an intriguing, contemplative film about the philosopher Alexes Losev. The film was awarded the prize for Best Debut, the Critic Prize, and the Silver Centaur Prize at the film festival 'Message to Man' held in St Petersburg.

Although Losev met with significant critical acclaim, Kossakovsky's real breakthrough on the international documentary scene was Belovi/The Belovs (1993). This poetic saga on life in rural Russia during the winter, shot in black and white, has become one of the most significant and successful Russian documentaries of the post-perestroika era. This tragicomic film with little dialogue is a lyrical ode to ordinary life in rural Russia. A girl and her brothers are the main subjects. Shot in close-up, they discuss world issues, take a traditional steam bath, or hold celebrations in the countryside. Kossakovsky did the camerawork himself, as well as the editing, scriptwriting, and directing. Belovi won the Joris Ivens Award at the International Documentary Film Festival Amsterdam (IDFA) in 1993 and garnered many other main prizes at festivals around the world.

After documenting life in a rural village in Belovi, Kossakovsky turned to urban life in his next film, Sreda/Wednesday (1997). The crux of the film is that the main characters are residents of St Petersburg with the same birth date as the director. In the transition to a more democratic and capitalist form of government, some of these individuals became alcoholics or drug addicts, whereas others have started families and are struggling to lead a decent life. Through their stories, Kossakovsky dissects the postcommunist society and the mentality of people raised under the socialist doctrine. This fascinating profile of life in a post-Soviet urban environment is edited into an intriguing narrative structure that unfolds from one sequence to another. The film also depicts some private and unexpected events in the life of the filmmaker himself.

Kossakovsky worked on his next project for more than three years. His triptych I Loved You ... (1998–2000) contemplates the joy, sorrow, and beauty of love. Three separate, unrelated films examine love within different generations. In Pavel and Layla/A Jerusalem Romance, the story focuses on the relationship of an elderly couple approaching separation because of the husband's fatal illness. In Sergei and Natasha/A Provincial Love Story, Kossakovsky portrays the wedding day of a young, jovial couple with conflicting families. The third member of the triptych, Sasha and Katja/First Romance, follows the love and suffering of children in kindergarten. In each of the films, the subjects face an obstacle: illness, family disputes, or an unexpected disappointment. Sasha and Katja is especially effective; it observes the behavior of children, who are uncompromisingly driven by deep emotions of love and jealousy.

Each film in I Loved You ... was shot with a different technique. Pavel and Layla was shot on 35mm film, in a calm and deliberate manner, employing light and shadow as symbols. Sergei and Natasha was shot more dynamically and unpredictably on 16mm film, and Sasha and Katja was shot on digital video.

With the feature-length documentary TISHE!/Hush! (2002), Kossakovsky embraced many different elements that he had explored in his earlier works: observation-based direct cinema, a satirical note in treating the political context of the narrative, and poetical realism in approaching the story. The film has no dialogue except the title, which is spoken only at the very end of this comical documentary. TISHE! was inspired by the short story 'My Cousin's Corner Window', written by E.T.A. Hoffmann in 1822. The story features a paralyzed man who spends his time observing life through the window. Shot on video (unlike most of his earlier works, which were done on celluloid), the film focuses on a small part of a street seen through a window of the director's St Petersburg home. Focusing on this narrow view, Kossakovsky managed to make an entertaining but also politically powerful film. With the talent of a sharp observer, Kossakovsky captured the mentality during the postsocialist era in Russia, where endless repairs on the same hole in the street, done as part of the preparations for the three hundredth anniversary of St Petersburg, were taking place day and night. TISHE! is a documentary drama of the absurd but, at the same time, a lyrical ode to the city. Using different lenses and various cinema techniques, Kossakovsky filmed throughout the whole year and captured changes in both the surroundings and the inhabitants of those surroundings. The carefully shot and edited images, strengthened by an imaginative soundtrack, transport the story from realism into surrealism. At the same time, TISHE! is an expression of the author's nostalgia and attachment to the city, with all its flaws and problems. This film won the Joris Ivens Award at the International Documentary Film Festival (IDFA) in 2002.

RADA SESIC

See also: Russia/Soviet Union

Biography

Born in 1961 in St Petersburg. Studied at VGIK in Moscow. Worked as a camera assistant, editor, assistant director, and director for the Leningrad Documentary Studio. He made several films for the German producer Viola Stephan and collaborated with major European broadcasters such as BBC, ARTE, and ZDF. Later produced his own films. His films have won many awards at numerous film festivals around the world and have been sold to dozens of broadcasters worldwide.

Selected films

1990	Losev
1991	Na dnjach/The Other Day
1993	Belovy/The Belovs
1997	Sreda/Wednesday
1998–2000	Ja vas ljubil/I Loved You ... Three Romances
2002	TISHE!/Hush!

Koyaanisqatsi

(US, Reggio, 1982)

The first film in Godfrey Reggio's Qatsi trilogy, Koyaanisqatsi became a surprising success when this ambitious, arty, conceptual documentary received considerable theatrical distribution (and revival), despite spurning conventions as basic as narrative, spoken word, and synchronous sound. With an acclaimed score composed by Philip Glass and a dazzling array of visual manipulations, the film was a daring return to the 'city symphony' genre of documentary popularized in the late 1920s. First-time filmmaker Reggio, however, sought to stand that tradition on its head, offering images of modernity as 'life out of balance' (as the Hopi title translates).

With its high-gloss look and high-art music, the film had an unlikely origin as an independent, spiritually based project made by an ascetic Catholic monk with no experience and little interest in film.

Shot and edited between 1975 and 1982, Reggio's documentary emerged from his work with what he called the Institute for Regional Education, a nonprofit foundation for artists and media researchers in Santa Fe, New Mexico. Raising nearly $2.5 million and working closely with cinematographer Ron Fricke, Reggio assembled an array of lustrous shots of natural landscapes and glowing cityscapes. Edited together, the contrasting images collide to create the film's transparent theme, that technocratic modernity threatens the beauty of the natural world and creates a civilization that deadens humanity.

Koyaanisqatsi is structured into some ten passages, each loosely arranged within, but demarcated by dramatic musical shifts. The film opens (and closes) with a lengthy shot of an unidentified Native American cave drawing while a deep bass voice chants the word koyaanisqatsi (which is not defined until the end titles appear). Slow-motion shots of industrial explosions and rockets are followed by aerial shots of the deserts of the American Southwest, rendered in time-lapse photography. A chorus of trumpets opens a third section, in which a visual geometry of swirling clouds and ocean waves contrasts with the earlier smoke and fire, signaling the film's apocalyptic vision. The Glass score becomes increasing frenetic and loud, full of intense repetitions. Bright, sharp cinematography captures powerful but brutal instruments of civilization transforming the Earth: electrical towers, pipelines, oil derricks, blast furnaces, acres of military hardware and, finally, the first atomic bomb mushrooming over the New Mexico desert.

People then appear amid this berserk technology. Sunbathers lie in the sand, but the camera pulls back to reveal them next to a nuclear power plant. After a montage of imploding buildings and Manhattan skylines, Reggio shows human beings as a robotic, dispirited race of city dwellers. The stuff of daily urban life—office work, assembly lines, fast food, video games, automobiles—is observed from a distant perspective and in hypernatural speed. Interspersed are slow-motion shots of sad-looking adults walking down streets and standing on corners. A pivotal moment occurs when the film suddenly provides an otherwise inconspicuous close-up of a hospital nurse holding an elderly woman's hand for comfort. This shot, incongruous within the sequence, serves as a sort of quiet climax: a human touch amid unnatural technology. Koyaanisqatsi concludes with a daring, lengthy meditation on raw footage of a NASA rocket ascending in a fiery trajectory. After several minutes a piece of burning debris peels away, and the camera tracks its fall to earth. The text of Hopi prophecies about the destruction of the Earth appear as a coda, leaving no doubt about the film's critique of modern life.

The success of Koyaanisqatsi can be measured by its having remained in circulation for more than twenty years, achieving near cult status, its appearance on the Library of Congress's National Film Registry in 2000, and its spawning of two documentaries in a similar vein. Powaqqatsi (1988), meaning 'life in negative transformation', presents disturbing, glossy footage of Third World people and places being destroyed. Teaming with Philip Glass for a third time, in 2002 Reggio released Naqoyqatsi ('civilized violence') through Miramax, with the aid of producer-director Steven Soderbergh.

DAN STREIBLE

Koyaanisqatsi (US, Institute for Regional Education, 1982, 87 mins). Distributed by Island Alive; New Cinema. Produced by Godfrey Reggio, with Francis Ford Coppola (executive producer) and associate producers Mel Lawrence, Roger McNew, T. Michael Powers, Lawrence Taub, and Anton Walpole. Directed by Godfrey Reggio. Scenario by Ron Fricke, Godfrey Reggio, Michael Hoenig, and Alton Walpole. Cinematography by Ron Fricke. Edited by Ron Fricke and Alton Walpole.

Original music composed by Philip Glass, performed by the Western Wind Vocal Ensemble and Albert de Ruiter (basso soloist), conducted by Michael Riesman. Additional music by Michael Hoenig. Filmed in New York City, Los Angeles, Las Vegas, San Francisco, Arizona, and New Mexico. Alternate title: Koyaanisqatsi: Life Out of Balance.

Further reading

- Canby, Vincent, 'Koyaanisqatsi, Back to Psychedelia', The New York Times, 4 October 1982: C14.
 Corliss, Richard, 'Koyaanisqatsi', Time, 17 October 1982: 90.
 Dempsey, Michael, 'Qatsi Means Life: The Films of Godfrey Reggio', Film Quarterly, Spring 1989: 2–12.
Institute for Regional Education (IRE), www.koyaanisqatsi.org, 2001–2.
 Jacobson, Harlan, 'Koyaanisqatsi', Film Comment, November–December 1982: 61–2.

Kramer, Robert

Throughout his career, Robert Kramer has challenged the definitions and boundaries of documentary by developing a very characteristic film style. He started as a reporter in Latin America but then in 1967 founded the Newsreel movement, which produced about sixty militant and agitational films. The films Kramer made within this collective marked him as a filmmaker of the American radical left, but his work was more than mere political pamphlets. His films were at the same time portraits of a generation opposing Western aggression against Vietnam (In the Country, The Edge, Ice, and People's War) or a reflection on oppressed or recently liberated countries. These and his subsequent films have always been portraits of people, societies, and/or communities within societies, in a very specific sociopolitical context, such as Portugal after the April Revolution (Scenes from the Class Struggle in Portugal) or independent Angola. In the first part of his career, Kramer was more political in his films, whereas later on he took a more reflective stance. His films can be considered a genre unto themselves, mixing fiction with documentary in a very specific way and always exhibiting his philosophical, essayistic approach. In a sense his films can be called 'documentaries of thought', provoking the spectator to reflect, together with Kramer, on the portraits he makes.

Kramer was recognized as a great filmmaker but could savour this relative success mainly in Europe. However, the highpoints of his work are two extraordinary un-American American films, Milestones (1975) and Route One/USA (1989). These two road movies portray Americans and American communities in a thoughtful and thought-provoking way. By mixing documentary and fiction, he invented a film form in which he could freely move, both as filmmaker and as a character in his films—sometimes through his alter ego, Doc, played by Paul McIsaac. His characteristic film style moved away from conventions of fiction and documentary, but despite the sometimes experimental character of his films (especially Notre Nazi, Berlin 10/90, and Ghosts of Electricity), they remain very accessible. This is because they combine openness to the world with personal involvement, guiding the spectator, who will always be touched by Kramer's reflections on both collective and personal experiences that make up a society or a community. In Le Manteau (1996), for instance, Kramer reflects on the sociopolitical madness of the so-called heart of darkness of Western civilization, whereas in his last, and testamentary, film Cités de la plaine (1999), he takes a much more personal and autobiographical approach but still does not omit reflection on the moral standards of Western society, in which the characters (and the spectator) move. Kramer was a nomadic filmmaker whose camera was an extension of his body and his own mind, translating his continuous dialogue with the world and his experience into film (see, for example, Ghosts of Electricity). His oeuvre is very consistent both in film style and in his approach to the world, and it is without doubt that Kramer was one of the most original filmmakers of the twentieth century.

KEES BAKKER

Biography

Born in New York in 1940. Studied philosophy and Western European history at Swarthmore College and Stanford University. He worked as a reporter in Latin America for various American publications. In 1967 he founded and organized the Newsreel movement. In the early 1980s he moved to Europe, living and working in Paris, where he died in 1999.

Selected films

- 1965 FALN
- 1966 In the Country
- 1967 The Edge
- 1969 Ice
- 1969 People's War
- 1975 Milestones
- 1979 Scenes from the Class Struggle in Portugal
- 1980 Guns
- 1981 Un Grand Jour en France—Naissance/
A Great Day in France—Birth
- 1982 A toute allure/As Fast as You Can
- 1983 La Peur/The Fear
- 1984 Sarkis at Woodrow Wilson Musée d'Art Moderne
- 1984 Notre Nazi/Our Nazi
- 1985 Diesel
- 1986 Un Plan d'enfer/A Plan of Hell
- 1987 X-Country
- 1987 Doc's Kingdom
- 1989 Route One/USA
- 1989 Dear Doc
- 1990 Berlin 10/90
- 1990 Maquette/Scale Model
- 1991 Sous Le Vent/Leeward
- 1991 Video Letters (with Steve Dwoskin)
- 1991 Ecrire contre l'oubli/Writing Against Forgetting
- 1993 Point de départ/Starting Place
- 1993 La Roue/The Wheel: Greg Lemond—
Andrew Hampsten
- 1996 Walk the Walk
- 1996 Le Manteau/The Mantle
- 1997 Ghosts of Electricity
- 1999 Cités de la plaine/Cities of the Plain

Krelja, Petar

Petar Krelja, Croatian film critic, scriptwriter, and director, played a crucial role in shaping the documentary scene in his country. A follower of the traditional documentary style, marked by pronounced narration and straightforward interviews, Krelja did work that is often lyrical, sometimes playful, and even humorous. From the beginning his artistic credo was based on a sincere interest in people living on the margin of society. During the communist regime he exposed the individual hidden within the statistics of social research and dealt with issues such as loneliness, delinquency, the oppression of women, and the neglect of the elderly and the ill.

In the 1960s and 1970s most directors in what was then known as Yugoslavia were making films according to the expectations of Communist Party officials. Krelja warned his colleagues about this 'unhealthy' practice of glorifying socialist rituals and the attendant celebrations of national holidays. During the movement known as Croatian Spring, a short period of liberalization in Croatia in the early 1970s, Krelja dared to express his opinion and made three documentaries that rejected the party standards. These films are quite ironic and confrontational toward the regime. Two were banned, and the third, which ridiculed the celebration of Republic Day in a small village, was destroyed.

After this short period of liberation in Croatia, President Tito reacted with a severe backlash. Artistic projects were cancelled and banned. Krelja returned to his previous interest, ordinary people, producing long and thorough studies of his characters' lives and behavioral patterns, thus achieving an enormous intimacy and mutual trust, enabling his subjects to act uninhibited and natural in front of the camera. Quite often he stayed in touch with his subjects long after the shooting of the film.

During the war in Yugoslavia and the dissolution of the nation in the 1990s, cinema was used mainly to reflect the dominant nationalistic doctrine. There was not much room for self-expression. Film directors faced a moral dilemma: whether to make propaganda films or to take a critical stance, risking not only unemployment but also their very lives. Krelja did not allow himself to conform but remained faithful to his favorite subject, marginal individuals. Unfortunately, the war supplied the Croatian community with more such people than ever before. Almost from the first day of the war, Krelja proved to be an engaged and daring filmmaker, both in terms of his preferred subjects (prisoners of war, refugees, and the displaced and forgotten) and in terms of the independent, supportive attitude he openly displayed in his films.

The quality of Krelja's war films lies in the director's profound approach. He allows his subjects to speak simply and freely about complex and difficult subjects, such as murder, rape, and the loss of family and home. Krelja always seeks in his films a spark of optimism and some wisdom about life. Even Krelja's feature fiction films are thematically consistent with the humanistic and socially engaged approach of his documentaries.

RADA SESIC

See also: Yugoslavia (former)

Biography

Born 1940. Graduated from the department of literature in the Faculty of Philosophy at Zagreb University, Croatia. Started as a film critic at Radio Zagreb in 1964; collaborated with major film magazines and newspapers. Directed thirty-one documentary films and four feature fiction films. Produced about two hundred documentary programs for Croatian television. His films have won many prizes at international film festivals. Has received numerous prestigious cultural awards in Croatia, including a lifetime achievement award.

Selected films

- 1968 Ponude pod broj ... /Offers Under the Number ...
- 1970 Budnica/The Reveille
- 1971 Coprinice/Sorceresses
- 1972 Recital
- 1972 Splendid Isolation
- 1986 Mariska Band
- 1991 Kovacica
- 1992 Ana i njezina braca/Ana and her Brothers
- 1992 Na sporednom kolosijeku/At the Railway Siding
- 1993 Zoran Sipos i njegova Jasna/Zoran Sipos and his Jasna
- 1993 Suzanin osmjeh/Suzana's Smile
- 1996 Americki san/American Dream

Further reading

- Majcen, Vjekoslav, Yearbook of Croatian Film and Video, Zagreb: 1996–2000.
- Sesic, Rada, 'Camera as a Magnifying Glass', DOX 2, 1994.
- 'Ordinary People', DOX, 1995, Copenhagen.
- Turkovic, Hrvoje, Against the Odds—An Outline of the History of Croatian Film, the catalogue of the Croatian Retrospective in Rotterdam, 1997.

L

Lacombe, Georges

Georges Lacombe, one of the early French documentary filmmakers, had an important but sometimes overlooked role in the development of the genre. His work was aided tremendously by the cinematic atmosphere of nonlinear, visual experimentation in France during the late 1920s. The Studio des Ursulines, a small theater and later distribution company, offered a haven for young artistic filmmakers to show their work during its sold-out subscriber series. Because of the theater's focus on the avant-garde, Lacombe's documentaries could access an audience that was less hostile than at the more conservative Ciné-Latin and Vieux-Colombier theaters. Non-narrative documentary films about Paris were in vogue during this period, and Lacombe's bold visual style created a pictorial world that was seen as transcendent and vital despite its challenging and sometimes harrowing subject matter.

Before embarking on his own Parisian documentary, Lacombe assisted René Clair with his short black-and-white subject piece about the Eiffel Tower, La Tour. Acting as both assistant director and writer of the scenario, Lacombe added his talent for recognizing compelling subjects to Clair's formidable directorial vision. Filmed in 1927 and released in 1928 at the Studio des Ursulines, this ten-minute exploration of the tower included not only intricately juxtaposed close-up and far shots of the tower itself, but intercut these visuals with long, panoramic views of Paris, notably l'Ecole Militaire, the Parc du Champ de Mars, and the Palais de Chaillot. Building on Clair's earlier portrayal of the Eiffel Tower in Paris qui dort (1923), Lacombe wrote a scenario in which La Tour Eiffel was a fantastic refuge in the sky, offering protection to whomever stood atop it. The short film was a paean to the tower from the avant-garde who saw its monolithic and infinitely reinterpretable presence as both a challenge and a comfort.

The second documentary feature with which Lacombe was involved was also the only one that he directed. The short film La Zone: au pays des chiffonniers, a twenty-eight-minute film examining the lives of rag pickers in Paris's Clignacourt district, also debuted in 1928 at the Studio des Ursulines. La Zone is Lacombe's documentary masterpiece in the truest sense of the word. In it he has absorbed and perfected the stylistic techniques of René Clair, but also imbued it with his own humanistic sentiment.

La Zone falls squarely in the footprints of two different cinematic ideologies that were dominant in the French film industry of the 1920s. The first is the realist school, the second the continually evolving avant-garde movement. Understanding the film requires locating it within these two schools of thought. French realism of the early twentieth century concentrated itself on the emerging social problems of an increasingly urban culture, with an eye toward trying to subvert and threaten the existing order that the filmmakers believed was the root of the problems. Its most important tenet was that the camera should descend into the lowest orders of the world and give a glimpse of the people dwelling there, thereby offering a commentary on this microcosm of a society in decay.

As avant-garde filmmaking, La Zone positions itself in the phalanx of what is known as the 'third avant-garde'. The first avant-garde is epitomized by the lyrical and affecting films of Abel Gance, and the second by the more blatantly surrealist Man Ray and Luis Buñuel. The third avant-garde, composed of filmmakers such as Lacombe, René Clair, Marcel Carné, and Jean Vigo, was interested primarily in documentary films and sociological study, albeit in a visual, nonquantitative way.

La Zone details the lives, their working days in particular, of the rag pickers who work in Clignancourt, one of Paris's slum areas in the eighteenth arrondissement at the northern edge of the city. Lacombe carries their daily struggle for existence to us through his examination of their routines: the rounding up of dustbins; the loading of paper and sundry trash onto carts; and the unloading, sorting, packing, crushing, and disposal by incineration of vast amounts of refuse. What follows is the sorting of anything recoverable into usable lots and the selling of the recovered items at the flea market in the neighborhood for little profit, but enough for the rag pickers to eke out another day. Within this larger examination of a socially invisible way of life, there are also more intimate portraits of individuals: a musician, a photographer, a gypsy, and a dancer, which detail the draconian forces that are leveled against the poor and unprivileged individuals of any city.

La Zone, then, concerns itself with the act of living, concentrating itself on lives otherwise ignored. Because it focuses on basic human struggle, it makes implicit commentary on the culture revealed by Lacombe's camera. It pulls away the façade that allows this invisible world to remain invisible and exposes it to view. It is sublime; its kaleidoscopic images of hardship and degradation do more to reveal the problems at work in French society than other longer, more explicitly condemnable films of the period.

Although Lacombe directed one of France's most important and original documentary films, he is primarily remembered as a director of feature-length dramas of the 1930s, 1940s, and 1950s, particularly the films, Jeunesse/Youth (1934), Derrière la façade/Behind the Façade (1939), Le Dernier des Six/The Last One of the Six (1941), L'Escalier sans fin/The Stairs without End (1943), and La Nuit est mon royaume/The Night is My Kingdom (1951). Although he did not film another documentary after La Zone, his break from the genre was far from clean, as many of these later films are in the realist drama and documentary fiction mode that use actual events, places, and people as their heart and embody many of the humanist ideas that Lacombe emphasized in his documentaries.

In interpreting Lacombe's documentary films, it is difficult to avoid seeing these early films through the lens of his later ones. La Zone was an early flash of brilliance from a young director whose future career was projected to be promising. Lacombe's work from the 1930s on is regarded by critics and scholars to be disciplined and efficient, but without the genius of his contemporary René Clair. Never rising above the level of an able craftsmen in his later work, Lacombe's documentaries are his most critically acclaimed achievements, and although relatively little scholarly work has been done on them, they are important to the growth of understanding of the French documentary tradition.

RYAN SMITH

See also: Zone, La

Biography

Born August 19, 1902 in Paris, France. First worked on films with René Clair as his assistant director 1924–8. Member of the 'third avant-garde' movement in Paris 1928–30. Signed on as a director with the Continental film company and distribution company Société de gestion et d'exploitation du cinéma, both collaborationist organizations 1941. Censured for his collaboration by the épuration committee 1945. Nominated for a Golden Lion, 1951. Died, April 14, 1990 in Cannes, France.

Selected films

- 1928 La Tour/The Tower: assistant director, writer
- 1928 La Zone: Au pays des chiffonniers/The Zone: In the Country of the Ragmen: director

Further reading

- Abel, Richard, French Cinema, the First Wave, 1915–29, Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1984.
- Armes, Roy, French Cinema, Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1985.
- Coissac, Georges-Michel, Histoire du cinématographe: de ses origines jusqu'à nos jours, Paris: Editions du Cineopse, 1925.
- Crisp, Colin, Genre, Myth and Convention in the French Cinema, 1929–39, Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press, 2002.

- Ehrlich, Evelyn, Cinema of Paradox, Filmmaking under the German Occupation, New York: Columbia University Press, 1985.
- Howard, Susan, French National Cinema, New York: Routledge, 1993.
- Lanzoni, Remi Fournier, French Cinema from its Beginnings to the Present, New York: Continuum, 2002.
- Martin, John, The Golden Age of French Cinema, 1929–39, Boston: Twayne Publishers, 1983.
- Potamkin, Harry, 'The French Cinema', Close-Up, July 1929: 15–17.
- Sadoul, Georges, Le Cinéma français: 1890–1962, Paris: Flammarion, 1981.
- Slavin, David Henry, Colonial Cinema and Imperial France, 1919–39, Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2001.
- Williams, Alan, Republic of Images, A History of French Film-Making, Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1992.

L'Amour existe

(France, Pialat, 1960)

Pialat's first film, with its ironic, paradoxical title, is a 'point de vue documenté' on life in the suburbs. The director, with his aloof and furious manner is, in L'Amour existe/Love Exists, up in arms.

The film's debut corresponded with the height of the nouvelle vague. Both the producer, Pierre Braunberger, and the composer, Georges Delerue, were figures in the movement, though Pialat always sought to distance himself from it. Although strictly speaking a contemporary of films such as Chronique d'un été (France) and Primary (United States), L'Amour existe seems, at first, to follow the conventions of classical documentary established in the 1930s. The film's discourse, however, clearly anticipates the philosophical trends to come. Pialat denounces the detrimental effects of advertising, the petit bourgeois mentality, and the capitalist system.

After a brief prologue showing commuter trains, subways, and traffic jams, the narration first takes up the autobiographical tone of a search for bygone days. Shortly afterward, however, 'delusions of pettiness' are scorned in a lampooning tone, and it is in the style of an indictment that damning figures are reeled off. The nostalgic tone does return, though, for the reminiscing of the elderly people, but the commentary comes to an end with a manifesto of leftist statements.

Some shots are carefully worked out to insist on absurd angles, such as that highlighting detached houses built just a few meters from an airport runway. Others are filmed in newsreel style, though with no synchronised sound: a fire in a shanty town, a child in tears alone on his bed. A few sequences, however, are clearly a result of documentary mise-en-scène: the couple at home; young louts in leather jackets fighting at night. Often the text intervenes to reformulate and clarify or extrapolate the meaning of the images: 'Urbanism conceived in terms of transport infrastructure'; 'More and more advertising prevails over reality'.

The absence of the commentary provides its own sort of eloquence. After a list of statistics is given (showing the figures for pollution, the underresourcing of cultural activity in deprived areas, and social inequality in education), no conclusion is drawn. Instead, the aforementioned night brawl between young men, with its strident jet engine background noise, presents the violence of the youths as the consequence of the statistics.

In 1961 L'Amour existe won both the Prix Lumière and a St Mark's Lion at the Venice Film Festival.

JEAN-LUC SMITH

L'Amour existe (France, Les Films de la Pleiade, 1960, 20 mins). Produced by Pierre Braunberger, production manager Roger Fleytoux. Directed by Maurice Pialat, assistant direction by Maurice Cohen. Written by Maurice Pialat. Cinematography by Gilbert Sarthre, assistant cinematographer Jean Bordes-Pages. Music by Georges Delerue. Edited by Kenout Peltier, assistant editor Liliane Korb. Commentary by Jean-Loup Reynol. Filmed in the suburbs of Paris.

Further reading

- Magny, Joël and Pialat, Maurice, 'La cicatrice intérieure', Paris: Cahiers du Cinema, collection 'Auteurs', 1992: 46–8.
- n.a., 'La France de Pialat', in Maurice Pialat, l'enfant sauvage, Torino: Museo Nazionale del Cinema, France Cinema, Admiranda, Institut de l'Image, Lindau, 1992: 37–43.

Land, The

(US, Flaherty, 1941)

Robert Flaherty's essay-film, The Land (1942), made for the United States Agricultural Adjustment Agency of the Department of Agriculture, has been understood as a turning point in Flaherty's oeuvre. Originally commissioned by Pare Lorentz on the recommendation of John Grier-son, the project was ill-fated from its inception. Because of Flaherty's penchant for loose production schedules and the attendant problem faced by Helen van Dongen in synthesising the material, The Land was completed only as the United States had entered World War II, and the resulting focus of the economy on the war effort diminished, in the government's eyes, the problems that Flaherty had identified.

Nanook of the North, Moana, and Man of Aran reinvented past cultures to construct exotic documents of humanity, but The Land was a representation of agricultural problems and their effect on people in contemporary 1940s America. Although almost universally dismissed, The Land signals a shift from the romantic pre-modernism of Nanook, Moana, and Man of Aran toward the lyrical negotiation of mechanisation and environmental wonder apparent in Louisiana Story.

Although Flaherty's earlier films used individual protagonists, around which a web of episodic accounts of the struggle to survive was spun, The Land is all-encompassing, ranging across many states and agricultural issues. Its concern is not for the land so much as for the people who depend on it. The Land uses static portraits of the people who work the land, including the opening images of a particular farm in which are imaged a farmer, his wife, and child, recalling the photography of Dorothea Lange and Walker Evans (as well as the portrait-like images in Industrial Britain) and establishing a 'farming type' similar to one that the Farm Security Administration photographers celebrated. Like these photographers' work, The Land is steeped in nostalgia, yearning for the kind of connection to the environment on which Nanook and Man of Aran were based, while perhaps clumsily proposing that the mechanisation of farming methods was the cause of erosion, dislocation, and racism.

Elliptical and episodic in structure, The Land divines its own raison d'être from the material it has to organise. Refuting the linear narratives that Lorentz used in The River and The Plow that Broke the Plains, The Land negotiates a host of agricultural, social, and economic problems, stretching the economic imperatives of the Department of Agriculture out on to the broader canvas of American life in a specific yet crucial moment in that country's history.

Based on the early work of Russell and Kate Lord, whose 1950 book Forever the Land contains most of the commentary, Flaherty's film wanders across vast geographical spaces that ultimately form the web of images, comments, and traces of stories that form the film. Flaherty's personal tone, accentuated by his narration, is the organising principle around which the glimpses and comments adhere. Siegfried Kracauer saw Flaherty's role in the structure as the film's strength, pointing to the naivety apparent in these 'fragments of a lost epic song' (quoted in Griffith 1972: 142).

DEANE WILLIAMS

See also: Flaherty, Robert; Lorentz, Pare

The Land (US, The Extension Service, United States Department of Agriculture, 1941, 39 mins). Directed by Robert Flaherty in collaboration with Frances Flaherty. Editorial supervision by Helen Van Dongen. Commentary by Russell Lord. Consulting by Wayne Darrow. Research and field assistance by W.H. Lamphere and Key Hart. Photography by Irving Lerner, Douglas Baker, Floyd Crosby, and Charles Herbert. Musical composition by Richard Arnell. National Youth Administration Orchestra conducted by Fritz Mahler, recorded by Robert Hufstader. Narrated by Robert Flaherty. Sound engineered by A. Dillinger and Reuben Ford.

Further reading

- Calder-Marshall, Arthur, The Innocent Eye: The Life of Robert Flaherty, London: W.H. Allen & Co, 1963.
- Griffith, Richard, 'The Land', Documentary News Letter, February 1942: 27.
- The World of Robert Flaherty, New York: Da Capo Press, 1972: 142.
- Lord, Russell, 'Robert Flaherty Rediscovered America', Land 1, no. 1, 1941: 67–75.
- Lord, Russell and Lord, Kate, Forever the Land: A Country Chronicle and Anthology, New York: Harper, 1950.

Winston, Brian, Claiming the Real: The Documentary Film Revisited, London: British Film Institute, 1995.

Land Without Bread

(Spain, Buñuel, 1932)

Filmed in a desolate mountain region in 1932, shortly after the founding of the Spanish Republic, Land Without Bread (aka Las Hurdes) was Buñuel's third film. From 1923 to 1928 Buñuel had worked in the French film industry (as Jean Epstein's assistant) and made his directorial debut in Paris with Un Chien andalou (1928) and L'Age d'or (1930). He had scripted his first films in collaboration with Dalí and had explicitly related their Freudian-inspired exploration of dreams, sexuality, and irrational impulses to the surrealist ideology. Both artists became full-fledged members of the movement at the time of the controversial release of Un Chien andalou. Buñuel broke up with the mainstream group in 1932 as a result of the political debates and purges that occurred during the mid-to-late 1920s. His work, however, continued to be informed by the iconoclastic spirit and provocative aesthetics of surrealism. In an interview recorded during the 1954 Cannes Film Festival, Buñuel acknowledged his strong affinities with the movement: 'I made Las Hurdes because I had a Surrealist vision and because I was interested in the problem of man. I saw reality in a different manner from the way I'd seen it before Surrealism' (Aranda 1976: 90–1). The idea of the documentary was inspired by Maurice Legendre's doctoral thesis on the remote Spanish region of Las Hurdes, which Buñuel had read before deciding to embark on what he described (in the opening title of the film) as 'a cinematographic essay of human geography'. The poet Pierre Unik (one of the first-generation surrealists) and the photographer Eli Lotar (who had contributed to Bataille's magazine, Documents, in 1929, and worked on Joris Iven's Zuiderzee, 1930) accompanied Buñuel on his two-month trip to Las Hurdes between April and May 1932. The Spanish professor Rafael Sanchez Ventura joined the small crew and acted as Buñuel's assistant alongside Unik, who also contributed to writing the commentary. The $2,000 production budget came from lottery money won by Buñuel's anarchist friend, Ramon Acin, a schoolmaster from Huesca.

Before reaching the region of Las Hurdes, the crew stopped in La Alberca, where the first sequence of the film was shot. The camera provides a panoramic view of the village, discloses one of its streets, then turns to the walls of the church, pausing for a moment on ominous skulls, which seem to preside over the destinies of the inhabitants, as the commentator's voice remarks. The deceptively reassuring presence of customary Christian inscriptions above entrance doors is shattered by the savage ceremony, which the crew witness, as they happen to arrive on a feast day. In front of the assembled villagers, recently married men on horseback have to ride at full speed and pull off the head of a cock tied by its feet and suspended on a rope across the street. Wine is served in abundance when the men have finished parading their trophies. A close-up image focuses on the gaudy decorations of a baby's dress. Though the commentator notes their apparent Christian origin, he nonetheless compares these 'sacred ornaments' to the charms of people from Africa and Oceania. The striking coupling of familiar signs and barbaric or 'exotic' rituals and beliefs sets the tone for the rest of the documentary, the objectivity of which only serves to heighten the viewer's discomfort and sense of dislocation.

Leaving La Alberca, the camera explores the mountainous landscape across which are disseminated the fifty-two hamlets of Las Hurdes, with a population of ten thousand. The ruins of a monastery in the valley of the Batuecas remind one that for centuries the Carmelite monks lived and preached the Christian religion in this region. However, the commentary adds that the Batuecas is also known for its vestiges of prehistoric life and its painted caverns, while the camera focuses on the only remaining 'inhabitants' of the abandoned ruins: toads and grass snakes (mentioned along with lizards). Buñuel's interest in entomology, which he studied as a student in Madrid in 1920, and which inspired the opening sequence of L'Age d'or (a quasi-documentary description of scorpions), points to the similar use of such images in Las Hurdes to anticipate or highlight the portrayal of terrifyingly sordid conditions of human existence. The viewer cannot fail to relate the mention of prehistoric dwellings to the image of rooftops in Martinandran (a hamlet in Las Hurdes), resembling layered crusts scattered among the trees, or, as the commentary remarks, 'the shell of a fabulous animal'. Houses have no chimneys or windows, and families live together in one room. In the first village that the crew encounters, the gutter serves for all uses: a woman washes some rags, a pig paddles in the stream, while further down the street, a little girl is giving some water to a baby that she holds on her knees. Poorly dressed children are dipping a slice of bread in the same stream before eating it. The commentary tells us that bread, which is almost unknown in the region, is given to the children by the schoolmaster, although parents usually take it away from them. The stark reality of daily life in Las Hurdes constantly overshadows every glimmer of hope or sign of progress. The village has a school, and the children are taught, like everywhere else in the world, that the sum of the angles of a triangle is equal to two right-angles, but the blatant irrelevance of this truth becomes apparent when the camera pans over the classroom filled with barefoot children, dressed in rags, some of whom have their heads shorn, and are identified by the commentary as 'pilus' (orphans from the welfare services in Ciudad Rodrigo, that the Hurdanos take into care for a meagre amount of money). The bizarre engraving depicting a marquis in a powdered wig, which decorates the wall of the classroom, seems no less ironic and out of place than the moral instruction that one of the children is seen writing on the blackboard: 'Respect the property of others'. The absurdity of this constant clash between rules of civilised society and the sheer misery and squalor of Las Hurdes is rendered unbearable by the objectivity of the camera and the dispassionate tone of the commentary read by Abel Jacquin. In Martinandran the condition of goitre sufferers is recorded and analysed with the clinical detachment of a course of entomology, just as the spread of malaria during the dry season gives rise to a scientific digression on the habits of the anopheles mosquito. Several shots of shivering men looking into the camera or lying on the ground illustrate the effects of the contamination.

A relentless accumulation of horrifying factual images of suffering and death overwhelms the viewer. A sick little girl is seen lying in the street. The camera reveals her inflamed throat, and the commentary simply informs us that 'there is nothing we can do for her', and that two days later the crew found out that the girl had died. Another instance when the passive positioning of the film crew comes sharply into view concerns the episodes devoted to the Hurdanos deficient alimentation and local industry. We are told that the staple diet consists of potatoes and beans. Occasionally, the more fortunate families raise a pig, which is killed once a year and devoured in three days. The camera then shifts our attention to a couple of mountain goats, one of which is about to leap across a ravine. Through several cuts, the image shows the goat falling to its death from the mountaintop, while the commentary remarks that goat meat becomes available when one of the animals accidentally kills itself. A similar fate awaits a mule carrying beehives, which the Hurdanos hire during the winter from La Alberca. Very often, while travelling along the arid mountain tracks, the mules stumble and spill their load of hives. The pitilessly static camera forces the viewer to watch the agony of a mule stung by thousands of bees. The animal is later shown lying dead, and a wandering dog arrives to feed off its carcass. Several other examples, however, seem to lead the powerless witness's reactions to such horrifying scenes from mere revulsion or passive empathy to revolt. Each time a positive aspect of the Hurdanos's fight for survival is mentioned, a new set of adverse natural or human factors are also made apparent, as part of a recurrent, logical progression. In Le surrealisme au cinema, Ado Kyrrou defined the subversive mechanism of Buñuel's documentary with reference to the implicit phrase: 'Yes, but ...'. The Hurdanos have few utensils, but they manage to cultivate narrow strips of land on the stony banks of the river by painstakingly transporting sacks of soil from fertile areas; however, their gardens produce very little and are completely wiped out by floods during winter, unless the artificial soil becomes exhausted after a year (because there are no domestic animals, and therefore no manure). The peasants are bitten by vipers, but the bite is rarely lethal; however, the herbs with which they try to cure the wound provoke an infection that kills them. As Ado Kyrrou eloquently concludes: 'each sequence is based [...] on these three propositions, and thus the progression into horror attains limits which can only lead to revolt'.

In the last two sequences of the film the portrayal of the Hurdanos' suffering reaches a kind of absurd paroxysm. The viewer is confronted with shattering images of the mentally handicapped, cripples, and dwarves, who spend their days on the outskirts of the village as goat keepers. The commentary attributes their condition to 'famine, lack of hygiene, poverty and incest'. Finally, the long journey of a funeral procession that carries the body of a dead baby in a small trough across a river, before reaching a place with enough land to bury it in, is filmed with the same unflinching lack of sentimentality. The short epilogue of the documentary intercuts scenes of the poor interior of houses at sunset and shots of the deserted streets where the eerie silhouette of an old woman passes, ringing a bell and asking for prayers for the dead. The last line of the commentary simply states: 'After a two-month stay in Las Hurdes, we left the country.'

The subversive message of the film did not pass unnoticed. A preview screening of Las Hurdes took place in 1933 in the Palace of the Press in Madrid, two months after the presentation of Buñuel's surrealist productions, Un Chien andalou and L'Âge d'or. Buñuel himself read the commentary, in a tone whose detached eloquence was matched by the irrelevance of Brahms's Fourth Symphony played in the background. The audience, which gathered the capital's intellectuals, responded with angered incomprehension at the stark realism of the images. Las Hurdes was subsequently banned by the Republican government, as well as by its right-wing successor, led by General Franco. First synchronised in 1934, then officially released in Paris in 1937 at the height of the Spanish Civil War, the film was also distributed in the United States by the New York Museum of Modern Art, where Buñuel worked from 1939 until 1943, directing or supervising the dubbing and adaptation of Spanish American documentaries. At the time of its conception, Las Hurdes coincided with the sudden surge of interest in primitive cultures among French surrealists and other avant-garde artists. This phenomenon acquired particular prominence during the Dakar-Djibouti ethnographic mission, the findings of which were published in Minotaure (11–12, 1932). Eli Lotar, Buñuel's cameraman for Las Hurdes, had contributed a series of disturbing 'documentary' photographs taken at the Villette slaughterhouse near Paris, in Bataille's magazine, Documents (2, 6, June 1929). Unlike the aesthetically and ethically transgressive aspect of most avant-garde approaches to ethnographic material, however, Buñuel's ideological stance in Las Hurdes tends to emphasise the social and political dimensions of a documentary account that uncovers uncanny areas of human reality in the very midst of the familiar Western civilization: 'The pathetic thing about this country, and for this reason its psychological and human interest is very superior to that of barbaric tribes, is that, though its material civilization is rudimentary and prehistoric, its religious and moral culture and ideas are like those of any civilized country' (Buñuel, quoted in Aranda 1976: 89). Despite its declared ethnographic aim and stark objectivity, Las Hurdes expresses Buñuel's lifelong concern with social injustice, the paradoxical nature of human destiny, and the illusion of progress. It provides one of his strongest anarchistic statements against state religion and bourgeois morality, which can be seen as the underlying thematic link between his surrealist productions and his later fictional work (from Los Olvidados, 1950, winner of the Cannes award for best direction, to Viridiana, 1961, from The Discreet Charm of the Bourgeoisie, 1972, to That Obscure Object of Desire, 1977). More than a mere travelogue and objective account of daily life in a poverty-stricken area of Republican Spain, Las Hurdes compels the viewer to undertake a journey of self-discovery, which constantly challenges his or her most basic assumptions about modern civilisation, cultural tradition, and ethical values. 'Nowhere does man need to wage a more desperate fight against the hostile forces of nature', reads the opening title of the film. The optimistic conclusion, which was added to certain copies of Buñuel's documentary, and which referred to the power of human solidarity and the beneficial reforms of the short-lived Popular Front government, did not preempt recurrent critical analogies with Alain Resnais's harrowing film about concentration camps (Night and Fog, 1955). One of the first productions of its genre to question both the crew's and the spectator's passive voyeurism, along with established conventions of photographic realism, Las Hurdes retains its deeply unsettling ideological resistance to empathetic identification, and hence its socially and politically subversive potential.

RAMONA FOTIADE

Further reading

Aranda, Francisco, Luis Buñuel: A Critical Biography, trans. and ed. David Robinson, New York: Da Capo Press Inc., 1976: 85–99.

Buñuel, Luis, An Unspeakable Betrayal. Selected Writings of Luis Buñuel, with a foreword by Jean-Claude Carrière, trans. from the Spanish and French by Garrett White, Berkeley, CA and London: University of California Press, 2000.

—'Las Hurdes (Terre sans pain)', the shooting script and commentary of the film, L'Avant-scène du cinéma, no. 36, April 1964: 58–62.

Kyrou, Ado, Le surréalisme au cinéma, Paris: Editions Arcanes, 1953.

Matthews, J.H., Surrealism and Film, Ann Arbor, MI: University of Michigan Press, 1971: 105–13.

Langjahr, Erich

Erich Langjahr, since the beginning of the 1970s an integral part of the community of Swiss filmmakers, demonstrates in his documentaries the modern dilemma of humankind. In the course of progress and the name of order, the individual is often left behind, unsure of his or her own identity and role in the greater scheme of things. Although all of his films take place in Switzerland, particularly in Central Switzerland, this existentialist and realistic approach gives Langjahr's work universal meaning.

Having grown up in postwar Switzerland, Erich Langjahr expresses through his work the problematic relationship between individual and society in a country that has to redefine itself against the backdrop of World War II and its own projected image. The concept of Switzerland as a wholesome rural idyll began to clash drastically with the reality of an urbanized, consumerist society. In the new Switzerland, as in all of Western Europe after the war, technological advances made the traditional ways of life obsolete. With this shift in technology, a shift in ideology has occurred as well; as big farming corporations started to swallow small farmers, the individual got lost in the masses of the cities. The years of the economic boom in the 1950s and 1960s gave way to the rise of consumerism.

It is against this background of a country in transition but, even more so, of its citizens facing an existential dilemma, that Erich Langjahr formulates his philosophy of documentary movies that emphasize the individual and his or her search for identity in a new world order. Inspired by his own search for who he is and what 'home' means, Erich Langjahr's work reflects a personal conflict that reaches beyond the scope of his own personality or that of his home country and, indeed, takes on universal significance.

Resulting from his emphasis on the individual, Erich Langjahr's philosophy of documentary film entails an unobtrusive approach. Rather than commenting on what the camera sees, Langjahr believes in letting the images speak for themselves. Dialogue, if any, is provided by the people whom the camera observes. This technique enhances the realism of the movies and gives their viewers the freedom to interpret what they see in whichever way they prefer. The idea that all lies in the eyes of the beholder forms an integral part of Erich Langjahr's philosophy, for interpreting the images for the audience would propagate the same hypocrisy that his films are trying to reveal. His approach is poetic, not dogmatic. If the individual has any importance, then he or she must be guaranteed the freedom to think for himself or herself.

From the beginning of his career in the 1970s as an independent documentary filmmaker, this unequal tug-of-war between individual and society, or, more precisely, its representative the government, has been a topic essential to Erich Langjahr's work. Already his early movies, such as Justice (1973) and Sieg der Ordnung/The Victory of Order (1976), demonstrate a sense of responsibility toward his audience typical for the cinéma de nouvelle vague. All of Erich Langjahr's films are to the point; they say what there is to say without romanticizing or demonizing any particular aspect. Their realism allows for an openness that makes it possible to express discomfort with social issues and protest against them in a loud and clear manner.

At the same time, the techniques of direct cinema challenge the viewer to participate openly in a public discussion, to take a stance.

Typical of Erich Langjahr's unobtrusive way of making documentary films is that he achieves his audience's involvement without resorting to the techniques of modern TV. On the contrary, his films captivate the audience because they simply show reality without the help of racy images, quickly assembled reports, or arbitrary stories. Consequently, Erich Langjahr grants his viewers the possibility to interpret the images he shows in the way they want to even if that may not be his own way of seeing things.

According to Erich Langjahr's philosophy and his own goal of filmmaking, the search for identity and for the definition of what 'home' means remains an individual task. Thus, any indoctrination of the audience on his part would mean a betrayal of his objective as a maker of documentary films, of himself, and his viewers. One of the best examples of this attitude is probably the film Morgarten findet statt/Morgarten is Happening (1978), in which Erich Langjahr's camera picks up images of a patriotic memorial day celebrated in central Switzerland. Whereas Erich Langjahr himself is not uncritical of the way in which this holiday is celebrated, his camera functions merely as a recording device. The people participating are shown as they are; they are in no way stigmatized or glorified as something they are not. Both the critical observer and the traditionalist are able to enjoy this film each in his or her own way. Naturally, such a goal requires an intensive study of human beings and their environment, one of the main characteristics of Erich Langjahr's films. His movies usually do not contain any comments, another fact that attests to his emphasis on creating as realistic an impression as can be.

Although all of his movies reflect Erich Langjahr's lifelong ambition to portray the search for identity and show the struggle of individuals for survival in a society increasingly characterized by technology and globalization, it is in particular in his latest trilogy of films that he demonstrates at his best the full implications of what that change means for an entire culture. The films Sennen-Ballade/Alpine Ballad (1996), Bauernkrieg/Farmer's War (1998), and Hirtenreise ins dritte Jahrtausend/Shepherd's Journey into the Third Millennium (2002) have won Erich Langjahr international acclaim beyond Europe's boundaries. In fact, Erich Langjahr showed the final part of the trilogy, Hirtenreise ins dritte Jahrtausend, at the 2003 International Documentary Film Festival in Yamagata, Japan, The Seattle International Documentary Film Festival in 2004, and was awarded the Natasha Isaacs Cinematography Award at the Chicago International Documentary Festival in 2004 for the same movie.

In his last trilogy, Erich Langjahr's lifelong ambition comes full circle. Beginning with Sennen-Ballade, he depicts the life of a cheesemaker in the Swiss Alps. It becomes clear that not only is this way of life not as idyllic as one might think it is, but also that it is doomed to become extinct. The reasons for this become clear in the trilogy's second film, Bauernkrieg, where Langjahr shows without restraint how technology, the mass market, and consumerism continuously destroy the traditional way of farming, dehumanize this way of life, and inflict incredible damage to the environment. Finally, in Hirtenreise, Erich Langjahr's camera follows two Swiss shepherds over the stretch of seven years on their journey. Again, in this movie by the Swiss filmmaker the question of identity constitutes the focal point of his movie: how do the shepherds, who have one of the oldest professions in human history, make the transition into the third millennium?

In agreement with his philosophy, Erich Langjahr records, becoming himself a viewer behind the camera. Instead of creating a harmonic, unified experience for his audience, so that it may just sit back and enjoy, Erich Langjahr tries to fit the 'gaps and contradictions' he encounters making the film into the film itself. To him, 'bringing the piece to completion is a poetic operation dictated by a rhythm that resides deep within me' (Hiroshi 2003). For Erich Langjahr, each film constitutes a call to one's conscience because, according to his philosophy of documentary film, ethics and conscience supercede the rules of the market.

ELKE BARTEL

Biography

Born in Baar, Switzerland, 1944. Independent filmmaker since 1971. Since 1977 member of the organization Filmregie und Drehbuch Schweiz (Directing and Script Switzerland); since 1992 member of this organization's board of directors. Also since 1992 founding member of the foundation Luzern—Lebensraum für die Zukunft (Luzern—Living Space for The Future). Since 1999 member of the board of directors of the cinematic club in Zug, Switzerland. Received Innerschweizer Kulturpreis (Culture Award of Central Switzerland) in 2002 for his lifelong achievements.

Selected films

- 1973 Justice: director, producer, author, camera, sound, editor
- 1975 USA-Time: director, producer, author, camera, sound, cut
- 1976 Sieg der Ordnung/The Victory of Order: director, producer, camera, sound, editor

- 1978 Morgarten findet statt/Morgarten is Happening: director, producer, author, camera, editor
- 1981 Made in Switzerland: director, producer, author, camera, sound, editor
- 1982 Do It Yourself: director, producer, author, camera, sound, editor
- 1983 O.K.: director, producer, author, camera, sound, editor
- 1986 Ex Voto: director, producer, author, camera, sound, editor
- 1990 Männer im Ring/Men in the Ring: director, producer, author, camera
- 1992 Unter dem Boden/Beneath the Surface: director, producer, author, camera, editor
- 1996 Sennen-Ballade/Alpine Ballad: director, producer, author, camera, editor
- 1998 Bauernkrieg/Farmers' War: director, producer, author, camera, editor
- 2002 Hirtenreise ins dritte Jahrtausend/Shepherd's Journey into the Third Millennium: director, producer, author, camera, editor

Further reading

- Breiner, Rolf, 'Partnerschaft mit Wechselwirkung', St Galler Tagblatt Online, www.tagblatt.ch, August 4, 2003.
- Chicago International Documentary Festival, 'Awards', www.chicagodocfestival.org/awards.html, 2004.
- Gasperi, Walter, 'Shepherds, Swiss Wrestling and Alphenhorn', FIPRESCI: The International Federation of Film Critics, www.fipresci.org/festivals/archive/2003/various_2003/Solothurn_2003_wgasperi.htm (accessed May 2003).
- Hiroshi, Wada, 'Reality to the Film, the Film to You, and Then ... : An Interview with Erich Langjahr', Yamagata International Documentary Film Festival Organizing Committee, 11 October 2003, www.city.yamagata.yamagata.jp/yidff/2003/interviews/039028-e.html
- Kathan, Bernhard, 'Vom Untergang bäuerlicher Kultur', Wiener Zeitung Online, www.wienerzeitung.at, October 30, 1998.
- König, Regula, 'Alpine Ballad', Yamagata International Documentary Film Festival Organizing Committee, 1997, www.city/yamagata.yamagat.jp/yidff/catalog/en/97/inter12.html
- Langjahr, Erich, www.langjahr-film.ch, Langjahr Film GmbH, 2002.
- Langjahr, Erich and Haselbeck, Silvia, 'Käse, Brot und Zelluloid', in St Galler Tagblatt Online, www.tagblatt.ch, October 31, 1997.
- Macdonald, Moira, 'Seattle film festival focuses the spotlight on documentary genre', The Seattle Times

- Online*, seattletimes.nwsources.com, April 11, 2004.
- n.a., 'Programm Bergfilmtage Zermatt, Sennenballade', www.bergfilmfestival.ch/2002/sa.htm, July 13, 2002.
- n.a., 'Swiss Films at the Chicago International Documentary Festival', Mosaic: Midwest Outreach for Swiss Art, Innovation and Culture 2, no. 3, 2004: 3.
- Pogade, Daniela, 'Die Kuh macht Muh: Sennen-Ballade und Bauernkrieg: Erich Langjahrs Dokumentarfilme über eine fast verblichene Schweiz', Berliner Zeitung Online, www.berlinonline.de/berlinerzeitung/archiv, March 16, 2000.
- Richter, Robert, 'Mensch und Kuh in Not', St Galler Tagblatt Online, www.tagblatt.ch, April 30, 1998.
- Stock, Andreas, 'Unsere Bauern und der Bauer in uns: Der Dokumentarfilm Bauernkrieg von Erich Langjahr im Kino', St Galler Tagblatt Online, www.tagblatt.ch, September 19, 1998.
- "Wir haben alle den Hirten in uns": Interview mit Erich Langjahr', St Galler Tagblatt Online, www.tagblatt.ch, October 24, 2002.
- Westphal, Anke, 'Wie schnell werden Schafe müde?: Der Dokfilm Hirtenreise ins dritte Jahrtausend', Berliner Zeitung Online, www.berlinonline.de/berlinerzeitung/archiv, November 27, 2003.
- Zimmermann, Verena, 'Zeitreisen, Kopfreisen', St Galler Tagblatt Online, www.tagblatt.ch, April 29, 2002.

Langlois, Henri

'First citizen of cinema', 'patron saint of cinema', 'Jules Verne of cinema', 'the dragon who watches over our treasures', are some of the many titles to honour Henri Langlois, who paid his own tribute to the seventh art: 'Movies will give us the third eye'; 'the cinema is light in darkness'.

Born on Friday, November 13, 1914 in Smyrna, in a cosmopolitan family, Henri Langlois spent his early years in that most mythical Turkish city. Caught in the explosion of nationalist violence in the aftermath of World War I, the Langlois family had to flee for France and settled in Paris in 1920.

The young Henri Langlois very early had a keen interest in cinema, in particular the silent movies of the 1920s, further enhanced by the arrival of the first talkies in 1929. He quickly became a regular spectator at the screenings organised by the numerous cine clubs that appeared in postwar Paris, creating with George Franju his own Cercle du Cinéma in 1935. A year later it became the Cinémathèque Française, with Man Ray, Louis Lumière, George Méliès, and Jean Renoir among its founding fathers. Henri Langlois was only twenty-one years old.

The Cinémathèque was created with a view to being more than another cine club. It was soon endowed with the mission to salvage the enormous quantity of silent movies made redundant by the arrival of the talkies, and which were being systematically destroyed. Within three months of its existence, Langlois and his friends had managed to salvage one thousand films and would amass over the years a considerable collection.

Henri Langlois spent most of World War II in Paris, trying to rescue the dispersed collection of the Cinémathèque and showing the banned American, English, and even Soviet films, defying the strict German censorship. He was also there, at the Libération of Paris, making sure that cinema was part of the euphoria that greeted the end of the German occupation.

Soon the Cinémathèque acquired an international reputation, through its travelling exhibitions such as 'Images of French Cinema' in 1945, or 'The Birth of French Cinema' in 1947. It also became a valuable source of films for the newly formed Federation of Ciné-Clubs, while maintaining its independence among the politics of postwar France. On October 26, 1948 Langlois realised his lifelong dream, the opening of the Museum of Cinema, avenue de Messine, in Paris. This nineteenth-century mansion became the place of worship for a new generation of cinema buffs, who found inspiration in the retrospectives organised by Langlois.

Langlois was also secretary general of the International Federation of Film Archives (FIAF), which was based in Paris until 1960. The FIAF eventually moved to Brussels, after its break-up with the Cinémathèque. The period between 1955 and 1960 is still considered the most creative period of the Cinémathèque, during which it played a central role in the emerging New Wave, providing it with a forum for discussion and giving it access to world film production, past and present. After this time, François Truffaut, Jean-Luc Godard, Les Cahiers du Cinéma, to name a few, were closely involved with the Cinémathèque, and were powerful allies in times of crisis.

The Cinémathèque constantly suffered from a lack of resources. In 1955 it had to move from its premises at rue de Messine to rue d'Ulm, with its offices at rue de Spontini, then rue de Courcelles. It was not until 1964 that, under the new Gaullist administration, the Cinémathèque moved to the prestigious Palais de Chaillot, opposite the Eiffel Tower. Langlois was awarded the Légion d'Honneur, and with new premises and a strong supporter in the powerful Ministre de la Culture, André Malraux, better times seemed to lie ahead; however, this was not to be the case.

Jealous of the independence of the Cinémathèque, Langlois found himself increasingly in conflict with an administration keen to control all aspects of cultural life and that demanded a more substantial governmental representation in its management against better subsidies. Langlois resisted such state interference until February 1968, when he was suddenly sacked. He became instantly a symbol of resistance to the abuse of power of the Gaullist administration. His dismissal was met with violent protests in Paris, with the whole of the New Wave and most of the cinema industry supporting him. The numerous and violent clashes with the police were a forerunner of the general unrest in May 1968.

In April 1968 Langlois was reinstated, but the governmental change of mind was accompanied by a drastic reduction in its funding. In June 1972 the first museum of world cinema was created at the Cinémathèque, not as much a museum as a movie itself, an immersion into the world of the moving image, going much further back than the Lumière brothers, as far as Chinese shadow puppets, an initiation to the art and ambience of cinema. The museum was inaugurated three times—in 1972, 1975, and 1980—after successive closures as a result of theft, poor management, and lack of resources.

Langlois became more involved in the lecture circuit, and travelled constantly between Montreal, Harvard in Cambridge, MA, and New York, receiving an honorary Oscar in 1973 where he was introduced as 'the curator, collector and conscience of cinema'. In 1975 the Henri Langlois Foundation was created, housed in two donated buildings in the Paris suburb of Pontault-Combault. At long last it owned its premises. However, Langlois was exhausted and overworked, having had to struggle for so long to keep his lifelong commitment to the preservation of films against the odds.

Langlois died on January 13, 1977 in Paris from a heart attack, at the age of sixty-two.

France and the film industry mourned the loss of one of the most colourful and passionate advocates of cinema, but his sudden death threw the Cinémathèque into complete disarray. Three years later half of its collection of films was destroyed in a huge fire in its warehouse, followed by another fire in 1985. It would take a few more years for its future to be at last guaranteed, with its subsidy being increased fivefold under the management of its new president, the director Costa Gavras. The museum has become the Musée du Cinéma-Henri Langlois, now situated in the main entrance of the Palais de Chaillot, a last tribute to the man whose life has been a passionate dedication to cinema and who, for generations of cinemagoers in France, has been the voice and the memory of cinema.

YVAN TARDY

Biography

Born in Smyrna, Turkey, November 13, 1914. Created Le Cercle du Cinéma in 1935, which became the Cinémathèque Française in 1936. Secretary general of the International Federation of Film Archives. Chevalier de la Légion d'Honneur, Honorary Oscar in 1973. Died in Paris February 13, 1977.

Further reading

- Bonnaud, Irène, 'La Cinémathèque dans la tourmente', Vacarme 83, January 2001.
- Cormerais, Franck, 'Le grand déménagement de La Cinémathèque française', Regards 42, January 1999.
- Langlois, Henri, Trois cents ans de cinéma, Jean Narboni—Cahiers du Cinéma, October 1986.
- Myrent, Glenn and Langlois, Georges P., Henri Langlois, First Citizen of Cinema, New York: Barnes & Noble, January 1995.
- Olmata, Patrick, La Cinémathèque Française de 1936 à nos jours, Olmata: CNRS Editions, 2001.
- Roud, Françoise Richard, A Passion for Films: Henri Langlois and the Cinémathèque Française, Baltimore, MD: The Johns Hopkins University Press, 1999.

Lanzmann, Claude

Claude Lanzmann is primarily renowned for Shoah (1985), widely considered a landmark among documentary films and without doubt the magnum opus of a career mainly devoted to confronting the memory of the Holocaust.

With Claude Lanzmann, documentary cinema becomes a duty of remembrance and a philosophical search for truth. His films attempt to comprehend some of the most extreme deeds of the twentieth century and to give an account of them as accurately and faithfully as possible. His technique mainly consists of in-depth interviews with witnesses. Shoah, 'An Oral History of the Holocaust', is a nine-hour, thirty-minute cross-examination of the survivors and guards of the concentration camps. Conversations with Yehuda Lerner, one of the few survivors of the only successful mass-revolt from one of the extermination camps, make up most of the ninety-five minutes of Sobibor, released in 2001.

The same principles underpin all his films. The intensity of war and the atrocities of the Holocaust cannot be apprehended using news-reel footage, neither through reconstruction nor fiction. It can be passed on only by the oldest method of transmission of knowledge, that of the eyewitness telling what he or she saw and did at the time of the events. The documentary film is a raw material on which the viewer has to reconstruct his or her own version based on the testimony of those interviewed. He or she is compelled to imagine what happened as recalled by witnesses to reappropriate their memory, to understand the reality as it is told, and accept it or reject it.

The result is a striking, unsettling account of the Holocaust, which also acts as a critical interrogation on humanity's encounter with its darkest side. There are few concessions to any kind of narrative or aesthetic consideration. The interviews, interceded with long shots of the concentration camps or lingering images of Poland, are essential elements designed to induce a meditation on humankind, war, life, and death.

In Tsahal, released in 1994, Claude Lanzmann goes beyond his exploration of the Holocaust, to the controversial topic of the Israeli army, applying the same technique of in-depth interviews, this time with Israeli soldiers who talk openly about their experience of the war. Tsahal was criticised for taking an ambiguous, even a partisan view of the conflict between Israel and its neighbours, an accusation that Lanzmann rejected. In a variety of interviews marking the release of his films he has become unwillingly a commentator on the conflict between the Israelis and the Palestinians, and as such a controversial figure, a position that he has found uncomfortable.

Claude Lanzmann has always defended his role as a documentary filmmaker concerned with the authenticity of history as reported by those involved in its most extreme events and to confront humanity with its darkest sides. His relentless search for witnesses and imperious quest for truth makes him one of the most outstanding directors of documentary cinema.

YVAN TARDY

See also: Shoah

Biography

Born Paris, France, November 27, 1925. Médaille de la Résistance, Commandeur de l'Ordre National du Mérite. Studied philosophy at Tübingen University in Germany. Awarded the Diplôme d'Études Supérieures de Philosophie, University of Paris. Journalist and lecturer in French literature and philosophy at the Freie Universität Berlin. Director of Les Temps Modernes and professor of documentary film at the European Graduate School in Saas-Fee, Switzerland. Director of the prestigious magazine Les Temps Modernes, founded by Jean-Paul Sartre and Simone de Beauvoir.

Selected films

- 1970 Élise ou la vraie vie/Elise, or Real Life: writer
- 1972 Pourquoi Israël/Israel, Why: director
- 1985 Shoah: director
- 1994 Tsahal: director
- 1997 Un Vivant qui passe/A Visitor from the Living: director, actor
- 2001 Sobibor, 14 octobre 1943, 16 heures/Sobibor, 14 October 1943, 16 hours: director

Further reading

- Brinkly, Robert and Youra, Steven, 'Tracing Shoah', PMLA 111/1, January 1996: 108–27.
- Felman, Shoshana, 'The Return of the Voice: Claude Lanzmann's Shoah', in Shoshana Felman and Dori Laub (eds), Testimony: Crises of Witnessing in Literature, Psychoanalysis and History, New York and London: Routledge, 1992.

- Furman, Nelly, 'The Language of Pain', in Geoffrey H. Hartman (ed.), Holocaust Remembrance: The Shapes of Memory, Oxford: Blackwell, 1994.
- Hansen, Miriam Bratu, 'Schindler's List is Not Shoah: The Second Commandment, Popular Modernism and Heretic Memory', Critical Inquiry 22, winter 1996: 292–312.
- Hartman, Geoffrey H., 'The Book of Destruction', in Saul Friedlander (ed.), Probing the Limits of Representation: Nazism and the 'Final Solution', Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1992.
- Koch, Gertrud, The Aesthetic Transformation of the Image of the Unimaginable: Notes on Claude Lanzmann's Shoah, trans. Jamie Owen Daniel and Miriam Hansen, October 48, spring 1989: 15–24.
- Lanzmann, Claude, Shoah, Grafenau: Trotsdem Verlag, 1999.
- Un Vivant qui passe: Auschwitz 1943—Theresienstadt 1944, Paris: Mille et une nuits, 1997.
- Shoah: The Complete Text of the Acclaimed Holocaust Film, Cambridge, MA: Da Capo Press, September 1995.
- Au Sijet de Shoah: le film de Claude Lanzmann, Paris: Editions Belin, 1990.
- Shoah, Paris: Editions Fayard, 1985.
- Shoah: An Oral History of the Holocaust: The Complete Text of the Film, New York: Pantheon Books, 1985.
- Lanzmann, Claude (eds), Les Temps Modernes 614, Revue Les Temps Modernes, Gallimard, summer, 2001.
- Lanzmann, Claude and Orenstein, Henry, I Shall Live, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1990.
- Lanzmann, Claude and Schneider, Silke, Formen von Erinnerung. Ein anderer Blick auf Gedenken, Erinnern und Erleben, Marburg: Jonas-Verlag, 1998.
- Rabinowitz, Paula, 'Wreckage upon Wreckage: History, Documentary, and the Ruins of Memory', in They Must Be Represented: The Politics of Documentary, London: Verso, 1994.
- Roth, Michael S., 'Shoah as Shivah', in The Ironist's Cage: Memory, Trauma and the Construction of History, New York: Columbia University Press, 1995.
- Weissman, Gary, 'A Fantasy of Witnessing', Media, Culture and Society 17, 1995: 293–307.
- Young, James E., 'Holocaust Video and Cinematographic Testimony: Documenting the Witness', in Writing and Rewriting the Holocaust: Narrative and the Consequences of Interpretation, Bloomington, IN: University of Indiana Press, 1990.

Lapping, Brian

Brian Lapping, British director, producer, and author, is among those contemporary documentary filmmakers who consistently brings insightful and quality current event documentaries to the television medium. Lapping's documentaries are driven by in-depth research and remain critically appealing because of their high-profile interviews and timely topics depicted within the world's climate. Lapping's documentaries are sophisticated and nonsensational; they provide invaluable summaries and international explanations to major events. The filmmakers involved in Lapping's productions are interested in the facts leading to international decisions and achieve this by prompting those involved to articulate their choices to the camera. Lapping lets his films' stories be told by the people who were there, on the inside. His documentaries are richly time-consuming and often run as series showing on BBC1 or BBC2, The Discovery Channel, Channel 4, ITV, PBS, Devillier Donegan, and many other international broadcasters.

Lapping began his career as a journalist, a profession that has profoundly informed and influenced his approach to documentary film production. In 1970 Lapping made the transition to motion picture documentary when he joined Granada Television. From 1976 to 1979 he was executive producer of the Granada/ITV weekly current affairs production World in Action. In 1979 Lapping created a new television format based on the Harvard Law School teaching method. The outcome was the series Hypotheticals. Lapping produced thirty of these one-hour programs for Granada, and they examined a different current ethical issue through intensive case studies. Later he would go on to produce the series annually for BBC2. The format has proved highly successful as an investigative approach and has been copied extensively in the United States and other countries.

In 1988 Lapping formed his own production company, Brian Lapping Associates. Its first production (incidentally, not a documentary), Countdown to War (1989), a drama based on letters, memoirs, and official papers, was produced for ITV. Lapping quickly returned to documentary filmmaking and continued to develop his investigative style with The Second Russian Revolution (1991). The series was aired in thirty-one countries and received many awards.

Lapping's primary interests involve intense political issues, and his series are steeped in high diplomacy and complicated negotiations. Lapping believes that 'the thing that binds together all the programs [...] is that the stories are very complicated, and too often the news can only handle the simple, superficial level—the level of high drama'. Lapping's series tell the story from spark to smolder, the entire history, development, and outcome. Lapping's teams visit a scenario with in-depth knowledge gained through thorough investigations of the topic's players and events.

Lapping also created the 'journalists' reconstruction'. The technique has several journalists meet and discuss a current matter with their respective countries' leaders. The journalists then pool their versions of the major international confrontation and assemble a many-sided account of how an important matter of public record came to be decided.

Lapping's trademark ability is his capacity to get the individuals at the center of an issue to tell exactly how they made the decisions that resulted in the outcome being explored. Lapping has described it as a process of flattery, wherein an individual is carefully studied and interviewed, which ultimately results in a deep impression made on the subject and prompts the interviewee to respond to that flattery by revealing more information. Lapping admits that, 'That is the process we exploit, or use, perfectly legitimately, to get people to tell their stories'. In The Second Russian Revolution, Lapping and associates were able to infiltrate and talk with members of Politburo, the traditionally tightlipped group, and again in The Death of Yugoslavia (1995) Lapping captured interviews with heads of government from Serbia, Croatia, Slovenia, and Bosnia covering issues that Western politicians would never have revealed.

Lapping describes this ability—the extraordinary access to top politicians—as a 'temporary freak'. Lapping has been able 'to get a level of access to top politicians and other decision-makers for making television programs that is denied to historians and is rarely, if ever, available to other journalists'. He cites this phenomenon as a particular effect of television. It is the power and scope of the medium that persuades those people to go before the camera and tell their story.

Another aspect of Lapping's documentaries is the depiction of actual 'events'. Lapping describes the opportunity to show an event as opposed to people talking about an event as 'The Great Toy'. In The Death of Yugoslavia, the producers' obsession with getting inside the story unearthed a boardroom film in the Yugoslav military archive. The film depicts the Yugoslav army, Serb president, and the presidents of other states deciding on whether to go into Croatia to stop the acquisition of arms.

Although Lapping has directed in the past, he has moved exclusively into a producer role. He designs the programs and is actively involved in persuading broadcasters about programming and places the individuals involved in their production. Lapping's films are coproduced and are commissioned by multiple broadcasters because they are so expensive.

Lapping's documentaries do not achieve high ratings, but they continue to be produced largely due to the praise they receive from newspapers, historians, and broadcasters. The BBC cites Lapping and his films as 'virtually a new genre of documentary which retells momentous events from the recent past with meticulous objectivity and with most or all of the principal actors recording their version of what happened: the narratives that emerge are revelations'.

ROBERT A. EMMONS, JR

Biography

Born in London, England, September 13, 1937. Graduated from Pembroke College, Cambridge, in 1959. Journalist for the Daily Mirror, Guardian, Financial Times, and New Society. Founder of Brian Lapping Associates, eventually becoming Brook Lapping Productions in 1988. Author of several books. Awards include Gold and Silver Medals International Film and TV Festival, George Foster Peabody Award, BAFTA Best Documentary Award, Columbia University du Pont Gold Baton, and an Emmy. Chairman, Teachers' Television Department of Education, 2003-4.

Selected films

- 1976 Chrysler and the Cabinet: producer
- 1985 End of Empire: executive producer
- 1991 The Second Russian Revolution: executive producer
- 1994 Watergate: executive producer
- 1995 The Death of Yugoslavia: executive producer
- 1998 The 50 Years War: Israel and the Arabs: director, producer
- 1999 Finest Hour: executive producer
- 2001 Endgame in Ireland: executive producer

- 2002 Avenging Terror: executive producer
- 2003 The Fall of Milosevic: executive producer

Further reading

- Lapping, Brian, Apartheid: A History, New York: G. Braziller, 1986.
- The Bounds of Freedom, London: Constable and Co., 1980.
- End of Empire, New York: St Martin's, 1985.
- The Labour Government, 1964-70, New York: Penguin, 1970.
- Lapping, Brian and Radice, Giles (eds), More Power to the People: Young Fabian Essays on Democracy in Britain, London: Longman, 1968.

Latin America

The earliest manifestation of the documentary instinct in Latin America occurred in Mexico before World War I during the Revolutionary years after the uprising of 1911, when the immediate success of actualities depicting the momentous events of the day helped to stimulate the early growth of Mexican cinema. In the absence of any dominant international cinematic model for political reportage (newsreels were only in their earliest stage and hardly provided models for events like those in Mexico), these actualities developed along their own distinctive lines. According to the account of Aurelio de los Reyes (1995), filmmakers stimulated by an eager urban audience took to the battlefields, where their instinct was to pursue a positivist belief in the camera's objectivity and to eschew a political agenda of their own. A film from 1912 by the Alva brothers, for example, Revolución orozquista/The Orozco Revolution, attempts to report the events from both sides of the battle lines; the filmmakers were even caught in crossfire that damaged their equipment. It is difficult, says de los Reyes, to tell where the authors' sympathies lay; an objectivity that he adds does not survive the imposition of censorship by the Huerta regime in 1913. In this brief period Mexican filmmakers quickly developed greater skill in the construction of a documentary narrative than filmmakers north of the border, and the results are what de los Reyes calls 'a local vernacular form of representation of contemporary happenings'.

This early flowering was exceptional, the result of opportunity, initiative, and a brief absence of repressive authority. The subsequent evolution of cinema as a commercial institution under the tutelage of Hollywood, which was nowhere auspicious for documentary, was compounded in Latin America by the conditions of underdevelopment. This stunted growth and resulted only in a series of medium-to-small, sometimes tiny, local film industries, all of them plagued by structural weakness and small markets. If early documentary in Europe was succored by the film society movement, born in Paris in 1924, and the first art houses, these did not appear in Latin America (apart from Brazil) until somewhat later (the 1940s in Uruguay and Argentina, the 1950s in countries such as Chile, Bolivia, and Cuba). Nor were there paragon agencies and corporate commercial interests to develop 16mm distribution of educational documentary, as happened, for example, in Great Britain, where a strong documentary movement grew up in the 1930s as a result. It is hardly surprising, therefore, that throughout the rest of the silent period and beyond, until the rise of a new film movement in the 1950s, Latin American documentary was confined, with little exception, to minor examples of conventional subgenres like the travelogue or the scientific documentary. Nevertheless, there is evidence of a documentary instinct at work in isolated examples uncovered by scholars. Agustín Mahieu (1966) speaks of an Argentine film of 1916, El último malón/The Last Indian Uprising, shot in the province of Santa Fé by an anthropologist called Alcides Greca, which he describes as a kind of documentary reconstruction of an uprising that took place at the beginning of the century, filmed in authentic locations with the indigenous Indians as protagonists of their own story. Paulo Antonio Paranagua (1984) speaks of a documentary made for a copper company in Chile in 1919 by an Italian, Salvador Giambastiani, which places on display faces marked by the grim conditions in the mines, including a number of scenes of the men at work. More recently the same writer has chronicled the existence of a substantial number of newsreels produced in various countries from the 1920s to the 1950s, especially Argentina, Mexico, Brazil, and Cuba (Paranagua 2003). The main exception to this pattern was the work of Humberto Mauro in Brazil, subsequently claimed by Glauber Rocha as the precursor of cinema novo. Mauro produced a series of films under the general title Brasilianas between 1945 and 1956, celebrating aspects of the Brazilian countryside and popular culture, as well as a number of longer films that often contain an original mixture of fiction and documentary.

Occasionally new finds appear. A documentary of 1993 by the Venezuelan Alfredo Anzola, El misterio de los ojos escarlata/The Mystery of the Scarlet Eyes, provides a rare glimpse of unseen images of Venezuela in the 1920s and 1930s: footage shot by the filmmaker's father, who made documentaries and two silent feature films, now lost, in the 1920s, then acquired a 16mm camera and filmed mostly documentary footage throughout the 1930s and 1940s while working as the director of a radio station. A radio serial written and produced by Anzola Père provides the title of his son's film about him, a film that prompts several questions: How many others among the all but nameless Latin American filmmakers of the early years had similar careers? Might they have left undiscovered archives? How many of these aficionados have not even left their names behind? Also, Anzola, as portrayed by his son, was clearly no intellectual, but a keen cineaste, an aficionado who took his camera with him to events where he had entry as a radio producer. The point of view is uncritical and marked by his social class. However, aficionados of the same class in succeeding decades were the very people whose first filmmaking efforts represent the initial stirrings of the powerful new movement in Latin American cinema that emerged in the late 1950s.

A singular example from 1930s Mexico points in another direction. The film historian Georges Sadoul calls Redes (Nets, aka The Wave, 1934) a semidocumentary that uses nonprofessional actors in real locations, in the manner of the German film Menschen am Sonntag/People on Sunday (directed by Robert Siodmak) of 1929, to recount a story taken from everyday life, which in this case deals with the struggle of Vera Cruz fishermen against exploitation. In short, an extraordinary piece of neorealism avant la lettre, as well as a precursor of what will later become a major tendency of politically committed filmmaking in every corner of Latin America. A rare example, too, of collaboration as equals between North and South, the film was made at the invitation of a progressive politician, Velásquez Chávez, in charge of public education, who wrote the original script, by a team headed by the Mexican Emilio Gómez Muriel, which included two foreigners: the New York photographer Paul Strand and a young émigré from Austria, Fred Zinnemann, Siodmak's assistant director on Menschen am Sonntag. In sum, Redes is one of those films, like Kuhle Wampe by Slatan Dudow and Bertolt Brecht (1932), or Jean Renoir's Toni of 1934, which impresses themselves on the imagination as spectres of a different kind of cinema that might have been, where the simple opposition between fiction and documentary is transcended.

The emergence of Latin American documentary in the 1950s and 1960s marks the appearance of a new generation of filmmakers, who benefit from a new economic and political conjuncture. Cinema was already thoroughly dominated by Hollywood product, which easily commanded eighty percent or more of the market, while postwar modernisation extended the US presence in the expanding domains of radio and television. It also brought a drive to open up markets among the Latin American bourgeoisie for the appurtenances of the 'American way of life', which naturally included amateur cine, for which official Washington publications like the Industrial Reference Service (later called World Trade in Commodities) recorded increasing sales in several countries. The spread of film clubs and magazines, art houses, and festivals was part of the same process of cultural modernisation, but produced a sting: the new generation rejected both what they saw as the cultural imperialism of the gringos and the crass commercialism of local film industries, where they existed, which together prevented the emergence of authentic autochthonous voices. Instead they looked to new film movements in Europe for orientation. Several of the pioneers of the 1950s and 1960s had taken themselves to Italy to study cinema in Rome, bringing back with them the ideals of both neorealism and the social documentary, whatever would help them in the endeavour to discover the social, economic, and political undertow in the sight of immediate reality, whether in the form of neorealist fiction or documentary.

Documentary is a marginal form of cinema, and some of the first initiatives occurred in out-of-the-way places like Cuzco in Peru, where a film club was set up in 1955 and Manuel Chambi and others started making short documentaries on ethnographic and sociocultural themes; Sadoul called them the Cuzco School. They were not unique, but represented a new desire to be found throughout the continent for self-expression beyond the bounds that were sanctioned by the ruling Creole elites. Several such groups were linked to social movements that espoused leftist and Marxist principles, like the cultural club Nuestro Tiempo run by the Young Communists in Havana in the 1950s, which harboured several future Cuban directors. The first international meeting place for the young filmmakers was a film festival in Montevideo, set up in 1954 by the SODRE, Uruguay's national radio station and a progressive cultural promoter. Among the filmmakers attending in 1958, when John Grierson was the guest of honour, were Chambi from Peru, and Fernando Birri from Argentina. The film exhibited by Birri and his students, Tire Die/Throw Us a Dime, a collaborative social inquiry into the shanty towns around the city of Santa Fe, later came to be celebrated as the founding social documentary of the new film movement. Known simply as el nuevo cine latinoamericano (the new Latin American cinema), the designation dates from a meeting in 1967 of filmmakers from across the continent hosted by a film club in the Chilean seaside town of Viña del Mar, which had been running a festival of 8mm and 16mm with a strong documentary emphasis since 1963. Documentary, for this movement, was far from marginal, even if documentarists everywhere (except Cuba after 1959) were forced to work in the interstices of the system. In the desire to turn the cameras on the actuality of the external world, to escape the distorted imagery of the dominant cinema's imaginary, fiction was necessarily inflected by documentary and shared the documentary vocation to witness and testify to social reality. There is a long list of dramatic films, from Nelson Pereira dos Santos in Brazil in the 1950s, by way of Sanjinés in Bolivia, Peru, and Ecuador in the 1960s and after, to the recent work of Víctor Gaviria in Colombia, which represents the persistent pull that the documentary instinct and its disciplines have exercised on the Latin American fiction film.

The 1950s saw a small number of initiatives in independent documentary production, including ¡Torero! by Carlos Velo in Mexico (1956), a partly dramatised account of the career of the matador Luis Procuña, in which Procuña plays himself, and in Venezuela, an extraordinary film of poetic realism depicting everyday life in the feudal salt marshes, called Araya, by Margot Benacerraf (1959). In the next few years, new paradigms of political documentary began to appear, and a stream of films, in a variety of styles and approaches, which attested to the conditions of life from the Rio Grande to Tierra del Fuego. As one commentator has put it, 'The rise of Marxist-inflected ideologies in Latin America prescribed a dual quest: for a less stratified socioeconomic system, and for authentic, autonomous, culturally specific forms of expression' (Burton 1990). Among the films shown at Viña in 1967 were no fewer than seventeen from Brazil, where filmmakers in São Paulo were stimulated by the arrival in 1963 of Birri and several of his associates, who had been forced to flee their country. Benefiting from more up-to-date equipment, Brazilian documentary established a particularly strong line in political reportage, exemplified by films like Geraldo Sarno's Viramundo (1964) on internal migration, which constructs a montage of multiple voices that juxtaposes the aspirations of peasants from the drought-ridden northeast who migrate to São Paulo in search of work with what they find when they arrive there. A distinctive feature of these films is the dissolution of the authoritative monologue of voice-over narration in favour of a dialogical form of construction that allows the filmmaker to apply a dialectical, and hence highly politicised, interpretation of the subject matter. Other filmmakers, working without the benefit of synchronous sound recording, found imaginative solutions to the construction of the soundtrack, which also displace the voice of authority, like the Uruguayan Mario Handler's Carlos: Cineretrato de un caminante/Carlos: Cine-Portrait of a Walker (1965), which combines patiently filmed images of a vagabond's life with his edited speech, recorded afterwards, on the soundtrack. Here, through the aesthetic construction of the subjectivity of an individual discarded by society, the film exemplifies another fundamental impulse of the new documentary, that of giving voice and image to those who have been condemned to silence and invisibility. In this way, Latin American documentary shared the aim defined by the Brazilian radical Christian educationalist Paulo Freire as breaking 'the culture of silence' to which underdevelopment condemned the subaltern classes.

Among the films on show at Viña in 1967, and the following year at another international meeting in Mérida, Venezuela, were several from Cuba. If the politicisation of the 1960s received a strong fillip from the Cuban Revolution, Cuban documentary contributed powerfully to the tendency to combine explicit political content with an experimental aesthetic, above all in the work of Santiago Alvarez, who reinvented the newsreel, the compilation film, the travelogue, and every other documentary genre he laid hands on in an irrepressible frenzy of filmic bricolage licensed by that supreme act of bricolage, the Cuban Revolution. Cuba became unique in Latin America in the status it awarded to its own cinema, including documentary. Cuba was the one place in Latin America where local documentaries were widely seen in the cinemas, because distribution was controlled by a state film institute (ICAIC, the Cuban Institute of Film Art and Industry), which had been created by the Revolution within three months of taking power in 1959. ICAIC set out to supply its own documentaries and a weekly newsreel with every feature film, foreign or domestic, that it distributed. Newsreel and documentary became the requisite form of apprenticeship for new directors, a philosophy that also succoured a critical realist approach to fiction. (Although Cuban fiction films were made with professional actors, the directors quickly abandoned the studio, and even their comedies and genre films are remarkable for the documentary value of their mise-en-scène.) The euphoria of revolution imbued the institute's films with an experimentalist aesthetic, and no one was more audacious than Alvarez, who headed the newsreel unit, which he turned by his own example into a school for militant documentary. By using every kind of visual imagery, from newsreel footage to stills, archive film to cuttings from magazines, combined with animated texts and emblematic musicalisation, Alvarez amalgamated revolutionary politics and kleptomania to reinvent Soviet montage in a Caribbean setting. Best known abroad in those years were his montage films on racism and politics in the United States, Now (1965) and LBJ (1968); the lyrical Vietnam films, Hanoi Martes 13/Hanoi Tuesday 13th (1967) and 79 Primaveras/79 Springs (1969); and his eulogy for Che Guevara, Hasta la Victoria Siempre/Always Until Victory (1967).

In the 1970s researchers at ICAIC found that people sometimes went to the movies because they wanted to see the new Alvarez, and would then stay and watch whatever feature was put on after it, a complete inversion of normal cinema-going behaviour. Alvarez began making feature-length documentaries at the start of the decade, and their success prompted ICAIC to produce a whole series of feature documentaries for cinema distribution by different directors at a time when commercial cinema in the West had abandoned making documentaries for the cinema altogether. Particularly notable are two films by Jesús Díaz. 55 Hermanos/55 Brothers and Sisters (1978) follows a group of young Cuban Americans, children of émigrés returning to their country for the first time on a highly charged three-week trip that ends with a meeting with Fidel. En tierra de Sandino/In the Land of Sandino (1980) is probably the most penetrating study of the Sandinista revolution by a foreign filmmaker. ICAIC's policy produced a paradox: Cuba, where according to its enemies the public sphere had been replaced by the totalitarian control of the communists, maintained a space on the cinema screen for the documentary encounter with social reality, which was not to be found on the screens of the democracies, where commercial criteria drove them out. Nor were Cuban documentaries, or even newsreels, by any means limited to political propaganda. The newsreels were often investigative (especially compared to the conformism of broadcasting and the press), whereas many of the documentaries were broadly didactic and to that extent Griersonian. Others were poetic; many were devoted to celebrating different aspects of Cuban culture. Several are portraits of individuals who recover their memories for the collective. Notable directors include Manuel Octavio Gómez, Octavio Cortázar, Pastor Vega, Sara Gómez, Melchor Casals, and Luis Felipe Bernaza. Whenever their films were seen in Latin America, in film festivals and film clubs, they powerfully encouraged the ambitions of documentarists who had none of the access to an audience that their Cuban compadres enjoyed.

If the surge of Latin American documentary went together with social ferment in countries where political upheaval was on the agenda, this was nowhere more true than in Chile in the late 1960s, where a small tribe of young filmmakers formed a committee of support for the left-wing coalition of Popular Unity and its Marxist presidential candidate Salvador Allende. Both before and after his electoral victory in 1970 they engaged in a cinema of urgency, producing a range of highly inventive films from campaign propaganda and agitational shorts to investigations of the political process and full-scale neorealist dramatisations denouncing the ills of underdevelopment. This was the milieu in which Raúl Ruiz, who would later make his career among the French avant-garde, first discovered his talent for improvisation, the improvised fiction of Tres Tristes Tigres/Three Sad Tigers (1968) and the improvised documentary in the case of La Expropiación/Expropriation (1972). The most extraordinary film to emerge from this period, however, was Patricio Guzmán's three-part chronicle La batalla de Chile/The Battle of Chile, a record of the tumultuous months leading up to the coup of 1973 in which Allende was overthrown. A fertile mixture of direct cinema observation and investigative reportage, the footage was smuggled out immediately after Allende's fall and edited in Cuba at ICAIC, the final part appearing in 1979. The result is a work of historical testimony unique in the annals of documentary for its scope, density, and poignancy.

As with other countries that fell to the right, Chilean filmmakers were among those who were forced into exile (the latter included Guzmán's cameraman Jorge Müller). Owing to international solidarity, Chileans became the leading practitioners of a cinema of exile that grew up in the 1970s and contributed a new genre to the history of world cinema, as a number of films took the experience of exile as their subject matter, including Ruiz's semidocumentary Diálogo de exilados/Dialogue of Exiles (France, 1974), and Marilú Mallet's highly personal Journal inachevé/Unfinished Diary (Canada, 1982), an early paradigm of a new mode of feminist autobiographical documentary just then emerging in first-world filmmaking.

Dictatorship and repression also hit Brazil after the coup d'état of 1968, and Argentina after that of 1976, which brought the guerra sucia (dirty war) against the left in which thousands disappeared, among them Raymundo Gleyser, leading member of the militant group Cine de la Base. At the same time, authoritarian rule often had the counterintentional effect of stimulating self-activity among those it held down. Across the continent, as military regimes took power, popular organisations developed at community level to deal with the problems of inadequate housing, food, health care, water, and electricity, and became the locus for resistance to military repression, or simply the practice of popular democracy by those neglected by the state. Filmmakers seeing these organisations as the natural audience for their work created alternative exhibition circuits using portable equipment, on the rural model established in the 1960s in Bolivia by the Ukamau collective, or the urban form of independent distribution collectives like Zafra in Mexico, supplying films to groups such as film clubs and shanty town residents. In short, Latin American documentary became involved in the creation of an alternative audiovisual public sphere parallel with popular organisations within the community and sharing the same preoccupation to give voice to people normally excluded from public speech and outside the political power structures. In some cases films were made and exhibited within the orbit of particular political groups, sometimes banned ones. The most famous example is a mammoth three-part, four-hour political testimony called La hora de los hornos/The Hour of the Furnaces (1968), a product of the Peronist movement in Argentina. The film was accompanied by a manifesto, Hacia un tercer cine/Towards a Third Cinema, by two of its makers, Fernando Solanas and Octavio Getino, which offers a blueprint for militant filmmaking that was rapidly reprinted across the world.

La hora de los hornos was not only filmed clandestinely, it was also shown clandestinely. It was designed for an audience of the politically engaged, and while it might seem to be lecturing at them, it included strategically placed inter-titles inviting the projectionist to pause the film to allow for debate among the audience. It thus exemplifies another essential characteristic of the movement to which it belongs, the intentional mode of address. Where independent documentary remains outside the world and discourse of television, and alternative distribution constructs a parallel public sphere for its circulation, the documentarist has the advantage of a direct relationship with small but particular sectors of the public. In Latin America this was reflected in the elaboration of a distinct vocabulary for the discussion of documentary in the journals and publications of the film movement to which they belonged: terms like cine didáctico, cine testimonio, cine denuncia, cine encuesta, cine rescate and, not least, cine militante. This list is not exhaustive or definitive and there is no single source from which it is drawn. These are only the most frequently used of a series of terms that occur across the whole range of radical Latin American film writings that express its preoccupations and objectives. They are found in film journals from several countries, with titles like Hablemos de Cine, Cine al Día, Primer Plano, Octubre, and Cine Cubano (from Peru, Venezuela, Chile, Mexico, and Cuba, respectively). The distinctive feature of all the terms listed is precisely their intentional character. They indicate a variety of purposes that can all be construed in political terms: cine didáctico is to teach, testimonio to offer testimony, denuncia to denounce, encuesta to investigate. Cine rescate is to bring history alive, celebrativo to celebrate revolutionary achievement. Cine ensayo is the essay film, to provide space for reflection. Cine militante or cine combate, militant cinema or cinema of combat, is the most explicit expression of the revolutionary imperative of those years.

If the politics of the movement were voluntaristic, the films generally paid scant attention to political programmes, but rather evinced an anthropological respect for their subjects combined with a sense of aesthetic search for anti-authoritarian modes of address. The filmmakers understood well enough that this required them to radicalise their own practices and develop collective working methods. It is no accident, but one of the features that justifies the designation of this variegated activity as a movement, that a strong tendency can be found from one end of Latin America to the other to work in groups, who often adopted declarative names like the two that called themselves Grupo Cine Testimonio: the first founded in Mexico in 1969 by Eduardo Maldonado, the second in Argentina in 1982. There was also a strong propensity to individual experiment, which might take several forms. The anthropological method is taken furthest in Chircales/Brickmakers (1972) by the Colombian documentarists Marta Rodríguez and Jorge Silva, who spent five years achieving a quite exceptional fusion of politics, poetry, and visual anthropology in the portrayal of workers in the brickyards on the outskirts of Bogotá. Even the most idiosyncratic experiments remain rooted in political reality, like the Mexican director Paul Leduc's ABC del Etnocidio/ABC of Ethnocide (1976), an A-to-Z of indictments against the modern Mexican state that breaks completely with the conventions of documentary exposition. Another tack is represented by Ciro Durán's Gamin (1978), a provocative and interventionist version of direct cinema that uses the technique to reveal what is under everybody's nose but is never seen: the private life of the Bogotá street urchin.

The 1980s brought a renewal of the political documentary across the continent, but in less strident forms. The forms of documentary that were cultivated in Nicaragua, where the Sandinistas took power in 1979 and immediately set up a film institute, and even El Salvador in the early 1980s, where a military junta was challenged by a guerrilla movement with its own filmmakers, gave considerable latitude for poetic expression. Elsewhere, liberalisation brought a new thematic—documenting the repression of the years of military dictatorships. One of the most thoughtful testaments of this history, its repressions and aporias, can be found in Eduardo Coutinho's Cabra Marcado para Morrer/Man Marked to Die (1984), which is not only an investigation into the assassination of a peasant leader in the northeast of Brazil twenty years earlier, but a film about its own history, recuperating the first abortive attempts to make the film more than twenty years earlier, juxtaposing actual footage from 1962, reenactment from 1964, and contemporary testimony from the early 1980s, all showing the same social actors at different ages and in different roles. As reflexive an aesthetic as anyone could want, the result was a documentary about a documentary with few to compare. In the 1990s Coutinho, now working on video, produced a number of deceptively simple but remarkable documentaries (Boca de Lixo, 1993; Babilonia 2000, 2001; Edificio Master, 2001), each presenting a cross-section of people at a particular location (scavengers on a rubbish tip, inhabitants of a favela (shanty town), or a middle-class apartment block), which amounts to an anatomy of the social classes of contemporary Brazil.

Another context was provided by the rise of feminism, which allowed a new generation of women filmmakers to transcend class barriers through the solidarity of gender, for which one of the first paradigms was an Argentine film memorialising the victims of military neofascism, Las Madres de la Plaza de Mayo/Mothers of the Plaza de Mayo (1985) by Lourdes Portillo and Susana Munoz. Meanwhile, women's film groups appeared in countries such as Mexico and Brazil, producing work on feminist themes like the struggle for abortion. Nevertheless, by the mid-1980s the movement as a whole found itself in a growing crisis of both confidence and identity. For a cinema founded on a political conception of itself, the transformation of the political space in which it operated as a result of the democratic turn of the decade threatened to cast it adrift. Revolutionary militancy and its rhetoric were slipping away, even before the collapse of the socialist camp shifted the balance of global power. Convictions remained, but the old prescriptions no longer served. Some Latin American documentarists were now in receipt of funding from European television stations, which also required a shift in the mode of address. Britain's new Channel 4, for example, supported a film by the exiled Argentine Jorge Denti, Malvinas, Historia de traiciones/Malvinas, Story of Betrayal (1983), which made a strength of conforming to British requirements of political balance by comparing the adventurism of Galtieri and Thatcher. A few years later they supported two films by the Chilean Ignacio Agüero: 100 niños esperando un tren/100 Children Waiting for a Train (1989), which discovers an entrancing world among children in a shanty town learning about the invention of cinema, and Sueños de hielo/Dreams of Ice (1992), a remarkable fantasy documentary about the lump of Antarctic ice that Chile sent to the World Fair in Seville.

However, there were also other developments in the shape of video, where once again Latin America would discover new forms of practice that punctured repression and the norms of representation. Indeed, video was put to such uses in Latin America with no greater delay than community video experiments in First World countries, and usually at much greater risk. In Chile, for example, the early 1980s saw clandestinely shot videos reporting on mass opposition to the rule of the junta, which would have been otherwise impossible to produce. The paradox is that video technology arrived in Chile as part of the neoliberal modernisation of the country's economy, which included investment in the advertising industry. In Argentina, the Grupo Cine-Ojo (in salute to Vertov's kino-eye), which began working in 1982 in Super 8, made their first video documentary in 1984 (though they continued to work on 16mm as well). In Brazil, by the end of the decade video was being taken up by indigenous groups to document their traditions and organise themselves in the face of the indifference of the wider society. The indigenous video movement, which organises regional and national meetings and has spread to other countries including Bolivia, constitutes a new catalyst within both documentary and the public sphere, as it enables its participants to speak to each other, and sometimes to their Others, in a direct mode of address. This is not documentary in the old sense, but its extension into new collective spaces, where the former subjects of anthropological and political documentarists now wield the camera themselves and assert ownership of their own image. Stereotypical notions of cultural and technological backwardness are exploded by the speed with which indigenous video established itself, and even started inventing new genres and tropes of video speech.

A final example is the renaissance of documentary in Argentina in the midst of the country's nightmare of economic collapse. Once again we see the same phenomenon, the rapid adoption of the newest technologies for purposes perhaps still best described by the old-fashioned word of 'liberation' in a way that demolishes the notion that underdevelopment means backwardness in anything other than an economic sense. Thus, the same global capitalism that produces computerisation and digital telecommunication also produces the digital video cameras and computers that, during Argentina's neoliberal experiment of dollar parity, found eager buyers among a new generation of aspiring filmmakers. With the collapse of the banks, documentary was boosted by an explosive reality. Filmmakers, many of them trained in the film schools that blossomed in Argentina during the preceding decade, and often militants of one or another political association, now in full possession of the means of production, needed no funding or commissions to go out on the streets and film. Spontaneous and uncredited videos, recording popular mobilisations and cacerolazos (saucepan-bashing), were sold on the streets from stalls piled with copies; others rediscovered a certain Argentine documentary tradition going back to the work of Raymundo Gleyser in the 1960s. The upsurge began before the economic collapse of December 2001. Earlier that year, at Mar de Plata, an alternative festival of contemporary political documentary attracted the attention of Solanas, who withdrew from an official screening of La hora de los hornos to join the counter-event, calling the new groups the heirs of third cinema. Political opportunism? Wishful thinking? A year after the bank collapse, as many as forty groups of video filmmakers were working alongside the assemblies and piqueteros, the women's movement, and the workers' cooperatives who were taking control of bankrupt firms. Their work was shown at factories, community movement assemblies, and festivals, but not on television or in the cinemas. The world's eyes, or rather, the global media, may have turned away from Argentina's plight, but not the new documentarists, for whom their cameras are once again weapons in a struggle of survival that testifies to resistance in the face of adversity.

MICHAEL CHANAN

Further reading

- Burton, Julianne (ed.), The Social Documentary in Latin America, Pittsburgh, PA: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1990.
- Chanan, Michael, The Cuban Image, Cinema and Cultural Politics in Cuba, London: BFI, 1984.
- de los Reyes, Aurelio, 'The Silent Cinema', in Paulo Antonio Paranagua (ed.), Mexican Cinema, London: BFI, 1995.
- Mahieu, Jose Agustín, Breve historia del cine argentino, Buenos Aires: Editorial Universitaria, 1966.
- Paranagua, Paulo Antonio, O Cinema na América Latina, Porto Alegre: L & P.M. Editores, 1984.
- Cine documental en América Latina, Madrid: Cátedra, 2003.

Law and Order

(US, Wiseman, 1969)

Law and Order shows the work of the city police force in Kansas City, Missouri, from precinct administration to routine patrol duty. Director Frederick Wiseman travels with cops in their patrol cars, and shows the police responding to different kinds of calls, ranging from domestic quarrels to armed robbery.

Stylistically, like all of Wiseman's documentaries, Law and Order offers no voice-over narration or expository titles, but presents a series of sequences that alternately depict the police as kind and cruel, as both benevolent and brutal. For every scene in which a policeman does something like find a lost purse for an elderly woman, there is another such as the one in which a detective seems inexplicably to ignore a man who wants to report someone with a gun.

In one sequence a policeman becomes a father figure to a lost little girl, bringing her to the precinct station and giving her candy. The policeman himself provides the perfect emblem of his 'parental' position by taking out a pipe and smoking it as he drives the patrol car with one arm wrapped protectively around the child, and Wiseman clearly encourages this view of him by shooting the policeman from a low angle, as if from a child's perspective. However, elsewhere in the film we see events that are likely to make us angry, such as the scene where a detective seems excessively violent to a prostitute, choking her even as he denies doing so. The event unfolds in a poorly lit basement and is the only time in the film when Wiseman uses artificial light in the form of a sun gun, tingeing the violence with a visually eerie tone.

The film thus places viewers in a conflicted position in relation to the police, their torn response analogous to the position of the police themselves. The film suggests that the sometimes inadequate or excessive responses of the police are, in turn, symptomatic of the impossible demands made on them as a result of larger social problems. Wiseman himself has said that his preconceptions about the police changed, grew more ambiguous, as a result of the experience of riding on patrol with them.

Wiseman is always interested in showing how a particular institution relates to the larger social fabric, and Law and Order suggests that American society, not unlike the police and the viewer, are torn. The police can neither solve domestic crime nor prevent it (a theme to which Wiseman returns again in Domestic Violence, 2001); often, all they can do is inform people that 'there's nothing we can do about it', the response they give in both the opening and closing sequences. The domestic emphasis of routine police work is expressed by the number of sequences in the film that refer to family and social tensions. In addition to the two domestic arguments that bracket the film, there are also, among others, a man charged with having molested a boy, a man who threatens to kill another man for molesting his niece, and a runaway boy.

Racial tensions, often present but largely submergled in Wiseman's films, loom large in Law and Order, made during a period of rising crime and racial violence in the United States. The fear of a recent race riot permeates the dialogue, and racial tension is evident throughout the film. At one point Wiseman's camera looks out the window of a moving patrol car to glimpse smoke ominously rising from a city block. A white woman who has been arrested makes a point of specifying the racial identity of the arresting officers, while the black youths arrested in the clothing store blame their fate on racial prejudice. In one sequence a young black man named Howard Gilbert is arrested for auto theft, and the camera waits with the youth and the arresting officers, who must listen to his string of racist insults for more than five minutes of screen time until the paddy wagon arrives. Richard Nixon's campaign speech near the end of Law and Order, in which he says voters are faced with a clear choice between rising crime and the reestablishment of 'respect for law and order in this country', makes explicit the social tensions that infuse the film.

In their work the police are required to enforce the law, maintain order, mediate domestic disputes, and provide a range of social services. The huge demands on the police seem almost impossible, as suggested by the film's structure. Bracketed by scenes of family arguments that the police attempt to mediate, the film structure is circular, distinguishing it from other Wiseman films such as Titicut Follies and High School, which both show beginnings and ends to their respective institutional processes. By contrast, Law and Order presents an accumulation of events, an ongoing process, more like Hospital and Welfare.

Subsequent to the scene of the arrest of Howard Gilbert, we hear two references to the fact that Gilbert has been released because he is a youthful offender. So Law and Order's structural symmetry suggests continuation rather than closure. Indeed, over the final credits, a voice from the police radio speaks of yet another dangerous suspect in a seemingly endless parade. The film's circular structure is thus apposite, given its view of police work as a ceaseless holding action against a wellspring of social discontent.

BARRY KEITH GRANT

See also: High School; Hospital; Titicut Follies; Wiseman, Fredrick

Law and Order (US, 1969, 81 mins). Distributed by Zipporah Films. Produced, edited, and directed by Frederick Wiseman. Cinematography by William Brayne. Sound recorded by Frederick Wiseman.

Further reading

- Atkins, Thomas R. (ed.), Frederick Wiseman, New York: Monarch Press, 1976.
- Benson, Thomas W. and Anderson, Caroline, Reality Fictions: The Films of Frederick Wiseman, Carbondale, IL: Southern Illinois University Press, 1989.
- Grant, Barry Keith, Voyages of Discovery: The Cinema of Frederick Wiseman, Urbana, IL and Chicago: University of Illinois Press, 1992.
- Mamber, Stephen, Cinema Verite in America: Studies in Uncontrolled Documentary, Cambridge, MA: MIT Press, 1974.
- Nichols, Bill, Ideology and the Image, Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press, 1981.

LBJ

(Cuba, Alvarez, 1968)

Santiago Alvarez's LBJ is a prime example, in terms of style and political focus, of the documentary work produced by the Instituto Cubano del Arte e Industria Cinematograficos (ICAIC). Founded in 1959, three months after the Cuban revolutions, the Institute (part of the Ministry of Culture) was completely funded and controlled by the government. Yet even as the Communist Revolution took hold, the Institute remained committed to artistic freedom rather than strict adherence to Socialist Realism. Alvarez was in charge of the newsreel division from the origin of the Institute into the 1980s. Fitting the title of his post, Alvarez preferred to be known as a 'news pamphleteer' rather than a documentary filmmaker. He loosely assembled films out of found materials, preferring to make films with immediate political relevancy over polished retrospectives.

LBJ presents an argument that Lyndon B. Johnson was a ruthless despot behind the murders of other prominent political leaders, both Kennedy brothers and Martin Luther King, Jr, thought to be his allies. Divided into three chapters, L for Luther, B for Bobby, and J for Jack, each section is introduced with a slot-machine animation that turns up a skull with corresponding initials to suggest that Johnson has ordered a hit on the named target.

The documentary never wavers in its assurance of Johnson's murderousness and, by implication, his targets' righteousness. Images of Johnson, his supposed victims, and the Civil Rights movement, are assembled in a way that unmistakably bears out this hypothesis. The chapter on Bobby Kennedy, for instance, opens with magazine covers that ask whether he will become the next president. This is followed by a photograph of Johnson's face imposed on a knight's suit of armor. Images of Kennedy's body and then his funeral appear shortly thereafter, chased by a photograph of an elated Johnson. The president appears as a cartoonish antagonist throughout this short feature, frequently associated with knights, and sometimes tinted in shockingly bright red and accompanied with evil cackling.

While the conspiratorial hypothesis of Alvarez's film is bluntly overdrawn, the style with which it is conveyed is much more compelling. The juxtaposition of the Kennedys and Johnson as forces of good and evil is, put simply, incorrect, but the spontaneity and inventiveness of its construction redeem the picture's didacticism. LBJ does not feature any voice-over narration. It relies, instead, on the montage of filmed photographs, and, less often, found footage. (Familiar speeches by Stokely Carmichael and Martin Luther King constitute the film's sole speaking parts.) The rhythmic and compelling flow of these images, accompanied by a range of music from Nina Simone to Carl Orff, work most effectively as a kind of swirling snapshot of America in the late 1960s. LBJ obviously features images of prominent political figures, but as often, photographs of poor, urban, and, particularly, black life. When Alvarez shows images of the Civil Rights movement, he gravitates as much to less famous pictures of demonstrations and incidents in varied city streets as to iconic events such as the March on Washington. This produces a much broader and more inclusive (if more fleeting) picture of the movement than an expository feature of equal length could portray. LBJ was not Alvarez's first study of black America. His 1965 film, Now, is a short about racial violence in the United States. Like LBJ, it valorizes the black community and its leaders with a series of filmed photographs. Unlike LBJ, Now's political argument is more focused and coherent.

Although LBJ's implication that Johnson is the evil architect of urban poverty, as well as the assassinations, is less than convincing, its commentary-via-montage works more effectively when considered as broader social criticism. LBJ is on-point in its attention to the influence of popular culture on politics. Without the need for explanatory dialogue, Alvarez suggests that the ubiquity of gunplay in popular culture plays a role in the American public's acceptance of violence perpetrated by the government as routine, and even admirable. Clips of television ads for firearms are paired with images of President Johnson joyously shooting rifles for recreation. Filming newspapers, Alvarez includes stories in the popular press about Johnson as a 'cowboy president'. This is joined with images of cowboys in TV serials riding horses like Johnson. This produces the effect of what one imagines could be a typical night of American television: Johnson on one channel, a Western on another, and perhaps a B gangster film or a gun commercial, which Alvarez also shortly excerpts, on a third. The unmistakable suggestion is that these separate genres (news, advertising, and drama), which circulate contemporaneously but are less often explicitly paired, influence the style and, more important, the reception of one another. A cowboy president on one channel is allowed, in part, by the presence of the cowboy on the Western serial on another. While Alvarez obviously has Johnson in his sights with this critique, it applies equally to presidents before and after him, who also capitalized on a rugged fighter persona.

LBJ is also effective in the way it contrasts the idealized façade of American life with the bloody facts of the country's domestic and international struggles. Alvarez does this by rapidly cutting from images of the United States romanticized through its popular culture to brutal depictions of the Civil Rights movements and interventions in Latin America. Banal images of Johnson holding babies, playing with puppies, or casually chatting with the Kennedy brothers are quickly chased by pictures of poverty, struggle, and even mutilated bodies. The film, in fact, opens with Life magazine's coverage of Luci Baines's marriage in 1966. It dwells slowly on the excesses of this event before moving to more sobering images. As with the cowboy president portion of the film, this aspect of the documentary is more effective when considered in general terms—as a juxtaposition of how America perceives and portrays itself, yet what it does—than in reference to Johnson himself. Such readings go against the grain of a documentary that marshals all contempt toward Johnson rather than push toward a more systemic view of social evils. Still, LBJ is prevented from becoming too rhetorical by the very nature of its form. To a certain extent, the film retains the raw quality of the found material that constitutes it. The broad variety and scope of the assembled images, outside of Johnson, leave a measure of interpretive room. LBJ and other Cuban films weren't screened in America until 1973 because of the US economic and cultural blockade.

JESSE SCHLOTTERBECK

See also: Alvarez, Santiago

LBJ (Cuba, ICAIC, 1968, 15 mins). Directed by Santiago Alvarez, additional direction by Norma Rorrado, Idalberto Galvez, Adalberto Hernandez, Pepin Rodriguez, Jorge Pucheux, Jose Martinez, Arturo Valdes, A. Fernandez Reboiro, Rosa Saavedra, and Della Quesada. Music by Miriam Makeba, Carl Orff, Nina Simone, Pablo Milanés, and Leo Brouwer.

Further reading

- Chanan, Michael, Cuban Cinema, Minneapolis, MN: University of Minnesota Press, 2004.
 ———, The Cuban Image: Cinema and Cultural Politics in Cuba, London: British Film Institute, 1985.
 ——— (ed.), Santiago Alvarez, London: British Film Institute, 1980.
 King, John, Magical Reels: A History of Cinema in Latin America, New York: Verso, 2000.
 Mraz, John, 'Santiago Alvarez: From Dramatic Form to Direct Cinema', in Julianne Burton (ed.), The Social Documentary in Latin America, Pittsburgh, PA: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1990: 131–50.
 n.a., 'Five Frames Are Five Frames, Not Six, but Five: An Interview with Santiago Alvarez', Cineaste 4, 1975: 16–21.
 Schumann, Peter B., Historia del cine latinoamericano, Buenos Aires: Editorial Legasa, 1987.

Leacock, Richard

'Ricky' (as everyone called him) Leacock was first and foremost a cinematographer, but also often director, producer, and/or editor on the films he shot. He is most strongly identified with the evolution of the technology and technique that became known as direct cinema and/or cinéma vérité. Although the latter term is now used generically, an earlier distinction between the two techniques was important to Leacock, who used direct cinema for what he was doing. Cinéma vérité was the term coined by Frenchman Jean Rouch to apply to his own work beginning with Chronique d'un été/Chronicle of a Summer (1961). Rouch and Leacock had a famous debate on the differences between their methods at a conference in Lyon, France, in 1963 sponsored by the French national broadcasting system.

Leacock got into filmmaking at the age of fourteen by virtue of having made a fifteen-minute silent film entitled Canary Bananas at his home in the Canary Islands. At the time, he was attending a boarding school in England with one of Robert Flaherty's daughters. When Flaherty saw the film on a visit, he recognized the budding talent and is said to have told the young Ricky, 'Some day we'll make a film together.'

Leacock came to America in 1938 and attended Harvard University (class of 1943), majoring in physics. He was in the US Army for four years as a combat photographer in Asia, 1942–6. Sure enough, after the war Flaherty hired him as cinematographer (and associate producer) on Louisiana Story (1948). Leacock always acknowledged that his association with Flaherty and work on this film had a profound effect on him. In it there is one scene in which the father tells a story about a man who had his jaw bitten off by an alligator. According to the recollection of some of those involved, this scene occurred while the crew were setting up to shoot a scripted scene. Camera and recorder were on merely for testing, but Flaherty let them run to preserve the telling of the story. He was so taken by it that it appears in the film, though its nondirected verisimilitude is quite different from the style of the rest. It caused Leacock to wish portable synchronous sound equipment were available that would permit recording actuality in this way generally—without script, without direction, with scarcely any editing. This was truly the thing itself, for its own sake, which was what Frances Flaherty said her husband was after.

After Louisiana Story, Leacock worked on numerous documentaries with Louis de Rochemont, John Ferno, Irving Jacoby, and Willard Van Dyke among others. Through a number of films (Toby and the Tall Corn, 1954; How the F-100 Got its Tail, 1955; Bernstein in Israel, 1958; Bernstein in Moscow, 1959), he was getting closer and closer to the possibility of handheld synchronous sound shooting, through experimenting with various pieces of equipment.

During this time, Robert Drew, a Life magazine correspondent who was thinking along the same lines as Leacock, contacted him after seeing Toby and the Tall Corn and involved him in Robert Drew Associates once he had managed to set up that organization. Drew persuaded Time-Life Broadcasting to sponsor the development of new, lightweight, portable synchronous sound equipment that freed documentary filmmakers from the bulky, tripod-mounted, AC-powered equipment of the past. As Leacock recalled:

After much experimenting and some wonderful failures, we managed to put together a portable, quiet sync-sound camera and recorder in 1960. Primary was the first film that our group (Bob Drew, [D.A.] Pennebaker, Al Maysles, [Terence] Macartney-Filgate and myself) made where the new equipment worked; where two people made up a whole film unit; where we could walk in and out of situations without lights, tripods, cables and all the other impedimenta which had shackled us before.

(Levin 1971: 195–6)

The Drew-Leacock approach fell within the reportage tradition, coming from Drew's background in photojournalism and Leacock's experience as a documentary cinematographer. This technique assumes the possibility of an objective observer. While acknowledging that subjectivity occurs in selecting persons and situations and aspects of them, once those choices are made, the filmmakers do not direct or participate in, or even influence (they contend), the scene in any way. The presence of the camera is soon taken for granted by the subjects, it is argued—ignored mostly, sometimes forgotten altogether. In this approach, the relationship between filmmakers and subject persons must be relaxed and trusting in order for the filmmaking to fit into ongoing action without affecting it. In addition to his astonishing talent as a cinematographer, Leacock was especially adept at winning confidence from the people he was shooting; a warm and engaging person, he could be confident and unassuming with his camera and the people in front of it.

Primary and On the Pole (both 1960) were produced by Drew Associates for Time-Life Broadcasting. These undirected sync-sound records of the Wisconsin presidential Democratic primary contest between Hubert Humphrey and John F. Kennedy, and of the Indianapolis automobile race, following driver Eddie Sachs, were shown on five stations owned by Time, Inc.

ABC-TV was sufficiently impressed by these films to hire Drew Associates to produce four one-hour documentaries for its Close-Up series (Yanki No!, X-Pilot, The Children Were Watching, and Adventures on the New Frontier), which aired in 1960–1. The first had to do with anti-Americanism in Latin America. The subject of the second is the final test flight of a new airplane and the personality of the test pilot. The third was shot in New Orleans during one week of a school integration crisis; it presents the attitudes of white segregationists and their effects on a black family whose daughter is supposed to be one of the first to attend a previously all-white school. Finally, Adventures on the New Frontier presents ‘a day in the life’ of President John F. Kennedy in the White House. (Leacock was heavily involved in all of these except X-Pilot, during the production of which he was working on The Children Were Watching.) Other particularly distinguished Drew productions on which Leacock played a key creative role include The Chair (1962) and Crisis: Behind a Presidential Commitment (1963).

In 1963 Leacock left Drew Associates with Pennebaker and they formed a partnership. In that year he made Happy Mother’s Day, with Joyce Chopra. It was a report on the birth of quintuplets in Aberdeen, South Dakota, but during the filming the filmmakers became aware of the media and commercial exploitation occurring and made that the focus of the film. Among other important productions out of Leacock-Pennebaker were Dont Look Back (1967), which tracks Bob Dylan on a concert tour of England and deals with the singer off-stage more than on. It was followed by Monterey Pop (1968), a record of a rock festival devoted almost entirely to the performances.

In 1968 Leacock left the partnership to start teaching at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology (MIT), where he developed and crusaded for the use of Super 8 sync-sound as an even lighter-weight, more flexible, and cheaper film format than 16mm for the kind of intimate nonintrusive filmmaking to which he was committed. His limited success in extending the use of this medium was cut short by the arrival and subsequent dominance of videotape, which offered even greater ease and economy. During his MIT years, Leacock continued to make various films including Community of Praise (1981) about a religious fundamentalist family, for the Middletown series on PBS-TV, and Lulu in Berlin (1984), an interview with 1920s movie star Louise Brooks.

In 1984 he retired from MIT and settled in Paris, where he met and started working with Valérie Lalonde, entirely in video. In fact, his enthusiasm and pioneering in lighter and smaller, less conspicuous and easier-to-use equipment led him to Video-8 and then to Hi8 when that format became available. Their first tape was Les oeufs à la coque de Richard Leacock/The Soft-Boiled Eggs of Richard Leacock (1991, sixty minutes), a series of short vignettes about the French people—their love of music, food, fishing, and gossip, all punctuated by the ritual of opening and eating a soft boiled egg—which aired on French and German television.

JACK C. ELLIS

See also: Chair, The; Flaherty, Robert; Happy Mother’s Day, A; Louisiana Story; Monterey Pop; Pennebaker, D.A.; Primary

Biography

Born in the Canary Islands, July 18, 1921. Educated in England. Made his first film, Canary Bananas, in 1935. Moved to America in 1938. Attended Harvard University, class of 1943; majored in physics. US Army 1942–6, as combat photographer. Cinematographer and associate producer on Louisiana Story, 1948. Then worked freelance on numerous documentaries. From 1960 to 1963 was a member of Robert Drew Associates. Left to form Leacock-Pennebaker, Inc. 1963–8. Then became founder and head of Department of Film at Massachusetts Institute of Technology. In 1984 he retired from MIT and settled in Paris. Met and started working with Valérie Lalonde, entirely in video. Died March 23, 2011.

Further reading

- Levin, G. Roy, Documentary Explorations: 15 Interviews with Film-Makers, New York: Doubleday, 1971.
 MacCann, Richard Dyer (ed.), Film: A Montage of Theories, New York: Dutton, 1966.
 Mamber, Stephen, Cinema Verite in America: Studies in Uncontrolled Documentary, Cambridge, MA: MIT Press, 1974.

O'Connell, P.J., Robert Drew and the Development of Cinema Verite in America, Carbondale, IL: Southern Illinois University Press, 1992.

Legg, Stuart

Stuart Legg, an historian by training and inclination, brought a scholarly and meticulous frame of mind to the Grierson-led documentary film movement in Britain and Canada. For most of his career he was more an aide than a commander. His strongest talent was the organization and illustration of ideas. He also contributed, like Grierson but on a much smaller scale, to the promotion and development of government and corporate sponsorship for documentary filmmaking. As a filmmaker, his most significant work was for the National Film Board of Canada during World War II.

Legg's contribution to the British documentary film movement in the 1930s lay primarily in work on projects initiated and directed by others. He edited Coalface (1935) and worked on Night Mail (1936). The Film Centre, which he cofounded with another important figure in the movement, Arthur Elton, linked government and corporate groups to filmmakers. The acclaimed Shell Film Unit grew out of this initiative.

At Grierson's suggestion, Canada's Motion Picture Bureau hired Legg in 1939 to direct two films on unemployment, The Case of Charlie Gordon and Youth is Tomorrow. While working on these unremarkable films, the National Film Board of Canada was formally established and Grierson was appointed Commissioner. Grierson immediately hired Legg as his second-in-command. With the outbreak of the war, Legg was put in charge of producing a monthly newsreel dramatizing Canada's war effort, called Canada Carries On. After about twenty films, most of them produced and edited by Legg, the series spawned the more internationally oriented The World in Action. Legg took over The World in Action; Canada Carries On was turned over to young Canadian filmmakers.

The films in both series were compilation films made from archival footage, captured enemy film, original combat footage taken by Allied cameramen, and occasional original footage. Influenced by The March of Time, which Grierson and Legg had carefully studied, the films featured extensive and often stentorian narration, and original but usually wall-to-wall music.

The films of these series embody Grierson's notion of propaganda and Legg's sense of film structure. They are hard-hitting, and they were criticized by filmmaking colleagues in Britain, who preferred the softer and more personal approach of Humphrey Jennings. Grierson, in turn, considered Jennings talented but his films effete. For Grierson, wartime propaganda should be hard-headed and rousing. However, his idea of propaganda, to which Legg subscribed, was not simplistic. The best films in the two series are well researched, strong in intellectual context, and to an extent honest; for instance, they dare to acknowledge that the enemy was formidable.

Churchill's Island (1941), one of the most successful films of the series, presents the Germans as a ferocious enemy, but the British as determined and able to repel them. The film also embodies some notions of film structure that Legg had developed. It opens and closes strongly. Sequences begin quietly, build to a crescendo, then yield to a quietly beginning new sequence that builds to a stronger crescendo. Geopolitik: Hitler's Plan for Empire (1942) also shows Germany as a formidable enemy and probably stands up even today as reliable history. The Gates of Italy (1943) expresses empathy for the Italians whose country at that time was an Axis power. The intention was to distinguish the Italian populace from the country, which was about to be invaded and, it was hoped, converted to the Allied cause. Our Northern Neighbor (1944), however, while offering a fresh perspective on the Soviet Union, glosses over unpleasanties such as the Moscow Trials. It exalts Stalin, extols the Soviet Union, and predicts a great future for the country.

Besides their sometimes overbearing tone, the main weakness in the films is that the commentary plays the dominant role. Images are used simply to illustrate the verbal argument. The images often represent deceptively what is being said in the commentary. For The Mask of Nippon, for instance, shots of Japanese swimmers in a long-distance competition are used to represent Japanese navy swimmers preparing to sabotage British ships somewhere in the Far East.

After the war, Legg returned to England and resumed his involvement with the British documentary. The most memorable of his post-NFB films is The Rival World (1955), which he produced for Shell. Directed by Bert Haanstra, this film is a gripping if technocentric account of the war between men and insects over the fruits of agriculture in Africa and the Middle East. Legg also wrote several historical books in his postwar career.

D.B. JONES

See also: Canada Carries On; Churchill's Island; Grierson, John; World in Action, The

Biography

Born in London, England, 1910. Educated at University of Cambridge. Joined the EMB Film Unit in 1932 and the General Post Office (GPO) Film Unit in 1934. Helped found the Film Centre in 1937. Joined the National Film Board of Canada in 1939 where he worked closely with Grierson in building the NFB. In 1945 joined Grierson in New York to work with The World Today. Returned to England in 1948. Produced films for Shell and other organizations. Died July 23, 1988.

Further reading

- Beveridge, James, John Grierson: Film Master, London: Macmillan, 1979.
- Ellis, Jack C., John Grierson, Carbondale, IL: Southern Illinois University Press, 2000.
- Evans, Gary, John Grierson and the National Film Board, Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1986.
- Fielding, Raymond, The March of Time, 1935-51, New York: Oxford University Press, 1978.
- Jones, D.B., Movies and Memoranda, Ottawa: Deneau, 1982.
- The Best Butler in the Business: Tom Daly of the National Film Board of Canada, Toronto, University of Toronto Press, 1996.
- Nelson, Joyce, The Colonized Eye: Rethinking the Grierson Legend, Toronto: Between the Lines, 1988.
- Sussex, Elizabeth, The Rise and Fall of the British Documentary, Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1975.
- Swann, Paul, The British Documentary Film Movement, 1926-46, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1989.

Leiser, Erwin

As a director, writer, and producer, Erwin Leiser created many interesting and provocative films over the course of a long and distinguished career. From the early 1960s most of his work was produced for movie theaters and television across Europe, Asia, and North America. He is probably best known for his films concerning the Third Reich, their propagandist movies, and Adolf Hitler's rhetoric. Primarily a documentary filmmaker, he has left an important legacy to both the cinema and society. His most famous film, Mein Kampf (1960), was rereleased in 1987, is still available, and continues to be watched and discussed by generation after generation of film spectators. The film, an international success, has been seen in hundreds of countries and is well respected by critics as a balanced but moving account.

Leiser was born on May 16, 1923 in Germany. He lived in Berlin until the age of fifteen at which time he escaped the Nazi persecution of Jews. Leiser fled to Sweden because of the 1938 anti-Semitic Nazi November Pogrom (Reichskristallnacht). Throughout his life, Leiser recounted the ways in which Jews were taken to concentration camps, synagogues were burned, and Jewish businesses were looted and seized. In Sweden, Leiser lived at a Jewish children's home in the countryside. Once he was of age Leiser attended the University of Lund in Sweden where he graduated in 1946. He became a Swedish citizen after World War II.

He became a journalist in Stockholm after college, working as the drama critic for a trade union newspaper. For eight years, beginning in 1950, he was employed by the newspaper Morgan Tidningen, which advocated social democratic politics. Leiser also worked as a literary translator by translating many poetry volumes and other German literary works into Swedish. In addition, he published an international theatre almanac. Leiser would continue to write throughout his life and produced several books and articles on many subjects including critical analyses of films made during the Nazi era.

Leiser was also involved in the broadcast industries, where he produced features for radio. In 1959 he started a career in the television industry. It was then that he had the idea for a documentary film on the crimes of the Third Reich and decided that he wanted to be a filmmaker.

In 1960 Leiser released his first film, a documentary about Germany under Hitler's domination. Leiser's original title for the film was Den blodiga tiden/Bloody Times, but Leiser retitled the film Mein Kampf. Mein Kampf is a compilation film made up of archival footage taken from newsreels and other sources in Germany and also retrieved from the vaults of Allied countries. The film demonstrates how Adolf Hitler became an important figure in German politics. Hitler's rejection from art school is revealed, as is his subsequent affiliation with different political groups. The film focuses on Hitler's rise to power via his divisive oratory, his hatred for the Jews, and his vilification of them for Germany's problems. His plans for their genocide are also revealed as the film depicts the aftermath of German atrocities in the concentration camps and throughout Europe. The voice-over narration explains the torture and war crimes in a moving but not oversensationalized manner. The film includes a good deal of footage of Adolf Hitler. It also contains footage of German Chancellor Heinrich Brüning reading a statement; he later emigrated to the United States after the Nazi party won control in 1933. Weimar Republic President Friedrich Ebert is seen reviewing troops and at his state funeral. Nazi Deputy Propaganda Minister Alfred Frauenfeld is shown meeting with Franz von Papen in Vienna, Austria. Footage of the Leader of the Nazi SA (Stormtroopers), Franz Pfeffer von Salomon, and Major General Franz von Epp is also presented. The Foreign Minister, Walther Rathenau, who was hated by the Nazis and assassinated by right-wing army officers, is seen writing at his desk. A young Dutch communist working in Germany, Marinus van der Lubbe, who was found guilty of the Reichstag Fire and executed on January 10, 1934, is shown standing trial.

The two-hour documentary was an international success with screenings in many countries. Critics praised Leiser for his objective and analytical portrayal of German history, especially Hitler's cunning use of propaganda and oratory. Mein Kampf launched Leiser's career as a documentary filmmaker and remains, some forty-four years later, a testament to Leiser's work.

In 1961 Leiser permanently relocated to Zurich, Switzerland. There he released his second film, Eichmann und das dritte Reich/Eichmann and the Third Reich, in 1961. This documentary focused on the Nazi program to eliminate the Jews. Karl Adolf Eichmann was an SS leader and Gestapo chief of the Department for Jewish Affairs from 1941 to 1945. Moreover, he was in charge of the deportation of millions of Jews to extermination camps. After the war Eichmann was arrested and detained in a US internment camp, but later escaped. He traveled to Argentina where he lived for ten years as Ricardo Klement. In 1969 he was removed from Argentina by Israeli agents, who took him to Jerusalem to stand trial for his crimes. The trial was well publicized and lasted five months, ending in mid-August 1961. Eichmann was sentenced to death and executed in 1962. Leiser's movie broadly recounts the Jewish persecution orchestrated by Eichmann while using Eichmann's trial as an interwoven backdrop. The film covers the building of concentration camps, Eichmann's 'final solution' for the extermination of the Jews and certain theories concerning race that are used to justify discrimination. The motion picture includes interviews with concentration camp survivors, as well as footage of Eichmann's trial, Adolf Hitler, Hermann Göring (Commander-in-Chief of the Luftwaffe, President of the Reichstag), Heinrich Himmler (Reich SS Leader, Chief of the German police), Joseph Goebbels (Hitler's Propaganda Minister), and Reinhard Heydrich (The Butcher of Prague).

His follow-up film to Eichmann was Leiser's first color film, the fifty-five-minute documentary, Wähle das Leben/You Must Choose Life, in 1963. In 1968 Leiser's fourth documentary, Deutschland, erwache!/Wake Up Germany! was released. Wake Up Germany! was a compilation of sequences for feature films made during Hitler's reign and used as documentary evidence of the Nazis' use of the mass media for propaganda purposes. Leiser maintained that he did not present the material with any bias so as to leave the value judgments to the audience. Also that year, Leiser published a book titled Deutschland, erwache! (translated and released in the US as Nazi Cinema in 1974). Leiser wrote this book while making Wake Up Germany! as a supplement to the movie. Despite this, his text is one of the foremost analyses on German cinema of the Nazi era and is well respected and often cited by critics and scholars. Leiser explained that because he restricted himself to feature films in his movie Deutschland, erwache!, he wrote the book so that he could broadly cover all the characteristics of Nazi cinema. As Leiser describes in his book, Joseph Goebbels wanted all German films to have a political function. As a result only about one-sixth of the German productions were overtly government propaganda. Goebbels also used feature films and newsreels to great propagandistic effect. Leiser analyses almost one hundred films in Nazi Cinema, including Riefenstahl's Triumph of the Will, Olympia, and Lowlands. Interestingly, the book also contains documents concerning four films: Triumph of the Will, Olympia, I Accuse, and Jud Süß.

After 1968 Leiser continued to make more than fifty films, including documentaries about Nazi propaganda, the Holocaust, and portraits of artists, for film and television. Leiser made three films about Dutch/American Abstract Expressionist painter Willem de Kooning, and three films about Nobel Prize Laureate author Isaac Bashevis Singer. Leiser's works include Zum Beispiel Fritz Lang (1968), Keine Welt für Kinder (1972), and Ich lebe in der Gegenwart—Versuch über Hans Richter (1973). In addition, Leiser made two documentaries about Hiroshima and its effects.

In 1985 he released Die Mitläufer/Following the Führer, a hybrid documentary and fictionalized drama. The film takes archival footage and juxtaposes it with scripted scenes written by Oliver Storz. The film tells the story of a group of Nazis as the war comes to a close. The world they know is coming to an end as they fight for survival and realize that they can no longer cling to their belief in Hitler or his promises for the future.

Unlike Mein Kampf, the film opened to mixed reviews; some critics found the fictional sketches too melodramatic and preachy. Others thought the film might offer a too forgiving view of the everyday Germans caught up in perpetrating the Nazi terror. Yet other critics credited Leiser for contributing once again to the historical study and analysis of the Holocaust. Also during this year at a Paris festival, Eichmann and the Third Reich was shown and during the screening a bomb went off in the theater, injuring more than a dozen people.

In the later years of his career Leiser collaborated with his spouse, Vera, on several projects for television and radio. Erwin and Vera Leiser cowrote the films Die Feuerprobe—Novemberpogrom 1938/The November Pogrom 1938 (1988) and Zehn Brüder sind wir gewesen/We Are Ten Brothers (1995). Leiser and Vera codirected three films. In 1993 Leiser made the documentary Pimpf war jeder/Everyone was a 'Pimpf'. One of the people interviewed in the film states 'Everybody was a pimpf'. This remark illustrates how the young Germans were caught up in the Nazi party. If a person was not a 'pimpf' then they were not important. This idea even affected Jewish students such as Erwin Leiser. From 1932 to 1938 Leiser attended school in Germany. In his documentary he seeks out his former classmates and interviews them. The result is a view of a group of students who either fled Germany to escape the Jewish persecution or who were thrust into the war.

In 1995 Leiser made Otto John: Eine deutsche Geschichte/Otto John: A German Story. It is the story of Otto John who was involved in the conspiracy against Hitler. After the war he worked to rebuild Germany and was involved with the prosecution team at the Nuremberg War Trials. He mysteriously disappeared in 1955 from a ceremony commemorating the failed attempt to assassinate Hitler. This documentary centers on Otto John and the mysteries and controversies surrounding his disappearance to East Germany in 1954. He was suspected of defecting to the Soviet Union, but he reappeared in West Germany in 1955. He said that the KGB kidnapped him, but he was arrested and charged with treason. Otto John's trial resulted in a four-year prison sentence. Also in 1995 Leiser made his last film, Feindbilder, which displayed various World War II propaganda movies and their messages to audiences regarding the enemy.

Besides being a prodigious filmmaker, Leiser was a film critic and an author. He provided critical analyses of films during the Nazi era in articles and books. In addition to Nazi Cinema, Leiser wrote A Pictorial History of Nazi Germany, Wahle Das Leben!, and Leben Nach Dem Überleben. In 1996 the Academy of Arts in Berlin made Leiser the head of the Film and Media Arts Section. It was a fitting tribute to this creative filmmaker's life.

DANIELLE WILLIAMS

See also: Mein Kampf

Biography

Born in Berlin, Germany on May 16, 1923. Remained in Germany until 1938; forced to leave because of the anti-Semitic Nazi November Pogrom (Reichskristallnacht). Relocated to Sweden to a Jewish children's home. Attended the University of Lund in Sweden and after graduation worked as a journalist and translator. In 1960 released his first documentary, Mein Kampf. In 1961 permanently relocated to Zurich, Switzerland. Made more than fifty documentaries for film and television through his production company, Erwin Leiser Filmproduktion. In 1995 made his last documentary but continued to work. In 1996 the Academy of Arts in Berlin made Leiser the head of the Film and Media Arts Section. On August 23, 1996, died from heart complications in Zurich, Switzerland.

Further reading

- Ascheid, Antje, Hitler's Heroines: Stardom and Womanhood in Nazi Cinema, Philadelphia, PA: Temple University Press, 2003.
- Barnouw, Eric, Documentary: A History of the Non-Fiction Film, second revised edn, New York: Oxford University Press, 1993.
- Barsam, Richard, Non Fiction Film: A Critical History, Revised and Expanded, Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press, 1992.
- Craig, Gordon A., The Germans, New York: J.P. Putnam's Sons, 1982.
- Elsaesser, Thomas, New German Cinema: A History, New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 1989.
- Murray, Bruce and Wickham, Christopher J., Framing the Past: The Historiography of German Cinema and Television, Carbondale, IL: Southern Illinois University Press, 1992.
- Sandford, John (ed.), Encyclopedia of Contemporary German Culture, New York: Routledge, 1999.

Leiterman, Douglas

Producer and director Douglas Leiterman is an important figure in both the history of documentary at large, but more specifically in the history of Canadian broadcasting as well. Best known as coproducer of the legendary CBC magazine program This Hour Has Seven Days, Leiterman and colleagues revolutionized current affairs programming with equal doses of satirical sketch comedy, hard-hitting interviews with prominent newsmakers, and particularly with large sections of the programme devoted to documentary films. Concurrent to this, Leiterman was also coproducer of the occasionally broadcast documentary series Document.

The CBC documentaries produced for these programs, usually exhibiting a clear point of view, as opposed to the traditional CBC practice of studied journalistic neutrality or 'objectivity', contributed to the then-emergent Canadian documentary aesthetic also associated with the National Film Board of Canada (NFB) as one at the forefront of socially committed and formally innovative documentary practice. Among the most important documentaries made for the CBC with Leiterman's significant participation (as producer, director, or executive producer) are One More River (aka Report on the Mood of the South Nine Years After the Supreme Court Ordered Integration with All Deliberate Speed, 1964), which featured an interview with Malcolm X, and the Beryl Fox-directed The Mills of the Gods: Viet Nam, an intensely moving portrait of the effects of the Vietnam War on both the American servicemen fighting there and the local peasantry. Another notable documentary from the period is The Chief, a portrait of former Canadian Prime Minister John Diefenbaker, by Leiterman and Fox (which aired on March 25, 1964 and January 31, 1965). This film, like so many of the excellent documentaries of the period, takes full advantage of the technological innovations of recently devised more portable equipment to catch images of heightened immediacy, such as in this case, fishing with Diefenbaker where his apparently more natural persona seems to emerge.

Despite the huge popularity of This Hour Has Seven Days, which arguably resulted from Leiterman and his collaborators' (particularly Patrick Watson) desire to make current affairs broadcasting relevant and exciting, it was cancelled by the CBC because of the controversy that surrounded the program. Much of this controversy was attributable to the clear social agenda of the interviews and documentary reports, a condition that did not jibe with then-prevalent standards of journalistic objectivity. In one celebrated moment the program interviewed hooded members of the Ku Klux Klan. An African American Civil Rights leader was presented and the Klansmen were invited to shake hands with him. Refusing, they walked off the set.

After his dismissal by the CBC (the other creative forces behind the program were fired as well), Leiterman was hired by CBS television where his recommendations led to the creation of 60 Minutes.

Leiterman is author of a book, Canadian Culture at the Crossroads: Film, Television and the Media in the 1960s, from his lecture at the Wendy Michener Symposium at York University in Toronto.

PETER URQUHART

Biography

Born in South Porcupine, Ontario, Canada, in 1927. Brother of celebrated cinematographer Richard Leiterman.

Further reading

Leiterman, Douglas, Canadian Culture at the Crossroads: Film, Television and the Media in the 1960s, Toronto, Ontario: ECW Press, 1989.

Lelouch, Claude

A self-proclaimed ‘cine-reporter’ who spent much of his early career making documentary films, the prolific French filmmaker Claude Lelouch has nevertheless been most commonly associated with ‘schmaltzy’ melodramas and overlong epics. This reflects a critical bias that does injustice not only to the writer/director/producer/cinematographer’s many forays into other genres (such as comedy, action-adventure, the biopic, literary adaptation, the western, and, above all, the heist film), but also to his intuitive knack for distilling the essence of a given situation in nonfiction shorts. True, the romantic contrivances of such films as Un homme qui me plaît/Love is a Funny Thing (1969) and La Belle histoire/The Beautiful Story (1992) weigh heavily against the subtle, self-reflexive stylings of his documentary films; and yes, Lelouch exuded a Spielberg-like sentimentality and nostalgia in his most box office-friendly films. However, one should not overlook Lelouch’s contributions to the field of documentary, nor dismiss him as only a commercial filmmaker catering to mainstream tastes.

Before forming his own production company (Les Films 13) and making his feature-length film debut with Le Propre de l’homme/The Right of Man (1960) (a copy of which the director claims to have destroyed), Lelouch cut his teeth on a handful of short films—USA en vrac, Une ville pas comme les autres, Quand le rideau se lève—not to mention a series of educational documentaries for the armed services detailing everything from SOS helicopters to data-processing. Although far removed from the types of melodramatic features Lelouch would direct in the mid-to-late 1960s, these industrial films gave him a great deal of technical proficiency—something that he showed off between 1960 and 1965, when he made roughly two hundred and fifty publicity films and scopitones. Each of these petites chansons, or mini-musicals, ran for approximately two-to-three minutes and can be seen as forerunners of today’s music videos.

In 1965 Unifrance Film commissioned Lelouch to make a cinematic portrait of Jean-Paul Belmondo, the Bogart-like star of A bout de souffle/Breathless (1960) and Le doulos/The Finger Man (1963). Designed to promote French cinema worldwide, this twelve-minute biopic, appropriately titled Jean-Paul Belmondo, treats its famously fickle subject as a man of sports and leisure, a kind of everyman rather than a celebrity. That same year, Lelouch also made a thirty-five-minute documentary about the Tour de France bike race entitled Pour un maillot jaune/For a Yellow Jersey (1965) (the title of the film refers to the garb worn by lead riders). As a textbook example of how to tell a story through colorful mise-en-scène, dynamic editing, and expressive sound effects, Pour un maillot jaune was widely shown in fledgling film schools throughout Europe and South America during the latter half of the 1960s.

The emphasis on human velocity and personal achievement in Pour un maillot jaune—themes accentuated through the speed and fluid movement of Lelouch’s camera—set the stage for his subsequent forays into the world of sports, beginning with his documentary about the 1968 Winter Olympics, Treize jours en France/Thirteen Days in France (1968). Extensively chronicling the games held in Grenoble from February 6 to 18, Lelouch and codirector François Reichenbach intercut footage of the biathlon, bobsledding, and downhill slalom competitions with the heroic victories of ice skater Peggy Fleming and other gold medallists. This focus on Olympic winners was eventually balanced by Lelouch’s interest in losers, a topic he explored in his ten-minute contribution to Visions of Eight (1973), an omnibus film about the 1972 Munich games produced by David Wolper and featuring the works of such directors as Milos Forman, John Schlesinger, and Arthur Penn.

Before making ‘The Losers’, Lelouch had contributed to another omnibus film, Loin du

Vietnam/Far from Vietnam (1967). Along with directors Joris Ivens, Alain Resnais, William Klein, Agnès Varda, and Jean-Luc Godard, Lelouch points up some of the ideological inconsistencies of the US government as it intervenes in yet another Asian conflict involving communism. Ironically, Lelouch's narrated sequence, which depicts American sailors loading bombs on an aircraft carrier, is reminiscent of the educational films he shot for the French military between 1957 and 1960. Forgoing politics for his next documentary, he directed the unconventional travelogue Iran (1971), a film notable for its lack of dialogue and narration. He had also shot a nonfiction piece on motorcycle racing entitled Un Après-midi avec des motos (1972).

Despite being stylistically innovative, none of these shorts could have prepared audiences for Lelouch's most notorious piece of cinéma vérité. While wrapping up production on Si c'était à refaire/If I Had to Do it All Over Again (1976), the director—left with about nine minutes of unshot film and a few days remaining on his rented equipment—hatched a harebrained scheme: with just three hundred meters of celluloid at his disposal, and without the aid of special effects or optical tricks, Lelouch would film a Ferrari 365 driving through the City of Lights at breakneck speeds, from the Périphérique to the Sacré-Coeur. Clocking in at a mere eight minutes and fifty seconds, and consisting of a single, unbroken shot taken from the front bumper of the car as it careens through the streets of Paris, C'était un Rendez-vous/Rendezvous (1976) is one of the simplest yet most elaborately staged documentaries in film history, a true cinematic curio, the production of which has become the stuff of underground legend. Shrouded in mystery for years, subject to the kind of rhapsodic hypothesizing that only Lelouch himself could settle (was he in fact behind the wheel or was it the famed Formula One driver Jacques Laffitte?), Rendezvous moves documentary filmmaking into the sphere of moral ambiguity and phenomenological uncertainty, strapping the spectator into a first-person perspective so perilously close to death that even contemporary audiences weaned on extreme sports, 'jackass'-style stunts, and racecam footage might recoil.

Several myths swirl around the production of this film, which is at once exhilarating, enthralling, shocking, and reprehensible. Allegedly arrested on the grounds that he endangered the lives of pedestrians (not to mention pets and pigeons), Lelouch was in fact given only a slap on the wrist by a sympathetic chief of police whose children, he claimed, adored the film. Although screenings were subsequently halted for fear that audiences susceptible to its visceral power might pull similar stunts, the film continued to circulate on the black market, where pirated prints and murky, third-generation videotape bootlegs could be procured at exorbitant prices. Finally, twenty-five years after the film's theatrical release, Moving Picture Company acquired a duplicate print, restored it, and helped produce a DVD of Rendezvous, giving thousands of curious cinephiles and motorcar enthusiasts the opportunity to see this miniature masterpiece and form their own opinions about its perceived political incorrectness.

What at first glance appears to be an anomaly in Lelouch's oeuvre might in fact be the summation of his career—a streamlined side-project of a self-professed speed freak that consolidates many of the persistent themes and images for which the director has become famous. Life, love, and death (to borrow the title of his 1968 film La Vie, l'amour, la mort) are obvious themes. More specifically, criminality, anarchism, and even romance (witness the titular meeting at the film's dénouement, when the female companion advances toward the vehicle from the steps of the Sacré-Coeur) are all inscribed in Rendezvous, thus situating it in various generic contexts. Although shorn of Lelouch's trademark excess (in terms of style and length), Rendezvous is, like all of his films, about a man and a woman. Un homme et une femme/A Man and a Woman (1966), Lelouch's soapy international breakthrough starring Jean-Louis Trintignant as a race car driver who teaches his son to drive his Mustang convertible and who—after having a near-fatal accident at Le Mans—participates in the Monte Carlo Motor Rally, is only the most obvious precursor—a film in which the Jacky Ickx-like protagonist says that 'the throb of the motor [...] is something you can feel throughout your entire body'. Another film, La Bonne année/Happy New Year (1973), finds Lelouch's characters preparing for a jewelery heist by clocking a Mercedes Benz as it speeds through Cannes at ninety-five miles per hour. The soundtrack, like that of Rendezvous, consists of screeching tires, as well as a ticking stopwatch and voice-over keeping time as the car goes from shop to boat dock in just over one minute.

Speeding past red lights and landmarks like the Louvre, Lelouch in Rendezvous provides a kind of whiplash ethnography, a travelog tapping into the visceral thrills first unleashed at the turn of the twentieth century by documentarians such as Auguste and Louis Lumière (many of whose actualities were shot from horse-drawn and electric carriages giving viewers a street-level view of Paris). In contrast to the fly-on-the-wall approach of direct cinema filmmakers, Lelouch—who has said that he does most of his thinking in cars—gives us a fly-on-the-wind-shield look at a world quickly passing by. This is just one of the unique and compelling ways in which his documentaries literally move us.

DAVID SCOTT DIFFRIENT

Selected films

- 1957 Vol des hélicoptères en haute montagne
- 1958 Carte mécanographique de l'armée de l'air
- 1959 La guerre du silence
- 1960 S.O.S. hélicoptère
- 1963 La Femme spectacle/Night Women/Paris in the Raw
- 1965 Jean-Paul Belmondo
- 1965 Pour un maillot jaune/For a Yellow Jersey
- 1967 Loin du Vietnam/Far from Vietnam
- 1968 Treize jours en France/Thirteen Days in France
- 1971 Iran
- 1972 Un Après-midi avec des motos
- 1973 'The Losers' (episode in Visions of Eight)
- 1976 C'était un Rendez-vous/Rendezvous

Further reading

- Guidez, Guylaine, Claude Lelouch, Paris: Saeghers, 1972.
- Lelouch, Claude and Chatrier, Jean-Philippe, Itinéraire d'un enfant très gale, Paris: Editions Robert Laffont, 2000.
- Lev, Peter, Claude Lelouch, Film Director, Rutherford, NJ: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 1983.

Lessons of Darkness

(Germany, Herzog, 1992)

Many films by contentious filmmaker Werner Herzog fluctuate between fiction and documentary, but little in his output, and perhaps in the history of film images, had suggested this film. In a prelude to its twelve sections, the opening chord of Wagner's Das Rheingold materializes from the credits, we see a landscape of swirling mist, and as a figure gestures in the distance, Herzog's voice intones: 'The first creature we encountered tried to communicate something to us.' The profilmic event is a mystery, but the accents are established from the outset: (operatically mounted) mythology shrouds a narrative that is part science fiction, and human figures are dwarfed and hermetically cut off, indicating a screen operating between subject matter and filmmakers.

It gradually emerges that we are in the clean-up phase of the Gulf War, with the prehistory of the war itself disposed of in forty seconds of CNN footage. Before that we are introduced to an eerily lit aerial view of 'A Capital City', largely empty. This is Kuwait City. The bulk of the film visually documents the attempt to extinguish oil well fires, with section headings such as 'Satan's National Parks', or 'A Dinosaur's Feast', and a passage from the biblical Book of Revelations, continuing the defiance of mainstream documentary modes.

There are concessions to the latter, with a handheld camera cataloguing implements in torture chambers, and two brief interviews with women victims of the war. Background traffic noises convey postwar life going on, punctuating the long silences of the interviewees. The first woman interviewed is unable to form words, communicating through gestures and facial grief, while the second holds her son who has been silent since being trampled on by soldiers. The norm in this film is the absence of people, and slow tracking shots of wrecks in a desert landscape, or of infernos of oil, burning with a terrible beauty. The only other close-up figures, by the end, are the firefighters, and as their fight with the elements dominates the soundtrack, any potential for analysis is bypassed.

Elements of unpredictability are also removed, with the Olympian vantage point of the camera and the (slender) narration. What we see is not even viewed as an exemplar of some kind of modern warfare. The specific historical moment, the aftermath of the Gulf War, is present in virtuosic imagery, but the 'reality' it represents is the normal domain of fiction, a staging of the Apocalypse, and of Herzog's private apocalypse. The aerial shots disorient us in what becomes a mythical landscape. Huge earthmoving equipment is viewed like a pre-historic monster. When images of the workers finally become clearer toward the end, slow-motion shots stylize them. The film confirms Baudrillard's notion that the Gulf War did not take place, but in a different sense. Dismissing the CNN images of a virtual reality, it recasts the event as an historical myth. It achieves this not least through a prominent soundtrack, many of whose musical examples function narratively as a dirge or lamentation for the West (for example, Death of Ase from Peer Gynt, the Verdi Requiem, Siegfried's Funeral Music from Wagner's Ring).

Music plays a far more prominent role than spoken commentary, absent for over half the film, and in places it yields only to the greater volume of sound effects, such as jets of water extinguishing fire. The music's national provenance seems secondary, and the prevailing sense is of spectacle, to match the slanting of the breathtaking images. The opening Rheingold Prelude is appropriate in dramatic and possibly in narrative terms, with the archetypal lust for gold conceivably matched by the contemporary greed for oil. Far less obvious is the choice of the Parsifal prelude in the section 'After the Battle'. This creates an absolute narrative discrepancy between image and sound. The camera alone is 'questing' as it tracks a static, battle-scarred landscape, which suffers the Wagnerian sound to wash over it until some sense of the non-aestheticized origin of these images is restored, as wind swirls and blends with the music toward the end.

With Lessons of Darkness, the Germanic song lines of war-tarnished Wagner have been overhauled by Wagner as world music, as harbinger of doom, but without strongly Nordic overtones. Whether consciously or not, the breadth of the original Ring-myth is reinstated after the strait-jacketing of its reception by Nazi Germany. Wagner is associated with obsequies for the West, in a war that signaled debate about unified Germany's military obligations under its return to the world stage. The rainbow bridge transporting these gods to Valhalla bears the hues of the nations of the Western alliance, and no longer just the colors of Germany.

Cultural memory is also cinematic memory, which in turn involves musical memory. Inasmuch as cultural memory can be documented, this film is a documentary beyond the subject of its visuals. The ultimate irony is that Herzog's images do not obscure the political reality for differently directed political, but for apolitical purposes. Therein lies perhaps a kinship with the self-defense of that other great, but suspect, image-maker of German cinema, Leni Riefenstahl, who in turn is overshadowed by the historically fluctuating presence of Wagner. This trio exemplify the problem of art and politics in Germany; they 'document' a nation's self-reckoning, beyond Herzog's aspirations to an ethnography of others.

ROGER HILLMAN

See also: Herzog, Werner; Riefenstahl, Leni

Lektionen in Finsternis/Lessons of Darkness (Coproduction by Premiere, BBC Television, Canal plus France, Canal plus Spain, and ITTEL, 1992, 51 mins). Distributed by U/A Films. Produced by Paul Berriff and Werner Herzog. Directed by Werner Herzog. Writing credits Werner Herzog. Cinematography by Paul Berriff and Rainer Klausmann. Music by Arvo Pärt, Edvard Grieg, Gustav Mahler, Sergei Prokofiev, Franz Schubert, Giuseppe Verdi, and Richard Wagner. Edited by Rainer Standke. Filmed in Kuwait.

Further reading

- Hogue, Peter, 'Genre-busting. Documentaries as Movies', Film Comment 32/4, July–August 1996: 56–60.
- MacDonald, Scott, The Garden in the Machine: A Field Guide to Independent Films about Place, Berkeley, CA: University California Press, 2001: 324–8.
- Pawelczak, Andy, Films in Review 47/1–2, January–February 1996: 63–4.
- Vogel, Amos, Film Comment, May–June 1992: 70.

Leyda, Jay

A genuine if largely unsung renaissance man, Jay Leyda produced a vitae that gives the impression that he was a dabbler, a world traveler always moving on to new things. Such a cursory glance, however, glosses over his achievements before moving between points, and his adaptability along the way. It is no surprise that he should have gone to Moscow to study with Sergei Eisenstein for, like him, Leyda is a classic example of the artist-scholar, one whose practice flows naturally out of a wide, synthetic interest in the arts and an equally strong one in history and politics. The practice of one's art is difficult to sustain, and political art even more so. Leyda's achievements in documentary, though done over a brief period of time, span the avant-garde (A Bronx Morning), political reportage (China Strikes Back), and social protest (People of the Cumberland). He was creative in other venues as well, writing short stories, poetry, and even the libretto for an opera. In many ways, though, it was through scholarship that Leyda was able to speak with even more clarity. Having encountered and been enamored of great artists, he gravitated toward the study of them. An historian by inclination, and one who was present at a seminal happening in film history, he felt the need to document not only Eisenstein's career and that glorious early moment in Soviet film, but also the underrepresented areas of film history. Hence we have his Dianying, the first work on Chinese cinema in English; Films Beget Films, his novel approach to the documentary subgenre of the compilation film; and a number of articles on film history and criticism.

Leyda first encountered many key works in documentary and experimental photography and film via camera magazines he avidly read as a boy. Moving to New York City as the Depression began, he found work as an assistant to Ralph Steiner in the darkroom and in the making of experimental short films. Between 1931 and 1933, he began to exhibit and publish notable work in portrait photography, especially pictures of fellow artists, and it is likely that he then first became involved with the photography branch of the Film and Photo Leagues of the Workers' International Relief. He also purchased a camera and made his first film, A Bronx Morning. It received a premiere in 1932 at the noted Julian Levy gallery that had also exhibited Leyda's photography but was not widely exhibited. Leyda himself tended to dismiss his eleven-minute initial effort as too formalistic, but its stature has grown in recent years. Playful in its experiments with framing, camera movement, and shot transitions, and clearly influenced by other city symphonies and key Soviet works (even if Leyda had only seen stills of them), the film vividly portrays the suffering engendered by the Depression even while it celebrates an open-air, multiethnic, urban culture. The film also played a vital role in enabling one of the most important periods of Leyda's life: it was part of the portfolio that gained him acceptance to the Moscow Film School.

Leyda's Moscow years (1933–6) and his close studies and working relationship with Eisenstein shaped his entire life. In 1934 he met and married his wife of more than fifty years, dancer-choreographer Si-lan Chen. The production records, stills, teaching materials, writing, and firsthand working experience—especially on Eisenstein's never-completed Bezhin Meadow—provided Leyda with inspiration for his own artistic practice and the wellspring for his prodigious scholarship. After returning to the United States, Leyda worked for the Museum of Modern Art and later served as a consultant on Russia for Hollywood productions, but ties to communism would dog him for years. In fact, in his affiliation with the leftist filmmaking collective Nykino and the later Frontier Films, Leyda was compelled to use a pseudonym, Eugene Hill. The editing lessons he had learned under Eisenstein, as well as a sense of political urgency that had matured since A Bronx Morning, were applied in his work for Frontier Films co-editing China Strikes Back (1937). Harry Dunham had been the first photographer to get key footage of communists in China, and it was up to the editors to both shape the material and keep it timely, given how changes were occurring so quickly at that time. In twenty-three minutes the film effectively chronicles the war between China and Japan, the fall of Manchuria, life under occupation, and the preparation of the Chinese people for successful resistance and counterattack.

Leyda played an even more prominent role in one of Frontier's finest efforts, People of the Cumberland (1937), codirecting with Sidney Meyers (credited as 'Robert Stebbins'). Made with the aid of the founders of the famous Highlander Folk School, the film had an impressive crew: Steiner photographed it, Elia Kazan was an assistant, Erskine Caldwell helped to write the commentary, and Alex North provided the score. People chronicles the struggles of impoverished folk, some of them fifth-generation Americans, who work in the mines and mills of the Cumberland Mountains. Following the typical structure and content of Frontier's documentaries (Campbell 1978), the film establishes the lives and problems of the community; shows the hope that the school brings; includes a stylized, atypically dramatized section recreating the murder of a union organizer; then rallies strongly as the community presses on in its daily work, celebrations, and union activism. The location shoot faced technical limitations, evident in the many static shots and the attempts to get around the lack of synchronized sound, but the often splendid framing and composition, the telling details in the workers' lives, and the sympathetic and progressive urgency yield one of the warmest and most accessible political documentaries of the era.

Although late in life Leyda offered support or did interviews and voice-overs for documentaries on Eisenstein and Edwin S. Porter, his production work essentially ended with the Depression. Scholarly work, and later university teaching, fully occupied the rest of his career. He wrote biographies of Emily Dickinson and Rachmaninoff, edited volumes of Melville's fiction and a documentary 'log' of his correspondence, and translated Musorgsky. In film studies his greatest contribution would ultimately prove to be one of his earliest—compiling, translating, and editing Eisenstein's theories into the landmark twin volumes, The Film Form and The Film Sense. Invited to pursue archival research in France, Germany, Russia, and China, Leyda produced such works as Kino, still one of the standard histories of Russian and Soviet film. His championing of documentary can be found throughout his oeuvre, from the actualities and government-sponsored works described in Dianying, to the attention he brought to artists from Esfir Shub, to the German team of Andrew and Annelie Thorndike in his work on compilation documentaries. Finally, in his tenure at NYU's department of cinema studies, he offered seminars on Griffith and early cinema, Eisenstein and Soviet film, and theories of documentary and filmic fiction, inspiring a generation of scholars, doubtless in much the same way his early teachers had done for him.

DAVID M. LUGOWSKI

See also: Bronx Morning, A

Biography

Born in Detroit, Michigan February 12, 1910. Moved to New York City, worked for photographer Ralph Steiner 1930. First published and exhibited own photographs 1931–2. Helped organize the Film Society and the Film Forum 1933. Accepted for study at Moscow Film School 1933. Became assistant curator, film department, Museum of Modern Art, New York 1936. Founded quarterly magazine, Films, 1938. Edited, translated, and published collection of Eisenstein's essays, Film Form, 1941–2. Moved to California when hired by Warner Brother as consultant on Russian subjects 1941–2. Began translations of Musorgsky (later published as The Musorgsky Reader) 1943–4. Reconstructed Herman Melville's correspondence, co-authored biography of Rachmaninoff 1945–6. Guggenheim Fellowships for biography of Emily Dickinson 1948–9. Wrote libretto for Walter Aschaffenburg opera, Bartleby 1950–2. Invited by Cinemathèque Française to write history of Soviet film 1955. Invited to China to work in newly founded Chinese Film Archive 1959. Moved to Germany to work at Staatliches Filmarchiv der DDR 1964–9. Fellow, Ezra Stiles College, Yale University 1969–70. Professor of Fine Arts, York University 1970–3. Gottesman Professor of Cinema Studies, New York University 1974–87. Died February 15, 1988.

Selected films

- | | |
|--------|---|
| 1932 | A Bronx Morning: director, cinematographer, editor |
| 1935–6 | Bezhin Meadow (Eisenstein): assistant director, casting assistant, still photographer, production historian |
| 1937 | China Strikes Back (no director; photography by Harry Dunham): coeditor (credited as 'Eugene Hill'), with Irving Lerner and Sidney Meyers |
| 1937 | People of the Cumberland (codirector, Sidney Meyers): codirector (credited as 'Eugene Hill') |
| 1943 | Mission to Moscow (Michael Curtiz): consultant |

Further reading

- The New York Times* obituary February 18, 1988.
- Alexander, William, Film on the Left: American Documentary Film from 1931 to 1942, Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1981.
- Campbell, Russell, Cinema Strikes Back: Radical Film-making in The United States 1930–42, Ann Arbor, MI: UMI Research Press, 1978.
- The Editors, 'Jay Leyda: A Brief Chronology' and 'Jay Leyda: A Bibliography', October 11, winter, 1979.

- Horak, Jan-Christopher (ed.), Lovers of Cinema: The First American Avant-Garde, 1919–45, Madison, WI: University of Wisconsin Press, 1995.
- Leyda, Jay (ed.), The Melville Log: A Documentary Life of Herman Melville, 1819–91, New York: Harcourt Brace, 1951 (reprinted with additions, New York: Gordian Press, 1969).
- Kino: A History of the Russian and Soviet Film, New York: Macmillan, 1960.
- Films Beget Films: A Study of the Compilation Film, New York: Hill and Wang, 1964.
- Dianying (Electric Shadows): An Account of Films and the Film Audience in China, Cambridge, MA: MIT Press, 1972.
- Leyda, Jay, Tomlinson, Doug and Hagan, John, Film Makers Speak: Voices of Film Experience, New York: Da Capo Press, 1988.
- Leyda, Jay and Voynow, Zina, Eisenstein at Work, New York: Pantheon Books/Museum of Modern Art, 1982.

Life and Death of Frida Kahlo, The

(US, Crommie, 1976)

David Crommie was working as a film director at a television station in San Francisco and his wife Karen was writing scripts for a children's program when they saw an item in a travel book about the Frida Kahlo museum and decided to visit it. Overwhelmed with the setting and her paintings, they decided upon their return to make a film about Frida Kahlo. Before this time, David had little experience with photography or cinematography, but he borrowed a camera (a Bolex wind-up with a running time for each shot of twelve seconds) from a cameraman in the newsroom of the station where he worked, a tripod from someone else, and a tape recorder from another friend. On their return to San Francisco, David and Karen rented some editing equipment and Karen assembled the film and made the first edit with a pair of rewinds and a viewer, which David admits was 'crude stuff by today's standards'. At the television station where he worked, David finished the editing, and the couple entered the film in the San Francisco Film Festival's Documentary division, where it won a top prize.

Shooting on a very tight budget, the Crommies bought rolls of film one or two at a time. Having begun filming in the museum in black and white, they realised that they could do justice to the paintings only by filming them in color. It was still beyond their budget to shoot the whole film in color film, however, so the documentary uses a combination of black and white and color footage, a pragmatic decision that makes for a stunning visual combination of life in monotones, art in colour. Even in Mexico, Kahlo was not particularly well known at that time and her paintings were not particularly valuable, so the Crommies hired an investigator to trace the paintings in private collections. The couple did not have adequate lights and so would take the paintings off the wall and put them in natural light somewhere either outside or by a window to photograph them.

The Life and Death of Frida Kahlo is a powerful example of how low-budget documentary making can nonetheless be extremely authentic. The titles are written in a Kahlo-esque style, using a script that imitates Kahlo's own hand. Interviews conducted in Spanish are left in the original language and subtitled rather than dubbed, which would remove the immediacy and emotion of the original voices. There are no shots of the speakers' faces. This is a film of and about Kahlo, and so the interviews are used as a soundtrack to the stills of Kahlo, her friends and family, and the filmed footage of her paintings and her home. For example, the story of Kahlo's miscarriage is narrated by close friend Lucienne Bloch over the visual track of the works that Frida painted in the wake of the misfortune as an expression of her grief, such as Henry Ford Hospital (Oil on Metal, 1932), which shows her bleeding in the hospital with a dead foetus, umbilical cord still attached floating above her. The result is an extremely painful and emotive sequence that privileges the autobiographical nature of Frida's art above a simple recounting of her story.

This marriage of life and art is essential to a depiction of Kahlo, whose work was extremely autobiographical. The film places Kahlo's paintings in relation to the specific events of her life: her relationship with Diego, her inability to give birth, her illness and, of course, her death. At no point is Frida Kahlo's artistic prowess sacrificed to her extraordinary life story, however. Generally speaking, the visual track focuses on the former while the soundtrack gives us the latter, so that the two aspects are resolved via the film's complementary elements. There are of course exceptions to this approach. The film incorporates numerous stills of Frida and her contemporaries, as well as filmed footage of her home, now transformed into a museum. There is also an extended discussion of Frida's artworks themselves. Her paintings are not merely illustrations, but are one of the documentary's primary subjects. Fellow artists and art critics, including Pablo O'Higgins and Raquel Tibol, comment on Kahlo's use of surrealist style and look at her use of various artistic media, stating that 'the Mexican movement could not be considered complete without Frida Kahlo'.

The Crommies' film has its flaws: it is basic, to say the least; the camera work is shaky and the film quality is poor in parts. It is somewhat polemical, making an extremely positive portrayal of Kahlo, and in compressing thirty years of Kahlo's life and work into a forty-minute film, it barely scratches the surface of her story. However, at the same time the Crommies use a number of simple camera techniques to great effect. For example, the camera constantly mimics Kahlo's method of beginning her paintings in the upper-left-hand corner of the canvas and moving to the lower left, so that most of her paintings are revealed to us as they were to her. They also use the technique of segueing from a photo to one of Frida's paintings, a device much imitated in later fictionalised accounts of Kahlo's life, such as Julie Taymor's 2002 Frida. The effect of such a technique is greatest when there is a slight disjunction between the camera's objectivity and Kahlo's subjectivity. A photo of Diego that matches his description on the soundtrack as an 'ugly big fat man' is juxtaposed with Kahlo's portrait of him, in which his eyes show us the 'gentle, tender, wise' man that his wife saw.

The Crommies succeeded in their ultimate goal: to draw the spotlight of the world's attention onto Kahlo. The film's release coincided with the time of the women's movement in the United States. Colleges and universities began to play it and then art movie houses picked it up. When Hayden Herrera saw it at a screening in New York, she contacted the couple for further information and was motivated to write her seminal autobiography of Kahlo. With the release of Herrera's book, Frida became a cult figure. Other books, theses, and films followed.

The film itself and the taped interviews conducted in preparation for the project are invaluable sources of information for any Kahlo scholar, featuring many people who knew and worked with Frida and who are no longer alive. More important, though, The Life and Death of Frida Kahlo is a potent example of the power that low-budget documentary making can have.

Frida Kahlo was almost completely unknown outside of major art circles when Karen and David Crommie's The Life and Death of Frida Kahlo debuted in 1966 at the San Francisco International Film Festival. As a result of the film, the originality and power of Kahlo's paintings has been recognised, and she has become a figure of international acclaim. In 1984 the Mexican government decreed Frida's work to be national patrimony, because it has 'an unquestioned aesthetic value and has reached unanimous recognition within the artistic community'. It is doubtless due, in no small part, to David and Karen Crommie that Frida Kahlo has finally achieved such long-overdue recognition.

CATHERINE WHEATLEY

Selected films

The Life and Death of Frida Kahlo (US, 1966/1976, 40 mins). Distributed by Karen and David Crommie. Produced by Karen and David Crommie. Directed by Karen and David Crommie. All additional work by Karen and David Crommie.

- 1986 Frida, naturaleza viva (directed by Paul LeDuc)
- 1989 Diego: I Paint What I See (directed by Mary Lance)
- 1992 Frida Kahlo: A Ribbon Around a Bomb (directed by Ken Mandel)
- 2000 Frida Kahlo's Corset (dir. Liz Crow)
- 2002 Frida (directed by Julie Taymor)

Further reading

- Herrera, Hayden, Frida: The Biography of Frida Kahlo, London: Bloomsbury, 1998.
- , Frida Kahlo: The Paintings, London: HarperPerennial, 1993.
- Kahlo, Frida, The Diary of Frida Kahlo: An Intimate Self-Portrait, ed. Sarah Lowe and Carlos Fuentes, New York: Harry N. Abrams Inc., 1998.

Life and Times of Rosie the Riveter, The

(US, Field, 1980)

Connie Field's The Life and Times of Rosie the Riveter is one of the most accomplished and well known of the exercises in popular historiography that characterised women's filmmaking in the 1970s and 1980s. The film tells the story of women workers in industry during World War II by following the personal accounts of five women, three of whom are black. The film's title comes from the popular typification of such workers, derived from a Norman Rockwell cover for the Saturday Evening Post in May 1943, which depicted a muscular but still 'feminine' worker at her lunch break, the word Rosie emblazoned on her lunchbox.

Using a weave of interviews and archive footage, Rosie the Riveter tells the story of how women were recruited to fill the ranks of depleted male workers in the factories and assembly lines during the war. The five women highlighted in the film have both a personal, subjective dimension and a more objective expositional function through which they become indicative of a more general process. The women's stories, illustrated by historical images, recount how women were recruited into the labour force as necessary adjuncts to the war effort, as well as the difficulties and the joys of being part of a formerly male domain. The interviewees describe how they battled dangerous working conditions, institutionalised sexism and racism, and in many cases shouldered the 'double burden' of domestic responsibility endemic to women's working lives. The story is also one of success and achievement, recounted with justified pride.

The film's strategy of interweaving the personal and the general is articulated through the introduction of the five women in the title sequence, freeze-framed and identified by caption, which opens out into a three-part structure illustrating wartime recruitment into industry, experience of wartime industrial work, and postwar return to domesticity or more traditional roles in the workforce. The interviewees are first introduced via brief prewar biographies; their stories then unfold through a series of extensive interviews that mark them as both observers and participants in the historical process they describe. Throughout the film, the women's accounts of their experiences are intercut with a range of archival footage, much of it drawn from official US propaganda footage designed first to encourage women into the labour force, and then to rationalise their displacement by men returning from the war. Newsreel sequences are also used more descriptively and positively as a way of giving a visual realisation to many of the incidents and circumstances described by the five women.

Figure 8 The Life and Times of Rosie the Riveter, 1980 (Courtesy of the British Film Institute)

The primary rhetorical usage of archival footage in Rosie the Riveter, however, is as a contrast to the testimony of the women. Rosie is a brilliant example of a film that uses historical film material not to confirm the truth of a situation but to demonstrate how truth claims can be made to support political goals. Connie Field's editing of propaganda footage against the grain, in an example of a politically motivated compilation technique, demonstrates the absurd contortions of logic required to facilitate differing government requirements (Nichols 2001). This critically comic dimension is aided by the retention of the propaganda footage's original soundtrack and the interviewees' remembering of a past at odds with the film's inserted historical images.

A number of similar films that rely on a string of interviews intercut with historical footage, such as Union Maids (1976) and With Babies and Banners (1977), have been accused of forfeiting an independent explanatory framework for the one provided by the participant-witnesses themselves, but the active counterpointing of the text in Rosie the Riveter reminds us that meaning is produced. The resonances set up between the interviews and the archival footage establish a perceptible sense of a textual voice that makes the film a more sophisticated, though not self-reflexive, version of the interview-based documentary (Nichols 1983).

Another way in which Rosie the Riveter avoids the dangers of the self-confirmatory role of the interview is through the degree of personal 'space' its participants occupy. John Corner argues that this space lends an integrity to the women's testimony, which renders it less appropriate by extra-textual intentions (Corner 1996).

In keeping with its project as a feminist recuperation of lost history, the film reveals an alternative history that lies beneath the national myth of women wartime workers. The ideology underlining official policy on the recruitment and postwar demobilisation of the female labour force is exposed as the workings of expediency and cynicism. Ultimately, however, although Rosie the Riveter raises a number of questions in relation to ideology and the official use of misinformation in relation to women and their role in the workforce, the film operates more as an elegy for a lost era of heroic women workers than as a cause for celebration.

MARINA BURKE

See also: Union Maids

The Life and Times of Rosie the Riveter (US, Charity Productions, 1980, 60 mins). Produced and directed by Connie Field. Associate producers Ellen Geiger, Lorraine Kahn, Jane Scantlebury, and Bonnie Bellow. Associate director Lorraine Kahn. Cinematography by Cathy Zeutlin, Bonnie Friedman, Robert Handley, and Emiko Omord. Edited by Lucia Massia Phenix and Connie Field.

Further reading

- Corner, John, The Art of Record: A Critical Introduction to Documentary, Manchester: Manchester University Press, 1996.
- Nichols, Bill, 'The Voice of Documentary', Film Quarterly 36, no. 6, spring 1983.
- Representing Reality: Issues and Concepts in Documentary, Bloomington, IN and Indianapolis, IN: Indiana University Press, 1991.
- Introduction to Documentary, Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press, 2001.
- Renov, Michael (ed.), Theorising Documentary, London: Routledge, 1993.
- Waldman, Diane and Walker, Janet (eds), Feminism and Documentary, Minneapolis, MN: University of Minnesota Press, 1999.
- Winston, Brian, Claiming the Real: The Documentary Film Revisited, London: British Film Institute, 1995.

Lights Out in Europe

(US, Kline, 1940)

Lights Out in Europe captures the final moments of 1939's uneasy peace and the first moments of the World War II. Director Herbert Kline, veteran of the New York Film and Photo League and an associate of Joris Ivens, intended to serve as the 'foreign correspondent' of the screen by presenting what contemporary documentarians designated 'a new genre of documentary—political film journalism'. Kline's desire to relate the effect of world events on the general population reflected the liberal social sensibilities of documentary filmmakers of the previous decade. His cinematographic collaborators brought an artistic visual touch to Lights Out in Europe, and the narration completed the effect of a film that opposed Nazi rule and decried the inhumanity of modern warfare. Criticized by some for its pacifistic tone in the face of Nazi aggression, Lights Out in Europe soon found itself appropriated (as did the documentary movement in general) by government organs seeking to illustrate their assertions of enemy barbarity and criminal guilt, and justify the war against Germany.

Herbert Kline planned to film the war as it occurred, and he did not prepare a shooting script. For his photographers, Kline again partnered with Czech filmmaker Alexander Hackenschmied (the later Alexander Hammid), his codirector for Crisis: A Film of the Nazi Way, and hired Douglas Slocombe, then a young English still photographer. Kline stationed Hackenschmied in England while he and Slocombe filmed in the free city of Danzig and in Poland. When the German military swept over the Polish border, Kline and Slocombe found themselves filming their own retreat with crowds of Polish refugees. Strafed and bombed, without proper permits from a government that no longer existed, they managed to escape to England via Riga only days before the Soviet invasion from the east. Kline returned to the continent with Hackenschmied to film in France, but encountered significant difficulties with French censors. Returning to England, Kline and Hackenschmied edited a rough cut, which they showed to an audience of documentarians assembled by John Grierson. With their colleagues' comments in mind, Kline completed the film in Los Angeles, adding James Hilton's narration, read by Fredric March, and Werner Janssen's score.

The visual style of Lights Out in Europe consists of quickly shot actuality footage augmented by some artfully composed shots. The actuality footage, visually similar to newsreels, includes tragic images of despondent villagers tossing buckets of water over their homes, now burned to ash, and Polish refugees running as German aircraft attack their train. In one shot, a woman shot through the throat slowly bleeds to death in a railway carriage. English children, bewildered and crying, struggle into gas masks; others depart the city for the countryside—tiny evacuees who might never reunite with their families. The artistic visual material demonstrated Hackenschmied's years of experience as a photographer and filmmaker, from work with Gustav Machatý to his own artistic short city film, Bezucelná procházka/Aimless Walk (1930). Traffic and pedestrians cross the fog-shrouded Thames in a sequence of careful shots using slowed motion. One shot features a layered view of the city, with passersby and advertisements in the foreground, trains moving slowly in the middle ground, and the silent form of St Paul's looming in the background. Britain's newest fighters, the graceful Spitfires, ascend and bank, and other shots of a sea of metallic interstices represent the skeletal fuselages of planes under construction.

Against this imagery, James Hilton's narration continually describes the terrible inhumanity of the coming conflagration while recalling the awful cost of World War I and associating it with the new conflict; even the title refers to a comment made in 1914. Hilton echoes the view of war and militarism expressed in his novel Lost Horizon, underscoring shots of blinded veterans and rows of crosses in military cemeteries, with speculation about the lost potential of those men and the apparent futility of their sacrifice. The narration decries Nazism, with its anti-Semitism and violence, but finally condemns the whole world for its willingness to fight a 'war to end all wars', but not to try a 'peace to end all wars'. Lights Out in Europe does not glorify Polish resistance, lionize British defense, or attempt to rally America's fighting spirit to intervention. In light of Kline's established reputation as an outspoken antifascist, the lack of a call to action against Germany surprised many. At least one reviewer accused Kline of mitigating his anti-Nazi stance, as some Communist sympathizers in America did as a result of the pact Germany signed with the Soviet Union.

The New York Times appreciated the moderate tone, lauding Lights Out in Europe as 'the most beautifully comprehensive report on the recent neurological prelude to war in existence'. Time bestowed a slightly more unusual accolade, describing the film as 'the next best thing' for 'those who cannot experience war at first hand'. However, Hollywood, having little to do with the documentary tradition from which Lights Out in Europe came, responded less warmly. In Variety, a short review near the back unjustly dismissed it as a mere compilation film of newsreel footage. Hollywood was not interested in 'political film journalism'.

After the attack on Pearl Harbor, however, Hollywood developed an interest in the potential for documentary film and found a use for Lights Out in Europe. The United States government charged famous studio directors—not experienced documentarians—to make high-profile documentaries about the outbreak of the war. John Ford made December 7th largely from reenactments, and Frank Capra supervised the assembly of footage from a liberal variety of sources to produce the Why We Fight series of Army ‘informational films’. The rhetoric of these films matched their intention: to convince US soldiers and civilians of the justice and morality of American involvement in World War II. The Why We Fight and other information films used footage from Lights Out in Europe but took nothing of the film’s humanitarian message or perspective. The National Film Board of Canada also reworked Lights Out in Europe, cutting thirty minutes of material (including all shots of military cemeteries) and inserting a new commentary over the conclusion to encourage Canadians to fight. The NFB released their film under the title Not Peace but a Sword.

The new documentaries, mobilized to support the war effort and made with Hollywood’s talent, took the vanguard previously held by liberal social subjects and activist documentarians like Kline and Ivens. As originally released, Lights Out in Europe represented one of the last efforts of their school of thought. The film presents an essay, artistically illustrated, not meant to simplify war or elicit fighting spirit, but to inform audiences of the genuine tragedy of World War II.

MICHAEL D. ROBINSON

See also: Kline, Herbert

Lights Out in Europe (US, Films for Peace, Inc., 1940, 66 mins or 68 mins). A Look (magazine); Ampix Presentation, released by Mayer-Burstyn, Inc. Produced by Herbert Kline. Associate production by Peter A. Mayer. Directed by Herbert Kline. Associate direction by Alexander Hackenschmied (as Alexander Hackenschmid) and Peter A. Mayer. Production managed by Rosa Harvan Kline. Cinematography by Alexander Hackenschmied and Douglas Slocombe, assisted by J. Massey Collier. Music by Werner Janssen. Edited by Herbert Kline. Montage by Alexander Hackenschmied. Commentary by James Hilton. Narration by Fredric March. (Not Peace but a Sword: ‘Epilogue’ by Grattan O’Leary.) Filmed in London and surrounding areas, the Free City of Danzig, Poland, and in France. ‘Sons of the Sea’, music and lyrics by B. Miles and Aaron Sachs, at the Ridgeway’s Late Joys; ‘(We’ll Hang Out the Washing on) The Siegfried Line’, music and lyrics by Jimmy Kennedy and Michael Carr, performed by Lupino Lane at the Victoria Palace, London.

Further reading

- Alexander, William, Film on the Left: American Documentary Film from 1931 to 1942, Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1981.
- Andel, Jaroslav, Alexandr Hackenschmied, Prague: Torst, 2000.
- Hilton, James and Kline, Herbert, ‘Lights Out in Europe’, Look, May 7, 1940: 24–9.
- Kline, Herbert, ‘Documentary Films in New Theatre and in My Life’, in New Theatre and Film 1934 to 1937, San Diego, CA: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1985: 306–7.
- ‘Films Without Make-Believe’, The Magazine of Art (New York), February 1, 1942: 58–63, 87–8 (reprinted in Lewis Jacobs, The Documentary Tradition, New York: Norton, 1979: 148–57).
- Slocombe, Douglas, ‘Rear-Guard Filming’, Documentary News Letter, July, 1940: 25.

Line to Tcherva Hut

(UK, Cavalcanti, 1936)

After making Coal Face (1935), Alberto Cavalcanti directed a series of seven films set in Switzerland, one of which was Line to Tcherva Hut (1936). The seven films are Line to Tcherva Hut, We Live in Two Worlds (1937), Who Writes to Switzerland? (1937), Message from Geneva (1937), Four Barriers (1937), Alice au pays romand (1938), and Men of the Alps (1939). These films, which were commissioned by the Swiss telephone company, Pro-Telephone Zurich, were commissioned as a group, and all but Line to Tcherva Hut were made after John Grierson’s departure from the General Post Office (GPO) Film Unit in 1936. Therefore, they were produced when Cavalcanti was in effective charge of the GPO Film Unit. Cavalcanti’s Swiss films are quite different from the more parodic films that he produced at the GPO Film Unit between 1936 and 1939, and far more conventional in terms of their use of linear narrative structures and continuity editing. Unlike Coal Face, they also use voice-over commentary in the traditional manner to provide information and explanation for the viewer. These films have been described as technically mature models of shooting and editing and imaginative use of sound by Paul Rotha, and it is certainly the case that in these films Cavalcanti returns to a more conventional realist tradition of filmmaking. Of these seven films, Cavalcanti's favourite was also Line to Tcherva Hut, which he preferred to one of the other films in the Swiss series, the better known We Live in Two Worlds (1937).

Line to Tcherva Hut is concerned with communication systems in Switzerland and, in particular, with the building of a telephone link to an alpine refuge hut. In classic Griersonian style the film shows the process of building the telephone link in some detail, depicting all the various stages of the process of production. The film also creates dramatic development from within the process of labour activity itself, as the telephone engineers grapple with the problems posed by precipitous drops and sheer mountainsides. In fact, in its depiction of technical, labouring, and professional skills, carried out against an imposing natural background, Line to Tcherva Hut is similar to early Empire Marketing Board Film Unit films such as Arthur Elton's The Shadow on the Mountain (1931) and Basil Wright's Windmill (1934) and Barbados (1934).

Line to Tcherva Hut combines depictions of manual labour with a lyrically evocative representation of the mountainous Swiss countryside, which emphasises the natural beauty of the landscape. A kind of lyrical naturalism pervades these scenes of high glaciers and sheer chasms, and this lyrical pastoralism is reinforced by showing the workmen who lay the telephone link as tiny insignificant figures within this dramatic environment. This mood is heightened by the musical score for the film, which was composed by Benjamin Britten. Britten's music is 'very simple', but it 'augments and contributes to an imaginative film that is a model of subtle conception, shooting and editing' (Aitken 2001, p. 85).

Some of the sequences in Line to Tcherva Hut also resemble scenes from Night Mail, made in the same year, as, for example, when in the latter film the train is seen speeding through a rolling countryside of moorland and hill country.

The same sense of atmosphere and imagery pervades both films, and it may be that, when Cavalcanti stated that he was particularly pleased with Line to Tcherva Hut, he was referring to the film's lyrical evocation of the natural environment.

IAN AITKEN

See also: Cavalcanti, Alberto

Line to Tcherva Hut (1936). Produced by John Grierson. Directed, photographed and edited by Alberto Cavalcanti. Music by Benjamin Britten. Produced at the GPO Film Unit.

Further reading

- Aitken, Ian, Alberto Cavalcanti, Realism, Surrealism and National Cinemas, London: Flicks Books, 2001.
 ——— The Documentary Film Movement, An Anthology, Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press, 1998.
 ——— Film and Reform, London: Routledge, 1990.
 Cavalcanti, Alberto, Filme e Realidade, Rio de Janeiro: Editora Artenova, in collaboration with Empresa Brasileira de Filmes—Embrafilme, 1977.
 Rotha, Paul, Documentary Film, London: Faber & Faber, 1939.
 Sussex, Elizabeth, 'Cavalcanti in England', Sight and Sound 44, no. 4, autumn, 1975.

Lion Has Wings, The

(UK, Korda, 1940)

Produced and speedily completed in six weeks at the outbreak of World War II, The Lion Has Wings (TLHW) was a three-part hybrid documentary style (now seen as very much a period piece) that attempted to engender feelings of comfort and courage in and for the home front. It was very much a declaration of intent and a promise for the future. On its release in November 1939, and despite—or perhaps owing to—it being clearly put together in some haste but meant well, it was well received by critics and the public and went on to make a reasonable profit.

TLHW combined reconstructions, newsreel footage, fiction (excerpts from earlier Korda successes such as Fire Over England inevitably drawing parallels with and evoking the triumph over the Spanish Armada) and fact to produce a collage and montage of images and ideas to link aspects of British traditions, history, and ideology in ways that emphasised continuity, tolerance, and democracy.

Famously or infamously, King George VI leading the scouts in singing Underneath the Spreading Chestnut Tree is contrasted with a Hitler youth rally. Dalrymple (in Pronay and Spring 1982) was quite explicit in his aims, perhaps predating or alongside Balcon's wish at Ealing to 'Project Britain and the British Character': 'I opened our film with the suggestion that there was a British ideology arising from our national character; that it was valuable to the world; and that it should not be lost.' To which, even allowing for the problems inherent in defining the term British, one might well say 'amen to that'.

That apart, The Lion Has Wings was the first result of Alexander Korda's promise to Churchill amongst others that on and after the outbreak of hostilities, the British Film Industry should be supported and enabled to play a valuable part in sustaining morale and promoting propaganda. Thus were the foundations laid for future masterpieces such as 49th Parallel and The Life and Death of Colonel Blimp (Powell 1986).

Michael Powell contributed to and directed parts of TLHW, with footage of the preparations for and the return of bombers from a raid on the Kiel Canal and elements of the German High Seas fleet. Given that Powell himself was available and ready to take part in the mission the day after war was declared and would thus have been able to include real-time footage of Britain's declaration of serious intent, it remains a loss that he was not allowed to take part. Consequently, this section of the film is largely a reconstruction and, for legitimate propaganda reasons, is, in its evocation and expression of the raid, to use a much later phrase, economical with the truth.

The final section addresses fears of an aerial Armageddon, which were widespread at the time, partly arising out of earlier films such as Things to Come (1935, another Korda epic) in which the presumed ability of aircraft to bomb a city back to the stone age was articulated. According to Powell (1986), TLHW was going to show how 'an all out attack by Nazi bombers, supported by fighters, was completely wrecked by the use of radar by the fighter squadrons of the RAF'.

For good or for ill, the needs of national security meant that references to radar were not allowable and so the final section seems now to predate Mrs Miniver in its portrayal of sentimental attachment to the values of 'England's green and pleasant land' not to mention the other kingdoms that make up the United Kingdom.

Having Ralph Richardson and Merle Oberon (both in uniform, the latter as a nurse) play the lead parts and representatives of those who fight for 'Truth and beauty, and fair play and kindness' seems now, and no doubt to some then, to be somewhat incongruous and over the top. However, there is the ever-present danger of judging with the sensibilities and ideological spectacles of a future generation and changed culture, and it does not do to be too hard on a film that, whatever its faults, served some of its purpose at the time even if aesthetically or formally it did not advance the cause or culture of documentary.

ROBERT BEVERIDGE

The Lion Has Wings (UK, 1939). Producer Ian Dalrymple/Alexander Korda. Directors Adrian Brunel; Brian Hurst; Michael Powell.

Further reading

Powell, M., A Life in Movies, London: Heinemann, 1986.

Pronay, N. and Spring, D.W. (eds), Propaganda, Politics & Film 1918-45, London: Macmillan, 1982.

Listen to Britain

(UK, Jennings, 1942)

A signal work of its director, Humphrey Jennings, Listen to Britain is also an institutional product and a sterling collaboration of skilled and committed contributors. Significantly, collaboration is also its subject. It is a powerful portrait of social cohesion during difficult times, as well as being a synthesis and elaboration of existing documentary possibilities and a clear prefiguring of many of the important innovations that would change the form in years to come. However, ultimately it is not the innovativeness, but the substance, even the goodness, of Listen to Britain that most distinguishes it. These things can be ascribed to a delicate balance of complicated and potentially contradictory factors, the combination of which continues to impress the modern viewer as being deeply organic and indeed, practically perfect. This fruit of British hardship and hardihood, however, did not come about accidentally or without a long and difficult gestation.

Unlike many of his forebears and colleagues at the Empire Marketing Board and the General Post Office (GPO) Film Units, Humphrey Jennings took a long time to find his documentary bearings. He joined the GPO in 1934, and he did not thrive under Grierson. To Grierson's mind a documentarian's duty was to roll up his sleeves, to advocate and to educate, and the bookish and aesthetical Jennings was ill-equipped for the role. Pedantry and dilettantism, from a more sympathetic perspective, might also bespeak, or lead to, depth and breadth. Jennings's sensibility was subtle and indirect, qualities both native and achieved through careful cultivation. It was his bookishness, as well as the diverse investigations and involvements that fell outside of the constraints and assumptions of Griersonian production, that made him a key link in the evolution of the documentary film, and Listen to Britain was the clearest emblem of its advance.

Four things contributed to this leap and to the poetic qualities so abundantly illustrated in Listen to Britain. In the 1920s Jennings was a scholarship student at the University of Cambridge, where he effected a considerable immersion in the major movements, the signal works and authors, the main periods and issues in English literature, and of English history. His PhD work was interrupted by other impulses and involvements—in fact he never finished it—but it developed in him the ability to amass, order, and interpret sources and data, a skill that would become a major part of his method.

In addition to acquiring great knowledge, Jennings developed striking ways of seeing and organizing that knowledge. He had a sympathy for surrealism (the mid-1930s found him painting, curating, and translating under that influence). He found great resonance in the movement's incongruous juxtapositions, which advanced his scholar's knack for assimilation, helping him to find patterns and correspondences that were not obvious, or even visible to the untrained eye.

As for method of presentation, in 1937 Jennings helped to organize Mass Observation, a monumental project that was to coincide with the coronation of King George VI, and that was designed to take the principles of anthropological science and apply them not to far-flung cultures, but to the British populace itself. In contrast to the GPO's customary prescribing and proscribing, the task here was to observe, gather, and present data without compulsory means or excessive urging.

Mass Observation informs Jennings's first major film as a director, Spare Time (1939). During its production he also acquired the final key component of his mature style and sensibility. Spare Time was shot in England's industrial north, which Jennings had never before visited. The exposure was revelatory; presented for the first time with the real conditions of working-class life, Jennings found himself obliged to incorporate the emotional, to add sympathy, compassion, and regard to the cerebral, aesthetic cast of his previous efforts. The gathering clouds and the eventual declaration of war completed his sensitization and confirmed in Jennings the very documentary conviction that private impulse should be subordinated to public ends. The stage was set for Jennings's finest work.

Listen to Britain emerges out of a tangle of wartime filmmaking activity. The Crown Film Unit had changed facilities in the aftermath of the Dunkirk Blitz. The atmosphere was unsettled, and Jennings shot material for a couple of films (one on military mustering, the other on the noontime concerts at the National Gallery) that would never be finished. He was able, however, to salvage some of the footage, and the germ of an idea, from these efforts. With the destruction in May 1941 of the Queen's Hall (longtime site of the London Promenade Concerts), along with the London Philharmonic's instruments, Jennings and editor Stewart McAllister came up with a treatment called 'The Music of War'. This would become Listen to Britain. (McAllister's contribution to the eventual film was so central that he receives equal credit with the director.)

The film is difficult to summarize, in part because of its enormous cumulative effect; in the volume of its sights and sounds, it is practically encyclopedic. It is a portrait of beleaguered Britain, working and waiting, at leisure and in anxiety, abiding and, we are assured, prevailing. There is narrative and characterization, but not remotely in the ways to which we are accustomed. Rather than synopsisizing, it might be more useful to enumerate the film's many satisfactions and contributions.

One of the simplest and most striking of these is its superb cinematic counterpoint of sound and image. Unlike the effects usually associated with Soviet counterpoint (for example, collision, opposition), Jennings and McAllister's counterpoint is at first glance more strictly formal. They replace the image's traditional primacy with a freer alternation of picture and sound. In doing so they oppose or at least alternate film's traditional picture/sound hierarchies and create what remains an ideal of cinematic virtuosity and expressiveness.

Jennings' previous film, Words for Battle (1941), had compiled contemporary images of wartime Britain and set them against statements and strains of music that far predated the current crisis. In doing so, Jennings conflated the epochs and, in the counterpoint of image and text, erased divisions between times and peoples and places. Listen to Britain explores this same idea synchronically, establishing a powerful present tense. It is Jennings's definitive mass observation film, with carefully chosen, intimately observed (and expertly staged) vignettes that cut across social, professional, and geographical lines, giving a vivid impression of wartime life and wartime unity, witnessed and overheard.

The manner in which Jennings observes constitutes a major shift in the role and nature of narration in the nonfiction film. The sound documentary, especially in Britain, had almost always tended towards emphatic narrative. Commentary led the way, dictating the use to which the pictures were put. This procedure was standard, and it was effective, but it also contained potential difficulties and clear contradictions. The urging, even hectoring tone of traditionally narrated documentary could betray a lack of confidence in the validity of the message, or of the ability of the audience to apprehend it. It could also betray a coercive core. If this previous approach had directed and even manipulated the viewer to particular ends, then Jennings openly invites the viewer into the process of comprehension and interpretation, not incidentally making him a more active agent in the subsequent action that documentary traditionally demanded.

In Listen to Britain commentary is not found in a narrator's explicit and manipulative proclamations—it has no narrator at all—but in the much more subtle and open juxtapositions of intellectual montage. Here are traces of Jennings's surrealist affinities. The film proceeds and makes its points by constant comparison, linking by mere proximity that which would at first seem to be completely unrelated. As with mise-en-scène style, seeming and actual realism does not mean that there is no manipulation here. Yet in the gathering and ordering of picture and sounds significance is not so underlined, meaning is left implicit, and the viewer has the responsibility and opportunity to make her own connections, her own meaning.

Work is central to the film's meaning, and it is one of its main subjects. Here it is a labour of a particular, communal kind, one that continues to come across as especially grave and moving. Documentary had always been invested in portraying work's dignity, and it was never so successful in doing so as it was here, when the most pressing labour was simply to survive and to live decently. In a time when the possibility of death or loss was constant, Jennings and McAllister discover the sufficiency of simple, careful observation, which reveals how precious plain processes and regular people can be.

Such raised stakes and heightened awareness allow for and make convincing a difficult hypothesis: that social origin and division could be effaced, that class differences could be reconciled amidst and even because of the greater conflict. Again, the detailed and affectionate rendering of mundane tasks illustrates the idea. Listen to Britain portrays a community bound by gainful employment as much as by tribulation and tragedy. The people have found themselves united in a common cause; the war has revealed the deeper affinities. The film has done so, too. Jennings and McAllister urge the case through the overlapping of sound and the juxtaposition of images. As a number of prospects and correspondences pass before us—the ballroom dancers in Blackpool, the Canadian soldiers in the transport train, the children in the schoolyard, the whistling workers in the canteen, and the concert-goers in the National Gallery—an assertion emerges that constitutes one of the central tenets of the documentary idea. Regardless of his or her role, each honest worker—including the public-minded artist—is worthy of his hire, and he is part of an interdependent community. Listen to Britain gives us, in effect, the body of Britain, where the head cannot say to the foot that it has no need of it. In fact we come to see that each member not only has its own utility, but its own beauty as well. The great Myra Hess, playing Mozart's 17th piano concerto (German music, as Barnouw has pointed out), is in some ways as skilled, and in every sense only as important, as the factory girl who sings and smiles while she wraps a package of razors.

Thus we see, or at least have proposed to us, the suggestion of a British culture utterly transformed, battered and yet full of new promise. The film brings binaries together: trades, ages, classes, farm and city, high culture and low, the present and the past. Things that have been poles apart begin to appear like they belong together.

In this a problem might arise, and a reminder that amid justifiable enthusiasm there are questions to raise. Listen to Britain was generally acclaimed on its release, but it was not received with unalloyed enthusiasm. Writing in the Spectator, Edgar Anstey described it as 'the rarest fiddling since the days of Nero', and 'a figment of the romantic imagination of Mass Observation'. To some blitzed Britons, the film's pacific qualities must have seemed at the least misplaced; Harry Watt's pugnacious Target for Tonight probably, and quite properly, represents a more typical representation of wartime resistance. As for its effect on the documentary community, National Film Board of Canada pioneer Tom Daly remembers that Listen to Britain was one of Grierson's locked case films, deemed to be so artistically indulgent as to constitute an actual danger to his impressionable charges.

Today a few of the film's details strike one as being less natural—the beautifully composed and patently staged 'Ash Grove' sequence—or less convincing, as in the contrived cutaway to the housewife's Highland regiment husband, than they might be. Furthermore, as was so often the case with British documentaries, there were great difficulties in the recording of the sound. Its inadequacy is most keenly felt in a film to which sound is so central.

There are other things of which modern viewers might fail to take note. Listen to Britain, for all its gentleness and subtlety, is still pointedly propagandistic. A continuous solidarity between past and present, or between class and region, was real and demonstrable. However, it was also tenuous, and the connections could be lost not only in the uncertainty of the moment, but also in the depths of real division. Furthermore, as with his earlier collaboration with Harry Watt, London Can Take It! (1940), Jennings removes fear and hostility almost completely from his account. This effacement, understandable, even justifiable, is also to some degree fictional. In these things, Jennings and McAllister effaced the joins as they fashioned their portrait, which is not without a degree of manufacture, and even manipulation.

Listen to Britain is also powerful in what it promises and proves of documentary and cinematic potential. As the cinema is in many ways a combination and a culmination of all of the arts, it is appropriate that a man of Jennings's broad background should finally have found his calling in films. His versatility, and the medium's, is superlatively manifest in this production. He was a modern painter able to see that there is more to an object, or a subject, than what presents itself to the naked eye. He was a surrealist poet who found that a direct line is not the only link between a cause and its apparent effect. He was an observer of the masses, and of the individual within, willing not only to tell, but also to hear. In the best of Jennings's work artistry and responsibility were perfectly balanced, the felicitous result being that in addressing with his own voice the specific concerns of a specific moment, Jennings was able to transcend that moment and speak for all time.

DEAN DUNCAN

See also: Jennings, Humphrey

Listen to Britain (UK, Crown Film Unit, 1942 20 mins). Produced by Ian Dalrymple. Directed and scripted and edited by Humphrey Jennings and Stewart McAllister. Photography by Chick Fowle. Sound by Ken Cameron. Music by various.

Further reading

- Calder, Angus, The People's War, London: Cape, 1969
- Calder, Angus and Sheridan, Dorothy, Speak for Yourself: A Mass-Observation Anthology 1937–49, London: Cape, 1984.
- Ellis, Jack, John Grierson: Life, Contributions, Influences, Carbondale, IL: Southern Illinois University Press, 2000.
- Harrison, Tom, Living Through the Blitz, London: Collins, 1976.

- Hodgkinson, Anthony W., Sheratsky, Rodney E. and Jennings, Humphrey, More than a Maker of Films, Hanover, MA: Clark University Press, 1982.
- Jennings, Humphrey, Pandaemonium: The Coming of the Machine in the Industrial Revolution, ed. Mary-Lou Jennings and Charles Madge, New York: Free Press, 1985.
- Jennings, Humphrey and Madge, Charles (eds), May the Twelfth: Mass-Observation Day-Surveys 1937, by Over Two Hundred Observers, London: Faber & Faber, 1937.
- Jennings, Mary-Lou (ed.), Humphrey Jennings: Film-Maker/Painter/Poet, London: BFI, 1982.
- Remy, Michel, Surrealism in Britain, Brookfield: Ashgate, 1999.
- Sheridan, Dorothy, Street, Brian V. and Bloome, David, Writing Ourselves: Mass-Observation and Literacy Practices, Cresskill: Hampton Press, 2000.
- Winston, Brian, Claiming the Real, London: BFI, 1995.
- , Fires Were Started, London: BFI, 1999.

Litvak, Anatole

The Russian-born feature film director Anatole Litvak pioneered the use of editing techniques in the pseudo-documentary. Relying on his education and expertise as a 'cutter' or film editor in both the Soviet Union and in France, Litvak juxtaposed production footage, controlled documentary footage, and newsreel footage in several feature films and, more important, in the Why We Fight series (1942–5) produced by the US Army Signal Corps during World War II. Frank Capra hired Litvak in 1942 as second-in-command of the production unit in Los Angeles. Litvak's contribution as codirector (in particular, the films The Nazis Strike, Divide and Conquer, The Battle of Russia, The Battle of China, and War Comes to America) helped to make the Why We Fight series one of the most effective examples of wartime propaganda documentaries. The psychological strength of these films proved so dynamic that more than fifty years later, after the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001, White House officials met with top television executives in Beverly Hills to discuss how Hollywood could help support the 'war on terrorism' by means similar to the Why We Fight series. Litvak's limited use of these techniques in the Warner Bros feature film Confessions of a Nazi Spy (1939) provided a blueprint for their even more effective use in his wartime documentaries.

The style of the Why We Fight series was based on techniques first used by Esfir Shub in the Soviet Union during the 1920s. Shub is generally credited with innovating the 'compilation film'. This documentary subgenre was created through the editing of footage from numerous archival sources to construct an historical documentary film. This manipulation of preexisting footage in relation to other pieces is a key element of the compilation film. Relying for the most part on newsreel footage, Shub created a trilogy that chronicled the fall of the Romanov dynasty and the rise of the Soviet Republic. The conception of film as montage (Shub was inspired by Eisenstein's Battleship Potemkin, 1925), the fusion of film form with ideological concerns, was also an instrumental element in the compilation film's structure. In the United States during the early 1930s similar compilation films included Universal's The Fighting President (1933), compiled from Universal newsreels concerning FDR, and This is America (1933). In the late 1930s the growing concern over Hitler and the spread of fascism spawned a feature-length documentary film produced by Louis DeRochemont, Ramparts We Watch (1940), and a Warner Bros feature, Confessions of a Nazi Spy (1939). Ramparts We Watch, which used fictional reenactments combined with newsreel footage, is generally considered to be the first American wartime documentary. Confessions of a Nazi Spy, directed by Litvak, was an entirely fictive feature (though based on real events) that incorporated newsreel footage, as well as voice-over narration, into its narrative structure for added authenticity. The film was about a Nazi spy ring operating within the United States and its exposure by the FBI. Litvak purposefully wanted the film to have an authentic look associated with newsreels and incorporated them into a quasi-documentary format for the film. The intercutting of documentary footage with stage scenes often made it difficult to distinguish between the two. Louis de Rochemont's film effectively combines dramatic narrative, patriotic songs, newsreels footage, Nazi propaganda, and reenactments to trace American attitudes concerning isolationism and interventionism before World War II. The technique of both films influenced the structure and style of the Why We Fight series.

The Why We Fight series were orientation films specifically designed to instruct armed forces personnel in the reasons why they were fighting overseas. They were also shown to the general public to assuage any questioning of the war itself. The series consisted of seven films that chronologically detailed war: Prelude to War (1942), The Nazis Strike (1943), Divide and Conquer (1943), The Battle of Britain (1943), The Battle of China (1944), The Battle of Russia (1944), and War Comes to America (1945). Anatole Litvak served as codirector, along with Frank Capra, for The Nazis Strike, Divide and Conquer, and The Battle of China. He is credited as director on The Battle of Russia and War Comes to America. In The Battle of Russia, Litvak skillfully edits newsreel footage along with animation sequences, combat photography, and production sequences from Sergei Eisenstein's Alexander Nevsky to detail the numerous historical attempts to invade the nation. The film, the longest and most effective in the series, then recounts Hitler's invasion and ultimate defeat by the Russian people. Litvak's film stresses the unity of the various peoples that comprise the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. It likewise puts an emphasis on the nation's culture and the threat to that culture by the invading Nazis. Litvak uses traditional music, as well as symphonic music as a counterpoint to the edited footage. Unity is stressed because it teaches that only a united front, in this case the Allied nations themselves, can successfully counter and defeat Nazi aggression. This particular film was originally shown in two parts.

The last film of the Why We Fight series, War Comes to America, was also originally planned to be shown in two parts, but the end of the war stopped production of part two. The film covers the events leading up to the United States involvement in World War II. Similar to De Rochemont's Ramparts We Watch, it details the shift in American attitudes from an isolationist stance to one of intervention. Litvak persuasively uses a parallel structure showing events in the spectators' lives (in this case the soldiers, for whom the series was intended) juxtaposed with world events. 'We the people' is continually stressed in the film. In one sequence the narration and images reflect the multicultural diversity that makes up America and the subsequent threat to American life caused by the war. The film itself is perhaps the most carefully constructed answer to the question proposed by the series title, Why We Fight.

RONALD WILSON

See also: Battle of Russia, The; Battle of China, The; Why We Fight

Biography

Born Mikhail Anatol Litvak in Kiev, Russia, May 10, 1902. Graduated from University of Leningrad, PhD in philosophy, in 1921. Attended State School of Theatre 1922. 1923 directed short films for Nordkino studios in Leningrad. In 1925 left the Soviet Union for Paris, then Berlin. Worked as an editor at Ufa in Berlin. 1926–30 assistant to Russian-emigré director Nicholas Alexander Volkoff, who had directed films in Czarist Russia. Moved to Paris in 1933, where he directed several feature films. The critical and box office success of Mayerling (Nero Film/Concordia Productions, 1936) brought Litvak to the United States in 1937. 1937–41 served as a contract director at Warner Brothers studio. 1942–5 codirector for US Army Signal Corps Special Services film unit of the War Department. Died December 15, 1974, in Paris. Military honors include the Legion d'Honneur and the Croix de Guerre.

Further reading

- Barsam, Richard M., Non-Fiction Film: A Critical History, Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press, 1992.
- Birdwell, Michael E., Celluloid Soldiers: The Warner Bros. Campaign Against Nazism, New York: New York University Press, 1999.
- Bohn, Thomas William, An Historical and Descriptive Analysis of the 'Why We Fight' Series, New York: Arno Press, 1977.
- Capra, Frank, The Name Above the Title, New York: MacMillan, 1977.
- Doherty, Thomas, Projections of War: Hollywood, American Culture, and World War II, New York: Columbia University Press, 1993.
- Eyles, Allan and Pattison, Barrie, 'Anatole Livak—A Cutter at Heart' (interview), Films & Filming (London), 13, no. 5, February, 1967.
- Leyda, Jay, Films Beget Films, New York: Hill & Wang, 1964.
- McBride, Joseph, Frank Capra: The Catastrophe of Success, New York: Simon & Schuster, 1992.
- MacCann, Richard Dyer, 'World War II: Armed Forces Documentary', in Lewis Jacobs (ed.), The Documentary Tradition, New York: W.W. Norton, 1979.
- Nolan, Jack, 'Anatole Litvak', Films in Review (New York), November, 1967.
- Thompson, George Raynor and Harris, Dixie R., The Signal Corps: The Test (1941–43), Washington, DC: Department of the Army, 1957.

Living Desert, The

(US, Algar, 1953)

The Living Desert was one of the most popular, as well as the most criticized, of Disney's True-Life Adventures series of theatrical documentaries. The film, produced by Disney's newly formed production company, Buena Vista, relied heavily on the narrative and aesthetic devices that Disney animators had used in their feature films and cartoon short subjects. Compiled from footage acquired from several freelance nature photographers, music and narration were added to create a humanization of the natural world. The resulting film was more an 'edu-tainment' than a traditional documentary.

The Living Desert was a feature-length film that was produced after the critical and commercial success of Disney's series of True-Life Adventures short subjects. The most successful of these shorts was Seal Island (1948), concerning the fur seal migration to the Pribilof Islands, off the coast of Alaska. Other films in the series included Beaver Valley (1950), Nature's Half Acre (1951), The Olympic Elk (1952), Water Birds (1952), and Bear Country (1953). The expanded feature-length films in the True-Life Adventures series, along with The Living Desert, included The Vanishing Prairie (1954), The African Lion (1955), Secrets of Life (1956), White Wilderness (1958), and Jungle Cat (1960). These films proved to be the most popular of the Disney studios productions in the 1950s.

The subject matter of The Living Desert is the flora and fauna that inhabit the dry and arid plains between the Sierra Nevada mountain range and the Rocky Mountains. After the opening credits, which feature the True-Life logo, a globe turning within a frame, an animated paintbrush paints the North American continent and shows how the desert was created by meteorological and geographic conditions. The wildlife that inhabit this region include tarantulas, scorpions, kangaroo rats, bats, rattlesnakes, and desert hawks. The final portion of the film shows a flash flood in a desert ravine and the resulting blooming of desert flowers (filmed in time-lapse photography). The sun sets on the horizon, and the narrator (Winston Hibler) explains that in the desert 'there are no endings, only new beginnings'.

The use of anthropomorphism, a chief characteristic of Disney's animated feature films, is also prevalent in the True-Life Adventures series. Musical cues, such as the square dancing of scorpions, and a tango for courting tarantulas, further the human characteristics placed on wildlife. The Living Desert presents a dichotomized natural world that stresses the duality of nature. Many of the animals in the film are either cute (the kangaroo rat, for instance) or malevolent (scorpions, rattlesnakes). Violence in the film reflects the survival-of-the-fittest ethos as a natural process. Domesticity is also a part of Disney's natural order, with scenes showing animals' parental concerns and family life. This struggle to survive in a hostile environment effectively ties into Cold War concerns of security and family.

Though Disney's humanization of nature in these films was criticized at the time, the photography is quite remarkable and set a standard for subsequent nature films. Much of the close-up camera work allows the viewer to witness the actions and events in an almost participatory effect. Likewise, these films contributed significantly to more of an ecosystem consciousness than had previous 'jungle documentaries' that stressed the hunting and capturing of animals such as Bring 'Em Back Alive (USA, Clyde Elliott, 1932) and Simba, King of the Beasts (USA, Martin and Osa Johnson, 1928). Though its faults are many, The Living Desert and subsequent films in the series created an empathy with the natural world and an awareness of humanity's role in it.

RONALD WILSON

The Living Desert (US, Walt Disney Productions, 1953, 73 mins). Distributed by Buena Vista. Produced by Walt Disney. Associate producer, Ben Sharpsteen. Directed by James Algar. Screenplay by James Algar, Winston Hibler, and Ted Sears. Cinematography by N. Paul Kenworthy, Jr, Robert H. Crandall. Additional photography by Stuart V. Jewell, Jack C. Coufer, Don Arlen, and Tad Nichols. Narrated by Winston Hibler. Animation effects by Joshua Meador, John Hench, and Art Riley. Music by Paul J. Smith. Orchestrations by Edward H. Plumb. Edited by Norman Palmer. Special processes by Ubi Iwerks. Sound direction by C.O. Slyfield. Sound recorded by Harold J. Steck.

Further reading

- Gartley, Lynn and Leebron, Elizabeth, Walt Disney: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston: G.K. Hall, 1979.
- Jackson, Kathy Merlock, Walt Disney: A Bio-Bibliography, Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1993.
- King, Margaret J., 'The Audience in the Wilderness: The Disney Nature Films', Journal of Popular Film and Television 24, no. 2, summer 1996: 60–9.
- Maltin, Leonard, The Disney Films, New York: Bonanza Books, 1973.
- Schickel, Richard, The Disney Version: The Life, Times, Art and Commerce of Walt Disney, New York: Simon & Schuster, 1968.
- Wasko, Janet, Understanding Disney: The Manufacture of Fantasy, Malden, ME: Blackwell Publishers, 2001.
- Watts, Steven, The Magic Kingdom: Walt Disney and the American Way of Life, New York: Houghton Mifflin, 1997.

Ljubic, Vesna

Vesna Ljubic is one of the most important woman filmmakers in Bosnia and Herzegovina. Her style can be characterized as poetic realism. From the beginning of her career, she has argued for an author's approach in her cinematic work. She writes the scripts for all of her films and often works with the same crew. She tries to remain faithful to her own poetic style of expression, regardless of the dominant trends in documentary and cinema. Devoting roughly five years to each of her films, going deeply into the core of the theme, she takes a contemplative approach and adopts a personally relevant point of view. Ljubic insists on expressing authentic and genuine emotions via her treatment of her film heroes. With a unique sense of humour, in which a specific Balkan wisdom is imbedded, Ljubic touches on the lives of common people: their poverty, their endurance despite oppression, and their negotiations of the relationship between the sexes. Ljubic portrays her female characters with depth, nuance, and understanding. By applying a sophisticated, often surrealist artistic approach, the stories of ordinary people are transformed into dreamlike tales.

Ljubic began making documentaries in 1970, while studying in Rome. As a student, Ljubic assisted Federico Fellini, who had a great influence on her development and her cinematic language. This is especially noticeable in her later feature projects Defiant Delta (1980) and The Last Switchman of the Narrow Gauge Railway (1987), the former shot in Herzegovina and the latter in Bosnia. Both of them are inspired by the difficult lives of village people during a time of political and social changes.

Ljubic does not follow the two dominant cinematic trends of the former Yugoslavia: the avant-garde movement known as Black Wave, which produces political, polemical films, and the mainstream practice of partisan or other conformist films.

Although Ljubic made a series of documentaries during the 1970s, she received sustained attention for the first time with the television film Simcha (1971), a fiction project based on the life of Jews in Bosnia. It was proclaimed Sarajevo television's Best Film of the Year and purchased by numerous Western European broadcasters, which at the time was quite rare for socialist Yugoslavia.

An especially intriguing aspect of Ljubic's films is the manner in which she combines documentary and fiction, as well as tragedy and comedy. This is especially successfully done in her half-hour semi-documentary The Illusionists (1991), made on the eve of the war in former Yugoslavia. The film tells the story of a poor man who believes that the only possible way to overcome the difficulties in his life is to perform illusions. Ljubic dramatized certain scenes according to her understanding of the man's real family lifestyle, while anticipating the upcoming downfall of Yugoslavia through the illusions of the hero.

Before the fall of Yugoslavia and the war in Bosnia, Ljubic spent a few months in India, where she made three documentary films inspired by the spirituality of the local people. Without any narrative, these films are completely driven by Ljubic's personal impressions of the people of South India. Unfortunately, all the material shot in India was destroyed during the shelling of Sarajevo.

For Ljubic, even straightforward war documentary is not meant to transmit only information. In her film Ecce homo/Behold the Man (1994), made during the siege of Sarajevo, she decided to shape her impressions of destruction in her own, cinematically poetic and uplifting style. There are no words, only fragments of different prayers (of four ethnic groups living in Sarajevo) and sounds of shelling, an approach underlining the director's conviction that image is more effective than the word. The film is shot during two years of the four-year period in which Sarajevo is completely isolated, cut off from water, food, and electricity, and suffers continuous heavy shelling. Paid only with bread and cigarettes, the whole crew takes a big risk shooting, making the first war documentary on 35mm at the time. Interpolating dramatized scenes between sensitive documentary material reporting death and murder, Ljubic expresses her own meditative state in which she concludes that death is the only way out in war-torn Sarajevo.

Ljubic's most recent film also refers to the consequences of the war. Adio Kerida (2001) is a documentary that follows the traces of the Sephardim community in Sarajevo, a community that almost completely disappeared. Structuring the work as the search for a person who died several years ago, Ljubic discovers in her own lyrical style the rich and beautiful life of the Jewish people during the twentieth century. The film ends with a marvellous scene in which a choir sings at one of the oldest Jewish cemeteries in Eastern Europe. The extinction of the Jewish people and lifestyle in Sarajevo is reflected in their ancient, now abandoned and desecrated, burial ground.

Remaining independent of any political or ethnic orientation, Ljubic's films are usually first acknowledged abroad, to be recognized at home only later. Nevertheless, Ljubic remains faithful to her own approach and specific film style, for which she has received numerous awards.

RADA SESIC

See also: Yugoslavia (former)

Biography

Born in Bosnia and Herzegovina in 1938. After obtaining the Bachelor of Arts Degree from the Department of Philosophy at Sarajevo University, studied film direction at the Centro Sperimentale in Rome, Italy. For three decades, worked for the Drama Department at Radio Sarajevo. Later became editor-in-chief, overseeing hundreds of programmes. Has served on numerous juries at film, television, and radio festivals around the world.

Selected films

1970 Putovanje/ Journey

- 1970 Smrt se otplacuje ziveci/Death is paid off Through Living (documentary)
 1971 Halil Tikvesa
 1971 Simcha (fiction)
 1980 Prkosna delta/Defiant Delta (fiction)
 1987 Posljednji skretnicar uskotracnog kolosijeka/The Last Switchman of the Narrow Gauge Railway (fiction)
 1991 Iluzionisti/The Illusionists (semi-documentary)
 1994 Ecce homo-Evo covjeka/Behold the Man (documentary)
 1999 Sveti prah Indije/Sacred Dust of India (documentary)
 1999 Lotus/Lotus Flowers (documentary)
 2001 Adio Kerida (documentary)

Further reading

- Chatterjee, Vidyarthi, Terrors of War, Yearnings for Peace, Calcutta Festival Bulletin, 1999.
 Crnkovic, Gordana P., 'Ecce Homo', review, Film Quarterly, summer 1999, Berkeley, CA: University of California Press.
 Sestic, Rada, 'The camera as magnifying glass', DOX Documentary Magazine, 1994.
 —'Filmer pour vivre a Sarajevo', Cine Bulletin, 1994.

Loach, Ken

Ken Loach is recognised widely as one of Britain's most important filmmakers. Born in 1936, by 2005 Loach had directed forty-five documentaries, television series, and feature films—about one per year since the acclaimed Z Cars (three episodes directed in 1964). His notable successes include Cathy Come Home (1966), Kes (1969), Days of Hope (1975), Riff-Raff (1990), Ladybird Ladybird (1994), Land and Freedom (1995), My Name is Joe (1998), Bread and Roses (2000), The Navigators (2001), Sweet Sixteen (2002), and the UK segment of September 11 (2002). The right-wing magazine Economist observed sarcastically in 2002 that in Loach the left-leaning Le Monde 'and indeed the rest of Europe' had discovered 'the heir to Dickens', that 'Europe's cultural elite has appointed him the supreme chronicler of contemporary Britain', and that Loach 'is also big in the Netherlands and Germany' (Economist 2002). However, it diminishes Loach's following in Britain as merely 'select', stating that 'his unrelenting hostility to capitalism [and]

Thatcherism [...] had made his more recent work predictable' (Economist 2002).

Loach's films can be divided 'into two broad categories—intimate family dramas which illuminate the politics of every day life and more militant films determined to skewer both the forces of reaction and the reformist wing of the labor movement [... Families are] where most drama happens in our lives' (Ryan and Porton 1998: 5). Although many of his films are located in the north of England, Loach is concerned with issues of social class rather than locality (Ryan and Porton 1998: 5). The naturalistic treatment and subject matter of Loach's films de-differentiate Loach's documentaries from his feature films. Loach is widely acknowledged for films of revolutionary bent that confront human despair and communal and familial decline, and that portray the bureaucratic heartlessness and ineptitude of those official social and political institutions that are the agents of human misery and degradation. However, his stories demonstrate his view that it is not only the powerful external institutional forces that destroy social identity and well-being but also betrayal by one's own side, as in his 1995 documentary drama, Land and Freedom, about idealism and betrayal in the Spanish Civil War. For Loach 'the innocents become the victims of their own idealisms' (McKnight 1997: 8).

Loach's sustained criticism encompasses the inflexibility of 'state-administered social services, [...] the medical and psychiatric professions, the police, the courts and [...] the law, the press, the military and the various forms of state security' (McKnight 1997: 2), and the British state education system. As such, Loach is a political filmmaker. He believes that 'you shouldn't become a filmmaker unless you have something to say' (London Weekend Television 1993). Loach's Kes, about a working-class boy who is a failure at school but who catches and trains a kestrel, has been compared with Grange Hill (Jones and Davies 2001), the popular, long-running BBC TV children's drama series, which was set in a London comprehensive school and which is widely recognised and criticised for validating the culture of British working-class children (Horsfield 1982). By combining social realism and the form of the seamless classical realist text, Grange Hill, as 'macrodrama', generated a new category, 'progressive classical realism', where the characters can be read both as participants in a narrative and as voices or discourses of various social and political institutions and their controlling agencies. Many of Loach's films, such as Kes, may be theorised in the same terms as reformist or revolutionary in content, but not all can be so described: Petley warns 'against the dangers of using the label ['documentary drama' ...] to obscure important formal differences between individual works [...] In Diary of a Young Man [...] there are echoes of the French New Wave, and especially of Godard [... We] find all sorts of diverse elements cropping up in Cathy Come Home', which is realist in a very different way to Days of Hope (Petley 1997: 51).

Loach's low-budget radical films attack the capitalist system and the reformist element of the Left and are characterised by a naturalistic aesthetic that was conceived as a departure from the 'tedious linear narrative' of the classical realist American technicolour film. Loach also acknowledges the influence of the 'street reality' of postwar Italian neorealism on his filmmaking. Tony Garnett, Loach's political and aesthetic soulmate and one-time collaborator on the BBC series The Wednesday Play, said, '[W]e used fiction to try to tell the truth [... We] wanted to make stories that got the same responses as when you saw the news, because [The Wednesday Play] came after the news and we wanted to be seen as almost part of the news' (London Weekend Television 1993). 'If Loach could shoot a film without a camera, he would' (Eade 1995: 49).

The Thatcher-Major period of British politics, 'usually considered the most dismal epoch of the twentieth century by British radicals, engendered Loach's most productive and artistically satisfying period' (Ryan and Porton 1998: 22). Interviewed for a documentary about himself by one-time colleague Melvyn Bragg, Loach said, 'The first Thatcherite onslaught was like being knocked over by a tidal wave [...] Documentary provided a quicker response to Thatcher than film. Documentary is more like a pamphlet [... and is] an appropriate form for the time to capture what was happening' (London Weekend Television 1993). Loach is highly critical of the mass media, including popular cinema, and he states that the 'majority of films have a right-wing sub-text' (Sterritt 1998: B3). Loach is concerned that the media express the ideas of our age in very concrete ways (Papadopolous 1998), but for him the media 'is about reassurance and not asking the key questions at the key times [...]

It's about social control [... Their] hypocrisy says we are open to all points of view' (London Weekend Television 1993). To Loach the institutions of the press and broadcasting protect and propagate the hegemonic ideologies of the ruling and owning class and he believes that the future healthy society should have media executives who are responsible downwards and that news should be produced by democratic collectives of journalists and broadcasters (Papadopolous 1998). Loach locates many of his stories in the working class because not only is that where the raw material of drama is found, but also in the working class resides the 'progressive element. That's where the engine for change will be. It won't be brought to us as a gift from above, but by the work of people from below' (Ryan and Porton 1998: 24). Loach stated, 'The future lies in common ownership and democratic control, and a freedom from the market—not of the market—but from the exploitation of the market' (London Weekend Television 1993). His work is 'often labelled Trotskyist, but is equally amenable to positions espoused by anti-Leninist Marxists and anarcho-sindicalists' (Ryan and Porton 1998: 1). Loach's films have at times been cut or refused broadcast. Having commissioned four fifty-minute films by Loach, including The Red and the Blue (1983) and Questions of Leadership (1983), which were subtitled 'Problems of democracy in trade unions: some views from the front line', Channel 4, its charter for alternative kinds of programming notwithstanding, refused to broadcast them. Of the protracted and dispiriting process of fighting the ban, Loach expressed to The Guardian what he felt was the unspoken reason for the censorship:

Working class people are allowed on television as long as they fit the stereotype that producers have of them. Workers can appear pathetic in their ignorance and poverty, apathetic to parliamentary politics, or aggressive on the picket line. But let them make a serious political analysis based on their own experiences and in their own language, then keep them off the air.

(Petley 1997: 107–8)

Loach tempers the revolutionary idealism in his films with the pragmatic realities of everyday politics, and this structure provides the dramatic human elements of his narratives: 'If there is a central theme that unites Loach's work, it would be the betrayal of hope [...] For, in Loach's world, the innocents become the victims of their own idealism' (McKnight 1997: 7), as, for example, in The Rank and File and Days of Hope (striking workers betrayed by their union leadership and the Trade Union Council), Hidden Agenda (workers' political aspirations lead to their own deaths or the deaths of others), The Big Flame (striking dockworkers betrayed by their leadership), and Land and Freedom (anti-Fascist volunteers in the Spanish Civil War) (McKnight 1997: 8).

The distinctive subgenre of Loach's work, whether in his documentaries or feature films, is 'documentary drama', which may be defined as dramatic fictions with a documentary aesthetic or 'look'. Loach's preferred creative method is to take a strong dramatic story and then to place great emphasis on casting people, including both actors and locals who are nonactors, whose social class and life experiences are directly relevant to the story and to the characters they play. Loach said, 'A kind of natural eloquence is quite important [...] Again, it's a class thing. Working class men and women will often speak with a natural eloquence and rhythm' (Ryan and Porton 1998: 6). Loach invariably seeks to have the audience identify with the screen characters and can easily allocate more time to casting than to location shooting. He casts not only from actors and non-actors but from other skilled performers such as entertainers and cabaret artists. Loach regards the premeditated script, especially the spoken words, as highly malleable, and the look of social realism for which Loach has become internationally known greatly depends on his painstaking casting of people who then produce, often ad lib, the kind of reality he is seeking to portray. This method has proved highly successful in creating a succession of vivid and memorable impressions of British society, for example, in Cathy Come Home (1966), Kes (1969), and Ladybird Ladybird (1994).

However, the resulting reality effect of Loach's films has often caused alarm among the conservative about the possibility that Loach's audiences will be misled: 'The essence of the problem is that although Loach is a fiction director, he has extraordinary power to coax convincing performances from inexperienced actors, and it is hard to accept their pain is simulated. It feels like fly-on-the-wall documentary, rather than something invented' (quoted in McKnight 1997: 45–6). Such conservative concerns are common in certain kinds of media effects studies, as they assume simplistically that programme content directly determines the effect on the viewer. This fear of political influence also assumes that 'straight' documentaries are not also careful constructions, which is far from the case. Claims that Loach's films deceive the gullible and politically naïve viewing public deflect the more hostile critical literature on Loach but are yet to be supported by grass-roots empirical or ethnographic audience research.

Claims of 'undue' politicising in his films have to take into account the specificities of each film, however, for the films vary in significant ways. For example, the form and structure of Cathy Come Home mix realism and constitute 'a series of forms of address which is actually quite disjointed and disorienting', and the film is therefore unlikely to dupe or mislead its audience (Petley 1997: 52–3). Loach noted that although questions were asked in parliament after the broadcast of Cathy Come Home on British television, nothing was really done about the problems of the homeless in Britain (London Weekend Television 1993).

Loach's films are embedded in the vigorous and continuing theoretic debate on the nature and foundations of realism in cinema and television. This debate seeks to clarify both differences and common ground between various cinematic styles or aesthetics of realism, including neorealism, cinéma vérité, classical realism, progressive classical realism, documentary, macrodrama, social realism, naturalism, and so on. McKnight (1997: 60) states that Loach's films 'are naturalist'; the aesthetic of naturalism reproduces the surface appearance of reality, whereas the classical realist text can betoken reality without the impression of verisimilitude that is the hallmark of naturalism. Petley cites John Caughie's warning about the imprecise and decontextualised formalism in writings about naturalism and the need for debate (Petley 1997: 51).

Through decades of political and social change in Britain, throughout the move to the right under Thatcher and Blair, Loach has not deviated from his left ideals and remains 'an icon of political filmmaking' (Neve 1998: 52). Loach is 'unquestionably one of Britain's most important filmmakers [...] Kes (1969), Family Life (1971), and Ladybird, Ladybird (1994) [...] are justly regarded as milestones of British social realism' (Porton 1996: 30).

BRUCE HORSFIELD

Selected films

- 1966 Cathy Come Home
- 1969 Kes
- 1975 Days of Hope
- 1983 Questions of Leadership
- 1983 The Red and the Blue
- 1990 Riff-Raff
- 1994 Ladybird Ladybird
- 1995 Land and Freedom
- 1998 My Name is Joe
- 2000 Bread and Roses
- 2001 The Navigators
- 2002 Sweet Sixteen
- 2002 September 11 (UK segment)

Further reading

- Eaude, Michael, 'Gracias, Mr Loach', New Statesman and Society 8, no. 372, September 29, 1995: 48–9.
- Economist*, 'Ken Who?' Economist 362, 52–6, January 19, 2002.
- Horsfield, Bruce, 'BBC TV's 'Grange Hill': Production/Audience/Ideology', unpublished PhD thesis, University of Exeter, 1982.
- Jones, Ken and Davies, Hannah, 'Representing Education 1969–80: Notes on "Kes" and "Grange Hill"', History of Education 30, no. 2, 2001: 141–51.
- London Weekend Television, Ken Loach, 1993.
- McKnight, George (ed.), Agent of Challenge and Defiance: The Films of Ken Loach, Trowbridge: Flicks Books, 1997.
- Neve, Brian, 'Agent of Challenge and Defiance: The Films of Ken Loach', book review, Cineaste 23, no. 3, April 1998: 51–2.
- Papadopolous, Theodoros, 'On Media, Culture and the Prospects for a New Libratory Project', December, 1998.
- Petley, Julian, 'Factual Fictions and Fictional Fallacies: Ken Loach's Documentary Dramas', in George McKnight (ed.), Agent of Challenge and Defiance, Trowbridge: Flicks Books, 1997.
- 'Ken Loach and questions of censorship', in George McKnight (ed.), Agent of Challenge and Defiance, Trowbridge: Flicks Books, 1997.
- Porton, Richard, 'The Revolution Betrayed: An Interview with Ken Loach', Cineaste 22, no. 1, April 1996: 30–1.

Ryan, Susan and Porton, Richard, 'The Politics of Everyday Life: An Interview with Ken Loach', Cineaste 24, no. 1, 15 December 15, 1998: 22-7.

Sterritt, David, 'Director Ken Loach: Voice for More Than Popcorn and Profits', Christian Science Monitor 90, no. 153, July, 3, 1998: B3.

London Can Take It

(UK, Watt, Jennings, 1940)

World War II was a remarkable period in British history and cinema. In Prime Minister Churchill's famous phrase, this was the nation's 'finest hour' and, by critical consent, it was something of a golden age for British film. At the heart of a new, mature, and socially realistic cinema was the documentary movement, which produced a number of classic studies of Britain at war. One of the most celebrated of these was London Can Take It, an account of the German blitz on the country's capital in 1940.

The film is narrated by the American war correspondent Quentin Reynolds. It begins with a series of images of London and its citizens as they prepare for the trials that the night will bring. The duties of Air Raid Precaution are carried on and queues form outside the shelters. Against images of ominous skies the drone of enemy planes begins to be heard, searchlights blink into life; anti-aircraft guns flash and bark into the darkness and fire-fighting teams tackle burning buildings. The next morning the damage is surveyed, streets are strewn with rubble, and shops have had their windows blown out, but the people struggle back to their workplaces. The emergency services set about their grim and dangerous work and the clearing-up operation commences. The King and Queen inspect the bomb damage, demonstrate their solidarity with the people, and talk reassuringly with Londoners. Reynolds concludes with an appropriate upbeat commentary about the unconquerable spirit of the city, played over an image of the statue of Richard the Lionheart with sword raised.

London Can Take It was originally conceived as a propaganda film, with the title of London Front, for exhibition in the neutral United States. The use of Reynolds, a well-known columnist for Collier's Weekly, helped to provide identification and objectivity for American audiences, and he worked again with director

Harry Watt on a later Blitz documentary film, Christmas Under Fire (1941). The production was reassigned to the General Post Office (GPO) Film Unit from a newsreel company, Gaumont British News, which had seemingly taken an overly direct approach to its subject and would have proved too alarmist as propaganda. The official filmmakers were more attuned to the requirements of the Ministry of Information (MOI) and proved subtler in handling the sensitive material. While quietly asserting his objectivity, Reynolds, reinforced by the imagery, makes a passionate defence of civilisation and democracy as embodied in the British, while constantly exposing the cowardly, barbarous, and totalitarian nature of National Socialism. Language is crucial in this: Londoners are 'the greatest civilian army ever assembled' in 'heroic' defence of democratic freedoms; the German bombers are 'creatures of the night', a faceless and, by implication, cowardly enemy, who 'scurry away' at the coming of dawn.

The Blitz was the British name for the Luftwaffe's sustained night attacks on British cities from August 1940 to May 1941. While of some military significance, targeting docks, power stations, and important centres of communication, these largely aimed to terrorise the population and to exhaust morale. By the spring of 1941 the attacks had killed more than forty-three thousand civilians, injured a further one hundred and thirty-nine thousand, and devastated more than one million homes. London Can Take It is the outstanding documentary record of the attack against the metropolitan area and provides many seminal images of destruction and defiance that have passed into myth. A perfect example is the use of the dome of St Paul's Cathedral, which appears as a motif throughout the film. The opening credits play over its image and its placement in subsequent shots, miraculously undamaged amidst the carnage, evokes a potent symbol of defiance and the rightness of the national cause. Other shots and sequences both reinforce these values and resonate with the spirit of the People's War: householders calmly gathering their possessions into any available transport to move on to safer areas; bombed out store fronts sardonically declared as 'more open than usual'; and heavy rescue teams saving distressed cats from bombed out buildings. It is a powerful impression of the British character as stoical, courageous, civilised, self-deprecating, and indomitable.

The question of authorship is a prominent critical issue with regard to London Can Take It. There has been a tendency to attribute the achievements of the film to Humphrey Jennings, the most venerated of the wartime documentarists, with a corresponding undervaluation of the contribution of Harry Watt. It now seems clear that Watt fulfilled a supervisory role over the production, while Jennings was responsible for the remarkable imagery through leading the camera-crew out on location. For a long time, Stewart McAllister was the ‘forgotten man’ at the documentary film movement, but his monumental labours in editing London Can Take It and the unique care and precision he devoted to marrying sound and image have now been established beyond doubt. Perfectly in accord with the ethos of the time, London Can Take It was the product of collaborative effort, brought to realisation through the skill, effort, and dedication of a team of talented documentary filmmakers at the height of their powers.

A slightly shorter version of the film was released in Britain as part of the MOI’s short film programme. It was titled Britain Can Take It, as the authorities were sensitive to criticisms of selectivity and were keen to emphasise that ‘the film is representative of what is happening in every other British city and town, where resistance to intense aerial attack and powers of endurance are every bit as heroic’. According to reports prepared by Mass-Observation, the film was an overwhelming success for a short documentary and highly praised. There does seem, though, that a residue of hurt remained, as an independently produced film of the Manchester Blitz in December 1940 mischievously went under the name of Manchester Took It, Too (1941).

ALAN BURTON

See also: Jennings, Humphrey; Watt, Harry

London Can Take It (UK, GPO Film Unit, 1940). Directed by Harry Watt and Humphrey Jennings. Edited by Stewart McAllister.

Further reading

- Chapman, James, The British at War. Cinema, State and Propaganda, 1939–45, London: I.B. Tauris, 1998.
 Coultass, Clive, Images for Battle. British Film and the Second World War, 1939–45, London: AUP, 1989.

Sussex, Elizabeth, The Rise and Fall of British Documentary, Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1975.

Vaughan, Dai, Portrait of an Invisible Man. The Working Life of Stewart McAllister, Film Editor, London: BFI, 1983.

Watt, Harry, Don’t Look at the Camera, London: Paul Elek, 1974.

Lonely Boy

(Canada, Koenig, 1961)

Wolf Koenig and Roman Kroitor’s raw, unscripted portrayal of twenty-year-old pop sensation Paul Anka stands as a prototypical example of the National Film Board (NFB) of Canada’s style of cinéma vérité. Lonely Boy, a twenty-seven-minute, black-and-white film, made with a 16mm handheld camera and a portable sound recording system, displays all the major stylistic elements of cinéma vérité.

Some critics, notably Richard Barsam and Eric Barnouw, draw a distinction between direct cinema, which originated at the NFB, and cinéma vérité. They reserve the French term to designate the pronounced role the director plays in provoking the subject to reveal its ‘true essence’, whereas in direct cinema the director aims to avoid intrusion. However, this nuance, essentially a matter of degree, has been lost in general usage and the terms have coalesced to describe a rough, handheld style of filmmaking made possible by technological advances in the 1950s. The advent of lightweight, battery-powered cameras and portable sync-sound equipment extended the filmmaker’s reach into more intimate quarters. Maneuverability and spontaneity promised greater authenticity.

Koenig and Kroitor sought to capture Paul Anka in a medley of unscripted situations. The subject’s true essence, they believed, resided in the mundane, unguarded moment. Although given the subject, the mundane in Lonely Boy is decidedly extraordinary. Anka, an Ottawa native, was the first Canadian artist to crack the American pop charts, performing his own material. Kroitor said he wanted to present Anka as a ‘tragic figure’. The film takes its name from Anka’s 1959 hit, ‘Lonely Boy’.

Produced by Unit B, the NFB’s most experimental division, Lonely Boy was the last of the short television documentaries broadcast between 1958 and 1961 under The Candid Eye program title. The aim of Candid Eye films, said Koenig, was to 'show them on television to millions of people and make them see that life is true, fine, and full of meaning'. All the Candid Eye films were unscripted. This necessitated shooting more footage and spending more time on editing, where narrative structure would take shape.

The most arresting scenes in Lonely Boy involve seemingly marred footage that exposes the filmmakers' presence off camera. These 'out-takes', however, appear to be deliberate attempts to provoke the subjects into self-revelation, the defining characteristic of cinéma vérité. The first such moment occurs with Anka running late for an Atlantic City performance. Surprised by the filmmakers' presence as he bursts into his dressing room, Anka stares hard at the camera for a moment, then tells his entourage to 'just forget they're [the film crew] even there'. Koenig and Kroitor thus shred the veil between camera and audience, acknowledging that the camera exerts a pull on its subjects. Anka, stripped to his underwear, hastens to dress while bantering with his drummer and manager. Does the film capture the true Paul Anka, or rather Paul Anka playing to the camera?

Lonely Boy's most telling moments occur inside New York's famed Copacabana in the interplay between Anka and the nightclub's owner, Jules Podell. The imbalance in power between Anka and Podell, a show business czar whose patronage is crucial to Anka's performing career, is the 'essence of truth' captured in mundane details. As he wends his way through the kitchen to the stage, Anka greets the well-wishing Podell with an embrace and a kiss. Noticing the older man's unlighted cigarette, Anka lights it. Unit B's Candid Eye films had rejected scripts, presumably as dishonest. Yet Koenig and Kroitor unabashedly enlist Podell's help to stage a scene: 'You want the waiters to move around a little bit?' Podell asks the man behind the camera. 'OK. Bruno', he orders the maitre d', 'tell the waiters to ... like move around'. The request made of Podell appears to have been a ruse used to reveal character, that is, the boss exercising power. (If the hustle and bustle of waiters Podell commanded was filmed, it was never used.) As the Podell interview progresses, the questions coming off camera, Podell asks, 'Is it alright if I light the cigar?' The filmmakers' response is audible: 'Oh, yeah. Please.'

Building on these self-referential pieces, the defining scene in Lonely Boy is the request that the directors make of Podell and Anka to reenact a kiss. Anka's manager, Irvin Feld, is seated at a booth with Podell when Anka arrives to pay homage to 'Uncle Julie' on the last night of his three-week engagement: 'Surprise, I got something for you'. Cufflinks that match Podell's ring. Anka proffers a second gift: 'I promised you something for your office. It's a picture of me'. Podell acknowledges the tribute—'that's beautiful'—leans over and kisses Anka on the cheek. 'Will you do the kiss again?' asks one of the directors. The request draws forced, prolonged laughter from Anka. Podell, hand to ear, affects not having heard the question: 'No, I think you just want us to do it [inaudible]'. 'I'll tell you what happened, the camera just moved a bit', the director entreats. Anka leans over and kisses Podell's cheek: 'Thank you, Uncle Julie.'

Lonely Boy demonstrates the power of cinéma vérité's 'truth' while exhausting its syntax. However, the film uses more than one technique and contains more than one truth. Using the traditional journalistic interview, Koenig and Kroitor capture the testimony of the eyewitness by permitting subjects to shape their own stories in their own words. How does Anka explain the hordes of screaming teenage girls? 'Sex. They like to feel if I'm singing about a lonely boy, they're the girl I'm singing about.' Anka has excellent features, according to his manager: 'His eyes are great. He has a great mouth. And it's no secret last year we had a plastic surgery job on his nose.'

Ostensibly about the drive for success and the cultural phenomenon of idolatry, Lonely Boy is also a wry comment on cinematic truth. Playful and self-referential, the film is unafraid to bare and scrutinize its own assumptions. In perfectly splicing technique to subject, Koenig and Kroitor created a stylistic masterpiece that endures as the lucid documentation of a key stage in the history of popular culture.

TONY OSBORNE

See also: Koenig, Wolf

Lonely Boy (Canada, Koenig, 1961, 27 mins). Distributed by the National Film Board of Canada. Produced by Tom Daly and Roman Kroitor. Directed by Wolf Koenig and Roman Kroitor. Cinematography by Wolf Koenig (uncredited). Edited by Guy L. Cote and John Spotton. Sound by Ron Alexander, Marcel Carrière, and Kathleen Shannon.

Further reading

- Barnouw, Eric, Documentary: A History of Non-Fiction Film, New York: Oxford University Press, 1974.
- Barsam, Richard, Nonfiction Film: A Critical History, Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press, 1992.
- Bochner, Sally, 'National Film Board of Canada: Four Decades of Documentaries and Animation', in The Museum of Modern Art Circulating Film Library Catalog, Ann Arbor, MI: Edwards Brothers, 1984.
- Gittings, Christopher E., Canadian National Cinema, London: Routledge, 2002.
- Jacobs, Lewis, 'Documentary Becomes Engaged and Verite', in Lewis Jacobs (ed.), The Documentary Tradition, New York: W.W. Norton, 1979.
- Jones, D.B., 'The Canadian Film Board Unit B', in Alan Rosenthal (ed.), New Challenges for Documentary, Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1988.
- Leach, Jim and Sloniowski, Jeannette (eds), Candid Eyes: Essays on Canadian Documentaries, Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 2003.
- McIntosh, David, 'Realites Incertaines: La Documentaire 1939-92', in Sylvain Garel and Andre Paquet (eds), Les Cinemas du Canada, Quebec: Centre Georges Pompidou, 1992.

Long Tan: The True Story

(Australia, Horsfield, 1992)

Bruce Horsfield's self-proclaimed 'revisionist' Vietnam War documentary memorialises and celebrates a brief but bloody battle in South Vietnam on August 18, 1966. Long Tan (a small village near a major Australian Army Base) gave its name to what the film calls 'a rallying point for Australia's 50,000 Vietnam veterans'. Yet it was not until almost thirty years after the event that this detailed and comprehensive expository film was made. Australian fictional films (quintessentially, The Odd Angry Shot, 1979) and later television miniseries (Sword of Honour, 1986; Vietnam: The Mini Series, 1987) had seen Australian servicemen/women and Australian society generally, as complicit victims in a pointless, degrading US Cold War adventure. Images of helicopter gunships over muddy jungles filled Australian screens in the aftermath of the US defeat in Vietnam. That Australia had lost more than five hundred soldiers in support of America made memories of the 'dirty little war' hard to celebrate in a country that had always seen itself as innocently supporting King and Empire throughout the century. 'Vietnam vets' suffered guilt and shame that were frequently portrayed by the local media as a stain on the legendary reputation of 'returned soldiers' from the World War I Gallipoli campaign or from the Pacific theatre of World War II.

Although an Academy Award had been won by Australian cameraman Damien Parer for footage of heroism and comradeship in World War II New Guinea, it was the domestic medium of Australian television news that had chronicled the seemingly unending skirmishes between 'our diggers' (soldiers) and the VC (Viet Cong), as well as the massive US presence and (occasionally) the horrors of napalm deaths among the Vietnamese villagers whom Australia was supposedly attempting to help the Americans to 'liberate'. As in the United States, mass protests against Australian involvement and against conscription ('the draft', as it became known during the Vietnam War) also counterpointed the apparently pointless suffering ritualistically broadcast in the nightly television bulletins.

Long Tan: The True Story should be seen against this background. The documentary deliberately sets out to narrate and to reflect on the military significance of a particular battle. Although formally conservative (voice-over narration, archival war footage, interviews with participants in the battle and with war historians), it showed, for perhaps the first time on national television, ordinary middle-aged Australian men reflecting not just on military tactics, but on the tragedies, mistakes, and sheer good luck that befell them as reluctant Australian fighters. Significantly, the film includes interviews with similarly aging Vietnamese soldiers and other survivors of the combat, humanising them and creating empathy as it does so. So, through celebrating both the Vietnamese people's resilience and the signal victory of what they term 'the Australian mercenaries', the film works to counteract thirty years of guilty media reporting and analysis of Australia's involvement in Vietnam.

Long Tan presents villagers and soldiers explaining that their forces outnumbered the Australians four to one, that the VC were fighting 'a people's war' because they 'wanted to liberate the people from the Saigon government and provide land'. The legitimacy of the Vietnamese struggle is never questioned, yet the ANZAC (Australian and New Zealand soldiers) victory is celebrated in tones of quiet triumphalism, in voice-over:

The battle of Long Tan demolished forever the myth of Viet Cong invincibility, and never again did the Viet Cong seriously challenge the Australians.

As it shows the battle removed from its politically compromised history, focusing on the events and participants and presenting 'real' people's recollected stories, the film has attracted both criticism and praise. However, its achievement is that it can claim to have been significant in reinserting Australian imaginings of 'Vietnam' into the broad museum chronicle of the Australian armed services. The connotations of the guilt-laden term Vietnam shifted as a result of fact-based documentaries such as Long Tan. (It is important to remember that by the 1990s many thousands of [South] Vietnamese migrants and refugees had settled in Australia.)

The film uses words not frequently associated with Australian or New Zealand (fellow allies) recollections of the war. It speaks of a battle 'victory' in the context of the larger, humiliating American and allied defeat. Above all, it constructs the psychologically and numerically modest 'diggers' as continuing, rather than betraying, the ANZAC tradition that Australia sees as a central tenet of its national ideology.

Long Tan: The True Story was broadcast nationally by SBS TV in 1994, 1995, and 1997. It is estimated that up to two million viewers (ten percent of the Australian population) may have seen the documentary. In 1997 the film was acquired by the Australian ITS Pan-Asia Satellite and Cable Network, for broadcast in thirty-three Asia-Pacific countries.

PHILLIP BELL

Long Tan: The True Story (Australia, Communications Futures, 1993, 54 mins). Distributed by Film Australia. Produced, scripted, and directed Bruce Horsfield. Edited by Warren Hedges. New Zealand unit director: Tom Duncan. Commentary: Jim Downes; Lyndal Vozzo; Bradley White. Filmed in Australia, New Zealand, and Vietnam.

Further reading

- Bell, Philip, 'Remembering Vietnam', Current Affairs Bulletin 65, no. 2, 1988: 16–22.
- Bertrand, Ina, 'From Silence to Reconciliation: The Representation of the Vietnam War in Australian Film and Television', Historical Journal of Film, Radio and Television 8, no. 1, 1988: 75–89.
- Moran, Albert, 'Constructing the Nation: Institutional Documentary Since 1945', in A. Moran and T. O'Regan (eds), The Australian Screen, Ringwood, Australia: Penguin Books, 1989: 149–71.

Longinotto, Kim

Since the early 1980s British documentarian Kim Longinotto has been making films that have enjoyed regular airings on BBC television and at film festivals in the United States and Europe. Her most recent features have brought her international acclaim and recognition as a filmmaker whose production style imbues the observational style of 'classic' cinéma vérité with a feminist commitment to social change and advocacy. Her films have won awards for their ability to communicate 'universal' insights in an effort to improve local social conditions for women and girls.

There are two significant features of a Longinotto documentary: collaborative filmmaking with an all-female crew and a focus on women's positions in sex-segregated societies. Longinotto eschews voice-overs, preferring subtitles to translate subjects' dialogue. Although she sometimes includes interview footage, the interlocutor almost always remains out of frame. Although her collaborators are not 'native' informants, they typically enjoy a greater familiarity (language, law, customs) with the local populations that the films take as their subjects. Such intimacy allows Longinotto, who always serves as director of photography, to maintain her distance: 'What I love about making documentaries is that I can disappear. It is getting involved in a situation and letting it speak for itself' (Brookes 2000).

For Longinotto, 'outsider' status is an asset because in these pervasively patriarchal societies 'outsiders [...] are merely the future come early' (Brookes 2000). An all-female crew may face certain prejudices, but they are also allowed an uncommon level of access by 'lightly breaking the rules just standing there and assuming it's all right and seeing if you can get away with it' (Teasley 2000). Through her work, Longinotto directs the viewer's attention to subjects who challenge status quo rules in a similar way: subjects often presumed by mainstream press to suffer patriarchal oppression in silence.

Longinotto finds her motivation in working for women's social progress, giving those who have been spoken for a forum to make their own voices heard. In discussing her examination of a Tehran family court in Divorce Iranian Style, she acknowledges that her personal investment shapes her documentary philosophy: 'We're proud they [critics] say we're on the side of the women, because we are. We don't want to be objective. We try to film things as they happen but our emotion is definitely on the side of the women' (Bourke 2001).

Longinotto seeks to educate her audience through the sharing of stories. In particular, she hopes to teach Western viewers about the specifics of women's experiences around the world. This is an education made more compelling in Longinotto's estimation because it is rooted in documentary film's aesthetic and ethical commitments; she explains: 'if you have a story that you can get involved hopefully what's happening is that the audience isn't being told that these people are obviously in a different culture to us, but they have the same emotions as us. A way of getting close to people is through following their stories and getting [emotionally] involved in their stories' (Bourke 2001).

JULES ODENDAHL-JAMES

Biography

Born Kimona Sally-Anne Landseer in London, February 8, 1950. Privileged child of middle-class parents. Spent formative adolescent years at Hampden House, a boarding school in Buckinghamshire, until, at the age of thirteen, she was punished by a two-year stint at Coventry, a half-way house for 'troubled' teenagers, for getting lost on a school field trip. After completing secondary education, spent some time homeless on the streets of London rather than returning to her parents' home. Uncovered an old family name, Longinotto, while making her way across Europe, and which would be the name she would adopt permanently as she entered Essex University to study English literature and writing. An internship doing 'person-on-the-street' interviews for the Lambeth council propelled her towards filmmaking. Instead of pursuing a PhD, enrolled in England's National Film School where she studied camera work and directing. Her first film, Pride of Place, was a scathing critique of her former boarding school, which was closed down in the wake of the film's run. In 1988 formed Twentieth Century Vixen Productions with Claire Hunt, which she now runs alone under the title Vixen Films.

Selected films

- 1979 Pride of Place: director, cinematographer, producer
- 1981 Cross and Passion: director (with Claire Pollak), cinematographer, producer
- 1982 UndeRage: director, cinematographer, producer
- 1989 Eat the Kimono: director (with Claire Hunt), cinematographer, producer
- 1990 Hidden Faces: director (with Claire Hunt), cinematographer, producer
- 1992 The Good Wife of Tokyo: director (with Claire Hunt), cinematographer, producer
- 1993 Dream Girls: director (with Jano Williams), cinematographer, producer
- 1995 Shinjuku Boys: director (with Jano Williams), cinematographer, producer
- 1998 Divorce Iranian Style: director (with Ziba Mir-Hosseini), cinematographer, producer

Further reading

- Bourke, Philippa, 'Interview: With Gaea Girls, Kim Longinotto and Jano Williams Hit the Mat', indieWIRE 25 April 2001, www.indiewire.com.
- Brockes, Emma, 'Silent Witness: Interview with Kim Longinotto', G2: The Guardian Magazine, February 11, 2000: 8–9.
- Fowler, Catherine, 'The Day I Will Never Forget: An Interview with Kim Longinotto', Women: A Cultural Review 15, no. 1, March 2004: 101–7.
- Holden, Stephen, 'Having Their Day, or Not, in Court', The New York Times, December 9, 1998: E5.
- Mitchell, Elvis, 'An Unblinking Eye on a Searing Topic', The New York Times, March 29, 2003: D7.
- Morrow, Fiona, 'Beyond the Mat', Sight and Sound 10, no. 9, September 2000: 38.

- n.a., 'Chipping Away at Stereotypes: An Interview with Kim Longinotto and Jano Williams (Gaea Girls)', DOX: Documentary Film Magazine, October 31, 2000: 22–3.
- Neustatter, Angela, 'Splitting Images', G2: The Guardian Magazine, August 23, 1999: 6–7.
- Ramsey, Nancy, 'In Africa, Girls Fight a Painful Tradition', The New York Times, January 3, 2004: B23.
- Teasley, Sarah, 'Interview with Kim Longinotto', Documentary Box 16, no. 1 December 2000: 17–27.

Looking for Langston

(UK, Julien, 1989)

Looking for Langston has generated more critical attention than any other work to emerge from the Black British Film movement of the 1980s. Subtitled 'a meditation on Langston Hughes (1902–67) and the Harlem Renaissance', Isaac Julien's elegiac monochrome film examines issues around black gay identity, the responsibility of the black artist, and the construction of cultural memory, by bringing together two specific historical spaces: Harlem in the 1920s and London in the 1980s. The film thus draws on and participates in what Paul Gilroy calls 'the Black Atlantic': the black diasporic culture that traverses the Atlantic in an exchange of ideas, influences, and cultural forms, challenging the category of the national through its syncretism and hybridity.

Like Marlon Riggs's video Tongues Untied (released in the same year), Looking for Langston was one of the first black productions to explicitly address the subject of black gay identity. In their sophisticated use of performance and bracketing of documentary's expository function, both exemplify what Bill Nichols calls 'performative documentary'. Less dependent than conventional documentaries on photographic indexicality and the rhetorical construction of an argument, they rely far more on the evocation of specific cultural contexts and their structures of feeling. While Tongues Untied and Looking for Langston both use a poetic structure and incorporate poetry on their soundtracks, particularly work by contemporary black gay poet Essex Hemphill, they differ considerably in their performative aspects. Whereas Riggs's video constructs a sense of immediacy through his deployment of direct address, Julien's film combines music, poetry, voice-over commentary, archival footage, and dramatic tableaux in a dreamlike montage to reconfigure the imagined space of the Harlem Renaissance within black diasporic memory.

Frequently disavowed or relegated to crude psychopathology, the question of Langston Hughes's ambiguous sexuality and its relevance to his status as a black literary icon has become a contested issue for African American studies. Yet Looking for Langston does not constitute a search to discover and document the biographical 'truth' of Hughes's life as a means to resolve this question. As its title suggests, Looking for Langston is more interested in the psychic process of historical identification, of imagining one's relation to a particular historical moment, space, or figure. Julien does not produce a biographical documentary of Hughes, but rather a 'meditation' on this black icon, opening up an imagined space, in which the significance of black gay sexuality for the Harlem Renaissance, and black culture more generally, can be explored.

Looking for Langston opens with documentary images of 1920s Harlem and a female voice-over eulogizing an unnamed black cultural icon. This eulogy provides a sound bridge to the first dramatic tableau, which presents mourners at a wake standing around an open casket. The words are those of Toni Morrison, whom Julien recorded at James Baldwin's memorial service in 1987, while the tableau image self-consciously invokes the funereal photography of James Van Der Zee's Harlem Book of the Dead. Julien himself plays the part of the dead man (Hughes) in the casket (introducing therein the theme of historical identification).

Thus begins the film's rich montage of intertextual and historical references. Whereas historical documentaries conventionally label their intertextuality to authenticate their historical referentiality, Looking for Langston moves effortlessly among its literary, visual, and archival sources, seldom labeling their historical referents. By refusing to mark such references, the film blurs the boundaries between 'fact' and fiction, 'real' and imaginary, past and present. Julien uses several aesthetic techniques to facilitate the transition between these different modes: the tonal equalization of the film's monochrome cinematography, its numerous poetic sound bridges, and the continuity of its camera movement across different spaces.

At the center of the film's imagined historical space is the character of Alex, a black gay man who bears a physical resemblance to the younger Hughes. Wearing 1920s fashion throughout the film, he first appears listening to the sound of Hughes's voice (from a 1960s television broadcast) on a gramophone. Later he arrives at a nightclub, becoming erotically interested in another black gay man, Beauty, who has a possessive white lover. This triangular encounter generates several fantasy scenes that explore the racial dynamics of the eroticized look within gay culture through the appropriation of images by two influential gay photographers, George Platt Lynes and Robert Mapplethorpe. Julien restages specific homoerotic tableaux photographed by Lynes but de-exoticizes their inscription of race, reconfiguring the image of black male sexuality, according to Bell Hooks, with an unprecedented 'softness'. His appropriation of Mapplethorpe's photographs is more explicit: the white gay man moves among these images projected onto fabric, fetishistically caressing their surface.

The act of 'looking' invoked in the film's title consequently alludes both to the eroticized look directed toward black men and to the search by a contemporary black artist for kinship with historical predecessors from a different time and space. Manthia Diawara argues that in its web of appropriations and allusions, both queer (Mapplethorpe, Lynes, Kenneth Anger, Jean Cocteau, and Jean Genet) and black (Hughes, Baldwin, Oscar Micheaux, Bruce Nugent, and Bessie Smith), Looking for Langston simultaneously confronts (queer) avant-garde cinema with its Other (that is, race) and brings to the surface that which has been repressed in the historical image of the Harlem Renaissance (that is, homosexuality).

The film was widely acclaimed in Europe, receiving the Teddy Award (given for the best gay film) at the Berlin Film Festival, but its reception in the United States was disrupted by legal interventions undertaken by the Langston Hughes estate, which objected to what it considered 'a sensationalist misuse' of Hughes as a metaphor for black gay sexuality. In its injunction against perceived copyright infringement by the film's use of Langston's name and poetry, the estate's action not only mistook the film for a straightforward biographical documentary, it also demonstrated the very cultural suppression of black gay sexuality that the film challenges. Preempting his later shift to installation-based work, Julien reworked the material of Looking for Langston in 1990 as a performance piece installed in London's Kings Cross, entitled Undressing Icons.

ROGER HALLAS

See also: Julien, Isaac

Looking for Langston (UK, Sankofa, 1989, black and white, 45 mins). Distributed by the British Film Institute (UK) and Third World Newsreel (USA). Written and directed by Isaac Julien. Produced by Nadine Marsh-Edwards. Cinematography by Nina Kellgren. Music by Blackberri and Wayson Jones. Edited by Robert Hargreaves. Art direction by Derek Brown. Sound by Martin Jackson and Ronald Bailey. Texts by James Baldwin, Essex Hemphill, Bruce Nugent and Hilton Als. Voiceovers by Erick Ray Evans, Essex Hemphill, Wayson Jones, Toni Morrison, and Stuart Hall. Cast: Ben Ellison (Alex), Matthew Baidoo (Beauty), and John Wilson (Karl). Filmed in Norfolk, London and New York City.

Further reading

- Bravmann, Scott, 'Isaac Julien's Looking for Langston: Hughes, Biography and Queer(ed) History', Cultural Studies 7, no. 2, May 1993: 311–23.
- Diawara, Manthia, 'The Absent One: The Avant-Garde and the Black Imaginary in Looking for Langston', Wide Angle 13, nos. 3–4, July–October 1991: 96–109.
- Gates, Henry Louis, Jr, 'Looking for Modernism', in Manthia Diawara (ed.), Black American Cinema, New York: Routledge, 1993: 200–7.
- Gilroy, Paul, Small Acts: Thoughts on the Politics of Black Cultures, London: Serpent's Tail, 1993.
- Hemphill, Essex (ed.), Brother to Brother: New Writings by Black Gay Men, Boston: Alyson, 1991.
- Hill, John, British Cinema in the 1980s: Issues and Themes, Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1999.
- Hooks, Bell, Yearning: Race, Gender and Cultural Politics, Boston: South End Press, 1990.
- Mercer, Kobena, 'Dark and Lovely Too: Black Gay Men in Independent Film', in Martha Gever, John Greyson and Pratibha Parmar (eds), Queer Looks: Perspectives on Lesbian and Gay Film and Video, New York: Routledge, 1993: 238–56.
- Muñoz, Jose, Disidentifications: Queers of Color and the Performance of Politics, Minneapolis, MN: University of Minnesota Press, 1999.
- Nichols, Bill, Blurred Boundaries: Questions of Meaning in Contemporary Culture, Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press, 1994.

Saalfield, Catherine, 'Overstepping the Bounds of Propriety: Film Offends Langston Hughes Estate', The Independent (New York, NY) 13, no. 1, January–February 1990: 5–8.

Lorentz, Pare

Pare Lorentz was the first US sociopolitical documentary filmmaker. His most important films, The Plow that Broke the Plains (1936) and The River (1938), chronicled the problems and accomplishments of the New Deal, a series of initiatives by President Franklin D. Roosevelt to combat the ravages of the Depression, the Dust Bowl, and flooding in the Mississippi River Valley. Much like John Grierson in Great Britain, Lorentz saw film as a vehicle for educating and mobilizing the citizenry. Although he had never been a filmmaker, Lorentz had been a motion picture critic since 1927 when he began writing reviews for Judge magazine and later for the New York Evening Journal, Vanity Fair, Town and Country, and McCalls. Lorentz was well known in music circles in the United States and often wrote about the role of music in motion pictures. Following a complementary book on Roosevelt's first year as president, and an article about the Dust Bowl for Newsweek magazine, Lorentz was invited to make a film about the work of a New Deal relief agency, the Resettlement Administration (RA). The RA was charged with providing help for people impoverished by a long history of poor agricultural practices, the Great Depression, and a severe drought that plagued much of the mid-section of the country. Until Lorentz was hired, the RA had used only still photographs to provide a visual portrayal of the misery of the people in the region. Lorentz's goal was to make a government film that would be entertaining and commercially successful.

The Plow that Broke the Plains chronicled the settlement of the Midwestern portions of the United States and the farming and grazing practices that contributed to its degradation. Moving pictures of a dangerous dust storm provided much of the drama in the film, and a brief message at the end heralded the work of the RA in relocating displaced persons. In many ways, The Plow was the visual equivalent of John Steinbeck's famous novel, The Grapes of Wrath. In fact, in gathering material for the novel, Steinbeck traveled with Lorentz and 'listened to him expound his theory of the documentary film [and ...] unconsciously absorbed many of the Lorentz principles'. Lorentz combined images of the country's rugged individualism and entrepreneurship with American folk songs and a lyrical commentary never before seen in US documentaries. He used an unusual editing style, scoring the film and using the music to guide the editing. The music was composed by Virgil Thomson, who understood the need to blend hymns and folk songs with traditional orchestral and symphonic music. From the start, Lorentz saw music as an integral part of the film. 'From the beginning of my moviemaking years, even though I had never set foot in the cutting room or been behind a camera, I wished to keep control of the three elements of my film—pictures, music, and words—and to emphasize the elements in that order'. Lorentz's commentary, influenced by the style of French author Antoine de Saint-Exubery and by F.W. Murnau's Sunrise, and delivered by a former opera singer, Thomas Chalmers, was written in free verse. Its rhythm was achieved through alliteration, particularly the repetition of words and phrases, reminiscent of the style of American poet Walt Whitman. 'High winds and sun ... High winds and sun', the narrator warned, as settlers recklessly plowed the fragile ground. After the devastation caused by years of over-plowing, overgrazing, a severe drought and dust storms, the narrator intoned of the farmers, 'Baked out—blown out—and broke!' Another Lorentz technique was the use of counterpoint, particularly ironic comment. In one scene, as the camera surveys an abandoned home and surrounding landscape choked by the fallout from dust storms, organ music from The Doxology ('Praise God, from whom all blessings flow ...') playing in the background provides an ironic contrast to the images on the screen. Despite resistance from Hollywood to distribute a government film, and the complaint that The Plow was too long for a short feature and too short for a long feature, the film opened at a major theater in New York City, The Rialto, on May 28, 1936. Other bookings soon followed. Critics were generally favorable in their reviews, but some politicians, particularly those from areas featured in the film, believed that Lorentz had distorted the facts. A more ominous response was the belief by some in private industry and in Congress that the government had no business competing with Hollywood.

Pare Lorentz's other major film of merit was The River, produced in 1938. Its focus was on the Mississippi River Valley, a large section of the eastern and middle United States, the rivers and streams of which flowed into the Mississippi River, causing considerable flooding in spring-time, often displacing people and washing away topsoil. The theme was the relationship among water, land, and people. At one point the narrator states: 'But you cannot plan for water and land unless you plan for people.' The New York Times critic Bosley Crowther wrote that with the possible exception of Robert Flaherty's Nanook of the North, The River was the most famous American documentary film before World War II. While acknowledging its propaganda value in promoting the New Deal policies of President Franklin D. Roosevelt, Crowther said 'It turned out to be so finely written, so beautifully executed, and it had such an apt and original musical score that it gained a worldwide reputation as a great work of screen poetry.' The organizational structure of The River follows a chronological order much like that of The Plow. The film begins with a roll call of rivers that identifies the geographical area and sets the stage for their commercial use—particularly the transportation of cotton grown in the River Valley and lumber from adjacent mountains and hills. Next, it shows an impoverished South, reeling from the effects of a four-year civil war (1861–5) and the erosion of its farmland. The situation is made worse by lumbering practices in the North that leave the Valley vulnerable to flooding. 'We cut the top off Minnesota and sent it down the river. We cut the top off Wisconsin and sent it down the river. We left the mountains and the hills slashed and burned, and moved on.' The climax of the film is the flood sequence, dramatized by Lorentz's filming of the devastating flood of 1937 that killed people and livestock and left thousands homeless. The solution to the problem, given greater attention in The River than in The Plow, is a series of dams to control flooding, a forest and soil conservation plan, low-cost loans to build homes, and hydroelectric power, all provided by the government.

Lorentz again chose Thomas Chalmers to narrate the documentary and Virgil Thomson to score it. As in The Plow, Thompson used a combination of folk tunes, hymns, and original music inspired by the pictures. Lorentz wrote the narration. James Joyce described it as 'the most beautiful prose I have heard in ten years'. The key to Lorentz's writing was his poetic style and skillful use of alliteration, particularly repetition. 'The water comes downhill, spring and fall; Down from the cut-over mountains, Down from the plowed-off slopes, Down every brook and rill, rivulet and creek, Carrying every drop of water that flows down two-thirds the continent.'

Lorentz used an editing technique that biographer Robert Snyder called parallel structure. The three main sequences in the film, an opening sequence featuring a roll call of rivers, a lumbering sequence with a roll call of trees, and a flood sequence that repeats the names of rivers, are cut in a somewhat similar manner. According to Snyder, they 'reveal two of the most striking qualities of The River—its unity, and the artistic relationship between the visual and aural elements of the film'. The River was shown initially in cities in the Mississippi River Valley where it was greeted with much enthusiasm. It was first shown publicly in New York City on February 4, 1938. Paramount Pictures agreed to distribute the film. The River won first prize in the 1938 Venice Film Festival (over Leni Riefenstahl's Olympia) and made such a favorable impression on President Roosevelt that he offered to establish the United States Film Service, with Lorentz as its director.

The US Film Service, the purpose of which was somewhat similar to that of Great Britain's General Post Office (GPO) Film Unit, lasted from 1938 until 1941, although as early as 1939 Lorentz saw that the war in Europe would preclude any possibility of continuing support from President Roosevelt, as the nation's attention changed from domestic to international issues. During its brief existence, Lorentz began a film project on unemployment called Ecce Homo, which was never finished, and produced and directed a feature-length film, The Fight for Life, about the dangers encountered in childbirth. For the first time, Lorentz used professional actors and a detailed script. Some of the film was shot on location at the Chicago Maternity Center, located in Chicago's slums, and the rest on a sound stage in Hollywood. Controversy arose over the maternity death-rate figures cited by Lorentz. Nevertheless, the film garnered much praise from the medical profession for its realistic portrayal of the problems that obstetricians face, particularly when compounded by the poor health habits of people from poverty-stricken areas. The Fight for Life premiered in

New York City in March 1940 and was distributed by Columbia Pictures. Ironically, the police department in Chicago, offended by shots of Chicago slums, banned the film from being shown there. The US Film Service attracted two well-known documentary filmmakers, Joris Ivens and Robert Flaherty. Ivens produced Power and the Land (1940), a film showing what government-provided electricity meant to a typical farm family. The sponsor was the Rural Electrification Agency (REA), a New Deal agency that provided farms with inexpensive electric lighting and power. Lorentz hired Flaherty to direct The Land (1941), a film about the problems of farm families, including migrant farmers, and the government's role in promoting better use of the land. The Land was never shown commercially and in fact was not completed until Lorentz had resigned from the Film Service. Also, in 1940 the US Film Service lost its production authority and transferred responsibility for completion to the Agricultural Adjustment Administration.

Throughout its existence, the US Film Service had never received a permanent budget or congressional approval. Its budget had come from funds designated for various relief agencies. Despite the quality of films produced under his direction, Lorentz failed to convince Congress that a permanent government filmmaking body was in the best interest of the country. Unlike John Grierson, Lorentz was not a skilled politician. Powerful congressmen, suspicious that Lorentz and his colleagues were too far left-of-center, wary of Roosevelt's New Deal programs, and doubtful of the legality of a government motion picture production service, opposed the establishment of the Film Service. So did the public, who along with some congressmen were concerned about a domestic propaganda organization, and so did Hollywood, whose executives resented government intrusion into the entertainment business. These obstacles, coupled with President Roosevelt's preoccupation with events in Europe and the Far East, brought about the demise of the US Film Service.

During World War II Lorentz served in the Air Force and produced overseas flight crew briefing films. In 1946 he became Chief of Motion Pictures, Music and Theater for the Civil Affairs Division of the US Department of War. In that capacity he collaborated with Stuart Schulberg on Nuremberg (1946), an unimaginative but absorbing account of the Nuremberg Trials. Much of the footage shown by prosecutors was of Nazi atrocities.

CHURCHILL ROBERTS

See also: Plow that Broke the Plains, The River, The

Biography

Born in Clarksburg, West Virginia, December 11, 1905. Attended Wesleyan College 1922, and West Virginia University 1923–5. Motion picture critic for various magazines beginning in 1926 and co-author of Censored: The Private Life of the Movies (1930). Wrote The Roosevelt Year: 1933 (1934). Went to work for the Resettlement Agency in 1935 and directed his first film, The Plow that Broke the Plains (1936). Resettlement Administration transferred to the Department of Agriculture in 1937 and renamed the Farm Security Administration where Lorentz directed his second film, The River (1938). Director of United States Film Service 1938–40. Air Force Major and Lt. Col. in World War II. Died in Armonk, New York, March 4, 1995.

Selected films

- 1936 The Plow that Broke the Plains: writer, director
- 1938 The River: writer, director
- 1940 The Fight for Life: writer, director
- 1948 Nuremberg: archival researcher

Further reading

- Alexander, William, Film on the Left: American Documentary Film From 1931 to 1942, Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1981.
- Bergman, Andrew, We're in the Money: Depression America and its Films, New York: New York University Press, 1971.
- Crowther, Bosley, Vintage Films: 50 Enduring Motion Pictures, New York: Putnam, 1977.
- Lorentz, Pare, FDR's Moviemaker: Memoirs and Scripts, Reno, NV: University of Nevada Press, 1992
- Lorentz on Film, New York: Hopkinson and Blake, 1975
- The River, New York: Stackpole Sons, 1938.
- Snyder, Robert L., Pare Lorentz and the Documentary Film, Norman, OK: University of Oklahoma Press, 1968.

Stott, William, Documentary Expression and Thirties America, reprinted edn, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1986.

Louisiana Story

(US, Flaherty, 1948)

Often considered Robert Flaherty's masterwork, Louisiana Story is the culmination of Flaherty's poetic method, formally and thematically drawing together the promise that can be seen in Nanook of the North, Man of Aran, and The Land, with a mediation between modernity and regionalism. Whereas The Land marks a shift from the premodern nostalgia of the early film to an engagement with modernity, Louisiana Story directly addresses the issue of the environmental impact of mechanisation on the pristine environment of the bayous of Louisiana in a film sponsored by Standard Oil, albeit with the approval of the sponsor.

Louisiana Story tells the tale of the disruption that mechanisation, in particular the speculative oil drilling performed by an oil company in the hitherto untouched, pristine environment of a Louisiana bayou can bring to the environment. The film focuses on the Cajun Latour family, in particular Alexander Napoleon Ulysses Latour whose youth and innocence personifies the virgin wetlands, recalling the figures of Nanook and Moana from the earlier films. As Louisiana Story is a sponsored documentary, evidence of the sponsor must appear. Thus, although the presence of the oil derrick initially disrupts the environment, normality is returned when the mobile oil drilling mechanism moves on.

Like many of the classic documentaries of this era, Louisiana Story used some of the foremost practitioners of the era. Helen Van Dongen was an experienced editor who had worked with Joris Ivens on films such as Rain, Borinage, The New Earth, and The Spanish Earth and had worked on The Land with Flaherty; therefore she was used to his more speculative approach to narrative construction. Richard Leacock was a young camera operator who, of course, was to forge his own notable career. Frances Flaherty, Leacock, and Van Dongen also provided production and editorial assistance. Another member to join the production was composer Virgil Thomson, who had provided the scores for Pare Lorentz's The Plow that Broke the Plains and The River. Thomson's role was crucial in incorporating the multitude of natural sounds with a variety of themes associated with the different characters. Thomson achieved this remarkable feat mainly through his early association with the production. He viewed early rushes and versions of the film and became an integral part of the working-up of the final film, rather than being presented with images and dialogue on which to layer music (Calder-Marshall 1963: 223).

Of all these people it is probably van Dongen who especially warrants further mention. She had the unenviable task of working without a shooting script, with Flaherty insisting on obtaining a vast amount of material that contained particular symbols or tones, with little regard for their effectiveness in the overall script. Van Dongen's concern for continuity and narrative combined well with Flaherty's search for tonal images; not one aspect forsaken for the other but a dilution of narrative imperatives to accommodate the naivety of Flaherty's vision for the world seen through the eyes of the Cajun boy.

Louisiana Story recalls Grierson's enthusiasm for Flaherty's use of 'the found story'. It is reported that in their research trip through the southern states of the United States, Frances and Robert Flaherty stumbled across an oil derrick being relocated, and that this provided the initial images and commencement point for the production. In Louisiana Story it is possible to see a convergence of the found story and the 'slight narrative' that Kracauer derives from Paul Rotha (Kracauer 1997: 247). Flaherty's notion that the documentary narrative should 'come out of the life of a people, not from the actions of individuals' as part of the daily routine of his native people (Rotha 1968), is used in the rendering of a life lived on the bayou. The slight narrative is affected through the ripples created by the appearance of the oil derrick, making for a tendentious narrative device that recalls Flaherty's earlier films such as the hunting of the walrus in Nanook and of the basking shark in Man of Aran. Yet in Louisiana Story the episodic nature of Flaherty's oeuvre is restrained, less melodramatic, and more concomitant with an appeal to the fragility of the world initially under threat from the industrial world of oil production.

Unlike Flaherty's earlier films, Louisiana Story marks a reconciliation of industrial modernity, initially dealt with in The Land, with an endemic regionalism apparent in the likes of Nanook and Moana. In this reconciliation it is possible to understand Kracauer's enthusiasm for the film whereby the alienation from the modern world is directly addressed through its filmic representation. The response to modernity imposing itself on the environmental and psychic realms of postwar capitalism is countered through Flaherty's insistence on a naive vision that promotes a sense of wonder at not only the natural world but at how that natural world can be understood in the face of the industrialisation of this Eden. For Flaherty and Kracauer, the poetic rendering of the world makes it possible to reengage the spectator who feels that they have been alienated from things such as the 'the ripple of leaves stirred by the wind' (Kracauer 1997: 31) or, in the case of Louisiana Story, the ripples on the water stirred by the passing of a canoe.

DEANE WILLIAMS

See also: Flaherty, Robert

Louisiana Story (US, The Standard Oil Company of New Jersey, 1948, 77 mins). Produced and directed by Robert Flaherty. Story by Frances and Robert Flaherty. Associate producers: Richard Leacock and Helen Van Dongen. Photography by Richard Leacock. Edited by Helen van Dongen. Music by Virgil Thomson. Sound recording by Benjamin Doniger, with assistance from Leonard Stark.

Further reading

- Barsam, Richard Meran, The Vision of Robert Flaherty: The Artist as Myth and Filmmaker, Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press, 1988.
- Calder-Marshall, Arthur, The Innocent Eye: The Life of Robert Flaherty, London: W.H. Allen, 1963.
- Grierson, John, 'First Principles of Documentary', in Forsyth Hardy (ed.), Grierson on Documentary, London: Faber & Faber 1966: 199–211.
- Kracauer, Siegfried, Theory of Film: The Redemption of Physical Reality, second edn, Introduction by Miriam Bratu Hansen, Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1997.
- Rotha, Paul, Documentary Film, With Contributions from Sinclair Road and Richard Griffith, Glasgow: The University Press, 1968.
- Winston, Brian, 'The White Man's Burden', Sight and Sound, LIV: 1, winter 1984–5: 58–60.

Low, Colin

The National Film Board (NFB) of Canada's Colin Low stands as one of the finest examples of the multitalented filmmakers employed by the institution during its history. Over a span of fifty-five years at the NFB, the director/producer/ animator/cinematographer was involved with nearly two hundred films. With interests ranging from animation shorts to technology-intensive nonfiction features to socially relevant projects, Low is responsible for some of the most successful films in the NFB's history in terms of sales and circulation, and is recognized as one of the single most influential figures in Canadian documentary.

As a member of the prolific group of filmmakers in the NFB of Canada's Unit B of the 1950s and early 1960s, Low was one of several figures who helped to refine both documentary film language and the collaborative working method that epitomized Canadian nonfiction filmmaking. Low's earliest documentary work was clearly rooted in his experience as an animator. Low felt that the 'patient, detailed single-frame work [required of animation] generated a working discipline quite different from the [contemporary] live-action documentary school' (Jones 1981). His first documentary with Unit B, Corral (1954), was part of the Faces of Canada project designed to find the 'Canadian character' in Canadian towns. A lyrical short capturing the lonely life of a western Canadian rancher, the documentary won critical acclaim and first prize at the 1954 Venice International Film Festival and is now considered one of the NFB's first 'auteur films'. Released without voice-over commentary at the request of the filmmaker, Corral illustrated Low's deft ability to anticipate the pattern and poeticism of the images before they had been confirmed in the editing room. His follow-up, City of Gold (codirected by Roman Kroitor, 1957), featured a poetic commentary from Pierre Berton and, with its groundbreaking use of still photography, asserted Low's interest in technology's role in filmmaking, leading to a series of projects that would each result in major filmmaking innovations.

As part of the Challenge for Change program implemented in 1967, Low moved into socially conscious filmmaking. Low's indelible print on the program was made with the Fogo Island series, consisting of twenty-eight films focusing on the residents of a small, increasingly unsustainable fishing community north of Newfoundland. Low's focus was to give a voice to his subjects and a vehicle for its delivery to local and federal government. 'I thought it was a lot better to examine a situation', said Low, 'the outcome of which was not yet determined, rather than look at another melancholy social mistake' (Jones 1981).

Throughout his career, Low was a leader at the NFB with a number of important roles including tenure as the director of Regional Production beginning in 1976, a period that confirmed his status as an icon and mentor to a new generation of documentary filmmakers. With his final film at the NFB, Moving Pictures (2000), Low glanced back on his career by tracing his own awareness of war with a dissection of technology's increasing ability to create and distribute still and moving images more efficiently.

MICHAEL B. BAKER

See also: Canada; Challenge for Change/Société Nouvelle

Biography

Born in Cardston, Alberta on July 24, 1926. Attended the Banff School of Fine Arts and the Calgary Institute of Technology before joining the National Film Board of Canada as an animator in 1945. Appointed Head of the Animation Unit at the NFB 1950. Directed first documentary short, Corral, 1954. Pioneered large-format filmmaking with In the Labyrinth (codirected by Roman Kroitor), 1967. Established Memorial University Film Unit in Newfoundland while working on the Fogo Island series 1967. Appointed executive producer of Studio C 1972. Appointed director of Regional Production 1976. Introduced OMNIMAX technology with Atmos 1979. Appointed to the Royal Order of Canada 1996. First Anglophone awarded Prix Albert Tessier/Prix du Québec 1997. Retired from NFB following final film Moving Pictures, 2000. Member of the Royal Canadian Academy.

Selected films

1953 The Romance of Transportation: director

1954 Corral: director, writer
 1957 City of Gold: codirector
 1960 Circle of the Sun: director, cowriter
 1967 Billy Crane Moves Away (part of the twenty-eight-film Fogo Island series): director
 1967 In the Labyrinth: codirector
 1974 Cree Hunters of Mistassini (Ianzelo, Richardson): producer
 1982 Standing Alone: director
 2000 Moving Pictures: director, writer, narrator

Further reading

- Evans, Gary, In the National Interest: A Chronicle of the National Film Board of Canada from 1949 to 1989, Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1991.
- Glassman, Marc and Wise, Wyndham, 'A Filmmaker of Vision: Take One's Interview with Colin Low' Take One 23, spring 1999.
- Jones, D.B., The Best Butler in the Business: Tom Daly of the National Film Board, Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1996.
- Movies and Memorandum: An Interpretative History of the National Film Board of Canada, Ottawa: Canadian Film Institute, 1981.
- Tibbetts, John C., 'All That Glitters', Film Comment 2, March–April, 1995.
- Villeneuve, Rene, 'Interview with Colin Low, Tony Ianzelo, Ernie McNabb', Perforations 2, April 1992.

Lozinski, Marcel

Polish documentaries have frequently served to depict the often volatile societal developments in that nation. Marcel Lozinski, however, dominated Polish documentary film in the 1990s not by the direct representation of extraordinary political events, but by the indirect representation of such events through the stories of individuals in everyday situations.

Although Lozinski does not avoid inspiring events, his is a quest to present viewers with the opportunity to explore the mystery, the innocence, and the tragedy of the everyday. His expertise in taking a documentary subject and presenting to the viewer not only a glimpse into an individual life, but a glimpse into the societal struggles of a village or city, the biases between the genders or age groups, or the political injustices of his country, exemplifies his contribution to documentary film. Lozinski's films convey the universality of life, exposing the depths of human struggle and hardship waiting beneath the surface of our every action.

In the short subject field, Lozinski demonstrates his mastery of indirect sociopolitical revelation. His 1993 film, 89mm From Europe, focuses on one trivial event, the hardly perceptible relations between European passengers traveling on a train, and the railwaymen who change the wheel track of all trains entering their country. Lozinski presents the demarcation line between Western and Eastern civilizations, between the rich and the poor, between those who aspire to achieve success but fail and those who have succeeded in making a name for themselves. Even the title—89 millimeters—reveals Lozinski's probing style, as it represents the measured difference between the rail widths of the rails in Europe and the rails of the former Soviet Union.

Lozinski's next project, Everything Can Happen (1995), again takes on the sublimity of humanity, by focusing on a sequence of conversations between a young boy and elderly people lingering on a park bench, and transforming the encounter into a philosophical treatise. Lozinski contrasts the naive sincerity of six-year-old Tomaszek with the dignity of elderly people engaged in the polite activity of adapting themselves to the child's comprehension level. The universal topics of loneliness, life, and fear of death find a direct voice through the indirect convergence of individuals, young and old, engaged in the simple activity of conversation. Here, Lozinski presents to his viewers questions often avoided or feared, by exploring the concept of death through the innocence of the young.

Lozinski conceives of the documentary film as a medium through which the viewer feels, through contact with real subjects, the essence of life and the irreversibility of the passage of time. In a Visit (1974) and So It Doesn't Hurt (1998), Lozinski enters the lives of two women who have succeeded in their chosen professions—one as a city journalist and the other as a rural farm manager. Lozinski chronicles the contrasting views of two women experiencing different definitions for the concept of ambition that spans more than two decades and in the process opens a window into the complexities of the competitive nature of society that views one person's accomplishment as another person's laxity.

Lozinski played an active role in the rise of Production Unit X. Created under the supervision of Andrzej Wajda, a leading figure of Polish cinema, this group of filmmakers became known as the representatives of the cinema of moral anxiety. Lozinski brought to this collection of filmmakers an ability to pursue the moral dilemmas of contemporary Polish society from an indirect perspective. His interest in seeking conciliatory answers to difficult situations of human existence and presenting them through the medium of film imparted his work with a timeless character.

CHRISTINE MARIE HILGER

See also: Poland

Biography

Born in Paris, France in 1940. Earned a degree in documentary film from the State Academy of Film, Television, and Theatre of Lodz in 1971. In 1973 began career as a director for the Warsaw Documentary Studio. Awards for documentary film include the FIPRESCI award (1981), an Oscar nomination (1994), and the Golden Pigeon award (1998). In 2001 participated in the Shoah Foundation by codirecting I Remember with Polish director Andrzej Wajda.

Selected films

- 1973 Happy End: producer, director
- 1981 Microphome Test: producer, director
- 1991 Katyn Forest: director
- 1994 89mm From Europe: director
- 1994 Everything Can Happen: producer, director
- 1998 So It Doesn't Hurt: director
- 2001 I Remember: codirector

Further reading

- Ackerman, Peter and DuVall, Jack, A Force More Powerful: A Century of Nonviolent Conflict (Polish Documentary), New York: St Martin's Press, 2000.
- Aitken, Ian, European Film Theory and Cinema: A Critical Introduction, Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press, 2001.
- Corner, John, Documentary and the Mass Media, London: Arnold, 1986.
- Orvell, Miles, After the Machine: Visual Arts and the Erasing of Cultural Boundaries, Jackson, MS: University Press of Mississippi, 1995.
- Rotha, Paul, Documentary Diary, New York: Hill and Wang, 1973.

Lumière Brothers, The

In the history of cinema, the significance of Louis and Auguste Lumière cannot be overstated. The device they invented, the cinematographe, was a major contribution to the institution we today refer to as cinema. The special qualities of this device were critical in the development of documentary film practice. Although it is a bit of an oversimplification to accept the divide between the Lumières and George Méliès as the founders of the two major strands of film, documentary and fiction, it is nevertheless the case that the Lumières' films represent the origins of a method of filming that attempts to show life as it is lived. All documentary filmmakers, from Flaherty to Grierson, Drew Associates to Ken Burns, Michael Moore to Errol Morris, owe some debt to the practice of the Lumières and their cameramen. Louis Lumière in particular is considered by many scholars to be the father of documentary film (Barnouw 1993).

The Lumières had substantial access to capital that financed their efforts. They were the sons of a successful painter and photographic equipment manufacturer, as evidenced by the first motion picture film they shot, Workers Leaving the Lumière Factory (1895). The Lumière family had a substantial business that employed three hundred people in a single factory in Lyon, France. They were encouraged by their father, Antoine, to improve on Edison's kinetoscope, which debuted in France in 1894.

The brothers—in particular Louis—developed the cinematographe in early 1895. The camera had several advantages over Edison's device (and those of other competitors). A hand-crank operated the machine (as opposed to the battery-powered electricity of the kinetograph), thus making the device portable. It was also a three-in-one device: camera, printer, and projector, allowing the operator to record the events happening around him and project such recorded films with great speed.

The first known films by Louis Lumière were of his employees leaving the factory. The event was clearly carefully staged, and indeed at least two other films of Workers Leaving the Lumière Factory are known to exist, suggesting Lumière's interest in careful composition. In the first film, dated March 1895, the doors to the factory are already open and workers are pouring out. By the time Lumière filmed them months later, a degree of narrative has been developed: the doors open, workers leave, and the doors close (almost—one person sneaks back inside at the last minute).

Lumière also filmed his family. He filmed his brother Auguste and sister-in-law feeding their baby, and his father and two associates drinking beer, for example.

Louis Lumière next took the cinematographe to the streets of Lyon, filming what would be called actualities: the streetcars and horse-drawn carriages and, in a famous film, a train arriving at La Ciotat station. The latter film suggests some degree of cinematic composition. For example, the diagonal perspective of the train moving from the upper right background to the lower left foreground becomes a common set-up for the camera, which provided remarkable depth of focus.

In terms of the birth of the cinema, the screening for a paying audience of a program of ten short films in the Salon Indien, in the basement of the Grande Café in Paris on December 28, 1895 is commonly accepted as the first time motion pictures were so presented. The program, modestly advertised, was an immediate success; soon after the debut, the Grand Café was running twenty half-hour shows daily, bringing in 2,500 francs (Barnouw 1993). The famous story of viewers ducking to get out of the way of the moving train is probably apocryphal, though Barsam (1992) suggests that this reaction should be considered in the context of a widely reported railroad accident at the Gare Montparnasse two months earlier (the first train film was not filmed at the time of the first screening; see later). Nevertheless, much was made of the power of the device to capture life. The projection of the film for an audience contributed to this reception, for it contrasted with the single-view, peep-show format of the kinetoscope. At the Grand Café, and soon other theaters around the world, the cinematographe presented large, well-photographed moving images that suggested fragments of life. Viewers noted the way in which the leaves moved in the background of several of the films, which added to the feel of authenticity to the presentations. As Andre Gaudreault (in Elsaesser 1993) observes, it was the sense of spontaneity of the nonhuman movement of the leaves and of the waves in a film such as Boat Leaving the Port that astonished audiences.

By the time of the cinematographe's debut, Louis Lumière had already established his economic strategy for exploiting the device. He had contracted an engineer to manufacture several hundred cameras and was training operators to take the device around the world. The company also delayed accepting purchase orders for the device so that it would ensure itself profits from the device's first appearances abroad. Shortly after the Grand Café opening, scores of cinematographe premieres began: London, New York, Brussels, Rome, Moscow, Copenhagen, Tokyo, Melbourne, and Delhi. A special feature of the programs was that the operator could film a scene in the daytime and show it to that audience in the evening, thus ensuring the audience's confidence that the program was not a trick-show. People got to see themselves projected onto the screens of local theaters and music halls. Within two years of Lumière's first films, the catalogue numbered more than seven hundred and fifty films, which began to be sold to individuals willing to purchase the equipment to project them. At this time Lumière announced a shift in its policy. Their demonstration tours, which had brought such fame to the device and began cinema as an institution in at least dozens of countries, would cease, and the company would concentrate on the sale of equipment, including raw film stock and the catalogue of films (by 1900 this catalogue numbered almost one thousand three hundred). No more would the company be involved in filmmaking, although several of their camera operators would remain active in teaching cinematography and working with other organizations.

Given the cinematographe's portability, Lumière cameramen traveled the world, filming daily activities. Some films were street scenes of hustling city dwellers; others created motion by placing the camera on a moving object such as a boat or train. Yet these were not wholly improvised slices of life. As mentioned previously, camera framing was crucial, but more important, individuals were in some cases prodded into various kinds of actions. The servant in the beer-drinking film is clearly exaggerating his interest in his master's card game. In Water Toboggan, a film of a flume ride, one person, having left the frame, returns and beckons his companions to do the same, pretending to look at something in the water, in an effort to 'kill time' until the film runs out. Most famously is the case of the so-called first comic film L'Arroseur arrosé (translated as The Waterer Watered, but other titles include The Gardener's Trick, A Trick on the Gardener, Watering the Gardener, and others). There are two known versions of this film. In one the framing is flat, almost two-dimensional; the other film, presumably shot later, suggests a greater understanding of composition in depth.

If we credit Lumière with being the father of documentary, we must also acknowledge that the 'problems' posed by documentary films also began with Lumière. The selection of events to film reflects particular subjective positions. In France it was probably easy enough to film the middle and working classes in public places and create fascinating composition (see, for example, Washerwomen on the River, with at least four planes of activity in clear focus: the women washing, their reflections in the water, men above them watching, and trucks traveling along the road above). However, in many places abroad, the device became used primarily to photograph royalty. Events such as the coronation of Czar Nicholas II of Russia and the funeral of Queen Victoria of England became common. They became testaments to imperial authority. The films also were testaments to colonialist thinking: films of natives dancing in ceremonies, such as African Knife Dance, arguably the first ethnographic films, appeal to Western audiences' presumptions about indigenous peoples. A particularly disturbing film is Children Gathering Rice Scattered by Western Women, filmed in Vietnam, then the French colony Indochina. The women, dressed in fine clothes, toss rice to poorly dressed Vietnamese children, as if they were feeding animals at a zoo.

It is difficult to fully express how these films were received; the motion picture camera represented a new mode of perception, and indeed the Lumières tended to believe in the camera's scientific importance rather than its artistic aspect. The Lumière brothers stated their belief that the camera, after its novelty phase, would largely serve a scientific function. They did not foresee all the possibilities their device would unleash, including a massive entertainment industry. The Lumières' legacy is enormous, in part for the very device they developed, but also for a mode of recording life in a new manner.

To coincide with the one hundredth anniversary of their achievements, the Lumière Trust invited sixty filmmakers to work on a project titled Lumière and Company. Each director was given an opportunity to work with a refurbished cinematographe to produce a single fifty-second film, working as close to within the confines of the original cameramen as possible (sound was permitted). Some created fictional formats; others, such as Spike Lee's footage of his young son, recall the home-movie styles of films like Feeding the Baby. It was an interesting tribute, but more a testament to what the Lumières' device had wrought than to the aesthetic they pioneered.

TOM GROCHOWSKI

See also: Workers Leaving the Lumière Factory and Other Lumière Shorts

Selected films

Note: the Lumière catalogue is too large to list here; all titles mentioned in this article are available on video and DVD in the United States on Kino International's The Lumière Brothers: The First Films. The following is a list of the ten films first presented at the Grand Café:

Workers Leaving the Lumière Factory Horseback Jumping
 Fishing for Goldfish
 Debarkation of the Photographic Congress
 Members at Lyon
 The Blacksmiths
 A Little Trick on the Gardener
 Feeding the Baby
 Blanket Toss
 The Place des Cordeliers at Lyon La Mer

Further reading

- Barnouw, Erik, Documentary: A History of the Non-fiction Film, New York: Oxford University Press, 1993.
- Barsam Richard M., Nonfiction Film: A Critical History, Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press, 1992.
- Elsaesser, Thomas (ed.), Early Cinema: Space, Frame, Narrative, Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press, 1993.
- Musser, Charles, The Emergence of Cinema, Berkeley, CA, University of California Press, 1990.

Lye, Len

The New Zealand-born filmmaker, painter, kinetic sculptor, writer, and theorist Len Lye became a leading avant-garde artist in London and New York, bridging pre- and post-World War II movements and trends. Associated with many important art groups, beginning with London's Seven and Five Society in the 1920s, the International Surrealist Movement in the 1930s, and the Kinetic Art Movement in the 1960s, Lye is best remembered for his contributions to the development of international abstract cinema. In the early 1930s he experimented with color printing processes such as Dufaycolor and Gasparcolor while pioneering 'direct animation', a method of painting, scratching, and stenciling directly onto motion picture celluloid. Aided by commissions from the British General Post Office (GPO), the Imperial Tobacco Company, Shell Motor Oil, and Imperial Airways, his whimsical animated films of the mid-to-late 1930s included original 'camera-less' techniques, advertising slogans, and dynamic musical rhythms. A fierce individualist and anarchistic thinker, Lye claimed that: 'There has never been a great film unless it was created in the spirit of the experimental filmmaker.' When applied to his seldom seen but formally inventive war effort films, this statement illuminates Lye's underrecognized contribution to the British documentary movement.

Commissioned by John Grierson in 1934 to produce promotional films for the GPO Film Unit, Lye did not share Grierson's social-democratic corporatist ideology; nor did Lye's early handmade films display the didactic, institutional form of the GPO's more widely circulated productions during this formative period. Conversely, Grierson's notion of documentary as the 'creative treatment of reality', coupled with his strong sense of social responsibility, may have focused Lye's thinking when he began directing instructional films for Britain's Ministry of Information during World War II. His theory 'Individual Happiness Now', developed in 1941 and refined throughout the war years, provides an important context for these films. Stressing spontaneity, individuality, and artistic experience, Individual Happiness Now was conceived 'as an alternative to the usual wartime appeals to nationalism or religion' (Horrocks 2001). Though Lye's information films were the product of their wartime context, these documentaries contain distinct auteur traces, experimental techniques, and technological innovations that run counter to their training and propaganda objectives.

Lye's Work Party (1942), a slice-of-life film about women working in a munitions factory, was criticized at the time of its release for not having enough 'propaganda value' (Horrocks 2001). Anticipating cinéma vérité, Work Party featured handheld camerawork and an unobtrusive, observational style. When The Pie Was Opened (1941), a film about coping with food rations, included surrealist diversions, an imaginative, playful storyline, and visual and aural puns. Newspaper Train (1941), about the importance of keeping people informed and countering Nazi propaganda, mixed live-action and animation and used an unusual, disjunctive editing style. It was also the first film to print two separate soundtracks side-by-side, one for dialogue and one for sound effects. Kill or Be Killed (1942), a taut psychological thriller pitting German and British soldiers against one another in a test of skill and dexterity, is considered one of the best war effort films. Inserting dramatic elements into a standard training film, Kill or Be Killed demonstrates Lye's ability to formulate new genres or genre hybrids while expanding documentary parameters. Cameramen at War (1943), a compilation of footage taken by World War I and II newsreel cameramen, was Lye's last assignment for Britain's Ministry of Information. Constructed on the editing bench from archival material, the film highlights his decisive editing technique, specialized ability, and professional approach. At the same time Lye must have felt some personal kinship with his subjects, who were likewise pressed into documentary film out of wartime circumstances.

Lye's contribution to the history of documentary film continued with his work for Louis de Rouchemont's international newsreel program, The March of Time. From 1944 to 1951, Lye worked as a field director for the series, directing short documentaries and newsreel sequences and gathering footage for the monthly news magazines. After relocating from London to New York to direct a March of Time assignment on Basic English with the literary critic I. A. Richards, Lye suddenly found himself in the new centre of modern art. Galvanized by the creative energy of New York's art scene, Lye spent most of the 1950s writing and developing commercial and noncommercial film projects. Synthesizing his work in experimental and documentary film, Rhythm (1957) combines amateur and professional modes of production. Made using documentary outtakes of the Chrysler assembly line, which were reedited, hole-punched, and scratched on, the kinetic Rhythm pioneered TV commercial jump cutting. After a long struggle to find employment on Madison Avenue from the late 1950s to the late 1960s, however, Lye ceased making films, devoting most of his artistic energies to kinetic sculpture.

Although Lye's documentaries often belied his anarchistic spirit and leftist values, it is important to recognize that these films were collaborative productions financed by a government information ministry at a time of war. Working within a compartmentalized production system where every staff member was paid the same and given equal credit, it may be inaccurate to claim that Lye 'authored' these films. His work in documentary film was short-lived and ephemeral, but its traces can still be located in the cinéma vérité movements of the following decades. Throughout his career Lye tested the limits of experimental and documentary cinema. An outsider with the determination, intuition, and insight to move within several artistic and industrial circles simultaneously, Lye's films opened up space for an art of documentary.

BRETT KASHMERE

See also: Grierson, John; March of Time, The

Biography

Born in Christchurch, New Zealand, July 5, 1901. Studied briefly at Wellington Technical Institute 1915, and at Canterbury Art College, New Zealand 1919. Lived for a year in the Polynesian islands of Samoa, 1923, before being deported to Sydney, Australia. Arrived in London, England 1926. Exhibited with London's Seven and Five Society 1927. Pioneered direct animation techniques 1933. Received first commission from British GPO Film Unit 1934. Won prize at the Brussels Film Festival 1935. Participated in International Surrealist Exhibition in London 1936. Directed war effort documentaries for the British Ministry of Information 1941–3. Hired by The March of Time film series 1943. Moved to New York's Greenwich Village 1944 and continued working on The March of Time until 1951. Won second prize at the Belgian International Experimental Film Competition 1958. Became a leading figure in the kinetic art movement during the 1950s and 1960s. First kinetic sculpture, Fountain, exhibited at Leo Castelli Gallery 1961. Tangible Motion Sculptures exhibited at the New York Museum of Modern Art 1961. Died in New York City, May 15, 1980.

Selected films

1941 Newspaper Train
 1941 When The Pie Was Opened
 1942 Work Party (aka Factory Family)
 1942 Kill or Be Killed
 1943 Cameramen at War

1944–51 The March of Time: contributing director and cameraman
 1957 Rhythm

Further reading

Curnow, Wistan and Horrocks, Roger, Figures of Motion: Len Lye, Selected Writings, Auckland: Auckland University Press, 1984.
 Davy, Sarah, 'Len Lye: The Film Artist in Wartime', in Len Lye: A Personal Mythology, Auckland: Auckland City Art Gallery, 1980.
 Fielding, Raymond, The March of Time, 1935–51, New York: Oxford University Press, 1978.
 Horrocks, Roger, Len Lye: A Biography, Auckland: Auckland University Press, 2001.
 Sussex, Elizabeth, The Rise and Fall of British Documentary, Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1975.
 Swann, Paul, The British Documentary Film Movement, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1989.

M

Macartney-Filgate, Terence

Terence Macartney-Filgate—scriptwriter, cinematographer, director, producer, and iconoclast—is best known for his pioneering work on Candid Eye, the landmark series of documentary films made by the National Film Board (NFB) of Canada for CBC Television in 1958–9. These films, which combined a reportage style with handheld camera, sync-sound, natural lighting, and noncontinuity editing, represented an important challenge to the authoritative, didactic documentary tradition entrenched by the NFB’s founder and first commissioner, John Grierson.

Macartney-Filgate’s interest in this new approach to documentary filmmaking was sparked by the films of the British ‘Free Cinema’ movement of the 1950s, which demonstrated to him the possibility of taking people in situ, rather than forming them to a pre-structured story. He was further inspired by the work of French photographer Henri Cartier-Bresson, whose book, The Decisive Moment, became the Candid Eye team’s ‘bible’. Along with Wolf Koenig and Roman Kroitor, two of his chief ‘Candid Eye’ collaborators, Macartney-Filgate attempted to do in film what Cartier-Bresson was doing with stills, allowing the films’ structure to arise organically out of everyday activities in the lives of ordinary people, which were candidly recorded by the camera.

We may regard Macartney-Filgate as one of the most important influences on the development of direct cinema, primarily because of his observational style and detached point of view, which, when allied with the formal aspects of his work (objectivity, mobile camera, on-location sound, contrapuntal editing), characterized this new documentary movement as a whole. His approach also bears significance specifically for Canadian national cinema. The underlying sense of irony that permeates Macartney-Filgate’s films has been interpreted as an expression of colonialist attitudes and dialectical tensions inherent within Canadian cinema during this period: on the one hand, committed to the national culture constructed and institutionalized by the NFB, while on the other hand, turning on that same culture the critical, distant gaze of the disenfranchised and rebellious young filmmakers who chafed against its limitations.

Over time, Macartney-Filgate’s frustration with his fellow filmmakers’ increasing inclination toward more structured, dramatic films with a predetermined philosophical ‘hook’, led him to depart from the Candid Eye team and the National Film Board in 1960, to pursue his ideal of ‘film before essence’. During the next decade he was involved in numerous award-winning projects throughout the world, yet he remains unwilling to sell his work, or promote himself as a pioneering filmmaker. ‘Sometimes I think I’m merely a hewer of raw material, that I have an ability to just go out and pan for gold and get enough and then it’s up to the refinery and the people who make the ingots and shape it, and sell it [and] wrap it.’

GILLIAN HELFIELD

See also: Canada; Primary

Biography

Born in England in 1924. Came to the NFB in 1954, to work as a scriptwriter for military training films. Moved to the famed UnitB, and directed seven of the thirteen landmark Candid Eye films 1958–9. Left the NFB in 1960 to work with Leacock, Drew et al. on Primary. Worked around the world on several award-winning projects. Returned to Canada permanently in 1969. Worked for the NFB, and for the CBC as a producer 1970–89. Taught film production at York University and broadcast journalism at Ryerson Polytechnic University. 1959 Canadian Film Award; 1960 Grand Prix Eurovision Award, Cannes; 1961 American Film Festival Award; 1964 Academy Award, Best Theatrical Documentary; 1979 and 1980 Gemini Award for Best Direction; 1980 Prix Anik, Cannes; 1981 Silver Screen Award; 1991 Gemini Award for Best Documentary. Currently lives in Toronto.

Selected films

- Candid Eye Series: director
 1958 Blood and Fire
 1958 The Days Before Christmas
 1958 Police
 1958 Pilgrimage
 1959 One Third Down and 24 Months to Pay/
 The Cars in Your Life
 1959 End of the Line
 1959 The Back-Breaking Leaf
 1960 Primary
 1964 Robert Frost: A Lover's Quarrel
 1978 The Hottest Show on Earth
 1979 Dieppe 1942—Part 1 The Battle Begins,
 Part 2 Echoes of Disaster (CBC)
 1980 This is an Emergency
 1991 Timothy Findley—Anatomy of a Writer

Further reading

- Almenay-Galway, Mary, A Postmodern Cinema: The Voice of the Other in Canadian Film, Lanham, MD and London: Scarecrow Press, 2002.
 Cartier-Bresson, Henri, The Decisive Moment, New York: Simon & Schuster, 1952.
 Clandfield, David, Canadian Film, Toronto: Oxford University Press, 1987.
 Elder, R. Bruce, Image and Identity: Reflections on Canadian Film and Culture, Waterloo: Wilfred Laurier Press, 1989.
 ———'On the Candid Eye Movement', Canadian Film Reader n.d.: 86–94.
 Evans, Gary, In the National Interest: A Chronicle of the National Film Board of Canada from 1949 to 1989, Toronto, Buffalo and London: University of Toronto Press, 1991.
 Feldman, Seth, 'The Days Before Christmas and the Days Before That', in Jim Leach and Jeannette

- Sloniowski (eds), Candid Eyes: Essays on Canadian Documentaries, Toronto, Buffalo and London: University of Toronto Press, 2003: 31–47.
 ———(ed.), Take Two: A Tribute to Film in Canada, Toronto: Irwin Publishing, 1984.
 Gobeil, Charlotte, Terence Macartney-Filgate: The Candid Eye, Ottawa: Canadian Film Institute, 1966.
 Helfield, Gillian, Il etait une fois au cinema quebecois: The Persistence of Myth and Folklore in Early Cinema Direct Documentaries 1958–64, PhD Dissertation, University of Warwick, 1999.
 Jennings, Sarah, 'An Interview with Terence Macartney-Filgate', in Seth Feldman and Joyce Nelson (eds), Canadian Film Reader, Toronto: Peter Martin and Associates, 1977: 77–85.
 Jones, D.B., The Best Butler in the Business: Tom Daly of the National Film Board of Canada, Toronto, Buffalo and London: University of Toronto Press, 1996.
 Kubecek, Linda, 'Shoot Alberta', Cinema Canada 80, 1981–2: 19.
 Morris, Peter, The Film Companion, Toronto: Irwin Publishing, 1984.
 n.a., Movies and Memoranda: An Interpretative History of The National Film Board of Canada, Ottawa: Canadian Film Institute, 1981.
 Nelson, Joyce (ed.), Canadian Film Reader, Toronto: Peter Martin Associates, 1977.
 Veronneau, Pierre and Handling, Piers (eds), Self Portrait: Essays on the Canadian and Quebec Cinemas, Ottawa: Canadian Film Institute, 1980.

MacDonald, Kevin

Kevin MacDonald is known for his arts documentaries about filmmakers, artists, and musicians, and for Imagining Reality: The Faber Book of Documentary, a practical, accessible, non-theoretical book written for readers interested in documentary at all levels.

MacDonald started his career-making profile documentaries including Howard Hawks: American Artist (1997), and Chaplin's Goliath (1996). He directed Witness: The Making of an Englishman (1995), a film about his grandfather, Emeric Pressburger, alongside Emeric Pressburger: The Life and Death of a Screenwriter, his publication on the same subject. Wanting to make films that were more than profiles he started to research, write, and edit Imagining Reality with cowriter Mark Cousins, in an attempt to further understand styles and opportunities in documentary filmmaking, and the learning process became the book. MacDonald became interested in the idea of productions for cinema release for a smaller but dedicated audience. Both One Day in September (2000) and Touching the Void (2003) were planned with a pace, visual scale, and use of sound and music intended for a big screen.

MacDonald felt that television's tight control often resulted in a prescriptive style of documentary structure, formulaic in narrative style and type of subject, and that concentrating on cinematic release would mean he could make films outside of this genre. He was commissioned by the BBC to make a fifty-minute documentary about Scottish artist and filmmaker Donald Cammell, and when Scottish Arts doubled his budget he was able to make a seventy-five-minute feature, Donald Cammell: The Ultimate Performance (1998), codirected with Chris Rodley.

MacDonald uses visual effects as storytelling tools, some archive-based, some more experimental, influenced by collaborating editor Justine Wright, who came from a commercials and pop-promo background. He is not a purist about what is used as long as it is used well as an appropriate tool of communication: if used for dramatic and cinematic effect, it is appropriate whether archive-based or animated. Touching the Void is an example of his use of reconstructions, where he uses actors and climbing doubles.

MacDonald is unique in having made two documentaries about documentary filmmakers, A Brief History of Errol Morris (2000) and Humphrey Jennings: The Man Who Listened to Britain (2000), for British television. The former has affected the way in which he approaches the documentary. He has intellectual ideas about structure, storytelling, and character, and is interested in how people portray themselves through language in an interview situation, feeling that certain interview techniques will uncover hidden depths, and the way his subjects act and speak in an interview is as valid a form of portraying human nature as other forms of documentary. He found that long periods of shooting contingency footage often revealed the most important elements and that the heart of a documentary is the spontaneity captured within planned, structured, preshaped shoots, and the friction between what is considered and composed and what is spontaneous, unplanned, or accidental.

ALISTAIR WARDILL

Biography

Born in Glasgow, Scotland, October 28, 1967. Grandson of Emeric Pressburger and brother of producer Andrew MacDonald. Graduated from Oxford, reading English Literature, in 1989. Lived in Spain, teaching English. Has taught at the National Film and Television School, The Swedish Film Institute, Salford University, and the Cuba International School of Film and Television. Has worked for the Edinburgh Film Festival programming documentary and as a judge at the Latin American Film Festival, Brazil. Has been an associate editor at Faber & Faber since 1995. Wrote Emeric Pressburger: The Life and Death of a Screenwriter (winner of BFI film book of the year and shortlisted for the NCR nonfiction prize), and co-edited Imagining Reality: The Faber Book of Documentary. His journalism has appeared in numerous publications in the United Kingdom including the Guardian, Observer and Telegraph. Recipient of the following awards, for Touching the Void: Banff Festival, Canada, Best Film, 2003; Evening Standard Film Awards, Best Film, 2004; Kendal Mountain Film Festival, Grand Prize, 2003; Autrans Festival of Mountain and Adventure Films, France, 2003; for One Day in September: Academy Award, United States, 2000; British Independent Film Awards, Douglas Hickox Award, 2000; International Emmy, 2000; European Film Awards, Best Documentary Award, 2000; International Documentary Association, IDA Award, 2000.

Selected films

- 1995 Witness: The Making of an Englishman (TV, Figment Films/PCP/Channel 4): director, writer
- 1996 Chaplin's Goliath (Figment Films/STV): director, writer
- 1997 The Moving World of George Ricky (BBC): director
- 1997 Howard Hawks: American Artist (TV, BFI/BBC/Bravo/Canal+/Star): director
- 1998 Donald Cammell: The Ultimate Performance (BBC/Total Performance Ltd): director, producer
- 2000 One Day in September (Arthur Cohn/BBC/British Screen): director

- 2000 Humphrey Jennings: The Man Who Listened to Britain (TV, Figment Films/Channel 4): director
- 2000 A Brief History of Errol Morris: director
- 2001 Being Mick (TV, Jagged Films/Channel 4): director, cinematographer
- 2003 Touching the Void (BDarlow Smithson/Film Council/Film 4/Pathé, US distribution: IFC Films): director

Further reading

- Collins, David, 'What's Up Doc?' interview, Creation, November 2000: 10–12.
- Falcon, Richard, 'White Ladder', review, Sight and Sound, January 2004.
- MacDonald, Kevin, Emeric Pressburger: The Life and Death of a Screenwriter, London: Faber & Faber, 1994.
- MacDonald, Kevin and Cousins, Mark, Imagining Reality: The Faber Book of Documentary, London: Faber & Faber, 1996.
- Mottram, James, 'Oscar H. One Day in September', Film Review 594, 2000: 81.
- n.a., 'Patriot Games', interview, Film Ireland 76, June/July 2000: 22–3.
- Wylie, Liam, 'One Day in September', Film West 40, 2000: 28–31.

McElwee, Ross

Ross McElwee was part of a small group of Massachusetts Institute of Technology (MIT) film students in the 1970s who, under the aegis of then faculty members Ed Pincus and Richard Leacock, sought to move away from what was perceived as an inherent lack of humanity in the traditional cinéma vérité style. As a result he became a major contributor to a movement toward a more personal and intimate form of documentary filmmaking sometimes referred to as the autobiographical or memoir film. In this enterprise, McElwee was the benefactor of a group of filmmakers such as Pincus, Martha Coolidge, and Amalie Rothschild who, in turning the camera on themselves and their own domestic settings, not only broke with the traditional premise of recording reality without the intrusion of the filmmaker, but foregrounded the author's presence to such an extent that the filmmaker became a central subject of the work.

The work of McElwee and his contemporaries, sometimes referred to as 'the second generation of cinéma vérité', is distinguishable from its predecessor primarily in its move toward a more skeptical self-interrogation, which often problematized documentary's ability to uncover truth. Appearing on the heels of 1960s cinéma vérité, which maintained a much more overt relationship to political and social causes, this tendency led some to deem the work passive and self-obsessed, but in hindsight it can be understood as reflective of a general trend at work across the arts whereby a central concern of the work becomes an interrogation of its own means of representation.

Despite his apparent dissatisfaction with vérité, McElwee nonetheless preserves many of its fundamental practices in his approach. Throughout his career, he has remained adamant in his mistrust of 'directed' sequences, artificial lighting, and preproduction of any kind and has instead chosen to shoot without notice and without extensive preparation.

Although occasionally experimenting on collaborations, McElwee tends to work singularly during shooting, as both camera operator and sound recordist, a style that bears the influence of Leacock's 'integrated process'. Because of the unassuming front it poses to those in front of the camera, the technique allows McElwee to garner more natural, unembellished on-screen performances. This, added to the fact that the majority of his subjects are either family members or close acquaintances, creates a convincing representation of the everyday, an aesthetic that in earlier films, such as Charleen and Backyard, often borders on the home movie.

A central point of departure from traditional vérité, however, is McElwee's highly subjective narration, the lyricism and humor of which is often cited as the product of the filmmaker's enthusiasm for literature. Beyond their narrative function, these tangential voice-overs create a dialectic between narration and image that serves the works' broader enterprise of calling into question the objectivity of filmic images. This technique came to full fruition in his most commercially successful film, Sherman's March: A Meditation on the Possibility of Romantic Love in the South During an Era of Nuclear Weapons Proliferation, where the filmmaker, as if acutely aware of his inability to fill the role of male protagonist in a narrative based on romantic relationships, perfected his now signature deadpan, antihero persona.

A crucial component of this persona is often McElwee's displaced status as a Southerner living in the North. This vantage point seems to render him an outsider in both contexts, but it is often called on to uncover insights not available to those within the milieu itself. It is in these subtle observations regarding issues such as race relations in Backyard or southern femininity in Sherman's March that McElwee continues the tradition of politically charged documentary film.

The addition of narration in postproduction also opens a temporal disjunction within the world of McElwee's films, which reflect a phenomenon that the filmmaker has referred to as 'retrophenia', whereby one experiences the images recorded at an earlier date as if they were in the present. This layering of time, as well as the filmmaker's multiple roles of cameraman, on-screen performer, and narrator, often leaves McElwee oscillating between observer and participant. This dialectic continually bleeds into a dialogue on filmic representation as in the case of Six O'Clock News where McElwee constantly negotiates reality against both the reality that his film is presenting and that which television presents of the same event.

These continual efforts to undercut the tradition of the invisible camera led McElwee to foreground its presence to such an extent that it not only catalyzes action as Jean Rouch prescribed, but participates in the on-screen action as an entity in itself. Thus, technical malfunctions such as camera jams or dwindling batteries are transformed in the hands of McElwee into evidence of metaphysical currents that selectively disrupt the action, often prompting extended narration that attempts to supply the missing images to a blank screen.

Not only do participants continually refer to the presence of the camera, but in trying times even request that it be turned off, a request that McElwee often obliges. The result is again blank or obstructed images that mark rare instances where life is privileged over art. These moments range from the disturbing, as for instance when Charleen, a high school poetry teacher, friend, and recurring player in McElwee's films, comes home from the hospital after a fit of hysteria, to the sacred as when his fiancée, Marilyn Levine, demands that he turn off the camera in the moments before the couple's wedding in Time Indefinite.

With the autobiographical format, McElwee's filmography composes a diary of sorts, with the filmmaker's own narrative providing the continuum between films. The audience meets McElwee as a shiftless bachelor, uncertain of his career path and eager for companionship, and follows him through his marriage, the death of his father, and the birth of his son. These events are not merely subjects of inquiry for McElwee, but are formative of the filmmaking process itself. In Time Indefinite, we find McElwee trying to balance the responsibilities of filmmaking and fatherhood and as certain requirements, such as going on the road for months, are no longer as tenable as they once were, an accompanying stylistic shift occurs in his work. This shift is best illustrated later in the same film when, after the screen has gone blank during the birth of his son, the action starts again with a rare shot of McElwee himself, who, having his hands full as a new father, has entrusted his cousin Mary to shoot the scene with her video camera.

THOMAS STUBBLEFIELD

See also: Leacock, Richard; Pincus, Edward

Biography

Born in 1947 in Charlotte, North Carolina. Received BA from Brown University in 1971, and an MS in filmmaking from MIT in 1977. Upon graduation worked as studio cameraman for evening news, househelper show, and gospel hour for local television station in North Carolina. Also worked as freelance cameraman for D.A. Pennebaker's Energy War (1977) and John Marshall's N!ai, the Story of a !Kung Woman (1980). In 2000 Sherman's March was chosen for preservation by the National Film Registry. Visiting Professor of Visual and Environmental Studies at Harvard University since 1986.

Selected films

- 1978 Charleen
- 1979 Space Coast (in collaboration with Michel Negroponte)
- 1982 Backyard
- 1986 Sherman's March: A Meditation on the Possibility of Romantic Love in the South During an Era of Nuclear Weapons Proliferation
- 1990 Something to Do with the Wall (in collaboration with Marilyn Levine)
- 1993 Time Indefinite

- 1996 Six O'Clock News
 1997 Kosuth (in collaboration with Marilyn Levine, digital video)
 2003 Bright Leaves

Further reading

- Lucia, Cynthia, 'When the Personal Becomes Political: An Interview with Ross McElwee', Cineaste 20, no. 2, December 1993: 32–8.
 MacDonald, Scott, 'Ross McElwee', in A Critical Cinema 2: Interviews with Independent Filmmakers, Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1992: 265–82.
 Stubbs, Liz, 'Ross McElwee: Personal Journeyman', in Documentary Filmmakers Speak, New York: Allworth Press, 2002: 93–108.

McLean, Ross

Television producer Ross McLean first came to prominence with the evening public affairs program Tabloid. While at the CLBT in Toronto, he developed the daily half-hour show to highlight information and news, rather than variety and dramatic programming. Although civically minded, Tabloid served audiences as a light-hearted approach to information. To that end Tabloid was sued after a 1956 stunt that has become television folklore in Canada. A Montreal physician wrote a terse letter of complaint to the show that was read on-air by host Dick MacDougal. Viewers were encouraged to write or call the doctor at the address and number provided on screen. Dr E.E. Robbins found himself inundated with phone calls, hate mail, and even taxis at his front door. McLean was promptly suspended until an apology was made. McLean begrudgingly returned to Tabloid three weeks later.

McLean left Tabloid to begin a late evening sister show called Close-Up. As a result of dedicated support from the CBC, Close-Up was able to send correspondents into the field for commentary, documentary, and investigative reports. This expanding format led to the thirty-minute show's expansion to an hour-long public affairs program. The format of multiple eight- to ten-minute segments set a programming precedent that is present in news coverage today. Described as 'the Daddy of all the information shows like 60 Minutes, The Journal, or The Fifth Estate', by Pierre Berton, Close-Up was McLean's attempt to mask information as entertainment. Interestingly, McLean modeled the tone of the show after interviews he'd seen with Mike Wallace, of 60 Minutes. The controversial storylines of the day, Paul Robeson, homosexuality, drug addiction, and euthanasia, also created a news-programming paradigm present today.

McLean's production work with Q is for Quest marked a move from news and information to documenting new and emerging performance. Q is for Quest focused on the fine and performing arts. During McLean's leadership, the program adapted and produced plays, recorded recitals, conducted interviews with painters, and produced one-person performances by Bertolt Brecht and others. This inclination toward the artist led McLean to in-depth personality programming.

As a producer for the inaugural year of Telescope, McLean helped to create yet another industry standard, documentary entertainment programming. Telescope, a half-hour documentary series, presented single-subject features on notable figures in the arts, politics, and Canadian society. This mini-documentary allowed subjects to garner wider audience recognition. Christopher Plummer, featured at the beginning of the series, saw his fame skyrocket while filming The Sound of Music, due in large part to Telescope. One of the series' most notable interviews came in 1964 with Alfred Hitchcock, in A Talk with Alfred Hitchcock.

Ross McLean returned to his Close-Up roots as producer for The Way It Is, Close-Up's successor, in 1967. The Way It Is marked a change in McLean's production style and programming trends. Whereas McLean's renowned innovative vibrancy proved successful for many years, CTV's W5 was proving that solid research was equally satisfying to audiences and safer in terms of production. McLean's The Way It Is became less whimsical and safer. News returned to being information, rather than entertainment.

Ross McLean died June 1, 1987.

AMY L. DARNELL

Selected films

- 1953–60 Tabloid
 1957–63 Close-Up
 1961–4 Q is for Quest
 1963–4 Telescope
 1964 A Talk with Alfred Hitchcock
 1967–9 The Way It Is

Further reading

- Collins, Richard, Culture, Communication, and National Identity: The Case of Canadian Television, Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1990.
- Kesterton, Wilfred H., The Law and the Press in Canada, Toronto: McClelland and Stewart, 1976.
- Peers, Frank W., The Public Eye: Television and the Politics of Canadian Broadcasting, Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1979.

Makavejev, Dusan

Makavejev's most important contribution to documentary is the innovative technique of associative montage, which he developed mostly in feature films made from 1967 to 1975. His visual commentary on the world's political and historical process, straight out of the countercultural zeal of the 1960s, was a profoundly subversive one, aiming at anxieties at the intersection of libidinal and ideological indoctrination. He had a taste for combining Soviet and Nazi propaganda with counterculture material from beatnik America. His unique style of political collage, rich in historical references, impacted radical filmmaking worldwide.

The director started his career as an amateur cineaste for a Belgrade club, where he directed several documentaries in the 1950s and collaborated on many others. These early films are a crossbreed between feature and documentary, often with topics at the intersection of sexuality and revolutionary politics, as seen in the 1958 short Spomencina ne treba verovati/Don't Trust Monuments, where a woman is seen trying to seduce a monument, overwhelmed by the silent self-adoring superiority of the marble figure. While cinema club Beograd produced most of 1950s documentaries, those from the early 1960s were put out by a variety of key production organisations across Yugoslavia—Avala, Sutjeska, Dunav, Zagreb. On some of the Croatian-made films, Makavejev collaborated with celebrated poet Vasko Popa and cinematographer Octavian Miletic; he regularly worked with editor Marko Babac. By the mid-1960s Makavejev had to his credit about twenty experimental shorts and documentaries, adding to the impressive record of Yugoslav documentary of this period.

Nevertheless, Makavejev's main contribution remains the innovative way in which he brought together the documentary and feature genres. The features he made in the late 1960s and early 1970s are marked by an 'extensive, heterogeneous usage of found footage' (Arthur 2001: 12). Documentary footage is usually incorporated into feature film by adding the documentary as an extension to the fictional narrative, normally to contextualize the fictional part. Makavejev, however, ventured into the realm of associative montage by bringing into the fictional narrative familiar visual documents for reexamination and placing them in non-conventional combinations for the purposes of creating new context. Here, a widely accepted reading of given documentary footage was subjected to questioning from the individual perspective of the filmmaker, who uses the footage to create a personalized and sometimes subversive vision of 'truth' about a given historical period or social order. In such a highly personal context, 'objective' historical record is replaced by associative collage (Iordanova 2001a). (Variations of this approach have been used by Andrzej Munk in Poland and by Andrei Tarkovsky in Russia.)

The first time Makavejev ventured into intersecting feature and documentary clips was in his second feature film, Ljubavni slučaj ili tragedija sluzbenice PTT/Love Affair or the Case of the Missing Switchboard Operator (1967). In a scene that was supposed to be the prelude to a first sexual intercourse, Makavejev had his Yugoslav protagonists watch TV footage of revolutionary Russians pushing down church crosses (from Esfir Shub's The Fall or the Romanov Dynasty). By using this seemingly unrelated documentary footage, Makavejev was not only setting up a sociopolitical context for the love story but was also creating a complex allegory. The challenge to the previously erect but now falling symbols of the religious establishment was a visual equivalent to the vulnerability of phallic power that the film examined.

These techniques were perfected in the 1968 Nevinost bez zaštite/Innocence Unprotected (1968), in which he used parts of a prewar Yugoslav melodrama cross-edited with newsreel material and current interviews. Since its release in 1968, the film has become a classical example of nonlinear narrative.

Makavejev's innovative approach culminated in WR: Misterije organisma/WR: Mysteries of Organism (1971), a film about American bigotry, counterculture, Yugoslav communism, world revolution, and sexual liberation. The film opens with a twenty-minute documentary on the American period in the life of Frankfurt school's Wilhelm Reich; it combines feature and documentary to make a nonconformist statement on social and sexual liberation, totalitarianism and imperialism, communism and free love. Among overlapping subplots that can qualify as fly-on-the-wall documentaries by themselves, WR included a more or less straightforward fictional narrative featuring a tense love affair between a Yugoslav female communist activist and a Soviet ice skater (named Vladimir Ilich, after Lenin), the protagonists symbolizing two communist powers at odds with each other. Standing in for both Wilhelm Reich and World Revolution, WR was a work of an avant-garde quality, unconventionally structured around a wide array of cinematic techniques, mostly musical collages and associative montages of documentary and feature film (from documentary footage of crowds cheering Mao to feature excerpts from a 1948 Soviet glorification of Stalin, to 'shock corridor'-style scenes from an American mental institution). In his next film, the controversial Western-made Sweet Movie (1975), the director continued this type of referencing by using background documentary footage of the 1941 exhumations of the Khatyn forest massacre (committed by Soviets against Polish army officers but blamed on the Germans).

The director has said on many occasions that to him cinema is 'a guerrilla operation' that is meant to undermine everything 'that is fixed, defined, established, dogmatic, eternal' (Arthur 2001). The Yugoslav Marxist-humanist group Praxis and its aesthetics have particularly influenced Makavejev's political views, by American avant-garde filmmaking and the 1960s counter-culture (he has identified Kenneth Anger as a major influence), as well as early Soviet montage. Having been exposed to the works of early Soviet cinema, Makavejev developed a technique that is influenced by the principles of Soviet montage, which he adapts for his idiosyncratic use. According to Arthur (2001: 12), by extending the principles of shot-to-shot montage ('to encompass clashes of material and elements or stylistic properties—fiction/documentary, interviews/newsreels, black and white/colour, colour stock/hand tinting, rapid editing/long takes, classical/folk music'). Makavejev, in fact, 'radicalized Eisenstein's categories of "tonal" and "intellectual" montage in a manner that layers intense visceral sensations over historically resonant particulars'.

Makavejev also perfected the art of using stereotypes and humour. Most of his protagonists are stereotypical representatives of a category such as a Serbian simpleton-strongman, an indoctrinated stiff Russian lover, a hygiene-obsessed Texas oil tycoon, a sensually glamorous Latino singer, or a sexually inhibited Swedish housewife. However, he defies all stereotyping by placing his protagonists amidst nontraditional associative sequences of cultural signifiers, thus challenging commonplace imagination and conducting an act of antirepression.

As a proponent of radical artistic and political views, Makavejev suffered a range of censorship acts throughout his career, both in Yugoslavia and the West. His work enjoyed such a strong reputation for controversy that only a few of his numerous projects were completed, mostly because of difficulties with financing.

Compelled to work, Makavejev made three features in the 1980s that did not make use of his trademark associative referencing of sexuality and politics that troubled the censors so much (and which, no wonder, were not particularly successful). He returned to using associative political referencing and collages of feature and documentary footage in Gorilla Bathes at Noon (1993), dealing with the end of the Cold War. In the 1990s he completed an autobiographical documentary Hole in the Soul (1994), produced by BBC Scotland, but failed to secure funding for a documentary project about Yugoslavia's break up. In 2000 he said that he wished to make a one-minute animation that would evolve around the endlessly changing Balkan maps.

Film specialists consider Makavejev's work a major contribution to the development of non-linear narrative and associative montage. Concerned predominantly with issues of sexuality and politics, his oeuvre remains intricately linked to the countercultural spirit of the 1960s. However, he is also something of a social prophet: in a subplot meant to expose the commodification of people in consumer society, Makavejev's Sweet Movie (1975) opened with a mock live TV show in which a Texas millionaire was shown selecting a bride among an eager group of contestants. A quarter of a century later, an almost identical setup played out for real. In February 2000 the Fox network broadcast live a programme, 'Who Wants to Marry a Millionaire?', in which property developer Rick Rockwell was seen choosing a bride among a number of finalists and proposing on the spot. The fictional stereotype of American kitsch that Makavejev had proposed twenty-five years before had now become a feature of real life.

DINA OIRDANOVA

See also: Yugoslavia (former)

Biography

Born October 13, 1932 in Belgrade. Attended secondary school in Novi Sad and graduated in psychology from the University of Belgrade in 1955. Enrolled in the Academy of Theatrical Arts in the class of Professor Hugo Klain. First worked on amateur shorts in a Belgrade club in 1953 and has been actively involved with documentaries since 1958. Worked also as a TV film editor, a journalist, edited a collection of fairy tales, and cowrote a comedy. By the time he made the controversial WR: Mysteries of Organism (1971), he had become an internationally acclaimed Yugoslav filmmaker (awards at Berlin, Cannes, Chicago, Sao Paulo). WR was deemed outrageous by the Yugoslav Ministry of Culture and shelved. Further projects did not receive production approval. As travel abroad for Yugoslav citizens was not restricted at the time, the director and his wife, Bojana Marian (musical editor of all his films), chose to leave the country. They live in Paris, but have also spent extensive periods working in the United States, Canada, Sweden, the Netherlands, Germany, Australia, and Israel. Spent most of the 1990s teaching at various Universities in the United States, from Harvard to Berkeley.

Selected films

- 1953 Jatagan mala/Yatagan Mala (Yugoslavia): director
- 1956 Pečat/The Seal: director, writer
- 1957 Antonijevo razbijeno ogledalo/Anthony's Broken Mirror (Yugoslavia): director, writer
- 1957 Spomenicima ne treba verovati/Don't Trust Monuments (Yugoslavia): director, writer
- 1957 Boje sanjaju/Colours are Dreaming (Yugoslavia): director
- 1957 Šta je to radnički savet/What is a Worker's Council (Yugoslavia): director, writer
- 1957 Eci pec pec/One Potato, Two Potato ... (Yugoslavia): director, writer
- 1957 Pedagoška bajka/Educational Fairy Tale (Yugoslavia): director
- 1957 Film o knjizi A.B.C./The Film About the Book A.B.C. (Yugoslavia): director, writer
- 1962 Parada/Parade (Yugoslavia): director, writer
- 1962 Ljepotica 62/Miss Yugoslavia 62 (Yugoslavia): director, writer
- 1962 Nova domaća zivotninja/New Domestic Animal (Yugoslavia): director
- 1962 Ljubavni slučaj ili tragedija sluzbenice PTT/Love Affair of the Case of the Missing Switchboard Operator (Yugoslavia): writer, director
- 1968 Nevinost bez zaštite/Innocence Unprotected (Yugoslavia): writer, director
- 1971 WR: Misterija organizma/WR: Mysteries of the Organism (Yugoslavia): writer, director
- 1975 Sweet Movie (France/Canada/Germany): writer, director
- 1993 Gorilla Bathes at Noon (Germany): writer, director
- 1994 Hole in the Soul (UK): writer, director

Further reading

- Arthur, Paul, 'Escape from Freedom: The Films of Dusan Makavejev', Cineaste, Winter 2001: 11–18.
- Blazevski, Vladimir (ed.), Dusan Makavejev: 300 Cuda, Belgrade: Studenski kulturni centar, 1988.
- Eagle, Herbert, 'Yugoslav Marxist Humanism and the Films of Dusan Makavejev', in David Paul (ed.), Politics, Art and Commitment in the East European Cinema, New York: St Martin's Press, 1983: 131–49.
- 'The Films of Dusan Makavejev', in Graham Petrie and Ruth Dwyer (eds), Before the Wall Came Down: Soviet and Eastern European Filmmakers Working in the West, New York: University Press of America, 1990.
- Goulding, Daniel, 'Makavejev', in D. Goulding (ed.), Five Filmmakers, Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press, 1995.
- Horton, A, 'The Mouse That Wanted to F-k a Cow', in Andrew Horton (ed.), Comedy/Cinema/Theory, Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1991: 222–39.
- Iordanova, Dina, Cinema of Flames: Balkan Film, Culture and the Media, London: BFI, 2001a.

—'Dusan Makavejev', in Derek Jones (ed.), Censorship: A World Encyclopedia, London and Chicago: Fitzroy Dearborn, 2001b: 3, 1505–6.

Makavejev, Dusan, 'Film Censorship in Yugoslavia', Film and the Public, Spring 1995.

O'Grady, Gerald (ed.), Makavejev Fictionary. The Films of Dusan Makavejev, Boston and New York: Harvard Film Archive/American Museum of the Moving Picture/Film Comment, July–August, 1975.

Malle, Louis

In a special issue devoted to the documentary films of Louis Malle, Film Library Quarterly calls him 'one of the most important documentary directors to emerge since WW II', and explains that his work in this area has tended to be overlooked because of 'the wide recognition [...] given to his narrative films'.

Louis Malle was born in Thumeries, France on October 30, 1932. In 1952, while still a student at IDHEC (Institut des Hautes Etudes Cinématographiques), Malle was hired as a cameraman by the undersea explorer Jacques-Yves Cousteau and four years later began his career as a filmmaker with Le Monde du silence/The Silent World, a classic documentary codirected with Cousteau. He also worked as the assistant of Robert Bresson on his 1956 film Un condamné à mort s'est échappé/A Man Escaped. Malle later recalled that his experience in documentaries was the reason Bresson hired him to work on this fiction film based on the real experiences of a World War II Resistance fighter in occupied France.

Malle rose to prominence with the French New Wave and his first fiction film, the award-winning Ascenseur pour l'échafaud/Frantic, made in 1957 and starring Jeanne Moreau. He made several other fiction films, as well as several short documentaries, before turning to his major documentaries shot during a trip to India in 1967–8. He was to continue this pattern of alternating documentaries and fiction films throughout his career in France and in the United States. His documentaries varied in subject matter but were generally shot as direct cinema simultaneously recording sound and image on location without the intervention of actors, written dialogue, and preestablished programs (Gauthier 2003). His last film, Vanya on 42nd Street, made in 1994, is a semi-documentary rendition of a rehearsal of the Chekhov play directed by André Gregory in an old New York theater.

Le Monde du silence, the 1956 documentary codirected by Malle and Cousteau, covers two years of undersea exploration in the Mediterranean, the Red Sea, the Persian Gulf, and the Indian Ocean on the ship Calyпсо. The film won the Palme d'Or at Cannes and the Academy Award for the best documentary that year.

In this film, divers using experimental equipment are seen swimming with schools of fish, examining coral reefs and sunken vessels. The Calyпсо braves a monsoon and takes part in a bloody battle with sharks and a school of whales. The film critic and cofounder of Cahiers du Cinéma, André Bazin, speaks of the poetry and intelligence of the Cousteau/Malle documentary and underscores the importance of the work of Louis Malle. What Bazin finds most admirable in the film is 'the a posteriori organization of unforeseen events by giving them a clear presentation and logic without diminishing their authenticity'. From this perspective, the greatest moment in the film is, according to Bazin, the whale sequence and most particularly the death of the baby whale, wounded by the ship's motor and then devoured by sharks.

In 1956 Malle made a fourteen-minute, black-and-white documentary entitled Station 307, describing a voyage of the Calyпсо in the Persian Gulf to experiment in applying the methods of underwater diving in the search for oil deposits. This film was written, directed, shot, and edited by Malle, who proudly commented that he was the entire crew of his first short film. That year he also made another fourteen-minute, black-and-white film, La Fontaine du Vaucluse/The Fountain of the Vaucluse, documenting underwater exploration of this famous geological site in the south of France.

After the success of his first feature film, Ascenseur pour l'échafaud, Malle made a number of feature films including Zazie dans le métro/Zazie in the Metro (1960) and Le Feu follet/The Fire Within (1963), as well as several short documentaries including Vive le Tour! a film on the Tour de France, the arduous bicycle race run in France every summer, and Bons baisers de Bangkok/Love and Kisses from Bangkok, a documentary for French television on daily life in the capital of Thailand, shot during a 1964 trip to Asia.

The most impressive and best-known of Malle's documentaries are the films made from footage shot during a six-month stay in India in 1967–8. This material was edited into a one-hundred-and-seven-minute documentary on Calcutta, the second largest city and the capital of western Bengal, and a series of seven fifty-minute films prepared for French and later British television on other aspects of Indian life.

Malle said that it was in India that he really discovered his approach to documentary or direct cinema. He said that he wanted to immerse himself in India, the real, not the Westernized India, to see what would happen, and to do it with a camera. 'It was a very subjective approach—I tried to describe my reaction to India. It was very personal. I feel these films made in India, these supposed documentaries, are probably the most intimate work that I've done so far' (Rollet 1976b). His very direct and affecting image did not please official India and in the same late-1970s interview Malle says that he had been refused a visa and felt that he had become 'one of the public enemies of the Indian government'.

Calcutta (1969) is a film that is both beautiful and shocking. Malle focuses intently on the life of the city—the religious rituals and celebrations, the animals and the people who live on the streets, the disfigured faces and bodies of the leper beggars, the student demonstrations, the acrobats, wrestlers, and public storytellers. Though we get some views of the life of the Anglicized upper classes at the Royal Calcutta Golf Club and the horse races, the focus of the film is on poverty, crowded conditions in the rat-infested slums, sickness, and death. In one memorable sequence the camera looks closely at the cremation of a woman and follows her husband as he lights the fire and then slowly, in accordance with the religious ritual, walks around the pyre sprinkling water and incense as we see the flames consume the body. The voice-over, spoken by Malle in a calm, unsensational tone, informs and gives statistics without commenting or judging. The final sequence of the film shows the dark-skinned immigrants from Madras, who live isolated and shunned by the other slum dwellers of Calcutta. The last words of the voice-over refer to them in a language that seems to have wider application for the spectator of this deeply moving film. 'They are astonished to be filmed. They are astonished to be pitied and to be a source of indignation.'

L'Inde fantôme/Phantom India is the general title of the series of seven fifty-minute films prepared for French television from footage from the same journey. In these films Malle's focus is on specific aspects of Indian culture such as the caste system or Indian religion, as well as life in cities such as Madras and Bombay. An English-language version was shown in Great Britain and Louis Malle was the voice-over commentator in both. 'In the commentary, I always returned to the fact that I had understood nothing about India,' Louis Malle said. 'Every time I thought that I had understood something, I discovered that I had been wrong [...] We thought that we had filmed a reality and, behind this reality, there was another. Truth is always more complicated, more tortuous.' Throughout his career, Malle believed in the virtues of the camera rather than the virtues of didacticism, and allowed himself always to be guided by his own gaze rather than ideology (Prédal 1989).

Humain, trop humain/Human, Too Human (1972) is a seventy-five-minute documentary on the manufacture of cars at the Citroën factory in Rennes (Brittany). In the first part of the film teams of workers are shown, often in close-up, working together on the assembly line. On the soundtrack the factory noises are occasionally accompanied by Gregorian-like chants to underscore the ritualistic aspect of the work. The second part begins with a long, high angle over the Paris Auto Show and then moves down to observe camera salesmen and customers, 'adoring and worshipping these cars' as Malle himself told an interviewer (Rollet 1976b). In the last section of the film, a final return to the factory emphasizes the boredom, discomfort, noise, and difficulty of the work. The faces of the workers are seen through the holes and gaps of the metal stamping machines they operate. Humain, trop humain is Malle's only documentary in which there is no commentary. 'I tried to keep away from any kind of easy stereotyped political statement' (Rollet 1976b). The spectator himself has to do the work of drawing conclusions.

In 1978 Malle made Pretty Baby, his first American film, and the following year began working on an English-language documentary, God's Country, shot and produced in the United States for the PBS with a grant from the National Endowment for the Humanities. Louis Malle wrote, directed, and shot this documentary on Glencoe, a city of five thousand inhabitants about fifty miles from Minneapolis. Malle and his crew first went to Glencoe in 1979 to interview and film the inhabitants as they lived their daily lives: farmers, bankers, police chiefs, members of an all-women baseball team. Because of a lack of funding and the pressures of other projects (including the making of Atlantic City in 1980 and My Dinner with André in 1982), Malle put off editing the rushes for several years. He returned to Glencoe in 1985 to film the same people, now showing the effects of the passage of time and changes in economic conditions. Malle spoke of making this film as an extremely interesting and agreeable experience, which brought him back to the basics of life. 'I found the same pleasure of total improvisation while filming this small city in Minnesota that I had experienced in India.'

To make his next American documentary, And the Pursuit of Happiness, produced and financed by HBO and shown on the cable network and later public television in 1986, Malle traveled across the United States interviewing recent immigrants. These include the West Indian poet Derek Walcott, a Russian actor teaching the Stanislavsky method, a Vietnamese doctor practicing in Nebraska, Egyptians in Los Angeles, Cubans in Florida, and others. The desire to obtain a certain cross-section of backgrounds and ethnicities required more planning and less improvisation than was usual in Malle's documentaries. It was a somewhat more traditional approach to filmmaking, Malle admitted, yet he insisted that, in this film as in his other documentaries, he was 'neither didactic nor systematic in his approach' (Prédal 1989).

In 1987 he returned to France to make one of his best-known and most admired fiction films Au revoir les enfants/Goodbye Children. This film, like the earlier Lacombe, Lucien (1974), reflects his lifelong moral concern with the behavior of the French people during the Occupation in World War II. He always saw a close relationship between his documentaries and his fiction films, many of which reflect his thinking about moral issues, and the historical and cultural context of societal values. A documentary entitled The Passions of Louis Malle, made by Don Boyd in 2003, celebrates the filmmaker's great body of work and includes interviews with his wife Candice Bergen, Brigitte Bardot, David Hare, and Philip French.

See also: Human, Too Human; Phantom India; Silent World, The

Biography

Born in Thumeries, France on October 30, 1932. Studied at the Institut des Hautes Etudes Cinématographiques (IDHEC). Died in Beverly Hills, California on November 23, 1995.

Selected films

- 1956 Le Monde du silence/The Silent World (86 mins, Technicolor)
- 1962 Vive le Tour! (17 mins, color)
- 1964 Bons baisers de Bangkok (15 mins, black and white)
- 1968 Calcutta (107 mins, color)
- 1969 L'Inde fantôme/Phantom India (350 mins, color)
- 1972 Humain, trop humain/Human, Too Human (75 mins, color)
- 1985 God's Country (95 mins, color)
- 1986 And the Pursuit of Happiness (80 mins, color)

Further reading

- Bazin, André, 'Le Monde du silence', in Qu'est-ce que le cinéma, Paris: Cerf, 1975.
- Billard, Pierre, Louis Malle—Le Rebelle Solitaire, Paris: Plon, 2003.
- French, Phillip, Conversations avec Louis Malle, Paris: Denoël, 1993.
- (ed.), Malle on Malle, London: Faber & Faber, 1996.
- Gauthier, Guy, Le Documentaire: un autre Cinéma, Paris: Nathan, 2003.
- Jankowski, Paul, 'In Defense of Fiction: Resistance, Collaboration, and Lacombe, Lucien', Journal of Modern History 63, September 1991: 457–82.
- Mallecot, Jacques, Louis Malle par Louis Malle, Paris: Althazor, 1978.
- Prédal, René, Louis Malle, Paris: Edilig, 1989.
- Rollet, Ronald, 'The Documentary Films of Louis Malle', Film Library Quarterly 9, no. 4, 1976a: 7–44, 54–8.
- 'An Interview with Louis Malle', Film Library Quarterly 9, no. 4, 1976b: 45–7, 61–4.

Malraux, André

Before his appointments as the civil steward of French culture for the post-Liberation Gaullist Fourth and Fifth Republic, André Malraux first achieved renown through his writing, attracting both high praise (his novel, La Condition humaine earned the Prix Goncourt for 1933) and criticism (Leon Trotsky had found Malraux's portrayal of Chinese revolutionaries in Les Conquerants, 1928, problematic). In his fiction writing, Malraux experimented with a narrative aesthetic that can be characterized as aligning with those of the social realist school (in the pejorative sense, Malraux's work had been indicted as 'inspired reportage' by his critics), basing many of his novels on his own experiences with leftist political action, and demonstrating a particular agreement with antifascist movements. French critic André Bazin noted, in 1945, that Malraux's fictional work shared a resemblance to certain narrative techniques found in the cinema and praised him specifically for his use of ellipsis and metaphor. Outside of his fiction, Malraux wrote numerous essays on art and art appreciation outlining a program of ideals that forwarded a conceptual model of universal cultural heritage that claimed a continuity between the art of antiquity and modern artistic praxis, and declared cultural production as a direct means for the 'interrogation of the universe'.

After his service with the España Squadron fighting for the Republicans in Spain against Franco in 1937, Malraux embarked on a fundraising tour of North America for the Spanish Medical Bureau. During this period Malraux began to collect his notes on his experiences in the civil war, which would become the basis for his novel L'Espoir (1937) and a film scenario based on his tour of duty in the Republican air force. The film project was developed after Malraux had witnessed that Joris Ivens's documentary, The Spanish Earth (commissioned by the Contemporary Historians, Inc., a group of writers that included Lillian Hellman and Ernest Hemingway who were sympathetic to the Republican cause) failed to prompt formal American intervention in the Spanish civil war on the side of the Republicans. The production of Sierra de Teruel (aka L'Espoir/Man's Hope) was meant to rectify Ivens's failure and would expose Malraux to the complexities of feature film finance and the physical demands of location-based production under extreme duress. The film began production in Spain with an up-front budget supplied by Spanish loyalists and was to feature a degree of verisimilitude similar to that of Ivens's documentary. The source of the film's realism was to be reinforced by the use of location-based sets in Spain (documenting the actual physical transformation of the Spanish republic as it 'bled' through its civil war) and nonprofessional performers, placing Malraux's film aesthetic within the same cultural-political milieu to that of British documentary pioneer John Grierson, who argued that documentary film (or, more appropriately for Malraux, propaganda film) must not only record a fact but also take a point of view. Unfortunately for Malraux, fighting in Spain escalated, forcing him to complete the film in France with a new financier. A final version of the film was completed for commercial distribution in 1939; however, the film's premiere was delayed by the start of World War II. Following the Liberation, Edouard Corniglion-Molinier sold the rights to Sierra de Teruel to a distributor who retitled the film L'Espoir and made subsequent edits to the film's footage and altered its title cards before its commercial release in 1945. L'Espoir failed to stimulate the political effects that Malraux had so consciously designed the film to produce and would go on to enjoy only limited critical praise from predominately leftist-oriented film journalists and critics.

During the German occupation of France through World War II American films were banned from the commercial circuit, and the scale of French film production accelerated under the patronage of organizations such as the German-owned Continental Films. Malraux during this time was active in the Resistance and had temporarily suspended his cultural activities. Liberation after the war freed French culture industries from external control; however, the signing of the Blum-Byrnes agreement between France and the United States in 1946 exposed the French film industry to American competitors through a system of quotas in return for economic aid for the reconstruction of France. The influence of Blum-Byrnes would play a significant role in determining the structural design of the French film industry and spreading the principle of cultural protectionism that would later dominate much of the discourse regarding French cultural policy and the policy frameworks constructed to preserve the concept of national French culture. In his role as Minister of Culture for the Fifth Republic under the stewardship of its President, Charles de Gaulle, Malraux was given authority to manage the Centre National de la Cinematographie (CNC). The CNC was founded in 1946 and had previously been placed under the supervision of the Ministry of Industry and Commerce to provide assistance, through subsidies, to the indigenous French film industry. In 1953 the CNC had been responsible for administering a selective support system for films d'art et essai, aiding the early work of noted documentary filmmakers Jean Rouch, Chris Marker, Agnes Varda, and Alain Resnais through a fonds de développement. During his tenure as Minister Malraux oversaw the establishment of an avance sur recettes loan system at the CNC that allowed producers to acquire partial financing from a support fund (fonds de soutien) based on a film's future profit. This subsidy and the relative strength of the French domestic box office (centered primarily in urban markets with its major market centered in Paris) helped to sustain the work of many practitioners of fictional film and documentary including several of the filmmakers associated with the nouvelle vague, who had adopted many of the precepts of documentary realism that Malraux had attempted to explore in Sierra de Teruel.

Malraux stepped down from his post as Minister of Culture in 1969, after de Gaulle's resignation as President. His departure was not unproblematic and he left the ministry amidst a scandal involving the attempted removal of Henri Langlois from his post as the director of the Cinemathèque Française, alienating him from many of the filmmakers his ministry had aided. In a rare return to private life after his civil service, Malraux would continue to write and maintain his lifelong interest in both art and politics.

JOSHUA AMBERG

See also: Man's Hope

Biography

Born in Paris November 3, 1901. Attended the Rue de Turbigot school in Paris 1915–17. 1921 publication of Lunes en papier. 1923–4 in Cambodia, arrested and convicted for theft. Political activity in Indo-China 1925–6. 1926 publication of La Tentation de l'Occident. 1928 publication of Les Conquerant. 1933 publication of La Condition humaine, awarded the Prix Goncourt. Political activity in Spain 1936–7. 1937 publication of L'Espoir. Production of Sierra de Teruel (aka L'Espoir/Man's Hope) 1938–9. 1939–40 served in the French army. Captured by the Germans 1940. 1941–4 activity with the French Resistance. Served as Minister of Information for Fourth Republic 1945–6. Publication of Le Musée imaginaire 1947. Served as Minister of Culture for Fifth Republic 1959–69. Died November 23, 1976 in Paris.

Selected film

1945 L'Espoir/Man's Hope: director, writer

Further reading

- Cate, Curtis, André Malraux: A Biography, London: Hutchinson, 1995.
- Cate, Curtis and Ahearne, Jeremy (eds), French Cultural Policy Debates: A Reader, London: Routledge, 2002.
- de Courcel, Martine (ed.), Malraux: Life and Work, London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1974.
- Lewis, R.W.B. (ed.), Malraux: A Collection of Critical Essays, Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice-Hall, 1964.
- Michalczyk, John J., André Malraux's Espoir: The Propaganda/Art Film and the Spanish Civil War, University: Romance Monographs, Inc., 1977.
- Romeiser, John B., André Malraux: A Reference Guide 1940–1990, New York: G.K. Hall & Co., 1994.

Man of Aran

(UK, Flaherty, 1934)

Man of Aran is Robert Flaherty at his most poetic and most removed from reality. In making the film, he took extreme measures to evade questions of the social and political context of the events and circumstances he portrayed while also shooting some of the most dramatic and beautiful images of the sea ever committed to film. The action takes place on the Aran Islands, off the coast of Ireland. A small fishing family face the perils of the sea when the son spots a basking shark and the local men go off in pursuit. Though their boat is lost in a storm, the men swim safely to shore. The film ends with the family making their way home in exhausted defiance of the sea that both nurtures and challenges them.

Man of Aran reconstructed an historical world that no longer (or perhaps never) existed, altering the profilmic until it fit the director's vision of what it should be like to live on an island. To obtain the desired rugged heroism in his characters, Flaherty cast three unrelated individuals as his mythical family. The two most important factual documentary sequences in the film, the farming and the shark hunt, were both reconstructed from practices that had long ceased; shark hunting had not taken place on the islands in more than two hundred years. Flaherty also violated ethnographic and ethical standards by significantly altering the rhythms of his subjects' lives and putting them in unnecessary physical danger. The fishermen's unfamiliarity with shark-hunting techniques meant that there was a genuine risk of their boat being capsized, and during the dramatic rescue of the boat from the sea in the opening scenes, Maggie Dirrane was almost swept out to sea while Flaherty filmed from a quarter of a mile away.

The idea for the film came from John Grierson, for whom Flaherty had just completed work on Industrial Britain (Flaherty, 1931). While Grierson shaped Flaherty's footage into something more closely resembling Grierson's conception of social documentary, he suggested that Flaherty might find the kind of isolated, agrarian community that fascinated him on the Aran Islands. After preliminary research, including reading the dramatic and documentary writings of J.M. Synge, Flaherty agreed. The film was produced by Michael Balcon, then head of Gaumont-British, for Gainsborough Pictures. In spite of Flaherty's poor reputation for working within industrial/studio conditions, Balcon gave him a budget of £30,000 and prepared to market the new epic documentary from the maker of Nanook of the North (Flaherty, 1922).

Like Flaherty's previous films, Man of Aran operates by alternating images of the faces and the environments of people. Significantly, the director's conception of the environment inhabited by these people was not of the land, but of the sea. Rather than a story of man and Aran, it is a story of man and the Atlantic. This had important effects on how he conceived of, or rather chose to omit, the social, cultural, and political aspects of life on the islands. By concentrating on fishing and the drama of a storm, Flaherty was able to sidestep a study of the islands as a community within the newly independent Irish state. The film became instead a romantic evocation of a people at the edge of civilisation, isolated and besieged by the intractable Atlantic.

The film was shot using a lightweight, spring-loaded camera and with a variety of long lenses of which Flaherty wrote appreciatively in 1934. Shooting up to half a mile away from his subjects, he claimed, gave the director the ability to eliminate self-consciousness and capture scenes that would have been impossible to film any other way. The photography of both human beings and the natural world was certainly more vivid and more monumental than ever before. The film used a greater amount of painstakingly arranged establishing shots and used the familiar fictional arrangement of shot-reverse shot to enhance and clarify the characters' reactions to events and circumstances. The overall visual rhythm was more conventional than in his previous films, a fact perhaps as much the result of his working with editors John Goldman and John Monck as a fundamental change in Flaherty's approach. The film established artful visual relationships among characters and between those characters and the environment in ways more closely resembling the conventions of epic drama than documentary. The final scenes, for example, frame the man against the skyline in a classic heroic pose, followed by an image of his son emulating it. The meaning of the sequence is clear; the son will battle the sea like his father in an endless and unchanging 'natural' cycle.

Though shot silently, the film was released with a soundtrack to correspond with the expectations of cinemagoers. Flaherty himself had little interest in or knowledge of sound. The musical score by John Greenwood seemed separate from the film and heightened the sense of romantic escapism. A largely random selection of wild-track sounds was also recorded, some of which were used effectively for atmosphere. The cast also recorded some vocalisations in a studio after the completion of principal photography.

The film was released as an authentic documentary record of life on the Aran islands amid a blaze of publicity and was a commercial success. It was only in later years that it was criticised, alongside most of the director's other films, for its romantic indulgences. Grierson had already written glowingly but cautiously of Flaherty 'I hope the neo-Rousseauianism implicit in Flaherty's work dies with his own exceptional self'. Paul Rotha would later be even more critical in his pronouncement that 'the Flaherty method is an evasion of the issues that matter most in the modern world'. Man of Aran was probably the most Rousseauian of all of the director's films and was proof of his continuing distance from those whose work he had inspired, including Grierson. It is more valuable as a documentary of Flaherty's vision of life than of life itself.

HARVEY O'BRIEN

See also: Flaherty, Robert

Man of Aran (UK, Gainsborough Pictures, 1934, 75 mins). Distributed by Gaumont-British Pictures. Produced by Michael Balcon. Directed by Robert Flaherty, with the collaboration of Frances Flaherty and John Goldman. Written by John Goldman. Edited by John Goldman and John Monck. Assistant direction by Pat Mullen. Field Laboratory by John Taylor. Music by John Greenwood. Musical Direction by Louis Levy. Sound by Harry Hand. Filmed in Inismore Island, Ireland.

Further reading

Barsam, Richard, The Vision of Robert Flaherty, Bloomington, IN and Indianapolis, IN: Indiana University Press, 1988.

Flaherty, Robert, 'Account of Making the Film—Man of Aran', Box 31, Flaherty Papers, New York: Columbia University, n.d.

—'Filming Real People', in Lewis Jacobs (ed.), The Documentary Tradition, second edn, New York and London: Norton, 1979.

Man with the Movie Camera

(USSR, Vertov, 1929)

Man with the Movie Camera is a film that has been claimed, justifiably, by historians of both documentary and avant-garde cinema (see, for example, Barnouw 1983; Sitney 1975). It is indeed a prime example of the considerable overlap between these two traditions in the 1920s and early 1930s, and serves as a reminder for contemporary viewers of just how audaciously experimental documentary can be (Nichols 2001). The crucial point, however, is that Man with the Movie Camera is an audio-visual manifesto demonstrating how cinema could be reinvented. Its director, Dziga Vertov, issued many written manifestos during the 1920s and 1930s, arguing for the need to film 'life as it is' and to organise filmed material according to a 'higher mathematics of facts' (Michelson 1984). Man with the Movie Camera elaborates these arguments on film.

Structurally, Man with the Movie Camera relates to the 1920s cycle of 'city symphony' films exemplified by Berlin: The Symphony of a Great City (Walter Ruttmann, Germany, 1927). These follow a 'day in the life' of the city. Man with the Movie Camera extends this basic idea in several ways. It combines material shot in Moscow, Kiev, and Odessa. It emphasises the interpenetration between rest, work, and productive leisure in the lives of good Soviet citizens. It loosely follows the adventures of a cameraman (Mikhail Kaufman) filming in diverse locations. Moreover, it represents its own making as a form of productive labour and undertakes a reflexive examination and celebration of cinematic vision (Michelson 1972). Bearing this in mind, Man with the Movie Camera's structure can also be seen in terms of charting its own construction and exhibition, from shooting and editing through to a triumphant final screening. On a more abstract level it is possible to argue that certain visual motifs recurring across the film give it another layer of structural coherence (Petric 1987).

Stylistically, Man with the Movie Camera exploits a gamut of devices to illustrate how the cinematic apparatus can augment human perception. The cinematography uses shots from every conceivable location, angle, and distance, including trick shots that play perceptual games with the viewer. Slow motion, freeze-frame, superimposition, and split screen effects are also deployed. Some shots are cut so rapidly that the viewer barely registers their content yet receives a dynamic impression of movement and energy. More generally, the film's complex and unusual editing matches and contrasts graphic elements and movements across similar and disparate shots. It utilises some of the conventions of features editing such as eye-line matching and matching on action, but often turns them to its own ends. Faced with this barrage of cinematic virtuosity, it is quite possible that first-time viewers of Man with the Movie Camera will simply be overwhelmed by the film. Particularly with repeat viewings, however, it is possible to discern some of the patterns and concepts articulated within its overall design.

Vertov and his 'kinoks' collaborators (cinematographer Kaufman and editor Elizaveta Svilova) were militant exponents in 1920s post-Revolutionary Soviet cinema of the avant-garde insistence on the need for a complete break with the culture of the past. In Man with the Movie

Figure 9 Man with the Movie Camera, 1929 (Courtesy of the British Film Institute)

Camera this is provocatively visualised near the end of the film. In a split screen shot, the Bolshoi Theatre, home of traditional art, breaks apart and collapses. Similarly, mainstream cinema had to be rejected because it hindered realisation of the medium's true social and technological potential and prevented audiences from engaging with reality. This is summarised near the beginning of Man with the Movie Camera. The eponymous cameraman walks past a poster for an entertainment film. A high-angle shot of a bustling city square, a low-angle shot of an industrial chimney, and a shot of a miner working underground follow. In four shots the film moves away from mainstream cinema into 'life as it is'. The combination of these shots into a 'higher mathematics of facts' reveals one of the power sources fuelling city life (Tsivian 1998).

Fundamentally, Man with the Movie Camera envisages cinema as the cultural electricity powering revolutionary progress. It operates like an alternating current, channelling energy between different aspects of an integrated Soviet society. Pleasure is linked to social production and productive work is joyful rather than alienating. The individual intersects with technology and collective activity. Shots of working hands, healthy torsos, and smiling faces are joined with aestheticised shots of machines. Industrial workers enjoy their work as well as athletics, music, and most of all cinema, within an accelerating cinematic rhythm. This rhythm feeds back into work practices and, within the utopian virtual city that the film constructs, speeds up the pace of progressive social development. The lives of good Soviet citizens represented in Man with the Movie Camera, and by implication the lives of its audience, are enhanced through synthesis with technology in the same way that human perception is expanded by watching the film (Turvey 1999).

Beyond its immediate Soviet, avant-garde context, the cultural 'year zero' premise and utopian dimension of Man with the Movie Camera connects with some long-established Russian cultural traditions. Cultural historians have highlighted the prominence of two parallel streams within nineteenth- and early twentieth-century Russian culture (Billington 1970; Sutes 1989). One is a violent, morally outraged rejection of previous and current culture, a desire to wipe the slate clean that often borders on the nihilistic. The other is an explicitly or quasi-theological belief in the power of art and the artist to redeem or reconstruct society. Both streams feed into Man with the Movie Camera and partially account for the visionary extremism it shares with the work of other Soviet avant-garde figures such as the poet Vladimir Mayakovsky.

Man with the Movie Camera's formal innovations and uncompromising cultural politics did not lend it to easy assimilation either in the Soviet Union or abroad. At home it attracted accusations of formalism, and subsequent Soviet debates about the role of documentary contributed to the further marginalisation of Vertov and the kinoks' approach to filmmaking (Roberts 1999). Abroad, Man with the Movie Camera was noticed by influential commentators. For example, the German film and cultural theorist Siegfried Kracauer wrote a positive review to accompany its Berlin screening. Exhibited at the Eighth Street Playhouse in New York in 1930, it was the first Soviet film seen by Jay Leyda, future Eisenstein scholar and author of the classic Kino: A History of the Russian and Soviet Film. Nonetheless, British documentary filmmakers John Grierson and Paul Rotha typified the predominant foreign response to Man with the Movie Camera by praising its undeniable technical and experimental accomplishments but failing to see its point.

It is tempting to describe Man with the Movie Camera as a film defiantly ahead of its time. Several decades passed before it received sustained attention from film scholars and filmmakers. There was some revival of interest in Vertov and the kinoks in the Soviet Union during the post-Stalin 'thaw' of the later 1950s and early 1960s, when the Soviet avant-garde suppressed under Stalinism was cautiously reappraised. In France around the same time, Jean Rouch developed his notion of cinéma vérité, pursued in Chronique d'un été/Chronicle of a Summer (Jean Rouch and Edgar Morin, 1961), with reference to the occasional practice of filming 'life caught unawares' in Man with the Movie Camera. 'Life caught unawares' was Vertov's term for experiments with recording the reactions of subjects unexpectedly confronted with the camera. An example in Man with the Movie Camera occurs when Kaufman, using a car-mounted camera, films two expensively dressed, wealthy women in a horse-drawn cab. Unlike the beaming workers seen elsewhere in the film, one of them reacts rather self-consciously to being observed.

At the end of the 1960s Jean-Luc Godard and his collaborators in the radical Dziga Vertov Group seized on another aspect of Man with the Movie Camera. The film insistently compares the work of the filmmakers to the work of productive Soviet labourers. Svilova is shown at her editing table working on shots from the film. The French Dziga Vertov Group sought to incorporate a similarly reflexive explicitness about the process of film construction into their own productions. A widespread feeling among radical filmmakers at this time was that documentaries and other forms of filmmaking should reveal rather than conceal their processes of construction in order to encourage more active and critical responses from audiences. Where the Dziga Vertov Group films differ from Man with the Movie Camera is in their lack of utopianism about the contemporary political situation. Simultaneous with this more politicised appropriation, Man with the Movie Camera, because of its experimental aspect, also began to be screened alongside the work of Stan Brakhage, Malcolm LeGrice, and others within avant-garde circles.

Man with the Movie Camera's revival and its influence on later generations of filmmakers have been accompanied by a considerable and still growing body of scholarly work devoted to its exegesis. Annette Michelson's pioneering essay on the film highlighted its reflexive dimension and its makers' ambition to use all the resources of the cinematic apparatus for enlightenment rather than illusionism (Michelson 1972). Subsequent commentators offered more detailed analyses of, for example, how particular sequences in Man with the Movie Camera critique the social and economic inequalities perpetuated by the New Economic Policy (NEP), which was drawing to a close in the late 1920s (Crofts and Rose 1977). Given the film's complexity, most of this scholarly effort has concentrated on elucidating its makers' intentions. However, some more recent work has raised questions about how Man with the Movie Camera constructs gender within its utopian world and about how it deals with issues of ethnicity (Mayne 1989; Stollery 2000).

Initially, the appropriation of Man with the Movie Camera by the Dziga Vertov Group and some radical scholars generated an aura of political irreproachability around the film. Prompted by the demise of the Soviet Union, some more recent commentators have argued that although Vertov himself was dismissed as a formalist and increasingly marginalised during the Stalinist 1930s and 1940s, Man with the Movie Camera nevertheless shares some basic political assumptions with Stalinism. Its radiant workers and harmonious synthesis of humanity and technology mystify the actual historical conditions of labour in the Soviet Union during the 1920s (Tsvian 1998). Its unqualified endorsement of rapid industrialisation and, more tenuously, its metaphorical references to cleansing society of unproductive elements can be seen as an anticipation of Stalinist practice during and after the First Five-Year Plan (1928–33) (Roberts 2000).

Defenders of Man with the Movie Camera's cultural politics might argue that there is a significant difference between its genuine, zestful, possibly naive utopianism and the cynically conformist utopianism of later Stalinist Socialist Realism. The success of the alternative, emancipatory social role for cinema that Man with the Movie Camera agitates for was crucially dependent on its makers' optimism about underlying progressive tendencies within Soviet society being vindicated. Their gamble on the direction history would take did not pay off. Rather than intervening significantly into its immediate context, Man with the Movie Camera lay dormant for many years before reemerging as an important reference point for a diverse range of later documentary and avant-garde filmmakers and scholars. One of the many reasons why the film remains so compelling is because even though people may now no longer believe they are ever realisable, it affords a nostalgic glimpse into cinematic and social possibilities that might have been.

MARTIN STOLLERY

See also: Vertov, Dziga

Man with the Movie Camera/Chelovek s Kinoapparatom (USSR, VUFKU, 1929). Direction and scenario by Dziga Vertov. Edited by Elizaveta Svilova. Cinematography by Mikhail Kaufman, possibly assisted by Peter Zotov. Filmed in Moscow, Kiev and Odessa.

Further reading

Barnouw, Erik, Documentary: A History of the Non-fiction Film, New York: Oxford University Press, 1983.

- Billington, James, The Icon and the Axe: An Interpretive History of Russian Culture, New York: Random House, 1970.
- Crofts, Stephen and Rose, Olivia, 'An Essay Towards Man With a Movie Camera', Screen 18, no. 1, 1977: 9–58.
- Mayne, Judith, Kino and the Woman Question, Columbus, OH: Ohio State University Press, 1989: 837.
- Michelson, Annette, 'The Man With the Movie Camera: From Magician to Epistemologist', Art Forum 10, no. 7, March 1972: 60–72.
- (ed.), Kino-Eye: The Writings of Dziga Vertov, London: Pluto Press, 1984.
- Nichols, Bill, 'Documentary Film and the Modernist Avant-Garde', Critical Inquiry 27, no. 4, summer 2001: 580–610.
- Petric, Vlada, Constructivism in Film. The Man with the Movie Camera. A Cinematic Analysis, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1987.
- Roberts, Graham, Forward Soviet! History and Non-fiction Film in the USSR, London: I.B. Tauris, 1999.
- The Man with the Movie Camera*, London: I. B. Tauris, 2000.
- Simey, P. Adams (ed.), The Essential Cinema, New York: New York University Press, 1975.
- Sites, Richard, Revolutionary Dreams, Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1989.
- Stollery, Martin, Alternative Empires: European Modernist Cinemas and Cultures of Imperialism, Exeter: University of Exeter Press, 2000.
- Tsvian, Yuri, commentary to The Man with the Movie Camera Video, London: BFI/Connoisseur, 1998.
- Turvey, Malcolm, 'Can the Camera See? Mimesis in Man with a Movie Camera', October 89, summer 1999: 25–50.

Manhatta

(US, Sheeler and Strand, 1921)

The emergence of the 'city symphony' as a film form in the 1920s arose from the intense interest among filmmakers to document the dynamism of the modern city. Films such as Berlin: Die Sinfonie einer Großstadt/Berlin: The Symphony of a Great City (Walter Ruttmann, 1926), Rain/Regan (Joris Ivens, 1929), and Man with the Movie Camera/Chelovek s Kinoapparatom (Dziga Vertov, 1929) focused on Berlin, Rotterdam, and Moscow, respectively, with the filmmakers using a variety of modernist techniques, including cutting, tracking, abstraction and perspectival shots, to convey the multiple points of view that were a central feature of urban modernity. Preceding all these films, the visual artists Paul Strand and Charles Sheeler had collaborated to make an American city symphony, Manhatta, that became influential on both sides of the Atlantic for testing the cinematic possibilities of city films. Strand and Sheeler began collaborating on the film in early 1920 and worked on it for most of that year. Manhatta has been the accepted title since 1927, but Strand periodically referred to it as Mannahatta; at its premiere in July 1921 at the Rialto Theater on Broadway it was called New York the Magnificent; and in 1922 in Paris it had the title Fumée de New York.

Strand and Sheeler were trained in painting and photography but were drawn to moving images to represent the rhythms of the city. They shared the belief that film should develop its own cinematic language, but they were novice filmmakers (particularly Strand) and relied on photographic forms in composing urban scenes. A contemporary review by Robert Allen Parker makes this clear: they 'sought to apply the technical knowledge gained from their experiments and achievements in still photography to the more complex problems of the motion picture'.

Manhatta is generally accepted as one of the first avant-garde films in America, with its emphasis on modernist experimentation. The seven-minute film interposes shots of Manhattan with lyrics taken from two of Walt Whitman's city poems, 'Crossing Brooklyn Ferry' (1881) and 'Mannahatta' (1888), which are used as inter-titles and superimposed over a mythical image of the Manhattan skyline. This fusion of literary and cinematic idioms supports the view that Strand and Sheeler saw film as a hybrid form. The lyrics can be seen either to reinforce the image of New York as 'the city of ambition' (as Alfred Stieglitz dubbed it in his 1910 photograph), or offer an ironic juxtaposition to the moving images of a city full of smoke and industry, facilitating working life at the expense of community and leisure. The close match between poetry and visual images substantiates Jan-Christopher Horak's claim that the lyrics were intended as an integral part of the film (reflecting the interest in Whitman among other modernist artists like Joseph Stella), but Scott Hammen asserts that the Rialto Theater managers added the lines after completion. Whatever their provenance, as Miles Orvell argues, the lyrics serve to 'soften the effect of the actual modern city, a city that as pictured is far beyond what even Whitman might have imagined'.

In terms of exhibition, Horak notes that Manhatta 'was released commercially as a "scenic", a quasi-travelogue, shown in cinemas [to piano accompaniment] as a short before a feature presentation', in the same vein as Robert Flaherty's later homage to New York City, Twenty-Four Dollar Island (1927). However, Strand and Sheeler's artistic ambitions for the film were much stronger than its early exhibition record attest. In a 1921 press release, Strand commented that they had restricted themselves 'to the towering geometry of lower Manhattan' and 'tried to register directly the living forms in front of them and to reduce through the most rigid selection, volumes, lines and masses, to their intensest terms of expressiveness'. In this drive to abstraction, Strand compares Manhatta to one of the most distinctive examples of silent German avant-garde film, The Cabinet of Dr Caligari/Das Kabinett des Dr Caligari (Robert Wiene, 1919), suggesting that he and Sheeler were attempting 'to do in a scenic with natural objects what in The Cabinet of Dr Caligari was attempted with painted sets'.

Although Manhatta is a non-narrative film, it retains the structure of a day in the life of New Yorkers in downtown Manhattan, focusing on the area around Battery Park, the Staten Island Docks, and Wall Street. The island topography of the city is emphasised, from the opening images of the arrival of workers to the closing scenes of boats in the harbour at dusk (suggesting a closure or cyclical return). In the middle sections the camera continually shifts its perspective from street-level shots to high angles from the top of skyscrapers (some of which are in the process of construction), in an attempt to render the extreme and multiple viewpoints that the modern city engenders. One of the most interesting features is the inclusion of some of the most iconic images of American modernism such as Strand's Wall Street (1915), which portrays indistinct figures dwarfed by the huge dark windows of the Morgan & Company Bank, and Stieglitz's The Ferry Boat (1910), depicting the transportation of a crowd of workers to the city island (as well as other images published in Stieglitz's photographic journal, Camera Work). Many of these images depict New Yorkers as silhouettes or distant figures lacking individuality. Although the film depicts the drive of urban forces and portrays crowds as 'swarms of ants' when viewed from above, however, Strand and Sheeler stop short of representing an entirely dehumanised city or what Karen Lucic calls the 'disturbing sense of anonymity and conformity' of metropolitan life. By developing Stieglitz's aesthetic interest in the interplay between nature and modernity in his photographs from the 1910s, they balance the geometrical harshness of new buildings with shots softened by mist, sky, and sea. This more balanced view of the city falls in line with Horak's claim that despite Strand and Sheeler's interest in the abstractions of the city, their inclusion of natural imagery (together with Whitman's lyrics) reveals 'a romantic longing for a universe in which man remains in harmony with nature'.

MARTIN HALLIWELL

Manhatta (US, 1921, 7 mins). Direction, editing, and photography by Paul Strand and Charles Sheeler. Verse by Walt Whitman. Filmed in lower Manhattan, 1920.

Further reading

- Hammen, Scott, 'Sheeler and Strand's "Manhatta": A Neglected Masterpiece', Asterimage 6, no. 6, January 1979: 6–7.
- Horak, Jan-Christopher, 'Modernist Perspectives and Romantic Desire: Manhatta', Asterimage 15, no. 4, November 1987: 8–15 (a longer version in Paul Strand: Essays on his Life and Work, ed. Maren Stange, New York: Aperture, 1990: 55–71).
- 'The First American Film Avant-Garde, 1919–1945' and 'Paul Strand and Charles Sheeler's Manhatta', in Jan-Christopher Horak (ed.), Lovers of Cinema: The First American Film Avant-Garde, 1919–45, Madison, WI: University of Wisconsin Press, 1995: 14–66, 267–86.
- Jacobs, Lewis, 'Avant-Garde Film Production in America', in Roger Manvell (ed.), Experiment in the Film, London: Grey Walls Press, 1949 (New York: Arno Press, 1970).
- Lucic, Karen, Charles Sheeler and the Cult of the Machine, London: Reaktion, 1991.
- Orvell, Miles, 'The Artist Looks at the Machine: Whitman, Sheeler and American Modernism', in After the Machine: Visual Arts and the Erasing of Cultural Boundaries, Jackson, MS: University Press of Mississippi, 1995: 3–27.
- Parker, Robert Allen, 'The Art of the Camera', Arts & Decoration 15, no. 6, October 1921: 396.
- Stebbins, Theodore E., Jr, and Keyes, Norman, Jr, Charles Sheeler: The Photographs, Boston: Museum of Fine Art, 1987: 17–21.
- Tashjian, Dickran, Skyscraper Primitives: Dada and the American Avant-Garde, Middletown, CT: Wesleyan University Press, 1975.

Man's Hope

(France, Malraux, 1939)

André Malraux made only one film in the course of a life crowded with major (and heroic) achievements of art and action and, after death, a burial in the Panthéon as a Hero of France. Among other things, he was a great novelist, antifascist political activist, leader in the French resistance against the Nazi invaders, author of influential and beautifully written meditations on the visual arts and, as Minister of Culture under President Charles de Gaulle, the man who ordered the buildings of Paris to be cleansed of their centuries of grime so as to visually renew the City of Lights.

The film he entitled Sierra de Teruel, later renamed Espoir/Man's Hope, was made with few resources under difficult conditions during the Spanish civil war. Malraux had performed a vital role for the Spanish Republic by organizing an international air force to counter the uprising of the Nationalists, which was supported by most of the Spanish military and was soon to be heavily aided by men and equipment from Nazi Germany and Fascist Italy. His novel, L'Espoir (1937), is a fictionalized panorama of the war at a time when victory for the forces of the Republic still seemed a possible outcome. Through characters based on Republican leaders and ordinary fighters, Spaniards and international volunteers, the novel presents a combination of vividly realized history, richly varied characters at war, and a modern yet classically resonant prose poetry of the battlefields, of human beings in passionate action under the all-darkening shadow of death. Among the events are those experienced by Malraux himself (Magnin in the novel) in his role as commander of an aerial squadron of international and Spanish volunteers. The film Sierra de Teruel deals with one sequence of that squadron's experience (though the events are expanded and some dramatic moments are added). The major action takes place in the hill country of Teruel in the province of Aragon, the key moment being a raid on a Nationalist airfield and the destruction of a bridge by two Republican bomber planes.

Malraux and his collaborators, all of them combatants on the side of the Republic or supporters of the Republican cause and untrained as actors, began filming in 1938 in Barcelona and the surrounding hills of Catalonia, but the advance of the Nationalist troops forced them to move to southern France, where the film was completed in 1939. After being shown three times to limited audiences, it was banned in September 1939 by the French government, and all the prints but one were reportedly destroyed by the Nazi occupiers during World War II. In 1945, with Germany defeated, the film (renamed Espoir to clearly connect it with the novel) was shown to a large public and awarded the prestigious Prix Luis Delluc for best French film of the year.

Stylistically, Espoir the film reflects the major characteristics of the novel, sometimes transmuting them into impressive cinema, but sometimes falling far short of a successful translation into the new medium. Especially at the beginning, there are awkward scenes of novelistic dialogue and brief moments of political declamation. The limited budget is reflected in battle scenes that consist only of the sounds of gunfire accompanying otherwise peaceful footage or the conclusion of an episode with dark screen and mere sound when a car full of combatants destroyed or a plane crashes, to avoid the necessity of simulating explosions. Yet, as in Malraux's novels, powerful moments of visual poetry advance or punctuate the action. The off-screen sounds of bombing are echoed by the trembling of water within a large flask. Panicking sheep filling a meadow become an analogy for civilians fleeing before the advance of General Franco's crack Moorish mercenaries.

The documentary aspects of the film include the use of actual combat footage, and the influence of Robert Flaherty in the sculptural treatment of the faces and forms of common people, as well as in the recreation of community events, here a community of struggle. The early films of Sergei Eisenstein also are reflected in some of the dramatic mass shots and heroic close-ups. (Malraux, who was always very interested in cinema, had begun but then abandoned a project to film his novel L'Espoir with Eisenstein.) However, at a point nearly two-thirds of the way into the film, the action literally and figuratively takes off into its finest and most original moments.

Two bombers, with Spanish and international crews, begin a mission. One bomber is to locate and raid a Nationalist airfield and hold their planes on the ground long enough for the other bomber to destroy a bridge. They must take off at night, and there is no working generator for normal airstrip lights. Cars have been volunteered from a series of small towns, and we see the headlights turn on, car by car, across a dark distance that the planes, in turn, traverse and rise above. This image of solidarity is followed by the raids and the destruction of the bridge, done with a cross-cutting of the crews and aerial combat footage, impressive for its time. One plane returns safely but the other crashes in the mountains of Teruel. The crew of the fallen plane is then transported down the mountains, the dying and those who will survive on improvised stretchers, one dead airman in a bouncing white coffin strapped to a mule. Long, ever-growing lines of peasants, seen close up and in long shot against the rugged mountains, accompany the descent to honor the airmen who are given silent, solemn respect by crowds in the villages they cross. While the novel L'Espoir ends with a major character filled with hope (espoir) for victory, the film concludes with this magnificently realized vision of solidarity but also of elegy and mourning, whether intended or not, for the lost cause of the Spanish Republic.

MIRA BINFORD

See also: Malraux, André

Espoir/Man's Hope (aka Sierra de Teruel) (France, 1939, 75 mins, black and white). In Spanish, available with French and English subtitles. Directed by Andre Malraux assisted by Boris Peskin and Max Aub. Script: Andre Malraux assisted by Denis Marion. Cinematography: Louis Page and Andre Thomas. Music: Darius Milhaud. Produced by Corniglion-Molinier. Filmed in Spain and France.

Further reading

- Lyotard, Jean-Francois, Signed, Malraux, trans. Robert Harvey, Minneapolis, MN: University of Minnesota Press, 1999.
- Malraux, Andre, L'Espoir, a novel, Gallimard (1937), trans. Stuart Gilbert and Alistair MacDonald as Man's Hope, Random House, 1938.
- Esquisse d'une psychologie du cinéma, Paris: Editions Nouveau Monde, 2003.
- Marion, Denis, Le Cinéma selon André Malraux, Paris: Petite bibliothèque de Cahiers du Cinema, 1970.
- Michalczyk, John J., Andre Malraux's Espoir: The Propaganda/Art Film and the Spanish Civil War, Romance Monographs no. 27, Jackson, MS: University of Mississippi, 1977.

n.a., Screenplay with commentary, L'Espoir—Sierra de Teruel, Paris: Gallimard Folio, 1937.

Manufacturing Consent: Noam Chomsky and the Media

(Canada, Achbar and Wintonick, 1992)

Noam Chomsky, the noted linguist and famed scholar, acts as the protagonist in Mark Achbar and Peter Wintonick's loose narrative, Manufacturing Consent: Noam Chomsky and the Media. The film chronologically charts the rise of the socialist activist Chomsky, who holds himself outside the mainstream media so as to retain the ability to critique it. This feature-length documentary is an epic and engaging examination of Noam Chomsky's critique of corporate news-gathering and the vested interests that lie behind media coverage.

Divided into two large segments composed of smaller informational units, each addressing a specific element of Chomsky's theses concerning the media, Manufacturing Consent is swiftly paced considering its nearly three-hour running time. Part one, 'Thought Control in a Democratic Society', focuses on Chomsky's background and his rise to prominence among the Western world's foremost scholars before establishing his leading role in the world of political activism. Achbar and Wintonick are careful to divide the intellectual's academic pursuits from his activism. Time and again the case is made that Chomsky's political position is a simple matter of 'being able to look at yourself in the mirror each day' and the scholar's contemporary critiques of power politics are removed from the 'Chomskyan Revolution of Linguistics' that established him in academia during the 1960s. Part two offers a far more detailed examination of Chomsky's role in contemporary activism and outlines several of his targets. Chomsky's application of the propaganda model to American news reportage of events in Cambodia and East Timor from 1975 to 1979 is presented as an example of how corporate and government concerns shape the news. During this documentary, within the documentary, the filmmakers skilfully combine file footage, interview material, and original illustrations to offer Manufacturing Consent's most dramatic example of the behaviour of the corporate press.

Throughout Manufacturing Consent, quotes from Chomsky's literature and documentary footage from separate segments of Achbar and Wintonick's film appear on billboards during brief transition shots featuring public spaces such as airports, shopping malls, and baseball stadiums. This 'recontextualization' of both Chomsky's politics and the filmmakers' imagery points up the absence of such oppositional viewpoints in mass media outlets. In fact, this device goes so far to strengthen the filmmakers' thesis concerning the importance of Chomsky's message as the activist's own words do. Other self-reflexive moments involve regular appearances of the filmmakers on-screen, often as illustrators of Chomsky's theories and arguments.

More than five years in the making, Manufacturing Consent aims to assist in the 'development of courses of intellectual self-defence', or independent thought, that led Chomsky to his self-professed stance as a 'rationalist-libertarian-socialist'. Lacking the conventional voice-over narration that generally orders such compilation films, Manufacturing Consent allows viewers to come to their own decisions concerning the material presented.

MICHAEL B. BAKER

Manufacturing Consent: Noam Chomsky and the Media (Canada, Necessary Illusions/National Film Board of Canada, 1992, 168 mins). Distributed by Zeitgeist Films. Co-directed by Mark Achbar and Peter Wintonick. Produced by Dennis Murphy, Colin Neale, Adam Symansky, Peter Wintonick, Francis Miquet, and Mark Achbar. Cinematography by Mark Achbar, Norbert Bunge, Antonin Lhotsky, Francis Miquet, and Barry Perles, Ken Reeves, Kirk Tongas, Peter Wintonick. Videography by Mark Achbar, Eddie Becker, Dan Garson, Michael Goldberg, William Turnley, Peter Walker, and Peter Wintonick. Edited by Peter Wintonick. Music by Carl Schultz.

Further reading

Achbar, Mark and Wintonick, Peter, 'Manufacturing Dissent', Cineaste 3, 1993.
Chomsky, Noam and Herman, Edward S., Manufacturing Consent: The Political Economy of the Mass Media, New York: Pantheon Books, 1988.

- Glassman, Marc, 'Mediating Noam Chomsky. Manufacturing Consent: Noam Chomsky and the Media', Take One 2, winter 1993.
- Kubey, Robert, 'In Praise of Chomsky', Intermedia 4, August–September 1994.
- Mattick, P., Jr, 'Manufacturing Consent: Noam Chomsky and the Media', Cineaste 1, 1993.
- Peck, James (ed.), The Chomsky Reader, New York: Pantheon Books, 1987.

March of Time, The

(US, 1935–51)

The March of Time (MOT) had the most substantial and sustained success of any documentary-like film series before the advent of television. It offered a new and distinctive form of screen journalism, a cross between newsreel and documentary. At its peak in the late 1930s and during World War II, it was seen in the United States alone by more than twenty million people a month, in nine thousand theaters. It was distributed internationally as well.

MOT was sponsored by the Time-Life-Fortune organization headed by Henry Luce. The monthly film series was preceded by a weekly radio series of the same title. Roy E. Larson of Time was responsible for the initiation of both series; Louis de Rochemont became the principal creative and operational head of the film series. The films and magazine functioned as promotion for each other.

Although sponsored by a politically conservative organization, MOT was identified with a liberal stance, more so than Time magazine. This was particularly true in foreign affairs; the films tended to be more conservative or erratic on domestic issues. Still, although feature films in the 1930s ignored or dealt only covertly with the Depression, MOT acknowledged unemployment, bread lines, and political demagoguery.

Internationally, newsreels avoided controversial political and military developments, but MOT tackled the machinations of Hitler, Stalin, Mussolini, and Tojo. One of the most politically controversial films in the history of American cinema was MOT's 'Inside Nazi Germany' (1938). It examined in some detail (sixteen minutes) the regimentation of the German people, the control and consolidation of nationalistic allegiances, and the preparations being made for future military and economic expansion. This was at a time when the majority of the American public was still strongly isolationist and the government maintained a careful impartiality.

The success of The March of Time—fueled by the controversy it aroused, as well as its energetic innovations—encouraged imitations, especially after World War II began. Created along the same lines were the National Film Board (NFB) of Canada's monthly Canada Carries On (1939–50) and World in Action (1940–5). When the distribution of The March of Time moved from RKO to Twentieth Century Fox in 1942, RKO replaced it with its own series, This is America (1942–51). The influence of MOT extended into American government documentaries of World War II as well, the most important being the Why We Fight series. Immediately after the war, in the UK, the J. Arthur Rank organization produced and distributed This Modern Age (1946–50). MOT was the principal model for the historical compilation documentary that became so prevalent on American television after the impressive success of Victory at Sea (1952–3).

A standard format for The March of Time was established early and varied little, regardless of subject. The fixed form may have been necessitated by the pressures of monthly production with modest resources; it must also have come to seem desirable given the considerable popularity of the series in the form in which it was offered. One of the most important ingredients was the voice and delivery style of its commentator, Westbrook Van Voorhis. His 'Voice of Time' (sometimes irreverently referred to as the 'Voice of God') was deep and commanding, ominous and reassuring at the same time. Spoken words carried the weight of the communication; the footage (largely stock), music (obvious and clichéd), and sound effects (sparse and highly selective) were cut to them. Often the pictures were given their meaning by the words, as part of 'the dramatization of the news' that MOT practiced. An extreme close-up of a face and mouth at a telephone becomes 'An angry refusal'; a long shot of a city street at night with a few electric signs becomes 'That evening Shanghai is tense' (War in China, 1937). Editing was the key. The pace is fast, with a hard rhythmic impact; a great deal of information is presented dramatically to capture the attention of the popcorn-chewing, Friday-night audience.

Structurally, each issue has four parts, with titles announcing each part. The first establishes the magnitude and urgency of the problem being dealt with. The second offers an historical survey of its origins and causes. Part three presents the immediate complications, confirming its newsworthiness. The concluding part looks to the future, stressing that the problem is a matter for continuing and serious concern.

By 1951 the losses of The March of Time had become too heavy for even the Luce organization to sustain. It was suffering from the competition of television news and public affairs programs, which could do the same thing as MOT films in theaters, with much greater immediacy. It was suffering even more from rising costs and inadequate rentals paid for shorts by the theaters, geared largely to the selling of feature films. Finally, it was no doubt suffering from its own fixed style and approach, which, through repetition of two hundred and five issues over sixteen years, had lost much of the freshness and excitement of its earlier days.

The March of Time must be acknowledged, however, as a memorable phenomenon in the history of popular American culture. Its influence has extended down to much of the documentary and public affairs programming on television today.

JACK C. ELLIS

See also: Rochemont, Louis de

The March of Time (US, Time, Inc., monthly, 1935–51, about 20 mins per issue). Distributed its first year by First Division Exchanges, then by RKO/Radio, and later Twentieth Century Fox. Produced by Louis de Rochemont and Roy Larson, but in 1943 Louis was replaced by his brother Richard de Rochemont. Edited by Louis de Rochemont and Roy Larson; Louis replaced by brother Richard during World War II. Technical management by Jack Bradford and Lothar Wolff. Commentary read by Westbrook Van Voorhis.

Marker, Chris

The French-based writer, photographer, filmmaker, and multimedia artist Chris Marker is a major—if elusive—figure in the development of documentary since World War II. Best known as a pioneer and accomplished exponent of the essay-film, in Marker's case the term is a catch-all for an extraordinarily diverse body of work that encompasses travelog, portraiture, political argument, and philosophical enquiry (often all in the course of a single film), and draws its impetus as much from shifts in the political and aesthetic climate as from his own enthusiasms and pre-occupations.

Marker is credited with rephrasing cinéma vérité as 'cine, ma vérité' (cinema, my truth), a gesture that conveys not only the humour and intelligence that distinguish his films, but the essence of Marker's achievement in placing the subjectivity of the maker at the heart of the documentary enterprise, and linking this to an understanding that truth is not an objective quality to be discovered in the world, but the outcome of human creation, interpretation, and contestation. Long before the concept of reflexivity gained currency in documentary debates, Marker made films that play commentary and images off against each other to question and open up the processes by which documentary realities are arrived at. The identity of their maker is similarly treated as a fluid projection ('Chris Marker' is a long-standing pseudonym). The disembodied commentators of Marker's films are fictional characters who may share certain familiar and recurring traits with the author (a love of travel, a passion for cats and owls, an ingrained mistrust of received ideas), but can never simply be equated with him.

Marker emerged as a filmmaker in the 1950s, nourished by the wider contemporary flourishing in France of a distinctly personal approach to nonfiction subject-matter. He sustained close friendships and working collaborations with several of its key directors, including Mario Ruspoli, François Reichenbach, Agnès Varda, and Alain Resnais, with whom he codirected his first film, Les Statues meurent aussi (1950–3). Marker established his reputation through four films released in the later 1950s and early 1960s. All are based on journeys to countries and regions in transition: China in Dimanche à Pékin (1956), Siberia in Lettre de Sibérie (1958), Israel in Description d'un combat (1960), and Cuba in Cuba Sí! (1961). The intimate, engaging commentaries of these films, which recount the experiences and observations of an unseen visitor, disregard conventional hierarchies of documentary content to combine political exposition with lighthearted humour, poetic reverie with historical insight, and philosophical erudition with delighted interest in the banalities of everyday life. This playful mixing of registers is most developed in Lettre de Sibérie, which extends it to the image track by using animation and an invented commercial for reindeer products alongside more conventional observational footage. Its purpose is most clearly manifested in the celebrated sequence of a street scene, road menders, and squinting passer-by in the city of Yakoutsk. The sequence is repeated four times: first without commentary, then in turn with a pro-Soviet paean, an anti-communist critique, and an account of the visitor's own observations. Each of these representations is understood to have a bearing on the reality of Siberia, but none is granted the privilege of being the truth.

In the early 1960s Marker turned to the new lightweight equipment that was revolutionising documentary practice in France and the United States. Le Joli Mai (1962) was a departure for Marker in several respects. Far longer than his previous films, it is based around interviews with a cross-section of Parisians recorded in the spring of 1962, immediately after the end of the Algerian War. Le Joli Mai extends the subjective premise of Marker's earlier work to ordinary Parisians, who recount their hopes, opinions, experiences, and dreams at this moment of historical transition. In contrast to Rouch and Morin's Chronique d'un été, which used the camera as a catalyst to bring Parisians together, the interviewees of Le Joli Mai remain isolated in their own worlds and value systems. This may lead the film to a melancholy conclusion, but it does allow Le Joli Mai to preserve the texture of individual experiences while effectively mapping how they help to create and reinforce the social, racial, and political fault lines of French society.

In 1967 Marker organised and edited the collective film Loin de Vietnam, which marked the beginning of a decade of involvement with the left political film culture that flourished after 1968. This period culminated in Le Fond de l'air est rouge (1977), an epic compilation work that tracks the changing political fortunes of the international revolutionary Left after 1967. Composed of off-cuts and outtakes from hundreds of militant films, on the principle that with hindsight these abandoned fragments might possess greater historical significance than the finished works from which they were originally excluded, Le Fond attempts nothing less than to give cinematic form to the chaotic and contradictory movement of world history during this tumultuous decade. Marker harnesses the affective, aesthetic principles of montage to convey the rapid momentum of revolutionary uprising, shifting patterns of allegiance, gathering forces of reaction and repression, and developments that went unremarked at the time, but in retrospect assume decisive historical importance. That Marker's choices and interpretations have been hotly contested by participants in this history, and that Marker himself has 're-actualized' the film on several occasions (1988, 1993, 1997, and 1998), to take account of subsequent developments, only extend the film's relevance as an exemplary work of documentary historiography.

Sans Soleil (1982), widely regarded as Marker's masterpiece, returns to the personal register and the compulsive globetrotting of his earlier film-essays, but filtered now through the political experience of the intervening decades. Touching down in Japan, Africa, Iceland, the United States, and Île-de-France, and narrated as a series of letters sent by a fictional cameraman to an anonymous woman who reads and comments on them, Sans Soleil eloquently distills Marker's trademark concerns and fascinations into two major themes that would set the tone for much of his subsequent output: the function of memory and the potential of new media technologies for reworking images of the past in a critical and original way. Sans Soleil ponders the function of remembering on both a personal and a collective level, recognising that individuals and societies have memories only because they cast much of the past into oblivion. The film includes sequences where film footage is processed by an image synthesiser, transformed into shifting fields of vivid pixellated colour, which makes the images bear physical signs that approximate the deforming mental processes of memory and historical representation.

Marker's enthusiastic willingness to embrace new media as vehicles for lucid and responsible documentary enquiry offers a salutary alternative to the sense of crisis in documentary representation brought about by the digital revolution. His most recent feature film, Level Five (1996), explores the historical oblivion of the catastrophic Battle of Okinawa, by reimagining the battle as an unfinished computer game that carries the moral prerogative of refusing to allow a human protagonist, Laura, to rewrite history. It offers an audacious vision of cyberspace and the Internet as the memory banks of the human race, balancing the allure and advantages of instant access with a sobering, necessary reminder that limits still remain to our capacity for fully understanding and representing the historical past.

CATHERINE LUPTON

See also: Cuba Sí!; Joli Mai, Le; Sans Soleil

Biography

Born 1921, Neuilly-sur-Seine, France. Animator for the organisation Travail et Culture 1946–9. From 1947 wrote poetry, articles, and reviews for Esprit and other journals. Published a novel, Le Cœur net (1949) and a critical study of the playwright Giraudoux, Giraudoux par lui-même (1952). Editor at Editions du Seuil, Paris 1954–57. Published the photo-text book Coréennes (1959). Significant works other than documentaries include La Jetée (1962), Si j'avais quatre dromedaires/If I Had Four Camels (1966), the multimedia installations Zapping Zone (1990) and Silent Movie (1995), and the CD-ROM Immemory (1997). Lives in Paris.

Selected films

- 1950–3 Les Statues meurent aussi/Statues Also Die (with Alain Resnais)
 1956 Dimanche à Peking/A Sunday in Peking
 1958 Lettre de Sibérie/Letter from Siberia
 1960 Description d'un combat/Description of a Struggle
 1961 Cuba Sí!
 1962 Le Joli Mai/The Lovely May
 1965 Le Mystère Koumiko/The Koumiko Mystery
 1967 Loin de Vietnam/Far from Vietnam: organiser, editor
 1968 La Sixième face du Pentagone/The Sixth Face of the Pentagon (with François Reichenbach)
 1968 A bientôt j'espère/Hope To See You Soon (with Mario Marret)
 1970 La Bataille des dix millions/The Battle of the Ten Million
 1971 Le Train en marche/The Train Rolls On

- 1974 La Solitude du chanteur de fond/The Loneliness of the Long-Distance Singer
 1977 Le Fond de l'air est rouge/A Grin Without a Cat
 1982 Sans Soleil/Sunless
 1985 A.K.
 1989 L'Héritage de la chouette/The Owl's Legacy (thirteen-part television series)
 1993 Le Tombeau d'Alexandre/The Last Bolshevik
 1993 Le 20 Heures dans les camps/Prime Time in the Camps
 1995 Casque bleu/Blue Helmet
 1996 Level Five
 2000 Un Journée d'Andrei Arsenevich/One Day in the Life of Andrey Arsenevich

Further reading

- Kämper, Birgit and Tode, Thomas, Chris Marker: Filmessayist, Munich: CICIM 45/46/47, September 1997.
 Gauthier, Guy, Chris Marker, écrivain multimédia, Paris: L'Harmattan, 2001.
 Kear, Jon, Sans Soleil, Trowbridge: Flicks Books, 1999.
 n.a., 'Chris Marker', Images Documentaires 15, 1993.
 n.a., Chris Marker, catalogue of the XXXII Pesaro Film Festival, ed. Bernard Eisenschitz, Rome: Dino Audino Editore, 1996.
 n.a., 'Dossier Chris Marker', Positif 433, March 1997: 76–104.
 Predal, Rene, 'Un cinema direct à la première personne: Chris Marker', CinémaAction 76, 1995: 18–24.
 Rafferty, Terence, 'Chris Marker', in The Thing Happens, New York: Grove Press, 1993.
 Van Wert, William F., 'Chris Marker: the SLON Films', Film Quarterly 32, no. 3, 1979: 38–46.

Marshall, John

John Marshall's career trajectory as a filmmaker anticipated and paralleled major shifts in documentary film, ethnography, and anthropology in the second half of the twentieth century. Soon abandoning his early mythic narrative style, Marshall embraced the observational possibilities of direct cinema, recording social interactions in Africa and the United States. His short 'event films' were followed by a reflexive turn in which the interventions of filming were made explicit. Then Marshall concentrated on what David MacDougall has labeled 'participatory cinema': collaborative productions driven by the economic and political needs of subjects.

John Marshall was only seventeen when his father took him to Africa, gave him a 16mm camera, and assigned him a task that shaped his life. In 1950 Laurence Marshall had resigned as president of Raytheon, which he had cofounded. Trained as a civil engineer, the elder Marshall believed that objective methods were possible in any field. He urged his son to make 'a record, not a movie' of the Ju/'hoansi (Marshall 1993). While Laurence Marshall financed and led seven trips of family members and various scientists to Southwest Africa over three decades, John developed his fluency in Ju/'hoansi and his abilities as a cinematographer, shooting massive amounts of color film. Co-edited with Robert Gardner, Marshall's first film, The Hunters (1957), was immediately embraced by anthropologists and remains an ethnographic classic. Often compared to the work of Robert Flaherty by admirers and detractors alike, The Hunters tells a thrilling story of a giraffe hunt, with footage assembled from various hunting occasions. Later Marshall would dismiss The Hunters as a 'romantic film by an American kid [that] revealed more about [the director] than about Ju/'hoansi' (Marshall 1993; see Gonzales 1993, who offers a counterargument).

Despite the success of The Hunters, Marshall shifted his filming style. Now having access to a synchronous sound system developed in 1955 by Danny Blitz, Marshall concentrated on long takes, without directorial or editorial intervention. Far removed from similar experiments in Europe and North America, Marshall was inventing direct cinema on his own as he filmed interactions played out in real time to document the nuances of spontaneous social life. A Joking Relationship (1962) follows the contours of a playful exchange between a young married Ju/'hoansi girl and her great-uncle. Marshall edited his first sync-sound footage into Bitter Melons (1971), another revelatory exploration of the negotiation of social rules. According to Marshall, his filmmaking has been shaped by the intensely interactive and egalitarian Ju/'hoansi people, whose transactions are characterized by intimacy. His Ju/'honasani mentor and namesake taught him how to use social space and to value specificity and truth-telling (Marshall 1993).

Forced to leave Southwest Africa in 1958 (and prevented from returning for twenty years), Marshall returned to the United States, where he studied anthropology and formed associations with Richard Leacock and D.A. Pennebaker, pioneers in the then-nascent direct cinema movement. Marshall joined another emerging central figure in documentary, Frederick Wiseman, to make a film at a prison hospital for the criminally insane. The result of this collaboration, Titicut Follies (1967), is an unforgettable record of institutional neglect and mistreatment, characterized by intense camera work by Marshall, whose self-described, career-long determination 'to get close to people' pulls the viewer into the horrors of the Massachusetts prison.

To make ethnographic film materials available, Marshall founded Documentary Educational Resources (DER), which soon became a major distributor with an unrivaled international collection. Continuing his concerns with pedagogy and direct cinema experimentation, Marshall filmed the activities of the Pittsburgh police, then cut the footage into short, 'thick event' films, further developing a theory of shooting and construction dictated by the actions of the participants and shaped by real time and space (Marshall and de Brigard 1995). The police films are striking in the intimacy and fluidity of Marshall's cinematography as he attempted to film as if a participant, rather than an observer. Use of these sequence-based films—often of interventions in family disputes—by the police deepened Marshall's belief in the utility of documentary to understand social interactions.

In 1978 Marshall returned to Africa and filmed N!ai, the Story of a !Kung Woman (1980). The ahistorical limitations of direct cinema required moving to another form to construct the autoethnographic N!ai, in which N!ai recalls her own life and also tells the wrenching story of her people over three decades. Structured around N!ai's direct address interviews and archival footage from the 1950s, N!ai was broadcast in the American public television series Odyssey and positioned Marshall's work in a popular venue. The film anticipates a major turn in contemporary documentary with N!ai's recognition of Marshall's camera and her reflections on the consequences of filming on her life.

In the 1980s Marshall intensified his advocacy work in Africa and co-created a development foundation. With colleague Claire Ritchie he produced short films shown to the press, funding agencies and groups whose knowledge and opinions could influence policy and help Ju/'hoansi establish farms and water resources. Marshall successfully lobbied to include local governments and cooperative land ownership in the 1989 Namibian Constitution. To Hold Our Ground (1991) reached a nationwide audience when broadcast on Namibian television during a debate on communal lands policy. Because of his deep and obvious commitment to the Ju/'hoansi, Marshall was relatively insulated from criticism directed against many First World image-makers whose depictions of 'the Other' were questioned, as a crisis of representation enveloped visual anthropology in the 1980s and 1990s.

A five-part series (2002) summarizes and concludes Marshall's record of the Ju/'hoansi over decades. A Kalahari Family begins with first contact between the Marshalls and the Ju/'hoansi in the 1950s, documents the move to communal farming and local governments, tracks the search for dispossessed relatives, and finally argues that representations of Ju/'hoansi as hunter-gatherers hinder their ability to adapt to the exigencies of a mixed economy. The series incorporates material from the Ju/'hoan Bushmen archive, which contains nearly two million feet of 16mm film and forty hours of videotape, a collection unequaled by any other body of ethnographic footage. Also unequaled have been John Marshall's commitment to the Ju/'hoansi and his place within documentary as he merged the goals of ethnographic filmmaking and development anthropology for half a century.

CAROLYN ANDERSON

See also: Hunters, The; Titicut Follies

Biography

Born in Boston, Massachusetts, November 12, 1932. Joined family expeditions to Southwest Africa 1950–8. Graduated from Harvard University, BA and MA, Anthropology. Photographed and directed The Hunters, released 1958. Associate director, Film Study Center, Harvard University 1958–60. Directed the Bushman Film Unit, Harvard University 1960–3. News photographer, National Broadcasting Company (US), Cyprus and Athens 1964–5. Photographed and codirected Titicut

Follies with Frederick Wiseman 1967. Photographed and directed eighteen short films, Pittsburgh Police Series 1968–70. Founded and directed Documentary Educational Resources 1968. Advisory Committee Member, Cultural Survival, Inc., Cambridge, MA 1975–90. Directed Ju/'hoan (!Kung) Demographic Project, Namibia 1980–2. Cofounded and codirected Ju/'hoan Bushman Development Foundation, Namibia 1982. Awarded Rockefeller Foundation Fellowship 1989. Presented Honorary PhD of Fine Arts, Rhode Island School of Design 1995.

Selected films

- 1957 The Hunters: director, photographer, editor (with Robert Gardner)
- 1962 A Joking Relationship: director, photographer, editor
- 1967 Titicut Follies (with Frederick Wiseman): photographer, codirector
- 1969 An Argument about a Marriage: director, photographer
- 1970 Inside/Outside Station 9: director, photographer, producer (with Lemberg Center for the Study of Violence, DER)
- 1971 Three Domestics: director, photographer, producer (with Lemberg Center for the Study of Violence, DER)
- 1971 Bitter Melons: director, photographer
- 1973 Men Bathing: director, photographer
- 1978 If It Fits: director, photographer
- 1980 N!ai, the Story of a !Kung Woman: director, photographer (with Ross McElwee and Mark Erder), editor (with Adrienne Miesmer), producer (with Sue Marshall Cabezas and Michael Ambrosino)
- 1985 Pull Ourselves Up or Die Out: director, photographer (with Cliff Bestall)
- 1990 To Hold Our Ground: director, photographer, editor (with John Terry)
- 2002 A Kalahari Family (five-part series: A Far Country, End of the Road, The Real Water, Standing Tall, Death by Myth): producer, codirector (with Claire Ritchie), photographer (with others), coeditor

Further reading

Anderson, Carolyn and Benson, Thomas W., Documentary Dilemmas: Frederick Wiseman's Titicut Follies,

- Carbondale, IL: Southern Illinois University Press, 1991.
- 'Put Down the Camera and Pick Up the Shovel: An Interview with John Marshall', in Jay Ruby (ed.), The Cinema of John Marshall, Philadelphia, PA: Harwood, 1993.
- Barbash, Ilisa and Taylor, Lucien, Cross-Cultural Filmmaking: A Handbook for Making Documentary and Ethnographic Films and Videos, Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1997.
- Biesle, Megan, 'Reclaiming a Cultural Legacy: The Ju/'hoansi of Namibia', Aperture 119, 1990: 50–7.
- Devereaux, Leslie and Hillman, Roger (eds), Fields of Vision: Essays in Film Studies, Visual Anthropology, and Photography, Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1995.
- Gonzales, Nancie L., 'An Argument about Film', in Jay Ruby (ed.), The Cinema of John Marshall, Philadelphia, PA: Harwood, 1993.
- Heider, Karl G., Ethnographic Film, Austin, TX: University of Texas Press, 1976.
- Hocking, Paul (ed.), Principles of Visual Anthropology, second edn, Berlin and New York: Mouton de Gruyter, 1995.
- Marshall, John, 'Filming and Learning', in Jay Ruby (ed.), The Cinema of John Marshall, Philadelphia, PA: Harwood, 1993.
- Marshall, John and de Brigard, Emilie, 'Idea and Event in Urban Film', in Paul Hocking (ed.), Principles of Visual Anthropology, second edn, Berlin and New York: Mouton de Gruyter, 1995.
- Ruby, Jay, Picturing Culture: Explorations in Film & Anthropology, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2000.

Mauro, Humberto

From the arrival of sound until the late 1950s, Brazilian documentary developed basically around INCE, the National Institute of Educational Cinema. In the early 1930s Humberto Mauro was a famous movie director (having already directed six fiction feature films) and a central personality in Rio de Janeiro society. The sound crisis, however, radically changed Brazilian cinema and forced Mauro to look for different opportunities in film production. In 1936 Roquette-Pinto (a well-known Brazilian intellectual) invited Mauro to direct the newly founded INCE. In his first writings and lectures about his work at INCE Mauro mentioned the influence of the French Institute of Scientific Cinematography and the work of Jean Painlevé. Contacts also were made with the Mussolini-inspired Luce Institute in Italy and the German Educational Film Institute, a government agency within National Socialist Germany. The exchange with Grierson and the British documentary tradition seemed to be absent. Humberto Mauro was the head of the Institut for thirty years (from 1936 to 1966), making only nonfiction films during that time. As the principal filmmaker of INCE, he directed three hundred and fifty-four short and medium-length nonfiction films. During this period he also directed, outside INCE, two fiction feature films and the docudrama O Descobrimento do Brasil/The Discovery of Brazil (1937), about the arrival of the Portuguese in Brazil in 1500, one of the biggest productions of the 1930s.

His documentary production at INCE can be largely divided into two periods. The scientific film takes its part in the first period, with a strong educational tone, having nationalism as its major proposal. The influence of positivism on the presentation of different fields of knowledge, such as medicine, biology, physics, chemistry, and history, is evident. In Mauro's first years at INCE he produced short scientific films with names such as Practical Lesson in Taxidermy, Superficial Muscles of the Human Being, Struggles against Ophidianism, and Stomach Extirpation. Scientific films seem to have been emphasized until the end of the 1930s, along with an increasing emphasis on nationalistic narration in films such as Brazil's Sky (1936), Vitória Régia (1937), Nation's Day of 1937, Bandeirantes (colonial explorers, 1940), and Invocação dos Aimorés/Praise to the 'Aimorés' Indians (1942).

In the 1940s and 1950s Mauro's documentaries exhibited a culturalist emphasis. In this second period of his career in INCE, there is a stronger focus on Brazilian folklore and culture, interacting with the 'classificatory' bias. The function of documentary appears to be related to the preservation of a disappearing rural culture and its traditions. Films such as Ceramics of Marajó (1939), Musical Culture (1951), Rural Hygiene—Dry Cesspool (1954), Hard Brown Sugar (1958), Rural Wells (1958), and Ox Cart (1945 and 1974) are examples of this period. Here the rationality of scientific knowledge is confronted with the universe of rural culture as a form of retrieving it. A melancholic/nostalgic tone is more and more evident. The director, who lived in Rio until he retired, draws on his poetic sensitivity when he represents his distant rural world of Minas Gerais. In 1945 Mauro began a series of short films named Brasilianas, a highlight of his documentary career. In Brasilianas we find a condensation of Mauro's most fertile work in documentary and fiction. The concern about traditions and customs is approached in a melancholy way, and the testimony of songs takes centre place. The dryness of the forms comes up naturally, as the simplicity of the culture he depicts.

FERNÃO PESSOA RAMOS

Biography

Born in the city of Volta Grande, in Minas Gerais state, in 1887. Began his work as a filmmaker in the small city of Cataguases, Minas Gerais, where he directed his first feature-length fiction film, Na Primavera da Vida/Spring of Life, in 1926. While still in Cataguases, directed three more feature-length films that affirmed his importance to Brazilian cinema (Tesouro Perdido/The Lost Treasure, 1927, Brasa Dormida/Reposing Ember, 1928, and Sangue Mineiro/Blood of Minas, 1929). Moved to Rio de Janeiro after receiving an invitation from Adhemar Gonzaga, the most important Brazilian producer at the time. Directed Lábios Sem Beijos/Lips without Kisses, as well as his most important fiction film, Ganga Bruta/Rough Ganguê, for Gonzaga's new studio, Cinédia. During the early 1930s also made A Voz do Carnaval/The Voice of Carnival (1933), and Favela dos Meus Amores/Slum of My Loves (1935). In 1936 entered INCE (Instituto Nacional do Cinema Educativo), where he remained until 1966, specializing in documentaries, a genre in which he did some of the most important work of his career. Directed three hundred and fifty-four short and medium-length nonfiction films. O Descobrimento do Brasil/The Discovery of Brazil, a feature-length film made in 1937, was a large-scale historical production that depicted the arrival of the Portuguese in Brazil in 1500. The film was not well received at the time. Argila, a psychological drama, was directed in 1940 and met with a similarly disappointing response. Ended his fiction career with O Canto da Saudade/The Longing Corner (1950). Continued to film and to be active in the filmmaking community until his death in 1983.

Selected films

1936 Prácticade Taxidermia I e II/Practical Lesson in Taxidermy I and II

1936 Músculo Superciais do Homem/
Superficial Muscles of the Human Being

1936 Um Parafuso/A Screw

1936 Os Inconfidentes/The Independence Struggle

1936 Dia da Pátria/Patriotic Day

1936 O Céu do Brasil I e II/Brazil's Sky I and II

1937 Luta Contra o Ofidismo/Struggles against Ophidianism

1937 Circulação de Sangue na Cauda do Girino/Blood Circulation in the Tadpole Tail

1937 Vitória Regia

1937 O Descobrimento do Brasil/The Discovery of Brazil

1939 Leishmaniose Visceral Americana/
American Visceral Leishmaniasis

1939 O Puraquê/Electric Fish

1939 Um Apólogo/Machado de Assis

1939 Tipos de Cerâmica de Marajó/
Ceramics of Marajó

1940 Bandeirantes/Colonial Conqueror

1942 Lagoa Santo

1942 Carlos Gomes, o Guarani

1942 Invocação dos Aimorés/Praise to the Aimorés Indians

1942 O Despertar da Redentora/The Waking of the Slave Liberator

1942 O Dragãozinho Manso/Easy Little Dragon

1943 Índios de Mato Grosso/Indians of Mato Grosso

1945 Carro de Bois 1/Ox Cart 1

1945–56 Brasilianas, including: 1945 *Canções
Populares: Chuá, Chuá e Casinha
Pequenina/Popular Songs: Chuá, Chuá and Small House*; 1948 *Can-ções Populares: Azulão e Pinhal/
Popular Songs: Bird and Tree*; 1954
Aboios e Cantigas/Cattle Chants and Songs; 1955 *Engenhos e Usinas/
Engines and Mills*; 1955 *Cantos de
Trabalho/Working Songs I*; 1956
*Manhã na Roça—Carro de Bois/
Morning on the Farm—Ox Cart*;
1958 Cantos de Trabalho 2/Working Songs II

1950 Alberto Nepomuceno

1954–6 Série Educação e Higiene Rural/Education and Rural Hygiene Series:
1954 Fossa Seca/Dry Cesspool; 1954
A Captação da Água/Water Intake;

- 1955 Higiene Doméstica/Domestic Hygiene; 1955 Silo Trincheira/Trench Silo; 1955 Preparo e Conservação de Alimentos/Food Preparation and Conservation; 1956 Construções Rurais/Rural Buildings
- 1956 Meus Oito Anos/When I was Eight
- 1956–9 Historical Cities of Minas Gerais Series: 1956 Sabará—Museu do Ouro/Sabará—Gold Museum; 1957 Cidade de Belo Horizonte/City of Belo Horizonte; 1957 Congonhas do Campo—Capelas dos Passos, Profetas e Basílica do Senhor Bom Jesus/Congonhas do Campo—Chapel of Steps, Prophets, and Basílica of Our Lord Jesus; 1958 Cidade de Caeté/City of Caeté; 1958 São João del Rei
- 1958 Fabricação de Rapadura/Hard Brown Sugar Fabrication
- 1958 O Café—história e penetração no Brasil/Coffee History in Brazil
- 1959 Poços Rurais/Rural Wells
- 1959 Cidade de Mariana/City of Mariana
- 1964 A Velha a Fiar/Old Woman Spinning
- 1974 Carro de Bois 2/Ox Cart 2

Further reading

- Aguiar, Claudio Almeida, O Cinema como 'Agitador de Almas'—Argila, uma cena do Estado Novo, São Paulo: Annablume/FAPESP, 1999.
- Cesar, Ana Cristina, Literatura não é documento, Rio de Janeiro: MEC/FUNARTE, 1980.
- Gomes, Paulo Emílio Salles, Humberto Mauro, Cata-guases, Cinearte, São Paulo: Perspectiva, 1974.
- Perdigão, Paulo, Trajé-tória de Humberto Mauro, Filme Cultura 3, January/February 1967: 4–23.
- Ramos, Fernão Pessoa, 'Mauro, Documentarista (Humberto Mauro)', in Paulo Antonio Paranagua (ed.), Cine documental en América Latina, Madrid: Cátedra, 2003.
- Roquete-Pinto, E., Ensaíos Brasileños, São Paulo: Companhia Editora Nacional, n.d.
- Schwarzman, Sheila, Humberto Mauro e as imagens do Brasil, São Paulo: Ed. Unesp, 2004.
- Souza, Carlos Roberto, 'Humberto Mauro', in Paulo Antonio Paranagua (ed.), Le Cinema Brésilien, Paris: Centre Georges Pompidou, 1987.
- Catálogo de Filmes Produzido pelo INCE*, Rio de Janeiro: Fundação do Cinema Brasileiro/MINC, 1990.
- Souza, Jose Inacio de Melo, O Estado Contra os Meios de Comunicação (1889–1945), São Paulo: Annablume, 2003.
- Viany, Alex (ed.), Humberto Mauro, sua vida, sua trajetória no cinema, Rio de Janeiro: Artenova/Embrafilme, 1977.

Maysles, Albert

No documentary cinematographer has had a more long-lasting, influential career than Albert Maysles, a pioneer of direct cinema who has shot scores of documentaries, many of them American documentary classics.

After studying psychology, Maysles plunged into documentary filmmaking on a trip to the Soviet Union, during which he photographed patients at mental hospitals. Psychiatry in Russia (1955) is prescient of all his later work in its compassionate fascination with human behavior. While hitchhiking across the United States and traveling by motorcycle from Munich to Moscow, Maysles and his younger brother David developed their curiosity about life stories and forged a close artistic partnership.

Their first joint production, Youth in Poland, was broadcast on NBC in the United States in 1957 and opened the way for the brothers to join a group of young, innovative journalists who were making experimental documentaries in the Living Camera series for Time, Inc., under the leadership of Robert Drew. Using lightweight, mobile cameras, portable recorders, directional microphones, and high-speed film, Drew and his colleagues pioneered a North American version of cinéma vérité: direct cinema. This style reflected a 1960s urge to explore the real world through media, eschewing voice-over narration, interviews, and staged action, instead forming an allegiance with the possibilities and demands of an essentially observational documentary style.

Albert Maysles, along with two other exceptional cameramen, Richard Leacock and D.A. Pennebaker, photographed Primary (1960), which defined a burgeoning film movement and documented an important political moment in American history as John Kennedy moved toward the presidency. It was Maysles who filmed (arguably) the best-known and -remembered single shot of early American direct cinema: the one minute twenty second wide-angle follow shot of Kennedy entering a Milwaukee political rally, moving through a crowd of outstretched hands to the hall stage in Primary. It was Maysles who put a human face on the Cuban revolution in the Drew production Yanki No! (1960) (O'Connell 1992).

When Drew Associates officially formed the Maysles brothers declined to join; instead, they formed their own production company, Maysles Film, Inc. in 1962. The brothers operated as a filmmaking team, with consistent work tasks. David recorded sound and supervised the editing, while Al was the cameraman and the technician behind camera innovations (Reynolds 1979). They shared business responsibilities and routinely financed their more personal projects by producing corporate promotional films and reality-based commercials. In contrast to the issue-oriented Drew films or Frederick Wiseman's documentary series on social institutions, Maysles's documentaries track the vagrancies of personal interactions. Colleague Ellen Hovde describes a continuing goal of the Maysles brothers: 'pushing in film terms toward a novel of sensibility more than a novel of plot' (Hovde 1980). Their documentaries have often focused on the experiences of celebrated individuals—movie producer Joseph E. Levine; rock musicians, the Beatles and the Rolling Stones; classical musicians, Leonard Bernstein, Vladimir Horowitz, Jessye Norman, and Seiji Ozawa; actor Marlon Brando; writer Truman Capote; conceptual artist Christo; boxers, Muhammed Ali and Larry Holmes; and, consequently, on an American infatuation with fame. Three of their most esteemed films, Salesman (1968), The Burk Family of Georgia (1976), and Grey Gardens (1976), however, move from the spotlights to the dark corners of American lives. In Salesman the Maysles brothers returned to the Irish Boston of their boyhood and to memories of working their ways through college as door-to-door salesmen themselves, when they followed four Bible salesmen on their rounds. The result, later included in the (US) National Film Registry, was one of the first direct cinema films screened theatrically. Salesman remains a classic observation of the centrality of selling—and religion—in American life. The Burk Family, set in rural poverty, was part of a six-part television series on the American family. Without shying from documenting the harsh realities of the Burkes's lives, the Maysles documentary presents the family with a respect and warmth absent in typical profiles of poor Southerners. Grey Gardens examines an intensely competitive relationship between Edith Bouvier Beale and her middle-aged daughter, Edie, two witty eccentrics secluded in their disintegrating estate. The frank intimacy of Grey Gardens struck an emotional chord with audiences. Some found its level of self-disclosure discomfiting; more commonly the documentary was considered important, revelatory nonfiction. Grey Gardens stands as one of the most complex examinations of obsessive family relations on film.

After David's unexpected death in 1987, Al Maysles continued and intensified his collaboration with a group of skilled documentary editors and coproducers, including Charlotte Zwerin, Ellen Hovde, Muffie Meyer, and Susan Froemke. Despite the rhetoric of 'uncontrolled cinema', cinéma vérité has always depended on subtle, intricate editing (Hall 1991; Benson and Anderson 2002). Indeed, 'the camera work and editing are directing in cinema verité' (Hovde 1980) and the strength of the Maysles' work partially flows from the imaginative cutting of the films by their colleagues. In the 1990s Maysles shot documentaries for cable television on topics ranging from abortion, care for the terminally ill, and the economic legacies of slavery to a series of profiles of film directors; however, each film is characterized by its frank, but deeply sympathetic, attention to individual experience. Along with other direct cinema practitioners, Maysles has encountered criticisms commonly lodged against observational documentaries: voyeurism, and a failure to meet a supposed promise of objectivity. To Maysles, mutual respect and solid relationships with documentary subjects are the central means of avoiding voyeurism. One of his documentary 'commandments' is 'to distance yourself from a point of view', while simultaneously recognizing that one will always have a frame of reference toward a subject (Maysles 2002). The veteran cinematographer considers personal integrity the necessary foundation for credible documentary production and urges documentarians to try to understand their subjects.

Although never active contributors to documentary theory, the Maysles brothers, through their best work, anticipated and influenced two important contemporary documentary trends: a recognition of power dimensions within family life (Grey Gardens) and a reflexive acknowledgment of the filmmaking process within the documentary text (Gimme Shelter). After filming for nearly half a century, Al Maysles retains his fascination with the complexity and ambiguity of human personality, his willingness to embrace new (most recently digital) technology, and his belief in the possibilities of direct cinema for documenting the intricacies of personal experience.

See also: Drew, Robert; Gimme Shelter; Leacock, Richard; Pennebaker, D.A.; Primary; Salesman; Wiseman, Frederick

Biography

Born in Boston, Massachusetts, November 26, 1926. Graduated from Syracuse University (BA) and Boston University (MA) in Psychology. Served in the Tank Corps during World War II. Taught Psychology briefly; began filmmaking in 1955. Worked as a cinematographer on Primary (1960) and Yanki No! (1960). With brother David, formed Maysles Films, Inc. in 1962. Made a Guggenheim Fellow 1965. Received Academy Award nominations 1974, 2001; Emmy Awards 1985, 1991, 1992; the International Documentary Association's Career Achievement Award 1994; SMPTE John Grierson Award for Documentary 1997; the American Society of Cinematographers' President's Award 1998; the Boston Film and Video Foundation's Vision Award 1998; the Flaherty Award 1999; and the Sundance Film Festival Award for Documentary Cinematography 1991, 2001. Named one of the world's one hundred finest cinematographers by Eastman Kodak 1999.

Selected films

- 1960 Primary: (Robert Drew) photographer (with Richard Leacock, D.A. Pennebaker, and Terence Macartney-Filgate)
- 1960 Yanki No!: (Robert Drew) photographer (with Richard Leacock)
- 1963 Showman: photographer, coproducer and codirector (with David Maysles)
- 1968 Salesman: photographer, codirector (with David Maysles and Charlotte Zwerin)
- 1970 Gimme Shelter: photographer, codirector (with David Maysles and Charlotte Zwerin)
- 1974 Christo's Valley Curtain: photographer, coproducer (with David Maysles)
- 1976 Grey Gardens: photographer, coproducer (with David Maysles and Susan Froemke), codirector (with David Maysles, Ellen Hovde and Muffie Meyer)
- 1976 The Burk Family of Georgia: photographer, codirector (with David Maysles)
- 1980 Muhammed and Larry: photographer, coproducer (with David Maysles)

- 1990 Christo in Paris: photographer, codirector (with David Maysles, Susan Froemke, and Deborah Dickson)
- 1992 Abortion: Desperate Choices: photographer, codirector (with Susan Froemke and Deborah Dickson)
- 1996 Letting Go: A Hospice Journey: photographer, codirector (with Susan Froemke and Deborah Dickson)
- 2001 LaLee's Kin: The Legacy of Cotton: photographer, codirector (with Susan Froemke and Deborah Dickson)
- 2001 With the Filmmakers: Portraits by Albert Maysles: photographer, codirector (with Antonio Ferrera and Larry Kamerman) (four-part series with Martin Scorsese, Robert Duvall, Jane Campion, and Wes Anderson)

Further reading

- Anderson, Carolyn, 'David Carl Maysles', in American National Biography, volume 14, Cary, NC: Oxford University Press, 1999.
- Benson, Thomas W. and Anderson, Carolyn, Reality Fictions: The Films of Frederick Wiseman, second edn, Carbondale, IL: Southern Illinois University Press, 2002.
- Davidson, David, 'Direct Cinema and Modernism: The Long Journey to Grey Gardens', Journal of the University Film Association 33, no. 1, winter 1981: 3–13.
- Hall, Jeanne, 'Realism as a Style in Cinema Verite: A Critical Analysis of Primary', Cinema Journal 30, no. 4, 1991: 24–50.
- Hovde, Ellen, 'Grey Gardens', in Alan Rosenthal (ed.), The Documentary Conscience: A Casebook in Film Making, Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1980.
- Levin, G. Roy, 'Albert and David Maysles', in Documentary Explorations: 15 Interviews with Film-Makers, Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1971.
- Mamber, Stephen, Cinema Verite in America: Studies in Uncontrolled Documentary, Cambridge, MA: MIT Press, 1974.
- Maysles, Albert, 'Digital Verite: Albert Maysles on DV Filmmaking', RES (Resolution Independent) 5, no. 3, 2002: 30.
- O'Connell, P.J., Robert Drew and the Development of Cinema Verite in America, Carbondale, IL: Southern Illinois University Press, 1992.
- Pryluck, Calvin, 'Seeking to Take the Longest Journey: A Conversation with Albert Maysles', Journal of the University Film Association 28, spring 1976: 9–16.
- Reynolds, Charles, 'Focus on Al Maysles', in Lewis Jacobs (ed.), The Documentary Tradition, second edn, New York: W.W. Norton, 1979.

Rosenthal, Alan, 'Salesman: Interviews with Albert Maysles and Charlotte Zwerin', in The New Documentary in Action: A Casebook in Film Making, Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1971.

Winston, Brian, Claiming the Real: The Documentary Film Revisited, London: British Film Institute, 1995.

Meat

(US, Wiseman, 1976)

Frederick Wiseman's Meat shows the entire process of meat-packing—what Ken Monfort, the owner of Monfort Meat Packing in Greeley, Colorado, where the film was shot, calls 'animal fabrication'—from the animals grazing in apparent freedom to the shipping to market of meat products. Wrapped in plastic, stamped by government inspection, and sealed in boxes, the final product bears little resemblance to the animals at the beginning. Power saws slice easily through the carcasses in seconds, flaying is done by giant machines that effortlessly peel away the animals' skin, and hooves are clipped off by powerful, ominous-looking scissor machines. Every part of the animals, from hide to intestines, is accounted for in the process, which is nothing if not efficient.

Meat is one of Wiseman's bleakest, most pessimistic views of American institutional life. As Wiseman documents the process, the animals unknowingly move from the fields and feedlots increasingly closer to the computerized packing plant, which looms on the horizon like an Orwellian ministry. Near the beginning of Meat we see several extreme long shots of cattle from high angles, visually reducing the animals to such an extent that they look like mere specks in the image, a graphic suggestion of their helplessness. Sure enough, at the entrance to the plant waits the inevitable butcher with a cattle prod and stun gun. The animals' movement toward their fate is consistently regulated and constrained by fences, gates, aisles, highway lanes, and entrance ways, and a variety of pens, corrals, cages, and boxes. Ultimately the animals themselves are transformed into boxed objects, consumer goods to be shipped across America.

Everywhere in Meat, life is quantified, a matter of weight and cost. Statistics and dollar figures make up the content of most of the dialogue in the film, including the auctioneer's patter, the exchange between the feed-truck drivers and the computer operators, the tour of the plant given to the Japanese businessmen, and the salesmen's telephone chatter. Even the weather is quantified as the feedlot supervisor reports to Monfort the relevant data on the climate at the two feedlots.

The work of animal fabrication, like the animals themselves, has been sliced into little pieces, each worker repeatedly performing the same one task on the disassembly line. The minimal camera movement in the film is primarily functional, serving to contain the flow of animals through pens and on ramps or to keep within the frame the various tasks performed by the workers. Most shots are stationary, and they accumulate with a rhythmic regularity that reflects the stultifying, repetitious tasks of the workers. The film's style thus matches perfectly the alienated, desensitized world shown inside the Monfort Plant.

Unlike most of Wiseman's films, Meat tends to avoid long takes and to rely instead on editing within sequences. Several lengthy sequences in the film are built out of numerous brief shots. These sequences have little or no dialogue, the soundtrack is dense only with the ambient sounds of machines at work. The 'beefkill' sequence, depicting the cattle being unloaded, killed, disemboweled, inspected, and placed in cold storage, contains no dialogue at all (the workers shout and make noise, but use no words), and is composed of ninety-two shots taking twenty minutes of screen time.

The film compares the alienated labor of the plant workers with the animals in several ways. In the cafeteria, for example, the workers, looking bored and alienated, eat in rows, arranged on either side of the long tables like the sides of beef in cold storage. Their faces, as they stare into the distance, doze, and glance at their watches, seem as expressionless as those of the dead animals. The workers also are shown punching out their time cards, their time slotted and calculated by company management, analogous to the treatment of the animals. In the meeting of union representatives, a worker named Bill voices his fear that the company is 'gonna start chopping our heads'.

Meat's structure brilliantly conveys this sense of alienated labor. The film is divided into two parts, each showing the slaughtering and packing process from beginning to end. The first part, which lasts about an hour, or roughly half the film, shows the process applied to cattle. As it nears completion, one cannot help but wonder what else the film can show. The answer, as many viewers are probably dismayed to discover, is that it chronicles the process once again, from the beginning. However, the second time around, the process, this time involving the smaller sheep, seems not only repetitious but decidedly anticlimactic. While the cowhides must be removed by big machines, the sheepskins are peeled away merely by a firm tug of the hand; and while the jaws of the cattle must be pried open by placing them in special metal receptacles, the sheep skulls are unceremoniously squashed like nutshells by giant stamping machines. If Primate (1974) is structured by a sense of mounting horror, as the animal experiments seem to become increasingly grotesque and violent, Meat works oppositely, draining what it shows of drama, just as the animals themselves are drained of blood. In short, Wiseman strategically places the slaughter of the smaller animal second, to make it seem even less 'interesting'. For some viewers the film quickly induces disinterest, even boredom. Indeed, how very quickly the film moves from the potential frisson of the abattoir to the dull banality of routine. See how quickly and easily, the film 'prods' us to realize, we too may be processed.

At the end of Meat, the meatpacking plant is suddenly thrust into a moral perspective when Monfort is asked by a local news reporter about his and the consumer's (that is, the viewer's) moral responsibility. The mounds of ground beef Wiseman shows after Ken Monfort's discussion of morality in meat packing inevitably speak to the ethics of conspicuous consumption that characterize the American way of life.

BARRY KEITH GRANT

See also: Wiseman, Frederick

Meat (US, 1976, 113 mins). Distributed by Zipporah Films. Produced, edited, and directed by Frederick Wiseman. Cinematography by William Brayne. Sound recorded by Frederick Wiseman.

Further reading

Atkins, Thomas R. (ed.), Frederick Wiseman, New York: Monarch Press, 1976.
Benson, Thomas W. and Anderson, Caroline, Reality Fictions: The Films of Frederick Wiseman, Carbondale, IL: Southern Illinois University Press, 1989.

Grant, Barry Keith, Voyages of Discovery: The Cinema of Frederick Wiseman, Urbana, IL and Chicago: University of Illinois Press, 1992.

Mamber, Stephen, Cinema Verite in America: Studies in Uncontrolled Documentary, Cambridge, MA: MIT Press, 1974.

Nichols, Bill, Ideology and the Image, Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press, 1981.

Mechanics of the Brain, The

(Russia, Pudovkin, 1925–6)

Vsevolod Pudovkin directed The Mechanics of the Brain: The Behavior of Animals and Man/Mekhanika golovnogo mozga: Povedenie zhivotnykh i cheloveka for the studio Mezhrabpom-Rus. It was Pudovkin's first film as a director and followed his final apprentice work for Lev Kuleshov on The Death Ray (1925), where he served as actor, screenwriter, and designer. The assignment is only a seemingly incongruous beginning for the director of such accomplished narrative feature films as Mother (1926), The End of St Petersburg (1927), and Storm over Asia (1928). Pudovkin, who had been trained in the natural sciences, embraced the assignment to make a popularization of Ivan Pavlov's theories of conditioned reflexes. Pavlov's theories about the mechanical quality of learning fit in well with the Bolshevik doctrine of education as a mechanical, perfectible, and egalitarian process (although Pavlov would later change his view that everything came down to training). Pudovkin's stated aim for the film was to reveal that the conditioned reflex lay at the basis of the soul.

Mechanics, which has been largely neglected in studies of Pudovkin's career, typifies the Soviet enthusiasm for experimentation, and it differs significantly from Pudovkin's later hagiographies of military leaders and scientists that were carried out during Stalinism's preference for monumental biographies. In Mechanics, instead of focusing on details of Pavlov's life, Pudovkin explains Pavlov's scientific work in a reflexive manner, transposing his theories of conditioned reflexes into the realm of film form. The film's remarkably frequent use of the iris and circular mask is the most salient example of this reflexivity. These devices were a prominent stylistic feature of the popular science film in the 1910s, emblemizing the genre's tendency to isolate significant details, usually by magnification. Pudovkin uses these devices in an attempt to approximate Pavlovian methods of training the spectator's attention, the circular framing simultaneously cuing the spectator's attention and calling attention to the film's strategies of manipulation. As Pudovkin wrote in a press release for the film, 'It depends on the director whether the spectator becomes a good or bad observer'. The contemporary nonfictional form on which these experimental strategies are overlaid is that of the Kulturfilm as it was developed in Germany (and, as Jay Leyda has noted, Mechanics bears comparison to Secrets of a Soul (G.W. Pabst, 1925–6), which also was conceived of as an instructional film). Mechanics was one of the few Soviet Kulturfilms to make a profit.

The original and longest version of Mechanics was approximately an hour long, probably corresponding to six reels. The opening sequence consists of numerous shots of animals being fed at the Leningrad zoo, illustrating the concept of stimulus-response. The film then shows a number of demonstrations of the effects of electricity on frog cadavers, replicating experiments that were conducted by Pavlov's predecessor Ivan Sechenov. This section contains remarkable animated sequences, the second venture of a specialized unit of Mezhrabpom-Rus. These sequences schematically depict the functioning of the nervous systems and demonstrate what happens when certain parts of the brain are removed. The next sequence contains demonstrations of experiments on the cerebral localization of sensory and motor functions that had been performed by Eduard Hitzig and Gustav Fritsch, David Ferrier and Hermann Munk. These experiments either stimulated the cerebral cortex with electricity to make certain limbs move or involved removing parts of the brain, which resulted in specific disturbances (blindness, loss of motor function). A final sequence in the animal laboratory depicts recreations of some of Pavlov's famous experiments on dogs that show the formation of conditioned reflexes—salivation that has been conditioned to respond to the sound of a bell and a motor reflex (the movement of a leg) that has been conditioned by the application of an electric shock.

The following sequences illustrate the applicability of these observations to humans. After shots of a baby being born, the film shows how the newborn quickly learns to locate and feed at its mother's breast. There follow scenes that compare the eating and grooming behavior of children from the ages of one to six. The sequence culminates with a scene where a group of children collectively solves a problem: a quoit has been hung on a nail out of their reach. One child leads the others to a solution that involves stacking chairs on top of a table to reach the desired object, demonstrating what the culminating intertitle calls 'the intentional reflex', that is, the ability to pursue a goal. The next sequences depict Pavlov's conditioned-response experiment previously performed on the dogs with a human subject, a child with a cheek fistula (which, an intertitle informs us, was the result of a previously existing condition). This sequence was filmed at a laboratory for child reflexology run by Professor Krasnogorski, a former assistant of Pavlov's. A final sequence compares a mentally retarded adult with a one-year-old child. Extant prints differ in the number of sequences they include and the order in which they are presented. The final two sequences are missing from the officially censored version of the film at Gosfilmofond and from other versions as well.

The film's cameraman, Anatoli Golovnia, who became Pudovkin's collaborator on subsequent narrative features, complained about the difficulties involved with filming 'mad men, idiots, paralytics, a woman in childbirth, newborn infants and not new-born [...] ordinary dogs and dogs without a brain, dissected frogs and undissected, frogs, monkeys, lions, bears, eagles, cows, horses, hippopotami, crocodiles'. Pudovkin and Golovnia had to resort to a number of special techniques, such as building a blind in the children's laboratory. This need to rely on a hidden camera links Mechanics not only with strategies familiar from wildlife filmmaking but also with some of Dziga Vertov's techniques for capturing candid footage in the service of his documentary project. During the filming of Mechanics Pudovkin made Chess Fever, a comedy that used footage his camera crew took under the pretenses of shooting a newsreel at the International Chess Tournament held in Moscow. Pudovkin's easy transition between these two projects as well as his subsequent move into feature narratives point toward the fluid boundaries between documentary and fiction film in this period.

Further reading

- Leyda, Jay, Kino: A History of the Russian and Soviet Film, third edn, Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1983.
- Pudovkin, Vsevolod, Film Technique and Film Acting, trans. and ed. Ivor Montagu, New York: Grove Press, 1976.
- Die Zeit in Großaufnahme: Erinnerungen/Aufsätze/Werkstattnotizen, Berlin: Henschel, 1983.
- Sargeant, Amy and Pudovkin, Vsevolod, Classic Films of the Soviet Avant-Garde, New York: I.B. Tauris, 2000.
- Sarkisova, Oksana, “‘Life as it Should Be?’: Early Non-fiction Cinema in Russia: From Kulturfilm to Documentary”, Medien & Zeit 18, no. 1, 2003: 41–61.
- Vöhringer, Margarete and Hagner, Michael, ‘Vsevolod Pudovkins Mechanik des Gehirns. Film als psychophysiologisches Experiment’, in Bildweltendes Wissens. Kunsthistorisches Jahrbuch für Bildkritik 2, no. 1, Berlin, n.d.: 82–92.

Mein Kampf(Sweden, Leiser, 1960)

Erwin Leiser’s film Mein Kampf is a compilation documentary. That is, it uses only authentic documents taken from film materials of the Russians, Americans, British, French, and the National Socialists. Among the visual documents are photos, newsreel footage, propaganda footage, and material from other documentaries. A text scrolling upward across the screen as the film opens assures viewers that ‘every scene is authentic’ and that, although the ensuing film focuses on Poland, the Nazi atrocities were not limited to that country. The text continues that twenty-five million lives had been consumed in ‘Hitler’s Hell’ by the end of the war, and dedicates the film ‘in guilt to his victims’. Finally, the text admonishes viewers that ‘we are responsible for what he did, for he was one of us and we permitted this to happen’, and against a background of drums, just before the first visuals begin, the scroll cautions viewers ‘may we be wise enough and strong enough to prevent this from ever happening again’. In spite of this promising beginning and although Leiser presents a compelling document of an historical crime, Mein Kampf remains problematic both as a film of warning about the mistakes of the past and one that helps viewers come to terms with the legacy of the Third Reich.

Erwin Leiser’s documentary on the rise and fall of the Third Reich, Mein Kampf (1960), was one of the first postwar films to ask how the tragedy of the Holocaust could happen. Unlike Alain Resnais, who in Nuit et Brouillard/Night and Fog (1955) suggests that we (the viewers) are responsible, regardless of our actual complicity, Leiser, in spite of credits telling viewers otherwise, implicates mostly politics, historical figures, history itself, but not the viewer. In that regard, he follows the lead of several German narrative features that preceded Mein Kampf by only a few years, among them Karl May’s 08/15 trilogy (1955), Frank Wisbar’s Hunde, wollt ihr ewig leben?/Dogs, Do You Want to Live Forever? (1958), and especially Kurt Hoffman’s Wir Wunderkinder/Aren’t We Wonderful? (1959). Leiser’s admonition that ‘it must never ever happen again’, which intones over a scene of crosses as the movie ends, reflects similar warnings in the three feature films. Mein Kampf seems reminiscent of Hoffmann’s comedy, in particular, the episodic scenes of which seek to explain Hitler’s rise to power, the destruction of the war, and its aftermath, and are introduced with documentary-style newsreel footage. However, if May, Wisbar, and Hoffmann spare viewers from being complicit in the crimes of the Third Reich, they nonetheless locate guilt in the general population’s cowardice, opportunism, and uncritical acceptance of the government—my country right or wrong. Leiser’s documentary, in contrast, might chastise viewers for their guilt, but his visuals spare the viewer and locate guilt for what occurred between 1933 and 1945 in mishandled treaties (Versailles), misinformed leaders (Chamberlain), and madmen (Hitler and the Nazis). Thus the admonition with which Leiser ends his film warns against an evil that lies outside our sphere of control.

In spite of its ultimate failure to serve as a useful warning against repeating history, Mein Kampf is nonetheless a powerful indictment of the Nazis and of the Western Powers for allowing the tragedy to transpire. Leiser divides his material into three major parts: 1914–33, 1933–9, and 1939–45. Each has its own tone, reflecting the period being depicted, the source of the material, and the closeness to the actual tragedy. The pre-Nazi years are the most objective in visual and aural material. The years 1918 to 1929 are narrated using well-known iconography of postwar Europe and the Weimar Republic: among these are the Russian Revolution, Lenin, Karl Liebknecht, the signing of the Versailles Treaty, the Freikorps, turmoil in the cities, and a photo montage of Hitler's childhood and early manhood, including his introduction to anti-Semitism and eventually to Germany's right-wing militarists. The material comes from newsreels, newspapers, and family photo albums and is neutral in tone. The background narration is matter-of-fact and the music also befits the visuals, militaristic during war scenes, classical at other times. The most overtly subjective element comes in a visual pun as the screen shows a newsreel of a listing, sinking German ship just before the war ends.

Leiser introduces a more urgent tone into his film to highlight the years 1929–33 as the Nazis exploit the world economic crisis and eventually come to power with the elections of 1933. Neutral visuals here give way to an election poster of the Nazi opposition that warningly asks 'who will save us from the Nazis?' The urgent tone continues as the film shows events from 1933–8, as the Germans tighten their hold on the government and the people. Leiser uses a dialectical style during this middle sequence as he juxtaposes scenes of torchlight parades of the Nazis and Hitler at an open window savoring the adulation of crowds with scenes of citizens being taken and loaded into police transports. Meanwhile, the narration also adopts a subjective tone by commenting that people are being 'dragged from homes and beaten up'. Finally, scenes of the Nazi leaders speaking to crowds and proclaiming their victory for a new Germany effect gooseflesh in the viewer. Much of the material for this section that depicts Hitler and his leaders is taken from Leni Riefenstahl's Triumph des Willens/Triumph of the Will (1935), adding to the ominous feeling that the section produces in viewers.

Any pretense to neutrality of visuals or objectivity of narration disappears as the film enters the third phase of its story. Again using newsreel footage and clips from films shot by the Nazis for propaganda purposes, as well as end-of-war documents filmed by the Allies, Leiser uses the invasion and destruction of Poland, the deportation of Polish Jews, and the uprising in the Warsaw Ghetto, to represent the misery throughout Europe. Shots of young children starving, corpses being collected from the streets and dumped into mass graves, and Polish civilians being hanged reflect events going on outside Poland: invasion and destruction of Eastern and Western Europe, attack on Stalin-grad, and deportation and killing of almost three-fourths of Europe's Jews. The soundtrack, too, adds to the desperation of the situations in this last third of the film. As scenes of the Warsaw Ghetto cross the screen, the narrator intones that Jews 'must live and die like rats'. As the corpses are being dumped into mass graves, a cantor singing Kaddish is heard on the soundtrack. Finally, as German captives march through a frozen Russian landscape, Leiser reprises a scene from Triumph des Willens, in which young Germans proudly call out where they are from, indicating that all of Germany is represented in the country's adulation of the Führer.

Figure 10 Mein Kampf (aka Den blodiga tiden) documentary, 1960 (Courtesy of the Everett Collection)

As the film closes, Leiser overwhelms viewers with the enormity of the tragedy by citing statistics of death and destruction read as the visuals show the suitcases, clothes, shoes, toys, hair, glasses, teeth, and skeletons of the Nazis' victims. In the scene that directly precedes this one, Nazi leader after Nazi leader at the Nuremberg trials pleads not guilty as charges are read, and the narrator asks, 'Did Hitler do everything himself?' The visuals cannot lie; they indict everyone, everyone involved with the Nazi government, that is. For taken as a whole, the film condemns the Nazis alone. It suggests that they were helped into power because governments and citizens looked the other way, but never expresses others' complicity beyond the mere fact that they were passive and/or too trusting. Thus the film fails as a warning against repeating the mistakes of the past, but it also fails to help viewers come to terms with the past, for there is nothing to come to terms with on a personal level. On another level, however, the film succeeds. As documentation of what occurred, the film is a chilling example of how far to destruction the insanity of ideology can lead a country. In this regard, Leiser achieved one of his stated goals, which was to reach a generation of Germans and other Western youth who were growing up ignorant of history and were thus susceptible to messages from the right, misappropriating Nazi symbols to shock their parents, and even sometimes just for fun.

ROBERT C. REIMER

See also: Leiser, Erwin; Riefenstahl, Leni; Triumph of the Will

Mein Kampf (original title: Den blodiga tiden, Sweden, Minerva Film AB, 1960, 111 mins). Distributed by Columbia Pictures and Vci Home Video. Produced by Tore Sjöberg. Directed by Erwin Leiser. Written by Erwin Leiser. Edited by Ingemar Ejve. Commentary for English-language version by Claude Stephenson. Compilation film composed of news and documentary footage.

Further reading

- Bishop, Christopher, 'Mein Kampf', review, Film Quarterly 14, no. 56, winter 1960: 56.
 Leiser, Erwin, Auf der Suche nach Wirklichkeit: Meine Filme 1960-96, Stuttgart: Europäisches Medienforum, 1996.
 Quigly, Isabel, 'Rewards of Atrocity', review, Spectator, April 14, 1961: 516-17.
 Whitebait, William, 'Eichmann and All', review, New Statesman, April 14, 1961: 600.

Memorandum

(Canada, Britain, 1965)

Memorandum, made ten years after Night and Fog (1955) and well before the spate of Holocaust documentaries and dramatic films of recent decades, is notable for its richly complex structure and its little-known status among Holocaust films.

The film follows the pilgrimage by a group of North American Jews to Bergen Belsen, the site of their internment during World War II. The documentary uses as its structural spine one member of the group, Bernard Laufer, a glazier now living in Toronto. Interwoven with Laufer's journey, which is filmed in vérité style, is an impressively varied amount of other documentary material: contemporary scenes of Germany and Poland; on-site interviews with other survivors; archival footage of the camps; and certain original scenes filmed before the trip that function as flashbacks. The film's disparate material is connected to Laufer and made into a coherent whole through inventive editing and a sweeping commentary.

Thematically the film is influenced by Hannah Arendt's characterization of the Holocaust as 'the banality of evil'. The film's title functions not only as an admonition to remember the Holocaust but also as a metaphor for the bureaucratic manner in which the Nazis implemented it. The film emphasizes the apparent ordinariness of some of the worst culprits. A montage of suited men carrying briefcases and other quotidian contemporary scenes reinforce the sense of potential evil still lurking behind everyday respectability.

The film's greatest achievement is its establishment of a link between an individual victim of the Holocaust and the almost incomprehensibly vast enormity of it. Bernard Laufer is a severely private man who projects little energy or emotion. He is on the screen for only a few minutes of the total running time, but the film's structure creates a sense that everything we are shown somehow reflects the essence of Laufer's memories and thoughts.

An element in Memorandum's complexity is its melange of film styles. The almost pure vérité style of most of the film's original footage forms an unusual match with the extensive and impersonal commentary delivered with professional polish by Alexander Scourby. This odd mixture makes the film hard to categorize stylistically and might help to account for its relative obscurity, but it also constitutes a tour de force and arguably makes Memorandum the apotheosis of director Donald Brittain's distinctive documentary editing and writing skills.

D.B. JONES

See also: Canada; Night and Fog; Shoah

Memorandum (Canada, National Film Board, 1965, 58 mins). Distributed by the National Film Board of Canada. Produced by John Kemeny. Directed by Donald Brittain. Cinematography and editing by John Spotton. Sound recorded by Roger Hart. Narration written by Donald Brittain, spoken by Alexander Scourby.

Further reading

- Blumer, Ron and Schouten, Susan, 'Donald Brittain: Green Stripe and Common Sense', Cinema Canada 15, August–September, 1974: 36–40.
- Breitrose, Henry, 'Memorandum', Film Quarterly xx, no. 2, n.d.: 57–9.
- Denby, David, 'Who's the Best Canadian Director?' New York Magazine, October 1977.
- Harper, Ray, Brittain on Brittain: Program 6: Memorandum, Ottawa: National Film Board of Canada, 1989.
- Jones, D.B., Movies and Memoranda, Ottawa: Deneau, 1982.

—The Best Butler in the Business: Tom Daly of the National Film Board of Canada, Toronto, University of Toronto Press, 1996.

Kolomeychuk, Terry (ed.), Donald Brittain: Never the Ordinary Way, Winnipeg: National Film Board of Canada, n.d.

Martin, Kent (director), Donald Brittain: Filmmaker, (film), Ottawa: National Film Board of Canada, 1992.

Memphis Belle

(US, Wyler, 1944)

The following summary of Memphis Belle is provided by Thorpe and Pronay:

A daylight bombing expedition over the Continent of Europe by American Flying Fortresses from a base in England. The film shows preparations, briefing, the flight out, the general plan of attack (by diagrams), defence against enemy fighters and flak, bombing of targets, the return home, attention to wounded, and visits to the bomber base by distinguished personages. The combat scenes were shot in action over enemy territory.

(Thorpe and Pronay 1980: 156)

William Wyler was one of three top Hollywood directors to make significant wartime documentaries of lasting value. John Ford made The Battle of Midway (1942) and December 7th (1943), and John Huston made The Battle of San Pietro (1945) and Let There Be Light (1946). ([Col.] Wyler's other documentary was Thunderbolt, 1945, about the work of P47 fighter-bombers in Italy.) All three seemed surprisingly at ease in the nonfiction mode. Memphis Belle is, in a way, an answer to the British Target for Tonight (1941). It is interesting that Wyler, whose most valued fiction features had been adaptations of literary and dramatic works, used candid color footage of a real raid (one of the cameramen was killed while filming) with voice-over narration, while documentarian Harry Watt used recreated action (some of it shot in a studio), scripted dialogue, and directed performances.

The Memphis Belle is a Boeing B17 on its twenty-fifth and final bombing mission over Germany before its veteran crew is sent home. The world we see and hear is that of the airmen—refracted images of sky and enemy fighter planes seen through Plexiglas, the drone of engines, and excited voices over the intercom. The film seems to come very close to the reality of their experience. Or, as James Agee put it in a review at the time (The Nation, April 15, 1944), ‘Everything is seen, done, and experienced as if from inside one or another of the men in the plane’. Agee goes on to say that, ‘The man in over-all charge of making this good film was William Wyler, whose talent I respected in Wuthering Heights and even in Mrs. Miniver, without caring for the pictures. Postwar planners should work out a better fate for him than going back to Hollywood.’ That did not happen, of course, but the Memphis Belle rests on the court house lawn in Memphis, Tennessee.

JACK C. ELLIS

See also: Target for Tonight

Memphis Belle (US, War Department in cooperation with the Army Air Force First Motion Picture Unit, 1944, 40 mins). Distributed by the War Activities Committee through Paramount Pictures. Directed by William Wyler. Cinematography by 8th Air Force cameramen and combat crew members.

Further reading

Thorpe, Frances and Pronay, Nicholas, British Official Films in the Second World War, Oxford: Clio Press, 1980.

Mexico

Mexican documentaries tended to be historical during the 1950s and 1960s, political during the 1960s and 1970s, and social and ethnographic during the 1970s and 1980s. In the 1970s some documentaries were taken back to the communities where they had been shot and used to facilitate discussion of the social problems affecting the communities. During the 1990s and 2000s documentaries revealed familial histories as they intersect with Mexican history and the rest of the world.

The history of documentary-making in Mexico has been strongly marked by the institutions, such as film schools or centers for documentary-making, which provided documentarians with the most opportunities to do their work. Until the late 1990s the state-educated artists and audiences funded artists’ works and sponsored exhibitions. Funding was scarce and very competitive, which limited the length and quantity of the documentaries. Documentaries were shown only on a particular exhibition circuit, consisting mostly of film clubs or other cultural institutions. With the introduction of video in the 1980s, the opportunities for making documentaries, especially for public television, grew. During the 1990s documentaries continued to be shown at film clubs or in documentary cycles at the Cinetecas, but they also began to be exhibited at commercial theaters and even won prizes typically awarded to ‘fiction’ films at festivals.

The first feature-length documentaries, compilation films about the Mexican Revolution, were made during the 1950s and 1960s. During the early 1910s, cameramen from the United States and Mexico (Jesús Abitia, Salvador Toscano, the Alva brothers) documented the Revolution by following the generals in their campaigns. Their footage was shown in Mexican cities, where spectators flooded the theaters to see the war in moving images. As the Revolution went from its military (1910s–20s) to its political phase (1920s–40s), however, newsreels became increasingly propagandistic and didactic.

In the 1950s–60s Carmen Toscano, in Memorias de un mexicano/Memories of a Mexican (1950), and Gustavo Carrero in Epopéyas de la Revolución/Epics from the Revolution (1961) compiled newsreel footage from earlier periods. Both films represent the Revolution as the foundation of modern Mexico, although they use diverse cinematic strategies. Toscano uses a fictional firsthand observer’s voice-over narration in the first person to present footage, most of which her father had shot during the Revolution. Using Jesús H. Abitia’s footage, Carrero tells a melodramatic omniscient narrator, Carrero and a simplistic story in which heroes (Madero, Carranza and Obregón) defeat villains (Porfirio Díaz and Victoriano Huerta).

Carlos Velo also used archival material (newsreels depicting bullfights) to make Torero/Bullfighter (1956), a film about the well-known Mexican bullfighter Luis Procuna. Torero neo-realistically represents Procuna’s youth in the slums using images of broken shoes, and of groups of bullfighters smoking to avoid feeling hungry, while a voice-over narration claims that Procuna began bullfighting to escape poverty. Having fled his impoverished beginnings, however, Procuna (played by the bullfighter himself) remains haunted by the fear of an audience insatiably thirsty for spectacle. As an established master of the documentary, Velo set up the Centro de Producción de Cortometraje (CPC) in the 1970s, under the sponsorship of the Secretary of Education; in 1975 he also founded Mexico's second film school, Centro de Capacitación Cinematográfica (CCC).

Indeed, film schools and state-subsidized public institutions supporting filmmaking education proliferated during the 1960s–80s. At the beginning of the period students from Mexico City's first film school, CUEC (Centro Universitario de Estudios Cinematográficos, 1963), made politically oriented documentaries. Using a direct cinema style, intertitles and voice-over narration, CUEC students shot and edited El grito/The Scream (Leobardo López, 1968). This political documentary recounts events leading up to the political turmoil of 1968 and gives testimony of the police attack that caused the massacre in Tlatelolco Square in Mexico City. Because of its testimonial images and soundtrack (some of which comes from an independent radio program run by students), El grito accurately represents the ideologies and popular cultures of the late 1960s. CUEC's critique of status quo politics continued in the 1980s to 2000 as Carlos Mendoza, a CUEC graduate and professor, created canal6dejulio/channel-6ofjuly (1989) to produce muckraking videos that uncovered government corruption and were sold at newspaper stands.

Velo had established CPC to provide film-school graduates, who were not allowed to participate in the film industry, an opportunity to make documentaries, albeit at the margins of the industry. Through CPC Eduardo Maldonado coproduced (with Canada's National Film Board) Jornaleros/Salary Workers (1976), an ethnography and a political commentary on the lives of Mexican migrant cotton workers. Jornaleros has an observational ethnographic tone that changes to a politically expository tone as the film proceeds. In the second half of the film, a suddenly introduced voice-over narration explores alternatives to migration. Jornaleros was exceptionally well received; in the first year more than one hundred and fifty thousand viewers, many of them jornaleros, watched the film. Maldonado's film is representative of the many 1970s–80s documentaries committed to social change.

Graduates of CCC and CUEC also made documentaries about social justice issues during the 1980s. CUEC graduate Mari Carmen de Lara filmed No les pedimos un viaje a la luna/We Are Not Asking for a Trip to the Moon (1986), which denounces the government for failing to aid the seamstresses who lost their jobs after the 1985 Mexico City earthquake, and shows the seamstresses organizing themselves into a cooperative. No les pedimos was watched by more than three thousand seamstresses and won important international awards. One of Maldonado's students at CCC, Dana Rotberg (joined later by Ana Díez), made Elvira Luz Cruz, pena máxima/Elvira Luz Cruz, Maximum Punishment (1986) about an illiterate indigenous woman who had been accused of murdering her four children. In Elvira, an interview with Cruz's defense lawyer shows that Cruz was condemned without a fair trial. The judge believed the account given by Cruz's husband, a policeman and major suspect.

Film school students and graduates were committed to social change and to documenting the lives of indigenous people. They also seriously engaged the questions of national heritage and identity circulating in the 1970s and 1980s. During the 1980s public television, another venue for graduates, produced two thousand half-hour programs on topics of national heritage. The unit for cultural television, UTEC (Unidad de Televisión Educativa y Cultural), sponsored by the Secretary of Education, made television documentary series on various topics, such as Mexican ethnic groups or Mexican artists. UTEC, where many of the female graduates worked, produced an innovative television documentary series on women's issues that used gender as a category to construct national identity.

Notable among the documentaries that help to construct national identity was Nicolás Echavarría's Niño Fidencio, taumaturgo de Espinazo/Fidencio, the Healer from Espinazo (1980), about pilgrims who pay homage to a deceased popular mestizo healer in northern Mexico. Stylistically innovative, Niño, produced at CPC, uses long takes and few interviews. Echavarría ingeniously allows the voices of pilgrims to narrate the healer's deeds and the songs of an ambulant singer (the saint's 'brother') to tell the saint's life-story.

CPC and the National Indigenous Institute (Instituto Nacional Indigenista, INI) produced in the 1980s anthropological documentaries that contributed to the construction of indigenous identities. At CPC Echevarría made María Sabina, mujer espíritu/María Sabina, Spiritual Woman (1978), which celebrates internationally acclaimed Mazatec healer María Sabina. Echevarría's film romanticizes the healer's connection to 'nature'. Likewise, Roberto Rochín's Ulama: El juego de la vida y la muerte/Ulama: The Game of Life and Death (1987), a thorough study of the Mayan ball game in classical and contemporary times, reinscribes myths about Mayans as gifted in the supernatural. Some such ethnographic work tended to exoticize indigenous groups; however, some filmmakers begin to defy romanticized content as well as traditional documentary-making techniques in ethnographic film.

Challenging the common distancing of indigenous history from Mexican identity, Enrique Escalona independently made the animated documentary Tlacuilo, el que escribe pintando/Tlacuilo, He Who Writes While Painting (1987). Referencing Joaquín Galarza's research, Tlacuilo reads the Mendocino codices as a sophisticated, logical, and systematic writing system, which is both an indigenous and Mexican historical cultural artifact. Thus, the Aztecs themselves are constructed as simultaneously indigenous and Mexican. Through the INI film unit, Sonia Fritz made De bandas, vidas y otros sonos/Of Bands, Lives and Other Musics (1985). Fritz's documentary follows a band of musicians from the mountains to the town where some of the musicians have already emigrated. Within the alienating town, music helps the musicians and their audiences to build a sense of trust and to maintain cultural identity. The film also includes scenes in which indigenous women refer to the presence of the camera and react to it; thus De bandas innovatively makes the traditionally invisible cinematic apparatus visible. Some documentarians later became interested in cross-cultural (mis)interpretation. In Mercedes Moncada's La pasión de María Elena/María Elena's Passion (2003), a white woman kills the son of a Raramuri Indian (María Elena) but fails to accept full responsibility for the child's death. The white woman seems unaware that her refusal to accept responsibility ostracizes María Elena from her community. Increasingly, indigenous groups took control over their representation; indeed, beginning in the 1990s, the binational (US–Mexico) group Chiapas Media Project provided video cameras and trained indigenous people from Chiapas in video-making and editing. The project has so far produced several videos.

In the 1990s many documentarians began to explore the intersections of familial and Mexican history. Marisa Sistach and José Buil's La línea paterna/The Paternal Line (1995) exhibits footage from 1925 to the 1940s shot by Buil's father, who used a Pathé Baby camera to document the history of the family. By the 1990s some filmmakers emphasized the partial, subjective narrative points of view that constitute even deeply familial history. In El abuelo Cheno/Grandfather Cheno (1995), CCC graduate Juan Carlos Rulfo, for example, begins his interviews by attempting to obtain an objective account of his grandfather's death. The campesinos, however, give different accounts, which are edited in short takes that cut across interviews. As the film proceeds, the attempt to clarify the past becomes unfeasible. Instead, the interviews, intersected with poetic images and the director's metacommentary, open up historical narrative as a vital and dynamic process. For the campesinos, remembering revivifies both stories and their tellers. El abuelo was shown at multiple festivals and won many awards.

Quite a few of the documentaries made in the 2000s voice an internationalist perspective. In Gregorio Rocha's Los rollos perdidos de Pancho Villa/Pancho Villa's Lost Reels (2003), for instance, the director appears on screen as he is searching for a film in which the famous revolutionary general acted. As Rocha walks the environs of numerous international libraries, he examines General Villa's story from an international perspective, thus simultaneously integrating Mexico into the wider world, while challenging Mexico's nationalist interpretations of itself. Giving a complex view of the Mexican hero, Los rollos shows that Villa made a deal with a US production company to restage some of his battles for a profit. Another example of a documentary expressing a global perspective is Juan Carlos Martín's Gabriel Orozco: un proyecto filmico documental/Gabriel Orozco: A Documentary Film Project (2002), produced by CCC. Using diverse media and MTV editing speed, Gabriel Orozco approaches the artist from the perspective of curators from internationally renowned museums. Orozco suggests that in the year 2000 the international community associates Mexico with Orozco's conceptualism, rather than with figurative art, as most Mexicans do. Marcela Arteaga's Recuerdos/Remembrances (2003), produced by CCC, situates Mexico within the international context of World War I, World War II, and the Spanish civil war by reconstructing the travels and exile of Lithuanian emigrant, Luis Frank. Arteaga, a CCC graduate, introduces objects to prompt emotions; an image of a chair burning on an empty beach, for example, can be connected to the nostalgia of exile and the emotional wounds caused by war.

Mexico's long tradition of documentary filmmaking began in the 1910s, grew as filmmakers trained in the film schools during the 1960s–90s, and gained extraordinary vitality by the beginning of the twenty-first century.

ISABEL ARREDONDO

Further reading

- Aviña, Rafael, México íntimo y profundo: cine documental mexicano contemporáneo, Huesca: Festival de Cine de Huesca, con la colaboración de la Filmoteca Española, 1999.
- Burton, Julianne, The Social Documentary in Latin America, Pittsburgh, PA: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1990.
- Davalos Orozco, Federico, Albores del cine mexicano, Mexico, DF: Clio, 1996.
- De Orellana, Margarita, 'The Voice of the Present over Images of the Past: Historical Narration in Memories of a Mexican', in The Social documentary in Latin America, Pittsburgh, PA: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1990: 211–13.
- García Riera, Emilio, Historia documental del cine mexicano, Guadalajara, Jalisco, Mexico: Universidad de Guadalajara, 1992.
- Muñoz, Eva Pichardo, 'El cine documental en Mexico (1963–67)', Dissertation. Universidad Nacional Autónoma de México, 1985.
- Paranagua, Paulo Antonio and Avellar, Jose Carlos, Cine documental en América Latina, Madrid: Cátedra, 2003.
- Rovirosa, Jose, Miradas a la realidad: ocho entrevistas a documentalistas mexicanos, Mexico, DF: Coordinación de Difusión Cultural, Centro Universitario de Estudios Cinematográficos, Universidad Nacional Autónoma de México, 1990.
- Miradas a la realidad: entrevistas a documentalistas mexicanos II. Vol. II, Mexico, DF: Centro Universitario de Estudios Cinematográficos, UNAM, 1992.

Meyers, Sidney

In all the films that Sidney Meyers directed, there appears, somewhere, a brief shot of a blind man (played by Meyers himself). This persistent figure honors the blind man who befriended Meyers as a young boy aged twelve or thirteen. The man was a socialist, the neighborhood radical. Meyers would help his friend negotiate the neighborhood and then in evenings he would attend meetings with him. The day after a meeting he would come to school and repeat what he had heard and call the children in his class 'comrades'. It was the beginning of his political education.

From an early age Meyers displayed a keen interest in music. At the age of twenty-one Fritz Reiner invited him to join the Cincinnati Symphony. He remained with them for several years. He subsequently played with an orchestra subsidized by the local and federal government.

In addition to politics and music, Meyers was interested in photography. By 1932 he had become involved with the Workers' Film and Photo League. The league was interested, among other things, in using the camera to document social conditions for a working-class audience, as well as providing a space where workers might learn about the making of both films and photographs. Since Meyers was still working as a musician, he could not go out with film crews on his rehearsal days, so more and more his film work concentrated on the editing table and the soundtrack.

In early 1935 his writing career began. He became a film critic and editor for New Theatre and other periodicals, choosing 'Robert Stebins' as a pseudonym to protect his other jobs. In 1936 he permanently left the orchestra for filmmaking. Through the Film and Photo League, his literary ventures, and the contacts he made through his wife's friends, Meyers became acquainted with a large number of talented people who were to become major contributors to both the American documentary movement and to theatrical film, including Leo Hurwitz, Irving Lerner, Ralph Steiner, and Ben Maddow.

By 1937 a new organization had come into existence: Frontier Films. Frontier was staffed by many people who had also worked at the Workers' Film and Photo League. The organization's task was to present the United States in a fresh way; in a way not shown by the commercial film industry. In the words of Leo Hurwitz, it was to present a vivid sense that 'When you put your hand in your pocket and you can touch your total savings, your life is revealed as not the private thing it seemed before. It becomes connected with others who share your problem' (Alexander 1981: 17).

Frontier, while still on the left in its political orientation, was independent of outside influences in that its staff raised their own funds for their own projects. Their ideal was to work cooperatively on each project. The writer, director, editor, and camera were all to collaborate at each stage of the undertaking. China Strikes Back (1937) was composed out of raw newsreel footage that detailed the life of the Eighth Route Army. The footage was smuggled out of China and was one of Frontier's early productions. The editing room is usually the place where such footage is shaped into a film. The credits for China Strikes Back, in order, read: Sidney Meyers, Ralph Lerner, Ben Maddow, and Jay Leyda.

People of the Cumberland (1937) was a combination of reenacted drama and documentary footage that details how a poverty-stricken and uneducated community struggles to become an efficient, productive society through education and the labor movement. Direction is credited to Meyers and Jay Leyda.

For the Chrysler company's exhibit at the 1939 World's Fair, Frontier made a six-minute film, The History and Romance of Transportation. It was fashioned entirely out of stock material. Participating in its making were Berman, Maddow, and Meyers. White Flood, completed in 1940, is another Frontier film that had to be made in the cutting room. The footage came principally from William Osgood Field, who had made a number of films on scientific and cultural topics. White Flood was pieced together from his own Alaskan 16mm shooting, alpine footage shot by Sherman Pratt, and from snowstorm scenes that were shot by Frontier cameras. Lionel Berman, Ben Maddow, and Meyers scripted and edited the film. The film is now remembered for its beautiful footage and original music score by Hanns Eisler.

With the approach of World War II many of the participants in Frontier drifted away. After Pearl Harbor, the British Ministry of Information gave Meyers the responsibility of preparing their films for American audiences, and eventually the Office of War Information employed his talents to plan and supervise their films.

In the postwar years much of his livelihood was derived from directing and/or editing films for the American television networks, as well as directing a series of highly regarded films for Monsanto, the Girl Scouts, and the Ford Motor Company.

The two major films for which Meyers had a significant share of responsibility, and on which much of his reputation rests, were The Quiet One, released in 1949, and The Savage Eye, released in 1960. Both were independently made, outside the Hollywood studio system. Both The Quiet One and The Savage Eye were made in the communal and collaborative manner that was the practice at Frontier Films. For The Quiet One Meyers directed and edited, and Richard Bagley provided camera work. Janice Loeb and the photographer Helen Levitt produced. When the film was nominated for an Oscar, all four names were recorded as authors of best original screenplay; when, as a result of the film, Hollywood beckoned Myers, his acceptance depended on the inclusion of the whole group. Hollywood declined. The film was in production for a year and a half. Shot in 16mm, it cost $28,000 of their pooled resources.

The Quiet One was the first major American film to use a black youth as its protagonist and one of the first nonfiction films to deal with issues of racism and black poverty in the United States. Donald Thompson is about ten years old and born and raised in Harlem. It is just one of Meyer's achievements that the audience thoroughly identifies with the boy, as we see how an oppressive slum environment robs him of his childhood. The boy has never known his father, never known the meaning of emotional security. His mother remarries when he is an infant, and he is forced to live with his grandmother, a tired, beaten woman, incapable of supplying Donald with the love of which he is starved. Desperately in need of affection and human warmth, Donald roams the streets of Harlem searching for someone to befriend. Donald is one of the lucky ones. His descent into delinquency is stopped when he is accepted into the Wiltwyk School for Disturbed Children, where through friendship and therapy he begins to understand himself and his world.

The Savage Eye began with Meyer and Maddow's notion of trying to see corrupt 1950s Los Angeles as the seventeenth-century artist William Hogarth might see it. A film was started that would be nine years and nine scripts in the making. The collaborators worked in any spare time they found and, inevitably, the ideas of the film changed. The idea of integrating Hogarth into the film was abandoned; what remained was the attempt to find modern parallels of Hogarth's vision. As for writing, direction, production, and editing, the film was signed for all these functions by Maddow, Meyers, and Joe Strick.

WALTER HESS

Biography

Born in the Bronx, New York, March 9, 1906. Attended New York public schools and New York's City College. Studied the violin. At the age of twenty-one, invited by Fritz Reiner to join the Cincinnati Symphony. Interest in photography brought him to the Film and Photo League, Nykino, and Frontier Films. During World War II worked for the British Ministry of Information, as well as for the American Office of War Information. Made a number of highly regarded industrial films for sponsors as varied as the Ford Motor Company and the Girl Scouts. During the 1950s and 1960s worked as an editor on numerous features, including Martin Ritt's Edge of the City, and several films directed by Joseph Strick. Died in 1969.

Selected films

- 1937 China Strikes Back: director, writer, editor (as 'Robert Stebbins', in collaboration with Jay Leyda as 'Eugene Hill', Irving Lerner as 'Peter Ellis', Ben Maddow as 'David Wolf')
- 1937 People of the Cumberland: codirector, coeditor (as 'Robert Stebbins', with Jay Leyda as 'Eugene Hill')
- 1940 White Flood: director, writer, editor (in collaboration with Lionel Berman, Ben Maddow as 'David Wolf')
- 1948 The Quiet One: director, editor
- 1951 Steps of Age: director (in collaboration with Ben Maddow, Joseph Strick), editor
- 1953 Decision for Chemistry: director, editor
- 1954 The American Farmer: director, editor
- 1957 Adventuring in the Arts: director, editor
- 1959 The Savage Eye: director and writer (in collaboration with Ben Maddow and Joseph Strick), editor

Further reading

- Alexander, William, Film on the Left: American Documentary Film from 1931 to 1942, Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1981.
- Jacobs, Lewis, The Documentary Tradition: From Nanook to Woodstock, New York: Hopkinson and Blake, 1971.
- Meyers, Sidney (as 'Robert Stebbins'), 'The Screen: Frontier', New Masses 7, January 1936: 29–30.
- 'Redes', New Theater, November 1936: 20–2.
- 'Film: To the Editor', TAC, October 1938.
- 'One Man's Contribution', TAC, November 1938: 6.
- 'Movies', TAC, April 1939: 14–15, 22.
- Rosenblum, Walter, 'The Quiet One: A Milestone', Photo-Notes, spring 1949 (also in The Documentary Tradition, above).

Miller Adato, Perry

The documentaries of Perry Miller Adato are, according to the director herself, aimed at "education" in the broadest sense, that is, in broadening the area of people's understanding, knowledge or enjoyment'. Inspired by documentaries such as, notably, the Why We Fight series that she saw on US television just after the Vietnam War, Miller Adato became very interested in 16mm distribution as a way of reaching people directly, in their own environments, whether through schools, public libraries, churches, unions, clubs, or film societies. She learned everything she could about 16mm distribution and started working gratis with different organizations, trying to get them interested in using films. Later, when she took a job as a researcher for CBS, she was employed to find films around which the network could build programs. It was while working at CBS that Miller Adato came across a short film directed by Rollie McKenna on Bob Dylan and, using this as the basis for her research, made her first film: Dylan Thomas: The World I Breathe.

Miller Adato's biographies resemble filmic scrapbooks, collating professional works and personal memories. They draw on a wealth of memorabilia from every conceivable source and are composed of intimate letters, rare stills, art work, home movies, radio broadcasts, vintage news clips and film footage, as well as numerous talking heads. As one article states, 'If there's something or somebody relevant to her subject's story, Miller's got it on film' (Trojan 1978).

Such a thorough approach undoubtedly springs from her background in research: during her time at CBS Miller Adato was known as one of the most effective researchers in the field. Her production method consists of collating as much material as possible and then cutting it down to the required length. This approach means that before she begins a documentary, and as she is working on it, she has little idea of what the finished product will be composed. Beginning from the briefest of outlines, the final script comes out of the interviews conducted, existing materials, letters, and quotes. At the editing stage Miller Adato types up transcripts and edits these into a script working alongside a script editor, before working with a film editor to bring the film together visually. She states that her films are 'made or lost in the cutting room'. Unusually for the genre, Miller Adato's film's are fast-paced, most likely the result of the vast amount of material that she aims to incorporate, never using one picture 'when we thought two of three or ten would be better' (Schutzer 1972).

Perry Miller Adato's films have, more often than not, focused directly or indirectly on the creative person who remains vital in age as well as youth. They recount the contributions of the artist to their field, as well as conveying a sense of the emotional and personal side of the subject. Although she has stated that she is anxious not to canonize her subjects, her films generally make positive portrayals and aim to imitate the style of the subject's work. When making a documentary about an artist, Miller Adato tends to incorporate a wide selection of their own work into the film, often in the order in which individual pieces were created, so that the changes in the subject's life can be seen in parallel to the developments in their art. She appears to have a great respect for her subjects and their work, and it is a rule in each of her films that if pictures, sculptures, or photographs are shown in details or cuts, they must at some point be shown in their entirety, out of respect for the artwork. When making films about other filmmakers, as in the case of Charles and Ray Eames, or writers, such as Gertrude Stein, such an ethos becomes more complicated to put into practice. However, Miller Adato remains focused on respecting the integrity of the subject's work while making it work for the larger program, incorporating discrete sequences or passages with no cuts.

Adato's films hover between biography and artistic homage. The longer films, such as Gertrude Stein: When This You See, Remember Me, and Carl Sandburg: Echoes and Silences, tend to work more effectively from this point of view than the one- or half-hour documentaries, as the greater length of time allows the director to more thoroughly resolve the personal and professional portraits of her subjects. Shorter films, such as Mary Cassat: Impressionist from Philadelphia, are less successful in this regard. Miller Adato's thoroughness seems to be the problem, for in attempting to cover an entire life, its context, and an artist's work all in thirty minutes, Miller Adato can condense too much into too small a space with the result that the viewer is left feeling that he or she has only scratched the surface.

A filmmaker with an obvious passion for her subjects, Miller Adato's strength, and her weakness, is her desire to know everything about them. Her works have a very personal touch. The director feels it is important to develop some kind of personal relationship with each person she interviews. This can be seen to its greatest advantage in the films of length, and, to this end, her best works are arguably the pair of films she made about Georgia O'Keefe and Alfred Stieglitz. Both are admirable films in their discrete forms and were made with no intention that they be viewed together, but taken together they allow Miller Adato to create an interesting diptych in which each portrait reflects back on the other, and Miller Adato can dedicate an appropriate length of space to each subject. In contrast to the shorter films, neither documentary seems rushed; each takes its time to thoroughly reveal its subject's life and art. Had they been made as one, shorter film, one suspects that much would have been lost.

Her work is also notable for its preoccupation with female artists. The films on Cassatt, O'Keefe, and Betye Saar are amongst some of Miller Adato's films made as part of a WNET series on women artists entitled The Originals: Women in Art. Portrait of an Artist: Anonymous Was a Woman, another film in the series, contends that the originator of the many works, especially as with regard to folk arts, that are frequently attributed to a mysterious 'Anonymous' was most often a woman, and a skilled and highly creative one at that. This program argues that although never singled out for fame or lauded for their endeavours, these silent women nevertheless achieved remarkable designs and imminently useful items for use in and around the home, and is by far the closest to a feminist film that Miller's works come. Even her film on the Eames can be read in a feminist light, however: Miller Adato acknowledges that if the film had not been made with a woman director and two women editors, Ray Eames would not have received as much attention as her more celebrated husband Charles.

Miller Adato, while not seeing herself as a feminist filmmaker, acknowledges that her gender has a strong influence on the films that she makes: 'it's just fascinating how much you have in common with every other woman artist or even every other working woman'. It is because she and her female subjects know 'exactly what each other has been through', Miller claims, that she can 'tell you all about their lives'. On the subject of Cassatt, Stein, and O'Keefe, and their inherent feminism, Miller Adato has stated that 'they were not conscious in the sense that a lot of women are today', but that 'they were just interested in living their lives and doing their work'. In many ways this is perhaps the best description of Miller Adato's own attitude to her filmmaking.

HELEN WHEATLEY

See also: Gertrude Stein: When This You See, Remember Me

Biography

Spent ten years as a film consultant to CBS-TV, where she worked on Adventure, Odyssey, Seven Lively Arts, Conquest, Calender, and Roots of Freedom, and coproduced The Best is Yet to Be. In 1964 joined WNET, where she was associate producer for a film in the History of Negro People Series and Georges Braques in the Creative Person series. Produced eight one-hour programs for The Film Generation and Dance, which was shown at the Robert Flaherty seminar. Produced her first documentary in 1967: Dylan Thomas: The World I Breathe, which won an Emmy Award for Best Cultural Documentary.

Selected films

1968 Dylan Thomas: The World I Breathe: producer, director

- 1969 The Film Generation: coproducer
 1969 The Film Generation and Dance: director, coproducer
 1970 Gertrude Stein: When This You See, Remember Me: producer, director
 1972 The Great Radio Comedians: producer, director
 1974 An Eames Celebration: producer, director
 1975 Mary Cassatt: Impressionist from Philadelphia: producer, director
 1977 Georgia O'Keefe: producer, director, writer
 1977 Spirit Catcher: The Art of Betye Saar: producer
 1977 Anonymous was a Woman: producer
 1982 Carl Sandburg: Echoes and Silences: director
 2001 Alfred Stieglitz: The Eloquent Eye: producer, director, writer

Further reading

- Nordstrom, Kristina, 'Who's Who in Filmmaking: Perry Miller Adato', Sightlines 8, no. 2, winter 1974-5: 15-16.
 Schutzer, Anne, 'Interview with Perry Miller Adato', Filmmakers' Newsletter 5, no. 5, March 1972: 20-5.
 Trojan, Judith, 'The Documentaries of Perry Miller Adato', Film Library Quarterly 11, no. 1, 1978: 28-35.

Mills of the Gods: Viet Nam, The

(Canada, Fox, 1965)

Although this film has maintained a relatively high profile since its production in the mid-1960s, certainly among films made during and about the Vietnam War, it is currently enjoying something of a resurgence in interest and popularity. This renewed interest is perhaps a result of its restoration in 2000 and subsequent release on DVD by the Masterworks Program of the Canadian Audio-Visual Preservation Trust, a body charged with maintaining Canada's media past. So significant is the film to the history of the media in Canada, that The Mills of the Gods: Viet Nam was selected in the very first batch of masterworks for restoration by the organization, which selects twelve worthy texts from radio television and film annually.

Directed and produced by Beryl Fox, executive produced by Douglas Leiterman, and edited by Don Haig, this film benefited from participation from three very significant figures in film and television in Canada. Produced for the CBC's Document series, an irregularly scheduled programme, loosely affiliated with the incendiary This Hour Has Seven Days, which broadcast documentaries by several important Canadian filmmakers, the film was first broadcast on December 5, 1965, and it went on to win many awards including the Film of the Year at the Canadian Film Awards.

Composed of images of both a wide variety of American service personnel and of Vietnamese peasants, the film provides a sobering, provocative, sad, and ultimately extremely poignant examination of the effects of the war on both the American servicemen and the Vietnamese peasants. Among images of napalm, bombs, and death, Fox intersperses moments of quotidian reality for the local residents, of working, shopping in the market, and so on. It is the juxtaposition of the graphic images of horrendous warfare with these everyday goings-on that lends the film its lasting poignancy.

The film was shot entirely in Vietnam and contains no archival footage or presenter commentary, relying on the words of those Fox encountered and interviewed and the images of events their camera encountered. Some of these images remain shocking to this day, including the strafing of a Viet Cong bunker and the torture of a prisoner.

The Mills of the Gods: Viet Nam was one of a series of socially committed documentaries produced by the CBC in the early 1960s in a cycle that produced moving early films by many important Canadian documentarians. In addition to those by Fox, which include One More River (aka Report on the Mood of the South Nine Years After the Supreme Court Ordered Integration with All Deliberate Speed, 1964, codirected by Douglas Leiterman, and featuring an interview with Malcolm X), Donald Brittain and Allan King also worked under this moment of ferment at the CBC.

Haunting, arresting, and universal in its consideration of the relationship of individuals to ideology, Mills of the Gods: Viet Nam appeared on television early enough in the war, and in a moment of emergent politically committed practitioners of broadcasting, to be seen today as an important example of the social potential of documentary as a film practice.

PETER URQUHART

The Mills of the Gods: Viet Nam (Canada, 1965, 56 mins). Produced and directed by Beryl Fox.

Mita, Merata

Merata Mita's role as a Maori filmmaker has been crucial for the documentary and feature film traditions of Aotearoa/New Zealand and for indigenous filmmaking internationally. The first indigenous woman to have made a feature film—Mauri/Life Force (1987)—Mita was also the first woman to have directed a feature-length film in Aotearoa, the documentary Patu! A Club: To Assault (1983). Mita's work is informed by the roles that whakapapa (genealogy) and whai koorero (oratory) play in Maori tradition. This is manifest most clearly through the approaches to camera work, editing, narrative structure, and treatment of subjects within each film. Generally, her work is characterised by a style that eschews an easy distinction between conventions of documentary and those of fiction. Through techniques of juxtaposition, slow motion, and the insertion of still photographs, these documentaries speak of her concern to evoke a sense of life beyond what is immediately apparent on screen. Similarly Mauri, although a fictional work, cast untrained actors in lead roles, a technique that effectively drew from the aura of these real-life social actors (Zac Wallace and Eva Rickard were recognised spokespeople for Maori, trade union, and land rights issues).

Films made between 1979 and 1990 represent the first stage of Mita's practice. Here, a movement can be traced from a period of internship on documentary films about community and struggle within Maoritanga (Maori culture) and trade union movements to work that integrates these perspectives of cultural resistance within the forms of feature and archival film (Mauri, and Mana Waka/Power of the Canoe, 1990). This period was informed by an environment of Maori cultural and political renaissance growing through the 1970s and 1980s, during which Mita became involved with an activist group, Nga Tamatoa (young warriors), a Maori organisation of urban, often university-educated rangatahi (modern youth), who had an agenda for social change through legislative, educational, cultural, and protest strategies.

Gerd Pohlmann, Mita's then partner, made a significant contribution to New Zealand documentary film through his body of work about trade union politics and industrial disputes, documentaries on which Mita also worked in various capacities from codirector to researcher. The Mer-Ger Productions films were made alongside work that was an extension of Mita's involvement with Nga Tamatoa. These films focused on Maori land rights, in Bastion Point: Day 507 (1980); oppositional movements against local and international racism, in Patu!; and Maori communities, in Karanga Hokianga/A Welcome to the Hokianga (1979), and Keskidee-Aroha/Universal Love (1981, the name of a theatre troupe).

Nga Tamatoa's dialogue between modern change and tradition is manifest in those documentaries that take articulations of protest as their subjects, and those works where tradition comes to a fore, such as Mauri and Mana Waka. Mita has referred to film's power to make the present eternal and, accordingly, editing choices facilitate the way in which a Maori understanding of historical time as 'the past being the present being the future' is built into the narrative structure of her films.

Women are central to the narratives of Mita's documentaries; they are often portrayed as strong community leaders. These representations invoke historical role models, inferring a line of connection between the women leaders of yesterday and those of today. As with other contemporary Maori women, Mita affirms mana waahine Maaori (the power of Maori women) as a means of understanding the strength of women within Maaoritanga, as well as asserting cultural difference from paakehaa (non-Maori) feminism, a difference that is largely predicated on race.

Although Mita has been based in Hawaii since completing Mana Waka, Aotearoa has remained tuurangawaewae (a place to stand). She returns often for documentary projects and teaching commitments. The last decade has seen her documentary work maintain an exploration of ways in which tradition operates within contemporary contexts. Dread (1996) is the study of a Maori Rastafarian community within the Bay of Plenty. Te Paho (1997) is a quest drawing from ethnomusicology in search of a Maori drum. Hotere (2000), moves back to a manipulation of editing, cinematography, and sound to both animate and hold in contemplation the work of a renowned artist who prefers not to speak for the camera. It can be said that in the spirit of whai koorero, whakapapa, and mauri, Mita's work has taken on a life of its own.

GERALDENE PETERS

Biography

Born in Maketu, Bay of Plenty, Aotearoa/New Zealand, June 1942. Affiliations are with the hapu (sub-tribe) Ngati Pikiao, and the iwi (principal tribe), Te Arawa. Trained as a secondary school teacher, introducing Maori students to film as a medium through which to tell their stories. Involvement with Nga Tamatoa from 1970. Liaison work between overseas film crews and Maori communities 1977–9. Directed first film Karanga Hokianga 1979. Continued making documentaries, alongside acting in television dramas and feature films; working as a Maori current affairs presenter; and directing her first feature film 1980–90. Resident of Hawaii since 1990, teaching documentary film production at the University of Hawaii-Manoa. Worked alongside partner, New Zealand director Geoff Murphy, in assistant director roles for two Hollywood feature films and a television pilot. Continued to produce documentaries within the Pacific and Aotearoa. Awarded the Flaherty Seminar's Leo Dratfield Award for Commitment and Excellence in Documentary 1996. Winner of the Mountain Award for excellence, commitment, and innovation, Taos Film Festival 1999. Screenwriting tutor, documentary juror, adviser to Native Programming with the Sundance Film Institute, 2000 to the present.

Selected films

- 1979 Karanga Hokianga: director, coeditor
- 1980 Bastion Point Day 507: codirector, coeditor
- 1980 The Hammer and the Anvil: codirector, coproducer
- 1981 Kinleith '80: community liaison
- 1981 Keskidee-Aroha: codirector, coproducer
- 1982 The Bridge: A Story of Men in Dispute: codirector
- 1983 Patu!: director, producer

- 1990 Mana Waka: director, sound designer
 1996 Dread: director, writer
 1997 Te Paho: director, writer
 2001 Hotere: director, writer, producer

Further reading

- Horrocks, Roger, 'Merata Mita', New Zealand Film Makers at the Auckland City Art Gallery 2, August 1984: 1–4.
 Horrocks, Roger and Mita, Merata, 'Patu!', Alternative Cinema 11, nos. 2–3, winter/spring 1983: 11–21.
 Jesson, Bruce and Mita, Merata, 'Film and the Making of Politics', The Republican, February 1983: 8–15.
 Lamche, Pascale, 'Interview with Merata Mita', Framework 25, 1984: 2–11.
 Mita, Merata, 'The Soul and the Image', in Jan Bieringa and Jonathan Dennis (eds), Film in Aotearoa New Zealand, Wellington: Victoria University Press, 1992.
 Parekowhai, Cushla, 'Puea o te Ao: Rise to the Surface of the World. Merata Mita and Mana Waka', in Christina Barton and Deborah Lawler Dormer (eds), Alter/Image: Feminism and Representation in New Zealand Art 1973–93, Auckland: Auckland City Art Gallery and Wellington: City Gallery, 1993.
 Peters, Geraldene, 'Lives of Their Own: Films by Merata Mita', in Ian Conrich and Stuart Murray (eds), New Zealand Film Makers, Michigan: Wayne State University Press, 2007.

Mitchell, Denis

A central figure in television documentary in the late 1950s and 1960s, Denis Mitchell established himself as one of the first television auteurs through a highly personal body of work. Unlike many documentaries in the late 1950s, usually marked by an 'objective', journalistic approach, Mitchell's work had more in common with cinematic precedents. Two of the most notable predecessors Mitchell can be linked to are the more poetic filmmakers who worked for the British documentary film movement and filmmakers associated with Free Cinema in the 1950s.

Cinematic links are important, but it should also be stressed that Mitchell's background was actually in radio, a medium that also significantly influenced his approach to television documentary. In radio he started to experiment with a portable tape recorder, making 'wild track' recordings of a variety of 'ordinary', mostly working-class people. Using these raw, direct recordings in his radio programmes was innovative because at the time the routine manner by which the working classes were represented was subject to heavy mediation. First they were interviewed, then their speech was 'tidied up', and eventually an actor would voice this 'common speech'.

Mitchell eventually secured work for television when he was asked to make a short film on teenagers for Special Enquiry, a current affairs series consisting of a number of diverse items. Mitchell again made heavy use of his portable tape recorder, creating a fragmented montage of teenage voices accompanying nonsynchronised images of teenage life. Using a nonsynchronous image track meant that the camera was lighter and easier to move around. This allowed a number of images from different positions to be shot and edited together. While the film featured narration, it was noted for its aesthetic character, the way in which it conveyed an impressionistic portrait of teenage life.

The film on teenagers met with wide acclaim; both Mitchell's technical accomplishments and his ability to 'get closer' to everyday life were praised. This led him to make his first television feature for the BBC in 1957. In Prison was the first attempt to explore prison life on television.

Mitchell researched the programme in depth and even spent time in a cell in Strangeways prison, where the programme was filmed. The film again used a mixture of wild track recordings, narration, and aesthetically framed observations of prison life. These were mixed, however, with some dramatic reconstructions plus some expressive sound effects and music.

Mitchell then began to adopt the even lighter 16mm camera, which enabled him to film location footage with more ease and with greater mobility. In 1959 he made one of his most critically acclaimed programmes for the BBC, Morning in the Streets. The film, which won an award at the Prix Italia, was shot in Salford and Liverpool and was a poetic evocation of life in working-class neighbourhoods. With the extra mobility afforded by the 16mm cameras, the film contains a greater sense of movement and fluidity than Mitchell's previous work; it also dispenses with narration, thus adding to its aesthetic, poetic qualities. The artistic rendering of working class life is reminiscent of some films from both the documentary film movement and the Free Cinema films. Yet Mitchell's films tended to focus, almost fetishistically, on 'down-and-out' characters, and his films are thus filled with a greater sense of despair. Also, by using 16mm and portable tape, his films can also be connected to the direct cinema movement that emerged in the early 1960s in the United States. It is true that Mitchell did not at this time use synchronised portable film and tape equipment, and that he was concerned with personal expression in a way that direct cinema proponents disavowed. His shots are often carefully framed and thus avoid the shaky camera movements often found in early direct cinema films. Yet his tape experiments and his freer use of cameras can be related to direct cinema in that they seemed more immediate than many other documentaries that were being made on British television at the time.

After making a number of films for the BBC in a similar vein, including House on the Beach (1960), Chicago (1961), and the series The Wind of Change (1960), which included Dennis Potter's documentary Between Two Rivers, Mitchell joined Granada in 1964. Here, working with Norman Swallow, he began to diverge from his previous methods by using videotape, which was still in its infancy in this period and was extremely difficult to edit. He made two films with Swallow in 1964 on videotape: Wedding on Saturday and The Entertainers. While the former was still a familiar anthropological dissection of working-class life in an industrial region (but which featured a lot more synch-sound than before), The Entertainers was a change in direction. The film straddled the borders of documentary and fictional filmmaking in that it was an observation of six different entertainers residing in the same lodging house for a period of time. In an early precursor of Big Brother (2000–), ordinary people were placed in an artificial situation and their interactions were dissected (the single location was convenient in that video cameras were cumbersome and difficult to move from place to place). Yet spontaneous interaction was mixed with more expressive, staged sequences, which added a dramatic impetus to the interpersonal dynamics.

Mitchell and Swallow then set up a freelance television company, Denis Mitchell Films, which was based in Hampstead. They negotiated a contract with Granada for which they produced the series This England. The series, which documented various aspects of the country, ran from 1965 until 1967 and gave new directors such as Dick Fontaine and Mike Grigsby a chance to make programmes. (Mitchell also directed a few programmes himself, as did Swallow.) The series reappeared on the television schedules for a slightly longer run between 1977 and 1980.

After This England Mitchell's star began to fade a little and his reputation for innovation waned. Yet, while the late 1950s to the late 1960s may have been his golden period, he continued to make documentary films on themes that interested him for most of his life. Unlike other figures he refused to delve into television drama (though he did sometimes use 'dramatic' elements for expressive purposes), believing that real lives and real people were of far more interest. He relentlessly pursued his personal interests, returning again and again to making films of those who were on the margins of society. He made some films for World in Action in the late 1960s and early 1970s. He then went on to make a series of character documentaries in Seven Men (1971), which included his famous film on Quentin Crisp. In 1977 he continued his analyses of marginal figures by making Never and Always, which portrayed the lives of three 'ordinary' people struggling to make a living in Norfolk.

JAMIE SEXTON

Biography

Born in Cheshire, 1911. Attended drama school and became an actor. Emigrated to South Africa after the war and began to work in a number of jobs including broadcasting. Returned to Britain in the 1940s and worked in Manchester as a radio talks producer. Set up Denis Mitchell Films in 1963. Died in 1990.

Selected films

- 1957 In Prison (BBC): director, producer
- 1959 Morning in the Streets (BBC): director
- 1959 Soho Story (BBC): director, producer
- 1960 House on the Beach (Redifussion): director
- 1960 The Wind of Change (BBC, series): director, producer
- 1961 Chicago (BBC): director, producer
- 1964 Wedding on Saturday (Granada): director

- 1964 The Entertainers (Granada): director, producer
- 1965–7 This England (coproduced with Norman Swallow, series): director, coproducer
- 1970 World in Action: St Mungo's People (Granada): director
- 1970 World in Action: Ian Paisley (Granada): director
- 1971 Seven Men (Granada, series): director, producer
- 1972–3 A European Journey (Granada, series): director, producer
- 1977 Never and Always (Granada): director
- 1977–80 This England (Granada, series): director
- 1986 Don of the Dais (Channel 4): director, producer
- 1986 Changing Times (Channel 4, series): director

Further reading

- Bell, Elaine, 'The Origins of British Television Documentary: the BBC 1946–55', in John Corner (ed.), Documentary and the Mass Media, London: Edward Arnold, 1986.
- Corner, John, 'Documentary Voices', in John Corner (ed.), Popular Television in Britain: Studies in Cultural History, London: BFI, 1991.
- Orbanz, Eva (ed.), Journey to a Legend and Back: The British Realistic Film, trans. Stuart Hood, Berlin: Edition Volker Spiess, 1977.
- Purser, Philip, 'Think-Tape: A Profile of Denis Mitchell', Contrast 1, no. 2, winter, 1961.
- Robinson, David, 'Shooting on Tape', Contrast 3, no. 1, autumn 1963.
- Scannell, Paddy, 'The Social Eye of Television 1946–55', Media, Culture and Society 1, no. 1, 1979.
- 'The Stuff of Radio', in John Corner (ed.), Documentary and the Mass Media, London: Edward Arnold, 1986.
- Swallow, Norman, Factual Television, London: Focal Press, 1966.

Mitry, Jean

Jean Mitry was an author, teacher, film historian and theoretician, and occasional actor and director. He was the most prolific film historian in Europe in the twentieth century; he was active from 1924 until his death in 1988. Few people are aware today that Mitry was one of the co-founders of the famous Cinémathèque Française, on September 9, 1936, with Henri Langlois, Georges Franju, and Paul-Auguste Harlé.

In his early twenties Jean Mitry was already fascinated by movies. He organized a Ciné-Club, wrote about films for many French journals, worked as an assistant for various film directors (such as Pierre Chenal), and appeared in minor roles in short films, as well as in Jean Renoir's La Nuit du carrefour (1932). Mitry also worked as a film editor for Alexandre Astruc's baroquedrama, Le Rideau cramoisi (1952).

Mitry directed approximately twenty short films, most of them experimental films or documentaries. Many depicted how moving images could illustrate pieces of classical music in a rhythmic synchronism. Mitry won a prize for best editing (in the short film category) at the Cannes Film Festival in 1949 for his first film as director and editor, originally entitled Pacific 231 (1949). In this short film influenced by Abel Gance's La Roue (1922), Mitry tried to create synchronicity between moving images of wheels and locomotives and a soundtrack by Swiss composer Arthur Honegger. Mitry later explained that Honegger and he wanted to explore 'the definition of the various relationships between acoustic and visual rhythm' (quoted in Mitry 1997: 260).

Among Jean Mitry's most important films are En bateau (1951), Images pour Debussy (1951), and Rêverie de Claude Debussy (1952), a cycle of three essays inspired by the music of Claude Debussy, for which Mitry tried to find a visual counterpoint, with pastoral and natural images. Mitry teamed up with French composer Pierre Boulez to find a visual equivalent to a more abstract, contemporary music, with a thirteen-minute film titled Symphonie mécanique (1955), which was initially planned to be on a multiscreen.

One of Mitry's last short films is a technical documentary about how a film is produced, titled Derrière le décor/Behind the Set (1969), a didactic work that presents the duties of every member of the film crew. Oddly, Mitry's only feature film made as a director was a weak adaptation of a novel by Léo Malet, Énigme aux Folies-Bergères (1959). Today, Mitry's films can only be found at the Cinémathèque Française and in a few other film archives.

In the 1960s Jean Mitry published his three most ambitious works that confirmed his respected position in French film studies. First, he released a theoretical synthesis on film studies in two volumes, Esthétique et psychologie du cinéma (The Aesthetics and Psychology of the Cinema, 1963 and 1965), which was for many generations the fundamental reference in film theory. The same year, Mityr published the first general dictionary dedicated to cinema, simply titled Dictionnaire du cinéma (Mityr 1963), which contained entries for major directors, actors, movies, followed (in appendices) by two valuable filmographies on selected short films (documentary and fiction) (on pp. 310–25) and another selection of classic documentaries of more than an hour produced between 1911 and 1959 (pp. 326–7). Just four years later Mityr released another monument: his multi-volume world film history, titled Histoire du cinéma (1967), which was acclaimed for its exhaustive spectrum and neutral tone, although it was sometimes overly criticized for minor errors (see Collet et al. 1980). A much celebrated book, The Aesthetics and Psychology of the Cinema contained several remarks about Mityr's conception of the documentary film: 'Conversely, when documentary presents an original and personal vision of the world and its objects, that is, when it becomes an eye, it also becomes a "poem". And as a poem it is organized, dialectically composed; in other words, it becomes language' (Mityr 1997: 59).

A film expert without an academic degree, Jean Mityr was nevertheless an extraordinary communicator, with an incomparable knowledge of film history and a vast memory of the thousands of films he had watched in various countries (Passek 1998). He was never a tenured professeur d'université, but he often taught as a lecturer, first at the Institut des hautes études cinématographiques (IDHEC) in Paris, sometimes at the Université de Paris 1, and later in Québec at the Université de Montréal (in the early 1970s).

During the 1980s, when semiotics became a popular field of academic inquiry, and for many professors the only way to apprehend film studies, Mityr published a courageous and accurate critique of the current French semiotic obsession, entitled La sémiologie en question (1987). That polemical book, one of Mityr's most important, demonstrated how futile and limited were Christian Metz's theories on film semiotics, in terms of film theory and film history. In that debate, Mityr also questioned the 'Marxist trend' and leftist doctrine that emerged in some French film studies, as seen in some authors of Cahiers du cinéma and Cinéthique in the early 1970s, such as Jean-Louis Comolli, Jean Narboni, Jean-Patrick Lebel, and Pascal Bonitzer. Mityr was the first to question that tendency and therefore courted controversy. It was attacked or ignored by many Parisian academics and contributed to the rejection of Mityr's incomparable contribution as a film historian and theoretician in some academic circles.

A prolific and generous author, Mityr also edited a Bibliographie internationale du cinéma et de la télévision in seven volumes, and edited a thirty-volume Filmographie universelle. Mityr also wrote monographs on film directors (John Ford, 1954; Eisenstein, 1961), and poetry (his last book, L'Ange Vénus). Today, Jean Mityr is remembered in France by an Association Jean-Mityr and a prize, the Prix Jean-Mityr.

YVES LABERGE

Biography

Born in Soissons, France, 1904, with the full name Jean Rene Pierre Goetgheluck le Rouge Tillard des Acres de Presfontaines. Chose his shorter pseudonym, Mityr, from the name of a little town near Paris. Died in La Garenne-Colombes, France, 1988.

Selected films

- | | |
|---------|---|
| 1949 | Pacific 231: director, writer |
| c. 1950 | Écrire en images/Writing with Images: director, writer, editor |
| 1951 | Images pour Debussy/Images for Debussy: director, writer |
| 1951 | En bateau/On a Boat: director, writer |
| 1952 | Rêverie de Claude Debussy/Claude Debussy's Dreaming: director, writer |
| 1955 | Symphonie mécanique/Mechanical Symphony: director, writer |
| 1969 | Derrière le décor/Behind the Set: director |

Further reading

- Andrew, J. Dudley (ed.), The Major Film Theories: An Introduction, New York: Oxford University Press, 1976.
- Collet, Jean, with Marie, Michel, Percheron, Daniel, Simon, Jean-Paul and Vernet, Marc, Lectures du film, third edn, Paris: Albatros, 1980.
- Lewis, Brian, Jean Mityr and the Aesthetics of the Cinema, Ann Arbor, MI: UMI Research Press, 1984 (from a thesis on Jean Mityr, defended at the University of Iowa, 1980).

- Lowry, Edward, The Filmology Movement and Film Study in France, Ann Arbor, MI: UMI Research Press, 1985.
- Mitry, Jean, The Aesthetics and Psychology of the Cinema (translated from the abridged 1900 edition of Esthétique et psychologie du cinéma), Bloomington, IN and Indianapolis, IN: Indiana University Press, 1997.
- Semiotics and the Analysis of Film, London: British Film Institute, 2000 (translated from La sémiologie en question, Paris: Cerf, 1987).
- Dictionnaire du cinéma, Paris: Larousse, 1963.
- Histoire du cinéma (Art et industrie), five volumes, Paris: Editions universitaires, 1967 (also 1969 and 1973).
- (ed.), Le cinéma expérimental: histoire et perspectives, Paris: Seghers, 1974.
- (ed.), Bibliographie internationale du cinéma et de la télévision, seven volumes, Paris: IDHEC, 1966.
- Filmographie universelle, thirty volumes, Bois d'Arcy (France): Editions du Service des Archives du Film, 1963–72.
- L'Ange Vénus, Longueuil: Le Preambule, 1979 (poetry book published in Canada, with some verses in English).
- Passek, Jean-Loup (ed.), Dictionnaire du cinéma, Paris: Larousse, 1998.

Moana

(US, Flaherty, 1926)

After the very considerable success of Nanook of the North (1922), Robert Flaherty, its creator, was approached by Jesse L. Lasky of Famous Players-Lasky (which became Paramount Pictures), the first firm to have turned down distribution of Nanook. Lasky offered Flaherty what amounted to a blank check. He was to go anywhere in the world and bring back 'another Nanook'.

Flaherty had become interested in the South Seas through the eloquent descriptions of a friend, Frederick O'Brien, who had written a popular book on the subject: White Shadows in the South Seas. O'Brien urged Flaherty to go to Samoa to record the lovely culture of its gentle people before it was further eroded by the incursions of foreigners and disappeared altogether. With his wife Frances, three small daughters, their nursemaid, and his brother David, he set sail for the Southwest Pacific.

Flaherty was aware of what Hollywood expected from him—another box office success—and wondered what he would find in Samoa that could provide the drama of human survival that Nanook contained. (Two years after the film was released Nanook died of starvation, as many of his people had.) On the way to Samoa, Flaherty learned that a giant octopus had been sighted from another ship. Maybe enormous sea creatures threatened human life in Samoa.

Once there he found no sea monsters. On the contrary, Samoan existence seemed to provide no drama at all. For weeks a dejected Flaherty sat on the veranda drinking apple beer, gloomily contemplating what form he might give to a film about Samoans.

Through his informal investigations into the culture, he had learned of a practice no longer carried out that interested him. Formerly, young Samoan men had been initiated into manhood by undergoing elaborate and intricate tattooing over much of their bodies (the knees being particularly painful), which took several weeks. Flaherty concluded that because there were few physical threats to their existence, the Samoans had invented a test of endurance involving considerable pain. He revived this custom for the purposes of his film, and organized it around the initiation of one Samoan youth named Moana. Preceding and paralleling the scenes of tattooing are scenes of the gathering of food (in the jungle, from the sea, and along the shore), the making of clothing and ornaments, the preparing and cooking of a feast, and the dancing of the Siva by Moana and his intended bride. When the tattooing is completed, there is a ceremonial drinking of kava (an alcoholic beverage made from the crushed root of a shrubby pepper) by the chiefs and a celebratory dance by the men of the village in honor of Moana's courage.

If Flaherty in his first two films became a special kind of storyteller, he was also a subtle and engaging teacher. His visual exposition is generally exemplary in its simplicity and clarity. Also, his pedagogy uses mystery and suspense to arouse our curiosity, to make us want to learn about the subjects that fascinated him. One of many similar instances of this method occurs early in Moana when Moana's younger brother, Pe'a, climbs a palm tree. First we see him mid-frame, on a section of the trunk. He is allowed to climb up out of frame; then the camera tilts up to re-center him. Pe'a again climbs out of frame and is again pursued by the camera. On the third climb/tilt, the top of this majestic tree is revealed. By that time we are not only craving to see the top, we are prepared to accept this as the tallest palm in the world. In another scene we see Pe'a looking at something, and a title tells us he has come upon 'a telltale bit of evidence—an empty coconut shell'. We do not learn what it is evidence of, however, and the mystery builds as Pe'a scrambles about the rocks, peers in the crevices between them, tries to move one, and starts a small fire accompanied by smoke until a creature emerges. Only then does a title say, 'Ah, Mr. Robber Crab, you won't climb my father's coconut trees any more'.

Though Flaherty tended to profess ignorance of technological matters, he seems to have been a natural and perhaps superb technician. For Moana he was the first to use the new panchromatic film. Though black and white (before color was available), panchromatic film is sensitive to all colors of the spectrum, unlike the orthochromatic film then in standard use. Although orthochromatic did not respond to red and was prone to harsh contrasts, Moana offers a Samoa rich in varied tones of gray. It was also on this production that Flaherty first began to make extensive use of long (telephoto) lenses. Almost all of it was shot with lenses of six inches focal length and upward (two inches being standard for 35mm). Their use had the obvious advantage of permitting the filming of distant and inaccessible subjects, the outrigger in the surf, for example. Also, Flaherty found that his people were less self-conscious and behaved more naturally if the camera was some distance from them. He also thought certain special photographic qualities resulted through the use of long lenses: 'The figures had a roundness, a stereoscopic quality that gave to the picture a startling reality and beauty [...] alive and real, the shadows softer, and the breadfruit trees seemed like living things rather than a flat background.'

Moana prompted John Grierson, then a young Scot visiting the United States, to devise a new use for the word documentary. He introduced it casually, as an adjective, in the first sentence of the second paragraph of his review of Moana for The New York Sun: 'Of course, Moana being a visual account of events in the daily life of a Polynesian youth and his family, has documentary value.' Grierson carried the word and his developing aesthetic theory and sense of social purpose back to Great Britain where he began and then led what would become a documentary film movement.

JACK C. ELLIS

See also: Flaherty, Robert; Nanook of the North

Moana (US, Famous Players-Lasky, 1926, 95 mins). Distributed by Paramount Pictures. Produced, directed, photographed, and edited by Robert J. Flaherty. Filmed in British Samoa.

Moffatt, Tracey

Tracey Moffatt is an indigenous Australian visual artist and filmmaker whose films speculatively document the 'real' via humour, narrative implication, and by challenging generic conventions. She began her film work with a ten-minute health promotion for the Aboriginal Medical Service (Redfern, Australia). Spread the Word (1988) was 'experimental and avant-garde at the time, with distinctive artificial sets, comedic characterisation, computer-generated art and rap music' (Langton 1993: 16). In 1988 she made Moodeitj Yorgas. Solid Women for the Western Australian Women's Advisory Council to the Premier. This lyric, twenty-two-minute video features interviews with prominent Aboriginal women: their voices are heard (but not synchronised) over silent videotaped portraits that are linked using dramatic segments of women in black silhouette who enact brief vignettes over stories told in two Aboriginal languages. Of her four independent films, only one has been marketed (by Ronin Films) as 'documentary': the twenty-eight-minute video Heaven (1997). Two of her 'fiction' films, however, the feature length BeDevil (1993) and the seventeen-minute Nice Coloured Girls (1987), are also significant for documentary film discourse.

First, her stylistic references to documentary in these films critique documentary filmmaking's 'necessary fiction' (in Herbert Blau's sense) that there is a vast difference between narrative fiction film's and documentary's choice and treatment of subject matter. They suggest that the combined devices of both 'fiction' and 'nonfiction' film might indeed be needed for 'documenting' the particular social issue that all Moffatt's films address: race relations between indigenous and nonindigenous Australians. This issue involves the telling and keeping of many 'secrets', recalling Michel Foucault's sense of a secrecy that simultaneously protects people's privacy and reinforces institutionalised abuse. Performances of 'secrets' by both professional and social actors in Moffatt's films glide constantly between fictional and nonfictional conjunctions of space and time. Second, when she uses or refers to documentary modes of filmmaking, Moffatt does so primarily through manipulating the cinematic gaze. Her films specifically critique the 'documentary gaze', which is 'constitutively multiform, embroiled with conscious motives and unconscious desires, driven by curiosity no more than by terror and fascination' (Renov 1999: 321). Third, while commenting on various modes of documentary filmmaking, Moffatt's films themselves can be understood in the context of documentary's fifth mode: the performative (Nichols 1994).

In the second ghost story of BeDevil, 'Choo Choo Choo Choo', Moffatt performs the role of her own mother, Ruby. Using a style suggestive of cinéma vérité, 'documentary characters' tell a story from the time when Ruby lived by a railway siding in outback Queensland. They invite their audience into a parody of the idyllic 'bush picnic'—at a rubbish dump in the desert, beside a derelict house. The camera zooms onto a middle-aged Aboriginal woman reclining and sipping a glass of cold Chardonnay who says directly to camera: 'Shoo! Don't do that!' This 'documentary' sequence explicitly critiques the documentary filmmaking devices of the 'intrusive' camera and the frequently stereotyping narratives of ethnographic film. The first ghost story also comments on documentary filmmaking, although less humorously. During the telling of 'Mr Chuck', the audience experiences the ravaged face of a middle-aged Aboriginal man (actor Jack Charles) who describes his childhood as he sits talking, not to camera, but past the camera, toward the unidentified person who is 'interviewing' him. The setting with its glass wall strongly evokes a prison interview room. This look 'past the camera' can be understood as a specific critique of documentary interview situations that rely on unequal power relations between those who interview and those whom they interview. In Patricia Mellencamp's words, 'Moffatt reacts against ethnography, the realist tradition of representing black Australia' (Mellencamp 1993–4: 136). Moffatt's films communicate the experience of Australian race relations; within their texts 'the 'unsaid and unseen' can be experienced, felt. Aboriginal characters don't simply see or look as much as they witness or evade. They don't speak as much as they testify or parody' (Mellencamp 1995: 60). BeDevil's 'documentary' sequences resonate strongly with performative documentary: 'overarching conceptual categories such as exile, racism, sexism, or homophobia [...] are seldom named and never described or explained in any detail' (Nichols 1994: 104).

Nice Coloured Girls (seventeen minutes) is again a fictional narrative with explicitly documentary overtones. Three young Aboriginal girls 'pick up' a middle-aged white Australian man at a bar in Sydney's infamous 'red light' area, Kings Cross. They lure him into buying them dinner; he gets drunk and they steal his wallet, giggling and disappearing into a taxi in the half-light of dawn over Sydney Harbour. We do not hear the actors speak. The soundtrack is full of ambient city noise and a male voice-over that intones British officials' early accounts of meetings with aboriginal women at the time of Sydney's early settlement in the late eighteenth century. Scenes of the girls' 'night out' are interrupted periodically by images of anonymous white hands pulling at black hands and legs, black legs climbing up rope ladders, old photographs, and smashing glass. The contemporary story is filmed in a style that suggests 'observational' documentary: the images are grainy, badly lit, and sometimes awkwardly framed. The 'flashes' of historical comment are explicitly staged and sharply framed. A dark woman's face is blown by a gentle wind; her expression is of quiet curiosity as we see her face looking at us, and we are caught into an experience of looking at someone whom we never thought to see and who is looking back at us. This film violently unsettles looking relations that conventionally exist between those who have access to power and those who do not. The story is drawn from Moffatt's childhood, she says: 'I used to do it, I used to do it with my sisters [...] we're not little angels' (in Mellencamp 1993–4: 152). Through this film we are given 'a glimpse into some young Aborigines' ways of seeing their world' (Kaplan 2000: 68). Both in this sense, and in the sense that the film combines historical documents with a narrative that 'reenacts' the filmmaker's own experience, Nice Coloured Girls can be understood as a performative documentary which 'clearly embodies a paradox: it generates a distinct tension between performance and document, between the personal and the typical, the embodied and disembodied' (Nichols 1994: 97).

Heaven, although marketed by Ronin Films as documentary, was produced in the context of video art for Moffatt's 1997 exhibition at the Dia Center, New York. It features staged and unstaged footage of 'good-looking' male surfers removing wet suits and otherwise 'changing' their clothes, and combines surveillance-styled footage of unaware surfers with interactions between surfers and the various anonymous (handheld) camera operators who were commissioned by Moffatt. Not one surfer is identified in the film. We never hear the spoken voice; we hear instead waves washing on a beach (as in Nice Coloured Girls) and intermittent, unidentified 'tribal' drumming and chanting. Once again, the documentary gaze is under review: for its dialectic of power and subversion, for its humour, and for its manifestation of our desire to 'watch' other people. Through Heaven, with its closing images of a dark female hand pulling away a blue towel from a white naked male body, Moffatt again challenges and explores the conventions of documentary film.

CATHERINE SUMMERHAYES

Biography

Born in 1960 in Brisbane, Australia. Graduated in 1982 from the Queensland College of the Arts in Brisbane, where she studied film and video. Principally known for her visual art that has been widely exhibited internationally: photo-series including Something More (1989), Scarred for Life (1994), Guapa—Good-looking (1995), Up in the Sky (1997), Laudanum (1999), and Invocations (2000). Lives and works in Sydney and New York.

Selected films

- 1987 Nice Coloured Girls: director, writer
- 1988 Moodeitj Yorgas. Solid Women: director, writer
- 1989 Night Cries: A Rural Tragedy: director, writer
- 1993 BeDevil: director, writer
- 1997 Heaven: director

Further reading

Jennings, Karen, Sites of Difference: Cinematic Representations of Aboriginality and Gender, South

Melbourne: Australian Film Institute Research and Information Centre, 1993.

Kaplan, E. Ann, 'Aborigines, Film, and Moffatt's "Night Cries: A Rural Tragedy": An Outsider's Perspectives', in Julie Marcus (ed.), Picturing the 'Primitif': Images of Race in Daily Life, Canada Bay, Australia: LhR Press, 2000.

Langton, Marcia, 'Well, I heard it on the radio and I saw it on the television': an essay for the Australian Film Commission on the politics and aesthetics of filmmaking by and about Aboriginal people and things, North Sydney: Australian Film Commission, 1993.

Mellencamp, Patricia, 'Haunted History: Tracey Moffatt and Julie Dash', Discourse 16, no. 2, winter 1993–4: 127–63.

—, A Fine Romance: Five Ages of Film Feminism, Philadelphia, PA: Temple University Press, 1995.

Morris, Meaghan, 'Beyond Assimilation: Aboriginality, Media History and Public Memory', Aedon 4, no. 1, November 1996: 12–26.

Nichols, Bill, Blurred Boundaries. Questions of Meaning in Contemporary Culture, Bloomington, IN and Indianapolis, IN: Indiana University Press, 1994.

Renov, Michael, 'Documentary Horizons: An Afterword', in Jane M. Gaines and Michael Renov (eds), Collecting Visible Evidence, Minneapolis, MN and London: University of Minnesota Press, 1999.

Summerhayes, Catherine, 'Moving Images: The Films of Tracey Moffatt—so far ...', in Lisa French (ed.), Women Vision: Women and the Moving Image in Australia, Melbourne: Damned Publishing, 2002.

Momma Don't Allow

(UK, Reisz, 1956)

One of the emblematic films of the Free Cinema group, Momma Don't Allow is a portrait of a jazz club in North London, with music provided by the Chris Barber Band. Jointly directed by two of the group's leading figures, Karel Reisz and Tony Richardson, and made with support from the British Film Institute's (BFI) Experimental Film Fund, it was included in the first Free Cinema programme in 1956.

Lindsay Anderson, the group's leading light, was always ready to admit that the term Free Cinema was a label of convenience, but as one of their handouts declared, these films were free 'in the sense that their statements are entirely personal' and 'produced outside the framework of the film industry [...] without obligation to subscribe to the technical or social conventions imposed on work under commercial conditions' (Lovell and Hillier 1972: 136). As the film critic

Alexander Walker concluded, they represented themselves as a challenge to orthodoxy, but as long as their films remained closer to essays rather than revolutionary pamphlets, they were not considered a political danger (Walker 1974: 33).

Momma Don't Allow exemplifies the characteristics of the group in several respects, including its 'personal' treatment of unfamiliar subject matter representing the candid portrayal of the contemporary world, here without the mediation of a commentary. On this occasion, however, the segment of the world portrayed is not one to which the filmmakers were social outsiders, but one in which, as young members of the artistic community of the capital city, they might expectedly participate. The Chris Barber Band was at the centre of the traditional jazz revival of the 1950s, which was one of the defining features of taste for a generation. A few years later Richardson included Barber's trumpet playing in his first feature film, Look Back in Anger.

The filmmakers adopt a sociological approach reminiscent of the work of Humphrey Jennings, beginning with introductions to a range of characters who finish their day's work and set out for the club: a female railway cleaner, a butcher's boy, a dentist's nurse—all cross-cut with the band setting up in the room at the pub that serves as the club's venue. The shooting is agile (though not as daring as Richard Leacock filming a similar subject in New York a year or two earlier), and the editing expertly disguises the fact that the film is shot without synchronous sound. It is all beautifully done, including a delicate moment when a couple who have had a tiff make up in a corridor. It is here that the film betrays its transitional status between the old style of constructed documentary and a new free form to which the group aspired, but that was not yet quite within their grasp. However, this can also be read another way: if these episodes are necessarily set up for the camera, they also hint at ambitions towards a new tone for realist fiction that both directors went on to realise in their early feature films.

MICHAEL CHANAN

See also: Reisz, Karel

Momma Don't Allow (UK, British Film Institute Experimental Film Fund, 1956, 22 mins).

Directed by Karel Reisz and Tony Richardson. Photographed by Walter Lassally. Sound and editing by John Fletcher.

Further reading

- Durnat, Raymond, 'Loved One', Films and Filming 12, no. 5, February 1966: 19–23.
 Ellis, John (ed.), 1951–76: British Film Institute Productions, London: British Film Institute, 1977.
 Lovell, Alan and Hillier, Jim, Studies in Documentary, London: Secker and Warburg/BFI, 1972.
 Walker, Alexander, Hollywood, England, The British Film Industry in the Sixties, London: Michael Joseph, 1974.
 Welsh, James M. and Tibbetts, John C. (eds), The Cinema of Tony Richardson: Essays and Interviews, New York: State University of New York, 1999.

Mondo Cane

(Italy, Jacopetti, 1962)

An immensely popular and influential compilation documentary that problematises, and effectively collapses, the boundaries separating fiction from nonfiction filmmaking practices, Mondo Cane/A Dog's Life initiated its own subgenre of 'Mondo Films' (or 'Shockumentaries', as they were affectionately referred to by fans), begat a wave of imitators, and has proven formative for such diverse pop- and pseudo-documentary traditions as the 'snuff' film, the mockumentary, hardcore pornography, execution videos, and even reality television. Purporting to subscribe to the adage that 'truth can be stranger than fiction', all the while betraying its own principles by presenting often misleading voice-over commentary and manipulated (if not wholly faked) footage, Gualtiero Jacopetti's sensationalist travelogue-cum-nature film set out to 'shock the audience with its exposé of bizarre cultural behaviour, fluctuating from the exotic to the erotic to the undeniably repellant' (Kerekes and Slater 1998). Although fairly dated and only intermittently outrageous by today's far more cynical and raunchy viewing standards, Mondo Cane (pronounced car-nay) was an international box office hit at its initial release and resulted in a veritable cottage industry of derivative (though increasingly graphic) sequels and series that continue to attract audiences to this day, particularly in the home video market.

A one-time journalist and war correspondent who later provided acerbic commentary for an Italian newsreel corporation, Jacopetti found himself distressed with the saccharine voice-over narration he was hired to write for Luigi Vanzi's Il Mondo di notte/World By Night (1959) and Alessandro Blasetti's Europa di notte/European Nights (1959). These celebratory compilation films of popular nightclub acts gave Jacopetti the initial idea for Mondo Cane; only his documentary would showcase, and exploit, whenever possible, all that was lurid and sensational by contemporary Western standards. Persuading producer Angelo Rizzoli to fund his undertaking, Jacopetti travelled across Europe, Asia, North America, and Africa, with associates Paolo Cavara and Franco Proserpi, collecting assorted footage of tribal ceremonies (replete with topless African women, their heads and legs often cropped in order to focus attention on the breast area), extreme cruelty to animals, religious rituals involving cross-dressing and self-flagellation, and environmental catastrophes (notably a long and languorous look at the deleterious effects of atomic radiation on the wildlife of Bikini atoll). This random material, its common denominator nothing more—although nothing less—than Jacopetti's conviction that seeing it would shock and titillate viewers, was then assembled into a one hundred and five-minute episodic whole, the various segments connected by the thinnest of associative links. (One cut takes the viewer from a dog cemetery in Pasadena, California to a restaurant in Taiwan that specialises in fresh dog meat; another cut takes us from a religious sect in Rome that periodically honours the bones of victims of the Black Plague, to a Hamburg beer-house in which the spectacle of drunken men and women flailing around, getting into fights, and falling asleep on the street supposedly demonstrates how 'a rather desperate concentration on the cult of life distracts the Germans from the memory of the cult of death'.)

Along with its bloated orchestral score (the theme song, 'More', actually became something of a hit on the pop charts, winning a Grammy Award for Best Instrumental Theme and garnering an Oscar nomination for Best Song), the film's pretentious and heavily ironic voice-over commentary became key ingredients of the Mondo film cycle to follow. The opening words of Mondo Cane are privileged by appearing as text on the screen in addition to being spoken by narrator Stefano Sibaldi: 'All the scenes you will see in this film are true and are taken only from life. If often they are shocking, it is because there are many shocking things in this world. Besides, the duty of the chronicler is not to sweeten the truth but to report it objectively.' Even if it were the case that the scenes then presented were 'true' in the sense of being detached and unbiased recordings of actual events—which they clearly are not (the only question concerns precisely which footage is real, which is reconstructed, which is completely staged, and which is otherwise manipulated)—Mondo Cane can still be charged with breaking its promise, as its reportage is anything but 'objective'. Besides dishing out the occasional piece of gross misinformation (for example, the male members of a mountain-dwelling clan in Papua New Guinea are called 'the last cavemen'), Sibaldi's voice-over narration, co-authored by Jacopetti and Cavara, is haughty and condescending in both content and tone. This narration sometimes takes on racist dimensions, as native peoples are regularly referred to as 'barbarians' and 'savages', and a Catholic mission fifty miles north of Geroka in the South Pacific is identified as 'the last outpost of civilization' to distinguish it from the tribal communities located nearby.

Complicating any straightforwardly xenophobic reading of the film, however, are its segments ridiculing various Western cultural practices. So we enter a gourmet restaurant in New York that serves an assortment of fried insects to its wealthy clientele, and tour with a gaggle of American senior citizens who seem eager to waste their retirement savings on a hokey Hawaiian vacation package. In this respect, and despite the sometimes objectionable narration, the creators of Mondo Cane finally come across as equal opportunity exploiters. By the end, and as the film's alternative title declares, it does indeed seem like we are watching 'a dog's life' (Mondo Cane translates literally as 'World of Dogs').

The Mondo Film can be credited, and criticised, for being the first documentary-style genre to cater specifically to the most voyeuristic and puerile, even sadistic, desires of modern viewers. In a 1964 essay for The Atlantic Monthly, Pauline Kael lamented the apparent fact that contemporary 'audiences [...] enjoy the shocks and falsifications, the brutal series of titillations of a Mondo Cane, one thrill after another, don't care any longer about the conventions of the past, and are too restless and apathetic to pay attention to motivations and complications, cause and effect. They want less effort, more sensations, more knobs to turn'. While the promise of showcasing increasingly bizarre and graphic sexual behaviour in the Mondo Film went by the wayside after the 1972 release of Deep Throat and the subsequent rise of hardcore porn, Mondo Cane's legacy is apparent today in the seemingly endless parade of filmic and televised material that claims (often with tongue held firmly in cheek) to be presenting 'true' footage of real-life cruelty, violence, disaster, death, and perversity.

STEVEN JAY SCHNEIDER

Selected films

- 1959 Europa di notte/European Nights (director Alessandro Blasetti)
- 1959 Il Mondo di notte/World By Night (director Luigi Vanzi)
- 1962 Mondo Cane/A Dog's Life (director Gualtiero Jacopetti; associate director Paolo Cavara and Franco Proserpi)
- 1963 La Donna nel mondo/Women of the World (directors Paolo Cavara and Gualtiero Jacopetti)
- 1964 Mondo Cane 2/Mondo Pazzo (directors Gualtiero Jacopetti and Franco Proserpi)
- 1966 Africa Addio/Farewell Africa (UK video title), or Africa Blood and Guts (USA cut version) (directors Gualtiero Jacopetti and Franco Proserpi)
- 1975 Ultime grida dalla savana: la grande caccia/Savage Man ... Savage Beast (directors Antonio Climati and Mario Morra)
- 1978 Faces of Death (director Conan le Cilaire)
- 1995 Executions (directors David Herman, Arun Kumar, and David Monaghan)

Further reading

- Black, Joel, 'Real(ist) Horror: From Execution Videos to Snuff Films', in Xavier Mendik and Steven Jay Schneider (eds), Underground USA: Filmmaking Beyond the Hollywood Canon, London: Wallflower Press, 2003.
- Duggan, E.J.M., 'Review of Killing for Culture: An Illustrated History of Death Film from Mondo to Snuff', Scope: An Online Journal of Film Studies,

May 2000, www.nottingham.ac.uk/film/journal/bookrev/killing_for_culture.htm

- Hight, Craig and Roscoe, Jane, Faking It: Mock-documentary and the Subversion of Reality, Manchester: Manchester University Press, 2001.
- Jackson, Neil, 'Cannibal Holocaust, Realist Horror, and Reflexivity', Post Script: Essays in Film and the Humanities 21, no. 3, 2002.
- Kael, Pauline, 'Are Movies Going to Pieces?' Atlantic Monthly, December 1964, www.theatlantic.com/unbound/aandc/movies/movies2.htm
- Kerekes, David and Slater, David, Killing for Culture: An Illustrated History of Death Film from Mondo to Snuff, London: Creation Books, 1998.
- Tombs, Pete, Mondo Macabro: Weird & Wonderful Cinema Around the World, New York: St Martins/Griffin, 1998.

Montagu, Ivor

Although he is better remembered for his collaboration with feature filmmakers like Alfred Hitchcock and Sergei Eisenstein, Ivor Montagu has left his mark on the documentary too, as on so many areas of culture, science, and sports in which he was actively involved. Born into a wealthy Jewish banking family as the youngest son of Lord and Lady Swaythling, Montagu studied zoology at Cambridge. Here he moved in left-wing circles and published his first film reviews. Although he would never lose interest in zoology, he chose to enter the world of the cinema as a journalist after obtaining his degree. Returning from a visit to the Berlin film studios for The Times newspaper in 1924, Montagu met film actor Hugh Miller on the train. This meeting led to the establishment of the Film Society in London, based on the model of the already existing Stage Society. Its purpose was to present to members only films that for some reason or other did not get a commercial release. Among the founding members of the Film Society were film critic Iris Barry (later film archivist at the Museum of Modern Art) and film exhibitor Sidney Bernstein (later founder of Granada Television), and thanks to his personal network, Montagu was able to recruit George Bernard Shaw, H.G. Wells, Julian Huxley, J.B.S. Haldane, J.M. Keynes, and Anthony Asquith as 'shareholders'. Despite the animosity of the film trade and the occasional interference by the authorities, the Film Society became a huge success, not in the least because of the Soviet films, banned by the censor, that it managed to show from time to time. Montagu's lengthy visit to the new workers' and peasants' state in 1925, taking him from Leningrad to Tiflis, opened his eyes to the virtues of Communism, but he did not join the Communist Party of Great Britain (CPGB) until the early 1930s.

After his return to the United Kingdom, Montagu teamed up with filmmaker Adrian Brunel. The two earned a living by adapting foreign films for exhibition in British cinemas. In 1926 Montagu was asked to help out Alfred Hitchcock, then at the start of his career, with the titles for his film The Lodger. This successful collaboration would be continued in the 1930s, when Montagu acted as associate producer on such well-known Hitchcock thrillers as The Man Who Knew Too Much (1934) and The 39 Steps (1935). In 1927 Montagu joined the Gainsborough Studios, where Michael Balcon was in charge as producer. The next year he decided to set up his own company, Angle Pictures, and produce and direct three short comedies, based on stories by novelist H.G. Wells. Adapted by his son Frank Wells and featuring actress Elsa Lanchester, Blue Bottles, Day-Dreams, and The Tonic presented a mixture of avant-garde film idiom and old-fashioned slapstick, reflecting the taste of Film Society audiences. Commercially, however, they were flops.

In September 1929 Montagu was sent as a delegate of the Film Society to the International Congress of Independent Cinema in La Sarraz, Switzerland. There he befriended Soviet filmmaker Sergei Eisenstein, who was touring Western Europe with his companions Grigory Alexandrov and Eduard Tisse to study the sound film. The three Russians were invited to the United Kingdom by the Film Society, which managed to present an uncensored version of Battleship Potemkin for the occasion. Next Montagu and his wife Eileen Hellstern (commonly known as 'Hell') accompanied Eisenstein and company on their trip to the United States, following an offer by the Paramount Studios. When the Hollywood company turned down the scripts of Sutter's Gold and An American Tragedy, which he had cowritten with Eisenstein and Alexandrov, Montagu returned home instead of following the Russians to Mexico.

Back in the United Kingdom Montagu tried his hand at various translations, including two collections of writings of Soviet filmmaker Vsevolod Pudovkin, Film Technique and Film Acting, which were highly influential among young filmmakers. He formed part of the team that organised, on behalf of the mastermind of Communist propaganda Willy Műnzenberg, the 'Counter Trial' in London in September 1933 to prove Nazi culpability regarding the Reichstag fire. In that same year he returned to the film industry, to work with producer Michael Balcon at Gaumont-British—and not, as was fashionable among left-wing artists and intellectuals, with John Grierson's documentary film unit at the Empire Marketing Board. In fact, Montagu was highly critical of the work of the documentary movement, and of its 'godfather' Robert Flaherty in particular. At Gaumont-British Montagu did script and edit, together with Geoffrey Barkas, the Academy Award-winning documentary Wings over Everest, based on footage shot by an RAF crew while flying over the heights of the Himalayas. He was also among the founding members of the Association of Cine-Technicians (ACT). An active member, he served for many years on the council of this film technicians' trade union, which was to play such an important role in the British film industry.

Montagu's expertise on film censorship, much of it laid down in his pamphlet The Political Censorship of Films (1929), was highly appreciated by the nascent workers' film movement. A central role was played by Kino, which had started in 1933 as a Film Section of the Workers' Theatre Movement but was soon to develop into a proper distribution company for 16mm (sub-standard), left-wing films. It ran into trouble over the exhibition of Eisenstein's Battleship Potemkin, which had been banned by the British Board of Film Censors, in Jarrow, a 'distressed' Tyneside town notorious for its high unemployment. Montagu enlisted the services of the National Council of Civil Liberties (NCCL) to help out Kino and the Boldon Colliery Miners' Hall. As he had pointed out in his pamphlet, the 1909 Cinematograph Act applied only to films on inflammable stock. Therefore a print of Battleship Potemkin on 16mm non-inflammable stock could be screened on any premises as long as these were not licensed under the 1909 Act. The NCCL lawyers had no problem proving this in court, and consequently the charges against both Kino and the Boldon Colliery Hall were dismissed. This result was an enormous boost to the distribution of left-wing films on 16mm in the United Kingdom. Typically, Montagu decided instead to concentrate on the distribution of the few left-wing films available on 35mm. For this purpose he set up the Progressive Film Institute (PFI, a pun on the recently founded British Film Institute), with his wife Hell manning the office. Among the PFI's customers were some miners' cinemas in South Wales and art house theatres in London and Glasgow.

In support of the work of the Relief Committee for the Victims of German Fascism, the PFI adapted an American documentary on the German Communist leader Ernst Thaelmann. Under the title Free Thaelmann (1935), this eighteen-minute film was distributed on 35mm by the PFI and on 16mm by Kino. In November 1936 Montagu left for Madrid, where it seemed that the Republican forces would be overrun at any moment by the Nationalist insurgents led by General Franco. He was accompanied by Norman McLaren, a young graduate from the Glasgow School of Arts, who earlier that year had made Hell Unltd, an impressive antiwar film. Kodak had made available two 16mm cameras and even some new colour stock, with which the two filmed the havoc caused by Italian airplanes, the activities of the Republican army and the International Brigade, and the relief work undertaken in Great Britain. Being partisan, silent, and lasting only half an hour turned out to be no problem for Defence of Madrid. All over the United Kingdom audiences flocked to see the film, which was distributed by Kino. Thus Defence of Madrid raised £6,000 for Spanish aid.

Through its connections with the Republican government, the PFI had access to other film material from Spain. English-language versions were made by either sticking to the original (for example, Non-Intervention, on the proof of Italian intervention found after the battle of Guadalajara) or using the material to compile a totally new film (for example, News from Spain, with a commentary spoken by Isabel Brown, whose fame for emptying people's purses for Spain was legendary). After a while it was thought that it might be more effective from a propaganda point of view for the PFI to go to Spain and make some films there. Montagu was given £3,000 in cash to do so by the end of 1937. He recruited six members of the ACT, who were paid expenses only, to join him. On arrival in Barcelona in mid-January 1938, the crew was immediately treated to a series of air raids. In fact, the deteriorating military situation made the realisation of the films as planned impossible. Back in London after two months of filming in Spain, two twenty-minute campaign films could be edited from the footage: Spanish ABC (director, Thorold Dickinson), presenting the Republican Government's literacy campaign, which was being pursued under the most difficult circumstances, and Behind the Spanish Lines (director Sidney Cole), showing how democracy worked in Spain and how Italy and Germany were making a farce of 'Non-Intervention'. In Barcelona Montagu had been given the opportunity to film with a hidden microphone (in those days observers did not automatically associate filming with the recording of sound) German and Italian prisoners of war being interrogated about their presence in Spain. Their confessions offered conclusive proof that their native countries were knowingly violating the Non-Intervention agreement. Montagu edited this footage into a four-minute, 35mm newsreel film, Prisoners Prove Intervention in Spain, which he persuaded some fifty cinemas all over the United Kingdom to show. Under the sarcastic title Testimony of Non-Intervention, a thirty-minute version was also released. However, Montagu's efforts to present the film at government level as irrefutable evidence of the violation by Germany and Italy of the Non-Intervention agreement failed.

From 1936 onwards Montagu was working as a journalist on the Daily Worker, the CPGB's newspaper. Inevitably, the Party decided to make use of his qualities as a filmmaker. With a camera crew he covered the XVth Congress of the CPGB in Birmingham. Held in September 1938, it was overshadowed by the Munich Crisis. The ten-minute sound film XVth Congress was clearly destined for a Communist audience, but a subsequent PFI production, Britain Expects, was aimed at the broadest possible audience. This film set out to show how the lives of British seamen were endangered as a consequence of the government's policy on Spain. The theatrical version was censored of the vital fact about the intervention of Germany and Italy. Britain Expects served on the unsuccessful election campaign of the Duchess of Atholl, a staunch supporter of Republican Spain. In January 1939 Montagu got together an ACT crew to film the homecoming of the British members of the International Brigade at the Empress Hall in London, but the footage was never edited into a proper film.

Late in 1938 Montagu was approached by the CPGB to make a thirty-minute film to be used during the forthcoming General Election. Its central theme was the defeat of the Chamberlain government. Entitled Peace and Plenty, it was an audiovisual adaptation of General Secretary Harry Pollitt's report at the XVth Congress of the CPGB, bearing similarities to Jean Renoir's French Communist election film La Vie est à nous (1936). It made effective use of stills and stock footage to ridicule members of the Chamberlain government. The mother of actress Elsa Lanchester made a puppet of Chamberlain especially for the film, while well-known bandleader Van Phillips wrote the music free of charge. It was Montagu's idea to end Peace and Plenty with a sequence in colour, to startle the spectators so that they would listen to what Communist leader Harry Pollitt had to say. Unfortunately, it turned out to be too expensive to have the colour sequence included in the distribution prints. A powerful indictment of the Chamberlain government, breaking completely with the realist conventions that dominated British documentary in the 1930s, Peace and Plenty was shown from March 1939 onwards in Communist circles and much appreciated. Because of the outbreak of World War II, however, the elections for which it was meant were postponed until 1945. By then the film's message had inevitably become obsolete.

Apart from journalistic work, Montagu was occupied during the war with the release of Russian films in the United Kingdom. After the German invasion of the Soviet Union in 1941, he set up the Soviet Film Agency for this purpose. Later Michael Balcon offered him work at the Ealing Studios, of which he had been in charge since 1939. Using stills, diagrams, and cartoons (not unlike Peace and Plenty) and a commentary spoken by Julian Huxley, Montagu refuted Nazi race theories in a short, government-sponsored documentary Man, One Family (1945). Also at Ealing he worked as a scriptwriter on Scott of the Antarctic (1948) and associate producer on Another Shore (1949). The Cold War forced him to wind up the Soviet Film Agency and the PFI. A part of the latter's film library and some modest financial benefits were bequeathed to Plato Films, a company founded in 1951 by Montagu's protégé Stanley Forman to distribute films from the socialist world. A similar outfit, Contemporary Films, established around the same time by Charles Cooper, could also count on Montagu's support. During the heyday of the Cold War his contacts (as a member of the World Peace Council or chairman of the International Table Federation) across the Iron Curtain were highly appreciated by his ACT colleagues, even by those who did not share his political views.

Plans for a new CPGB election film in 1960–1, scripted by Montagu along the lines of Peace and Plenty, failed to materialise because of the costs. The Pelican publication Film World (1964) offered Montagu the opportunity to present his personal views on the cinema, rather than those of Pudovkin or Eisenstein, whose writings he had so loyally translated to a large audience. Stating that 'documentary is not per se truer or nobler than "story" film', he distanced himself from the prevalent Griesonian discourse. Montagu's contacts with the SED leadership in East Germany led to a British-GDR coproduction on the occasion of the fiftieth anniversary of Labour Monthly. Entitled Fifty Fighting Years (1972), this forty-five minute documentary was scripted by Montagu, Forman, and Roger Woddis and directed by Forman and Roland Bischoff. It featured the recollections of veteran Communists Rajani Palme Dutt and Robin Page Arnot, illustrated with rare archive footage. Although this was the last film production in which he was actively involved, Montagu continued to write on film (he was a regular contributor to Sight and Sound) and give his support to the reemerging left-wing film culture until his death in 1984.

BERT HOGENKAMP

Biography

Born in London, April 23, 1904. Educated at Westminster School, the Royal College of Science, London, and King's College, Cambridge. Founding member and first president of the Film Society 1925. Founding member of the International Table Tennis Federation in 1926 and its first president until 1967. Companion to Eisenstein during his visit to the United States 1930–1. Founding member of the Association of Cine-Technicians 1933. Founder of the Progressive Film Institute 1934. Journalist at the Daily Worker 1936–41. Visits to Spain, November–December 1936 and January–March 1938. Founder of the Soviet Film Agency 1941. Awarded the Lenin Peace Prize 1959. Died in London, November 5, 1984.

Selected films

- 1934 Wings over Everest: director (with Geoffrey Barkas)
- 1936 Defence of Madrid: director, cameraman
- 1938 Spanish ABC: producer
- 1938 Behind the Spanish Lines: producer
- 1938 Prisoners Prove Intervention in Spain: producer, editor
- 1938 Testimony on Non-Intervention: producer, editor
- 1938 Britain Expects: producer, editor
- 1939 Peace and Plenty: director
- 1945 Man, One Family: director
- 1973 Fifty Fighting Years: scriptwriter

Further reading

- Hogenkamp, Bert, Deadly Parallels: Film and the Left in Britain 1929–39, London: Lawrence & Wishart, 1986.
- Film, Television and the Left in Britain, 1950–70, London: Lawrence & Wishart, 2000.
- n.a., ‘Interview: Ivor Montagu’, Screen 13, no. 3, autumn 1972: 71–113.
- Montagu, Ivor, Film World: A Guide to Cinema, Harmondsworth: Pelican Books, 1964.
- The Youngest Son: Autobiographical Sketches, London: Lawrence & Wishart, 1970.
- With Eisenstein in Hollywood, Berlin-GDR: Seven Seas Publishers, 1968.

Monterey Pop

(US, Leacock, Pennebaker, 1968)

In capturing the events of the three-day 1967 Monterey Pop Music Festival, filmmaker D.A. (Donn Alan) Pennebaker (1925–) pioneered the ‘rockumentary’ genre later exemplified by films such as Woodstock (Michael Wadleigh, 1970), Gimme Shelter (David and Albert Maysles and Charlotte Zwerin, 1970), and The Last Waltz (Martin Scorsese, 1979). Pennebaker’s work is often associated with the American incarnation of cinéma vérité, the direct cinema movement of the 1960s, in which light, handheld cameras were used to capture action directly (and often in intimate close-up), without narration or apparent intrusion or participation on the part of the filmmaker. Following Primary (1960), a direct cinema documentary about John F. Kennedy and Hubert Humphrey locked in the struggle for votes in the 1960 Wisconsin presidential primary election, Pennebaker made his first foray into music documentaries with Dont Look Back (1967), a film about Bob Dylan’s 1965 tour of Great Britain.

As he had done in Dont Look Back, Pennebaker attempted to make Monterey Pop more than just a filmed record of the concert’s musical performances from the perspective of the audience. The film does not have the strong sociological focus of Wadleigh’s later Woodstock, but an effort is made at capturing the entirety of the concert atmosphere and, more broadly, the emerging youth counterculture of 1960s California. Thus, the film’s musical sequences are sometimes intertwined with footage that seems to have little to do with music: local police voicing concerns about the Hell’s Angels and Black Panthers attending the concert, frolicking flower children with painted faces and day-glow buses, festival goers camping out on the football field of a nearby high school. In most cases, however, such as the opening sequence that depicts the hectic preparations for the event beneath a soundtrack featuring Scott McKenzie’s peaceful ballad ‘[If You’re Going to] San Francisco’, even the nonperformance footage is presented with a soundtrack consisting of music from the festival. The overall effect links the visual record of the festival’s activities and its music almost seamlessly.

It is the performances themselves and Pennebaker’s rendering of them that make Monterey Pop truly memorable. Although Bob Dylan’s irreverent backstage demeanor had provided much of the interest a few years earlier in Dont Look Back, the filmmaker was quick to realize that by the end of the 1960s, rock music was becoming more and more visual, and that a psychedelic era rock documentary should explore the spectacle, as well as the sound of the performance. Thus, film viewers are treated to the full gamut of the concert performance not accessible to a listening audience: the surreal, acid-tinged stage countenance of Country Joe and the Fish, and the psychedelic light shows accompanying Jefferson Airplane, Hugh Masekela, and The Animals. Other, more shocking, visual images include Pete Townshend smashing his guitar at the end of The Who’s ‘My Generation’, only to be outdone by Jimi Hendrix ritually setting fire to his guitar before smashing it at the end of ‘Wild Thing’.

Pennebaker's handheld cameras seldom settle on the performers in a standard, straightforward fashion. Often, the camera drifts away from stars and focuses instead on backup musicians—drummers, keyboard players, and background vocalists. Just as often, close-ups of individual members of the festival's audience fill the screen. In several instances the camera captures the reactions of the musicians themselves as audience members, such as Mama Cass Elliot's expression of awe as she takes in Janis Joplin's performance of 'Ball and Chain', and Jimi Hendrix's reverent attention to the Indian sitar master Ravi Shankar.

Such expressions of mutual admiration among the musicians, in which the traditional barriers between East and West, pop and rock, audience and the performer are broken down, underscore the key theme emerging from Pennebaker's film—love and community among the youth counterculture of the 1960s. Although cinéma vérité and direct cinema generally place a high value on objectivity and look with distain on artificially shaping film footage to produce a desired impression by the audience, in the final analysis 'reality' must always be shaded by the filmmaker. Throughout Monterey Pop, Pennebaker subtly but insistently introduces the theme of love and community. From the opening statements of audience members, in which one young woman predicts that the event would be 'a big love-in', to the serene shots of California hippies dancing, embracing, and camping in communal teepees, to performers like Otis Redding referring to the audience as 'the love crowd', Pennebaker idyllically captures the 1960s zeitgeist of peace, love, and brotherhood. It would be a theme that would be picked up and further embellished in Woodstock, turned on its head in Gimme Shelter, treated with nostalgia in The Last Waltz, and affectionately mocked in This is Spinal Tap. More important, Pennebaker's Monterey Pop provided a lively stylistic model for these and many other concert documentaries that would follow.

ROD PHILLIPS

See also: Dont Look Back; Gimme Shelter; Leacock, Richard; Pennebaker, D.A.; Woodstock: Three Days of Peace and Music

Monterey Pop (US, Leacock Pennebaker, Inc., 1968, 79 mins). Produced by John Phillips and Lou Adler. Directed by D.A. Pennebaker. Cinematography by James Desmond, Barry Feinstein, Richard Leacock, Albert Maysles, Roger Murphy, D.A. Pennebaker, and Nick Proferes. Sound recorded by Wally Heider. Music by Scott McKenzie, Mamas and Papas, Canned Heat, Simon and Garfunkel, Hugh Masekela, Jefferson Airplane, Big Brother and the Holding Company, Janis Joplin, Eric Burdon and the Animals, The Who, Country Joe and the Fish, Otis Redding, Jimi Hendrix, and Ravi Shankar. Editing by Nina Schulman. Filmed in Monterey, California.

Further reading

- Hall, Jeanne, "'Don't You Ever Just Watch?': American Cinema Verité and Dont Look Back", in Barry Keith Grant and Jeannette Slonowski (eds), Documenting the Documentary: Close Readings of Documentary Film and Video, Detroit, MI: Wayne State University Press, 1998: 223–37.
- Mamber, Stephen, Cinema Verité in America: Studies in Uncontrolled Documentary, Cambridge, MA: MIT Press, 1974.
- Pennebaker, D.A., 'Interview with Donn Alan Pennebaker', in G. Roy Levin (ed.), Documentary Explorations: 15 Interviews with Filmmakers, New York: Doubleday, 1971: 221–70.
- Rosenthal, Alan, The New Documentary in Action: A Case-book in Film Making, Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1971.
- Seldes, Hal, 'D.A. Pennebaker: The Truth at 24 Frames per Second', Avant-Garde, March 7, 1969: 46–9.

Moore, Michael

Michael Moore's Fahrenheit 9/11 (2004) became the most successful (and arguably most controversial) nonfiction film in history, earning more than $100 million in its first two months on release and turning its creator into a celebrity recognized as a one-man muckraking industry whose films, books, and public appearances were suggested by some to even be a factor in the 2004 election. Moore's films have frequently come under attack, especially by those he targets (General Motors tried to counter the charges in Roger & Me by distributing copies of negative reviews outside theatres), but with Fahrenheit 9/11 Moore's unique brand of populist agitprop became headline news.

Fahrenheit 9/11 ridicules the ineptness and incompetence of an American president by turning his own news footage and photo opportunities against him. Moore presents George W. Bush as a ideological puppet, so bored by the demands of his job that even delivering an anti-terrorism sound bite is considered a nuisance interrupting his golf game, and so unfit to lead that he reacts to the news of the World Trade Center attacks by sticking to the script of a packaged photo-op reading of a children's book called My Pet Goat to a group of Florida school-children.

Following in the footsteps of such filmmakers as Nick Broomfield and Ross McElwee, whose on-screen presence personalize their efforts to reveal a story, as well as archivists and collagists like Kevin and Pierce Rafferty, Moore's methods involve guerilla interview techniques, ironic use of stock footage and music, and, most significantly, the creation of an on-screen persona: a naive man with a baseball cap and a microphone who watches innocently while his interview subjects make fools of themselves. Moore's on-screen role is that of the average guy, a dumbstruck citizen who cannot believe that anybody would ever stop him from wandering into the office of the head of General Motors or the home of actor Charlton Heston. Acting more dumbfounded than outraged, he suggests that he is only asking the corporate heads (or more frequently their publicists and handlers) questions that any average American would put to them.

Moore's first film, Roger & Me, explored an economic crisis in his hometown of Flint, Michigan, after General Motors (GM) closed an auto production plant there. Rather than present a dry economic analysis, Moore presented a wide-ranging and free-wheeling portrait of a community where the wealthy spend their time in a dream world of country clubs and parties, the political forces mask their ineffectuality through frivolous public relations campaigns, and the middle and working classes are driven to selling blood or raising rabbits in their backyards to survive. The Roger of the title is GM executive Roger Smith, who dodges Moore's attempts to interview him throughout the film. As part of the promotional campaign for the film, Warner Brothers asked that every theatre playing it leave one vacant seat, just in case Smith wanted to drop in.

Roger & Me introduced Moore as a filmmaker provocateur, using methods that he would refine and polish on two television series, TV Nation and The Awful Truth. It also sparked attacks that would challenge each of his subsequent films. Moore's critics claim that his films are distorted and loose with facts, charges that he has answered on his website and elsewhere. He is also frequently criticized for using interviews as a form of attack, making his subjects look ridiculous. His defense is that most of the people in front of his camera are professional publicists or media figures and therefore fair game. This rationale does not entirely defend his methods, but it does point out the irony that those who have squealed most loudly about Moore's characterization have been those with the most media experience. However, if someone like Bob Eubanks, a television host with forty years of experience, chooses to tell a witless and anti-Semitic joke while a camera is running (in Roger & Me), it can hardly be blamed solely on Moore's interviewing technique.

The 2002 film Bowling for Columbine showed a willingness on Moore's part to move from the activist/populist stance of his television work to a larger and more extended critique of domestic issues. Sparked by the 1999 massacre at a Colorado high school, Moore's film uses that and other violent crimes to indict both the US obsession with guns and a political system that promotes paranoia and fear in its citizens. Predictably, the film's critics were more concerned with charging that the filmmaker had ambushed celebrity interviewees like NRA president Charlton Heston and TV producer Dick Clark, and that some of the more provocative segments, like a visit to a bank where guns are given away to anyone opening an account, were staged on Moore's behalf.

The success of Columbine and the resulting controversy (Moore was booed for making political remarks when he accepted an Academy Award) were little more than a prelude to the reception of Moore's follow-up, Fahrenheit 9/11, a relentless and scathing investigation of the Bush administration and the war in Iraq. Even after winning the grand prize at the Cannes Film Festival (the first documentary ever to do so), the producers, Miramax Films, were forbidden by their parent company, Disney, from releasing the film. By the time it hit theatres in the summer of an election year, 2004 (released by a consortium that bought out Miramax's interest), Moore's film had become as big a political story as the presidential race itself, dissected by news analysts, attacked from the stage of the Republican National Convention and even accused of violating election laws. The now-routine criticism of Moore's satirical approach and documentary ethics had become a subject of national interest.

Controversy aside, Fahrenheit 9/11 is Moore's most polemical film, a cry of outrage over the war and the deceptive policies that led to it. Though it remains, through the director's narration, a deeply personal statement, Moore diminishes his usual role as on-screen surrogate to rely instead on television feeds and news footage showing the Bush administration in unflattering situations. As in Roger & Me, Moore views the war from a middle-class perspective, with the most emotional segments coming through the presence of Lila Lipscomb, a Flint, Michigan woman who had gone from supporting the war to protesting it after her own son was killed in Iraq. Moore remains a satirist, but humor takes a back seat to indignation at the things that his targets of ridicule have perpetrated.

ROBERT HUNT

See also: Roger & Me

Biography

Born in Flint, Michigan, April 23, 1954. Elected to local school board aged eighteen. Founded newspaper, The Flint Voice, in 1976. Edited Mother Jones magazine 1986–7. Produced his first film, Roger & Me, with money raised by bingo games and from his settlement with Mother Jones. After success of Roger & Me, directed a fictional comedy, Canadian Bacon, in 1994. Produced TV series TV Nation 1994–5, and The Awful Truth 1999–2000. Author of Downsize This, Adventures in a TV Nation, Stupid White Men and Dude, Where's My Country? 2002 Academy Award-winner for Best Documentary, and a special jury prize at the 2002 Cannes Film Festival.

Moretti, Nanni

Nanni Moretti's cinema stands out in the panorama of contemporary art house filmmaking for its combination of fiction, autobiography, and sociopolitical documentary. Along with his fictional production, Moretti has to date authored one 'classical' documentary, La cosa/The Thing (1990), as well as four docufictions: the shorts L'unico paese al mondo-9/The Only Country in the World-9 (1994), and Il giorno della prima di Close-Up/Opening Day of Close-Up (1996), and two full-length films adopting a diary structure, Caro diario/Dear Diary (1994), and Aprile/April (1998).

On November 12, 1989, two days after the fall of the Berlin Wall, Achille Occhetto, leader of the Italian Communist Party (PCI), announced that the party would change its name, and the sobriquet la cosa, 'the thing', was adopted for the nameless party. This event was the apex of a long, difficult phase for Italian, as well as European Communism, deriving from the sociopolitical changes that in the course of the 1980s led to the dissolution of the Soviet bloc, and to the questioning of the basic ideological beliefs of the Left. Occhetto's contentious proposal brought PCI's grassroots members back to the cells to engage in a discussion that released repressed rage and disconcertion, but also passion and enthusiasm. Moretti, who had just finished a fiction film about the crisis of PCI, Palombella rossa/Red Wood Pigeon (1989), decided to shoot these animated discussions. The result is La cosa, a traditional documentary of montage, devoid of voice-over and captions bar those indicating the film's locations. Ideologically, La cosa is consistent with Palombella rossa, the emphasis being on the problem of re-describing seventy years in the political life of a community that had identified with ideals that were by now severely challenged, if not fading.

By ceding the entire screen time to the voters' words, Moretti shows that language is the nub of the problem: if the old metaphors are no longer able to describe the community, it is necessary to coin new, better-suited ones to give the community new life.

Whereas La cosa does not overtly investigate the thorny question of the filmic documenting of reality, Caro diario and Aprile carry the filmmaker's reflection on the relationship between fiction and nonfiction to high levels of sophistication. In all of his films Moretti plays the protagonist, but in Caro diario he uses his real name instead of the habitual pseudonym Michele Apicella. In the first of three episodes, Nanni rides his Vespa through the deserted streets of summertime Rome while listing the things he likes to do best; in the second he visits the Eolie Islands with a friend; in the third we are shown his struggle against Hodgkin's disease. In interviews, Moretti repeated that in this film he plays himself, or even that he is himself. Most critics took him at his word and talked of autobiography. The insertion in the third episode of Moretti's real-life chemotherapy treatment prompted critics to extend the statutes of documentary to the whole film: 'Having presented his brief documentary sequence, Moretti tells the rest of the story in flashback, simulating the rounds of medical visits and providing narrative continuity in voice-over. But the fact that we witnessed the chemotherapy session in newsreel form confers authority and gravity on the subsequent performance, for the body we see on screen is the same body that went through the ordeal to which we bore documentary witness' (Marcus 1996: 244).

Only a minority of critics questioned the authenticity of Moretti's self-portrait in Caro diario (Villa 1999), in spite of the fact that fiction in this film is amply prevalent, and that autobiography is itself a problematic genre for its ambiguous mix of memory and imagination, of document and personal reflection. Caro diario is best seen as the culmination of Moretti's previous work on the creation of a 'fictional autobiography', or even of a fiction that looks like a documentary on the life of citizen Nanni Moretti. In the previous films spectators were encouraged to think that Michele Apicella was the alter ego of the filmmaker through the reappearance of the same biographical details and personality traits in each film and the use of Moretti's family and friends as actors. With Caro diario it seemed as if Nanni went a step further and straightforwardly filmed himself and his life, although this film only intensified the effect of autobiography and documentary already achieved by his previous work. This view is confirmed by Aprile, the diary of Moretti's life, as well as of Italy at large, from the general election of March 1994, won by Silvio Berlusconi, to the next election two years later that saw the victory of the Left. In terms of autobiography, the film covers the pregnancy of Nanni's partner and the birth and first months of his child Pietro, as well as Nanni's reluctance to work on two films: a musical with a political slant, and a documentary about contemporary Italy. Aprile includes many scenes shot in Moretti's own house and office, with members of his family, friends, and collaborators, as well as documentary takes of the electioneering and other sociopolitical events. The autobiographical/documentary effect is challenged by the irony pervading the film, by the exaggeration and self-mockery of Moretti's behaviour, as well as by discrepancies between what Moretti says and what he shows. For instance, he announces that he will never allow his son to become an actor, but then 'casts' him in one of the film's main roles. The greatest discrepancy, though, is between Nanni's declared impotence in making a documentary about Italy, and the fact that Aprile is ultimately the documentary he claimed to be unable to make.

L'unico paese al mondo-9 and Il giorno della prima di Close-Up can also be described as short diaries. The first is the ninth episode of a collective film critical of Berlusconi's entry into the political arena. Nanni rides his Vespa through Paris, observing that Berlusconi tried in vain to make it in France, and commenting on the differences between the Italian and French bourgeoisie. In the second short, Moretti appears in his role as director of his cinema in Rome, the Nuovo Sacher. He meticulously prepares for the premiere of Abbas Kiarostami's Close-Up, advertising the film in the press, checking which sandwiches are sold in the cinema, coaching his staff to answer the spectators' questions, and discussing the volume of the sound with the projectionist. Both shorts present the same ambiguous mix of fiction, autobiographical effect, and documentary as the major diary films.

LAURA RASCAROLI

Biography

Born in Brunico (Bolzano, Italy), August 19, 1953. Joined the Italian water polo junior team 1970, and played in the Italian first division. Active in the extra-parliamentary Left 1970s. Founded with Angelo Barbagallo the production house Sacher Film 1987. Andre Labarthe dedicated to him an episode of Cinéma de notre temps (La Sept and Channel 4), 1990. Opened a cinema in Rome, the Nuovo Sacher, 1991. The Toronto Film Festival dedicated a retrospective to him 1993. Founded the Sacher Film Festival for shorts 1996. With Angelo Barbagallo, Roberto Cicutto, and Luigi Musini, founded the distribution company Tandem 1997. Lives in Rome.

Selected films

- 1990 La cosa/The Thing: director, producer, writer
 1994 Caro diario/Dear Diary: director, producer, writer, actor
 1994 L'unico paese al mondo-9/The Only Country in the World-9: director, producer, writer
 1996 Il giorno della prima di Close-Up/Opening Day of Close-Up: director, producer, writer, actor
 1998 Aprile/April: director, producer, writer, actor

Further reading

- Aspden, Peter, 'Caro diario (Dear Diary)', Sight and Sound, December 1994: 42–3.
 De Bernardinis, Flavio, Nanni Moretti, Milan: Il Castoro, 2001.
 Marcus, Millicent, 'Caro diario and the Cinematic Body of Nanni Moretti', Italica 73, 1996: 233–47.
 Porton, Richard and Ellickson, Lee, 'Comedy, Communism, and Pastry. An interview with Nanni Moretti', Cineaste 1–2, 1995: 11–15.
 Samuëli, Anna, 'L'unique pays au monde', Cahiers du Cinéma 479, no. 80, 1994: 66–7.
 Valens, Gregory, 'La cosa and La première de Close-Up', Positif 464, 1999: 174–5.
 Villa, Federica, 'Oggi farò delle belle riprese, sì, anche se mi vergogno un pò. Percorso nel raccontar leggero', in Nanni Moretti, Turin: Paravia Scriptorium, 1999.
 Wagstaff, Chris, 'Aprile', Sight and Sound, April 1999, 36.

Morin, Edgar

Edgar Morin, a French philosopher, sociologist, ecologist, and documentary film director, played a leading role in the cinéma vérité movement (based on the Russian movement Kino-Pravda led by Dziga Vertov) during the 1960s. Morin's theory of documentary film was developed in collaboration with the ethnographic filmmaker Jean Rouch.

Morin produced with Rouch the documentary Chronique d'un été/Chronicle of a Summer (1961), a significant and unique work. Chronique d'un été is set in Paris after the Algerian war. The film displayed a new documentary aesthetic, marked by a nonlinear structure, uninterrupted takes, and non-manipulated locations. The documentary focuses on the city of Paris and communicates the opinions of the directors regarding 1960s French society and culture. The new methods of documentary filmmaking displayed in Chronique d'un été exemplified cinéma vérité.

Several technical advancements and developments made it possible for documentary filmmakers to use their chosen medium to study societal developments and mores in great depth. These include the development of compact 16mm cameras, less dependence on artificial lighting, the use of real and synchronized sound, and an acceptance of filmmakers appearing in their own documentaries.

Chronique d'un été is a perfect example of a documentary film that incorporates nontraditional documentary filmmaking techniques to allow the film to better address the primary questions of the directors: How can I identify the differences between reality and fiction, objectivity, and subjectivity? Do those differences truly exist? How can I, as a director, transmit my vision to others? Morin and Rouch appear in front of the camera during the film, talking, explaining their thesis as scientists and artists, making evident their own point of view as directors, and at the same time learning new things about the French society throughout the entire production and interviews. This is a masterpiece and a door for the discussion between reality and fiction and the way to produce documentaries.

Cinéma vérité practitioners focused their efforts to renew the documentary language with more realistic characters, locations, and histories, without the use of make-up and trying to give to this style the most pure representation. The language, technique, structure, mounting, photography, characters, sound, and background all constructed this reality giving surprises and knowledge to the entire audience.

Morin's thinking was affected by the state of the world around him. He said:

History tells us that we have to reckon with the improbable. Historically speaking, I have twice lived through the victory of the improbable. First, with the defeat of Nazism in 1945, even though Germany's victory was probable in Europe in 1941; then, with the collapse of the Communist system in 1989–90. The worst is never certain; in the words of Hölderlin, ‘wherever danger grows, salvation grows too’, reminding us that danger will help us perhaps to find a way out, providing we become aware of it.

(Rapin 1977)

Morin did not produce any documentaries other than Chronique d’un été, but this accomplished film has a place in the history of documentary film.

CATALINA CERON

See also: Chronique d’un été; Rouch, Jean; Vertov, Dziga

Biography

Born in Paris, France July 8, 1921. Studied history, geography, and law. Served during World War II 1942–4. Received honorary degrees from the University of Perugia, the University of Palermo, the University of Geneva, and the University of Brussels. Investigator for the CNRS (National Center for Scientific Research) 1950–89. Director of the magazine Arguments 1956–62. Director of the magazine Communications. President of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization’s (UNESCO) European Agency of Culture. His books include: L’Homme et la mort, 1951; Le Cinéma ou l’homme imaginaire, 1956; L’Esprit du temps, 1962–76; Introduction à une politique de l’homme, 1965; Le Paradigme perdu: la nature humaine, 1973; Pour sortir du XXe siècle, 1981; Penser l’Europe, 1987; Terre-Patrie, 1993; Mes démons, 1994; La Complexité humaine, 1994; Amor poésie sagesse, 1997; Une politique de civilisation, 1997; La tête bien faite, 1999; Relier les connaissances, 2000; Les sept savoirs nécessaires à l’éducation du futur (Seven Complex Lessons in Education for the Future) 2001; Journal de Plozevet, 2001; Méthode, l’humanité de l’humanité, 2001; Pour une politique de civilisation, 2002.

Selected film

1961 Chronique d’un été: codirector (with Jean Rouch)

Further reading

Barnouw, Eric, A History of the Non-fiction Film, Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1992.

Freyer, Ellen, ‘Chronicle of a Summer—Ten Years Later’, in Lewis Jacobs (ed.), The Documentary Tradition: From Nanook to Woodstock, New York: Hopkinson and Blake, 1971.

Kofman, Miron and Reader, Keith, Edgar Morin, London: Pluto Press, 1996.

Morin, Edgar, The Film or the Imaginary Man, Paidós, 2001.

Rapin, Anne, Interview with Edgar Morin, Label France Magazine Humanities no. 28, 1977.

Reader, Keith and Powrie, Philip, French Cinema: A Student’s Guide, Oxford: Oxford University, 2003.

Sadoul, George, Dictionary of Films, Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1972.

—Historia del Cine Mundial—Desde los Origenes, Siglo XXI, 1992.

Morris, Errol

Errol Morris is an American documentarist who represents the subjectivity of perception through a combination of interview and dramatic illustration. Morris is more interested in the psychological and perceptual grounds for human behaviour than the procedural details. He focuses on unusual people in particular circumstances or environs that he examines not for observational or expositional purposes, but because of his interviewees’ distinctive worldviews. He is concerned with mortality and motivation and is therefore interested in individuals whose unique perspectives on life and death (and often their lack of perspective on themselves) inform his exploration of the schism between personal truth and socially determined reality. His aim in these films is to deconstruct notions of absolute truth and infallible knowledge by emphasising the relativity of people’s experiences of human existence.

Morris’s distinctive use of the interview was developed in his two first films, Gates of Heaven (1978) and Vernon, Florida (1981), in which monologues of up to several minutes were presented without interruption. He did not change camera angles and only rarely used cutaways to illustrate points of information while people were speaking, allowing his subjects to reveal more of themselves than was necessary for narrative alone. By refusing to provide visual distraction, Morris compelled viewers to listen more carefully and to study the face, body language, and immediate environment of the interviewee. As there was often no narrative function in their utterances, hearing the flow of their language and observing how their thoughts unfolded was just as important as knowing what they said. Consequently, a rich sense of the people and their environment emerged. The resultant assemblage of personal perspectives gave greater depth to stories that might otherwise have seemed trivial, namely in the first case the lives of those affected by two Californian pet cemeteries, and in the second the peculiar lives and views of the residents of an enclosed community in rural Florida.

The Thin Blue Line (1988) seems, on the face of it, to be Morris's most atypical film, an investigative documentary that successfully challenged the case against a man convicted of the murder of a police officer in 1976. In spite of its generic familiarity and its incorporation of the stylistic and structural conventions of the thriller, it is yet another exploration of subjective perspective. The use of dramatic reconstruction to stage and restage the murder based on the testimony of different individuals was merely another tool that allowed the director to problematise notions of an absolute truth. 'Truth isn't guaranteed by style or expression', he argues, 'It isn't guaranteed by anything' (Bruzzi 2000).

Morris' approach to the adaptation of Stephen Hawking's A Brief History of Time (1992) was equally representative of lateral thinking. Seeing the book as 'a thinly disguised romance novel' about Professor Hawking's relationship with the universe, Morris made the film as a combination of biography and science lesson. It sought to explain how this unique individual came to have such a singular perspective on reality and how that perspective informed his work. Morris's rejection of the stylistic conventions of documentary went even further in this film than in The Thin Blue Line. Surreal, often absurdist imagery was used to illustrate Hawking's theories, while studio sets were built to accommodate the friends and family who related stories from the professor's life. The physical environment itself had become relative in a film that embodied and represented how the conceptual can and does exceed the constraints of the physical.

In Fast, Cheap, and Out of Control (1997) Morris began to develop what he would later term 'first person cinema', an attempt to allow remarkable individuals to tell their own stories free from the necessity to provide context in social, political, economic, or religious discourse. The film was a multilayered exploration of the lives of four people: a lion tamer, a topiary gardener, a robot builder, and a breeder of mole-rats. It mixed observation and speculation, interviews and abstract imagery, and even incorporated different film and video formats. Morris was drawn to these people because of their immersion in their own private universes, and he celebrated their common concern with primal themes of human existence: life, death, reproduction, and self-expression.

In Mr Death: The Rise and Fall of Fred A. Leuchter, Jr (1999), the director was compelled to take a different attitude toward his subject's exclusion of a sense of external context. The film told the story of an eccentric designer of execution equipment whose belief in his own expertise had led him to the conclusion that the Nazis could not have carried out mass executions at Auschwitz. The first version of the film, shown to students at Harvard, presented Leuchter's worldview without explicit commentary. Morris felt that Leuchter's basic oddness was evidence enough that his perspective was subjective and his conclusions of questionable veracity. Many of those who saw the film at first did not agree; it was too easy to be immersed in Leuchter's world and lose touch with an 'objective' perspective. Morris subsequently reshot substantial portions of the film. He included interviews with people who disagreed with Leuchter and presented evidence to prove his theories were very much his own.

Morris's subsequent work includes a series of shorts compiled under the title First Person (2000) for broadcast on the UK's Channel 4. The films use the director's trademark interviewing machine, christened 'the interrotron', to represent and embody his attitude to documentary as a process of human communication. The interrotron is a live recording and feedback system derived from a standard teleprompter. Interviewees look directly into the camera and see an image of Morris looking directly back at them, which is filmed by another camera located elsewhere. This device allows his subjects to retain direct eye contact with the audience when the footage is broadcast, which increases the sense of connection between human beings. For Morris, this is the cornerstone of a truly first-person cinema, which will contribute to a broader understanding of the subjective experience of shared external reality.

In 2003 Morris presented The Fog of War: Eleven Lessons from the Life of Robert S.

McNamara. McNamara, who served as Secretary of Defense under Presidents John F. Kennedy and Lyndon B. Johnson, looks back on his career and the major political events of his tenure and the twentieth century. Morris won the 2004 Academy Award for Best Documentary Feature for The Fog of War.

HARVEY O'BRIEN

Biography

Born Hewlett, Long Island, New York, February 5, 1948. Studied and played cello at the Putney School, Vermont. Graduated from University of Wisconsin, Madison, reading history, in 1969. Undertook graduate studies at Princeton and University of California at Berkeley but did not submit a doctoral thesis. Undertook an independent research project interviewing and studying mass murderers and became involved with the Pacific Film Archive as an assistant programmer. Recipient of three fellowships from the National Endowment for the Arts, a Guggenheim Fellowship, and a MacArthur Fellowship. Currently lives in Cambridge, Massachusetts with wife, Julia Sheehan, an art historian, and son, Hamilton.

Selected films

- 1978 Gates of Heaven
- 1981 Vernon, Florida
- 1988 The Thin Blue Line
- 1992 A Brief History of Time
- 1997 Fast, Cheap, and Out of Control
- 1999 Mr Death: The Rise and Fall of Fred A. Leuchter, Jr
- 2000 First Person
- 2003 The Fog of War: Eleven Lessons from the Life of Robert S. McNamara

Further reading

Details and reprints of interviews with Errol Morris can be found at: www.errolmorris.com
 Arthur, Paul, 'Jargons of Authenticity', in Michael Renov (ed.), Theorizing Documentary, London and New York: Routledge, 1993.
 Bruzzi, S., New Documentary. A Critical Introduction, London: Routledge, 2000: 6.
 Gordon, Ian E., Theories of Visual Perception, Chichester, New York, Brisbane, Toronto, and Singapore: Wiley & Sons, 1989.

Paget, Derek, No Other Way to Tell It: Dramadoc/Documentary on Television, Manchester and New York: Manchester University Press, 1998.

Rabiger, Michael, Directing the Documentary, Boston and London: Focal Press, 1992.

Williams, Linda, 'Mirrors without Memories: Truth, History, and The Thin Blue Line', in Barry Keith Grant and Jeannette Sloniowski (eds), Documenting the Documentary: Close Readings of Documentary Film and Video, Detroit, MI: Wayne State University Press, 1998.

Moullet, Luc

Luc Moullet was only nineteen years old when he was offered the opportunity to write reviews for Cahiers du cinéma, a fashionable film magazine, then right-wing but nonconformist and hostile to cinematic establishment. Moullet's humorous papers were much appreciated, and his review of Godard's Breathless helped to give the French New Wave its theoretical framework. The films Moullet directed from 1961 through 1968 were fictions verging into parody, with odd characters mixed up in muddled, uncanny situations. The events of May 1968 brought about significant change in the editorial board of Cahiers, which adopted a more political, doctrinaire stance, leading Moullet to distance himself from the review and to collaborate with more conventional cinema magazines.

Considering that he was only one among millions like him and that his views and deeds offered an insight into the problems and concerns of contemporary society, Moullet decided that he and his companion, Antonietta Pizzorno, would play their own part in his films: 'my presence', he noted, 'indicates the documentary character of my films'. At the same time he came to the conclusion that sophisticated shots and an elaborate editing process were uselessly expensive. With a more casual treatment, a fixed camera, and no ornamental musical score, films would attract fewer people, but, being cheaper, they would be profitable. Some criticised Moullet for his 'amateurism' and the poor quality of his images; others thought that by contriving an original style combining actual scenes with reenacted ones he had reinvigorated the documentary tradition, which, they contended, had become rather humdrum. The classical distinction between shorts and feature-length films does not apply to Moullet who was totally indifferent to the duration of his works. The best division we can adopt is between amusing, often satirical movies and serious, analytical ones. Among the former we can single out Ma première brasse/My First Stroke (1981), an autobiographical sketch originating from his first experience in a swimming-pool; Barres/Bars (1984), a fantasy about the barriers installed in the métro and the ways of avoiding them; L'empire de Médor/Médor's Empire (1986), a lampoon against dog owners who, under the pretext of loving their pets, in fact martyr them; La comédie du travail/The Comedy of Work (1987), which told the adventures of three unemployed men who hopelessly look for a job; La valse des médias/Waltz of the Media (1987), a look at readers' behaviour in French and Moroccan libraries; and Imply capitale de la France/Imply, Capital of France (1995), or why it would be better to transfer the capital from Paris, where unnecessarily complicated ways of doing things officially poison life, to a small, quiet town in the centre of France. Les sièges de l'Alcazar/The Seats of the Alcazar (1989) deserves special mention. The title is a pun, the siege (in French the same word means seat and siege) of the Alcazar was a famous episode of the Spanish civil war. In the late 1980s many films lamented the closure of old picture houses. Recreating the life of a cinema in a suburban district, Moulet indulged in the same vein but with more detachment and no nostalgia.

Anatomie d'un rapport/Anatomy of a Relationship (1976) was Moulet's first committed film, a view over the sexual problems of a couple through an observation of his relationship with Antonietta Pizzorno. The latter complains that she is not sexually satisfied; both try to improve their intercourse; a pregnancy and an abortion do not help the situation. Genèse d'un repas/Genesis of a Meal (1978) opens with the same couple eating an omelette, tuna fish, and bananas. Where do these products come from? Moulet investigates at his grocer, in Normandy, where they breed hens, in Antilles to track the origin of bananas, and in Africa for the fishery of tuna fish. By interviewing workers in foreign countries as well as in packaging plants in France, he understands that these people do not realise that they are mere pawns in a system that exploits them for the benefit of others. The film ends with the filmmaker pondering over his own function, as a consumer, in the circuit of capitalism. Despite the considerable lapse of time between the two films, Toujours plus/Always More (1994) was a sequel to Genèse. Moulet settled in a supermarket where he followed the customers, noting what they bought and how much they paid; then he interviewed the employees. Without making any commentary, only by juxtaposing piles of consumer goods and the complaints of check-out assistants, Moulet blames the profit motive for the unlimited development of consumption. The same criticism surfaced in Le ventre de l'Amérique/The Belly of America (1995). Assuming that big cities are a small part of the United States and that they conceal its real face, Moulet attempted to reach the heart of America. Des Moines, Iowa, was chosen because it is in the centre, the 'belly' of the country, but the film was merely a hasty, superficial and at times unfair satire of the free enterprise economy, with an emphasis on fatness; the inhabitants of Des Moines are shown to be wandering bellies. The method had not changed since the late 1960s. Moulet himself was still a perceptive observer of his time, but the point of view had become more and more pessimistic.

After 1995 the director returned to fiction films, but his works met with a reserved response because viewers thought of him as a documentarian. Moulet has often been labelled an iconoclast or a rebel individualist. Owing to his personal involvement in his films he has carved out a special place in the history of documentaries. Many works shot for television have adopted his approach. It seems banal, nowadays, to see the filmmaker play a part in his film or to watch a combination of authentic and contrived shots. Moulet's works feature prominently in documentary film festivals, often as a counterpart to more elaborate movies. Spectators are usually fond of their jocular mood, of their bizarre way of touching serious problems and, above all, of their critical perspective.

PIERRE SORLIN

Biography

Born in Paris in 1937. After studying in a Parisian secondary school, became a journalist. Worked successively for Cahiers du cinéma, Télérama, Arts. Founded a small production company specialising in documentaries and directed eleven feature films and twenty-four shorts, which established his reputation as an independent filmmaker.

Selected films

- 1976 Anatomie d'un rapport/Anatomy of a Relationship: writer, director
- 1978 Genèse d'un repas/Genesis of a Meal: writer, director
- 1981 Ma première brasse/My First Stroke: writer, director, producer
- 1984 Barres/ Bars: writer, director, producer
- 1986 L'empire de Médor/Médor's Empire: writer, director, producer
- 1987 La comédie du travail/The Comedy of Work: writer, director
- 1987 La valse des médias/Waltz of Media: writer, director
- 1989 Les sièges de l'Alcazar/The Seats of the Alcazar: writer, director
- 1994 Toujours plus/Always More: writer, director
- 1995 Imphy capitale de la France/Imphy, Capital of France: writer, director
- 1994 Le ventre de l'Amérique/The Belly of America: writer, director

Murrow, Edward R.

During the 1951–2 television season, Edward R. Murrow and Fred W. Friendly's See It Now (out of their radio series Hear It Now) appeared on CBS-TV. It was the first regular documentary series on American television. (Also in 1951 The March of Time series, produced for the movie theaters, ended.) See It Now was a sort of news magazine of feature stories in The March of Time tradition, though it had a much quieter and more intimate tone suitable for the living room. Murrow and Friendly produced it; Murrow was the on-screen host and commentator.

At first, See It Now, like March of Time and the present-day 60 Minutes, presented several different stories in each half-hour program. In 1953 the format changed to only one story a week. Among the memorable See It Now programs are Christmas in Korea (1953), made during the Korean War; several programs dealing with McCarthyism, including one in 1954 in which Senator Joseph McCarthy was afforded the right to reply (consistent with an American broadcasting dictum called 'the fairness doctrine'); and a visit with nuclear physicist J. Robert Oppenheimer (1955). Details of two other programs may give some sense of the series' subjects and of its distinctive style.

Argument in Indianapolis (1953) presented opposing factions in that city when the American Civil Liberties Union, attempting to form a local chapter, was opposed by the American Legion post. One of the extraordinary things about that program was its balance in handling a controversial subject, necessary, no doubt, for it to be telecast at all. Depending on your sympathies, the American Legion members become fascist monsters or upholders of true Americanism; the ACLU group pleasant, sensitive intellectuals or dangerous radicals and subversives. At any rate, the faces, speech, and manner of the protagonists are caught more or less candidly. A remarkable study is offered of diverse ideologies and personalities that exist in uneasy relationship to each other within this republic.

Segregation in Schools (1954) was made the week after the United States Supreme Court decision that declared separate education for blacks and whites to be neither equal nor constitutional. It reported on reactions to the decision in two Southern towns: Natchitoches, Louisiana, and Gastonia, North Carolina. What seems a curious stiffness and formality on the part of both black and white interviewees, with stand-up microphones visible and some statements read or clearly rehearsed, may have to do with extremely strong feelings being controlled, as well as a less flexible technology than is available today. When emotion does break through—actual expressed emotion of an elderly black woman, a black high school youth, an elderly white woman, and a black teacher—it is moving and becomes real in a way that helps us to understand more fully what is involved than do the prepared statements.

In 1955 Alcoa withdrew its sponsorship from See It Now. It then changed from regularly scheduled weekly half-hours to hour-long programs appearing at intervals, 'specials' in effect. Media critic Gilbert Seldes quipped that it had become See It Now and Then. In 1958 See It Now was terminated, to be followed by CBS Reports. Murrow appeared on the latter series occasionally. His last program was Harvest of Shame (1960), about the exploitation and hardships of migrant agricultural workers. Aired on Thanksgiving Day, it created noteworthy furor. Murrow left CBS to become director of the United States Information Agency and died shortly thereafter of lung cancer. Cigarettes were invariably a part of his image.

JACK C. ELLIS

Biography

Born April 25, 1908 in Greensboro, North Carolina. 1913–21 lived in Blanchard, Washington. 1926–30 attended Washington State College, Pullman. 1930–5 lived in New York City; worked for National Student Federation of America and then for Institute of International Education. 1935–7 Director of Talks for Columbia Broadcasting System. 1937–45 in London as European Director for CBS; broadcast from London to the United States throughout World War II. 1946–7 Vice-President and Director of Public Affairs for CBS. 1947–50 newscaster for CBS. 1950–1 Hear It Now weekly radio series on CBS. 1951–5 See It Now weekly television series on CBS-TV. 1961–3 Director, United States Information Agency. Died April 27, 1965, in Pawling, New York.

Further reading

- Bluem, A. William, Documentary in American Television, New York: Hastings House, 1965.
 Curtin, Michael, Redeeming the Wasteland: Television Documentary and Cold War Politics, New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 1995.
 Friendly, Fred W., Due to Circumstances Beyond Our Control ..., New York: Random House, 1967.
 Kendrick, Alexander, Prime Time: The Life of Edward R. Murrow, Boston: Brown, Little, 1969.
 Murrow, Edward R. and Friendly, Fred W., See It Now, New York: Simon and Schuster, 1955.
 Sperber, A.M., Murrow: His Life and Times, New York: Freundlich Books, 1986.

N

Nana, Mom and Me

(US, Rothschild, 1975)

Nana, Mom and Me is a self-reflexive biographical documentary and a powerful account of three generations of women. The film explores issues of femininity, family memory, mother-daughter dynamics, and the challenges of documenting one's own kin.

With the intent of documenting her grandmother, with whom Rothschild feels a special affinity, the filmmaker instead confronts a matriarch who refuses to take the camera seriously or to talk in any detail about her own past. Frustrated, Rothschild turns her probing camera to her own mother, with whom she does not feel as connected, and a rich portrait of family issues and the act of filmmaking emerges. Old photographs and home movies are intercut with present-day interviews and observational footage in a way that truly sets the stage for future autobiographical documentaries. Nana, Mom and Me incorporates elements of journals, diaries, self-interviews, poetry, and alternative formal devices.

Rothschild's mother becomes the primary object of the camera's attention. As such, she offers a narrative of deeply personal growth and self-definition, as well as a comment on society's changing ideal for women.

C. MELINDA LEVIN

Nana, Mom and Me (US, New Day Films, 1975, 47 mins). Distributed by New Day Films. Produced and directed by Amalie Rothschild. Cinematography by Daniel Drasin and Amalie Rothschild. Original music by Randolph S. Rothschild. Edited by Amalie Rothschild and Bronwen Sennish.

Nanook of the North

(US, Flaherty, 1922)

Nanook of the North by Robert Flaherty is a seminal work in the field of documentary film. The film was hailed upon its 1922 release as an aesthetic (and anthropological) triumph, and it performed well at the box office. Its success opened up a whole range of new cinematic possibilities. Since then the film has continued to be a touchstone and an inspiration for film pioneers and practitioners.

Nanook's importance is undeniable, but its influence is not universally appreciated. As time has passed and the film's stature and influence have increased, so too have the controversies attached to it. Concerns about its nonfiction status, doubts regarding Flaherty's method, questions about its sensitivity to indigenous realities—all are subjects of debate.

During Flaherty's youth his family lived a nomadic existence, much of it in Canada, where they passed from mining camp to mining camp. Flaherty frequently went on lengthy prospecting expeditions, learning by example the outdoor arts and observing the conditions of northern life. Much of Flaherty's practical education was received from native teachers, expeditionary guides whose wisdom and facility he admired. He also came to realize that this cultural wisdom was being encroached upon and endangered by incursions of European culture and capitalism. As Flaherty grew up and became a mining engineer in his own right, he became more and more aware of his paradoxical position. As an explorer in the north he represented a vanguard, bringing advantages of trade and technology to needy and isolated communities. Simultaneously, he was also the agent for irreversible change, as pressures of integration and modernization forced out old ways that were, for all the disregard of white sensibility, frequently artful and abundant.

Figure 11 Nanook of the North, Nanook, 1922, harpoon (Courtesy of the Everett Collection)

In 1910 Flaherty was hired by Sir William Mackenzie to prospect the vast area east of the Hudson Bay for its railway and mineral potential. Over the course of several years and through four lengthy expeditions, Flaherty had frequent contact with the region's Inuit people. As before, Flaherty found himself to be an appreciative beneficiary of native craft. He was taken by the Inuit's survival skills. Flaherty recognized that such traditional practices were threatened by modernization. Therefore, on one of his next expeditions, he brought a motion picture camera.

In tracing his transition from engineer to ethnographer, it has proved easy to exaggerate the uniqueness of Flaherty's aims and accomplishments, as well as the seriousness of his shortcomings. Flaherty inherited the sensibilities and interests of his age, and his work is a key point in the cultural continuum tracing the interaction of Europeans and natives of colour. In this context, the exalted reputation of Nanook of the North, much disputed and denied in more recent years, is complex but indubitably justified.

Nanook was not intended as a documentary; the genre had not even been defined at the time of the film's production. The film was made with an eye to commercial distribution and exhibition, and it was made for audiences that were accustomed to narrative fiction films. Flaherty was not an ethnographer, but he built his story out of the materials of real life. In this he was innovative and accomplished, especially given that the tenets of anthropological filmmaking were far from established at the time.

Flaherty had spent a good part of the previous ten years with the Inuit. However, he did not depend on his own experience alone. Flaherty screened his footage for the film's participants, who were encouraged to make suggestions. Many of these suggestions were incorporated into the film. This practice would later become fundamental to ethnographic filmmaking.

Consistent with this substantial artistic and cultural collaboration, and contrary to a narrative and stylistic impulse that would prevail elsewhere for many more years, Flaherty does not intrude on his subject. He is not the star of his film, and even though his effaced presence causes a few unsightly wrinkles (unfortunate contrivances—such as Nanook's biting of the phonograph record—are perceived as actual and natural), for the most part it means that the credit for the film's feats of courage and grace go precisely where they belong: to the Inuit. If Nanook is Flaherty's film, then it is his in collaboration with its subjects, who emerge as almost wholly admirable.

In ethnographic matters, Nanook began a trend that has affected documentary ever since. Its progress is seen in the Griersonian documentary, in the National Film Board of Canada's Faces of Canada series, in films like Jean Rouch's Moi, un noir, in the NFB's Challenge for Change series, and in the work of ethnic filmmakers such as Trinh T. Minh-ha. That trend would eventually enable the indigenous individual to tell his or her own story, to that individual's own community as well as to the outsider, leading to a greater hope for mutual comprehension, cinematically and in unmediated social interaction.

Commentary has focused on the film's place in a trajectory of ethnic relations and representations, but Nanook of the North is also important for a contribution that crosses borders and reduces divisions. In its earliest years (1895–1902), film production was dominated by actualities—short pictures of actual people in actual places. These films favoured a largely unmediated view of the world over arranged spectacle, and although they gave place in popularity to the narrative fictions of the likes of Georges Méliès and Edwin Porter, they continued to be produced in great number.

However, there was a reason for their commercial eclipse. The early actuality basically evolved into two types of film production, both valuable and yet both somewhat lacking. The first category, the travelogue, took the viewer to faraway places with strange-sounding names. There was an inherent appeal in the journey, but the spectator's visit seldom provided more than a superficial glimpse of the picturesque.

A second type of actuality film flourished, for the most part in Britain (primarily but not exclusively during the reign of Edward VII). These films were more substantial portraits of industrial processes—also valuable for the way they revealed the rhythms of workers' lives, the conditions of their labour, and the superb skill that in some ways shone through the difficult conditions—but given the escapist impulses that already held audiences in thrall, their commercial appeal was limited.

Robert Flaherty's great innovation, perhaps most clearly and successfully articulated in Nanook of the North, was simply to combine the two forms of actuality, infusing the exotic journey with the details of indigenous work and play and life. By so doing Flaherty transcended the travelogue, as now the picturesque became a real and respectful portrait.

That portrait contained two things that remain, even today, at the very core of the documentary idea. These are process and duration, or the detailed representation of how our everyday things are done (burning moss for fuel, covering a kayak, negotiating ice floes, hunting, caring for our children, etc.) and how long the doing takes. In Nanook this combination leads to a number of lovely moments, most particularly in its stunning igloo sequence. Here labour is not only revealed in its (romanticized) social context but also emerges, through Nanook's skill and Flaherty's cinematic revelation, as an ideal of beauty and even spirituality. First there is shelter, then warmth, and finally light (the window!). Here and elsewhere, by giving real processes a human dimension, craftsmanship and artistry, life and enactment and representation, become one.

Nanook is a film of great accomplishment, but it has also provoked controversy and protest. Flaherty's film is not a pure documentary. For example, the family at the film's centre was not really a family. These were photogenic Inuit, simultaneously presenting themselves and enacting a dramatic role. The characters' authentic clothes were actually a nostalgic hybrid; the Inuit had started to integrate Western wear with their own traditional garb some time before. This integration was in fact quite general: igloos were giving way to southern building materials, many harpoons had been replaced by rifles, many kayak paddles by motors.

Given that all this was true, observers (starting with John Grierson) would come to accuse Flaherty of ignoring contemporary realities and real crises (cultural integration, unemployment, various modern social ills), in favour of romances that were, for all their prettiness and partial anthropological interest, socially irrelevant. (This complaint would be applied even more vigorously to some of Flaherty's later films, such as Moana, 1926, and Man of Aran, 1934.)

Other fabrications have caused more serious concern on social and even ethical grounds. The seal that appears to be engaging Nanook in a delightful tug of war is actually dead; Nanook is in fact being pulled around by some friends who are at the other end of the rope, standing just off camera. During the famous walrus hunt, the hunters desperately asked Flaherty to stop shooting the camera and start shooting the rifle. Flaherty pretended not to hear, and kept filming until the prey was taken in the old way. A failed bear hunt (not appearing in the film, but related in Flaherty's northern memoir, My Eskimo Friends) left its participants, Flaherty included, stranded and nearly starving for weeks.

Flaherty's shortcomings, as well as those of his films, are certain, and they should be acknowledged. However, it is fair to point out that with regard to endangerments for the film's sake, Flaherty exposed the Inuit to difficulties that were not only within the realm of traditional, historical experience, but that were to some degree still current. As for stereotyping, if Nanook is not quite the perfect ideal of cultural comprehension, it still stands as a remarkable plateau, especially given the surrounding contemporary landscape.

Despite its contradictions and controversies, Nanook of the North holds a central place in the history of documentary film. Its strong documentary elements are set in a fine romantic story, and its romance is made profound by the loving detail that decorates and humanizes it.

DEAN DUNCAN

See also: Challenge for Change/Société Nouvelle; Flaherty, Robert; Grierson, John; Man of Aran; Moana; Trinh T. Minh-ha

Nanook of the North (US, Revillon Frères, 1922, 75–80 mins). Distributed in the United States by Pathé, in the UK by Jury. Scenario, direction, and photography by Robert Flaherty. Assisted by Captain Thierry Mallet. Titles written by Carl Stearns Clancy and Robert Flaherty. Edited by Robert Flaherty and Frances Flaherty. Featuring Allariallak as 'Nanook'. Also featuring 'Nyla', 'Cunayou', 'Allee', and 'Allegoo'. Filmed near Inukjuaq, in the Nunavik region of northern Québec, Canada.

Further reading

Barnouw, Erik, Documentary: A History of the Non-Fiction Film, New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1974 (revised 1983, 1993).

- Barsam, Richard, The Vision of Robert Flaherty: The Artist as Myth and Filmmaker, Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press, 1988.
- Berton, Pierre, The Mysterious North: Encounters with the Canadian Frontier, 1947–54, Toronto: McClelland and Stewart, 1989 (revised).
- Brownlow, Kevin, The War, the West and the Wilderness, New York: Knopf, 1979.
- Calder-Marshall, Arthur, The Innocent Eye: The Life of Robert J. Flaherty, London, W.H. Allen, 1963.
- Carpenter, Edmund, Eskimo, Toronto: University of Toronto, 1959.
- Danzker, Jo-Anne Birnie (ed.), Robert Flaherty, Photographer/Filmmaker: The Inuit, 1910–22, Vancouver: Vancouver Art Gallery, 1979.
- Flaherty, Frances Hubbard, The Odyssey of a Filmmaker: Robert Flaherty's Story, Putney, VT: Threshold Books, 1984.
- Flaherty, Robert, My Eskimo Friends, Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1924.
- Griffith, Richard, The World of Robert Flaherty, New York: Duell, Sloan and Pearce, 1953.
- Houston, James A., Confessions of an Igloo Dweller, Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1995.
- Rotha, Paul, Robert J. Flaherty: A Biography, edited by Jay Ruby, Philadelphia, PA: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1983.

Native Land

(US, Strand, 1942)

Native Land was the culminating project of Frontier Films, a nonprofit filmmaking company aligned with Labor-left groups in the United States between 1937 and 1942. Drawing on testimony presented to the LaFollette Civil Liberties subcommittee of the US Senate Committee on Education and Labor in the late 1930s, the film dramatizes acts of anti-union espionage and violence and argues for the right of workers to organize as a traditional American civil liberty in modern dress. Frontier previously had limited production to short subjects, and the scale of this documentary feature strained the organization's resources, contributing to Frontier's dissolution the year of the film's release. However, Native Land, with its inventive design and professional polish, also attracted greater critical attention than earlier Frontier projects and, in retrospect, can be viewed as a capstone to a decade of experimentation in American documentary filmmaking on the political left.

The driving forces behind Native Land were Paul Strand and Leo Hurwitz, Frontier's president and vice-president, respectively, who assumed control of the project in April 1938 when they found preliminary work by other members of the group wanting. A feature-length script was hammered out collaboratively, with poet Ben Maddow (under the pseudonym of David Wolff) writing the commentary. In addition to sharing directing credit, Strand was responsible for the cinematography and Hurwitz for the editing. Over the next three years, production progressed intermittently, given available funds; at various times footage was screened in New York, Washington, and Los Angeles in an effort to gain additional backing.

Strand estimated that as many as fifteen thousand people saw parts of Native Land this way, and he likened the process to 'making a film in a fish bowl'. Upon completion of an answer print on December 8, 1941, Frontier recruited actor-singer Paul Robeson to read the commentary and composer Marc Blitzstein to write the score; their reputations added further luster to the project.

Central to Strand and Hurwitz's approach to Native Land was a Popular Front politics that recast the conflict between socialism and capitalism as a struggle between democracy and fascism and staked a claim for patriotic symbols on behalf of Labor's cause. Equally important was the filmmakers' ambition to stretch documentary forms to accommodate the psychological dimension of dramatic fiction. In this regard, Native Land would bring to fruition ideas that had been advanced by Hurwitz and former colleague Ralph Steiner when they founded the experimental filmmaking collective, Nykino, in association with the Group Theater, in 1934. Given the latent drama in the LaFollette Committee testimony, Hurwitz, Strand, and Maddow devised a hybrid format for Native Land that combined expressive acting and character-centered editing with documentary montages, vocal commentary, musical scoring, and song. Actors from the Group Theater were recruited for key roles, and theater veterans William Watts and Alfred Saxe assisted with the direction of the performers.

In its finished form, Native Land interweaves historical events on three levels. The middle sections are dominated by a series of discrete, dramatized acts of violence: the murder of a Michigan farmer, of a Cleveland Labor organizer, and of two Arkansas sharecroppers; the flogging and tar-and-feathering of a progressive political leader by the Ku Klux Klan in Tampa, Florida; and a longer, fictional scenario featuring actors Art Smith and Howard de Silva and involving internal espionage and personal betrayal within a local union. Over the course of the film these isolated incidents then are stitched together to reveal a pattern of corporate conspiracy, the details of which constitute Native Land's central mystery plot. The antidote to this conspiracy, Native Land suggests, is union solidarity and democratic processes at the national as well as local level, political forces given graphic power in documentary montages of workers waking, laboring, meeting, protesting, and relaxing, and of the congressional investigators in Washington patiently reconstructing anti-Labor crimes.

Framing these contemporary events in Native Land is a long-range, mythic history. A seven-minute prologue recounts the settlement of the New England wilderness by ancestral European citizenry, as founding figures fight and die to vouchsafe civil liberties, an inheritance out of which the modern era of industry and labor emerges. The language and imagery of this prologue is recapitulated at the close as a way of offering comfort and inspiration to the families and colleagues of the victims of the Chicago Republican Steel Massacre on Memorial Day 1937. Invoked at both the beginning and the end of Native Land, then, is an epic national struggle, the true dimensions of which can be appreciated only on a time scale that exceeds the purview of a single generation. The commentary delivered forcefully by Robeson gives voice to that legacy, and in the end Native Land invites the audience, along with the working-class figures on screen, to set their sights on this longer view.

Topical events, however, would have an impact on the film's reception. Native Land played at a World Theatre in New York City for three months in the spring of 1942 and was widely and well reviewed in the mainstream press, with the photography, music, and performances especially receiving high marks. In light of the US entry into world war the previous December, questions were raised about the Native Land's timeliness, a problem the filmmakers sought to finesse by attaching an epilogue in which Robeson acknowledged that the struggle to defeat the Axis powers abroad now took precedence. Much to the disappointment of Hurwitz and Strand, no national distributor ected to pick up their unconventional feature, not even the left-based Garrison Films, which had previously handled Frontier's releases. Except for sporadic showings in a few other cities, Native Land quickly dropped from sight without earning back its initial costs. Following a brief rerelease in 1946, under the pressure of Cold War politics the film disappeared even from the nontheatrical market, not resurfacing until Hurwitz and Strand gained control of the film in the early 1970s.

Since that time, Native Land has entered into the standard repertory of political documentary filmmaking. As some contemporary critics have noted, the agrarian and industrial iconography of the film seems far removed from the contemporary media landscape, and its romanticizing of the origins of American democracy and its generalized critique of corporate conspirators at home seem at times curiously evasive. However, Native Land provides evidence of the expressive power of a left-wing American patriotism, passionately articulated at an historical moment when the meaning of national symbols was in flux, and of a tradition of creative thinking about the plasticity of documentary cinema as a poetic form.

CHARLES C. WOLFE

Further reading

- Alexander, William, 'Frontier Films, 1936–41: The Aesthetics of Impact', Cinema Journal 15, no. 1, fall 1975: 16–28.
- Film on the Left: American Documentary Film from 1931 to 1942*, Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1981.
- Campbell, Russell, Cinema Strikes Back: Radical Film-making in the United States, 1930–42, Ann Arbor, MI: UMI Research Press, 1992.
- Hurwitz, Leo, 'One Man's Journey: Ideas and Films in the 1930s', Cinema Journal 15, no. 1, fall 1975: 1–15.
- Klein, Michael, 'Native Land: Praised Then Forgotten', Velvet Light Trap 14, winter 1975: 12–16.
- Klein, Michael and Klein, Jill, 'Native Land: An Interview with Leo Hurwitz', Cinéaste 6, no. 3, 1974: 2–7.
- Strauss, Theodore, 'Homesteading Our "Native Land"', The New York Times, May 3, 1942: X3.
- Wolfe, Charles, 'Modes of Discourse in Thirties Social Documentary: The Shifting "I" of Native Land', Journal of Film and Video 36, fall 1984: 13–20, 61.

—'The Poetics and Politics of Nonfiction: Documentary Film', in Tino Balio (ed.), Grand Design: Hollywood as a Modern Business, New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1993.

Nazis: A Warning from History, The

(UK, Wood/BBC, 1997)

A television documentary in six episodes, The Nazis: A Warning from History is particularly interesting for its focus on two aspects of Nazism: the horror perpetrated by the Nazis in Eastern Europe; and the extensive popularity that the Nazis enjoyed in Germany. Written and produced by Laurence Rees, The Nazis: A Warning from History was broadcast for the first time on the BBC from September 10, 1997, to October 15, 1997, for a total running time of almost two hundred and ninety minutes. The six episodes, which unfold in chronological order, offer a broad view of the historical, cultural, and political events that produced Hitler and his politics of expansion. They focus predominantly on the occurrences linked to the rise and fall of Nazism from a German perspective. World War II itself receives little coverage. Little or no attention is devoted to military tactics; there is no trace of the invasion of France, of D-Day, or of the battles against Britain. The documentary concentrates instead on the human aspects and motivations of Nazism.

By showing contemporary images of the historical settings, documents from the Gestapo archives, and official acts signed by Hitler, The Nazis: A Warning from History reconstructs step by step the political and legislative acts that led to dictatorship in Germany. It analyzes the conflicts internal to the Nazi Party, the enthusiastic support of the pro-Nazi masses, and the gradual elimination of anti-Nazi political antagonists through the official endorsement of the racial laws and their consequences. The first two episodes, entitled Helped into Power and Chaos and Consent, offer an analysis of the long- and short-term causes that gave rise to Nazism and focus on the illusion of order offered by Hitler and on the life of the German population under the dictatorship.

Without drawing from the better-known Nazi propaganda films, The Nazis presents numerous sources and documents of the time, intertwined with contemporary images and interviews. The interviews are not dubbed but subtitled, and an old photograph of each interviewer is shown. The authors privilege testimonies of ordinary people who adhered to Nazism and who show some signs of nostalgia; the interviewer often seems to seek a confession, an admission of guilt. The documentary as a whole highlights the popular consent to Nazism; we watch Austrians and German-speaking inhabitants of Eastern European countries cheering at the arrival of the Nazi troops and note the support of the German population for the anti-Semitic laws. There is a particular focus on the civilians who collaborated with the Gestapo; we see letters written by ordinary citizens to denounce neighbors or friends, and in a dramatic sequence we even witness an interviewee, an elderly German lady, being confronted with the letter that she handwrote fifty years before, betraying a neighborhood girl.

The authors employ as many images and sequences as possible in color. From a purely cinematic perspective, the high-quality color film of the 'Night of the Amazons' in Munich is of particular interest, with its dancers and female riders who parade almost naked through the centre of the Bavarian capital at night, a testimony to the cult for the body and the superiority of the Aryan race. The sequence is followed by an interview with one of the women who participated in the parade and who stresses the positive sides of Hitler and of life in Nazi Germany.

The image of Hitler that the authors construct is, perhaps surprisingly, that of an indolent man, intent on maintaining competition among his close collaborators. We are shown the sites of Nazi power as they were then and as they are today, the pastimes of the party officials, and their holiday destinations. Hitler's politics of expansion are associated by the authors with his passion for England and for films set in the British countryside or in India; his dream of an alliance with Britain against Russia is explored. The episode The Wrong War elucidates his project to make Germany great once again by bringing back to the fatherland the German-speaking populations from bordering countries. It documents the advance of the German troops and the greeting they received in Austria and Poland; it illustrates the Nazi policy of expropriating goods, shops, and houses and redistributing them to German speakers coming back to Germany after the wave of emigration that followed World War I. It shows how, in the regions where Germans and the Polish both lived, the former became, virtually overnight, the persecutors of their neighbors. The invasion of Poland is observed with particular attention in the episode The Wild West, which is entirely dedicated to the partition of Poland and to the treatment of the Polish population.

One of the most interesting aspects of The Nazis is its attention to Nazi crimes in Lithuania—in particular, the ramifications of the order to eliminate, without delay, communist and Jewish women and children. The central piece is an interview with a Lithuanian, then a voluntary member of the SS. After twenty years in prison for war crimes, he offers a cold and lucid testimony, despite the repeated attempts of the interviewer to break his aloofness.

The episode The Road to Treblinka investigates the concentration camps. Rather than showing horrific images of the Holocaust, it focuses on the development of the Polish Treblinka camp, from the planning phase to its construction, between July 1942 and August 1943, thus investigating the Nazi will driving the extermination effort and the efficiency of their 'killing factories'.

The Nazis: A Warning from History closes on images of the defeat of an entire people, not only of the party officials. One of the last sequences is an interview with a woman shot on one of the rivers that surround the city of Berlin. She claims to have seen entire families committing mass suicide in the river in the wake of the German defeat. The film closes with images of the Holocaust and with the words of the German philosopher Karl Jasper, which are also the documentary's title, warning that the horror that has happened could happen again, any day, anywhere in the world.

STEFANO BASCHIERA

The Nazis: A Warning from History (UK, BBC, 1997, 290 mins). Written and produced by Laurence Rees. Narrated by Samuel West. Series historical consultant: Prof. Ian Kershaw.

Further reading

Rees, Laurence, The Nazis: A Warning from History, London: BBC Consumer Publishing, 1997.

Near/Middle East

The Middle East, or, alternatively, the Near East, is a rough-hewn area situated between Mauritania and Mali in West Africa and Iran and Afghanistan in Central Asia. The region is often associated with the Arab and Islamic worlds, but both of these parameters insufficiently describe the diversity of ethnic and cultural backgrounds present. Various empires have controlled vast sections of land that stretch from Africa's Atlantic coast to the Himalayan ranges. These empires have left their influence not only on the landscape, but also on the various cultures living in this region. Most recently France and Britain governed much of this area until the widespread push for national independence after World War II. Yet, international and regional political ambitions have continued to define much of the Middle East in the post-colonial era. It follows that the cinematic traditions in many of the nations have been tied to these political prerogatives. In fact, colonialism, conflict, state oppression and, ultimately, exile have influenced the development of documentary film in the region more than any other factors.

Documentary film in the Middle East, like narrative film, was introduced as part of Western modernization. Europeans and Americans intent on discovering images of the Orient pioneered film production in the region. The lure of the 'Holy Land' attracted both the Lumière company and Thomas Edison to shoot footage in what was then called Palestine. Also on behalf of the Lumière brothers, the French Algerian cinematographer Felix Mesguich began filming actualités in Algeria in 1905 and a year later in Egypt, and then in 1907 he captured on film the French invasion of Morocco.

Many of the earliest documentaries from the region were produced under colonial rule and presented little more than official propaganda. The deployment of propaganda films during the colonial period and the emergence of resistance films during the postcolonial period present some of the most salient examples of early documentary in the region. Following these early endeavors, documentary film in the Middle East has continued to be influenced by various forms of political domination, if not delineated in opposition to them. In fact, the bulk of Middle Eastern documentaries present a tenacious social critique of political power, but severe censorship by both colonial and national governments has limited the reception of many of these films.

The French and British domination of the region, especially after the Sykes-Picot agreement in 1916, effectively stifled the development of national cinemas in the Middle East. Under French authority the development of national cinemas was discouraged in favor of colonial assimilation. Thousands of informational and documentary films were made in the French colonies in order to disseminate pedagogic advice and political propaganda. There was almost no opportunity for indigenous filmmaking to take shape prior to independence from Europe. Only after the French realized the popularity of Egyptian cinema in the 1940s did they begin to endorse films made with Arabic dialogue in Morocco, though still under the auspices of the French Protectorate.

Indeed, only Egypt was able to develop a national film industry during the colonial period. Initially, Egyptian cinema took root in the production of news films that depicted, among other things, the funeral of head of state Mustafa Kamil. Muhammad Bayumi is most notable for his regular Amun newsreels. Yet, these documentary endeavors quickly gave way to the production of Egyptian narrative films more concerned with entertaining the masses than with informing them. After the founding of Studio Misr (Studio Egypt) in the 1930s, Cairo established itself as the capital of popular Arab cinema and proved a minor player in documentary film production until the founding of the National Documentary Film Center in the 1970s.

In North Africa, indigenous filmmaking lagged until the late 1950s when Morocco and Tunisia gained national independence. The film industries in these two countries have developed in fits and starts, producing sporadic but significant film traditions. However, documentary film has been largely overshadowed by the production of narrative features. One notable exception, Ahmed el Maanoui's Alyam! Alyam!/The Days, the Days (1978), blurs the distinction between fiction and documentary film to blast the effects of modern development and neo-colonial power in Morocco.

In Algeria, where the French encountered a persistent rebellion through the same decade, Ahmed Rachedi, Mohamed Guenez, Djamel Chandlerli, and Frenchman René Vautier formed Groupe Farid as a resistance film unit of the FLN (Front de la Libération Nationale), in order to film the struggle for independence. Rachedi's L'aube des damnés/The Dawn of the Damned (1965) is the most notable film to emerge from this collective. Though not a documentary per se, it presents a history of anti-imperialism across Africa with many documentary elements.

The Battle of Algiers (1965), an Algerian-Italian production, helps to illustrate the documentary threads of these projects. While imprisoned in France, FLN rebel leader Saadi Yacef wrote a film script based on his experiences fighting French colonial rule. After his release he approached a number of Italian directors working in the neorealist tradition. Despite the film's explicit anti-imperialist underpinnings and financial backing by the new Algerian government, director Gillo Pontecorvo offers a surprisingly balanced depiction of escalating violence (terror and torture) by both the French and the Algerians. The astute portrayal of guerilla tactics against the colonizers significantly bolstered the popularity of this film with the Black Panthers in the United States in the 1960s and, more recently, with the US government for use as a counterterrorism training tool. Simulating documentary footage and utilizing locals as well as former FLN members for cast and crew made it possible to replicate the hostilities and chaos so effectively that the film's distributors issued a notice stating, "Not one foot of newsreel has been used in this reconstruction of 'The Battle of Algiers'". The newsreel, whether recycled or recreated, continues to be an important stylistic element of both narrative and documentary film in the region.

For several years Algerian cinema remained obsessed with its colonial past and the battles waged for national independence, continuing to celebrate the heroes and martyrs of the war. By the 1970s, however, Algerians were rejecting this obsession with the war, and their popular films became more concerned with agrarian reform.

Since national independence, film industries throughout the region have struggled to achieve their own autonomy. Lacking the infrastructure, audience base, and funding necessary to become entirely self-reliant, many filmmakers have depended on foreign sources. France and other Western countries have offered many Arab filmmakers education, funding, and distribution opportunities, and the large Moroccan and Algerian populations in France have ensured transnational audiences for these films. Thus the former French colonies in the Levant or Mashreq (principally Lebanon, Syria, and Palestine) and the Maghreb (Morocco, Algeria, and Tunisia) continue to benefit from the francophone cultural mission. Yet, the cumulative effect of these factors challenges the notion of a national cinema.

Several recent documentaries from North Africa reveal the postcolonial dimension of film production, while also offering a commentary on transnational existence. Yasmine Qassari's heartbreaking film Indama Yabki al-Rigal/When Men Cry (1999) reveals the harsh reality for Moroccans trying to emigrate to Spain illegally. French director Yamina Benguigi's two documentaries Mémoires d'immigrés/Immigrants' Memories (1998), and The Perfumed Garden (2000) portray the experience of North African immigrants in France, and Hakim Belabbes's Boujad: A Nest in the Heat (1992) offers a perspective on separation, independence, and return as he chronicles his journey from the United States to visit his family in Morocco. In Fitouri Belhiba's whimsical Mirror Effect (1999), he tells the story of a Belgian ice-cream vendor in Tunisia, while deconstructing common notions of identity. Each of these films is, to some extent, a multinational production.

For some filmmakers this dependence on Europe is a mixed blessing that carries its own set of concerns about neocolonialism and Orientalism. Although support and funding may be generous resources for these filmmakers, there may be demands to use mostly French dialogue or to adhere to lucrative themes, such as violence. This is particularly the case for the countries in the eastern Mediterranean, which have experienced tremendously more civil strife in recent years than most others in the region. After the unyoking from centuries of Ottoman authority, the slicing up of the Middle East after World War I, and the eventual placement of Israel in Palestinian land, the violence of this region has spawned some of the most provocative documentary films being made in the Middle East today. Largely in reaction to the chronic violence in these locales, Lebanese and Palestinian filmmakers have produced some of the most innovative work in Arab documentary.

Following World War I, Britain favored the creation of a Zionist homeland in an effort to keep the French out of Palestine. This raised the ire of the Arabs, who had hoped for independence after helping to defeat Turkey during the war. Zionist filmmaking, which began before the founding of Israel, employed propaganda approaches in much the same way as the French and British, depicting Arabs in general, and Palestinians specifically, as barbaric, if they were depicted at all. The tribulations of World War II exacerbated the conflict. Largely prompted by the atrocities of the Holocaust, the United Nations passed a resolution in 1947 to create separate Jewish and Arab states in Palestine. Fighting erupted almost immediately and led to the 1948 War, when over seven hundred thousand Palestinian Arabs fled to neighboring Arab countries or further abroad. Distrust between Israel and its neighbors continued to escalate for the next two decades. Fearing an Arab invasion during the summer of 1967, Israel launched a preemptive strike against Egypt, Jordan, and Syria and subsequently captured the Sinai Peninsula, the Gaza Strip, the Golan Heights, and the West Bank, including the eastern sector of Jerusalem.

Like the resistance efforts against European colonialism, the creation of Israel as a Zionist state and the ongoing warring effectively spawned Palestinian documentary filmmaking. After the 1967 War cinematographic activism developed in connection with the armed struggle. A Palestinian film unit began operating in Jordan and was eventually annexed by Yassir Arafat's resistance organization Al-Fatah. After the 1970 Black September massacre of Palestinian resistance members in Jordan, the film unit relocated to Beirut, where several other Palestinian organizations were actively documenting military actions and life in the refugee camps. The infusion of Palestinians into Lebanon disrupted the balance of power and is partly blamed for the outbreak of war in Lebanon.

Under the banner of the Dziga Vertov Group, Jean-Luc Godard and Jean-Pierre Gorin had documented Al-Fatah's training program prior to Black September, as an ideal model of revolutionary preparedness, in Jusqu'à La Victoire (Until Victory—or—Palestine Will Win, 1970). However, the devastating defeat in Jordan forced the filmmakers to reevaluate the validity and promise of their project; they abandoned the film and it was never completed. After being ousted by Jordan, the Palestinian Liberation Organization (PLO) had relocated to Lebanon, where it launched attacks on Israel. This eventually prompted the brutal Israeli invasion of Lebanon in 1982, which halted the production of films and destroyed much of the archived materials. The PLO film unit transferred to Tunis and began coproduction with Western filmmakers, but in Lebanon Hezbollah (the Party of God) emerged as a Shiite resistance group poised to resist Israel along the southern border of Lebanon. Hezbollah has adopted the documentary filming of their martyrs in action.

The First Intifada (1987–94) marked the emergence of a strong Palestinian resistance within the occupied territories until the Oslo Accords brought a temporary end to the fighting. By 2000 the peace process broke down again, and the Second Intifada has persisted despite intense Israeli efforts to sequester the Palestinian resistance. These momentous historical events set the scene for documentary film to flourish.

Many of the most prolific and talented narrative filmmakers began their careers documenting this conflict. Indeed, the Lebanese documentary tradition cannot be adequately understood without also discussing the development of Palestinian documentary filmmaking. In 1974 Lebanese filmmaker Borhan Alawiya filmed Kafr Kassem, about a massacre of Palestinians by Israeli troops, before going on to become an enduring voice in Lebanese cinema. Michel Khleifi emerged as a prominent filmmaker after his first feature-length documentary, Al-dhakira al-khasba/Fertile Memory (1980), in which he employs narrative elements to examine the lives of Palestinian women living under occupation. His later work veers more toward fiction, but he continues to use documentary aesthetics. One of the few filmmakers to remain prolific during the Lebanese civil war(s), Mohamed Soueid uses documentary and fictional elements in his video essays. In his recent Nightfall (2000), he draws from his diaries to recount his participation in 'The Student Squad' of Al-Fatah during the Lebanese wars. His stories tell of old friends, some of whom have died while others live with their memories and solitude. In the tradition of documenting history in the making, Mohamed Bakri's Jenin, Jenin (2002) offers very little hope for the future for the Palestinians. After the Israeli army has flattened Jenin, grief and sorrow overwhelm the residents' testimonies in this film.

Jean Chamoun and Mai Masri, a Lebanese-Palestinian husband and wife team, are two of the more prolific documentary filmmakers from the region. Churning out film after film about the continued conflict and violence in Palestine and Lebanon, they convey the human element behind these devastating events. Though often depicting the lives of women and children immersed in struggle or families attempting to rebuild their lives in the wake of war and exile, their documentaries maintain a resilient element of hope that other filmmakers have long since abandoned. Some of their most notable documentaries are Under the Rubble (1983), about Israel's invasion of Lebanon; Suspended Dreams (1992), chronicling the rebuilding of lives and relationships after the Lebanese civil wars; Children of Fire (1990), revealing the place of children in the Palestinian uprising; and Children of Shatila (1998), a film about life within a refugee camp from the perspective of children that utilizes footage recorded by the children themselves. Chamoun revisited the Lebanese wars recently in his narrative debut, In the Shadows of the City (2000). The return to the war in narrative films has been the trend among many Lebanese documentarians working during the war, revealing the difficulty of moving beyond the traumatic events for many of these individuals.

It is worth highlighting the role that female filmmakers played from early in the development of these traditions, because they have had a pronounced presence in Palestinian and Lebanese documentary film. Heiny Srour's Saat al-tahrir Dakkat Barra Ya Isti'mar/The Hour of Liberation has Sounded—The Struggle in Oman (1974) documents the struggle against imperialist oil interests in Oman, paying particular attention to the role that women play. Her next film, Leila wal-dhiab/Leila and the Wolves (1984), about women in the Palestinian resistance, earned an unprecedented broadcast in England of an Arab film. Her recent film on women during the Vietnam conflict, Rising Above—Women of Vietnam (1996), continues her look at female resistance movements. Like many Arab filmmakers residing abroad, Srour uses a Western locale (London) as her base, while continuing to film in non-Western locations.

Trained as a journalist, Jocelyne Saab covered conflicts in the Middle East for European television in the early 1970s. She produced dozens of short reportage documentaries for television before turning to a more personal approach in Lettre de Beyrouth/Letter from Beirut (1979), and Beyrouth ma ville/Beirut My City (1982). Her innovative feature Once Upon a Time, Beirut (1994) is structured around a fascinating montage of over three hundred Arab, French, and American film clips—depicted as Beirut's memory.

Maysoon Pachachi and Noura Sakkaf have made several documentaries in the region. Their most recent film, Bitter Sweet (2003), offers a sad portrait of Bourj al Barajneh refugee camp in Lebanon and the continued restrictions that Palestinians face in their Arab host countries, where citizenship (among other things) is not granted. Other women documentarians have challenged the gendered stereotypes of the Middle East. In Egypt, Attiat al-Abnoudi's Ahlam Mumkina/Permissible Dreams (1989) brings women together to discuss female agency and their struggles with patriarchy in Egypt. Yousry Nasrallah has also contributed to this debate, most recently with Sibyan wa banat/Regarding Boys and Girls and the Veil (1995). Owing to increased financing by local and international development organizations, al-Abnoudi's and Nasrallah's works have emerged within a trend in Egyptian documentary that has refocused its attention on development and gender issues. The American filmmaker Elizabeth Fernea has also collaborated with women on these issues. For instance, The Veiled Revolution (1982) shows Egyptian women redefining not only the meaning of the veil but also the nature of their own sexuality.

Sexuality is also central to Mona Hatoum's deeply personal video Measures of Distance (1988), which marks the distance from 'home' through a dense layering of visual and audio media. While residing in London, her mother sends letters from Beirut during the war, where her family has been living since their displacement from Palestine. The narrative consists of her mother's letters, whose constant references to the distance in communication (sporadic letters and unreliable telephone connections) help punctuate the layers of displacement. In effect, Hatoum articulates an aesthetic of exile recurrent in Arab video art today.

Among the countries in the Mashreq (Arab East), Lebanon has had one of the richest film histories, encompassing decadent popular cinema, conflict-based social documentary, and most recently the emergence of experimental video essays. In fact, during the nationalist period in Egypt under Gamal Abdel Nasser, Lebanon dominated the region's popular market, albeit using many exiled Egyptian actors and maintaining the preference for the Egyptian dialect. The major role that Lebanese financiers and distributors played in Arab cinema and the large audience of filmgoers made Lebanon an ideal surrogate for Egyptian cinema during the 1960s and early 1970s.

Lebanon, popularly described as the meeting point between the Occident and Orient, attracted the decadence of jet-set oil sheikhs, European chic, and Hollywood's rich and famous. In addition to hosting this cosmopolitan population, Lebanon was known as a playground for international intrigue and espionage. The outbreak of intense violence in Lebanon during the mid-1970s brought an end to this 'Golden Age' and to popular Lebanese cinema. Yet, the Lebanese civil war(s) (1976–91), partially precipitated by the heightened conflict between Israel and its other contiguous Arab neighbors, initiated a turn to social documentary.

Since the Lebanese civil war(s) ended in 1990, Beirut has become the preeminent capital of Arab visual media. Many artists and intellectuals who returned during the postwar 1990s have helped to create a vibrant environment for politics, theory, and art to converge. Furthermore, the increased accessibility of digital video has fostered the production of independent documentaries, both artistic and journalistic. Many of these videos have an autobiographical foundation but blur the boundaries between personal and communal narratives, as well as between documentary and fiction approaches.

For many, the return to a 'home' violently altered—and known, perhaps, only from the distance of Western news reportage—has prompted innovative introspection on identity and representation. The exiled or diasporic location has also fostered a documentary genre critical of ethnocentrism abroad. In both documentary and video art, artists often appropriate and rework archival news footage in creative and critical ways. Applying the cut-up tradition to hundreds of news and movie clips, Palestinian filmmaker Elia Suleiman and Lebanese Canadian video artist Jayce Salloum create a dense montage of Orientalist discourse in their Introduction to the End of an Argument (1990). They show in no uncertain terms that the American media are ardently racist in their depiction of Arabs.

The rise in popularity of satellite television throughout the region has also played a role in the development of documentary in the Middle East. The competing broadcast centers in Lebanon, the United Arab Emirates, and Qatar have all shown interest in documentary film, sponsoring either productions or film festivals. Under the auspices of Qatar's satellite news station Al-Jazeera, Omar al-Issawi directed an impressive ten-hour chronicle of the Lebanese civil wars. The War of Lebanon (1996) combines interviews with a variety of players from different factions and newsreel footage in an effort to provide a better understanding of these events and their international influences—a rather sensitive topic regarded as taboo in Lebanon itself. The focus of Jehane Noujaim's Control Room (2003) was Al-Jazeera's news coverage of the American and British invasion of Iraq. Because of its political commentary, this film has been one of the few Arab documentaries to get a relatively broad theatrical release in the United States. At first polemically focusing on differences in attitude between the Arab journalists and the American communications officer in charge of the US military's Centcom, Noujaim deftly brings them into closer dialogue and greater understanding.

Even though numerous efforts have been made to 'objectively' document the violent conflicts and their effects, many film- and video-makers have realized the futility of any attempt to present an objective account of these 'unreal' events. Furthermore, by acknowledging the impossibility of making sense of the senseless violence, many filmmakers have delved into an intensely personal perspective on violence and the accompanying rupture of self. This is especially the case for filmmakers who have experienced these harrowing realities personally; however, many of the recent documentaries emerging throughout the Middle East have also had to account for the distance of exile.

Armenian filmmaker Nigol Bezjian, who lived in the United States during the war, appropriated news footage to create an intimate essay about his relationship with Beirut in A Road Full of Apricots (2001). Juxtaposing newsreels with personal places and memories, he draws attention to the way in which the city is popularly mediated, but he also reinscribes lived experience where it has seemed absent. Jayce Salloum undertook a similar project shortly after the war in his This Is Not Beirut (1994). Culling from found footage and video shot during 1992 in Lebanon, Salloum examines the popular misrepresentations of Lebanon and Beirut, chronicling his own assumptions, which he inherited during his upbringing in the West. Among many others making documentary-informed videos, Jalal Toufic, Akraam Zaatari, and Mahmoud Hojeij deserve acknowledgement. They are among the most active and influential video artists in Beirut today, and each offers an important documentary commentary on culture and politics in Lebanon. Although he is based in New York, the work of Walid Raad provides one of the most acute and humorous perspectives on the history of Lebanon. His videos advance subtle but ingenious critiques by cloaking fabulous stories about the war under the guise of documentary filmmaking. His short, Hostage: The Bachar Tapes (2001), regarding the narratives that come to dominate a place, inserts an Arab perspective within the hostage narratives that emerged from Beirut's terrorism in the 1980s.

Work in documentary film has been more limited elsewhere in the Arab Middle East, but notable filmmakers have emerged throughout the region. In the late 1960s many filmmakers adopted the political framework of Third Cinema. For those participating in this project, the potential for inciting state censorship prevented many from making documentaries. Yet they adapted a documentary aesthetic within fictive settings in order to advance resolute political and social critiques. Somewhat in contrast to this situation, Shadi Abdes-Salam was prevented from making a second feature film after his debut, Al-momia/The Night of Counting the Years (1969), thoroughly blasted the social divisions in Egypt. Despite the authorities' indignation, he went on to become a prolific documentarian. Similarly, the prolific Syrian filmmaker Omar Amiralay was censored in Syria for his critique of the government in al-Hayat al-Yawmiyya fi Qaria Suriyya/Daily Life in a Syrian Village (1974). He is now based in Beirut, where he continues his critique of political power, as in his documentary on Lebanese Prime Minister Rafiq Hirari, L'Homme aux semelles d'or/The Man with the Golden Soles (2000). Amiralay's unprecedented access to Hirari reveals the sway and charm of this powerful and wealthy leader.

In Kuwait, the Indian-trained Khalid Siddik made a number of television and government-endorsed documentaries before moving on to fictional features. In these films he borrows from folklore and traditions to present a counterpoint to the stereotype of oil-rich Kuwaitis. In similar fashion Iraqi cinema lagged until the emergence, in the 1960s, of a governmental agency that produced dozens of documentaries before the feature film industry blossomed in the late 1970s. Muhammad Shukri Jamil's early work on documentary exemplifies this trend. Khadija al-Salami, in Ard Al-Saba/Land of Saba (1997), places the modern history of Yemen in relation to the national archaeological heritage, partly to help Western audiences better understand his country.

On the periphery of the African Middle East, Mauritania's famed filmmaker Med Hondo, more often identified as an African cineaste than as part of the Middle East's tradition, has made all of his films in exile in France. In places such as Sudan, ethnographic film has traditionally been much more prolific than indigenous productions. Documentaries by Westerners still dominate the cinematic landscape of Sudan, but they provide important perspectives on the state of affairs for those affected by the continued conflict between the Islamic-oriented government and the indigenous southern population. Arthur Howe's continued interest in Sudan is exemplified in Kafi's Story and Nuba Conversations (both 2001). Indigenous examples of filmmaking are scarce, but Ibrahim Shaddad provides a poignant example of experimental Arab cinema emerging from the Sudan. Shot without dialogue, Insan (1994), meaning 'human' or 'person' in Arabic, creatively deploys sound to present an unsettling account of urban alienation for a shepherd from southern Sudan.

With what is often a more amusing approach, some filmmakers have begun to ask introspective questions about identity and authenticity. Omar al-Qattan's film Going Home (1995) chronicles the return of a British army officer to the 1948 battlefields and how he remembers those final days of the mandate. Al-Sheikh Inglizi Walgentman al-Yamani/The English Sheikh and the Yemeni Gentleman (2000) by Bader Bin Hirsi offers an interesting reversal of traditional roles, as the British resident of Yemen introduces the Western-raised Yemeni to Arab culture. Hamid Rahmanian's Sir Alfred of Charles de Gaulle Airport, about an Iranian national residing in the Paris airport, offers a unique perspective on transnational movement and the instability of identity. The liner notes describe the video as 'the story of a human being whose only aspiration is to be somebody else'. No matter how much Rahmanian tries to make this man stand for larger issues about exile, the self-named Sir Alfred repeatedly spurns these efforts and eventually refuses to speak with him. Sir Alfred's residence at the Charles de Gaulle Airport and his schizophrenic becoming-other steadfastly resist extrapolation into grand narratives. Yet, the desire to fix these identities is renewed in Steven Spielberg's latest film, The Terminal (2004), starring Tom Hanks, which clearly draws on this true story. Ultimately, however, it seems more interested in Rahmanian's determination to impose meaning than in Sir Alfred's subjective experience.

In terms of international acclaim and popularity, Iranian cinema easily surpasses all other national cinemas in the region. Numerous international festivals have highlighted the work of Abbas Kiarostami, Mohsen Makhmalbaf, and other Iranian filmmakers. Similar in many ways to Italian neorealism, Iranian cinema presents the beauty and struggle of everyday living by using documentary footage, nonactors, and self-reflexivity to achieve a quotidian aesthetic. Early in Kiarostami's career he launched the film division of the government-sponsored Center of the Intellectual Development of Children and Young Adults (Kanoon). Here Kiarostami made many educational and documentary films, developed his artistic impulses largely independent of commercial and political pressure, and established Iranian cinema's long-standing tradition of making films about children for all audiences.

The recycling of documentary scenes in Kiarostami's narrative films and the centrality of child characters is well demonstrated in his outstanding trilogy Khaneye doust kodjast?/Where is the Friend's Home? (1987), which recounts the efforts of a small boy to return his classmate's notebook. Zendegi va digar hich/Life Goes On—or—Life, and Nothing More (1991) is about the director of the first film (played by Farhad Kheradmand) and his young son trying to locate the first film's actors after a massive earthquake in a remote part of Iran. Many documentary images of the devastated landscape, shot out of the car window, serve as the backdrop for this father-and-son journey. The hope and perseverance demonstrated by the people encountered en route serve as inspiration for the final film, Zire darakhatan zeyton/Through the Olive Trees (1994). The three films become increasingly self-reflexive of the film-making process. In the third film, the production of a film actually serves as the plot structure for the narrative subtext to emerge. Here another director (played by Mohamad Ali Keshavarz) comes to film an event from the second film, but this enables Kiarostami to present an endearing love story taking place behind the scenes.

Despite this monumental cinematic tradition, new trends in Iranian documentary (and narrative) utilize the 'small media' format of digital video. Not unlike the dissemination of cassette tape sermons, which helped prompt the Iranian Revolution, most documentaries in Iran rely on a more underground existence. Many documentaries are now being made without the censors' permission, a trend emerging throughout the Middle East.

There has been a significant blurring of genre distinctions in Middle Eastern cinema. From the neorealist approaches popular in Iranian cinema to the extradiagetic insertion of behind-the-scenes footage in new Lebanese cinema, the cinematic avant-garde has increasingly pulled documentary elements into their narratives. Conversely, the presentation of 'actuality' nowadays often self-consciously challenges the notion of reality, thus blurring the distinction among documentary, docudrama, and video essay. This trend marks one of the most dynamic developments in Middle Eastern filmmaking. Yet, more often than not, the current development of Middle Eastern documentary depends greatly on a transnational web of festival spectatorship and on the tenacity of independent filmmakers.

MARK WESTMORELAND

See also: Kiarostami, Abbas

Selected films

- Abdes-Salam, Shadi, The Night of Counting the Years/Al-momia (1969)
 al-Abnoudi, Attiat, Permissible Dreams/Ahlam Mumkina (1989); Days of Democracy/Ayam al-dimuqratiyya (1996)
 Alawiya, Borhan, Kafr Kassem (1974)

- al-Issawi, Omar, The War of Lebanon (1996)
- al-Joundi, Dima, Between You and Me, Beirut/Bayni wa baynik Bayrut (1992)
- al-Qattan, Omar, Going Home (1995)
- al-Salami, Khadija, Land of Saba/Ard al-Saba (1997)
- Amiralay, Omar, Daily Life in a Syrian Village/al-Hayat al-Yawmiyya fi Qaria Suriyya (1974); The Man with the Golden Soles/L'Homme aux semelles d'or (2000)
- Babai, Brahim, And Tomorrow/Wa ghadan (1972)
- Bakri, Mohamed, Jenin, Jenin (2002)
- Belabbes, Hakim, Boujad: A Nest in the Heat (1992)
- Belhiba, Fitouri, Mirror Effect (1999)
- Benguigi, Yamina, Immigrants' Memories/Mémoires d'immigrés (1998); The Perfumed Garden (2000)
- Bezjian, Nigol, A Road Full of Apricots (2001)
- Bin Hirsi, Bader, The English Sheikh and the Yemeni Gentleman/Al-Sheikh Inglizi wal-gentleman al-Yamani (2000)
- Chamoun, Jean, In the Shadows of the City (2000)
- el-Maanouni, Ahmed, The Days, the Days/Alyam! Alyam! (1978)
- Farrokhzad, Forugh, The House is Black (1962)
- Fernea, Elizabeth, The Veiled Revolution (1982)
- Godard, Jean-Luc and Gorin, Jean-Pierre, Until Victory, or Palestine Will Win/Jusqu'à la Victoire (1970)
- Hadjadj, Belkcem, A Woman Taxi Driver in Sidi Bel-Abbes (2000)
- Hatoum, Mona, Measures of Distance (1988)
- Hojeij, Mahmoud, Palermo, Beirut, Palermo (1998)
- Hondo, Med, The Black Wogs Your Neighbours/Les Bicots-nègres vos voisins (1974)
- Howe, Arthur, Kafi's Story (2001); Nuba Conversations (2001)
- Jamil, Muhammad Shukri, The Thirsty/al-Zami'un (1972)
- Khamis, Mona, The Cleaner (2001)
- Khan, Hassan, Six Questions for the Lebanese (2001)
- Khleifi, Michel, Fertile Memory/Al-dhakira al-khasba (1980)
- Kiarostami, Abbas, Jahan Nama Palace/Kakh-e Jahan Nama (1976); Tribute to the Teachers/Bozorgdash-t-e Mo allem (1977); Where is the Friend's Home?/Khane-ye doust kodjast? (1987); Life Goes On, or Life, and Nothing More/Zendegi va digar hich (1991); Through the Olive Trees/Zire darakhatan zeyton (1994)
- Lakhdar-Hamina, Mohamed, Chronicle of the Years of Embers/Chroniques des années de braise (1975)
- Longinotto, Kim and Mir-Hosseini, Ziba, Divorce Iranian Style (1998)
- Makhmalbaf, Mohsen, A Moment of Innocence/Nun va Gooloon (1999); Kandahar/Safar e Ghandehar (2001)
- Masri, Mai and Chamoun, Jean, Under the Rubble (1983); Suspended Dreams (1992); Children of Fire (1990); Children of Shatila (1998)
- Mesguich, Felix, Algeria (1905); Egypt (1906); French Invasion of Morocco (1907)
- Nasrallah, Yousry, Regarding Boys and Girls and the Veil/Sibyan wa banat (1995)
- Noujaim, Jehane, Control Room (2003)
- Pachachi, Maysoun and Sakkaf, Noura, Bitter Sweet (2003)
- Pontecorvo, Gillo, The Battle of Algiers (1965)
- Qassari, Yasmine, When Men Cry/Indama Yabki al-Rigal (1999)
- Ra'ad, Walid, The Dead Weight of a Quarrel Hangs (1996–9); Hostage: The Bachar Tapes (2001)
- Rachedi, Ahmed, The Dawn of the Damned/L'aube des damnés (1965)
- Rahmanian, Hamid, Sir Alfred of Charles de Gaulle Airport (2000)
- Reggb, Mohamed, The Barber of the Poor Neighborhood/Halaq darb al-fuqara' (1982)
- Saab, Jocelyne, Letter from Beirut/Lettre de Beyrouth (1979); Beirut My City/Beyrouth ma ville (1982); Once Upon a Time, Beirut (1994)
- Salloum, Jayce, This Is Not Beirut/Hadha laysat Bayrut (1994)
- Shaddad, Ibrahim, Insan (1994)
- Siddik, Khalid, The Cruel Sea/Bass ya bahr (1971)
- Soueid, Mohamed, Tango of Yearning (1998); Nightfall (2000)
- Spielberg, Steven, The Terminal (2004)
- Srour, Heiny, The Hour of Liberation Has Sounded—The Struggle in Oman/Saat al-tahrir Dakkat Barra ya Isti'mar (1974); Leila and the Wolves/Leila wal-dhiab (1984); Rising Above—Women of Vietnam (1996)
- Suleiman, Elia and Salloum, Jayce, Introduction to the End of an Argument (1990)
- Toufic, Jalal, Credits Included: A Video in Red and Green (1995)

Zaatari, Akraam, All is Well on the Border Front (1997); Crazy for You/Majnounak (1997)

Further reading

- Armbrust, Walter, Mass Culture and Modernism in Egypt, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1996.
- Armes, Roy, Third World Film Making and the West, Berkeley, CA and London: University of California Press, 1987.
- Asfour, Nana, 'The Politics of Arab Cinema: Middle Eastern Filmmakers Face up to Their Reality', Cineaste 1, no. 26, 2000: 46–8.
- Diawara, Manthia, African Cinema: Politics & Culture, Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press, 1992.
- Fawal, Ibrahim, 'Three Perspectives on Arab Cinema', Edebiyat: The Journal of Middle Eastern Literatures 2, no. 11, 2000: 275–82.
- Ghareeb, Shirin, 'An Overview of Arab Cinema', Critique Journal for Critical Studies of the Middle East 11, fall 1997: 119–27.
- Ghazoul, Ferial J., 'Arab Cinematics: Toward the New and the Alternative', Alif: Journal of Comparative Poetics 15, 1995.
- Malkmus, Lizbeth and Armes, Roy, Arab and African Film Making, London and New York: Zed Books, 1991.
- n.a., 'Toward a Revolutionary Arab Cinema: An Interview with the Palestinian Cinema Association', Cinéaste 2, no. 6, 1974: 32.
- Naaman, Dorit, 'Middle Eastern Media Arts: An Introduction', Framework 2, no. 43, 2002: 5–13.
- Sadoul, Georges, The Cinema in the Arab Countries, Beirut: Interarab Centre of Cinema and Television, 1966.
- Shafik, Viola, Arab Cinema: History and Cultural Identity, Cairo: The American University in Cairo Press, 1998.
- , 'Class Difference, Nation and Subjectivity: Two Egyptian Documentaries', Framework 2, no. 43, 2002: 104–16.
- Sherzer, Dina (ed.), Cinema, Colonialism, Postcolonialism: Perspectives from the French and Francophone Worlds, Austin, TX: University of Texas Press, 1996.

Negro Soldier, The

(US, Heisler, 1944)

To depict The Negro Soldier as the dawn of African American consciousness-raising cinema may be something of an exaggeration, but the film is certainly a milestone in the treatment of blacks on screen. America's entry into World War II raised several race-related issues in acute form. The US Army was officially committed to racial segregation, a policy that was not to end until 1948—and then only by presidential decree. In the higher echelons of the military there was more than a little hostility to the idea of African Americans in combat roles; not least, there was their long-standing portrayal in the media as deferential servants or slow-moving, shiftless buffoons, but in every instance markedly inferior to whites.

The genesis of the project to rectify this situation emanated from Frank Capra and the Bureau of Motion Pictures, a branch of the Office of War Information (OWI). The idea was that a morale-boosting picture for and about the contributions of blacks in the armed forces would be ideal as an instrument of social engineering. It might enhance the image of the eight hundred and fifty thousand then in uniform and perhaps help undermine conventional stereotypical attitudes toward African Americans in general. Nevertheless, the project was undertaken with much bureaucratic trepidation. An OWI memorandum of 1942 cautioned against racial profiling, suggesting, for example, that the casting of black soldiers most Negroid in appearance be 'played down' and that reference to the race's supposed affinity for watermelon and fried pork be avoided. It was thought best to omit all mention of contentious issues such as slavery, emancipation, post-Reconstructionism, and black radical movements. After two false starts, a script by Carlton Moss, a black writer who had worked for the Federal Theater Project, was approved. Capra chose Stuart Heisler as director mostly on the strength of his film The Biscuit Eater, which he had made in Georgia with an interracial cast.

In their social construction of the milieu of The Negro Soldier, the filmmakers reflected dominant ideological attitudes and liberal values of the period, even if, from today's standpoint, these seem painfully tentative. The bulk of the first part is set in a church of improbable grandeur, all carved stone and soaring spires. The preacher, played by Moss himself, is clean-cut and mellow-voiced, and the attentive, all-black congregation is, without exception, well-dressed, with military uniforms, two-piece suits, and fur stoles much in evidence. In short, these are the kinds of African Americans whom most white audiences would find nonthreatening (neat and restrained). The intention of the film, in this segment, is to undermine the conventional portrait of uninhibited exuberance in blacks' practice of religion. The narrative is contained within the pastor's sermon as he guides his congregation through a condensed account of black participation in the nation's history from the American Revolution to the present, although mention of the Civil War is pointedly limited to a travelling shot of Lincoln's statue with a voice-over declaiming his definition of democracy from the Gettysburg Address. Stock footage from, among other fictional works, D.W. Griffith's America and John Ford's The Iron Horse have inserts of black actors in situ. Newsreel excerpts provide visuals for the story from the turn of the century to the present, ending with a staged version of black steward Dorie Miller's seizing a gun from the hands of a dying comrade and aiming it at Japanese planes during the raid, December 7, 1941, on Pearl Harbor, thus making him the first black in World War II to fire at the enemy. An epilogue to this catalogue of virtuous deeds is provided by a female parishioner reading from her son's letter. He relates how he has smoothly mastered basic training, encountered the work of black poet Langston Hughes, and won his Army commission. A gifted choir brings matters to a conclusion with spirited renditions of 'Onward, Christian Soldiers' and 'Joshua Fit' de Battle ob Jericho' as musical counterpoint to scenes of marching soldiers.

Apprehensions that some portions of The Negro Soldier might offend led to excisions in the prerelease print. No white men were to be seen under the command of black officers; the amount of combat footage involving African Americans was scaled back; and a brief shot of a black man receiving a massage from a white physiotherapist was removed. Contemporary reviewers tended to deplore the homogenised blandness of the outcome, a depoliticised discourse that studiously avoided racial issues then endemic in all branches of the US military.

Following the premiere of The Negro Soldier in April 1944 as Official Film 51, tepid exhibitor enthusiasm meant it received very limited theatrical exposure, playing in fewer than one cinema out of five in the United States, a ratio that was significantly lower in the Deep South. In this respect it performed more poorly than any other short subject released under government auspices during the war. However, its subsequent track record in the noncommercial market was considerably brighter. Several African American groups campaigned for a wider audience by way of distribution in 16mm format to public libraries and educational institutions overseas as well as at home. Those efforts were successful to the extent that the film was in constant demand even beyond the war's end.

It must be acknowledged that in The Negro Soldier there is the implicit assumption that to succeed, the race must accept and assimilate white, middle-class norms of social behaviour and attitude. This was, to be sure, a simplistic solution that ignored or consigned to irrelevancy the more deeply rooted issues of political and economic inequality. It was a legacy that vitiated the thrust of much of Hollywood's postwar 'race problem' films. Yet it is ironic that the officially segregated Army sanctioned a work, the thrust of which, however tentative, was toward racial integration; also, that the race's contribution to the war effort had been recognised was a source of pride for a segment of the population that had hitherto been ill-served by the motion picture.

JAMES M. SKINNER

The Negro Soldier (US, 1944). Produced by Frank Capra. Directed by Stuart Heisler. Script by Carlton Moss. Music score by Dimitri Tiomkin (choral items by Jester Hairston).

Further reading

- Cripps, Thomas, Slow Fade to Black: The Negro in American Film, 1900-942, London: Oxford University Press, 1977.
- Koppes, Clayton R. and Black, Gregory D., Hollywood Goes to War: How Politics, Profits and Propaganda Shaped World War II Movies, New York: The Free Press, 1987.
- Leab, Daniel, From Sambo to Superspade: The Black Experience in Motion Pictures, Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1975.
- MacCann, Richard Dyer, The People's Films: A Political History of U.S. Government Motion Pictures, New York: Hastings House, 1973.
- Rollins, Peter C. (ed.), Hollywood as Historian: American Film in a Cultural Context, Lexington, KY: University of Kentucky Press, 1983.
- Short, K.R.M. (ed.), Film and Radio Propaganda in World War II, London: Croom Helm, 1983.
- Winkler, Allan M., The Politics of Propaganda: The Office of War Information, 1942-45, New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1978.

Nestler, Peter

Since I started to shoot films, I only tried to analyze the topics, which I had chosen from the bottom. I tried to find the shortest way for me and to show the most important aspects: to perceive, to recognize and to decide with others, this should be changed or that should be preserved or not be overlooked.

(Nestler 1974)

This fundamental statement seems to summarize the approach of Peter Nestler's films perfectly. He was always interested in people's daily lives, their situation, and the changes in society reflected in their existence. His very personal films show us people who are oppressed by the capitalist entrepreneur or the fascist politician or who have had to fight against changes in their living conditions. These people resist, and this is an important aspect of his films, which are often very political. However, these stories do not seek to create a sensation, even though some of them are sensational. Instead he concentrates on everyday life, which is portrayed in strong images that stick in our minds. In his sometimes sparing use of images and sounds, we feel the concentration of arguments, which are investigated thoroughly. In his portraits of people, the concrete and the typical are tightly linked. The French filmmaker Jean-Marie Straub, who discovered him at a very early stage, is convinced that Peter Nestler is the most important filmmaker in Germany after 1945 because he is perhaps the only one 'who just shoots what is there and does not attempt to provoke the people' (Philipp 2001). His images often speak for themselves and are not explained in the commentary, which he frequently delivers himself.

With his debut film Am Siel/At the Sluice (1962), which he made in cooperation with the photographer Kurt Ulrich, he portrays a small village on the North Sea in a very poetic and essayistic way from the perspective of the sluice. Thus a confrontation between nature and civilization appears from the very beginning. The sluice comments on changes in the village and in traditions but also offers a much broader perspective, speaking as a voice of natural history. Aufsätze/Compositions (1963) portrays a small school in the Swiss mountains, where the pupils have to write a paper in class and tell about their weekday. The viewer can concentrate on this closed world in long shots, which fit perfectly with the voice of the child who is telling his story. This work is quite similar to his first film for the SDR, the Stuttgart public TV station. In Ödenwaldstetten (1964) he depicts changes in a small village in the Swabian mountains, which is on the one hand very traditional, with collective bread-baking and handling of farm animals; however, industrialization has also come to this small place, and most of the inhabitants work in the brewery or the cloth factory. Nestler's collage of statements, commentary, and images corresponds to that place. 'Rough is the landscape, rough are the people and rough is the voice of the commentator. The program does not tell anything new, but it tells it a new way. It was not a standard reportage, but the attempt to adapt the report totally to the object' (Hoffmann 1996: 206), as a film critic wrote in 1964. Nestler lived in Ödenwaldstetten for four weeks to observe the community before shooting for two weeks, mostly without sound. The montage concentrates on detailed shots, and long shots are very rare. The inhabitants tell their stories in their dialects, which are sometimes summarized in the commentary. The film generated considerable controversy, and its critical approach was attacked, especially from official quarters.

The next film for the SDR was Ein Arbeiterclub in Sheffield/A Working-Men's Club in Sheffield (1965), which is often discussed as one of his strongest films of that period, because it reflects the history and the current situation of the workers' movement so precisely. At the TV station it was seen critically and was broadcast only under the new title Menschen in Sheffield/People in Sheffield. 'Nestler[']s work contrasts markedly with] everything made in documentaries during the last 25 years. His aesthetic not only stands in opposition to the classical cultural film [...] but also retreats from the new cinéma vérité of the '60s (with original sound and light, moveable cameras). His works have nothing in common with journalistic reports or features in television. Because of the economic chances of the documentary film, they could be produced for television, but only for public TV, because a commercial station never would take such a risk' (Roth 1990). This quality and individuality came at a price. Nestler had to finance his next film, Von Griechenland/From Greece (1965), by himself, and it was not broadcast because some critics viewed it as communist propaganda.

Peter Nestler emigrated to Sweden, where after a year holding down different jobs, he was able to work on the youth and children's programme for Swedish public TV. Besides this he made films independently, which often were broadcast on Swedish or German television. They were frequently very political, but even in Sweden his films on neo-fascist tendencies in West Germany and on Chile were not broadcast. Besides making political films on Vietnam, Spain, and fascism in 1969, he and his wife Zsóka started a cycle on traditional craftsmanship, which tells the social history of work and production techniques and explores the relationship of the workers toward their craft. 'Interrelations are also typical for his films in the '70s, in which Nestler follows the history of specific products and production techniques like glass or paper, book printing or ore mines. His profound examinations in this multipart series are not free from stylistic adaptations from the classical cultural film, but are always told from the perspective of the craftsman and worker and not from [that of] the factory owner' (Roth 1982: 66). It is very typical of his films is that time periods mingle to build a bridge between historical events and the present. 'The films are working, so that no injustice is forgotten, they are a search for a direct way to make clear specific conditions of class and property; the dynamics of social contradictions are analysed by the visible and the dependence of politics on the economy is illustrated' (Becker 1984: E4). This is what gives the films of Peter Nestler such currency and timelessness.

KAY HOFFMANN

Biography

Born June 1, 1937, in Freiburg (Breisgau), Germany. After school he worked two years as a sailor and travelled around the world. Study of painting at the art academy in Munich; work as an extra in various German movies. 1961/2 debut film Am Siel/At the Sluice, which was followed by seven other films in Germany. Emigrated to Sweden in December 1966. 1968 commissioning editor at SVT2, mainly working on the children and youth programme. Besides that, he continuously produced independent films, often with his wife Zsóka. His filmography includes more than fifty shorts and documentaries, and he won many prizes at international film festivals.

Selected films

- 1962 Am Siel/At the Sluice: director, script, camera, editing (all with Kurt Ulrich), producer
- 1963 Aufsätze/Compositions: director, script (both in collaboration with Kurt Ulrich and Marianne Beutler), camera (with Kurt Ulrich), editor, producer
- 1964 Mühlheim (Ruhr): director, script (both with Reinald Schnell), camera, editing, producer
- 1964 Ödenwaldstetten: director, script, camera (all with Kurt Ulrich), editing
- 1965 Ein Arbeiterclub in Sheffield/A Working-Men's Club in Sheffield: director, script, camera (with Kurt Alvermann), editing
- 1965 Von Griechenland/About Greece: director, script (both with Reinald Schnell), editor, sound, speaker, producer
- 1967 I Ruhromradet/In the Ruhr Area: director, script (both in collaboration with Zsóka Nestler and Reinald Schnell), camera, editor (with Bengt G. Erikson)
- 1968 Greker i Sverige/Greeks in Sweden: director, script, editing
- 1969 Hur bygger man en orgel?/How Does One Build an Organ?: director, script (both in collaboration with Zsóka Nestler), camera, editing
- 1970 Varför är det krig?/Why War?: director, script (both in collaboration with Zsóka Nestler), camera, editing
- 1970 Att vara zigenare/Being a Gypsy: director, script (both in collaboration with Zsóka Nestler), camera, editing
- 1971 Får de komma igen? Om nyfascistiska tendenser i Västtyskland/Are They Allowed to Return? About Neo-fascist Tendencies in West Germany: director, script (both in collaboration with Zsóka Nestler), camera, editing
- 1972 Bilder från Vietnam/Pictures from Vietnam: director, script (both in collaboration with Zsóka Nestler), camera, editing
- 1973 Spanien!/Spain!: director, script (both in collaboration with Taisto Jalamo), camera, editing

- 1978 Nägot om USAs indianer/Something About the Indians in the USA: director, script, camera, editing
- 1982 Det är krig i Centralamerika/A War is Going on in Central America: director, script, editor
- 1988 Die Judengasse/The Jewish Lane: director, script, editing, sound, speaker
- 1991 Die Nordkalotte/The Northkalotte: director, script, editing
- 1997 Pachama—Unsere Erde/Pachama—Our Earth: director, script, speaker
- 2000 Flucht/Escape: director, script, sound
- 2002 Die Verwandlung des guten Nachbarn/The Metamorphosis of the Good Neighbour: director, script, DV-camera, sound
- 2003 Mit der Musik gross werden/Growing Up with Music: director, script (both in collaboration with Zsóka Nestler), DV-camera, sound (with Ferenc Gerendai), editor

Further reading

- Becker, Jörg, 'Peter Nestler', in Hans Michael Bock (ed.), CineGraph. Lexikon zum deutschsprachigen Film, München, 1984.
- Belz, Corinna, 'Die Filme Peter Nestlers im Kontext der zeitgenössischen Dokumentarfilmdiskussion', unpublished Master's degree work, Free University West Berlin, 1981.
- Hoffmann, Kay, Zeichen der Zeit. Zur Geschichte der Stuttgarter Schule, Munich, 1996: 97–9, 206–13.
- Huber, Jörg, 'Mit vielen sagen: Dieses gehört geändert', in Cinema, Zürich, Basel, Frankfurt: Territorien, 1986: 96–117.
- 'Zur Filmarbeit von Peter Nestler', Filmpodium (Zeitschrift des Kommunalen Kino Zürich), March 1988.
- Koch, Gertrud, 'Den Alltag sichtbar machen', Frankfurter Rundschau, January 15, 1974.
- Nestler, Peter, 'Zusammenhänge', Filmkritik May 19, 1974: 228–35.
- 'Arbeiten beim Fernsehen in Westdeutschland und Schweden. Ein Gespräch mit Gisela Tuchtenhagen, Klaus Wildenhahn und Angela Wittlich', Filmkritik, August 1975: 341–53.
- 'Die gedehnte Demokratie', Konkret, June 1976: 30.
- Netenjakop, Egon, 'Kunstvoller Dokumentarbericht', Funk-Korrespondenz 36, March 9, 1964.
- Peters, Elke, "'Eine Art, dokumentarisch zu arbeiten'. Eine Annäherung an drei Filme von Peter Nestler. Mühlheim/Ruhr, Ein Arbeiterclub in Sheffield, Spanien!'", unpublished Master's thesis, University Osnabrück, 1979.
- Philipp, Claus, "'Ästhetik der Armut" und des Widerstands. Eine Höhepunkt: Tribute für Peter Nestler', Der Standard, October 10, 2001.

- Pirschtat, Jutta (ed.), Zeit für Mitteilungen. Peter Nestler, Essen: Dokumentarist, 1991.
- Roth, Wilhelm, Der Dokumentarfilm seit 1960, Munich, Lucerne, 1982: 63–6.
- 'Peter Nestler. Scheitern und sich durchsetzen', in Cornelia Bolesch (ed.), Dokumentarisches Fernsehen, Munich, Leipzig, 1990: 128.
- Scuria, Frank, 'Analytiker ohne Kompromisse', Medium, November 1973: 14–17.

New Earth

(The Netherlands, Ivens, 1933–4)

In 1929 Joris Ivens was commissioned to make a film by the Dutch Construction Workers' Union to celebrate their twenty-fifth anniversary. This became the film Wij Bouwen/We are Building (1929), on the different construction works in the Netherlands. One of its parts, 'Zuiderzee Works', dealt with the reclamation of land and the construction of polders. Joris Ivens extended this part and gave it a separate release in 1930 as Zuiderzee. This film was reworked several times during the following years as the reclamation and cultivation of the land progressed.

Nieuwe Gronden/New Earth can be regarded as the final version of Zuiderzee. The first two parts of the film are taken from earlier versions of Zuiderzee, whereas the last part consists of new material taken mainly from newsreels. Joris Ivens himself compared the continuity of the film with the structure of a joke: the first three quarters of the film works to a specific, expected climax, but then the story takes an unexpected turn (Ivens 1969).

In Nieuwe Gronden the first part shows the construction of the dykes and sluices and the reclamation of land. The second part shows the subsequent cultivation of the land to make it habitable. We see endless fields of grain, and the spectator would expect a happy ending, but suddenly this idyll is disrupted: the lush corn fields are intercut with hunger marches, riots, images of stock markets, and the destruction of crops in order to drive up the prices at those markets.

This is a sudden change not only in tone (even in literal tone, because Ivens's commentary voice changes radically) but also in style. The first two parts are taken from the earlier versions of Zuiderzee, which are all marked by a formalist style: well-composed images, aesthetic photography, informative commentary, and an elaborate editing. The last part, however, is mainly taken from different newsreels, which explains the variation in aesthetic and technical quality of these images. Furthermore, the excited and angry voice of Ivens—Nieuwe Gronden is one of the two films in which Ivens himself speaks the commentary text—is in stark contrast with the quiet and educational tone of the earlier parts of the film.

Nieuwe Gronden is known for its montage sequence of the closing of the dyke. Although Ivens did most of the filming in 1929 for the film Wij Bouwen, in the following years it was mainly his collaborators who continued filming: Joop Huisken, John Fernhout (later better known as John Ferno), and Helen van Dongen. Joris Ivens himself was usually working on other projects abroad, among them a film in the Soviet Union on the Komsomol: Pesn o Gerojach/Song of Heroes (1932). For the closing sequence he gave each of the camera operators a specific role. The land camera followed the struggle of the land against the sea. The sea camera identified itself with the waves and the strong currents that take away the clay that was dumped by men and their machines, who were followed by the third camera. The best qualities of Joris Ivens, Helen van Dongen, who did the editing, and Hanns Eisler, who composed the music, are combined, resulting in a haunting montage sequence of powerful images accompanied by stirring music.

Again, this high point of documentary aesthetics is in stark contrast with the conclusion of the film. The aesthetic and educational approach is abandoned and overtaken by the militant anticapitalist ending of the film: the work on the reclamation of the land is done, and while the abundant corn fields are waving to the camera, the workers who made this possible are unemployed and starving. Instead of feeding hungry people, the crops are used for speculation: they are dumped into the sea to make the prices go up. Ivens does not limit himself to the Dutch polders anymore but, rather, uses the images of the worldwide economic crisis to dismiss the global capitalist attitude of giving priority to stock markets instead of considering the poor and starving people around the world. The film ends with the ironic 'ballad of the sack dumpers', which is accompanied by images of men dumping sacks of grain into the sea. That it was actually a couple of Ivens's assistants who were dumping sacks of flour into the Seine river doesn't change the message. It does, however, illustrate Ivens's approach to documentary filmmaking amid his determination to be subjective and persuasive.

Given the changes in style and tone, Nieuwe Gronden can be considered a hybrid film. At the same time, it is emblematic of Ivens's work. This film marks a shift toward a more politically committed way of filmmaking, but Ivens always combined this with the aesthetic approach he applied from the beginning. His next film, Borinage, would lean more toward the militant approach, but subsequent films are much more balanced in their aesthetics and their political stance.

KEES BAKKER

See also: Ivens, Joris

Nieuwe Gronden/New Earth (The Netherlands, CAPI Amsterdam, 1933, 30 mins). Produced and directed by Joris Ivens. Script by Joris Ivens. Cinematography by Joris Ivens, Joop Huisken, Helen van Dongen, Eli Lotar, and John Fernhout. Edited by Joris Ivens and Helen van Dongen. Sound edited by Helen van Dongen. Music by Hanns Eisler. Commentary written and spoken by Joris Ivens. Ballad written by Iulian Arendt, sung by Jan van den Broek.

Further reading

- Bakker, Kees (ed.), Joris Ivens and the Documentary Context, Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 1999.
- Delmar, Rosalind, Joris Ivens, 50 Years of Film-making, London: British Film Institute, 1979.
- Ivens, Joris, The Camera and I, Berlin: Seven Seas Books, 1969.
- Ivens, Joris and Destanque, Robert, Joris Ivens ou la mémoire d'un regard, Paris: Editions BFB, 1982.
- Schoots, Hans, Living Dangerously: A Biography of Joris Ivens, Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 2000.
- Waugh, Thomas, Joris Ivens and the Evolution of the Radical Documentary 1926–46, PhD dissertation, Columbia University, 1981.

Night and Fog

(France, Resnais, 1955)

One of the earliest films on the subject, Alain Resnais's Night and Fog (Nuit et brouillard) is considered to be among the most powerful films about the concentration camps of Nazi Germany. As a documentary, it treads on novel ground, and its unusual use of structure, music, and imagery is as original today as it was in 1955.

The establishing shot of Nuit et brouillard presents a green field under a dark, heavy sky. The camera then moves slowly down to reveal barbed wire. This movement is repeated twice more, always with a camera that presents the scenic view first and then pulls back in order to reveal the fencing around a camp. In the last movement, the camera moves directly into the camp. These scenes are accompanied by a subtle, rhythmic drum and the light-hearted melody of a flute, along with a voice-over informing the audience that ‘Even a quiet country scene ... even a field with crops harvested and crows flying ... even a road with cars and people passing ... even a village fair may lead directly to a concentration camp’.

In this first sequence, the film introduces some of its key concerns: first, the reality of the concentration camps existed side by side with the reality of beautiful, tranquil landscapes and that—no matter how unimaginable—they belong to the same universe. Second, anything—including serene villages and fields—might not be what it seems at first glance. Third, the past is contained in the present, and it can be and must be uncovered in order to keep the memory alive, even if all that remains are scattered and fragile traces—the brick walls, the crematoria, the photographs, the imagination. Fourth, the film itself fails to describe the full dimension of the events. Finally, what happened in the concentration camps is not an isolated event of only one time and one place.

The Comité d’Histoire de la Déportation de la Seconde Guerre Mondiale commissioned Nuit et brouillard in 1955 to mark the tenth anniversary of the liberation of the concentration camps by Allied forces and to make the history of the concentration camps of World War II more broadly accessible. Alan Resnais, whose work displays a preoccupation with war, with time, and with memory and forgetting, and who was already a well-known filmmaker, at first declined to make the film. His concern was that only a survivor and someone who had been to the camps could possibly create a film that would be able to represent the ‘univers con-centrationnaire’ authentically. The solution was found in Resnais’s collaboration with Jean Cayrol, a poet and novelist and a survivor of the Mauthausen concentration camp, who would write the commentary of the film. The third collaborator was Hanns Eisler, a composer and collaborator of Bertolt Brecht and himself a refugee from Nazi Germany. The collaboration of Resnais, Cayrol, and Eisler resulted in a rich documentary with innovative uses of imagery, text, and music.

The imagery in Nuit et brouillard—the title evokes both Hitler’s ‘Night and Fog Decree’ (Nacht-und-Nebel-Erlass) and a collection of poems by Jean Cayrol—comprises both new recordings and historical footage. These two types of film material are used alternately and signify two different time lines, which become more and more intertwined as the film proceeds. Although the first cuts from historical to contemporary footage might still take the audience by surprise, Resnais’s montage often matches images with similar structures and angles in order to create a careful interweaving of the two types of images. For example, a camera travels past rows and rows of barbed wire fences and cuts to a camera traveling past rows of marching soldiers. Or a train full of people leaves the station, followed by a cut to the camera traveling along train tracks overgrown with grass.

The first set of images consists entirely of black-and-white archival film and photo footage (taken by both the Nazis and the Allies) and includes a minor scene from Leni Riefenstahl’s 1934 propaganda documentary Triumph des Willens/Triumph of the Will about the Nazi Party rally in Nuremberg. It covers chronologically the rise of Nazism, the emergence of the concentration and extermination camps, the trains and deportations and the suffering in the camps, right until after the war when the perpetrators declare their innocence. The ordering of the material is not only chronological in the larger historical sense but also reconstructs the hypothetical journey of a deported person. The close-up photograph of the terror-widened eyes of a man upon his arrival at a camp reinforces this effect, as does the fact that once inside the camp, the camera never leaves it again. The result for the audience is a subtle identification with a deported person.

The second set of images used in Nuit et brouillard consists of contemporary footage from 1955, only ten years later than the black-and-white footage. These images of the decayed concentration camps of Auschwitz and Madjanek in Poland are shot entirely in color. The mixing of black-and-white and color in a single film was a formal innovation for documentary at the time, and its effect has lost none of its power since.

Whereas the black-and-white footage of the past chronicles historical events and includes photographic and filmic images of the victims as well as of the perpetrators, the color images of the present are produced by an investigative, subjective, and perpetually moving camera: 'No footstep is heard but our own.' The tracking camera follows closely the train tracks to the camp and then continues to scrutinize the remaining buildings, inside and outside, of the former campsite, as if the camera is looking for something. 'Today there is sunlight on those lines. We follow them slowly, seeing what? Traces of bodies that fell out when the cars were opened?' The restless camera strives to discover traces of the monumental. The assumption is that the violent death of millions of people must have left traces other than a few badly maintained buildings: 'The only traces now, if you know what they are, are on the ceiling,' the commentary informs the viewer when the camera glides through the fake shower rooms, the gas chambers. The camera's movement through the camps becomes a journey back in time, and architectural details of the campsite—a brick wall, a window, a room—trigger images of the past. It is in that gap between contemporary imagery and a voice-over imagining the past that the imagination of the audience is most active in searching for their own images of what it might have been like. When we look at contemporary images of the camps—a row of bunk beds or latrines—while at the same time listening to descriptions of the past, the past is pulled closer into the present and, by extension, closer to the viewer.

In its concern with what can and what cannot be represented, Nuit et brouillard touches on a key dilemma of art that treats 'the unimaginable'. The paradox of the impossibility of adequately representing the bureaucratic preparation and execution of millions of people in gas chambers on the one hand, and the need to bear witness on the other, also leaves its marks in this documentary. The narration faces this dilemma pointedly and on various levels. There is, for example, the use that the film makes of footage produced by the Nazis. Because there are few images of life inside the camps other than Nazi material, the perpetrators' material has a privileged position in the narration of the events. Where images are missing, contemporary images and the commentary strive to fill the gap. Additionally, there is the voice of the narrator, which at times breaks off or pauses and at other times does not finish a sentence at all, unable to find language to articulate the horror: 'With the bodies ... but words fail ... with the bodies, they tried to make soap. As for the skin ...' And finally, there is the commentary itself, which admits that 'no image, no description can capture their true dimension of constant fear'.

A novelist and poet and a survivor of the Mauthausen concentration camp, Jean Cayrol, wrote the text for Nuit et brouillard. Cayrol, who was to collaborate with Resnais again for Muriel (1963) a few years later, created a text that is precise, pragmatic, and poetic. The text, read by actor Michel Bouquet, at times sounds so laconic and so emotionally restrained as to almost appear comical. In one scene, for example, different concentration camp styles are described as though they were pieces in a design show. The effect of a voice and a text that does not sentimentalize the tragedy of the events, however, is to distance the viewer, forcing more of an intellectual than an emotional response. The more poetic parts of the text emerge when Cayrol uses metaphors and metonyms: 'death makes his first pick ... the second one is made on arrival in the night and fog'. Strikingly, Resnais and Cayrol avoid assigning specific guilt to a nation, referring instead to Nazi Germany as 'the machine'. Even more remarkable is the fact that the film makes no specific reference to the Holocaust—in the sense of the extermination of Jewish people—and makes few references to the Jews as specific victims. Once we see the Star of David sewed onto a camp inmate's jacket, but the four victims that the film names are chosen to illustrate the diversity of the victims: 'Burger, a German workman, Stern, a Jewish student in Amsterdam, Schmulski, a shopkeeper in Krakow, Annette, a schoolgirl in Bordeaux'. In addition, the commentary twice mentions the number of nine million dead, which, because it includes the non-Jewish people who died in the camps, exceeds the commonly accepted number of Holocaust victims by three million.

One reason for this may be that Jean Cayrol chose not to focus on the Jewish victims of the camps exclusively because he himself, a camp survivor whose brother had died in Oranienburg, was a Catholic. However, Cayrol and Resnais seem to be interested in yet another point: that what happened is a tragedy of unimaginable dimensions, and that the tragedy does not depend on who was killed but only on the fact that they were killed and how they were killed. The camps did not happen outside of history. They could happen again, in another place and another time: 'who watches to warn of new executioners? Do they really look that different from us?'

The third component of the film is Eisler's musical score. Eisler, one of the inventors of twelve-tone music, had been a close collaborator of Bertolt Brecht and had already composed the music for Jacques Feyder's Le grand jeu (France, 1933) and Fritz Lang's Hangmen Also Die (USA, 1942).

Eisler's musical score for Nuit et brouillard consists of two main themes played alternately. First, there is an almost sentimental melody, played by soft violins and flutes and, at times, trumpets. Then there is a more piercing, tense melody, carried by a violin's pizzicati and staccati strokes and, at times, a trumpet and a dissonant-sounding piano. One of the characteristics of Eisler's score is its constant shifting from one theme to the next and its constant changes in rhythm and pace. Often, the effect is jarring. In one scene the images show the books in which the names of the dead, as the commentary tells us, have been crossed out, while the music plays a lighthearted, almost cheerful tune. It might in fact be such variations in the music, as well as its driving pace, that carry the audience through the film and particularly through the last third, which presents the film's most brutal images. As with the voice-over, the use of music (especially its more cheerful parts) generates an alienating effect, which ultimately serves to force the audience to engage intellectually with the horror of the concentration camps.

JACOBIA DAHM

See also: Resnais, Alain

Nuit et brouillard/Night and Fog (France, 1955, 31 mins). Directed by Alain Resnais. Assistant director: André Heinrich, Jean-Charles Lauthe, and Chris Marker. Production by Philippe Lifchitz and Anatole Dauman of Argos, and Samy Halfon of Como Films. Production director: Edouard Muszaka. Cinematography by Ghislain Cloquet and Sacha Vierny (assistant). Editing: Henri Colpi and Jasmine Chasney. Editing assistant: Anne Sarraute. Special Effects: Henry Ferraud. Musical director: Georges Delerue. Music: Hanns Eisler. Commentary by Jean Cayrol. Voice by Michel Bouquet (English version: Alesander Allan, German version: Paul Celan). Historical advisors: Henri Michel and Olga Wormser. Filmed in Auschwitz and Madjanek, Poland.

Further reading

- Armes, Roy, The Cinema of Alain Resnais, London: A. Zwemmer Ltd, and New York: A.S. Barnes & Co., 1968.
- Avisar, Ilan, Screening the Holocaust: Cinema's Images of the Unimaginable, Bloomington, IN and Indianapolis, IN: Indiana University Press, 1988.
- Barnouw, Erik, Documentary: A History of the Non-Fiction Film, New York: Oxford University Press, 1993.
- Colombat, André Pierre, The Holocaust in French Film, Filmmakers No. 33, London and Metuchen, NJ: The Scarecrow Press, 1993.
- Indorf, Annette, Indelible Shadows: Film and the Holocaust, Cambridge Studies in Film, with a foreword by Elie Wiesel, third edn, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, [1983] 1989.
- Jacobsen, Wolfgang, et al., Alain Resnais, Munich: Hanser Verlag, 1990.
- LaCapra, Dominick, Representing the Holocaust: History, Theory, Trauma, Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1994.
- Monaco, James, Alain Resnais: The Role of Imagination, London: Secker and Warburg, and New York: Oxford University Press, 1978.
- Raskin, Richard, Nuit et Brouillard: On the Making, Reception and Functions of a Major Documentary Film, Aarhus: Aarhus University Press, 1987.
- Rothman, William, 'Night and Fog', in Documentary Film Classics, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1997.
- Ward, John, Alain Resnais or The Theme of Time, London: Secker and Warburg, in association with the British Film Institute, 1968.
- Warren, Charles (ed.), Beyond Document: Essays on Nonfiction Film, Hanover, NH and London: Wesleyan University Press, 1996.

Night Mail

(UK, Watt, Wright, 1936)

Night Mail was one of the most critically acclaimed films to be produced within the British documentary film movement of the 1930s. It was also one of the most commercially successful, and it remains, even today, the film most commonly identified with the movement. By 1936, when Night Mail appeared, film output at the General Post Office (GPO) Film Unit was divided between the production of relatively routine films that promoted post office services and procedures and the production of more important films that experimented with the use of sound, visual style, narrative, and editing technique. Night Mail falls into the latter of these two categories.

Night Mail was the product of collaborative, rather than individual, authorship. Although it was primarily directed by Harry Watt, Basil Wright developed the script and had overall production responsibility for the project. The resulting film was also edited by Wright and Alberto Cavalcanti. John Grierson and Stuart Legg were involved in its production. The music score was arranged by Benjamin Britten and Cavalcanti, and the rhyming verse used in the film, which was spoken by Grierson, was written by W.H. Auden. Auden was also appointed assistant director for the film. This model of team authorship was promoted at the time by Grierson as a means of developing a variety of filmmaking skills throughout his young team. However, it proved to be a source of later friction as various individuals involved in the making of Night Mail put forward competing claims for the character and quality of their contribution to the film. Cavalcanti, in particular, felt that his own crucial contribution to Night Mail had been seriously undervalued.

Night Mail is an account of the operation, over the course of a single day and night, of the Royal Mail train delivery service. It shows the various stages and procedures of that operation and interactions between workers and management. The film begins with a voice-over commentary describing how the mail is made ready and collected for transit. Then, as the train proceeds along the course of its journey, we are shown the various regional railway stations at which it collects and deposits mail. Inside the train the process of sorting goes on, and we see procedures such as the pick-up of mailbags at high speed. As the train nears its destination there is a sequence—the best-known in the film—in which the spoken verse of W.H. Auden and the music of Benjamin Britten are superimposed over montage images of racing train wheels. Finally, an emotive voice-over by Grierson emphasizes the importance of the mail to national communication.

Although the narrative architecture of Night Mail is concerned with issues of national communication and integration, the thematic centre of the film is more closely linked to representations of the regional environment. For example, the railway and mail service are represented as a set of institutional practices closely associated with traditional, provincial, and regional milieux. This elevation of the regional and indigenous above the national is further reinforced by the portrayal of the railway as separate from the metropolitan environment, and little attempt is made to link the railway and its workers with the city. Night Mail also channels representations of modern technology and institutional practice away from an account of the industry and organization of postal delivery, and into an imagistic study of the train as a powerful symbol of modernity, in its natural element speeding freely into the countryside, away from the dark city stations.

Night Mail also illustrates the existence of an underlying contradiction within Grierson's theory of documentary film. Grierson had argued that documentary should both provide substantial information about social practices, and use innovative, thematic, and stylistic technique to achieve that end. However, in a film such as Night Mail, this double imperative leads, on the one hand, to the inclusion of some relatively pedestrian descriptive sequences, and, on the other, to sequences that are far more aesthetically significant. Furthermore, although a concern with the relationship among the rural, technology, and nature lies at the heart of Night Mail, this relatively abstract, symbolic thematic concern fits uneasily with the need to describe the operation and function of routine institutional practices. As a consequence, although Night Mail contains some strikingly lyrical shots of the train traversing open moorland, and one particularly celebrated modernist montage sequence, the main body of the narrative, and much of the photography, is handled in a fairly prosaic and unoriginal manner.

In fact, Night Mail is probably most renowned for the sequence referred to above, in which the poetry of Auden and the music of Britten are superimposed over a montage of images of speeding train wheels. The origin of this sequence lies, ultimately, in Cavalcanti's interest in the creative conjunction of sound and image. Cavalcanti had been experimenting with the relationship between sound and image since the early 1930s, and his influence in this respect can be seen in films such as Pett and Pott (1934), The Song of Ceylon (1934), and Coal Face (1935), all of which were made within the documentary film movement. Coal Face, in particular, on which Cavalcanti also worked alongside Auden and Britten, contains a number of modernist stylistic techniques that were later to be more fully developed in Night Mail.

Night Mail is, ultimately, an uneven film that lacks the stylistic and symbolic potency of earlier films made within the documentary film movement, such as Drifters and The Song of Ceylon. In these films, the ambitious attempt to combine a depiction of provincial, indigenous regionalism, and national-institutional subject matter, with symbolic, 'imagist' technique, is achieved successfully. However, this is not the case with Night Mail, which remains a film of interesting sequences, rather than a fully realized and unified work. Despite this, Night Mail is one of the best-known films to emerge from the British documentary film movement, and it continues to play a role in introducing scholars to the ideas and work of the movement.

IAN AITKEN

See also: Cavalcanti, Alberto; Coal Face; Grierson, John; Jennings, Humphrey; Legg, Stuart; Watt, Harry; Wright, Basil

Night Mail (UK, GPO Film Unit, 1936, 24 mins). Distributed by Associated British Film Producers. Produced by John Grierson, Alberto Cavalcanti, and Basil Wright. Directed by Harry Watt, additional direction by Basil Wright. Shooting script by Basil Wright. Cinematography by Chick Fowle, Pat Jackson, and Jonah Jones. Assistant direction and verse by W.H.

Auden. Music by Benjamin Britten. Edited by Alberto Cavalcanti, Humphrey Jennings, and Basil Wright. Sound directed by Cavalcanti. Commentary by Stuart Legg and John Grierson. Filmed in London, Crewe, Glasgow, Edinburgh, and Dumfries.

Further reading

- Aitken, Ian, Film and Reform, London: Routledge, 1990.
 ——— The Documentary Film Movement: An Anthology, Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press, 1998.
 ——— Alberto Cavalcanti: Realism, Surrealism and National Cinemas, London: Flicks Books, 2000.
 Ellis, Jack C., John Grierson, Carbondale, IL: Southern Illinois University Press, 2000.
 Hardy, Forsyth, John Grierson: A Documentary Biography, London: Faber, 1979.
 Sussex, Elizabeth, The Rise and Fall of British Documentary, Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1975.

Now

(Cuba, Alvarez, 1965)

Now is a film to a song; it consists of seven minutes of photographs and archive footage of racism and civil rights protests in the United States, a kind of political music video avant la lettre. Using for the soundtrack a protest song by Lena Horne that had been banned in the United States, Santiago Alvarez constructs a powerful collage on racial discrimination in the United States, which he had observed during a visit many years before, on a trip from Florida, through the Deep South, and up to New York. The pre-title sequence establishes the film's ironic tone by juxtaposing shots of racist incidents in California in August 1965 and a photograph of President Johnson meeting with a group of blacks under the leadership of Martin Luther King (whom Alvarez was to eulogise on film three years later, after his assassination, in LBJ).

This short film essay is impressive not only for the resourcefulness with which it uses its found materials, including pirated newsreel, but also for the syncopation of the editing, which intensifies the insistence of the song and leads up to its militant ending more effectively than slavishly

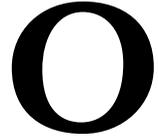

Figure 12 Now, 1965 (Courtesy of the British Film Institute)

following the music's surface beat. The rousing tune of the song is the well-known Hebrew dance 'Hava Nagila', which is associated with the pioneering period of Zionism and thus carried antifascist connotations that Lena Horne and Alvarez are both mobilising. The film quickly acquired the reputation of being a work of great and forceful originality and made Alvarez a director to be watched.

MICHAEL CHANAN

Now (Cuba, 1965, 7 mins black and white). Directed by Santiago Alvarez.

Obomsawin, Alanis

Alanis Obomsawin's films have documented the historical and contemporary struggles of the Inuit, Métis, Cree, Mohawk, Ojibway, and Mi'gmaq peoples. Her films, all made at the National Film Board, grew out of a first career as a songwriter, storyteller, and educator, and from her lifelong commitment to political activism on behalf of Canadian first nations peoples. At their most fundamental level, Obomsawin's films have given native peoples an opportunity to be heard in a number of poignant recordings of their experience. Christmas at Moose Factory (1971) used children's drawings to evoke life in an isolated northern community. Mother of Many Children (1977) is composed of interviews with women from many groups to paint a composite portrait of native matriarchy. The text of Richard Cardinal: Cry from the Diary of a Métis Child (1986) was taken from the words of a seventeen-year-old boy who committed suicide after a short lifetime in institutions and foster homes.

In many of her films, Obomsawin (also known as Kolilawato) herself is a major presence, adopting the style of the storyteller, to present not simply the immediate subject before her but also the broader contexts of native experience that have shaped it. She speaks calmly and often with great sadness. As Pick writes, 'Her work demystifies notions of disinterested observation in cinema direct by inscribing her presence in the film, as narrator and subject. In her hands, documentary practice becomes a rhetorical intervention that places the enabling subject at the centre of discourse' (Pick 1999: 77). It is in this mode that Obomsawin's film Poundmaker's Lodge: A Healing Place (1987) documents life inside a native-run treatment centre for drug and alcohol abuse, while arguing that the problem itself is the inevitable product of a long history of cultural dispossession. She uses a similar approach in No Address (1988), a film focusing on the Montréal Native Friendship Centre, as a means of exploring the larger issue of displaced natives in urban centers.

If Obomsawin's work, as Jerry White suggests, has been to create an imagined native community (White 2002: 371), that work came to fruition after the 1990 Oka Crisis. Native attempts to prevent the appropriation of an ancient burial ground near Montréal ended in a shoot-out with Québec Police, followed by a seventy-eight-day standoff between armed natives and the Canadian Army, while other natives blocked a commuter bridge to Montréal. Obomsawin's response was four films. The first of these, Kanehsatake: 270 Years of Resistance (1993) interspersed Obomsawin's footage from behind the native lines with an historical essay tracing the crisis to the first treaties between the Oka natives and French settlers. My Name is Kahenttiosta (1995) is a portrait of an Oka protester held by authorities for refusing to identify herself by anything other than her native name, and Spudwrench—Kahnawake Man (1997) depicts a steelworker who found himself a warrior behind the barricades. Obomsawin's fourth Oka film, Rocks at Whisky Trench (2000), provides historical and social context for an incident in which angry Montréal suburbanites stoned a convoy of native women and children leaving the blockade.

In her 2002 film, Is the Crown at War with Us?, Obomsawin treats a 2000 dispute between Mi'gmaq fishermen in New Brunswick and Canadian fishery officials attempting to abrogate their treaty rights.

SETH FELDMAN

Biography

Born August 31, 1932, in New Hampshire. Spent part of her childhood on the Abenaki first nations reserve near Sorel, Québec. She is a widely known native singer, songwriter, storyteller, and activist for native rights whose work was documented in Ron Kelly's film Alanis (1965). In 1967 hired as a consultant by the National Film Board (NFB), where, after preparing multimedia educational kits on native language and customs, began her career as a filmmaker with Christmas at Moose Factory in 1971. Her films are distributed widely by the NFB in Canada and abroad and have received more than thirty international awards. Has provided narration and music for other NFB work. Serves as an advisor for films on natives and women of color at the NFB and Canada Council. Inducted into the Order of Canada in 1983, and has received honorary degrees from Concordia University (1993), Carleton University (1994), and York University (1994).

Selected films

- 1971 Christmas at Moose Factory: director
- 1977 Amisk: director
- 1977 Mother of Many Children: director
- 1986 Richard Cardinal: Cry from the Diary of a Métis Child: director
- 1987 Poundmaker's Lodge: A Healing Place: director
- 1988 No Address: director
- 1993 Kanehsatake: 270 Years of Resistance: director
- 1995 My Name is Kahenttiosta: director
- 1997 Spudwrench—Kahnawake Man: director
- 2000 Rocks at Whisky Trench: director
- 2002 Is the Crown at War with Us?: director

Further reading

- Alioff, Maurie and Schouten Levine, Susan, 'The Long Walk of Alanis Obomsawin', Cinema Canada 142, 1987: 10–15.
- Doxtater, Mike, 'Alanis Obomsawin', Native People 12, 1979: 13.

Gittings, Christopher E., Canadian National Cinema, London: Routledge, 2002, pp.217–25.

Pick, Zuzana, 'Storytelling and Resistance: The Documentary Practice of Alanis Obomsawin', in Kay Armatage, Kass Banning and Brenda Longfellow (eds), Gendering the Nation, Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1999: 76–93.

White, Jerry, 'Alanis Obomsawin, Documentary Form and the Canadian Nation(s)', in William Beard and Jerry White (eds), North of Everything: English-Canadian Cinema Since 1980, Edmonton: University of Alberta Press, 2002: 364–75.

Olympia

(Germany, Riefenstahl, 1938)

Olympia, Leni Riefenstahl's documentary on the Olympic Games held in Berlin, Germany, in 1936 creates a fusion of art film and sports documentary that no director since has achieved. The film has been hailed by some critics and film historians as a masterpiece. Others have condemned it as National Socialist propaganda. Both positions have validity, depending on one's point of departure when analyzing the film. Divorced from its Nazi context, the director's bravura style is equaled in few documentaries and could support any ideology in which physical strength plays an important role, but embedded in the political, historical context of the Third Reich, Riefenstahl's camera work, editing, lighting, and settings evoke images of power and sacrifice that are the hallmarks of a fascist aesthetic.

Riefenstahl herself was the most active champion of separating her films from the political, historical context of the Third Reich. The director never tired of insisting that her documentary Triumph des Willens/Triumph of the Will (1935) is not political in nature, except in the sense that it is a document of a National Socialist rally. In similar fashion, in interviews and print, she repeatedly argued that Olympia is not a documentation of Hitler's or the Nazi's Olympic Games, but a film about the Olympics, which happened to take place in Berlin that year. In a lengthy defense of her film before the Filmbewertungsstelle (Committee of Film Review) in 1958, in an attempt to get her film released for public showing in West Germany, Riefenstahl argued that 'until its premiere, no National Socialist official had seen any of the film', and that, moreover, 'the Olympic film had no scenes that glorified the National Socialist regime' (in Graham 1986: 280). Her supporters have echoed this defense, citing the film's emphasis on the victories of Jesse Owens, the African American athlete from the United States; the surprisingly few shots of Hitler, the Nazi flag, or other references to the Third Reich; and most of all the way in which the film elevates human effort, not German effort, through excellence in sport.

Detractors, of whom Susan Sontag is perhaps the most well known, use these same points to discredit the film. For example, the emphasis on physical beauty and performance sport suggests allegiance to the aesthetics of fascism, which she defines as 'situations of control, submissive behavior and extravagant effort'. The film's critics also emphasize that Olympia, as well as being an excellent sports film, was also a great public relations vehicle for the Third Reich at a time when the world was beginning to question internal politics in the country.

On the one hand, the politics of those who criticize or praise the film, as well as the politics of the film itself, influences their positions on Riefenstahl's Olympia. The harshest critics have been Americans, both those writing at the time of the film's release and postwar American critics. However, West German critics have also been disapproving, Ulrich Gregor and Karsten Witte being two of the most critical. Witte challenges Riefenstahl's claims that the film is politically neutral by pointing out the militaristic tone of the commentary as well as the chauvinistic tone of the film (Witte 1993: 131). Yet all commentators, regardless of their political leanings, tend to use phrases drawn from the lexicon of combat to announce sporting contests, and the English commentator is no less biased in his reporting of the English athletes than the German commentator is in his remarks about the Germans. The most favorable reviews came from contemporary critics in Germany, France, and Sweden. Finally, postwar film critics who focus on the film as film, not as historical document, tend to support Riefenstahl's claims of neutrality.

Figure 13 Olympiad (aka Olympia 1. Teil-Fest der Volker), 1938 (Courtesy of the Everett Collection)

On the other hand, ambiguity originates in the nature of Olympia itself, for the film documents both the games and the setting for those games. Moreover, in both instances, Riefenstahl has shaped the raw material through placement of images and inclusion or exclusion of information.

Consisting of two parts, Fest der Völker/Festival of the People, and Fest der Schönheit/Festival of Beauty, Riefenstahl's Olympia has three major themes: individual accomplishment in sports, the unifying power of athletic events, and Germany's place in the seemingly harmonious world of athletes. Through the artistry of her directing—camera work, editing, mise-en-scène, lighting, and music—she interprets sports competitions (whether contests of strength, skill, or endurance) as celebrations of physical beauty. Furthermore, she champions the accomplishments of the individual within the collective of high-performance athletics. Finally, she locates Berlin, Germany, within a community of nations tracing their origins back to ancient Greece. Thus, through the formal means already on display in Triumph des Willens, Riefenstahl transforms the expected content of a sports document (athletic events, athletes, crowds, victory and defeat) into a paean to sacrifice for an abstract ideal.

In its presentation of individual competitions, Olympia eschews political favoritism and avoids fascist aesthetics. Part 1, Fest der Völker, devotes over half of its nearly two hours to individual accomplishments from discus throwing to relay racing. Part 2, Fest der Schönheit, also devotes over half of its one-and-a-third hours to competition, from yacht racing to team sports events. In all of these events Riefenstahl focuses on the top athletes in the field, who more often than not come from nations other than Germany.

To ensure that events would be as exciting for viewers after the fact as for spectators at the games, Riefenstahl films from odd angles, from high above the event or trenches below the event, from under the water, and from cameras specifically constructed to race along on tracks beside the runners. To obtain optimal viewing position for events such as yacht racing, skulls, and diving, the director included footage from practice sessions, when cameras were allowed to intrude more on the space of the competition. In addition, she had some contests reenacted after the event to be sure that the winners are highlighted in the finished film.

In spite of her resorting to such cinematic tricks and deception, however, the sports information presented is free of ideology. At no time does Riefenstahl emphasize German athletes over the athletes of any other nation, except when they are the winners of an event. Furthermore, she showcases the individual events in which Jesse Owens excelled, thus ensuring the African American athlete a high profile in the finished documentary. The ten-minute section on the decathlon creates suspense by emphasizing the changing rankings of the top three participants, all Americans. For the victory ceremony in this contest, the film focuses on the US flag and America's anthem. In similar fashion, she showcases many of the winners of individual games, always highlighting the anthem and flag of the appropriate country, be it Great Britain, France, Finland, or Germany. Finally, Riefenstahl focuses attention on individual effort or team effort, whichever is relevant to the sport, without relegating the athlete and his or her accomplishment to a secondary position behind his or her nation. That is, the individual athlete wins, not the country that the athlete represents.

Besides documenting athletic ability and endurance, Olympia celebrates physical beauty through lighting, camera placement, and choice of faces and bodies. Moreover, it often places these beautiful images within a greater community of athletes. This is particularly evident in the nonathletic events and in those that are presented outside of a competitive narrative. Thus the opening of each of the individual films dwells on the perfect human form. Fest der Völker showcases the ideal beauty found in Greek sculptures of the human body, shots of individual statues dissolving into live human forms. In similar fashion, the first sequence of Fest der Schönheit devotes over five minutes—longer than the time allocated to some of the sporting events—to naked male athletes running through the woods, emerging from a lake, playing in a sauna, and relaxing on a deck of their Olympic village. Riefenstahl also focuses on physical form, rather than on the athletic event, in some of the sports competitions. In the javelin throw the camera stays on an individual athlete's form as he runs and releases the javelin, rather than following the object to see how far it has been thrown. She edits the five-hour pole vaulting event into ten minutes, filming the athletes from below against an ominous sky and from above, then finally filming the human forms in shadow. In both of these events, the individual contestants recede into the totality of the communal event. These sequences lend Olympia its undeniable beauty, but they also suggest Riefenstahl's acquiescence to her and the Nazis' cult of physical perfection as desirable for the community. Moreover, they support the claims of her detractors that the film glorifies physical strength and beauty to the exclusion of other human values and attributes.

Olympia's competitive and non-competitive footage when viewed within the film's historical context does indeed suggest an ideological purpose behind the documentary. The Nuremberg laws denying Jews their rightful citizenship in Germany were passed in 1935, turning official international public opinion against the country.

There was an unsuccessful attempt to withdraw the games from Berlin, which had been chosen to host the games before the Nazis assumed power. America threatened to boycott the Berlin Games because of Germany's racial policies. Seen from this historical perspective, even the neutral, non-objectionable elements of Olympia seem orchestrated to present a Germany that did not exist—one that did not practice anti-Semitism, welcomed black athletes, and believed in peace and harmony. In short, Olympia offers a picture of Germany quite different from that found in Triumph des Willens. Although both films present Germany as a peace-loving nation, Triumph des Willens situates the Third Reich within the country's Pan-German borders and emphasizes the country's link to its past. Moreover, it portrays the nation's growing nationalism as a source of power and pride. Olympia, on the other hand, locates Germany within the world of nations. Power and pride accrue to the community through the accomplishments of individuals.

The opening sequence of Fest der Völker suggests how much Riefenstahl intended the film to present Nazi Germany as heir to antiquity and guarantor of peace in central Europe. As the film begins, the camera lingers on the ruins of ancient Greece, panning slowly as stones give way to columns that give way to an entire structure, which dissolves into the Berlin stadium. Then, for the lighting of the torch, the film begins with an athlete in Greece who runs and passes the torch on to the next runner, and so on and on, in a sequence that takes viewers through all of Greece and Middle Europe until the flame reaches Berlin. The sequence, which takes twenty minutes, places Germany in an honored position, as heir to the ideals of ancient Greece, as a nation in the middle of Europe that desires to uphold those ideals.

Olympia closes with a three-minute ceremony of bells ringing, focusing until the end on the Olympic flame, whose rays form a sun that radiates over the screen as the last shot of the documentary. This close is preceded by perhaps the most famous sequence of the movie: a diving sequence almost five minutes long that supports both an apolitical and an ideological reading of the film. As the sequence begins, Riefenstahl chooses shots that focus on individual divers as they spring from the board, glide through the air, and enter the water. As it continues, the tempo increases so that the time between dives is reduced; simultaneously, less and less emphasis is placed on divers entering the water. Eventually the shots focus only on the start of the dive, as the athletes spring from the board and glide—even fly—through the air. In one instance, a reverse shot carries a diver first into the air then backwards so that he soars like a bird. Increasingly the divers are filmed from below, silhouetting their bodies against clouds in the sky. Finally, divers are filmed falling off the high platform singly and in twos, their arms outstretched as if falling on faith that they will be caught, as indeed the angle that highlights their silhouettes sailing through the sky suggests. In this sequence, as Riefenstahl's supporters might note, the individual event has been transformed into a display of abstract beauty, devoid of political or ideological intentions. Detractors, on the other hand, might say that the divers have been transfigured into objects or film props for illustrating the idea of sacrifice.

ROBERT C. REIMER

See also: Riefenstahl, Leni

Olympia (Germany, 1938, 201 mins). Distributed by Belle & Blade Studios. Produced by the International Olympic Committee, Olympia Film, and Tobis Filmkunst. Directed, written, produced, and edited by Leni Riefenstahl. Original music by Herbert Windt. Nonoriginal music by Richard Strauss.

Further reading

- Berg-Pan, Renata, Leni Riefenstahl, Boston: Twayne Publishers, 1980.
- Graham, Cooper C., Leni Riefenstahl and Olympia, Metuchen, NJ, and London: Scarecrow Press, 1986.
- Hinton, David B., The Films of Leni Riefenstahl, Metuchen, NJ, and London: Scarecrow Press, 1978.
- Hull, David Stewart, Film in the Third Reich: A Study of the German Cinema 1933–45, Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1969.
- Infield, Glenn B., Leni Riefenstahl: The Fallen Film Goddess, New York: Thomas Y Crowell, 1976.
- Kracauer, Siegfried, From Caligari to Hitler: A Psychological Study of the German Film, Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1947.
- Mueller, Ray, Die Macht der Bilder Leni Riefenstahls, New York: Kino Video, 1993.
- Schwartzman, Roy J., 'Racial Theory and Propaganda in Triumph of the Will', in Bonnie Braendlin and Hans Braendlin (eds), Authority and Transgression in Literature and Film, Gainesville, FL: University Press of Florida, 1996: 136–51.
- Sontag, Susan, 'Fascinating Fascism', New York Review of Books, February 6, 1975: 23–5.
- Witte, Karsten, 'Film im Nationalsozialismus: Blendung und Überblendung', in Wolfgang Jacobsen, Anton Kaes and Hans Helmut Prinzler (eds), Geschichte des deutschen Films, Stuttgart and Weimar: J.B. Metzler, 1993.

On the Bowery(US, Rogosin, 1957)

On the Bowery followed the models and demonstrated the viability of a narrative documentary approach made evident in Robert Flaherty's Louisiana Story and Sidney Meyers's The Quiet One (both 1948). It was Lionel Rogosin's first film, financed with his own money (his father was a wealthy industrialist). The other crew members had had considerable experience: Richard Bagley was cinematographer on The Quiet One. Rogosin conceived of the idea for his film over several years of research on New York City's infamous skid row.

On the Bowery was an extraordinary breakthrough in a number of ways. Its subject matter—the ravages of alcohol on human life, the degradation of a derelict existence—had been used often enough in conventional fiction features. What was unusual here was the taking of the camera (mostly a 35mm Arriflex with a four-hundred-foot magazine) and tape recorder into the actual jungle of metropolitan life, which enabled a much closer look at this particular reality than audiences were used to.

This film was also different from conventional documentaries, especially in that it had a slight storyline and developed, to a limited degree, characters who interact with each other. Three men who play the main roles are followed; one of them in particular, an ex-lawyer who had been unable to cope with the pressures of his previous life, becomes the basis of the narrative structure.

The problems of making this kind of film, from a production standpoint, are, of course, enormous—human problems as well as technical problems. Not only are the filmmakers working in a situation that demands maximum tact and care, innumerable clearances, and cooperation that may or may not be volunteered, but they must also lead nonactors through performances, get them to deliver lines, and teach them to behave as though the camera were not there. The film was made just before the availability of the technology that would make possible what would become cinéma vérité and/or direct cinema. At the time, it seemed to many filmmakers and critics to open up a whole new production method and range of subject matter.

Veteran British documentarian Basil Wright wrote of it, 'On the Bowery is neither a propaganda film nor a piece of reportage. It is a film made from the inside, in the way Flaherty made Nanook and Moana[...] In the bars and on the sidewalks, the camera leans sympathetically across table or grating towards these men and women who have passed the point of no return, and have reached a hideous sort of happiness achieved at best by gin and whisky, and at worst (when purchasing power has gone) by a shared squeeze from a can of metal-polish' (Sight and Sound, Autumn 1956). On the Bowery received first prizes at the Venice International Film Festival and from the British Film Academy.

JACK C. ELLIS

See also: Rogosin, Lionel

On the Bowery (US, Lionel Rogosin in association with the other crew members credited, 1957, 65 mins). Distributed by Contemporary Films. Produced and directed by Lionel Rogosin. Written by Mark Sufrin. Cinematography by Richard Bagley. Edited by Carl Lerner. Filmed in New York City.

Ophüls, Marcel

Ophüls's style of documentary filmmaking represents in many ways a synthesis of two forms: the compilation film and cinéma vérité. The historical perspective of the compilation film, constructed through editing to form a type of nonfiction narrative, is combined with interview techniques in an effort to come to terms with a past event. This style is most evident in two of Ophüls's most famous works, The Sorrow and the Pity (1971) and Hotel Terminus: The Life and Times of Klaus Barbie (1988). Ophüls's style was influenced by the work of Emile de Antonio, as well as by the historical compilation films of television and the films of Jean Rouch. The documentarist also relied heavily on advances in technology that enabled him to go into the field to conduct interviews and use small film crews. Ophüls is very much representative of the documentary approach known as participatory or interactive, whereby the filmmaker is a presence in his or her work. This type of approach relies on the interview process to help reveal a kind of truth. When it is combined with archival historical film footage, it presents a selection and arrangement of material that often, in Ophüls's case, is juxtaposed to create an effect on the spectator. According to Bill Nichols, 'The filmmaker's felt presence as a center of attention for the social actors as well as the viewer leads to an emphasis on the act of gathering information or building knowledge, the process of social and historical interpretation, and the effect of the encounter between people and filmmakers when that experience may directly alter the lives of all involved' (Nichols 1991). This style was unique for its time and has influenced other documentary filmmakers, such as Peter Davis and Michael Moore.

Ophüls's worldview was shaped by several factors, including the political turmoil of the 1960s both in America and Europe, the culture shock of being a European émigré in Hollywood, and his father's filmmaking style and sensibilities. The chaotic events of the 1960s—political assassinations, the Vietnam War, and the student protest movement—set the tone for a questioning of authority, as well as the historical record of the past. The culture shock of being a European (German-French) in America allowed for a questioning of both cultural and familial values. The classic style of narrative filmmaking of both European and American cinema invited a questioning of those as well. His father's fluid camera technique and deliberate composition enabled viewers to become a part of the narrative, determining for themselves the 'truth' within a pseudo-realistic mise-en-scène. What Ophüls is able to do is to synthesize these influences into his own unique approach to documentary film.

The compilation film had become a mainstay of documentary filmmaking since the pioneering work of Soviet documentarist Esfir Shub. The use of archival footage to provide an historical account of events was a tool in such works as Louis de Rochemont's The March of Time and Frank Capra's Why We Fight series. It wasn't until the 1960s and the films of Emile de Antonio that the compilation film was used to critique the past rather than valorize it. De Antonio's Point of Order (1963) used archival television footage of the McCarthy-Army hearings as social and historical critique of the communist witch hunts of the 1950s. Although de Antonio does not use contemporary interviews in this film, he does use them in his subsequent work, providing, as Randolph Lewis has suggested, a 'dialectic between past and present' (Lewis 2000). This 'dialectic' is very much a part of the documentary approach of Marcel Ophüls.

The primary themes that underlie Ophüls's films are history and memory. In films such as The Sorrow and the Pity, Memory of Justice, Hotel Terminus: The Life and Times of Klaus Barbie, and Munich, or Peace in Our Time, the filmmaker concentrates on events of the past and how people remember them. Ophüls is concerned with perception and truth, and he focuses on historical events and people's perception of them. Ophüls often moves back and forth from the past (using newsreel footage) to the present (with contemporary interviews) in order to situate the perception of events being described. It is here that the influence not only of cinéma vérité (in the use of interviews) but also of broadcast journalism reportage is most apparent. The appearance of cinéma vérité in the 1960s with films such as Jean Rouch's Chronique d'un été/ Chronicle of a Summer (1961) and the use of lightweight, portable equipment, allowed the filmmaker a more intimate access to subjects. Ophüls utilizes these innovations to enhance his ability to edit his found footage, complementing it with interviews to recollect the past, and in his juxtaposition of images come to terms with that past. Ophüls uses an interview technique that often catches his subjects off guard, but only after they have relaxed in the interview process. In this regard, Ophüls is very much a provocateur, who has an agenda all along but simply waits for the right moment to announce it. It is very much a controlled form of documentary in its reliance on editing. Ophüls's documentaries also concern national identity and question the perception of a single collective viewpoint.

The primary characteristics of Ophüls's style include the lack of voice-over narration, the use of archival footage juxtaposed with contemporary interviews, the use of nondiegetic music juxtaposed with both archival footage and interviews, an epic length, the presence of the filmmaker himself (within the interviews, or seen reflected in a mirror, or simply heard), and an often ironic tone that becomes noticeable during the course of the film. Although the compilation film itself used a voice-over narrator, Ophüls eschews this approach in favor of a journalistic interview technique that is revelatory. The director allows time for revelations to emerge and, during the editing process, juxtaposes archival footage with the interviews to create certain effects. Sometimes these effects are achieved by the use of feature film footage as well as music or songs to effect irony. Recordings of Maurice Chevalier, for instance, are used in certain parts of The Sorrow and the Pity to create not only nostalgia for the past, but also the devil-may-care attitude that Ophüls's film associates with Occupied France during World War II. Form follows function in Ophüls's films. Because Ophüls's primary interest is in the subjects of memory and history, historical recollection is part of the interview process. This historical memory is coupled with newsreel footage pertaining to the event itself. Any historical event is never merely one-sided, so the interview process must include a number of subjects. Ophüls could simply have made a compilation film from the archival footage itself, but instead, through interviews and their juxtaposition with filmic images of the past, he offers the viewer a perception of truth—or at least suggests a questioning of the historical record. The filmmaker's presence (more noticeable in Ophüls's later films, beginning with Hotel Terminus) provides additional insight into the recollection of events. The filmmaker essentially becomes not only a catalyst, but also a character, in the film's narrative: a searcher, as well as a researcher, for historical truth. Ophüls incorporates dozens of interviews in order to show the wide range of choices and recollections of a particular event. According to one critic, 'The brilliance of Ophüls's editing lies in its capacity to pose uncomfortable questions for the viewer—or, to put it another way, [in] its capacity to force the viewer into uncomfortable subject-positions in relation to the material [...] Ophüls's editing obliges the viewer to ask, Whom do I believe and who do I think is lying? Whose ideas do I share? Whom do I identify with? Where are my loyalties?' (Suleiman 2002).

RONALD WILSON

See also: Sorrow and the Pity, The

Biography

Born in Frankfurt-am-Main on November 1, 1927. The only son of film director Max Ophüls and actress Hilde Wall. Became a French citizen in 1938, then an American citizen in 1950. He attended Hollywood High School and graduated in 1945. In 1946 he was in service with a theatrical unit of the US occupation forces in Japan. He furthered his education at Occidental College and then the University of California at Berkeley. Returning with his family to France in 1950, he attended the Sorbonne, where he studied philosophy. In 1951 he began to work in the French film industry as a third assistant director using the name Marcel Wall. He worked as an assistant to such directors as Julien Duvivier, John Huston, Anatole Litvak, and his own father, Max Ophüls. Between 1956 and 1959 he served as radio and TV story editor for Sudwestfunk, Baden-Baden, West Germany. He eventually debuted as a radio and stage director and also directed four productions for German television. Ophüls returned in 1960 to Paris, where he began to write and direct filmscripts, also contributing articles to Cahiers du Cinéma. In 1966 he worked for ORTF (French TV monopoly) as a reporter and director for news magazine features, and during this period Ophüls developed his interview technique. In 1967 he directed his first major historical documentary feature film, Munich, or Peace in Our Time, for ORTF: it was broadcast over two evenings. In the wake of the May 1968 uprisings he moved to Hamburg, where he became the senior story editor at NDR (German TV). In 1971 he directed The Sorrow and the Pity for German and Swiss TV. Between 1973 and 1974 he was the Senior Visting Fellow, Council of the Humanities, at Princeton University. From 1975 to 1978 Ophüls served as the staff producer at CBS News and then at ABC News. In 1979 he returned to Europe and resumed making television documentaries. Between 1980 and 1983 he contributed articles to various journals, including American Film, Positif, and Les Nouvelles Littéraires. Since 1995 he has lived in retirement in the south of France.

Selected films

- 1967 Munich, ou la paix pour cent ans/
Munich, or Peace in Our Time: director
- 1969–71 Le Chagrin et la pitié/The Sorrow and the Pity: director, writer
- 1976 The Memory of Justice: director
- 1988 Hotel Terminus: The Life and Times of Klaus Barbie: director, writer
- 1992 Jours en Novembre—Voix et che-mins/November Days: director
- 1994 Veillées d'armes/The Troubles
We've Seen: A History of Journalism in Wartime: director

Further reading

- Ciment, Michel, 'Joy to the World! An Interview with Marcel Ophüls', American Film XIII, 10, September, 1988.
- Ellickson, Lee, 'The Troubles He's Seen: An Interview with Marcel Ophüls', Cinéaste 21, no. 3, summer 1995.
- Greene, Naomi, 'La Vie en Rose: Images of the Occupation in French Cinema', in Lawrence D. Kristman (ed.), Auschwitz and After: Race, Culture and the Jewish Question in France, New York: Routledge, 1995.
- Hoffman, Stanley, Introduction to The Sorrow and the Pity: A Film by Marcel Ophüls, New York: Outerbridge & Lazard, 1972.
- Jacobsen, Kurt, 'Memories of Injustice: Marcel Ophüls' "Cinema of Conscience"', Film Comment, July–August, 1996.
- James, Carol Plyley, 'Documentary & Allegory: History Moralized in Le Chagrin et la Pitié', The French Review LIX, no. 1, October 1985.
- Lewis, Randolph, Emile de Antonio: Radical Filmmaker in Cold War America, Madison, WI: University of Wisconsin Press, 2000.
- Nichols, Bill, Representing Reality: Issues and Concepts in Documentary Film, Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press, 1991.

Suleiman, Susan Rubin, 'History, Memory, and Moral Judgement in Documentary Film: On Marcel Ophüls' Hotel Terminus', Critical Inquiry 28, winter 2002.

O'Rourke, Dennis

Dennis O'Rourke, a noted Australian documentary filmmaker with an established international reputation in Australia, Europe, and North America, has focused mainly on the dissonances between European and traditional cultures. His films are located in various Southwest Pacific cultures, including Australia, Papua New Guinea, and Micronesia. O'Rourke typically expresses his subject matter through his own strong ideological frames. In Yap ... How Did You Know We'd Like TV? (1980), O'Rourke films the cultural impact of the United States' gratuitous introduction of television on the life ways of the Yapese people when Yap ceased to be a US trust territory. O'Rourke infuses local suspicion of the United States into Yap, hinting that the unasked-for television service, replete with commercials for Western-style processed foods and goods, was an act of US cultural imperialism designed to keep Yap within the American sphere of strategic influence.

O'Rourke theorises his reflexive documentary practice. For example, in making Cannibal Tours (1988), O'Rourke rejected 'the sanctimonious position of the documentary filmmaker as culture hero', because his project is 'to subvert the normal narrative expectations so that the documentary form can address the unquantifiable and the metaphysical' (O'Rourke 1989). The Western tourists of Cannibal Tours are 'representative of a particular development in Western culture—a high bourgeois value oriented system which has an ignorant relationship to the other cultures, especially black ones' (O'Rourke 1989). O'Rourke states that the tourists' cameras are an icon of preferring technical to cultural values, and by presenting the tourists' images of the Papua New Guineans, he forces the viewer to shift focus. By asking questions but offering no answers, Cannibal Tours 'is trying to make a window into the unfathomable'.

O'Rourke avoids the term documentary, preferring the term nonfiction film: 'the so-called documentary is dry, it's about facts, it's about Truth with a capital T. And I've always been interested in Emotion with a capital E' (Hawker 2001). After the making of the highly controversial The Good Woman of Bangkok (1991), for which O'Rourke lived with a Thai prostitute, Aoi, O'Rourke wrote:

Always, for it to work, the filming process must be an ordeal of contact with perceived reality—I must place myself within the flux of what I am attempting to film in order to discover the authenticity of peoples and places, and to fix my emotional perspective within a social and political process, which is not academic. The process is empirical, emotional and instinctive. I always try not to be rational but instead to trust my intuition and my feelings. In fact, I think you have to be irrational, because when you try to be rational the true meaning and beauty of any moment or idea will escape you.

(O'Rourke 2002: 1)

O'Rourke vehemently rejects as fantasy any idea that the documentary film can be some kind of pure and unproblematic representation of reality (O'Rourke 2002: 2). He derides documentary filmmakers whose approach to truth makes them implicitly the 'heroic protagonists' of their own films and the 'moral shield of the spectator'. He attacks the notion of the documentary as offering 'palatable truth' designed to make the audience feel good as 'part of an enlightened elite' (ibid). He attacks moralising critics whose frame of reference is journalistic news and current affairs programmes, which O'Rourke regards as 'the most crude form of storytelling that exists' (O'Rourke 2002: 5). His heresy, O'Rourke says, is his belief that truth is 'ultimate and undefinable' and 'messy and upsetting' (ibid). The Good Woman of Bangkok was meant to be 'a critique of prevailing notions of "higher claims to truth" in the documentary film genre' embedded in the term (O'Rourke 2002: 2).

O'Rourke contests the definition of documentary, describing the term as misleading and more acceptably used as an adjective. The documentary, he says, is an artefact, so he prefers the category documentary fiction film, which uses 'some of the techniques of the traditional documentary, but ignores and then subverts the naturally accepted implication of truth and meaning that these techniques foster' 'The authenticity of the film—its "truth"—is entirely subjective' (O'Rourke 2002: 4). This results in the challenge of representation, which is 'how to articulate the relationship of the subject to the author to the audience [...] In all my films, the observed reality—the subjective experience of observation—is coated with "re-description", which becomes another narrative and [...] more complex experience' (ibid). Re-description is a voyeuristic process that puts the viewer both inside and outside the frame simultaneously and introduces self-recognition and embarrassment, which O'Rourke sees as the true subject of the film (O'Rourke 2002: 5). For example, O'Rourke states that in The Good Woman of Bangkok, 'we can recognise the imperfections of the "film maker" character in his naïve, imperialistic and morally impossible stances—and we can recognise something about ourselves' (ibid). This self-recognition is painful for the professional critics who, in a 'post-religious world' of dogma and the drive 'to judge before we understand', recall Goddard's comment that 'critics are like soldiers who fire on their own men' (ibid). O'Rourke observes, 'I don't make the film, but the film makes me' (Sheffield International Documentary Festival 2001: 1). In The Good Woman O'Rourke hoped that, 'as with Brecht, the work would confront members of the audience with a vision of themselves, thus forcing the consideration of how personal sexuality affects our political and philosophical beliefs. We are all implicated in some way' (ibid).

For Cunnamulla (2000), which was his first film set in Australia and which resulted in legal action against O'Rourke in 2002 for deceptive and misleading conduct by two underage girls who appeared in the documentary, O'Rourke lived in the western Queensland rural town of Cunnamulla for nine months, establishing relationships with local people and then filming them. This was typically his 'intimate contract' with the people he wished to film that would demonstrate the fallacy of the subject/object dichotomy of the documentarist. O'Rourke was attracted to an Australian rural town as an expression of his disgust at what he saw as the marginalisation and neglect of country people by politicians and the elite metropolitan media. He said that he chose a Queensland town deliberately: 'I do believe there's something about Queensland [...] I can't pin it down, but as you cross the border, things turn gothic [...] something happens' (n.a. 2002).

BRUCE HORSFIELD

See also: Good Woman of Bangkok, The

Biography

Born in Brisbane in 1945. After travelling in the Outback, the Pacific Islands, and South-East Asia, taught himself photography and was a photojournalist before becoming a cinematographer for the Australian Broadcasting Commission. Lived for five years in the decolonising Papua New Guinea, working for the new government teaching documentary filmmaking to Papua New Guineans. Has won the American Film Festival Blue Ribbon Award, the Jury Prize at the Berlin Film Festival, the Eastman Kodak Award for Best Cinematography, the Director's Prize for Extraordinary Achievement at the Sundance Film Festival, and the Australian Film Institute's Byron Kennedy Award.

Selected films

- 1976 Yumi Yet—Independence for Papua New Guinea
- 1976 Ileksen—Politics in Papua New Guinea
- 1980 Yap ... How Did You Know We'd Like TV?
- 1982 The Shark Callers of Kontu
- 1984 Couldn't Be Fairer
- 1985 Half Life—A Parable for the Nuclear Age
- 1988 Cannibal Tours
- 1991 The Good Woman of Bangkok
- 1993 The Pagoda da Tia Beth
- 2000 Cunnamulla

Further reading

- Hawker, Philippa, 'Inciting Indignation with a Capital I', www.theage.com.au, 2001.
- n.a., 'Dennis O'Rourke: Australian Contemporary Filmmaker', (film), The Australian Film, Television and Radio School, Sydney, 1989.
- n.a., 'O'Rourke, Dennis: Cunnamulla', Urban Cinephile, www.urbancinephile.com.au, May 25, 2002.
- O'Rourke, Dennis, 'Documenting a Life—Documentary Fictions: Bibliography, Truth and Moral Lies', National Library of Australia, May 2002.

Sheffield International Documentary Festival, 'Dennis O'Rourke Masterclass: "I Don't Make the Film, But the Film Makes Me"', Programme Schedule, October 22–8, 2001, www.sidf.co.uk/festival01/programme/sessions/dennis_ourourke.htm (accessed 24 May 2002).

Ottinger, Ulrike

For much of her career, Ulrike Ottinger focused on making fictional, feature-length films, the only notable exception being Berlin-Fieber, Happening für Ada (1973), a short documentary about the German artist Wolf Vostell. Although she is a major German filmmaker, Ottinger's documentaries are generally overlooked in contemporary documentary film studies.

The subject of her first lengthy documentary, China, der Alltag, die Künste (1985), is daily life in China. It was shot in the tradition of the travelog, as interpreted by Michelangelo Antonioni in the 1970s, while scouting locations for Johanna d'Arc of Mongolia (1988). Ottinger's conception of documentary film becomes apparent in the chronological structure of her itinerary, indicating her conviction that the camera should play the role of a central instrument of perception able to record the visible life of public spaces. The observing function of the camera is its primary function. The structure of Ottinger's documentary is based on following the traveller's route in long sequences, with linear editing.

Ottinger eschewed commentary, in keeping with her belief that the camera will record reality and that the documentary cannot presume to interpret or gloss that reality. Her approach to documentary filmmaking is to depict the world without embracing or suggesting any sort of personal or political context. The primary intrusions into an unmediated recording experience are the simple captions that Ottinger employs. However, in an attempt to maintain an unmediated experience, she does not use any interviews or footage external to the events at hand.

In keeping with Ottinger's method of radical empiricism, production is carried out cautiously and conservatively. Her films are shot by small crews. Ottinger herself frequently did the 16mm camera work.

In Taiga (1991–2), her documentary about the life of nomads in Mongolia, Ottinger's film-making aesthetic is consistently maintained over the course of five hundred and one minutes. She did the same in Countdown (1990), a three-hour documentary about the ten days in Berlin preceding the reunification of East and West Germany. Exil Shanghai (1997), two hundred and seventy-five minutes long and based on interviews, traces the lives of six Jewish emigrants who escaped from Hitler's Germany and Stalinist Russia to Shanghai. In this film Ottinger modified her style by editing a montage of historical print documents and photographs, combining this with what her travelling camera recorded in the contemporary Chinese city, and filming long takes in which she searches for the lost places of emigrant history. With Southeast Passage: A Journey to New Blank Spots on the European Map (2002), Ottinger returned to her concept of cross-country chronicle. In this examination of residents of Berlin, Istanbul, and Odessa—those on the edge of Europe, who had not benefited from the end of the Cold War—she used a digital camera for the first time.

ANNETTE DEEKEN

Biography

Born in Konstanz, Germany, on June 6, 1942. Studied art in Munich from 1959 to 1961, worked as artist (painting and photography) in Paris. Since 1973 living in Berlin, Germany. First film in 1972 Laokoon & Söhne. Founded her own film production company. Since 1978 photo exhibitions, radio plays, theater productions, and feature films, such as Madame X, Eine absolute Herrscherin (1977), and Freak Orlando (1981). 2002 Invitation to the world art exhibition Documenta 11, Kassel, Germany.

Selected films

- | | |
|--------|--|
| 1973 | Berlin-Fieber, Happening für Ada |
| 1985 | China, der Alltag, die Künste |
| 1990 | Countdown |
| 1991–2 | Taiga |
| 1997 | Exil Shanghai |
| 2002 | Southeast Passage: A Journey to New Blank Spots on the European Map |

Further reading

- Deeken, Annette, Ästhetik des Reisefilms, Remscheid: Gardez-Verlag, 2004.
- Freunde der Deutschen, Kinemathek e.V., Ulrike Ottinger, Berlin: Kinemathek, no. 86, 2001.
- Ottinger, Ulrike, Taiga. Eine Reise ins nördliche Land der Mongolen, Berlin: Verlag Dirk Nishen, 1993.
- Schöning, Jörg, 'Ulrike Ottinger: Filmemacherin', Cinograph: Lexikon zum deutschsprachigen Film, Lieferung, no. 11, München, 1988.

P

Parer, Damien

Damien Parer is Australia's most respected war photographer. His 'moment' was World War II, when he filmed the experiences of the ordinary soldier close to or in contact with the enemy in North Africa, New Guinea, and the Southwest Pacific. He won Australia's first Academy Award for his Kokoda Front Line, documenting the grim jungle war against the Japanese in Papua New Guinea. Parer grew up during the Great Depression in the milieu of Australian Irish Catholic anti-British feeling and the ideological struggles in 1930s Europe, becoming a committed Catholic, political liberal, and social egalitarian. Both by temperament and as a keen member of the Catholic Campaign Society, Parer was staunchly anticommunist, anti-Nazi, and antifascist, intensely patriotic, and, until he visited what was then Palestine in World War II, anti-Semitic (McDonald 1994: 42).

He was self-taught as a stills photographer, moving into cinematography as camera operator on the feature films of Australian director Charles Chauvel. Parer not only taught himself professional camera skills such as lighting, aperture setting, and selecting and framing the shot, but—unusual for an Australian professional photographer—he also evolved informed ideas about European film theory. Parer was a serious intellectual in his approach to film, and he studied foreign films such as Eisenstein's Battleship Potemkin and October. Parer also engaged critically with film theory debates of this period. For example, he disagreed with Pudovkin that the single shot and the single word are equivalent, and his main theoretic influence was Vladimir Nilsen's The Cinema as Graphic Art, which arose from the montage controversies in 1920s revolutionary Russia (McDonald 1994: 13–14).

Parer agreed with Nilsen that technique without purpose was vacuous, and he shared Ruskin's conviction that 'art is the definition of an idea through a form', a dictum where form and idea coalesce (Brennan 1994: 47). Parer read avant-garde film journals addressing European and Russian film theory, and he was influenced by John Grierson, whose definition of documentary, 'the creative treatment of actuality', was displayed in Parer's workroom (McDonald 1994: 14). He became convinced of the central importance of narrative structuring in film, even in newsreels and stills news photographs.

Appointed as an official stills and movie war photographer in January 1940, Parer had already identified his mission: to apply his skills and theories to recording truths of the Australian soldier at war and to explain the war and its contexts to the Australian public and the world. At his best when applying the style of the pictorial and still photographers to film, he moved resolutely from one theater of war to another, always looking for opportunities to express truth as he saw it with artistry, freshness, and vitality. His training and commitment gave him a sense of compositional discipline and artistic orientation, even during the frequent unnerving moments when he was with troops under fire. He invariably sought a profound honesty and penetration below mere appearances, eschewing wherever possible simulations and reenactments and seeking pictures expressive of an Australian identity and self-definition that would enhance the national culture and self-reliance of what was then a minor British colony. Although there was clearly powerful war propaganda potential in his striking frontline material, Parer scorned what he regarded as the mere surface realities of propaganda footage, insisting on the transcendent value of the truthful pictorial statement. He was adept at filming soldiers—unnoticed by them—at their most intense moments of perception or reaction, but would not press them if they were reluctant to be filmed. Filming the soldier's spontaneous personal responses to his war experiences became an ideal that often drove Parer to position himself out in front of advancing soldiers to capture faces, eyes, and gestures. This insistence on a rear-facing camera position in 'no-man's-land' led directly to his death in 1944.

Although he was a noncombatant, Parer's stamina, professionalism, and empathy earned him the respect of fighting soldiers wherever he worked. He carried his cumbersome camera gear across the debilitating Kokoda Track in New Guinea, a gruelling system of high ridges, braving knee-deep mud, rain, cold, malaria, tropical ulcer, dysentery, and a host of diseases that drastically reduced in numbers whole fighting battalions. The gloomy jungle was useless for filming, and action shots were restricted to the jungle clearings. With film stock always in short supply, Parer carefully filmed the fighting and suffering around him, editing in camera and selecting his shots sparingly. He was technically proficient enough to maintain his cameras and to improvise when they broke down.

Parer's Papua New Guinea films were also driven by his deep concern that although the Japanese Army was on Australia's doorstep, the Australian people seemed to lack a sense of urgency about the war and were ignorant of the hardship their soldiers were undergoing in Papua New Guinea.

This concern gave his documentary aesthetic a further significance, and he sent back unsettling, disturbing footage of the chaos, confusion, mismanagement, official neglect, and exhausted soldiers during the Australian retreat from the Japanese along the Kokoda Track. However, despite the appalling conditions along Kokoda, and Parer's increasing fatigue, he kept firmly to his production ethic.

Parer's nationalism caused him to react against the public relations media material emanating from General Douglas McArthur's headquarters in Australia. Although Australian forces in New Guinea inflicted on the Japanese their first defeat of the war, McArthur continued to minimise Australian successes in his press releases, while inflating the achievements of American troops. Parer hoped that his coverage of Australians would correct this slight by giving the Australians their fair share of public recognition.

Parer's best-known war films include Sons of the Anzac (documentary), Assault on Salamaua, Bismarck Convoy Smashed, Kokoda Front Line, Men of Timor, Salamaua Frontline, and War on the Roof of New Guinea (newsreels).

BRUCE HORSFIELD

Biography

Born Melbourne, Australia, August 1, 1912, into a staunch Catholic family of Spanish ancestry. After school, became a highly skilled photographer before joining Charles Chauvel's movie production of Heritage as a camera assistant. Filmed several features before joining the Department of Commerce as a camera operator and stills photographer. With the outbreak of World War II in 1939, his department was absorbed by the Department of Information, and Parer became a war photographer of the Australian forces. From 1940 until late 1943 filmed Australian troops, often in fierce battles, in Palestine, North Africa, Greece, the Middle East, and Papua New Guinea. In 1943 Kokoda Front Line won an Academy Award for Parer and Ken Hall jointly. After a series of disagreements with management, resigned from the Department of Information and joined US Paramount News covering the American thrust through the Southwest Pacific in Tarawa, New Britain, the Admiralty Islands, Hollandia, and Guam. In September 1944 was killed by Japanese machine gun fire on Peleliu Island in the Palau Group.

Further reading

- Brennan, Niall, Damien Parer, Cameraman, Melbourne: Melbourne University Press, 1994.
- Brune, Peter and McDonald, Neil, 200 Shots: Damien Parer and George Silk with the Australians at War in New Guinea, Sydney: Allen and Unwin, 1998.
- The Chester Wilmot Files, Australian Archives (SP 300/4).
- The Department of Information Files, Australian Archives (SP 109/1).
- Legg, Frank, The Eyes of Damien Parer, Adelaide: Rigby Ltd, 1963.
- McDonald, Neil, 'Damien Parer and Chester Wilmot at Tobruk', Quadrant 44, nos 7–8, July–August, 1986.

—War Cameraman: The Story of Damien Parer, The Parer Papers, Mitchell Library, Sydney (MLMSS 197/Melbourne: Lothian, 1994, 1–4).

Routt, William D., 'Review of Damien Parer: Cameraman by Niall Brennan and My Friend Parer by Maslyn Williams', Metro 101, 1995: 85–6.

Paris 1900

(France, Nicole Védres, 1948)

Although rarely given more than a passing mention in surveys of French cinema and documentary film, Paris 1900 was in its time a much-loved popular success and a significant landmark in the development of the compilation film. Composed of footage drawn from over seven hundred actualités, newsreels, and fiction films from the 1900–14 period, the film offers a panorama of the events, pastimes, and personalities of Belle Epoque France. It is unashamedly rose-tinted in its nostalgic evocation of this lost epoch, and it is not difficult to imagine its appeal to French audiences still reeling from the impact of war and occupation. Yet it conveys, too, the potent and unexpected freshness of discovering a forgotten past preserved in celluloid. Much of the continuing fascination of Paris 1900 lies in seeing such legendary figures as Sarah Bernhardt, Auguste Renoir, and a young Maurice Chevalier captured on film (and on records), but the film also catches and reflects on the poignancy of contemporary celebrities who were not so well remembered by posterity.

Paris 1900 was the product of a collaborative effort. Its producer, Pierre Braunberger, had the original idea for the film before World War II. He wrote a complete treatment with Marc Allégret in 1941, while staying with Allégret in Cannes. Braunberger had originally approached Henri Langlois to plan Paris 1900, but he found that despite the latter's prodigious memory of films and their content, Langlois did not possess the necessary creative skills to shape the project. Upon returning to Paris after the war, Braunberger pursued his plans for Paris 1900, hiring Nicole Védres to write the commentary and direct the film, and a young Alain Resnais as her assistant.

Braunberger claims that he and the editor Myriam Borsoutzky were the true directors of the film, creating together its overall shape and its key innovations in montage. Other commentators have given more weight to Védres's input. Jay Leyda emphasises the importance of her rediscovery of early French cinema through Langlois's screenings at the Cinémathèque Française, and the extraordinary montage book of photographs, Images du cinéma français (1946), which she compiled in the wake of this experience—a work that anticipates the achievement of Paris 1900 in creating a persuasive formal and thematic cohesion out of radically disparate source materials.

Paris 1900 opens with actualité street scenes of Paris as a background to key events and icons heralding the new century: the Exposition Universelle, the Eiffel Tower, and the first métro. It ends in 1914 with the first mobilization and the affecting image of a troop train pulling away from the camera, packed with conscripts waving goodbye to the viewers. Between these two historical turning points, the film is organized into loose thematic clusters that compress and rearrange chronological events but are composed overall to convey a sense of change and historical momentum. One early sequence begins with a lighthearted survey of women's fashions in the 1900s, and then considers how the handicap of long skirts impeding women's participation in sport led to the 'scandal' of women wearing trousers. Symbolically empowered by the new garments, if not actually shown wearing them, women appear doing traditionally male jobs such as driving a tram. This leads to accounts of the later women's suffrage campaigns, then back on a lighter note to examine the tyrannies of the corset.

Such effective blending of topical novelty with larger social and historical transformations is typical of the way Paris 1900 handles its different themes, integrating a concern for the minutiae of everyday life and the ephemeral forms of popular culture into a wider narrative of the flowering and fading of the Belle Epoque.

Paris 1900 carries echoes of the city symphony films of the 1920s. It loosely follows their 'day in the life' pattern of beginning at dawn—with footage of the market traders in Les Halles—and closing with night falling and a new dawn, as a symbolic shot of an electric street light going out is linked to the declaration of war. It also adopts the city symphony films' presentation of social microcosms by ranging thematically through urban rituals, fashion, leisure, popular entertainment, theatre, art, politics, sports, and topical events. The vision of France that dominates much of Paris 1900 is of an eternal summer holiday of social contentment, leisure, and relaxation. It is only in the last quarter of the film, heralded by a visit to the squalor and poverty of the Zone, that the tone and emphasis shift to examine political unrest and the negative consequences of modernization for the labour force. This move in turn opens up a widening geographical and political focus as the film rapidly traces the international events leading to the outbreak of World War I.

As Jay Leyda notes, the successful compilation film relies on sensitivity to the formal qualities of its archival sources and on the ability to use montage to create graphic associations between disparate pieces of film that will shape and carry the meanings of the compilation work. Paris 1900 is exemplary in this respect, because it is able to achieve a smooth integration even between actualité and fiction footage, by capitalizing on similarities of composition and content. Discussing her working methods (in Leyda 1964: 79), Védère also emphasises the importance of what she calls the second meanings of filmed images, dominant moods or feelings that may have little connection to their manifest content. Such feelings are often precisely the product of historical distance from the original sources, or, more specifically, the benefit of hindsight. Thus the brief shot of a 'sinister' bearded man used to create a disquieting mood, appropriate to the growing shadow of war, works effectively by making emotions appear to come from the original material itself, as well as by evoking the distance between past and present knowledge.

The sense of historical distance also inflects the seemingly random associations made by the commentary, as one theme or idea triggers another in a deceptively effortless flow, creating a movement akin to the digressive processes of human memory. As the film images appear in response or in parallel to the commentary, the effect is of their being spontaneously remembered. André Bazin registers this effect in finding the achievement of Paris 1900 to be its forging of a collective memory that, although it does not belong to individual spectators, is experienced as powerfully as if it did.

Ultimately, if unconsciously, Paris 1900 attests to the role of film itself as a specific medium through which the past reaches us. It offers a compendium of the techniques and developing conventions of early cinema, from the spontaneous charm of people glancing and smiling at the camera in the earliest actualités, through the sets and performance conventions of early narrative melodramas and filmed plays, to the inventory of newsreel parades and political meetings that close the film. It even holds a mirror up to its own medium, with a fantasy short shown as a film-within-a-film and preceded by a delightfully ironic reminder of those days when, some thought, cinema was an invention without a future.

CATHERINE LUPTON

Paris 1900 (France, 1948, 79 mins). Pantheon Productions. Produced by Pierre Braunberger. Directed and researched by Nicole Védère. Scenario and commentary by Nicole Védère. Production supervision by Claude Hauser. Assistant supervision and research by Alain Resnais. Edited by Myriam Borsoutzky, assisted by Yannick Bellon. Music by Guy Bernard. Sound engineered by Claude Carrère.

Further reading

- Bazin, André, 'Nicole Védère', in Le Cinéma français de la Libération à la nouvelle vague, 1945–58, Paris: Cahiers du Cinema/Editions de l'Etoile, 1983: 166–9.
- Braunberger, Pierre, Cinéma mémoire, Paris: Centre Georges Pompidou/Centre nationale de la cinématographie, 1987.
- Leyda, Jay, Films Begot Films, London: Allen & Unwin, 1964.

Pelechian, Artavazd

Armenian filmmaker Artavazd Pelechian remains shamefully neglected among the world's great documentary filmmakers. Creator of an astounding series of montage-based short films that were for many years shelved by the Soviet authorities, he has done little work in recent years, despite support in the West, as a consequence of the challenging nature of his experimental work. His latest completed films are the companion pieces Konec/End (1992) and Zizn'/Life (1993), which run for eight and seven minutes, respectively.

It is impossible to ignore the legacy of Eisenstein's thinking in the work of the Armenian. Since the late 1960s Pelechian, an important theorist as well as practitioner, has situated his work within the problematic of 1920s Soviet Montage theory and practice.

His main aim has been to extend montage theory—in particular the more radical aspects of Eisensteinian thought—to capture the movement of life on a cosmic scale. In line with recent developments in both science and the arts (for example, musical aesthetics), Pelechian's 'montage at a distance' concentrates on the material reality of the work, seeking to emphasise and exploit the shot's nonrepresentational features. It is a concept of abstraction and a use of the medium that presuppose in the filmic material the persistence of connections that exceed its sense and signification from a spectatorial viewpoint. Pelechian writes,

The fundamental elements, the principal detonator of contrapuntal montage, exercise a reciprocal action on all the other elements according to a law and fulfill a function that one can qualify as nuclear. This involves a double contrapuntal link with every or any other point of the film according to vectorial lines. They provoke a bilateral chain reaction amongst all the subordinate links, first descending, then ascending.

Pelechian's position is as much influenced by the post-1968 Godardian version of montage theory (and in turn his Natchalo, Nacalo or Skisb/In the Beginning, 1967, will be a model for Godard's masterpiece Histoire(s) du cinéma, 1988–98), and as much by the radical formal innovations of American underground artists such as Brakhage and Conner, as it is by Eisenstein.

Pelechian's relation to Eisenstein can be summarised in the following terms. Through inflecting Eisensteinian montage theory in the direction of more broadly cosmic concerns, Pelechian can relativise the historical/historicist perspective of Eisenstein. Pelechian pits the David of little Armenia against the Goliath of Eisenstein's Soviet Union. Menk or My/Us (1969), his most overtly political film, uses material from the Central State Archives and the Documentary archives of Yerevan studios to remember this lost people of history, its culture, and its landscape. Tarva Yeghanaknere or Vremena goda/The Seasons (1972) presents images of the human fully immersed in nature, carried along on its waves, no longer its master as in the Western, Cartesian tradition, but forming one energetic element in the grand turbulent system of life. Whether he uses images of crowds or of flocks of birds (as he did in Obitateli or Bnakitchnere/The Inhabitants, 1970), historical footage or material staged in the present, his cinema constitutes a kind of rhythm-analysis whereby Pelechian seeks to express all of the forms of movement and all of the dimensions of reality. In forcing the cinema to 'acquire other dimensions', the Armenian invents a contrapuntal method emphasizing what he calls the 'pitches of expressivity' whereby, as in the philosophical notion of univocity, the world sings of itself. This univocal tendency (the work's ontological facet that on occasion can allow the mood to veer unproblematically, with a mere shift in intensity, from tragedy to burlesque) is in line with Pelechian's immanent methodology, a criteria of selection and placement of shots whereby no external necessity dictates the logic of cutting and assembly, lending each work a unique rhythm and temporality. There is no belief in transcendence; religion is merely a social fact and progress a ruse (see Pelechian's answer to Kubrick's 2001 A Space Odyssey, Nas vek or Mer dare/Our Century or Cosmos, 1982). His fascination with the science of complexity, in particular the physics of clouds, has led to the effect on the viewer of his unique method of selecting and ordering shots being compared to the butterfly effect; that is, the 'fluttering' of a single shot can produce turbulence in all the other shots.

Whereas Eisenstein's dialectical thinking rests on a sensorimotor unity of man and nature, and, therefore, in Deleuzian terms (and it has largely been within this conceptual frame of reference that the Armenian's work has been considered by critics), remains a cinema of movement-images, Pelechian's univocal philosophy has led him to produce genuine time-images, and in The Seasons the complete lack of spatiotemporal coordinates and sociocultural landmarks has given rise to an abstract and cosmic vision of life as aberrant movement (in which the human is merely one rhythmic force among others) in fusion with the enveloping 'chaosmosis' of torrential nature.

Following from this, I would suggest that there is a new logic of thought in Pelechian, one that perhaps moves him furthest away from Eisenstein's position. If there is a certain sense of impenetrability (but one that accounts for the films' incredible intensity) about Pelechian's montages, it is an essential element of this new thought; we can no longer sanction the all-powerful thought of dialectics and the grand narratives to which it gave rise. To think of the cosmos is to recognise the void at the heart of thought that no logical succession or associative chain (and no Aufhebung) can fill. Montage at a distance can express what is unthought of in our manner of being, seeing, and doing. Against the Eisensteinian organic totality wherein all oppositions are overcome according to the laws of dialectics, the whole for Pelechian is a non-totalizing Becoming governed by a dissociative force—the force of time, an interstitial universe ceaselessly emitting incommensurable series.

In line with Deleuze's account of the neo-Baroque times in which we live, there are no harmonic resolutions in Pelechian, only dissonant tunings. In manipulating found or staged footage through acceleration, slow-motion photography, repetition, inversion, or running images backwards, Pelechian rejects what he calls, in his influential text Contrapuntal Editing, 'the classical rules of montage: exposition, development, resolution', in favour of an ever-increasing turbulence, without beginning or end.

FERGUS DALY

Biography

Born in Leninakan, Armenia, in 1938. In the 1960s studied cinema at the VGIK (Cinematic Institute of Moscow). Made his first film in 1964. Although his films were suppressed under Soviet rule, he has since achieved a measure of acclaim worldwide and received the Scam Prize for Television in 2000.

Selected films

- 1964 Gornyj patrol/Mountain Patrol
- 1967 Natchalo, Nacalo or Skisb/In the Beginning
- 1969 Menk or My/Us
- 1970 Obitateli or Bnakitchnere/The Inhabitants
- 1972 Tarva Yeghanaknere or Vremena goda/The Seasons
- 1982 Nas vek or Mer dare/Our Century
- 1992 Konec/End
- 1993 Zizn'/Life

Further reading

- Cazals, Patrick and Danielou, Laurent, 'The Galaxy Pelechian: Interview with Pelechian', Discourse, January 22, 2001.
- Godard, Jean-Luc, 'Un Language d'avant Babel, conversation entre Arthur Pelechian et J-L Godard', Le Monde, April 2, 1992.
- Niney, Francois, 'Montage with Images That Don't Exist: Against Time', Discourse, January 22, 2001.
- Pelechian, Artavazd, 'Le montage à contrepoint, ou la theorie de la distance', Trafic 2, spring 1992.
- 'Time Against Me, My Cinema Interview with A. Pelechian', Discourse, January 22, 2001.
- Pigoullie, Jean-Francois, 'Pelechian: Le montage-mouvement', Cahiers du Cinéma 454, April 1992.

Pennebaker, D.A.

A pioneer in the cinéma vérité movement in the United States, D.A. Pennebaker has brought his observational style to music and politics since the 1960s and continues his practice today.

After completing several short works, he traveled to Moscow and made Opening in Moscow (1959) with the help of Albert Maysles, though the sponsors refused to pay for the film. That same year he joined Drew Associates, where he helped develop the first portable, synchronized 16mm camera and sound system.

With Drew Associates, Pennebaker worked on a variety of landmark films that helped define the cinéma vérité movement in America, including Primary (1960), On the Pole (1960), David (1961), Jane (1962), and Crisis: Behind a Presidential Commitment (1963). A new style emerged in the making of these films, noted primarily for their eschewing of traditional documentary conventions, such as reenactments and voice-over narration, in favor of seemingly pure observation. The mobility of the newly developed equipment facilitated unprecedented access to private situations, creating the illusion of the camera operator acting like a 'fly on the wall'. It is this style that Pennebaker continued in his own films after leaving Drew Associates in 1963 and starting his own company with Richard Leacock.

Pennebaker first made a name for himself with Dont Look Back [sic] (1967), a prototypical concert film that set the standard for others to follow, and that incorporated many of the cinéma vérité traditions started in the Time-Drew Associates films. Begun on just a handshake and without funding, the film followed

Bob Dylan on his 1965 British concert tour and became a classic document of the counterculture movement. Dont Look Back refuses to paint a realistic portrait of the enigmatic Dylan, instead opting for as much irreverence toward its subject as its subject had for the world. Pennebaker captures Dylan's duality in his personality through the musician's disrespect for the press on the one hand and through his charisma with his fawning fans on the other. Numerous concert film conventions (some of them derivatives of cinéma vérité conventions) begin in this film, including the informal backstage jams with Donovan and other artists, interaction with British fans, travel time, press conferences and interviews, and, of course, onstage performances before enraptured audiences.

In this film Pennebaker also celebrates his level of access into private spaces and moments. He highlights the behind-the-scenes planning performed by manager Albert Grossman through his extensive telephone negotiations. He follows Dylan down a long hallway to the stage (a convention often featured in other concert films and even spoofed in This is Spinal Tap, 1984). During one of Dylan's concerts the sound system fails and Pennebaker keeps us backstage with the crew members as they frantically scramble to get the correct cables plugged in and the sound working again. All of these work to provide a greater sense of intimacy with the subject, a key characteristic of many of Pennebaker's works.

After his success with Dont Look Back, Pennebaker continued to make documentaries in cinéma vérité style about music, musicians, and music festivals. Monterey Pop (1968) and Sweet Toronto (Keep on Rockin') (1972) chronicle two rock festivals. Both films favor the long take and attempt to maintain a fidelity to the festivals' happenings. In some ways this fidelity creates complications in Ziggy Stardust and the Spiders from Mars, a 1973 film of David Bowie's final performance as Ziggy Stardust. This work focuses primarily on onstage events, although critics of the camera work complain about the lack of framing on Bowie himself. Critics also complain about the poor sound quality and lack of backstage access, something flaunted in Dont Look Back. Another music-subject film from this time by Pennebaker is Company—The Original Cast Album (1970).

In 1977 Pennebaker met and began working with Chris Hegedus. Their first films together took on political subjects such as the proposal to deregulate natural gas in Energy War (1978). The pair's best-known collaboration is probably The War Room (1993). In keeping with the cinéma vérité tradition, the film follows Bill Clinton's 1992 campaign staff, including the fiery James Carville and the staid George Stephanopoulos. From the New Hampshire primary to the election night victory, it chronicles the pitfalls that mired the campaign, including Jennifer Flower's allegations of sexual misconduct, draft-dodging accusations, and other mud-slinging. The film earned an Oscar nomination for Best Documentary Feature and won the D.W. Griffith Award for Best Documentary of the Year.

The War Room (which refers to the Clinton campaign headquarters in Little Rock, Arkansas) also demonstrates the risk involved in this type of documentary filmmaking. In pursuing real life in real-life contexts with as little interference as possible, there is little guarantee of the outcome. If Clinton had lost the election, there would not have been much in terms of a sellable film.

Music remains the primary passion for these collaborators, and their titles cover a wide variety of music genres. Depeche Mode 101 (1989) features the 1980s pop group's massive concert at the Rose Bowl Stadium in Pasadena, California, and a group of fans who travel cross-country to witness it. The Music Tells You (1992) is a portrait of jazz saxophonist Branford Marsalis. Down from the Mountain (2001) returns Pennebaker to his concert film origins, though this time in bluegrass music, not rock; Only the Strong Survive (2002) is a who's who of soul, including Wilson Pickett, Carla Thomas, Mary Wilson, and the Chi-Lights.

Their 2004 film was the Emmy Award-winning Elaine Stritch at Liberty, a portrait of the Tony-winning Broadway legend.

Pennebaker and Hegedus married in 1982 and run Pennebaker Hegedus Films, based in New York City.

HEATHER MCINTOSH

See also: Dont Look Back; Hegedus, Chris; Leacock, Richard; Primary

Biography

Born in 1925 in Evanston, Illinois. Earned a degree in mechanical engineering from Yale in 1947 and spent a year studying naval architecture at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology before joining the Navy for two years. Then held a variety of odd jobs in New York City, and during this time began experimenting with and making films. Joined Drew Associates in 1959. Left Drew Associates in 1963 to start his own company with Richard Leacock. In 1977 met and began working with Chris Hegedus. Married Hegedus in 1982. Currently runs Pennebaker Hegedus Films, based in New York City.

Selected films

- 1959 Opening in Moscow
- 1960 Primary: cinematographer, editor
- 1963 Crisis: Behind a Presidential Commitment: cinematographer
- 1967 Dont Look Back
- 1968 Monterey Pop
- 1970 Company—The Original Cast Album
- 1970 Sweet Toronto (Keep on Rockin')
- 1973 Ziggy Stardust and the Spiders from Mars
- 1978 Energy War (with Chris Hegedus)
- 1989 Depeche Mode 101 (with Chris Hegedus and David Dawkins)
- 1992 Branford Marsalis: The Music Tells You (with Chris Hegedus)
- 1993 The War Room (with Chris Hegedus)
- 2001 Down from the Mountain (with Nick Doob and Chris Hegedus)
- 2002 Only the Strong Survive (with Chris Hegedus)
- 2004 Elaine Stritch at Liberty (with Nick Doob and Chris Hegedus)

Further reading

- Levin, G. Roy, 'Donn Alan Pennebaker', in Documentary Explorations: 15 Interviews with Film-makers, Garden City, NY: Doubleday and Company, 1971: 223–70.
- Mamber, Stephen, Cinéma vérité in America: Studies in Uncontrolled Documentary, Cambridge, MA: MIT Press, 1974.
- Pennebaker Hegedus Films, www.phfilms.com
- Rosenthal, Alan, 'Dont Look Back and Monterey Pop: Don Alan Pennebaker', in The New Documentary in Action: A Casebook in Filmmaking, Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1971: 189–98.
- Stubbs, Liz, 'D.A. Pennebaker and Chris Hegedus: Engineering Nonfiction Cinema', in Documentary

Filmmakers Speak, New York: Allworth, 2002: 41–68.

Swift, Lauren Lowenthal, 'Pennebaker: D.A. Makes 'em Dance', Film Comment 24, no. 6, November 1988: 44–9.

Peries, Lester James

Lester James Peries, founder of indigenous Sinhala cinema, laid the foundations for a serious national cinema in Sri Lanka and played a pivotal role in shaping a vigorous film culture in the island from the mid-1950s to the present.

Influenced by his early training as a documentary filmmaker, Peries was the first to take the camera outside the confines of the cardboard houses built in South Indian film studios and shoot on location in natural light, with amateur actors. His first feature film, Rekawa/Line of Destiny (1956), was the first Sinhalese movie to portray people, their environment, and their culture in a realistic way.

From 1939 to 1952 Peries led a bohemian existence in London. Although he had gone there to start his career as a writer, that period in Britain was crucial to his formation in a different way. London was then the centre of a vigorous documentary film tradition associated with the British General Post Office (GPO) Film Unit formed by Grierson, Cavalcanti, and Wright, among others. One of the most popular of these films was Night Mail (Wright, Watt, Cavalcanti, and others, 1936), a film about the functioning of the mail trains that transported the post all over Britain.

It was this vigorous tradition of the documentary cinema that Peries inherited when, in 1952, he returned to Colombo to work for the Government Film Unit (GFU) as assistant to the British chief producer Ralph Keene and began churning out several documentaries on several subjects, including malaria and vehicle traffic.

The GFU was established in 1948 to produce newsreels and documentaries to educate people about their newly won independence. Noted for its 'creative treatment of actuality' and high filmmaking standards, it became the nursery from which many of Sri Lanka's future eminent filmmakers emerged. One of them was Lester James Peries (Varma 1997).

In the beginning the GFU was headed by Guido Petroni and Federico Serra, two Italian filmmakers influenced by the neorealism movement who brought elements of it into their Sri Lankan films, though Serra's film Royal Mail, about the country's postal service, showed that the British influence was also in the air.

However, it was under the stewardship of Ralph Keene that the GFU—with films such as Kandy Perahera (George Wickramasinghe), Rhythms of the People (Pragnasoma Hettiarachchi), Makers, Motifs and Materials (Pragnasoma Hettiarachchi), and Conquest of the Dry Zone (Lester James Peries, 1954), a fourteen-minute film on the eradication of malaria from the North Central Province of Ceylon that was awarded a diploma of honour at the Venice Film festival in 1954—radically changed the style of documentary filmmaking in Ceylon (Dissanayake and Ratnavibhushana 2000).

In those years, Peries and his colleagues were being trained in the finest traditions of British documentary (Peries 2001). At that time he also assisted Keene with Heritage of Lanka (1953) and the prizewinning film Nelugama (1953), depicting the life of a fishing community, and made many documentaries for numerous private-sector firms and organizations. For the Ceylon Tobacco Company (CTC) he shot at least two. One was on Navajeevana, CTC's five-hundred-acre farm in Mahiyangana where the company settled sixty farmer families and opened a new chapter in farming, introducing new crops such as soya and maize. The other was on another of CTC's diversified projects: the sugarcane cultivation and manufacture of jaggery at a time when sugar was a scarce commodity due to foreign exchange shortage.

In 1955, when he had just finished a film on road safety, Be Safe or Be Sorry (1955), and had been asked to make a film on venereal diseases, Peries's second cousin suggested starting a company to produce Sinhala films. Bored with the subject matter of the GFU films, and more interested in fiction, characters, and human beings, Peries resigned from the GFU and embarked on the shooting of his first feature film, Rekawa/Line of Destiny and his subsequent film career.

Peries developed a personal film style, the twin hallmarks of which were the stylistic construction of narrative and his ability to capture and project actualities in a realistic manner. It was his documentary experience and his literary background that made this possible. Peries succeeded in portraying the existential realities and nuances of rural Sri Lanka and its ontological veneer (Jeyaraj 2000).

Even after resigning from the GFU and enjoying international success with his feature films, Peries continued to make documentaries, including Too Many Too Soon (1961), a documentary for the Family Planning Association; Home from the Sea (1962), on the lives of fishermen and their faith in St Anthony; and Steel (1969), a documentary record of the construction and working of a steel-rolling mill at Oruwela, for the National Steel Corporation.

VERÓNICA JORDANA

See also: Grierson, John; Night Mail; Wright, Basil

Biography

Born on April 5, 1919 in Dehiwela, a suburb of Colombo, Sri Lanka. Studied at St Peter's College in Colombo. At the age of seventeen left school to pursue a career as a journalist and to escape from his teachers' intention that he become a priest. Wrote for the Kesari, a cultural newspaper, and worked as a broadcaster for Radio Ceylon reviewing books 1939. Left for London, where he led a bohemian life and worked as a correspondent for the Times of Ceylon 1940–54. Shot and finished Soliloquy, his first short film, which won an award for artistic and technical merit from the Institute of Amateur and Research filmmakers of Great Britain in 1951. Returned to Sri Lanka and joined the Government Film Unit (GFU), where he shot several documentaries 1952–7. Resigned from the GFU and, with cameraman Willie Blake and Titus Thotawatte, made Rekawa/Line of Destiny, his first feature film. A member of the Légion d'Honneur (France), he received the Lifetime Achievement Award at the International Film Festival of India in January 2000. Received UNESCO's Fellini Gold Medal at the Cannes Festival, 2003.

Selected films

- 1952 Nelugama: assistant director
- 1953 Heritage of Lanka: assistant director
- 1954 Conquest of the Dry Zone: director, writer
- 1955 Be Safe or Be Sorry: director, writer

- 1956 Rekawa/Line of Destiny: director, writer
 1961 Too Many Too Soon: director, writer
 1962 Home from the Sea: director, writer
 1969 Steel: director, writer

Further reading

- Ariyadasa, Edwin, 'The History of Sinhala Cinema', Framework: The Journal of Cinema and Media 37, 1989.
 Asian Film Center, A Brief History of Sri Lanka Cinema, Sri Lanka, 1999.
 Dissanayake, Wimal and Ratnavibhushana, Ashley, Profiling Sri Lankan Cinema, Sri Lanka: Asian Film Centre, 2000.
 Jeyaraj, D.B.S., 'Sinhala Film's Line of Destiny', The Sunday Leader, March 12, 2000.
 Peries, Lester James, 'Pragnasoma Hettiarachchi: A Personal Tribute', Sunday Observer, October 7, 2001.
 Varma, Mitu, 'Historical Perspective: Films in Search of a Movement', in Himal Magazine, December 1997.

Perrault, Pierre

Pierre Perrault practiced law for two years in Montreal before he found a job with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation (CBC), producing programs on the rural areas of Québec, in 1956.

He was hired by the National Film Board of Canada (NFB) in 1962 to work with Michel Brault on a project on the people of Île-aux-Coudres, an island in the St Lawrence River. The resulting film was Pour la suite du monde/The Moontrap (1963), the first Canadian feature documentary shown at the Cannes Film Festival and generally recognized as marking the high point of the direct cinema movement in Québec. At the core of the film are a group of middle-aged men who try to resuscitate the traditional beluga whale hunt that their fathers practiced forty years earlier. The revival of the whale hunt was in fact initiated by the filmmakers themselves, as means both to recapture a disappearing way of life and to provide a unique opportunity to record the voices and faces of the men and women of Île-aux-Coudres as they came together to reanimate their past. While Brault was primarily responsible for the splendid images of the film, Perrault focused on collecting the words of these people by spending extended periods of time with them to establish a genuine dialogue. Perrault directed two other films on Île-aux-Coudres: Le règne du jour/The Reign of the Day (1966) and Les voitures d'eau/The Water Cars (1968); both are imbued with the rustic poetry of his subjects.

Some of his films are explicitly political, such as Un pays sans bon sens!/Wake Up, Mes Bons Amis (1970) and L'Acadie, l'Acadie?!/Acadia, Acadia?!? (1971), but most are concerned less with politics per se than with the people who make up the nation of Québec. In the 1970s Perrault concentrated his energy on two ambitious series or cycles of films, one on the Abitibi region of northwest Québec (four films), and the other on the native peoples of Northern Québec (three films). In the 1980s Perrault abandoned his cycles to direct a few seemingly heterogeneous films, all of which, however, reflect his fascination with the land. La bête lumineuse/The Shimmering Beast (1982) follows a group of men on a moose-hunting trip. Les voiles bas et en travers/Lower the Sails (1984) and La grande allure/Sailing at Great Speed (1985) examine the life of French explorer Jacques Cartier and his role as the forefather of Québec culture. His last two films, L'oumigmag or l'objectif documentaire/Oumigmag or the Documentary Objective (1993) and Cournouailles/Icewarrior (1994) were shot in Québec's far north and are at once visual poems on the musk ox and evocative reflections on the very act of filming wilderness.

Pierre Perrault holds a unique place in the history of Québec cinema. One of the very few filmmakers of his generation who never made mainstream fiction films, he is also one of the few who have found a place within the highbrow discourse of French film theory, especially in the work of Gilles Deleuze. Deleuze, in Cinéma2 (1985), is especially interested in how Perrault creates temporal shifts among past, present, and future with individuals and groups who generate 'la suite du monde' (the future of the world) through a present-tense narrative of their past. Perrault was also a prolific writer, publishing commentaries on his films, poems, and other creative works. Jean-Daniel Lafond's film Les traces du rêve (1986) documents Perrault's life.

ANDRÉ LOISELLE

See also: Brault, Michel

Biography

Born June 29, 1927, into an upper-class family. Studied law in Montreal, Toronto, and Paris. Practiced law for two years in Montreal. Hired by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation (CBC) in 1956. Hired by the National Film Board of Canada (NFB) in 1962 to work with Michel Brault on a project on the people of Île-aux-Coudres. Died June 24, 1999.

Selected films

- 1963 Pour la suite du monde/The Moontrap
- 1967 Le Règne du jour/Reign of the Day
- 1968 Le Beau Plaisir/Beluga Days
- 1968 Les Voitures d'eau/The Water Cars
- 1970 Un pays sans bon sens!/Wake Up, Mes Bons Amis
- 1971 L'Acadie, l'Acadie?!/Acadia, Acadia?!?
- 1975 Un royaume vous attend/A Kingdom is Waiting for You
- 1976 Le Retour à la terre/Back to the Land
- 1977 C'était un Québécois en Bretagne, Madame!/He was a Québecker in Brittany, Lady!
- 1977 Le Goût de la farine/The Taste of Flour
- 1980 Gens d'Abitibi/People of Abitibi
- 1980 Le Pays de la Terre sans arbre ou le Mouchouânipi/The Land Without Trees or Mouchouanipi
- 1982 La Bête lumineuse/The Shimmering Beast
- 1983 Les Voiles bas et en travers/Lower the Sails
- 1985 La Grande Allure (1re partie)/Sailing at Great Speed I
- 1985 La Grande Allure (2e partie)/Sailing at Great Speed II
- 1993 L'Oumigmag ou l'Objectif documentaire/Oumigmag or the Documentary Objective
- 1994 Cornouailles/Icwarrior

Further reading

- Brûlé, Michel Pierre Perrault ou un cinéma national, Montreal: Presses de l'Université de Montreal, 1974.
- Deleuze, Gilles, Cinéma 2, L'Image-Temps, Paris: Les Éditions de Minuit, 1985.
- Perrault, Pierre, Écriture de Pierre Perrault, Montreal: Cinéma-thèque québécoise, 1983.
- Warren, Paul, Cinéaste de la parole, Montreal: Hexagone, 1996.

Waugh, Tom, To Wake the Heart and the Will: Pierre Perrault and Cinéma-Direct in Québec, 1956–71, PhD dissertation, Columbia University, 1974.

Phantom India

(France, Malle, 1969)

By the mid-1960s the prominent French director Louis Malle was profoundly bored with working in the mainstream film industry. Partly to make a break with France, he accepted a cultural mission to India to promote New Wave cinema in film clubs and other Indian cultural centres. On his arrival in India, Malle was immediately fascinated by the nation. Symbolism and spiritualism seemed to infuse every aspect of Indian social life. Accompanied by his sound man Jean-Claude Laureux and his photographer Etienne Becker, Malle returned to shoot documentary material. It was out of this quasi-instantaneous set of encounters that Malle would edit together two substantial pieces, the film Calcutta (1969) and the better-known seven-part television series Phantom India (1969).

Malle's decision to focus so intently on India marked a significant turning point in his career. The films were the first substantial documentaries that he had made since working as an assistant director to Jacques Cousteau in the mid-1950s on The Silent World (1956). Therefore, the Indian films reignited the director's interest in a form that would prove vital to his career. With the benefit of historical hindsight, one can also interpret Malle's Indian experience as a quintessentially 1960s episode. Rejecting Western European sociopolitical values, Malle, like many members of his generation, was attracted to the alternative model perceived to have been provided by India.

Phantom India is a free-flowing travelog. It is a self-reflexive work in which Malle is frequently seen on screen and heard via voice-over. Appropriately, everything that Malle shows through his camera is offered as exclusively his own vision. It is for this reason that the films can be interpreted as a treatise on a Westerner's awestruck encounter with India, rather than as a dissection of that nation per se. Many passages from the series of films are moving and visually impressive. At its best, Phantom India demonstrates both its director's passion for India and that country's rich cultural variety.

Figure 14 Phantom India, 1969 (Courtesy of the British Film Institute)

Malle identified his films as an exercise in the free-flowing direct cinema form that he would hone further in Place de la République (1974). However, as American critic Todd Gitlin noted as early as 1974, parts of the films are very troubling. Malle's enthusiasm for the people and groups that he encountered tends to lack any moral or ethical centre. Thus, when Malle visits a tribe in which women are indoctrinated to worship men, to literally kiss their feet, the director describes this group as a Utopian society. Such comments are unnerving. In part, they are indicative of Malle's increased fascination with the politics and provocation of sexual freedom, later also played out in fictional exercises such as Le Souffle au coeur (1971) and Pretty Baby (1978). Nevertheless, in light of such statements, the viewer is left suspicious of Malle's numerous tracking shots of beautiful young Indian women, his camera endlessly exploring their social space, seemingly without much regard to their viewpoint or concern with their consent.

Other aspects of the films are also unsettling, not least Malle's commentary on the Indian Jewish community, which he describes as decadent. However, it was neither because of these remarks nor because of explicit and implicit sexism that the films proved controversial upon their initial release. Purchased by the BBC, the films were shown on British and French television. The reaction to the series was especially intense in Britain and India. The British Indian community felt that Malle had shown an exclusively one-sided picture that concentrated on an impoverished and backward India, rather than on a modernizing nation. The Indian government felt similarly insulted, and a diplomatic incident quickly ensued. The Indian authorities were so irritated by Malle's work that they challenged the BBC to cease broadcasting it or face severe penalties. The BBC stood by Malle and was indeed briefly ordered to leave its New Delhi bureau. This telling postcolonial incident has long since been forgotten. It deserves renewed historical research.

HUGO FREY

Phantom India/L'Inde fantôme (France, 1969). Produced by Nouvelles Editions de Films (Paris). Directed by Louis Malle. Photography by Etienne Becker and Louis Malle. Sound by Jean-Claude Laureux. Edited by Suzanne Baron. Narration by Louis Malle.

Further reading

- Billard, Pierre, Louis Malle: le rebelle solitaire, Paris: Plon, 2003.
- French, Philip (ed.), Malle on Malle, London: Faber, 1993.
- Frey, Hugo, Louis Malle, Manchester: Manchester University Press, 2004.
- Gitlin, Todd, 'Phantom India', Film Quarterly 27, no. 4, 1974: 57–60.
- Malle, Louis, Malle sur Malle, Paris: Editions de l'Atharor, 1978 (includes published extracts from Malle's India diaries).
- 'Louis Malle', in C. Devarrieux and M.-C. de Navacelle (eds), Cinéma du réel, Paris: Autrement, 1988: 22–31.

Pictures of the Old World

(Slovakia, Hanák, 1972)

Dušan Hanák's Obrazy Star ho Sveta/Pictures of the Old World was not widely seen when it was completed in 1972, but more than fifteen years after it was suppressed by communist censors, this Slovakian film won awards at film festivals around the world and made a name for its director. Even though Hanák made mostly feature films, his only documentaries, Pictures of the Old World and Paper Heads (1995), have earned him the most attention.

As indicated by the title, Pictures of the Old World is about people who live in the modern world yet adhere to more traditional, modest means of subsistence. Filming the inhabitants of rural communities in the remote Tatra Mountains, Hanák captures the everyday facts of their existence while the subjects provide free-form commentary. The men he profiles often comment on their inclusion in the project. One subject informs the director that his profile had better be funny, because 'one is interested in what is funny'. In a unique move, Hanák includes a series of still and filmed photographs for each subject, who often comment on the pictures in synch with their appearance on the film. Inverting the more conventional documentary style, where a carefully composed script is read over the filmed material, Hanák allows the subjects' commentary to overlay the images whenever simultaneously recorded sound is not present. Although the director is virtually absent from the sight and sound of the film, his hand is evident in the structure of the work.

Pictures of the Old World features a series of nine self-contained portraits, all of poor, rural people living alone. With few exceptions—two women and one younger man—Hanák profiles only elderly men. (A sequence where numerous respondents take on 'what is most important in life' shows that Hanák probably conducted extensive interviews with a broader range of subjects before deciding to focus almost exclusively on older men.) One could be critical of Hanák for so limiting his subjects, but even though the men featured in the film are from the same generation, they express a wide range of views. The range of experiences accounted for is, perhaps, made all the more remarkable by the similarity of the sampled demographic. Each subject appears free to comment on his life however he sees fit, and accordingly, the final cut includes contrasting responses. While leading similar lives as poor, agricultural workers, these men view their experiences in fundamentally different ways. Some find gratification in their labor; others find solace only in the promise of an afterlife. Some find simplicity and satisfaction in their modest way of life. (One man says, 'You city people will get hard and dried on asphalt. Your heart is made of cement. I live on a proud bunk'. Another remarks that 'Whoever's got some wants more, whoever's got nothing, got a grand time'.) A third, however, finds similar conditions inhumane. He says, 'A man puts up with more than an animal'. (The ubiquity of alcohol is the only absolutely consistent element through every profile.) Still, the film is most intriguing when the profiled subject possesses a singular interest. One old man is still consumed by memories of his stint in the army, and another spends his time making elaborate mobiles. The sixth man featured stands out as the most exceptional. He speaks a few sentences in passing of his work (for another farmer) and his partner's (selling newspapers) but is otherwise monomaniacally obsessed with space exploration. His face lit with glee, this man lists one astronomical fact after another as Hanák, in a rare move, splices appropriate footage of space exploration alongside his commentary.

Although the title of the film, Pictures of the Old World, and the quote that opens it ('These are the stories of people rooted in the soil they came from. Replanted they would perish') imply the possibility of sentimentalizing or romanticizing the lives of these elderly villagers, the film proceeds to work conscientiously against this tendency. The range of statements both in opposition to and in endorsement of this style of life show a filmmaker more interested in exploring the ambiguity of his subjects than motivated to produce a piece with a particular argument. It is clear from the material on display in this cut that Hanák, had he wanted, could have crafted a piece about the bucolic simplicity of village life or, conversely, about the forbidding harshness of it. He chose, instead, to include both sides.

The style of Pictures of the Old World is similarly two-sided, as Alojz Hanúšek and Martin Martinček shift between unselfconscious, straightforward means of filming with a single, handheld camera and more stylized sequences. In one instance, the camera focuses on a subject's feet and then moves up his body at a horizontal angle before turning upright at the man's face. The filmmakers also appear fond of the extreme close-up, although it is not clear whether this was a conscious decision or they simply chose to indulge subjects who wanted to be inordinately close to the camera. Still, in accordance with conventional documentary style, the film tends more toward straightforward shooting than toward stylized sequences. In the context of a primarily observational documentary, it is notable that the stylized sequences are present at all.

The use of a single handheld camera, black-and-white film, and the usually unadorned style of Hanák's picture could lead to comparisons with the direct cinema approach, but the director deliberately breaks the transparency of the film on numerous occasions. He includes shots that emphasize the making of the picture. In one sequence, a bashful elderly couple awkwardly pass a microphone back and forth, uncertain what to say. Hanák also shows a woman who shouts her answers into the mike, evidently unsure how well such devices work. Although the director could have coached his subjects into being more conventional interviewees, he chose, instead, to include their tentative early encounters with the filmmaking process. These scenes effectively portray the villagers' lack of familiarity with modern technology, in addition to emphasizing the construction of the picture. Using another hallmark technique of self-reflexive documentaries, Hanák sometimes includes sound clips of himself asking the interviewees questions. More often, documentarians erase their questions from the final cut to create the illusion of a single, coherent monologue from the subject's point of view.

The use of music in Pictures of the Old World is also notable. It ranges from naturalistic, sometimes simulated, on-location sounds and folk songs sung by the subjects to an expressive but minimal classical score and strange, high-frequency synthetic noises.

Following Pictures of the Old World's release in 1988, Hanák earned a Special Mention at the European Film Awards in 1989 and was given an award for a lifetime's achievement in cinema at the first National Free Festival of Czech and Slovak films the following year.

JESSE SCHLOTTERBECK

Pictures of the Old World/Obrázky starého sveta (Slovakia, Slovak Film Institute, 1972, 64 mins). Written and directed by Dusan Hanák. Original music by Vaclav Halek and Jozef Malovec. Nonoriginal music by Georg Friedrich Händel. Cinematography by Alojz Hanúšek and Martin Martinček. Film edited by Alfred Bencic. Sound by Andrej Polomsky.

Pilger, John

Australian-born television documentary maker John Pilger is first and foremost a journalist. He made his first television documentary in 1970 (The Quiet Mutiny), which revealed the rejection of the Vietnam War by large numbers of US conscripts. Pilger's print journalism output is prolific (it includes a regular column in the New Statesman), and he has published numerous books and a play, as well as more than fifty television documentaries, always on controversial political issues. He is an accredited war correspondent and has reported from conflicts in Vietnam, Cambodia, Bangladesh, Biafra, and the Middle East.

Pilger's film style is direct, and some have called it 'polemical', whereby he confronts the objects of his criticism in a direct and uncompromising manner. He is said to have a knack for getting people in authority to make statements on camera that they would not normally make. He has said that he 'grew up in Sydney in a very political household, where we were all for the underdog' (Barsamian 2002). However, although they critique the wrongs of society and present the voice of the powerless, his films stop short of offering the viewer any alternatives. He says, 'I am not going to offer anything in its place. I am saying that people should be aware of it and identify it and then they have the power of that knowledge to do something about it if they want to' (Sydney Morning Herald, April 11, 1998).

One of his best-known documentaries is In Search of Truth in Wartime, which critically scrutinizes the role of the war correspondent in conflicts ranging from Crimea to Vietnam. Impressively structured, the film begins with the famous black-and-white footage of the little Vietnamese girl running terrified from the flames of napalm during the Vietnam War, to illustrate immediately where Pilger's strongest sympathies lie in any conflict—with its innocent victims. In reflecting on the role of the journalist in war, he suggests that many reporters wittingly or unwittingly serve the state in sanitizing and rationalizing war, exemplified by the images they send to their media organizations back home, such as those of the soldiers' coffins draped respectfully in flags as they are met at airports by dignitaries and family. It is unusual for journalists to criticize their own profession, but to Pilger nobody is exempt from his critical gaze if it means an opportunity to bring to light unjust practices or institutions.

Pilger calmly informs us (direct to camera from a domestic interior) of the press collusion in the British government's conspiracy to hide the futility and extent of the carnage of World War I. The complicity of the journalists having been established, we are shown newsreel after newsreel, revealed by Pilger to the contemporary viewer as clear propaganda, but not seen as such at the time. With more recent wars, we move to Pilger's interviews with some of the journalists who covered the conflicts. In these interviews, more cases of collusion between government and the press are revealed, including stories fabricated by the US government of barbaric 'official' North Korean press releases and the CIA's staging of the filmed 'invasion' of South Vietnam by the North, needed to justify the commencement of US aerial bombing of North Vietnam.

Controversial as always, Pilger refutes the myth that the media affected the outcome of the Vietnam War, either positively or negatively, except that free media access during this conflict prompted the subsequent decision by the British Ministry of Defence never to give cameras the same freedom in any future war. This fact is then illustrated by news footage of the Falklands War (1982), in which a former correspondent from that war states that the British government allowed only a few handpicked British journalists to cover the conflict.

Pilger made two documentaries entitled Palestine is Still the Issue (1974 and 2002), the first of which was one of his most widely viewed films. These documentaries comment on the irony that the Palestinians have become for the Israelis the displaced people that the Jews were for the Europeans before the creation of the state of Israel. Interviews take place with people on both sides of the conflict, most of whom express a strong desire for peace and cannot see war as the solution. In the sequel Pilger addresses the camera: 'If we're to speak of the great injustice here, nothing has changed. What has changed is that the Palestinians have fought back'.

In some films, Pilger is not afraid to implicate himself among those he attacks. In The Secret Country (1985), about the systematic but officially unacknowledged mistreatment by white Australian settlers of Aboriginal people (made during the period leading up to the Bicentenary of European settlement in that country), Pilger locates a cottage built by his own father on the site of a one hundred-year struggle between Aboriginals and settlers. He also talks of the sanitization of the 'encounters' between Europeans and Aboriginals 'when I learned history at school' in his native Sydney. Pilger is not a 'holier-than-thou' journalist, morally separated from the objects of his critique; rather, his is the concerned, serious voice of someone deeply troubled by what his career has led him to witness and what his astute mind, impeccable training, and political consciousness have driven him to expose.

Pilger's films are didactic and ideologically motivated. Numerous accusations of bias have been leveled at him by the establishment, because his films confront power cliques and hegemonic interests, including governments and the media. He lives in an era when few documentary makers consistently critique such interests, and his films have frequently been refused screenings in the United States. He has been described by the right as 'a left-wing polemicist' ('Editor Falls Victim to Iraq "Scoop"', Sunday Mirror, May 16, 2004) and a 'professional conspiracy theorist' ('Truth is Pilgered', The Australian, Features, February 17, 2003: 10). His documentary on the Israel–Palestine conflict was even denounced as 'one-sided [...] factually incorrect, historically incorrect' by his own producer at Carlton Television ('Pilger Biased, Says TV Boss', The Times, Overseas News, September 20, 2002: 15). Auberon Waugh, right-wing journalist and staunch critic of Pilger, joked that 'Pilger' was a verb that meant 'to seek to arouse indignation by inflated or absurd propositions', and that to 'Pilgerise' meant 'to distort in a tendentious way'.

On the other hand, Phillip Knightly, a journalist supporter of Pilger, provided his own definition of the 'verb' to Pilger as 'to regard with insight, compassion and sympathy, coined as a tribute to the work of one John Pilger, a well-known humanitarian journalist who wrote about the world's underprivileged'.

Pilger continues to be a prolific writer and documentary film producer, with productions including Breaking the Silence: Truth and Lies in the War on Terror (2003), about the US and British prosecution of their 'war on terror' in Iraq. Here Pilger uses his trademark archival footage accompanied by interviews with human rights activists, members of the White House staff, and former intelligence analysts to make his case that Bush used the September 11 terrorism as an excuse to activate plans to assert control over Iraq's oil. Pilger again juxtaposes benign footage of Bush and Blair arguing that the war in Iraq is moral and just with interviews and images which suggest the opposite. Conservative criticism of his journalistic stance has clearly not diminished the volume of his documentary output, nor has it softened his confronting style. Pilger has received numerous awards for his journalism in Britain, in the United States, and from the United Nations.

JULIANNE STEWART

Further reading

- Arnove, Anthony, 'Cautionary Tales: Documentaries on the UN Sanctions and War with Iraq', Cinéaste 28, no. 2, spring 2003.
- Barsamian, David, 'The Progressive Interview: John Pilger', The Progressive 66, no. 11, November 2002, www.progressive.org/nov02/intv1102.html (accessed May 23, 2004).

Hayward, Anthony, In the Name of Justice: The Television Reporting of John Pilger, London: Bloomsbury, 2001.

Sweeney, Brian, 'Siding with the Enemy', The Weekend Australian, Features, July 5, 2003: 26.

Pincus, Edward

With Diaries (1971–6) (1980), Ed Pincus made an extraordinary breakthrough in the realm of the film about one's own life, shot as it is happening. This film, along with Pincus's teaching at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology Film/Video Section in the 1970s, helped to shape the work of a generation of autobiographical filmmakers—Joel DeMott, Ross McElwee, Rob Moss, Mark Rance, Ann Schaetzel, and others. Pincus's work is not as well known or as much discussed as it deserves to be, because he retired young from filmmaking, and his films have not been promoted or widely distributed (one must contact him personally to obtain a print, and nothing is available on videotape or DVD).

Pincus became active in the American Civil Rights movement of the early 1960s and began making films at that time in the cinéma vérité or direct cinema mode established by Robert Drew, Richard Leacock, Albert and David Maysles, D.A. Pennebaker, and others. Pincus's Black Natchez (1966) is an exemplary film of this kind, a sixty-minute, strictly observational account of the Mississippi city and its black population's struggles to organize political protest in the face of white violence. Pincus, working with David Neuman, shoots here with handheld camera and synchronous sound recording. He has clearly won the confidence of people and made himself inconspicuous enough so that he gets remarkable footage of everyday life, political meetings, a secret society, and infighting. The film is a complex portrait of political debate and movement toward decisive action at a time of great tension.

Shot at the same time in Natchez, but completed only later, Panola (1970) is a different kind of film. Here the thirty-five-year-old black man named in the title addresses the camera, talks about his hard life and his aspirations, engages the filmmakers in interplay, invites them into his house in the black slums, appears drunk at one point, behaves histrionically. However truthful a report on black life in the South and on the state of mind of one charismatic, disturbed, ordinary man, the film is nevertheless a performance, a display of speech and action offered with full consciousness of the camera, a display made for the camera by one who can command it.

Diaries (1971–6) comes to rest after its three hours and twenty minutes, on a hilltop in Vermont on the holy day of Yom Kippur. Indeed, this film is a work of atonement, bringing together what is in conflict, working toward peace in a process of moral growth. The film centers on Pincus, his wife Jane, and their small children, as the couple come to deepen their commitment to each other, ultimately deciding to move to a new home in a new place. The world of the film takes in the Cambridge, Massachusetts, filmmaking scene, Pincus's and Jane's extramarital affairs, anti-Vietnam War politics, the Women's Movement of the 1970s, rural Vermont, and trips to New York, the American Southwest, and California. Pincus's lovers, friends, and professional associates become major characters. Pincus films life as it evolves, not knowing where it will go, often turning the camera on himself. He gets remarkably intimate—even painful—encounters on film, and of course he also elicits self-consciousness, performance, even melodramatics, all of which has its way of being revealing. The film is alive with the possibilities of sex and of political and social change. The shaping of the material into the finished work is at one with Ed and Jane's process of coming to understand themselves better and to make decisions about their family life and future.

Diaries has a curious double quality. On the one hand it seems raw, as if abundant life is caught awkwardly on film and assembled into a simple chronology. This in itself is fascinating. However, the film is artistically masterful. Every shot and the structuring seem deeply well judged. The camera is always in the right place. In the many conversations in cars, the interior lines of the vehicle, and what passes in the window, slowly, quickly, or in a blur, seem to define the state of mind of the speaker. The images of a trip to the Grand Canyon, Las Vegas, and elsewhere seem mental, indicating an expansion of spirit, an irresponsible lark that is a contribution to growth. The film moves more quickly, changing places and acknowledging diverse actions, when Ed and Jane are in creative turmoil, thinking, forming a new plan for life. Diaries draws on and realizes that basic power of documentary film, and of film in general, to capture to some extent what is vital and uncontrollable, and to transfigure life into an art shape or art structure that amounts to understanding.

CHARLES WARREN

Biography

Born in Brooklyn, New York, July, 6, 1939. Graduated from Brown University in 1960. Studied philosophy at the graduate level at Harvard University 1961–3. Established the Film/Video Section at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology 1969, brought in Richard Leacock, Steven Ascher, and others to teach, and taught there himself until 1980. Taught filmmaking at Harvard 1980–3. Coauthored The Filmmaker's Handbook with Steven Ascher, 1984. At that time, gave up filmmaking to work as a cut-flower farmer in Vermont.

Further reading

- Lane, Jim, 'The Career and Influence of Ed Pincus', The Journal of Film and Video 49, no. 4, 1997: 3–17.
 ———, The Autobiographical Documentary in America, Madison, WI: University of Wisconsin Press, 2002.
- Levin, G. Roy, Documentary Explorations: 15 Interviews with Filmmakers, Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1971.
- Pincus, Ed, 'New Possibilities in Film and the University', Quarterly Review of Film Studies, 2, no. 2, 1977: 159–78.
- Rothman, William, 'Looking Back and Turning Inward: American Documentary Films of the Seventies', in David Cook (ed.), Lost Illusions: American Cinema in the Age of Watergate and Vietnam, 1970–80, vol. 9 of Scribner's History of the American Cinema, New York: Scribner's, 1999.

Plow that Broke the Plains, The

(US, Lorentz, 1936)

Pare Lorentz's first film, The Plow that Broke the Plains, marked a significant point in the history of documentary film in the United States. It was the most widely publicized peacetime attempt by the federal government to communicate to its entire citizenry through a motion picture, and its elaborately synchronized soundtrack was groundbreaking. It was the first film to be placed in congressional archives, and President Franklin Roosevelt wanted it to be shown before a joint session of Congress, which would have happened had the Capitol chambers been equipped to present a sound film. The film had been produced under the sponsorship of the Resettlement Administration (RA), a New Deal agency directed by Rexford Tugwell (one of Roosevelt's 'brain trusters'). The RA's mission was to find relief for the chronic rural poverty in the central part of the United States then known as the Dust Bowl, and its recuperative strategies included providing housing, financial, medical, and educational aid to the displaced families, as well as finding ways to restore and conserve the environment. Property interests among the middle and upper classes feared the loss of cheap labor and the undermining of rental rates that could occur as a result of government assistance.

Several factors, not the least being the perceived 'socialist' bent of the RA, conspired to hinder the film's distribution. For one, its length (around half an hour) was deemed awkward—too short to fill a feature-length slot, but too long to be a newsreel. The timing of the film's release (May 1936) coincided with a particularly sensitive moment in US partisan politics, as Roosevelt and the reforms of the Democratic Party's

New Deal were facing a major reelection campaign in November of 1936.

For that reason, Republicans widely criticized the film, although a number of Democratic elected officials, especially those from the states depicted in a negative light, also took issue with The Plow's images of devastation and poverty (an Oklahoma Democrat publicly threatened to punch Tugwell in the nose over the film). Real estate interests from the Plains states bemoaned the negative representations. Finally, the distribution of a government-produced film through the established commercial channels was perceived by the film industry as a competitive threat, so the film was denied bookings through the major theater chains. Despite that opposition, and because of the efforts of RA staff to promote the film through the Midwest in the summer of 1936, The Plow was shown through independent theater chains, at an estimated three thousand of the approximately fourteen thousand commercial theaters in the United States at that time. The experiment of the state-produced film of persuasion could probably not be declared an unqualified success as an effective new mode of disseminating information, although it did lead to a handful of further films produced by the US government (The River, The Fight for Life, and the uncompleted Ecce Homo!) and to a short-lived United States Film Service run by Lorentz (1938–40).

Figure 15 The Plow that Broke the Plains, 1936 (Courtesy of the British Film Institute)

Sometimes compared to Grierson, Lorentz is one of the great pioneers in US documentary film history. His blending of the visual (shot composition, mise-en-scène, editing), the musical (with noted composers Virgil Thomson and Louis Gruenberg), and the poetic (his narration for The River was praised by James Joyce as the ‘most beautiful prose’ he had heard in ten years) created a kind of cinematic Gesamtkunstwerke, or ‘total work of art’, intended here not for an elite Aryan audience but rather for mainstream media consumption in the United States. Lorentz was purported not to have liked the term documentary, preferring instead the somewhat immodest term film of merit; he used the terms documentary musical picture and melodrama of nature to describe The Plow that Broke the Plains in his own review of his film. Lorentz began working with the RA in the summer of 1935, not long before the Information Division of the RA started documenting its activities and the state of rural living by assembling a team of still photographers that included Dorothea Lange and Arthur Rothstein, both of whom would have connections to The Plow: Lange, skilled at posing subjects, assisted Lorentz in filming the California migration sequence, and Rothstein’s famous steer skull photos were probably influenced by Lorentz’s imagery in Plow. In addition to still photographs, radio programs, and pamphlets, the RA in 1935 decided to add motion pictures as a way of dramatizing the violence of dust storms.

With experience only as a film critic, Lorentz was a novice filmmaker when he began work on The Plow that Broke the Plains. He hired a group of experienced cameramen (Leo Hurwitz, Ralph Steiner, and Paul Strand) who were involved with the left-wing Film and Photo League and later the filmmaking collectives known as Nykino and Frontier Films. Some of the greatest drama associated with Plow would take place off camera, as the photographers found their ideological and professional differences with Lorentz increasingly intolerable. Lorentz envisioned a fantasy sequence where presumably wealthy men in top hats would walk across a field, mount tractors, and plow up the land—just one example from a flimsy script that Strand found unfilmable. The three cameramen went ‘on strike’, as reported in Variety, and offered Lorentz an alternative script that infuriated him. After they filmed what he needed—Lorentz sent Hurwitz and Strand off to film dust storms while he and Steiner teamed up to shoot, among other things, the top hat sequence—Lorentz released his crew (the fact that he did not hold all the cameramen in equal esteem is reflected in their nonalphabetical listing in the credits). Lorentz then went to California to purchase stock footage and to film the final sequence at a roadside migrant camp on US Highway 99. He was able to purchase stock footage only through the insider assistance of his Hollywood friend King Vidor (whose 1934 film Our Daily Bread may have provided some visual inspiration for Plow). Filming of the final sequence was facilitated by a fourth cameraman, Paul Ivano, and Dorothea Lange, on loan from Roy Stryker’s Historical Section of the RA.

The film follows a chronological arc that attempts to explain how the Plains became the Dust Bowl, ostensibly tracing a history of the place and people, yet as an historical document the narrative is incomplete, and as a piece of rhetoric the argument is perhaps too subtle, because Lorentz tends to focus more on elemental forces at the expense of political and economic ones. The excised epilogue contains the only direct narrational references to the government programs offering relief. A similar historical narrative and several key phrases appeared earlier in a 1935 Fortune story by Archibald MacLeish called ‘Grasslands’, which may have provided a framework for Lorentz. In place of dialogue and identified characters, Lorentz wrote a script for Thomas Chalmer’s god-like narration. Beginning with an animated map of the entire United States, the affected regions called ‘the Plains’ are traced out and exaggerated with dotted lines; the words ‘625,000 sq miles’ and ‘400 million acres’ appear before an image of waving grasslands fills the area within the dotted lines, and then the region’s borderlines wipe outward so that the landscape fills the entire frame. If nothing else, the film works powerfully to create a national issue out of a regional problem. Sweeping panoramic shots of lush grasslands are next followed by the introduction of cattle grazing and by the massive homesteading and settlement of the region. After a sequence depicting early drought problems, a montage showing the necessity of wheat during World War I suggests that overproduction led to further misuse of the soil, culminating in dust storms and families fleeing the devastation.

One of the most vexing issues surrounding this famous documentary is the fact that two versions exist: a three-minute epilogue explaining the RA's role was screened for some audiences in 1936 (most initial reviews refer to it) but was then, for reasons still only speculative, removed. The Museum of Modern Art preserved the copy with the epilogue, but the version that was shown through the summer of 1936, as well as the version rereleased by the Department of Agriculture in 1962, lacked the epilogue. The epilogue's narration overtly stated what had only been implied up to that point: irresponsible and shortsighted use of the soil led to the creation of a disaster area, and government intervention was now required. Images of 'model farms in Nebraska' may have borne too close a similarity to Soviet communal farms, particularly given the Republican cries of 'New Deal propaganda' that preceded the 1936 fall elections.

The film's musical accompaniment, written by Thomson (famous at that time for Four Saints in Three Acts), was called 'the finest musical score of any American film' in a 1936 review, and it accounts for much of the film's power. Partly borrowed—including, for example, cowboy songs and a Protestant hymn ('Old Hundred')—and partly original material, Thomson's underscoring employs considerably more dissonance than was allowed in Hollywood's music at that time, although it did rely on certain stock musical conventions, such as pounding tom-toms supporting melodies in parallel fourths as a code for 'Indians' (although 'Indians' are mentioned only once in Lorentz's narration, the music provides multiple invocations of those earlier inhabitants who managed to live on the land for centuries without driving it into dust). Once hoping to work as a music critic, Lorentz provided several articulate and detailed sets of instructions for Thomson. He interviewed eleven other composers before settling on Thomson. Lorentz showed his rough edit to Thomson, who composed a score that Lorentz then used to reedit his final cut. Thomson converted the entire score into a suite for concert performance, where it has become a recognized part of the twentieth-century musical canon, and parts of its style (such as its fondness for open intervals) were quickly absorbed into Hollywood's musical codes for 'Americana'.

Throughout The Plow that Broke the Plains, music and images rely on repetition and dialectic. Lorentz calculatedly contrasted scenes of fecundity with drought. Pan shots of lush grasslands are matched later in the film with a succession of still images showing cow skulls and abandoned farm equipment resting on cracked, baked-out soil; Thomson underscored the pastoral idyll with a theme in a major key that returns for the drought scenes in a minor key, reorchestrated for saxophone. In sequences meant to depict the overproduction of wheat during World War I, Lorentz's images alternate rapidly between tractors and tanks, bayonets and plow blades, cannon and grain chutes. Their rapid juxtaposition, together with the narration ('Wheat will win the war!'), suggests that wheat became a weapon for the allies. Thomson matches the visual cross-cutting by alternating the famous World War I melody 'Mademoiselle from Armentières' between major and minor keys. The 1920s are set up as a period of economic, ecological, and social excesses through Thomson's jazz-inflected score and images of an African American jazz musician, all culminating in the stock market crash, which is metonymically signaled by a stock ticker breaking on the ground. Moments of the score, such as the cattle sequences accompanied by cowboy songs, are genuinely ebullient, but Thomson occasionally slips in ironic commentary. In one scene showing a home overpowered by a dust storm, we see the dust swirling through the living room as we hear a harmonium play 'Old Hundred', a hymn the words of which refer to a divine bounty that is notably absent. The most puzzling musical-visual juxtaposition occurs with the shots of migrant workers driving into California camps, as Thomson transforms a melody from earlier in the film into a haunting tango the associations of which with upper-class leisure are asynchronous with the images of impoverished domestic life and ecological disruption. Both score and film indulge in melodramatic excesses: the narrative cueing is overstated, and its emotional ranges are limited to extremes. Particularly without the epilogue, The Plow that Broke the Plains is 'agit' without the 'prop': its images and sounds are powerfully affecting, but they only hint at the larger structural causes of the Dust Bowl and make no explicit mention of the federal relief programs in existence.

See also: Lorentz, Pare

The Plow that Broke the Plains (US, 35mm, black and white, monosound, Resettlement Administration, 1936, 25 mins; a three-minute epilogue was shown to some audiences in 1936). Written and directed by Pare Lorentz. Photographed by Leo T. Hurwitz, Paul Ivano, Ralph Steiner, and Paul Strand. Music composed by Virgil Thomson, orchestrated by Henry Brant, and conducted by Alexander Smallens. Narrator, Thomas Chalmers. Research editor, John Franklin Carter, Jr. Editor, Leo Zochling. Sound technician, Joseph Kane. Filmed in Montana, Wyoming, Colorado, Kansas, Texas, and California. Starring Bam White (others unnamed). Budget of $6,000 grew to $19,260.

Further reading

- Alexander, William, Film on the Left: American Documentary Film from 1931 to 1942, Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1981.
- Allan, Blaine, 'Canada's Heritage (1939) and America's The Plow that Broke the Plains (1936)', Historical Journal of Film, Radio and Television, April 19, 1999: 439–72.
- Curtis, James, Mind's Eye, Mind's Truth: FSA Photography Reconsidered, Philadelphia, PA: Temple University Press, 1989.
- Lorentz, Pare, Movies 1927 to 1941: Lorentz on Film, New York: Hopkinson and Blake, 1975.
- MacCann, Richard D., The People's Films: A Political History of U.S. Government Motion Pictures, New York: Hastings House, 1973.
- O'Connor, John E., 'Case Study: The Plow that Broke the Plains', in John E. O'Connor (ed.), Images as Artifact: The Historical Analysis of Film and Television, Malabar, FL: Robert E. Krieger Publishing Company, 1990.
- Rabinowitz, Paula, They Must Be Represented: The Politics of Documentary, London and New York: Verso, 1994.
- Snyder, Robert L., Pare Lorentz and the Documentary Film, Norman, OK: University of Oklahoma Press, 1968.
- Thomson, Virgil, Virgil Thomson, New York: Dutton, 1966.
- Van Dyke, Willard, 'Letters from The River', Film Comment, 1965: 38–56.

Podnieks, Juris

Juris Podnieks, best known as a chronicler of the decline of the Soviet Union, was part of a new wave of documentary filmmaking that emerged in the wake of Mikhail Gorbachev's perestroika and corresponding attempts at glasnost, begun in 1985. As these forces began to take hold in the film industry, the first reaction to the new situation came from the documentary cinema. The renaissance of documentary was evident across the Soviet Union, in the studios of the Ukraine, Belarus, the Urals, and Siberia, as well as Juris Podnieks's native Latvia. The documentary emerged as one of the most active expressions of glasnost, as documentarists addressed a series of formerly taboo subjects linked to social and political problems in the Soviet Union.

Podnieks's Is it Easy to Be Young? (1986) was one of the first and most distinguished of these hard-hitting documentaries. The film opens with a rock concert in Riga, in July 1985—images that in themselves are an important statement about the increasing significance of pop music in Soviet youth culture—and follows its young subjects (not all of whom were present at the concert) over a period of almost two years. The film addresses juvenile delinquency, teenage suicide, and drugs, topics that were to assume a vital role in a number of subsequent documentaries. From a portrayal of youth lost in crime, suicide, and drugs, the documentary turns, for the first time on a Soviet screen, to the war in Afghanistan, adding to the picture of a lost generation new political and moral dimensions. Podnieks depicts a widespread sense of confusion, disappointment, and antisocial feeling with startling honesty, in a characteristically rhythmic and startling juxtaposition of images punctuated by increasingly disturbing interviews and held together by an edgy electronic soundtrack. Not surprisingly, the film broke box office records in the Soviet Union and later enjoyed a wide international distribution.

As the Soviet Union crumbled, Podnieks's collaborations with Central Television and Channel 4 added up to a haunting collective portrait of a society disintegrating morally, physically, and socially. The five-part series transmitted as Hello, Do You Hear Us? (1990) ranges over diverse topics and portrays a wide variety of individuals all over the Soviet Union, in a kaleidoscope of rapidly edited images drawn from personal interviews, newsreel, and found film footage, and amateur videotape. As in Is It Easy to Be Young?, there is a question mark at the end of the series's title, suggesting a tentative investigation rather than any ready or easy answers.

Homeland (1991), also made for Central Television, is a powerfully lyrical portrait of the emergent Baltic republics, structured around the 20th Latvian Song Festival. The songs and music provide an evocative soundtrack for Podnieks's highly accomplished cinematography and more muted polemics, and make this one of his most coherent and powerful films.

His final film, (A Portrait of an) Unfinished Business (1993), was completed by his crew after his untimely death. It depicts the slow and painful rebirth of three former Soviet republics through the central linking device of a Trans-Siberian train journey. Uncharacteristically, the film adds an intermittent voice-over to the scenes from daily life, based on Podnieks's filming notebook. The speculative tone of the commentary, together with testimonies from various crew members, leaves us with a sense of a man firmly in the tradition of 'spiritual' cinema in the Soviet sense of a preoccupation with serious matters of the human mind and spirit.

Formally, Podnieks's documentaries are distinguished by their powerful images and rhythmic editing, and by a detached narrative style that eschews voice-over and relies on a mixture of interviews, music, and archive footage—a style described by Horton as 'expressionistic cinema verité' (Horton 1992: 75). In all of his films, it is the faces and voices of ordinary people caught in the fallout from the disintegration of the Soviet empire that give them their haunting poetic density. Encouraged by the unobtrusive off-camera questioning, people reveal themselves with extraordinary openness. At times, however, as Julia Neuberger points out, Podnieks's passionate empathy can result in a loss of the ambivalence that is so revealing throughout his films and slip into a 'heroic one-sidedness', favouring some ethnic groups over others. (Neuberger 1994: 297).

MARINA BURKE

See also: Russia/Soviet Union

Biography

Born in Riga, Latvia, in 1950. Graduated from the cinematography faculty of VGIK, the State Film Institute in Moscow, in 1975. Went to work at the Riga Film Studio, first as assistant cameraman, then as cameraman, before finally becoming a director in 1979. His first production, The Cradle, won a prize at the Leipzig Festival, and The Kokar Brothers took first prize at the Kiev Youth Festival in 1981. In the same year, won widespread recognition both inside and outside the Soviet Union for his film Constellation of Rifleman, which won honours at the 17th All State Festival in Leningrad and also the Latvia Komsomol prize. The film that first won international recognition was Is It Easy to Be Young? (1986), which exploded many popular myths about Soviet youth. Subsequently commissioned by Central Television to make the series of documentaries about the Soviet Union at the end of the 1980s that were transmitted on Channel 4 in 1990 as Hello, Do You Hear Us? While filming the follow-up to Homeland (1991), two members of Podnieks's film crew were killed after coming under sniper fire during the Soviet coup in Riga. Podniek himself died in a freak diving accident on June 23, 1992.

Selected films

- 1982 Constellation of Rifleman/Strelnieku Zvaigznajs
- 1985 The Stone of Sisyphus/Vel Sizifs Akmen
- 1986 Is It Easy to Be Young?/Legko li byt' molodym?
- 1990 Hello, Do You Hear Us?
- 1991 Homeland/Krestyni put'
- 1991 End of Empire
- 1993 Unfinished Business

Further reading

- Graffy, Julian, 'Juris Podnieks', Sight and Sound 3, no. 2, February 1993: 30–1.
- Horton, Andrew, 'Nothing Worth Living For: Soviet Youth and the Documentary Movement', Wide Angle 12, no. 4, October 1990: 38–47.
- Horton, Andrew and Brashinsky, Michael, The Zero Hour: Glasnost and Soviet Cinema in Transition, Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1992.
- Neuberger, Julia, 'Soviets', Russian Review 53, no. 2, April 1994: 296–7.
- Plakhov, Andrei, 'Soviet Cinema into the 90s', Sight and Sound 58, spring 1989: 53–7.

Poirier, Anne Claire

Anne Claire Poirier, who joined the National Film Board of Canada (NFB) in 1960, spent a few years working as assistant editor and assistant director in the shadow of her male colleagues, who included Claude Jutra, Michel Brault, and Gilles Groulx. In 1963 she was commissioned to direct a documentary on the actor Christopher Plummer (30 Minutes, Mister Plummer), and the following year wrote and directed her first fiction short, La Fin des étés/The End of Summers (1964), starring Geneviève Bujold. Poirier is credited with initiating feminist filmmaking in Québec in 1967 with her landmark feature-length documentary De mère en fille/Mother-to-Be. A personal as well as political reflection on pregnancy and maternity, De mère en fille was the first feature film ever directed by a French Canadian woman.

A few years later, as part of her proposal to the NFB for the establishment of a production program coordinated by women, Poirier, along with Jeanne Morazain Boucher, published the text En tant que Femmes: Rapport de recherches (As Women: Research Report) (1971). This veritable manifesto for the creation of an interventionist feminist cinema in Québec would break the isolation of women and educate men on the female condition. It led to the production of the En tant que femmes film series, the first significant wave of activist documentaries and docudramas created by women at the NFB. While head of the En tant que femmes program, from 1972 to 1974 Poirier produced four films by female directors, as well as directing two films of her own: Les Filles du Roy/They Called Us 'Les Filles du Roy' (1974), a history of Québec women's traditional roles as servants, mothers, and wives, which employed an effective mixture of historical reconstruction and personal commentary to paint a vibrant picture of a subject systematically ignored by male cinéastes; and Le Temps de l'avant/Before the Time Comes (1975), a straightforward dramatic feature aimed primarily at sensitizing men to the issue of abortion.

In 1979 Poirier achieved full recognition as a major filmmaker with the release of her strikingly innovative and daring docudrama on rape, Mourir à tue-tête/A Scream from Silence. In this uncompromising look at the individual and collective brutalization of women's bodies, Poirier adopts a radical feminist perspective that blends documentary and fiction to criticize society and institutions for failing to provide victims with the support to which they are entitled. The film's graphic depiction of rape and its putative suggestion that all men are potential rapists raised a storm of debate seldom seen in the history of Canadian film.

A cry of rage that still echoes today, Mourir à tue-tête is certainly the most controversial production of Poirier's career. In contrast, her fiction films, La Quarantaine/Forty Something (1982), and Salut Victor!/Hi Victor! (1988) are accessible, traditional dramas on how friendship can transcend time and differences. Her most recent documentary film, Tu as crié Let Me Go!/You Screamed, Let Me Go! (1997), returns to the violent theme of Mourir à tue-tête. However, the explicit political agenda of the 1979 production is replaced here by a highly personal outlook on the corruption of contemporary society, as Poirier reflects, with a mixture of pain and serenity, on the murder of her own daughter in October 1992 in a drug-related dispute. In 1989, for the fiftieth anniversary of the NFB, she made a documentary on the representation of women in dozens of NFB films: Il y a longtemps que je t'aime/I've Loved You for a Long Time.

ANDRÉ LOISELLE

Biography

Born June 6, 1932 in Montreal. Studied law before switching to drama. Worked at the Société Radio-Canada. Joined the National Film Board of Canada (NFB) in 1960. Made her first feature-length film, De mère en fille/Mother-to-Be, in 1967.

Selected films

- 1963 Mister Plummer: director, script, editing
- 1965 Les Ludions/Players: director
- 1967 De mère en fille/Mother-to-Be: director, script
- 1974 Les Filles du Roy/They Called Us 'Les Filles du Roy': producer, director, script
- 1979 Mourir à tue-tête/A Scream from Silence: producer, director, script
- 1989 Il y a longtemps que je t'aime/I've Loved You for a Long Time: director
- 1997 Tu as crié Let Me Go!/You Screamed, Let Me Go!: director, script

Further reading

Special issue on Anne Claire Poirier, Copie Zéro 23, Montreal: Cinéma québécoise, 1985.

Loiselle, Andre, Mourir à tue-tête/Scream from Silence, Trowbridge: Flicks Books, 2000.

Poirier, Léon

Although Léon Poirier has been largely forgotten by contemporary cinema scholars, he was among the most popular and technically ambitious French filmmakers of the 1920s and 1930s. A versatile director, writer, and producer, he set new quality standards for on-location shooting in standard documentary and historical reconstruction, or docudrama. The success of La Croisière noire/The Black Journey (1926), Verdun, visions d'histoire/Verdun, Visions of History (1928), L'Appel du silence/The Call (1936), and Brazza, ou l'épopée du Congo/Brazza, or the Saga of the Congo (1940) helped to integrate both genres into the commercial mainstream and had a lasting impact on the form and practice of documentary cinema. In his films, Poirier critiqued the decadence and materialism of modern Western civilization, positing spirituality, patriotic self-sacrifice, and contact with 'primitive' cultures as antidotes to the identity crisis that Europe confronted in the wake of World War I.

Poirier began his career as a theatre manager, producer, and owner in Paris. He came to cinema after suffering serious burns in an automobile fire that led to his bankruptcy and a temporary job making short entertainment films for Gaumont just before World War I. After his demobilization in 1919, Poirier returned to the profession full-time, directing several critically acclaimed literary adaptations (Jocelyn, 1922; Geneviève, 1923; La Brière/The Salt Marsh, 1924), the outdoor shooting in rugged rural environments of which created a unique painterly depth, pictorial realism, and documentary feel.

In 1924 automobile manufacturer André Citroën hired Poirier and assistant Georges Specht to film a twenty-thousand-kilometre, seven-month expedition across Africa. Simultaneously a grandiose marketing tool and a suspense-filled adventure story that dramatized man and machine conquering some of the harshest terrain on Earth (including the Sahara desert, dense rainforests, raging rivers, and vast savannahs), La Croisière noire was also an unabashed tribute to colonialism that symbolically unified French possessions in North, West, and Central Africa. In the spirit of newly instituted associationist colonial policy that encouraged respect for rather than erasure of native cultures, Poirier crafted a well-intentioned, though methodologically naive ethnographic study in the picturesque and the exotic. His footage of collective rituals and distinctive physical characteristics is consistently charged with an unself-conscious voyeurism that betrays a European fear of decadence and desire for renewal by appropriating the uncorrupted vitality of 'primitive' African cultures.

Released in late 1926, La Croisière noire was a critical and commercial mega-hit that elevated documentary to the level of feature film. More important, it paved the way for subsequent ethnographic documentaries (including Marc Allégret's Voyage au Congo, 1927) and established representational conventions that would inform colonial cinema and popular perceptions of Africa throughout the interwar period. For Poirier, the experience was a personal revelation that decisively influenced his conception of documentary. As he wrote in the July 1926 issue of Ciné-Miroir:

An exotic film is not a script that one carries in one's luggage; it is a work of art that one shapes along the way with the landscapes that one encounters, the human characteristics that one analyzes, and the incidents that one records. By virtue of his sensitivity, the cinematographer must extract the poetry, joy, and pain directly from the lives he discovers, then fashion a work of art capable of making others feel what he himself felt.

Verdun, visions d'histoire applied this approach to reconstructing the bloody 1916 battle in which Poirier had fought. Shot on location in France and Germany with actual veterans playing all but a few roles, the film echoed Abel Gance's classic J'accuse/I Accuse (1919) in its pacifist denunciation of war and internationalist plea for reconciliation among the belligerent nations. Stylistically Verdun was a striking mix of expressionist allegory and documentary realism that integrated universal-type characters such as the Mother, the Son, the Husband, the Wife, the Peasant, and the Intellectual with graphic reenactments of combat, death, and the soldiers' psychological agony. Poirier further amplified this realism by editing several segments of authentic newsreel footage into the military scenes—the first time such a technique had been used in a film about the Great War. Like La Croisière noire, Verdun drew international acclaim and performed well at the box office, thereby solidifying the director's reputation in the French film industry.

Yet like many directors of his generation Poirier found the transition to sound cinema difficult. After releasing two mediocre fiction films set in eastern Africa (Cain, aventures des mers exotiques/Cain, 1930; La Voie sans disque/The Unmarked Track, 1933) and an overblown remake entitled Verdun: Memories of History (1931), he undertook a cinematic biography of Charles de Foucauld, an obscure soldier-turned-Catholic missionary who had been killed in 1916 during an anti-French uprising. L'Appel du silence, which brought together the themes of Western decadence, spiritual regeneration, pacifism, and patriotic martyrdom present in Poirier's previous work, marked the crowning achievement of his career and made Foucauld an instant national hero.

Financed by Poirier himself and small public donations collected during a two-year fundraising tour, the film was shot primarily on location at Foucauld's isolated retreat in the Algerian Sahara. In addition to winning the 1936 Grand Prize of French Cinema, it was the top box-office draw of the year, selling nearly a million tickets in Paris and ranking among the five biggest successes of the entire decade. French conservatives seized on L'Appel du silence to validate their agenda and discredit the socialist-led Popular Front government that had recently taken power, but the film contains no clear endorsement of any party, instead portraying all politics as corrupt. As for moral regeneration and colonialism, at the time both were broadly pan-ideological values—hence the film's extraordinary popularity. Nevertheless, cinema historians have often retrospectively cast Poirier as an apologist for the Right.

Poirier's next project, Brazza, ou l'épopée du Congo, focused on the late nineteenth-century exploration of Equatorial Africa by Pierre Savorgnan de Brazza, who, like Foucauld, is presented as a visionary Christ figure seeking to revitalize France spiritually and culturally through benevolent colonialism. Shooting in the rainforests of Gabon and the Belgian Congo was an enormous logistical challenge that required specially modified film and sound equipment, as well as a production team of two hundred native labourers, half-a-dozen French engineers, and a small fleet of boats. Though its technical quality and thematic appeal equalled that of L'Appel du silence, Brazza was overshadowed by World War II, its run cut short by the German invasion.

Poirier remained in France during war, but maintained a low profile to preserve his independence in an industry that was tightly regulated by Vichy French and German authorities. He made only one film during the Occupation, a melodrama titled Jeannou, the proruralist message of which led to postwar suspicions of Pétainism but no formal indictment or sanctions like those levied against so many of his peers. In 1947 Poirier made his final film, La Route inconnue/The Unknown Road, about Charles de Foucauld's early-life adventures in Morocco and spiritual awakening. Its failure to resonate with postwar audiences pushed him into retirement, bringing an otherwise distinguished career to an abrupt and anticlimactic end.

BRETT BOWLES

Biography

Born in Paris, 25 August 1884, nephew of Impressionist painter Berthe Morisot. Successful theatre manager, producer, and owner 1906–13. Served in artillery unit during the Great War 1914–18. Fiction film director and producer at Gaumont 1919–24. Transition to documentary with hits The Black Journey and Verdun: Visions of History 1924–8. Brief return to fiction film and experimentation with sound cinema 1929–33. Made The Call and Brazza, or the Saga of the Congo 1935–9. Virtual inactivity during World War II 1940–5. Researched and shot The Unknown Road 1946–8. Retired to Urval-le-Buisson, France, became mayor, and published memoirs 1949–53. Died in Urval, June 26, 1968.

Selected films

- 1926 La Croisière noire/The Black Journey: director
- 1928 Verdun, visions d'histoire/Verdun, Visions of History: director, writer, producer

- 1931 Verdun, souvenirs d'histoire/Verdun, Memories of History: director, writer, producer
- 1934 La Croisière jaune/The Yellow Journey (Andre Sauvage): editor
- 1936 L'Appel du silence/The Call: director, writer, producer
- 1940 Brazza, ou l'épopée du Congo/Brazza, or the Saga of the Congo: director, writer, producer
- 1948 La Route inconnue: Charles de Foucauld au Maroc/The Unknown Road: Charles de Foucauld in Morocco: director, writer, producer

Further reading

- Abel, Richard, French Cinema: The First Wave, 1915–29, Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1984.
- Boulanger, Pierre, Le Cinéma colonial de 'L'Atlantide' à 'Lawrence d'Arabie', Paris: Seghers, 1975.
- Haardt, Georges-Marie and Audouin-Dubreuil, Louis, La Croisière noire: expédition Citroën Centre-Afrique, Paris: Plon, 1927.
- Leprohon, Pierre, L'Exotisme et le cinéma: les chasseurs d'images à la conquête du monde, Paris: J. Susse, 1945.
- Levine, Alison J., 'Film and Colonial Memory: La Croisière Noire, 1924–2004', in Alec Hargreaves (ed.), Memory, Empire, and Post-colonialism: Legacies of French Colonialism, Lexington, KY: Lexington Books, 2005.
- Piault, Marc Henri, 'L'exotisme et le cinéma ethnographique: la rupture de La Croisière noire', Journal of Film Preservation 63, 2001: 6–16.
- Poirier, Leon, Vingt-quatre images à la seconde: du studio au désert, Tours: Maison Mame, 1953.
- , A la recherche d'autre chose, Bruges: Desclède Brouwer, 1968.
- Slavin, David, Colonial Cinema and Imperial France, 1919–39, Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2001.
- Ungar, Steven, 'Leon Poirier's L'Appel du silence and the Cult of Imperial France', Journal of Film Preservation 63, 2001: 41–6.

Poland

Short documentary films first appeared in Poland in the years before World War II. They were a means by which ideas that would otherwise have remained suppressed in the communist nation could be discreetly presented for interpretation by viewers. At the time, Polish documentaries either focused mainly on social themes or were 'avant-garde and experimental films created by artists closely connected with avant-garde circles in painting and poetry' (Fuksiewicz 1973: 58). Studios and films were subsidized by the state (Kornatowska 1992: 47). Shorts had to be produced in such a way that the government would approve of them and see them as being of educational value to the nation. The subject matter covered by documentaries was limited.

It was after World War II that a reorganization of Polish cinematography occurred, as the young generation began taking over and working with shorts. This new generation turned to documentaries as a means to explore their creativity and their new ideas. During the war photographs and other materials were collected and later used to produce documentaries on the Polish contribution to the victory over Nazism (Fuksiewicz 1973: 58). This led to a sense of nationalism among the Polish people and helped to unite them during war. The first short films to be made in Poland after liberation were Jerzy Bossak's Bitwa O Kolobrzeg/The Battle for Kolobrzeg (1945) and Zagłada Berlina/The Annihilation of Berlin (1945). 'Antoni Bohdziewicz's Ostatni Parteitag w Norymberdze [The Last Parteitag in Nuremberg (1946)] was an attempt at a complete settlement of accounts with Nazi war crimes' (Fuksiewicz 1973: 59).

During and after the war, the devastation and rebuilding of Poland were a central theme of documentary. One of the most popular works on this theme remains Tadeusz Makarczynski's Suite Varsovienne/Warsaw Suite (1946).

Throughout the postwar period Polish cinematography began developing at a much faster pace. An increase in films led to an increase in the range of subjects being depicted and accepted by the public. As the film industry expanded, the number of filmmakers in Poland grew.

In the 1950s four main influences led to the increasing number of documentaries and short films in Poland. The first was the expansion of the film industry, which led to an expansion of production studios, greater willingness to take risks, enhanced creativity, and the exploration of a variety of new ideas. The second factor to play an important role in the increased production of documentaries in Poland was the emergence of young directors newly graduated from the Higher State Film School. The third major influence was the change in the political and social climate that took place in the mid-1950s. Finally, there was the founding of The Warsaw Documentary Film Studio, the principal location where documentaries began to be made.

In 1955, with the introduction of so-called Black documentaries, a new atmosphere emerged in Poland. 'The term "Black series" bracketed those films which attacked problems that were not supposed to exist' (Bren 1986: 48). W.I. Borowik's film Paragraf Zero/Paragraph Zero (1957) is one such film; it depicts the life of prostitutes. Another such film is Jerzy Hoffman and Edward Skorzewski's Uwaga Chuligani/Watch Out! Thugs! (1955), which dealt with the growing problem of juvenile delinquency in Poland. At this point, filmmakers started to intertwine fiction with reality in order to produce documentaries. The documentaries were grounded in fact, but the filmmakers used fictional means to create their characters. It was these 'Black' films that made the public more aware of the documentary genre.

As their atmosphere and surroundings changed, directors relied on documentaries to illustrate the economic and social changes taking place in Poland. Changes such as the growth and expansion of industry, the variety of career paths becoming available to the younger generation, and the everyday working life of the nation were themes that dominated the documentaries. Following the theme of transformations emerging in Polish life, Witold Lesiewicz's Wesola II/Vesola II (1952) traces the opening of a coal mine.

In the late 1950s two key elements transformed documentaries yet further: the intimate way of perceiving work and the remarkable way in which individuals were being portrayed. Between 1956 and 1957 documentaries began to report the various kinds of negligence and social ills that accompanied rapid industrial development. Films such as Hoffman and Skorzewski's Dzieci Oskarżają/The Children Accuse (1955) revolve around themes such as alcoholism invading lives and the backwardness of regions untouched by new development. Films helped to remind Polish audiences of difficult, complex social problems, while giving them glimpses of positive changes within the community. Documentaries mimicked reality, which forced individuals to face issues directly. As documentaries continued developing and evolving, direct sound recording soon became a basic element in their production. While realist documentaries gained in popularity, there also began to emerge 'philosophic shorts', which were polar opposites of realist documentaries in that they gave filmmakers freer rein to creativity and personal interpretation of new ideas. Films such as these often exposed the disturbances in our modern world, such as human ruthlessness, cruelty, and egotism. Roman Polanski's Dwaj Ludzie z Szafą/Two Men and a Wardrobe (1958) is one of the better-known of these films.

In the following years, filmmakers began to focus less on immediate problems and more on the individual. Interest in social themes remained, but producers stopped singling out specific Polish affairs and instead adopted a wider, calmer perspective. Issues of national crisis and war became less prevalent, as social issues such as gambling, alcoholism, childhood, and the intimacy of human life took over. This trend continued and developed in the years that followed, as more experienced documentary film producers moved on to making feature films and the younger generation continued to explore the world of shorts (Fuksiewicz 1973: 65). One of the more popular shorts produced at this time was Jerzy Hoffman and Edward Skorzewski's film Gangsterzy i Filantropi/Gangsters and Philanthropists (1962).

In 1961 the Short Film Festival took place in Krakow. It was the first Polish film festival to be held in the country. By 1964 it had evolved into an international festival, and the majority of the productions shown were documentaries. The grand prize of the first Krakow Festival was awarded to Muzykanci/Musicians (1960), a classic documentary made by Kazimierz Karabasz. It was Karabasz, along with another film producer, Jerzy Bossak, who gave rise to the documentary approach of marrying ethics with aesthetics in the course of production.

By the second half of the 1960s, World War II was being examined by documentary filmmakers. A great deal of historical material became newly available to filmmakers: material that depicted Nazi crimes and Poland's struggle throughout the war.

By the late 1970s and early 1980s many changes being made in Polish society affected the documentary film industry. For instance, in 1978 the Film and Television School at Katowice was founded. This film school taught students a documentary-oriented style of production and was seen as a direct competitor to the National Film School at Lodz (one of the first film schools to be founded in Poland). Up until the 1980s Polish documentary films were seen merely as 'additions' that would precede feature films. In the late 1980s it became obvious that the additions were competing with the feature films in terms of aesthetics. It did not take long for documentaries to be viewed independently of any other type of film. Clearly, they were a means by which views that would otherwise be suppressed by communist authorities could be 'smuggled in'.

The year 1989 brought great changes to the film industry in Poland, because it was during this year that Polish society made the transition from a communist regime to a democracy. Following the 1989 'Freedom Shock', the state-controlled and state-owned industry was transformed into independent studios and companies, which were free to make their own financial and production decisions. 'The relationship between the state and the artist, as well as between the artist and its audience had been modified dramatically [...] The idea was to create a new system in which state patronage co-exists with private initiatives' (Haltof 1995: 137, 139).

One year later, in 1990, there was yet another drastic alteration to the Polish film industry: censorship was abolished. Film producers and directors suddenly were responsible for both the successes and the failures of their products. 'As a consequence of these recent political transformations, hidden archives and victimized dissidents no longer constituted the Polish film landscape' (Haltof 1995: 15). Filmmaking quickly shifted from a national and social mission to a strictly professional endeavor. Now filmmakers were held accountable for their own productions. They had their films as a defense, rather than the state as well. It was now up to the producer to decide what was to be censored and what was to be portrayed to the audiences. This movement granted film producers greater liberty, but it also led some to feel an immense, sometimes unbearable sense of responsibility. During this post-communist period filmmakers attempted to deviate from issues of politics and history, because the Polish audiences had grown tired of these central themes.

In the late twentieth century, many social, economic, and political problems arose as a result of Poland's transition to a market economy. In order to keep film production numbers up and steady, three government funding bodies were introduced in 1991: the Script Agency, the Film Production Agency, and the Film Distribution Agency. The Script Agency (Agencja Scenariuszowa) was established in order to ensure the existence of a prominent market for film scripts in Poland. The funds available through the Script Agency are used to support script development and pre-production work. The Film Production Agency (Agencja Produkcji Filmowej) was founded as a means of collecting funds used mostly for the production of projects that are seen as having 'cultural value', such as documentaries and educational films. Finally, the Film Distribution Agency (Agencja Dystrybucji Filmowej) was initiated to ensure the distribution of important cultural and national films.

The future of Polish cinema is uncertain. Today, there are many foreign and international filmmakers entering Poland. Polish filmmakers are worried that their national cinema runs the risk of undergoing commercialization by Western distributors entering the Polish market. In 1992, for example, 'more than seventy percent of the Polish repertoire consisted of American films; Polish films made up only thirteen percent' (Haltof 1995: 141). Although movie directors such as Steven Spielberg are traveling to Polish soil to film productions such as Schindler's List (1993), the demand for Polish productions is waning. It is important to support coproductions, but it is equally important that Polish theaters do not become filled with American movies. Needless to say, Polish critics are insisting that the influx of films needs to be controlled in order to preserve the Polish film industry.

Despite the turbulence and uncertainty that the Polish film industry has faced since the 1989 'Freedom Shock', Polish documentary film continues to thrive. Today, between one hundred and fifty and two hundred documentary films are produced each year in Poland. The majority of these are broadcast on television and have attracted the attention of worldwide audiences. One of the most popular documentary series that airs on television in Poland is Czas Na Dokument/Time for a Documentary. Other documentaries, such as Maciej Drygas's Uslyszcie Moj Krzyk/Hear My Cry (1991), Marcel Lozinski's 89mm Od Europy/89mm from Europe (1993), Dariusz Jablonski's FotoAmateur/Amateur Photographer (1998), and Wojciech Staron's Syberyjska Lekcja/Siberian Lesson (1998) have all earned great critical acclaim and have received awards at international film festivals.

Present-day Polish documentaries, and those of the 1990s, can be divided into four main categories. The first two categories are named in honor of two famous Polish documentary makers, Marcel Lozinski and Andrzej Fidyk. The last two categories consist of historical and biographical documentaries. The four different types of shorts are more thoroughly summarized below.

Lozinski documentaries are documentaries in which the producer's main interest lies in the everyday life of the everyday individual. Locating the absolute essence of the ordinary life lived by the ordinary person is a mysterious process. The producer feels a great sense of responsibility in depicting the life of the individual, and the individual himself or herself, as accurately as possible. Films such as Lozinski's Wizyta/A Visit (1974) and Marcin Latalla's Slad/Trace (1996) are world-renowned documentaries that fall in this category.

Fidyk documentaries are similar to Lozinski documentaries, but they are less interested in everyday life and more committed to making contemporary issues as attractive as issues depicted in Hollywood productions. The Fidyk documentary deals with contemporary problems and present-day changes in customs and morals. However, it is produced in such an ingenious way that rather than getting bored, contemporary audiences are naturally drawn in. Included in this genre are Fidyk's Defilada/Parade (1989), Sladkowski's Szwedzkie Tango/Swedish Tango (1999), and Piotr Morawski's Tata, I Love You/Daddy, I Love You (1998). Such films are known for 'attracting the most interest but, at the same time, arousing the most controversy and disputes' (Lubelski 2004: 10).

The third type of documentary prevalent today consists of historical documentaries. A great majority of them were produced in the early 1990s, right after the communist regime collapsed in Poland. Historical documentaries were produced more as a duty to the country than anything else. Filmmakers believed that they owed it not only to their nation, but also to the community to produce films that continued to document Polish history. This was critical then, because with the abolition of censorship, filmmakers had an opportunity to retell history accurately, without interference. Thanks to unlimited access to historical archives, Marek Drazkiewicz's documentary Zdrada/Treason (1991) is one such film in which 'there is a new approach presented to the history of Polish foreign policy in the period between the two world wars' (Lubelski 2004: 12). Historical documentaries aim to discover the truth behind history and to uncover all the distortion that characterized postwar 'history'.

The final group of short films consists of biographies. These films trace the lives of politicians, scientists, and artists, offering educational value to the nation. Films such as Jadwiga Zajick's Zycie Jak Film/A Life Like a Film (1994) and Andrzej Wajda's Idac, Spotykajac/Going, Meeting (1999) not only educate audiences but also show how famous individuals, including leading filmmakers, got to where they are today.

In the past, Polish producers had to face the challenge of producing documentaries that accurately represented reality but at the same time appealed to both the Polish audience and the communist authorities. As the years progressed and Poland entered a postwar era that transformed the economy into a democracy, the major challenge for film producers was to uncover the truths that remained hidden. Although today the state has no say in what type of film an artist decides to produce, the filmmaker has just as big a challenge to face as ever before. The challenge is no longer to please a state, a government, or a body of authorities but, rather, to attract an audience that has disintegrated into numerous entities. With democracy comes freedom, and with freedom comes the liberty to voice countless opinions on countless subjects. The challenge facing the present-day filmmaker in Poland is significant: to produce documentaries that will be accepted and praised by audience members of varying tastes both at home and around the globe.

SAPNA GUPTA

See also: Bossak, Jerzy; Lozinski, Marcel

Further reading

- Bren, Frank, World Cinema 1: Poland, London: Flicks Books, 1986.
- Dowell, Pat, 'The Man Who Put Poland on the Post-War Map of Cinema: An Interview with Andrzej Wajda', Cineaste 19, fall 1992: 51–4.
- Fuksiewicz, Jacek, Polish Cinema, Poland: Interpress Publishers, 1973.
- Haltof, Marek, 'A Fistful of Dollars: Polish Cinema after the 1989 Freedom Shock', Film Quarterly 48, spring 1995: 15–25.

- 'Everything for Sale: Polish National Cinema After 1989', Canadian Slavonic Papers 39, March–June 1997: 137–53.
- Kornatowska, Maria, 'Polish Cinema', Cineaste 19, fall 1992: 47–51.
- Lubelski, Tadeusz, 'Polish Contemporary Documentary Film: Essays on Polish Culture', Culture.pl, August 25, 2004, www.culture.pl/en/culture/artykuly/es_film_dokumentalny
- Michalek, Boleslaw and Turaj, Frank, The Modern Cinema of Poland, Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press, 1988.
- Rogerson, Edward, 'Polish Cinema: An Internal Exile?' Sight and Sound 55, summer 1986: 195–7.
- Sosnowski, Alexandra, 'Cinema in Transition: The Polish Film Today', Journal of Popular Film and Television 24, spring 1996: 10–16.
- Warchol, Tomasz, 'Polish Cinema: The End of a Beginning', Sight and Sound 55, summer 1986: 190–4.

Portillo, Lourdes

Lourdes Portillo is a Mexican-born, Chicana-identified documentary filmmaker. Her work has centered primarily on gendered Latin American and Chicano/Latino themes. She was part of a Marxist film collective in the 1970s called Cine-Manifest, and later founded the oldest Latino film organization, Cine Acción, which operates to this day in San Francisco. After receiving her MFA at the San Francisco Art Institute, she began working on her first documentary, After the Earthquake/Después del terremoto (1979), a piece about a Nicaraguan immigrant who flees his native country and settles in the Bay Area.

Her 1985 film, Las Madres: The Mothers of the Plaza de Mayo, which she codirected with Susana Muñoz, was nominated for an Academy Award for Best Documentary. It describes the heroic efforts made by the mothers of the desaparecidos or 'disappeared' children who were kidnapped and killed during Argentina's Dirty War, a dictatorship which lasted from 1976–83.

Portillo has focused her work on documenting the role of women within the Chicano/Latino/Latin American community and related issues of identity, politics, and culture in a contemporary setting. Her documentaries have ranged from Argentine 'maternal' activists, Mexican practices of the 'Day of the Dead' ritual celebration, a portrait of the Tejana singer Selena and her fan base in Corpus Christi, Texas, her familial probe into the death of her favorite uncle Oscar in Mexico, to the unresolved case of over two hundred young women murdered in the maquiladora town of Juárez, Mexico.

Rosa Linda Fregoso, Portillo's foremost biographer and critic, sums up Portillo's aesthetic sensibility in the following manner: 'While her work conforms to the realist aesthetics of cinema, Portillo has created a genuinely hybrid style of filmmaking insofar as she crosses the border of multiple styles and playfully blends aesthetic traditions' (Fregoso 2001: 100). In films such as The Devil Never Sleeps, for instance, she mixes the traditional documentary mode of interviews with beautiful and stylized shots of images such as tomatoes, toy tractors, and family photographs suspended on rippling water.

In her documentary, La Ofrenda: Days of the Dead, Portillo connects common themes between the Mexican and Mexican-American experiences of the Day of the Dead ceremony. She examines the traditional ritual in small Mexican villages, but then shifts to a more modern rendition in the gay Latino community of San Francisco. Her idea is to trace parallels between the Mexican religious ritual and the altars made in the United States to honor the deaths caused by AIDS. By making these connections, Portillo is making radical claims about the Latino diaspora and the collective identity of Latinos that is ultimately deterritorialized, but remains unified by cultural and religious ritual. By bridging the gap between Latin Americans, Chicanos/as and US Latino/as, she is acting in political ways to stress commonalities and linkages between these geographically separated groups.

Portillo's strengths in her documentaries have been the uses of unorthodox or 'non-legitimate' sources of knowledge, such as rumor, folktales, telenovela clips, dichos (proverbs) and other forms of popular culture (they are often 'feminized' practices such as gossip) to examine how knowledge is constructed in Mexico and in the United States. Her films often share themes of border crossing, the nature of truth, and the filmmaker's self-reflexivity in story-telling. Fregoso states that The Devil Never Sleeps also 'sketches the permeable borders between nations, genres, and the political/familial identities' (Fregoso 2001: 90). Portillo has deemed this film a melodocumystery due to its form of crossing genres, borders, and styles of filmmaking. Her aim was to infuse the traditional US documentary form with some elements of melodrama, a narrative device often utilized in Latin America, but frequently disliked by Americans. In an interview she states that 'in traditional documentaries, there's a sense of objectivity in documentary where you are not supposed to feel strong feelings. And that's what melodrama is about, the exaggeration of drama' (Portillo in Fregoso 1999: 324).

Humor is also an important device used in Portillo's films. In 1993, to commemorate and contest Columbus's 'discovery' of America, Portillo teamed up with the Chicano comedy troupe, Culture Clash, to create the eighteen-minute piece Columbus on Trial whereby the main character, a Native American named Stormcloud (Richard Montoya) charges Columbus with genocide in a comedic parody of courtroom dramas. This piece utilizes an inventive use of blue screen, whereby you can see Portillo's hand in placing 'exotic backdrops' to illustrate the various voyages that Columbus made. While it appeals to the viewer's sense of humor, it simultaneously engages the audience to critically rethink Columbus's legacy from the point of view of oppressed citizens.

Señorita Extraviada/Missing Young Woman tells the haunting story of the more than two hundred kidnapped, raped, and murdered young women of Ciudad Juárez, Mexico since 1993. The majority have come to the border city from the rural villages to work in the maquiladoras. Portillo spent three years in Juárez, meeting with human rights groups and speaking with the family members of the victims, who became the protagonists of the film. This documentary could be considered part of the Latin American literary/film genre the testimonio, whereby silenced or marginalized people are given a space to speak of their traumatic experiences. These stories, in the words of Portillo, 'spoke to me and became the heart of my film. These voices were the most important because they rang true and demanded justice' (Portillo 2003: 230).

The film tries to outline some of the possible murder suspects by describing a tangled web involving police complicity, government corruption, and a powerful group of drug traffickers in Juárez. Portillo's film worked as a consciousness-raising tool and a call to action. Portillo, along with Mexican filmmaker María Nováro organized both indoor and outdoor film screenings in Mexico to educate the public about this group of unsolved murders. The film helped to galvanize discussion, and soon various human rights and women's groups visibly organized around this issue (Portillo 2003: 232).

Although Portillo tackles difficult and sometimes taboo subjects in her native Mexico (e.g. questions of homosexuality, adultery, rape, and political corruption), she is able to gain entré into this society due to her Northern Mexican roots, but also because of her special status as an outside observer coming from the United States. Her dual subject positions as a Mexicana and Chicana allows her to straddle two worlds: she takes the critical distance needed to see the problems of Mexican society from an outsider's point of view, while intimately understanding the nuances of the people and the culture she has such an interest in comprehending.

TAMARA L. FALICOV

Biography

Born in Chihuahua, Mexico, Portillo was raised in Los Angeles from the age of thirteen. In 1978, after graduating from the San Francisco Art Institute, Portillo was awarded the American Film Institute (AFI) Independent Filmmaker Award to create an internationally acclaimed narrative film, After the Earthquake/Después del terremoto, about a Nicaraguan refugee living in San Francisco. In 1985 Portillo won an Academy Award nomination in the Best Documentary category for Las Madres: The Mothers of the Plaza de Mayo. This film won twenty awards and positioned her to obtain PBS funding to complete her next film, La Ofrenda: The Days of the Dead, in 1989. In 1992, in connection with commemoration of Columbus's 'discovery' of America, Portillo won an NEA Inter-Arts grant to produce a performance piece called 'Columbus on Trial', featuring the Chicago comedy troupe Culture Clash. It screened at the London and Sundance film festivals. This film was selected for the 1993 Whitney Biennial. In 1994 she was awarded a Guggenheim fellowship in recognition of her achievements in filmmaking. Continuing with Mexican and Mexican American themes, she next created a film about border crossing and family secrets in Mexico called The Devil Never Sleeps/El diablo nunca duerme. In 1999 she directed the documentary Corpus: A Home Movie for Selena about the impact that the Tejana singer Selena Quintanilla had on young Chicanas in Texas. Her most recent film, Señorita Extraviada, is a grim story of the two hundred murdered young women of Juárez, Mexico. The filmmaker poetically investigates the circumstances of the murders and the horror, fear, and courage of the families whose children have been taken.

Selected films

- 1979 After the Earthquake/Después del terremoto
 1986 Las Madres: The Mothers of the Plaza de Mayo
 1988 La Ofrenda: The Days of the Dead
 1992 Columbus on Trial
 1994 The Devil Never Sleeps/El diablo nunca duerme
 1999 Corpus: A Home Movie for Selena
 2001 Señorita Extraviada/Missing Young Woman

Further reading

- Fregoso, Rosa Linda, Lourdes Portillo: The Devil Never Sleeps and Other Films, Austin, TX: University of Texas Press, 2001.
 ——— ‘Sacando los trapos al sol (airing dirty laundry) in Lourdes Portillo’s Melodocumystery, The Devil Never Sleeps’, in Duana Robin and Ira Jaffe (eds), Redirecting the Gaze: Gender, Theory and Cinema in the Third World, New York: SUNY Press, 1999: 307–29.
 Fusco, Coco, ‘Las Madres de la Plaza de Mayo: An Interview with Susana Muñoz and Lourdes Portillo’, Cineaste 15, no. 1, 1986: 22–5.
 Gonzalez, Rita, ‘The Said and the Unsaid: Lourdes Portillo Tracks Down Ghosts in Señorita Extraviada’, Aztlán: A Journal of Chicano Studies 28, no. 2, fall 2003: 235–40.
 Portillo, Lourdes, ‘Filming Señorita Extraviada’, Aztlán: A Journal of Chicano Studies 28, no. 2, fall 2003: 229–35.

Portugal

The first Portuguese documentaries were a series of short films produced in 1896 by the film pioneer Aurélio da Paz dos Reis (1852–1931). Obviously influenced by the Lumière brothers, the films depicted scenes of daily life in Portugal—cattle markets, firemen at work, arrival of trains, and a very typical Saída do Pessoal Operario da Fabrica Confiança/Workers’ Exit from the Confiança Shirt Factory. Although Paz dos Reis can be considered the first filmmaker of the Iberian peninsula, his career was extremely brief. When a screening of his films in Brazil in 1897 failed, he lost all interest in filmmaking.

During the first twenty-five years of cinema in Portugal, the documentary was reduced to the filming of newsreel scenes, which led to the curious fact that all films of more or less ‘documentary’ condition were generically defined as actualidades, or newsreels. It was not until the end of the silent cinema that the influence of foreign filmmakers, and the critical commercial success of works by Flaherty, Ruttmann, and Vertov, marked a turning point in Portuguese documentary filmmaking. This turning point was marked by the release of three important films: Nazaré, Praia de Pescadores/The Fishers of Nazaré (1929), Alfama, Velha Lisboa/Alfama, the Oldest Lisbon (1929), and Douro, Faina Fluvial/Working at the Douro (1931).

Filmed in 1928, Nazaré was photographed and produced by Artur Costa de Macedo (the only name in the credits when it was first released) and directed by José Leitão de Barros. According to its title, it shows daily life in that fishermen’s village, with great attention to atmospheric detail. The critics hailed the superb photography and handsome editing, and soon it was classified as a milestone in Portuguese cinema. Unfortunately, the prints preserved are fragmentary. In the two following decades, Leitão de Barros (1896–1967) became one of the major Portuguese filmmakers, although not in the documentary genre. He directed such epics as the first ‘talkie’, A Severa (1931, filmed in Paris), Bocage (1936), and Camões (1946).

Alfama, Velha Lisboa is forgotten today, but in 1929 it was warmly received. Because its credited director was an amateur, a medical student named João de Almeida e Sá, the merits of the film are usually attributed to its cinematographer, again Artur Costa de Macedo.

Douro Faina Fluvial is the most accomplished of these three films, in part because of the name of its director, the now nonagenarian and still active Manoel de Oliveira (born 1908), but also because of its modern, avant-garde cinematic language that was probably one of the reasons for its weak critical and commercial reception. In 1934 the film was rereleased in a new version, which had been slightly reedited by Oliveira and had an added soundtrack, as a companion to the successful feature Gado Bravo/Brave Bulls, directed by Oliveira’s former assistant António Lopes Ribeiro. Douro Faina Fluvial was reevaluated by critics and is now considered a classic.

Between 1933 and 1974 and after the military coup of 1926, Portugal lived under an authoritarian regime called Estado Novo. António de Oliveira Salazar, professor of economics at the University of Coimbra, was the leader of this dictatorship, which was based on the political clichés of religion, family, and authority, with the addition of light fascist elements and a solid friendship with one democratic power, Great Britain, which actually was the main supporter of Salazar's regime until its very last years. Cinema was not one of the priorities of the new regime's politics; in fact, the Portuguese film industry was practically nonexistent, and theatres only showed foreign films, but Salazar knew that control of every medium was necessary.

Because the number of fiction films being produced was minimal, all efforts were concentrated on documentaries. In 1933 a propaganda office called the Secretariado da Propaganda Nacional, Alfama, Velha Lisboa (SPN) was created to oversee the ideological messages circulated by newspapers, radio, and cinema (in 1944 the name was subtly changed to Secretariado Nacional da Informação, Cultura Populare Turismo: SNI). The main collaborator among cinema people was António Lopes Ribeiro (1908–95), who was responsible for the most important cinematic projects of Salazarism. One of them was related to the colonies: during nine months of 1938, the SPN organized an expedition to Portuguese Africa ('Missão Cinegráfica às Colónias de África'), led by Ribeiro, to shoot enough material to edit a series of films of variable length. The results led to an eighty-minute documentary, Viagem de Sua Exa. O Presidente da República a Angola/Journey of His Excellency the President to Angola (1939), some short subjects like Guiné, Berço do Império/Guinea, Birth of Empire (1940, twenty minutes), Aspectos de Moçambique/Vistas of Mozambique (1941, twelve minutes), or Angola, a Nova Lusitânia/Angola, a New Lusitania (1944, thirty minutes), and a feature film with actors, Feitiço do Império/The Enchantment of Empire (1940). Ribeiro continued his service to Salazar until 1974.

In 1956 Manoel de Oliveira, retired from filmmaking since 1942, presented a thirty-minute documentary entitled O Pintor e A Cidade/The Painter and the City, a tribute to his native city, Porto (like the earlier Douro Faina Fluvial) as well as to the painter António Ruiz. The release of this film acted as the prelude to the most productive period of Portuguese documentary—paradoxically the result of a negative factor.

In the mid-1950s film production in Portugal collapsed as a result of several factors. The weak domestic market contributed to the problem, while the lack of markets for export reduced the production of newsreels and documentaries, most of them shot inexpensively using 16mm equipment and black-and-white photography. This was not the case for Rapsódia Portuguesa/Portuguese Rhapsody (1958, directed by João Mendes), a 35mm, colour, handsomely mounted travelogue produced by the SNI for strictly touristic purposes; however, it does characterize A Almadraba Atuneira/The Tunny-Fishery (1961), the film debut of the best documentarist filmmaker of Portugal, António Campos (1922–99). Campos's innovative and courageous work is largely unknown, even in Portugal, and merits attention. He generally writes and shoots his own films, and receives production support from cultural institutions, mainly the Gulbenkian Foundation, where he was a civil servant for years. His films are little masterpieces of ethnographic cinema. To name only a few from a filmography of almost fifty titles, we can select two medium-length works, Vilarinho das Furnas (1971) and Falamos de Rio de Onor/Talking About Rio de Onor (1974), both clever studies of primitive rural societies.

Apart from the films of Campos, marked by their ethnographic approach, the documentaries produced during the 1960s can be classified by subject. The less interesting are those made to promote tourism, some of them edited only in English versions, like José Fonseca e Costa's (later a noted feature director) The Pearl of the Atlantic (about Madeira, 1969) and Golf in the Algarve (1972).

Another subject was figures of Portuguese culture, living or dead. Among the writers profiled, the best examples are the tributes to poet Sophia de Mello Breyner Andresen (1968, released 1972) by João César Santos (later known as Monteiro), and to novelist Fernando Namora (1969) by Manuel Guimarães. Both films were produced by Ricardo Malheiro, who, along with Francisco de Castro, was one of the most enterprising producers of those years. Malheiro was also the sponsor of 27 Minutos con Fernando Lopes-Graça/27 Minutes with Fernando Lopes-Graça (shot 1968–9, released 1971), directed without credit with another future great filmmaker, António Pedro Vasconcelos (Lopes Graça was a musician), and Castro produced Almada Negreiros Vivo, Hoje/Almada Negreiros Live, Today (1969), homage to this painter by Antonio de Macedo, which was one of the most celebrated titles of this series. Manuel Guimarães produced and directed Carta a Mestre Dórdio Gomes/A Letter for Mr Dórdio Gomes (1971, about a painter) and Areia, Mar—Mar, Areia/Sand, Sea—Sea, Sand (1973, about sculptor Martins Correia). Distinguished documentary specialist Faria de Almeida (born in Mozambique in 1934) provided one of the most ambitious ‘biographic’ films about a living writer: Vida e Obra de Ferreira de Castro/Life and Works of Ferreira de Castro (1971, released 1974), which included scenes of the character’s childhood, testimonies of colleagues like Jorge Amado, and excerpts from amateur films. It was produced by Telecine-Moro, a company specializing in commercial filmlets that contributed to the production of documentaries and newsreels. A more conservative approach was given by veteran Lopes Ribeiro in his Gil Vicente e o Seu Teatro/Gil Vicente and his Theatre (1965), an official SNI production for the fifth centennial of the famed playwright.

The most accomplished film about a living character was Belarmino (1964), directed by Fernando Lopes (born 1935) and produced by António da Cunha Telles, based on the remembrances of Belarmino Fragoso, a former boxing champion. An incisive portrait of a man and a city (Lisbon), this testimonial documentary is justly remembered today as one of the landmarks of the ‘New Portuguese Cinema’ and one of the few films of this period with a real social concern, only comparable to another Lopes title, Nacionalidade: Português/Nationality: Portuguese (1972, released 1974), a slightly softened exposé of the hard conditions of the life of Portuguese workers in Paris.

Indicative of the strange situation of the film industry during this period is a series of documentary shorts with diverse sponsors. For example, Francisco de Castro produced for the National Tobacco Factory the politically incorrect (by the standards of the time) Nicotiana (1963). This film marked the beginning of a ten-year collaboration with the director António de Macedo (born 1931), probably the main specialist of ‘industrial’ films, among them, História Breve da Madeira Aglomerada/A Short History of Agglomerate Wood (1970), a surprisingly good treatment of the subject. The other great director in this field was Faria de Almeida, who, with Faça Segundo a Arte/Make it as You Know (1965), produced by the Indústria Portuguesa de Especialidades Farmacêuticas, succeeded in making the process of manufacturing medical drugs entertaining.

Glorification of empire persisted, despite the increasing unrest in colonial territories. Some films with propaganda goals were sufficiently ambiguous to arouse censorship suspicions. The most flagrant case was that of Faria de Almeida’s Catembe (1965), about daily life in Mozambique, which, after a semi-clandestine preview, was cut from eighty-seven to forty-five minutes. The most impressive effort in colonialist propaganda was Angola na Guerra e no Progresso/Angola: War and Progress (1971), a widescreen, colour blockbuster produced by the Serviço de Informação Pública das Forças Armadas (SIPFA) and directed by Quirino Simões, an Air Force officer who was also an accomplished filmmaker. Simões (born 1931) is the author of another accomplished work of propaganda, Guiné, A Caminho do Futuro/Guinea, the Road to the Future (1971), a tribute to Gen. António de Spínola, then Governor of Guinea, as well as two fiction films (shot in 1967 and 1991).

The Carnation Revolution of April 25, 1974 changed Portugal’s political landscape, which was reflected by film. Cinema and television documentaries were conceived as propaganda weapons. The first report of the Revolution (and an impressive depiction of its time) was As Armas e o Povo/Arms and the People (shot in 1974, edited in 1975), which, as with many of the titles produced during this period, was presented without directorial credit, as a production of a group calling themselves ‘Trabalhadores da Actividade Cinematográfica’/‘workers of the activist cinema’. Among these ‘workers’ were such noted filmmakers as Luis Galvão Teles (one of the main animators of this militant cinema), Fernando Lopes, Alberto Seixas Santos, António de Macedo, António de Cunha Telles, António Pedro Vasconcelos, José Fonseca e Costa, and Brazilian talent Glauber Rocha. The other important piece of militant cinema was Deus, Patria, Autoridade/God, Country, Authority (1975) by Rui Simões. If the earlier film was the first cinematic portrait of revolutionary days, the second was the first critical approach to the forty years of Salazar's dictatorship. Coproduced by the newly formed Instituto Português de Cinema (IPC) and the RTP (Portuguese Television), its message sounds today a little partisan, but it was a phenomenal success.

One of the most active filmmaker cooperatives of this period was the Grupo Zero, responsible for two documentaries on agrarian reform made in 1976: A Lei da Terra/The Law of the Earth, also known as Alentejo 76, mainly directed by Alberto Seixas Santos; and A Luta do Povo/The People in Arms, which according to the most credible sources was directed by Swedish-born Solveig Nordlund. Nordlund was the editor of Alberto Seixas Santos's curious experiment on Estado Novo, Brandos Costumes/Sweet Habits, 1975, a mix of documentary and fiction elements filmed in part before April 25, 1974 and later completed with archive material. Another important purveyor of militant films was Cinequanon, a company founded by Luis Galvão Teles. Among its titles were O Outro Teatro/The Other Theatre (1976) by António de Macedo, about the staging of politically non-conformist plays, and Colônia e Vilões/Colonies and Villages (1977) by Leonel Brito, about political and religious repression on the island of Madeira. The most elaborate and widely known piece on agrarian reform was a coproduction with West Germany about a people's cooperative, Torre Bela (1977), directed by Thomas Harlan, son of Veit Harlan, famous (or infamous) for his cinematic contributions to Nazi propaganda. The independence of African territories was another political subject for documentaries, Fernando Matos Silva's Acto dos Feitos da Guiné/History of the Events of Guinea (1980) being one of the most accurate. The cycle of political documentaries ended in the late 1970s, with Rui Simões' Bom Povo Português/Good Portuguese People (1981) standing as a sort of summary of the illusions and disappointments of the revolutionary period.

Despite the increasing presence of political messages in documentaries, some of them managed to follow the lines established before 1974. In the ethnographic category, we have a masterpiece by António Campos, Gente da Praia da Vieira/People from Praia da Vieira (1975), a tribute to this fishermen's village where he directed one of his first amateur films, Um Tesouro/A Treasury (1958). The impoverished villages of the northeast of Portugal were the subject of Máscaras/Masks (1975) by Noémia Delgado and the superb Trás-os-Montes (1976) by António Reis and Margarida Martins Cordeiro. The daily life of women in the village of Lanheses was beautifully portrayed by Manuela Serra in O Movimento das Coisas/Things in Motion (1985).

Among biographical films, one of the best is Ma Femme Chamada Bicho/My wife, Bicho (1976), produced by the Gulbenkian Foundation and directed by José Álvaro Morais, about the artist couple Maria Helena Vieira da Silva and Arpád Szenes. An original approach was that of Lauro António's Prefácio a Vergílio Ferreira (1975), which was a sort of preface to a later adaptation by António of one of the most celebrated novels by Ferreira, Manhã Submersa/Hidden Dawn (1979). A little disappointing were Herculano, filmed in 1978 by João Matos Silva for the centennial of one of the great Portuguese writers, and Maranos (1978) by Dórdio Guimarães, about poet Teixeira de Pascoaes, produced by IPC and the Ministry of Culture. However, the most original work of this category appeared some years later: A Ilha de Moraes (1984) by Paul Rocha, a study of Wenceslaus de Moraes, a nineteenth-century writer enchanted by Japanese culture. De Moraes had previously been the hero of Rocha's time-consuming feature film, A Ilha dos Amores, which was shot with great difficulty in Japan between 1979 and 1982.

The mid-1980s marked the collapse of documentary production, or, to be exact, of those films intended to be shown in a theatre. An audience who turned increasingly toward television and away from the cinema, an increase in costs, and a decrease in state sponsorship were the main causes of the decline in film production.

In the early 1990s, however, a slight revival took place because of two factors. One was exclusively technical: the increased use of video stock, which was less expensive and easy to edit, decreased costs. The increased participation of national institutions like the ICAM (Instituto de Cinematografia, Audiovisuais e Multimédia, known as IPACA until 1999) and, especially, Portuguese Television (RTP) in filmmaking also helped.

The points of view covered were, curiously, generally the same as in earlier years. For example, the ethnographic approach was apparent in the depiction of the rural areas of Portugal in Fernando Matos Silva's Alentejo—As Quatro Estações/Alentejo—The Four Seasons (1994) and A Luz Submersa/The Obscured Light (2001), as well as Rabo de Peixe/Isinglass Island (2000) by Joaquim Pinto and Nuno Leonel; the African and Asian immigrants to Portugal in Afro Lisboa/Afro Lisbon (1996) by Ariel de Bigault, Kulandakilu (1998) by Margarida Leitão, or Swagatam/Bemvindos (Swagatam/Welcome) (1998) by Catarina Alves Costa. Current life in the former colonies was portrayed in O Homem da Bicicleta/The Bicycle Man (1997) by Ivo M. Ferreira and António Pedro, Céu Aberto/Open Sky (1998) by Graça Castanheira, A Dama de Chandor/The Lady from Chandor (1998) by Catarina Mourao, Com Quase Nada, Brincar em Cabo Verde/With Near Nothing, or How Children Play in Cabo Verde (2000) by Carlos Barroco and Margarida Correia. The team Pinto-Leonel produced some titles about Brazil such as Surfavela/Poor Man's Surf (1996) and Moleque da Rua/Children of the Streets (1998).

Another important approach of previous decades, the biographical portrayal, was typified by Aurélio da Paz dos Reis (1995) by veteran Faria de Almeida; Táxi Lisboa (1996) by the Bavarian Wolf Gaudlitz, about and made with the writer Vergílio Ferreira; Vencer a Sombra/Fighting with Shadows (1996) by Paulo Ares and Pedro Madeira, about an aged boxer, a sort of sequel to Fernando Lopes's Belarmino; As Escolhidas/The Elected Women (1997) by Margarida Gil, about painter Graça Morais; Joaquim Bravo (1999) by Jorge Silva Melo, about this painter; No Quarto da Vanda/In Vanda's Room (2000) by Pedro Costa, a one hundred and sixty-minute mix of reality and fiction on the daily life of Vanda Duarte, former actress of Costa's Ossos/Bones (1997), in Fountainhas, the caboverdians' quarter of Lisbon; Ilusíada—A Minha Vida Dava Um Filme/The Illusitans or My Life Would Be a Movie (2001) by Leonor Areal, about four unknown characters whose modest lives reflected fifty years of Portuguese history, which was presented theatrically as a one-hundred-and-thirty-five-minute film and in three fifty-eight-minute chapters for television; and Agostinho Neto (2001) by Orlando de Fortunato, about the Angolese leader. Bruno de Almeida's A Arte de Amália/The Art of Amália (2000) was a tribute to legendary fado singer Amália Rodrigues, which used footage from the 1920s until her death in 1999, including live clips from her concerts.

The designation of Lisbon and Portugal as European Cultural Capitals in 1994 and 2001 encouraged the production of the following documentaries by prestigious filmmakers: Joaquim Leitão's A Cidade Qualquer/Just Another City (1994) opted for an experimental, pseudo-impressionistic approach, and Manoel de Oliveira's Porto da Minha Infância/Port of My Childhood (2001) used Fellini-like fictionalized sequences for a nostalgic trip to a city that he had depicted cinematically on other occasions, for example in his early masterpiece Douro, Faina Fluvial.

RAFAEL DE ESPAÑA

Further reading

- de España, Rafael, Directory of Spanish and Portuguese Filmmakers and Films, Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1994.
- de Matos-Cruz, José, Anos de Abril (Cinema Português 1974–82), Lisbon: Instituto Português do Cinema, 1982.
- Cinema Novo Português, 1960–74, Lisbon: Cinemateca Portuguesa, 1985.
- Prontuário do Cinema Português 1896–1988, Lisbon: Cinemateca Portuguesa, 1989.
- O Cais do Olhar. O Cinema Português de Lungmetragem e a Ficção Muda, Lisbon: Cinemateca Portuguesa, 1999.
- de Pina, Luís, Documentarismo Português, Lisbon: Instituto Português do Cinema, 1977.
- Passek, Jean Loup, Ribeiro, M. Felix, de Pina, Luís and de Matos Cruz, José, Le cinéma portugais, Paris: Centre Georges Pompidou, 1982.
- Paulo, Heloísa, 'Documentarismo e Propaganda. As Imagens os Sons do Regime', in Luís Reis Torgal (ed.), O Cinema Sob o Olhar de Salazar, Lisbon: Temas e Debates, 2001.
- Ramos, Jorge Leitão, Dicionário do Cinema Português 1962–88, Lisbon: Caminho, 1989.

Prayer

(Cuba, Trujillo, 1983)

Prayer, directed by Cuban filmmaker Marisol Trujillo, is a short documentary film in the tradition of the aesthetic and political experimental work associated with Third Cinema practitioners. The film embodies a Third Cinema aesthetic in its commitment to 'an imperfect cinema' that challenges First Cinema practices and seeks to address audiences at a political level (Chanan 1985: 251). Trujillo's hard-hitting film harks back to an exceptional period of experimentation in radical political film in the 1960s and 1970s associated with the Cuban Institute of Cinematographic Art and Industry (ICIAC). Representative works include Santiago Alvarez's Now (1965), which offers a powerful exposition of institutionalised racism in America, and LBJ (1968), which delivers a stinging critique of American political life through a montage of found images that associatively link Lyndon B. Johnston with political corruption.

Throughout Prayer, Trujillo draws on the traditions of Soviet montage filmmaking and employs montage editing techniques to juxtapose still and film footage of found images, with music, and poetic dialogue. These elements function cumulatively to mount a powerful Marxist critique of the ideological structures and institutions of Western capitalism, in a visual style similar to that of her fellow Cuban filmmaker Alvarez.

Trujillo was one of several female Cuban filmmakers who worked under the auspices of ICAIC. Prayer embodies a strong Marxist-feminist aesthetic in the way images of Marilyn Monroe's life are juxtaposed with political events of the time. For much of the film, the spoken verse of Ernesto Cardenal's poem Oración por Marilyn Monroe (Prayer for Marilyn Monroe) is superimposed over the visuals, presenting a catalogue of abuse associated with Marilyn Monroe, from child rape, through her time as a product of the 'Hollywood Dream Factory', to her early suicide.

Trujillo's selection of found images of Marilyn Monroe emphasizes the way in which the female body is objectified by mainstream media conventions and would seem to directly reference the work of film theorist Laura Mulvey (1975) on 'the male gaze'. The film includes many promotional 'glamour shots' of Marilyn Monroe as media celebrity and film footage of her in her many roles as screen goddess, posed suggestively in revealing costume, while the camera, by lingering on parts of her body, fragments and dehumanises the woman into 'body parts': breasts, legs, or open yielding mouth. These striking visual sequences represent Marilyn as the object of the male gaze and illustrate the way in which the female body is exploited as a mere spectacle for male pleasure.

Marilyn's 'glamour shots' and other images of fetishised female 'body parts' are juxtaposed with conflicting images from the latter part of Marilyn's troubled career, clearly interpreting her as a hunted victim of media intrusion. Archive photographic material from Marilyn's childhood and youth are also included with a spoken dialogue, which refers to her long-standing history of abuse and domination prior to her celebrity status and entrance into the Hollywood Studio system. Throughout Prayer, Marilyn's image functions as a cinematic metaphor for patriarchal oppression.

Through the use of associative montage, the film's thematic concern with Marilyn's exploitation within a patriarchal system shifts to a more direct critique of political regimes and the ideological structures that oppress their people. There are many startling and repetitive motifs throughout the film that link Marilyn's exploitation and death with that of 'innocents' throughout the world. The overriding thematic concern with Marilyn is interspersed with stills and film footage from around the world (hunger marches, political rallies, children living on the street, child prostitutes) and juxtaposed with images of state violence, police beatings, and military hardware. In one sequence, images of Marilyn's softly yielding mouth are juxtaposed with startling images of an open-mouthed starving child from the Third World: in another, pictures of the headless bodies and the decapitated heads of political victims echo the 'body parts' imagery of earlier visuals of Marilyn. The film constructs strong links between global capitalism and Third World oppression.

Throughout the film, in spoken dialogue and imagery, the ideological practices of Western media are critiqued. Twentieth Century Fox in particular is singled out as representative of the exploitive practices of global capitalism and is associatively linked to the oppression, violence, and poverty experienced by many people living in the Third World. Prayer offers its audience a harrowing visual catalogue of brutality and exploitation, which is reinforced by Cardenal's poetic dialogue.

Nevertheless, the film ends on a note of optimism. As it reaches its climax, Cardenal's dialogue is overlaid with Blake's 'Jerusalem', which rises to a crescendo as, in a rapid montage sequence, edited images of 'people empowerment' flash across the screen. The pace picks up as the film shifts from cataloguing injustice throughout the world to images of revolutionary militancy. Transcultural motifs of arms raised in power salutes are interspersed with iconic images of Che Guevara and of heavily armed young revolutionaries, male and female 'brothers' in arms, who are represented as having literally taken up arms in their determination to protect 'the innocent'. There would seem to be no place for patriarchal oppression within the revolution (an optimistic if conflicting statement on female empowerment within Cuban society, given that machismo remained a powerful influence in Cuban society after the revolution). The film ends with a long take on the static image of a small child of indeterminate sex, smiling with arms outstretched in exuberance, happy and at peace. The screen fades to black as the audience is left to contemplate this lasting image of care-free childhood, a powerful visual statement on moral obligation.

In addition to Prayer, Trujillo made several other documentaries under the auspices of ICIAC, focusing on Cuban culture and famous Cuban artists. Motivations (1988) profiled the Cuban painter and sculptor Manuel Mendive and explored the sources for his art. Encounter (1981) documented the meeting between the Cuban prima ballerina Alicia Alonso and the Soviet dancer Vladimir Vasiliev when they met in preparation for their duet in Giselle. Woman Before the Mirror (1983) profiled the Cuban dancer Rosario Suarez.

PAT A. COOK

See also: Alvarez, Santiago; LBJ; Now

Further reading

- Chanan, Michael, The Cuban Image, London: BFI, 1985.
 Mulvey, Laura, 'Visual Pleasure and Narrative Cinema', Screen 16, no. 3, 1975: 6–18.
 Pines, Jim and Willemen, Paul, Questions of Third Cinema, London: BFI, 1989.
 Wayne, Michael, Political Film: The Dialectics of Third Cinema, London: Pluto Press, 2001.

Prelorán, Jorge

Jorge Prelorán, a native of Argentina, is the most widely recognized and prolific ethnographic filmmaker of Latin America. His films generally focus on the folkways of individual subjects within a rural or natural environment. The majority of his work explores the various indigenous tribes throughout the provinces of Argentina, but it includes portraits of indigenous people and communities in countries such as Venezuela and Ecuador. He has also worked as the codirector and coproducer on a film that one of his former University of California, Los Angeles (UCLA) students made about a poet, philosopher, and cabin builder in Oregon, USA, entitled Luther Metke at 94 (1979). This film was nominated for an Academy Award the following year.

Preferring the term ethnobiographer to ethnographer, Prelorán tends to focus on one man's life experiences and perspectives, which become emblematic of a tribe or people typically living on the margins. To achieve a strong rapport with his subject, he would spend long stretches of time with his subject before turning on a film camera. After a comfort level was achieved, Prelorán would record an audio track with his subject and would later intertwine the subject's voice with silent camera footage recorded later. Prelorán has produced over seventy films, in which he has worked as the director, cameraman, soundman, and editor. Many times he will complete a film, only to go back months later to recut the film into a different version. Over a span of years, a work may have multiple incarnations. Just as culture is constantly in flux, so too are Prelorán's films.

His style has been compared to Flaherty's depictions of the harmony between man and nature. However, in an interview, Jorge Prelorán has stated that although he identifies with Flaherty's humanism, he has been influenced the most by the Italian neorealists of the 1950s. His interest focuses primarily on documenting indigenous culture in Latin America as a way to preserve the folk traditions and rituals, while simultaneously elevating the importance of these cultures, which are too often marginalized and threatened with extinction in the Americas. Despite the fact that Prelorán's work is widely recognized and studied by visual anthropology scholars, he prefers to categorize his films as simply 'human documents'. Because his interviews are in Spanish, a language he can understand, Prelorán labels his films as folkloric, rather than ethnographic. In this way, he believes that 'the magic of his human documents is the sensitivity with which many of the things shot were achieved' (Sherman 1985).

His best-known film, Hermógenes Cayo (Imaginero) (1969), features Cayo, a deeply spiritual and religious icon carver in the province of Santiago del Estero. As Sharon Sherman (one of Prelorán's former students), explains, 'his early films look at single events which place the protagonists in their environments, but the rituals themselves, rather than the participants, are the central focus' (Sherman 1985). Prelorán, while interviewing subjects such as Hermógenes and others, excises his questions out of the voice-over narration to avoid calling attention to himself as a main narrative framing agent for the film. With the exception of the film on the Warao, a Venezuelan tribe, all of Prelorán's films since 1967 have used the subjects' voices to describe their own lives. In this way, according to Sherman, he has chosen a group of characters who represent a culture. Documenting their quotidian activities alongside their religious and cultural traditions, Prelorán tries to be an invisible filmmaker, much in the style of traditional documentarians. However, this does not rule out what he calls the 'subjective' or 'artistic' focus in which filmmaking can be an art—that is, whereby the language of cinema and the dramatic structure of fictional film are used (Prelorán 1995). According to filmmaker Ron Norman, Prelorán's films 'have the humanism of Jean Renoir and Akira Kurosawa, the inner or personal life of Ingmar Bergman, and the revelations of Robert Flaherty and Satyajit Ray' (Taquini 1994).

Politically, he is committed to eliminating any trace of his own ideology from his films: 'I do not want to impose my own ideas. This means that my films are not political or ideological. I have no intention to use my film as a vehicle for my ideas rather than [those of] the protagonists. I try to listen to people and convert this into a film.' Although he may not be overtly adopting a political agenda, it is clear that he aims to empower these communities that are often excluded from Latin American public sphere by making them visible. He has shared some of the money made in film screenings and sales with his films' protagonists. It is clear that Prelorán's self-described 'apolitical' work has been aimed at bettering the life of rural people in Argentina, and this could have had dangerous consequences after a military junta seized power in 1976. Fleeing in exile to the United States, Prelorán and his wife Mabel, also a filmmaker, left their country definitively in search of better working conditions.

Prelorán then lived in Los Angeles, where he was professor emeritus of ethnographic film at UCLA's School of Film and Television. His work has been recognized widely in ethnographic film festivals, but otherwise, it is not readily accessible. Always working outside of the studio system in Argentina and the United States, he has generally worked solo or with his wife to produce and promote his films. Only one film, Mi Tía Nora, filmed in Ecuador, was a fictional film based on a true story and was produced as a feature-length commercial release.

TAMARA L. FALICOV

Biography

Born May 28, 1933, in Buenos Aires, Argentina. Studied architecture at the Universidad Nacional de Buenos Aires but left to attend the University of California, Los Angeles, where he finished film school in 1961. Awarded a Tinker Foundation Grant to direct four films on Argentine gauchos in 1963. Funded by the National University of Tucuman (an Argentine provincial city) in 1967 to document various folkloric traditions in Argentina. In 1976 he fled Argentina and began living in exile in the United States, where he became professor emeritus in the Ethnographic Film program in the School of Film and Television at the University of California, Los Angeles. He produced more than seventy films over a period of twenty years. Died 28 March 2009 in Culver City.

Selected films

- | | |
|---------|---|
| 1963 | The Argentine Gaucho Today/El gaucho argentino, hoy : director |
| 1966–71 | Araucanos of the Ruca Choroy/Araucanos de Ruca Choroy : director |
| 1967 | The Image Maker/Hermógenes Cayo (Imaginero) : director |
| 1973 | Ona People/Los ona: Vida y muerte en Tierra del Fuego : director |
| 1975 | Cochengo Miranda : director |
| 1978 | Zerda's Children/Los hijos de Zerda : director |
| 1980 | Luther Metke at 94 : codirector (with Steve Raymen), coproducer (with Richard Hawkins) |

- 1982 Zulay Confronts the Twentieth Century/Zulay frente al siglo XX: director
- 1983 My Aunt Nora/Mi Tia Nora: director

Further reading

- Ardevol, Elisenda and Perez Tolon, Luis (eds), Imagen y cultura: perspectivas del cine etnográfico, Biblioteca de etnología 3, Granada, Spain: Publicaciones del diputacion provincial de Granada, 1995.
- Barnard, Timothy, 'Hermógenes Cayo (Imaginero)', in Timothy Barnard and Peter Rist (eds), South American Cinema: A Critical Filmography, 1915–94, Austin, TX: University of Texas Press, 1996: 50–2.
- Chicello, Ruben D., 'Jorge Prelorán: The Documentary as Poetry', Américas 34, no. 6, November–December 1982: 55.
- Devereaux, Leslie and Hillman, Roger (eds), Fields of Vision: Essays in Film Studies, Visual Anthropology, and Anthropology, Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1995.
- Kruger, Clara and Sendros, Parana, 'Jorge Preloran', in Clara Kruger and Alejandra Portela (eds), Diccionario de realizadores, Buenos Aires: Ediciones del jilguero, 1997: 128–9.
- MacDougall, David, Transcultural Cinema, Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1998.
- Mathieu, Agustin, Breve historia del cine nacional, Buenos Aires: Alzamor Editores, 1974.
- Prelorán, Jorge, 'Conceptos éticos y estéticos en el cine etnográfico', in Elisenda Ardevol and Luis Perez Tolon (eds), Imagen y cultura: perspectivas del cine etnográfico, Biblioteca de etnología 3, Granada, Spain: Publicaciones del diputacion provincial de Granada, 1995: 123–60.
- Sherman, Sharon, 'Human Documents: Folklore and the Films of Jorge Preloran', Southwest Folklore 6, 1985: 17–61.
- , Documenting Ourselves: Film, Video, and Culture, Lexington: University of Kentucky Press, 1998.
- Taquini, Graciela, Jorge Prelorán, Buenos Aires: Centro Editor de America Latina, 1994.

Preston, Gaylene

Gaylene Preston, director and producer of both documentaries and fiction films, is one of Aotearoa's (New Zealand) senior filmmakers, a status earned through the quality of her own productions and her efforts at all levels—from education to funding—to help other local filmmakers with their work. Preston's interest in telling local stories for local audiences has tied her to Aotearoa (New Zealand), although she has often wished for bigger budgets and more consistent funding for her projects (the advantage of accepting local budgetary restraints has been total control of all her projects). In keeping with her understanding of film as an important part of its local community, she acknowledges film's collaborative nature and refers to her 'creative team'. She has played, and continues to play, an important role in developing creative talent and practical skills among a large and varied group of protégées, through hiring them to assist her, producing their early efforts, mentoring via Women in Film and Television, the New Zealand Film Commission, and the Film School, and through her efforts to attract local and national government support for the New Zealand film and television industries. An active filmmaker who made the second feature-length fiction film directed by a woman in Aotearoa (New Zealand) (a gender-bender thriller entitled Mr Wrong, 1984), she was honored as film laureate for the country.

Although Preston has made several successful fiction films (including a comic satire, Ruby and Rata, 1990, that deals with ethnic, gender, and class stereotypes, and Bread and Roses, 1994, a television miniseries/feature film docudrama based on the autobiography of nurse, social activist, and eventually MP Sonja Davies), the bulk of her work has taken the form of documentaries about extraordinary individuals as seen through Preston's eyes. Her favorite film, she says, is one of her earliest, Learning Fast (1981), about a group of small-town teenagers whom she and her camera track over approximately a year of their lives as they make the transition from school to unemployment. The teenagers start with high hopes and confidence, but the town's lack of employment opportunities wears them down. Typically, this film sympathizes with the individual's point of view at the same time that it situates the individual's dilemma within an acute analysis of the social context.

The best example of Preston's ability to draw attention to systemic frameworks for individual dissatisfactions comes at the close of Married (1993), Preston's contribution to a series of TV dramas made by women in honor of the centenary of women's suffrage in Aotearoa (New Zealand). Having established that the married couple in question have their own joys and troubles, Preston ends her film with the frustrated wife sitting on the back steps; the camera pulls away to show a long row of similar houses in the dawn light, each with its own, presumably similar story to tell of husbands and wives boxed in by economic limitations. According to Preston, Married is her 'most unpopular film' because it is done 'in doco-realism', a style that doesn't let audiences 'off the hook'.

If a group of unemployed teenagers might not seem particularly extraordinary, Preston's first documentary subject was more obviously unusual. Bruce Burgess, incapacitated by cerebral palsy, wanted to get to the top of Mount Ruapehu, one of Aotearoa's (New Zealand) active volcanoes. All the Way Up There (1978), which documents his successful ascent (accomplished with the aid of committed expert climbers), was a financial success for Preston (Encyclopaedia Britannica bought it) as well as a succès d'estime that won Preston international prizes and some local recognition. Her next film, Hold-Up (1981), is a docudrama in the sense that it combines a dramatized scene of a hold-up witnessed by three disabled bystanders with interview material about the players' own responses as disabled persons to the idea that their testimony would have no credibility because of their disabilities.

Although Making Utu (1982) is about Geoff Murphy's second complete feature film, it is not a 'making of' movie, partly because of Preston's experience dealing with similar issues while contributing extensively to Merata Mita's Patu! (1983), a politicized documentary about the 1981 Springbok rugby tour. Like later Preston documentaries, Making Utu is more evocative than denotative. During the 1980s, while working on projects expressive of her political convictions, Preston also worked in advertising and in music videos.

The success of All the Way Up There meant that Preston attended the Cannes market, one result of which was that she and Robin Laing formed a professional partnership as director and producer that has lasted nearly twenty years. In 1995 they produced War Stories Our Mothers Never Told Us, a feature-length opportunity for seven women (including Preston's own mother) to talk about their experiences during World War II—the embodiment of Preston's desire to get her subjects 'to relive the moment of past experience'. A mix of simple presentation and engrossing storytelling, War Stories has achieved international recognition and has played to record domestic audiences for a feature-length documentary.

Preston calls Kai Purakau (1987) and No Other Lips (1997) her 'bookends', because they are television documentaries about New Zealand writers: Booker Prize winner Keri Hulme and poet Hone Tuwhare. The former was made for Thames Television to be broadcast in Britain, the latter for Greenstone Pictures and New Zealand television. Preston comes from the same part of the country as Hulme, which has figured in responses to criticism that a Maori should have made the film about Hulme, who identifies as Maori. Despite similar criticism a decade later, Hone Tuwhare himself invited her to direct the film about him, and the warm feeling between subject and documentarist, as well as Preston's characteristic appreciation of humor, pervades the film.

Working increasingly as a producer, Preston also codirected Getting to Our Place (1999), a 'fly-on-the-wall documentary' about meetings—specifically, the meetings involved in constructing Te Papa, the country's new national museum that has become internationally influential. Simultaneously, Preston produced Punitive Damage (1999), a documentary focusing on a New Zealand mother's grief over the loss of her son in civil unrest involving the East Timorese and Indonesians.

Finally, in Titless Wonders (2001), Preston presents stories of breast cancer survivors and of friends who have succumbed to the disease. It is her most specifically local film, despite the universality of its topic. Her ability once again to bring a joyous humor to a painful subject—her ability to celebrate life—is the hallmark of a Preston film.

HARRIET MARGOLIS

Biography

Born in 1947 in Greymouth, on the West Coast of the South Island, Aotearoa (New Zealand). Attended boarding school in Nelson and art school in Christchurch. Received Dip Art Therapy, St Albans School of Fine Arts, England, 1974. While using art therapy to help psychiatric patients, made first short films. Returned to Aotearoa (New Zealand) 1976, and worked for six months at John O'Shea's Pacific Films. Served on New Zealand Film Commission 1979–85. With Robin Laing, formed Preston Laing Productions, 1984. One child, a daughter, born in 1987. Board member of New Zealand On Air and of Creative Film Fund. Turned down Centenary of Suffrage medal (1993) because of political disagreements with the then prime minister. Named a Laureate of New Zealand 2001. Received a Media Peace Award 2001, for Titless Wonders. Honored as an officer of the New Zealand Order of Merit for services to the New Zealand film industry 2001.

Further reading

- Ahuriri, Monika, 'Stubborn Bloody Mindedness', Newsreel (The New Zealand Film Archive) 48, November 2001: 3.
- Beattie, Keith, 'First Say and Last Cut', Media Studies Journal (Massey University), 1996: 4–16.
- Benjamin, Julie and Maclean, Alison, 'Revolving Clotheslines and Morris Minors: A Discussion of New Zealand Film Making with Gaylene Preston', Alternative Cinema 11, no. 4, summer 1983–4: 21–4.
- Dennis, Jonathan, 'Reflecting on Reality: An Interview with Gaylene Preston', in Jonathan Dennis and Jan Bieringa (eds), Film in Aotearoa New Zealand, Wellington: Victoria University Press, 1992: 161–72.
- Hardy, Ann, 'Gaylene Preston', in Annette Kuhn and Susannah Radstone (eds), The Women's Companion to International Film, London: Virago, 1990: 325–6.
- Horrocks, Roger, 'Gaylene Preston', New Zealand Film Makers at the Auckland City Art Gallery, part 5, November 1984.
- Johnson, Stephanie, 'Through Women's Eyes', Quote Unquote, June 1995: 14–17.
- n.a., 'The Benefits Outweigh the Compromise', The Business of Film (New Zealand Special Issue), May 2001: 85.
- Shepard, Deborah, 'Gaylene Preston', in Christina Barton and Deborah Lawler-Dormer (eds), alter/image: Feminism and Representation in Recent New Zealand Art, Wellington: City Gallery, 1993: 99, 115–16.
- Reframing Women: A History of New Zealand Film, Auckland: HarperCollins, 2000.

Primary

(US, Drew, 1960)

Primary is a landmark in the development of direct cinema as an aesthetic and journalistic movement, both because it exemplifies the work done by the seminal television documentary team of Drew Associates and because it provides access to aspects of the political campaign process inaccessible before and since. As a hybrid of traditional and direct cinema styles, Primary bears traces of a struggle between pre-television documentary's reliance on voice-over narration and classic Hollywood conventions and an emerging style of mobile reportage further developed by Drew Associates alumni Richard Leacock, Donn Alan Pennebaker, and Albert and David Maysles. Primary's own reliance on editing and sound-image matching to mold reality into dramatic form belies its claim of objectivity, but its success in stripping away accumulated conventions through direct cinema techniques was rightfully hailed as a leap forward in documentary filmmaking's quest to capture 'truth'.

Primary's style of detached observation is strikingly different from Jean Rouch's Chronicle of a Summer (1961), a cinéma vérité documentary released one year later that continually reminds both the on-camera participants and the audience watching it that a film is being made. Like Chronicle, however, Primary pursues a subject ripe with social, cultural, and political insights waiting to divulge itself: the 1960 Wisconsin presidential primary between senators John F. Kennedy and Hubert Humphrey. As narrator Joseph Julian intones in a low-key voice-over heavy-handed by today's standards, 'Now, traveling along with them, hot on the heels of two fast-moving presidential hopefuls, you are about to see a candidate's view of this frantic process, and an intimate view of the candidates themselves.'

The film's delivery on this promise proved groundbreaking in its capture of intimate details of candidate behavior. Humphrey, for example, flips to The Red Skelton Show as he seeks diversion from disappointing voter returns, and an atypically nervous Kennedy paces the floor of his hotel suite while anxiously dragging on a cigarette. Primary also delights in exposing through this backstage form of reportage the subjective limitations of newspapers, photography, and radio in their interpretations of the candidates as people and politicians.

During a sitting for a campaign poster, for example, Kennedy sits in a small portrait studio encircled by spotlights opposite a photographer and his camera. Catching himself after offering up a glad-handing grin for the camera, Kennedy acknowledges to the photographer (who has just tinkered with his equipment and adjusted the candidate's shirt sleeve cuffs), 'It's not time to smile yet, Wally'. A cut that juxtaposes the perfectly coiffed and stiff-backed Kennedy posing for the portrait with a campaign poster of a smiling Humphrey on the back of a bus overlays the image of Kennedy's rival with the photographer's request to 'swing your body a little bit more to the camera'. Recalling Robert Drew's observation that the studio portrait session was a 'ritual in many small towns', the juxtaposition of the photographer's instructions with the paper image of a smiling Humphrey implies that the campaign posters that pervade Primary are a painstakingly staged construction of personhood that cannot compete with the raw veracity of direct cinema's handheld shots, synchronous sound, and (often) poorly lit passages of footage.

In a reversal of the cut from the photo session to Humphrey's campaign poster, Primary juxtaposes Humphrey's behind-the-scenes preparation for a television call-in show with a video image of Kennedy on a television screen. Staking out a position in the television studio behind a TV camera, Humphrey supplies the show's host with the first question to be asked of him, instructs the camera operator where to focus, and informs his wife Muriel that she has thirty seconds of air time to summarize for viewers how she has spent the day. The cut from Humphrey to Kennedy reminds the audience that the latter's erudite television image is also the product of technical preparation and planning.

The filmmakers arrange these scenes in symmetrical bookend fashion in order to suggest that they have taken great pains to remain value-neutral in their presentation of the candidates. Furthermore, both scenes remind us that the Drew team avoids both directing the subjects (as the photographer directs Kennedy in the studio) and being directed by them (as Humphrey directs the camera operator in the television studio).

Conversely, Primary fails to acknowledge the visual and aural sleights of hand that characterize its own reportage. In one of the most celebrated sequences of the film, Albert Maysles's camera follows Kennedy's arrival at a rally in Milwaukee, snaking down a long corridor, up a stairway, through a doorway, and out onto a stage where a cheering crowd greets both camera and candidate. The claustrophobia of the narrow path, the anticipation of the crowd, and the burst of blinding light and applause that accompanies Kennedy's arrival on stage deliver a riveting example of narrator Julian's opening promise. Subsequent shots of the rally, however, subjectively frame the panoply of events by carefully isolating details, overlapping sound and image, and using matches-on-action to establish cause-and-effect relationships between discrete bits of footage.

As the ever-poised Jacqueline Kennedy addresses the crowd, for example, a close-up reveals her white-gloved hands fidgeting nervously behind her back. Students of direct cinema objected to the use of a cut (rather than a zoom) to the close-up, arguing that the filmmakers juxtapose the steady and confident sound of Mrs Kennedy's voice with the image of her hands in a way that achieves verisimilitude without being real. Other instances of this imposition of form on raw footage appear throughout the film, revealing the subjectivity inherent in direct cinema's claim of ostensible objectivity.

The rising cost of television network air time during the 1970s led Drew to lament the replacement of single-subject documentaries such as Primary by multi-subject television news magazines such as 60 Minutes, which he derided as 'entrapment journalism' because of their reliance on hidden cameras and ambush interview techniques (Drew 1988: 401). Even though Primary also fell short in its effort to capture filmic truth, its pursuit of this goal proved an invaluable contribution to documentary filmmaking.

CHRIS JORDAN

See also: Leacock, Richard; Maysles, Albert; Pennebaker, D.A.

Primary (US, 1960, 53 mins). Distributed by Direct Cinema. Produced by Robert Drew. Photographed by Richard Leacock, Donn Alan Pennebaker, Terence Macartney-Filgate, and Albert Maysles. Written by Robert Drew. Edited by Robert Drew, Richard Leacock, Donn Alan Pennebaker, and Terence Macartney-Filgate.

Further reading

- Bluem, A. William, Documentary in American Television, New York: Hastings House Publishers, 1965.
- Bruzzi, Stella, New Documentary: A Critical Introduction, New York: Routledge, 2000.
- Drew, Robert, 'An Independent with the Networks', in Alan Rosenthal (ed.), New Challenges for Documentary, Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1988.

Hall, Jeanne, 'Realism as a Style in Cinema Verite: A Critical Analysis of Primary', Cinema Journal 39, no. 4, summer 1991: 38–45.

Hammond, Charles Montgomery, The Image Decade: Television Documentary 1965–75, New York: Hastings University Press, 1992.

Nicols, Bill, Representing Reality: Issues and Concepts in Documentary, Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press, 1991.

O'Connell, P.J., Robert Drew and the Development of Cinema Verité in America, Carbondale, IL: Southern Illinois House, 1981.

Pull My Daisy

(US, Frank and Leslie, 1959)

Part documentary, part Dada-esque farce, Robert Frank and Alfred Leslie's short film Pull My Daisy stands, along with films such as John Cassavetes's Shadows (1959), as one of the most important cinematic statements of the postwar Beat Movement. Based loosely on the third act of Jack Kerouac's unproduced stage play The Beat Generation, the film provides a brief glimpse into the lives of bohemian artists and writers of 1950s New York City.

The play was adapted for the screen by Frank and Leslie, who changed the title to Pull My Daisy after learning that MGM was planning to produce a Beat exploitation film titled The Beat Generation. The new title came from a whimsical 1949 poem by Kerouac and Allen Ginsberg—a poem that, when set to music by David Amram, provided the film's theme song and set the tone for the film's eccentric action.

Both Robert Frank (1924–) and his codirector, contemporary realist painter Alfred Leslie (1927–), were members of The Group, a small collective of American independent filmmakers formed in 1960 with loose ties to Free Cinema in England and to the nouvelle vague in France. Frank had been best known as a still photographer prior to the release of Pull My Daisy in 1959. His still photographs, such as those published in The Americans (1959), a collection of more than eighty photos bluntly chronicling life in postwar America, pioneered the 'snapshot aesthetic' in which the documentary image is rendered starkly with a minimum of conscious artistry. It was a visual aesthetic well matched to the Beat Movement's embrace of literary spontaneity to capture experience, once described briefly by poet Allen Ginsberg as 'First thought, best thought'. Not surprisingly, Frank's first motion picture shares the same stark imagery and spontaneous feel of both his earlier photographs and much of the poetry and prose produced by writers of the Beat Movement.

Filmed silently in black and white, with an overdubbed narration, Pull My Daisy documents a single day in the lives of a small circle of bohemian poets and artists in a dingy loft apartment on New York's Lower East Side. The cast is made up of some of the Beat Movement's most important artists. Poets Allen Ginsberg, Peter Orlovsky, and Gregory Corso appear as themselves. Composer/musician David Amram plays the role of jazz musician Mezz McGillicuddy, and painter Larry Rivers appears as Milo, the working-class poet at the center of the film's storyline (a character whose life bears a strong resemblance to Kerouac's friend Neal Cassady). Although Kerouac does not make an appearance in the film, he acts as the narrator and supplies all of the voices for the film's characters (the only exception is the voice of a small boy, probably provided by Robert Frank's son Pablo).

Much of the film is concerned with the tension between the routine life of work, family, and home and the less constrained and more spontaneous life offered by the Beat Movement. The film begins with a peaceful domestic scene typical of the period: a young woman (identified in the credits only as 'Milo's wife') readies her son for school while she awaits the return of her husband Milo from his job as a railroad brakeman. The morning's calm is broken, however, as poets Ginsberg and Corso arrive, quickly making themselves at home with wine, marijuana, and an animated discussion of poetics. When Milo arrives home from work a few hours later, accompanied by Peter Orlovsky, he tells the assembled poets that a bishop will be paying the household a visit that evening and warns them to be on their best behavior. As the bishop arrives for what Milo's wife hopes will be a pleasant visit, accompanied by his sister and his very proper mother, the scene quickly turns into an uncomfortable evening of increasingly bizarre and intoxicated antics, as the poets ask the cleric strange yet pointed questions about the spiritual realm. Despite Milo's wife's best efforts to control the tone of the event, the evening further disintegrates with the arrival of jazz musician Mezz McGillicuddy, who turns the apartment into the scene of a jam session, as the bishop and his family look on in quiet shock. The film ends with Milo's wife in tears, as the bishop and his party leave abruptly, and Milo is jubilantly led out of the apartment by his bohemian friends for an adventurous night on the town.

Pull My Daisy documents a moment of interaction between two worlds: the mundane, proper, and feminized life of the mainstream (exemplified by Milo's wife, the bishop, and his mother and sister), and the wild, joyous, and very masculine life of 'kicks' to be found among the bohemian artists of the Bowery (exemplified by Milo, Ginsberg, Orlovsky, and McGillicuddy). Contemporary viewers will no doubt be troubled by the irresponsible and, at times, seemingly sexist actions presented by the film's subjects and may find themselves in agreement with Beat scholar Joyce Johnson, who has suggested that the film is 'about the right to remain children'. Nonetheless, the work provides a striking visual representation of the Beat Movement and its struggle with the stifling conformity of the 1950s.

ROD PHILLIPS

Pull My Daisy (US, G-String Productions, 1959, 20 mins). Produced and directed by Robert Frank and Alfred Leslie. Cinematography by Robert Frank and Alfred Leslie. Written and narrated by Jack Kerouac. Featuring David Amram, Beltiane (Delphine Serig), Gregory Corso, Pablo Frank, Allen Ginsberg, Sally Gross, Alice Neal, Denise Parker, Mooney Peebles (Richard Bellamy), Peter Orlovsky, and Larry Rivers. Edited by Leon Prochnik, Robert Frank, and Alfred Leslie. Music by David Amram. Filmed in New York City.

Further reading

- Allen, Blaine, 'The Making (and Unmaking) of Pull My Daisy', Film History 2, 1988: 185–205.
- Frank, Robert, The Americans, Millerton: Aperture, 1959.
- Sargeant, Jack, Naked Lens: Beat Cinema (Creation Cinema Collection #7), London: Creation Books, 2002.
- Sterritt, David, Mad to Be Saved: The Beats, the '50s, and Film, Carbondale, IL: Southern Illinois University Press, 1998.
- Tyler, Parker, 'For Shadows, Against Pull My Daisy', Film Culture 24, 1962: 28–33.

Pumping Iron

(US, Fiore and Butler, 1976)

Pumping Iron generated intense public interest in bodybuilding, an activity that theretofore lacked credibility as a legitimate sport or art form. It also started Arnold Schwarzenegger on his rise to superstardom, catapulting him into public consciousness in a way that his previous films, The Long Goodbye (1973) and Stay Hungry (1976), had failed to do. At almost every level, the film was a collaborative effort. Based on the book of the same name, written by Charles Gaines and George Butler, Pumping Iron as a film project was carried on conception to completion by the efforts of Butler. Butler coproduced the film with Jerome Gary and codirected with Robert Fiore. Larry Silk and Geof Bartz handled editing. Michael Small oversaw music throughout and wrote the title song for the film.

From the opening credits, featuring quaint clips of old-time muscle men and backed by Small's engaging, humorous score, the film never takes itself too seriously. When the viewer is then faced with a compelling human drama, it comes as unexpected delight. Filmed across the United States and culminating in South Africa, Pumping Iron follows the workouts and preliminary competitions through which the world's top bodybuilders must pass to become 'Mister Olympia', the ultimate glory for the bodybuilding community. Success, each contestant understands, involves more than approximating bodily perfection. To become Mister Olympia ultimately requires besting the dominating international presence in the sport—Schwarzenegger.

Unlike its sequel, Pumping Iron II: The Women (1985), this low-budget, intimate film foregoes contrived dramatic elements and lets contestants speak for themselves through word and deed. With minimal narration and only occasional interviews to 'flesh out' main characters, Butler and Fiore gently offer the viewer the chance to love or hate each of the Mister Olympia hopefuls, though there is little doubt that only 'Arnold! Arnold!' (as his mesmerized fans chant) will win the title. In a film replete with people literally larger than life, Schwarzenegger stands head and shoulders above his peers physically and mentally, while demonstrating a depth of personality and psyche that few in Hollywood can match on camera. A smash box office success, and available on the shelves of film rental stores ever since because of Schwarzenegger's popularity, Pumping Iron remains one of the most financially successful American documentaries.

MICHAEL S. CASEY

Pumping Iron (US, White Mountain Films, 1976, 85 mins, color). Distributed by Cinema 5 Distributing. Produced by George Butler and Jerome Gary. Directed by George Butler and Robert Fiore. Cinematography by Robert Fiore. Music by Michael Small. Edited by Larry Silk and Geof Bartz. Sound by Harry Lapham.

Lighting by Michael Lesser. Titles by Martin S. Moskof. Narrated by Charles Gaines. Peter Davis and Charles Gaines served as consultants. Filmed in New York, Los Angeles, San Francisco, Holyoke, Massachusetts, and South Africa.

Further reading

Butler, George, Arnold Schwarzenegger: A Portrait, New York: Simon & Schuster, 1990.
 Gaines, Charles, Pumping Iron: The Art and Sport of Bodybuilding, New York: Simon & Schuster, 1982.
 Nowell-Smith, Geoffrey, The Oxford History of World Cinema, London: Oxford University Press, 1996.
 Schwarzenegger, Arnold and Hall, Douglas Kent (contributor), Arnold: The Education of a Bodybuilder, reprint, New York: Fireside, 1983.

R

Rain

(Holland, Ivens, 1929)

With the premier of Rain at the Filmliga (Film League) in Amsterdam in 1929, Joris Ivens established his reputation as a serious director. His previous film, The Bridge (1928), had been well received, particularly among followers of the avant-garde, but Rain was hailed as a ciné-poem by French critics (Ivens 1969), an ideal synthesis of thematic and formal elements communicated through moving images.

As Bill Nichols suggests, Rain could be seen as operating within the modernist ‘poetic mode’ of documentary: a style that goes against the standards of continuity editing to explore associations and patterns that arise out of ‘temporal rhythms and spatial juxtapositions’ (Nichols 2001). Indeed at this point in his career, Ivens was closely aligned with the ideological and aesthetic aims of Amsterdam’s Film League, a group founded in 1927 to promote the screening of avant-garde films and that associated mainstream cinema with the masses, with ‘the commercial regime, America, kitsch’ (Stufkens 1999). Ivens served as the Film League’s technical advisor and agreed that films should offer an alternative to the monolithic cinema industry that produced low entertainment and seduced the public ‘by adapting to the public’s bad taste’ (Stufkens 1999). Rain does go against many of the common practices of silent continuity editing, but does not go so far as to dispense with narrative entirely. Instead, a narrative unfolds that dramatizes the rhythms of a natural event, a single rain shower, which in turn gestures toward larger existential and aesthetic concerns. In Rain, the built urban environment is utterly transformed not only by the natural event but also, perhaps more important, by the steady gaze of the camera, which can capture those fleeting visual patterns produced by everyday movements that might be missed by the naked eye.

In his autobiography, Ivens recalls that he and an assistant, Chang Fai, shot Rain over several months in 1928, using two 35mm amateur hand cameras. In all, however, the twelve-minute film took almost two years to complete. The story, based on a scenario by Mannus Franken, is straightforward: a bright day in the city gives way to a darkening sky, wind, the first drops of a rain shower, and then a deluge that increases in force until it finally ebbs away, the weakened daylight returning to a drenched landscape. Within this slight narrative frame, other more abstract impressions are communicated through the camera’s meditation on movements, patterns, and forms. Changing light effects are highlighted through the interplay of sun and shadow in the early scenes; reflections produced in pools, puddles, and rain-slicked streets are emphasized in later scenes. The film rarely focuses on human actions, which are subordinate to those of the primary player, the rain. With the exception of an obviously staged shot of a man holding out his hand to feel for raindrops, then turning up his collar and rushing for cover, people are primarily shot from behind or overhead. Human figures, although integral to the mise-en-scène, remain wholly anonymous. Still, these shots are not deployed to produce sterile, carefully composed scenes surveyed from a safe distance; instead they work with other moments in the film that align the spectator’s eye more closely with the camera’s lens. Rain conspires to make viewers’ experience the rain-storm firsthand. Ivens wanted audiences to feel ‘damp’ after watching his ‘super-wet’ images (Ivens 1969).

Many critics have noted the influence of Walter Ruttmann’s Berlin: The Symphony of a Great City, which Ivens saw when he met the director in 1927, though years later Ivens would distance himself from that film, suggesting that ‘a city film with human interest and content could be done without Ruttmann’s virtuosity and superficial effects’ (Ivens 1969). Rain’s emphasis on the formal composition of shots and on the juxtaposition of different movements, shot scales, and camera angles also suggests an affinity with the contemporary montage experiments of Sergei Eisenstein and Dziga Vertov, whom Ivens met while working with the Film League. What sets Ivens’s film apart, however, is its sustained focus on a single event, its formal unity and coherence, and its ability to capture kinetic images that are imbued with the singularity and compositional intensity of still photographs. Patterns produced by juxtaposing movement and stasis are revealed in images such as a boat traveling under a bridge, while the steady shadow of the bridge’s iron railing cuts across the movement of the boat beneath it. The recurring motif of raindrops falling into water further suggests a dialectic of motion and stillness: a seemingly stable aesthetic form both produces, and is produced out of, the force of multiple, fragmented movements and events.

One of the film’s most striking sequences begins with a street scene framed by the arch of an umbrella, which cuts to a traveling shot of a man under an umbrella. Further images of groups of people holding umbrellas cut to raindrops falling into a puddle, and then several arresting overhead shots of a street scene appear in succession, in which groups of umbrellas form a recognizable, yet somewhat surreal, shuddering mass. The sequence is tied up when the final shot fades to black, a technique used only sparingly in the film. Although the images might appear simply to indulge in aesthetically pleasing forms, they also indirectly articulate the relationship between the modern city dweller and the anonymous masses, suggesting the constant interplay between the individual and the social organism, the whole and its innumerable parts.

Rain preceded Ivens’s more openly political phase, generally considered to have begun after 1929. He would later see his early films as failed attempts to fight bourgeois ideology through formalist revolutionary strategies, labeling his late-1920s work as fundamentally apolitical and ‘parochial’ (Stufkens 1999). However, Rain was clearly a foundational film for Ivens and a defining moment in the modernist avant-garde. The subtleties of Rain’s camera work—capturing images both banal and arresting, like the street filmed through the streaming windows of a moving tram—are typical of an attention to documentary aesthetics that would persist throughout Ivens’s long career.

JEFFREY GEIGER

See also: Ivens, Joris

Rain (the Netherlands, 1929, 12 mins, silent). Produced, directed, and written by Joris Ivens and Mannus Franken. Photographed and edited by Joris Ivens. Music composed by Lou Lichtveld (1932) and Hanns Eisler (1941). Production company, CAPI Amsterdam. Filmed in Amsterdam.

Further reading

- Heller, Berndt, ‘The Reconstruction of Eisler’s Film Music: Opus III, Regen, and The Circus’, Historical Journal of Film, Radio, and Television 18, October 1998: 541–60.
- Ivens, Joris, The Camera and I, Berlin: Seven Seas Publishers, 1969.
- Leyda, Jay and Meyers, Sidney, ‘Joris Ivens: Artist in Documentary’, in Lewis Jacobs (ed.), The Documentary Tradition, New York: Norton, 1979.
- Nichols, Bill, Introduction to Documentary, Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press, 2001.
- Stufkens, André, ‘The Song of Movement: Joris Ivens’s First Films and the Cycle of the Avant-garde’, in Kees Bakker (ed.), Joris Ivens and the Documentary Context, Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press, 1999.

Reichert, Julia

Julia Reichert was a prominent producer and director in the social issue documentary movement the 1970s and early 1980s. Of particular note are four documentaries she codirected with James Klein. Growing Up Female (1971), the first documentary study of the American societal forces that mold female identities, influenced subsequent feminist documentaries through its combination of interviews, advertisements, and popular music. Methadone: An American Way of Dealing (1975) critiques the use of methadone as a method of combating drug addiction. Her next two documentaries were Oscar-nominated: Union Maids (1976) blends feminist and labor history through oral interviews of three women who played roles in the unionization drives in the United States during the 1930s; Seeing Red: Stories of American Communists (1983) records the personal oral histories of American Communist Party members from the 1930s to the 1950s.

After 1983 Reichert began working on dramatic films, although the subject of one of those films, Emma and Elvis (1992), is a middle-aged, countercultural documentary filmmaker. She has recently returned to documentary filmmaking. She worked as a creative consultant on Welcome to Warren (2003), which examines the relationship of inmates and guards at the Warren Correctional Institution in Warren, Ohio, and she was a collaborator on A People's History: Dayton's People's History, Twenty Years Later (2003). In 1997 Reichert began work on A Lion in the House, which marks her return to directing. The film, scheduled to air on PBS in 2005, uses the subject of adolescent cancer patients as a context to discuss larger social issues such as health care, race, and poverty.

Like many social issue documentarians, Reichert is motivated by a particular political activism. Her primary interests are gender and working-class life, and she approaches them from a socialist perspective, but her activism is not limited to the choice and treatment of these subjects. Though her early films are not technically innovative, she pioneered novel approaches to production, marketing, and distribution. In the early 1970s Reichert was a founding member of New Day Films, which was originally created to promote the Women's Movement. New Day was the first American cooperative distribution company operated entirely by and for filmmakers (the company is still active today, and distributes the work of over fifty filmmakers: see www.newday.com).

Many of her films are made for particular working-class audiences, and are distributed to them directly through a variety of political institutions and organizations such as unions, schools, YMCAs, and health care providers. Because of this control, Reichert can focus on her explicit goal of promoting discussion and social change. To that end her films are often accompanied by discussions or meetings and include complementary handouts and discussion questions. Methadone incorporates a midway break for discussion, and some of her work is so audience-specific that it is produced for particular working-class neighborhoods and never distributed beyond them. She has written a book on film distribution, Doing It Yourself, devoted to the dissemination of this model.

Reichert also attempts to incorporate her socialist, nonhierarchical politics into the production and structure of her documentaries. Her collaborative models, such as codirecting many of her films with James Klein, undermine common hierarchical structures in film production. In Union Maids, for example, she and Klein chose to work with video, despite the compromised quality, because video allowed more extended, collaborative interviews, and because it allowed them to work with less experienced students. Video not only allowed more shooting, but also allowed them to direct inexperienced cinematographers by intercom while watching on a monitor. Union Maids also exemplifies Reichert's aversion to heroic figures. Reichert has argued in interviews that focusing on individuals and aggrandizing their actions leads the audience to believe that such people are unusually gifted and unique, and that they drive history. She wishes, rather, to forward a model of collective agency. Consequently, Union Maids mixes the testimonies of three women of different ethnicities to demonstrate the wide range of people who collaborated in the cause of unionizing American industry.

Reichert's focus on agency led to an early shift in her filmmaking. Her first major film, Growing Up Female, depicts the problem of gender roles in the United States, but does not develop possible responses to the problem. Her next film, Methadone, begins in a similar vein with a critique of the societal response to drug addiction, but the second half of the film explores possible solutions to the problem. In her subsequent documentaries, Reichert incorporates positive role models and opportunities for agency.

Critical reception of Reichert's documentary films has focused on her use of direct cinema techniques. Because Reichert's documentaries generally eschew voice-over narration and use oral interviews extensively, they are less able to develop the broader context of the topics they explore. Further, despite Reichert's aversion to portrayals of individual heroism, critics have claimed that her films aggrandize the few people interviewed. Union Maids and Seeing Red, for example, are criticized for oversimplifying social relations by giving an incomplete, uncontested story primarily through oral interviews of small numbers of like-minded people. Such an approach can be read as a legitimate form of counterhistory, and recent critics have argued for the recuperation of such direct cinema techniques for the creation of counterhistories that dispute conventional representations of authority and give more heteroglossic alternatives (see entry on Union Maids). Other critics, however, have argued that Reichert tends to present oral histories as independent arguments and not as primary source material in need of a broader explanatory frame. The lack of such a frame, it is claimed, can make her films appear naive—an endorsement of a partial, self-protective history rather than a meta-critical response to previous histories (Nichols 1991: 252).

DEREK LOH AND PAUL MILLER

See also: Klein, James; Union Maids

Biography

Graduated from Antioch College in 1970 with a degree in documentary arts. Cofounded New Day Films 1971. Cofounded the Film Fund, a foundation to promote social issue films, 1977. Published Doing It Yourself: A Handbook of Independent Film Distribution, 1977. Union Maids nominated for Academy Award for Best Documentary Feature 1978. Named Artist of the Year by the Ohio Arts Council (with James Klein) 1983. Seeing Red nominated for Academy Award for Best Documentary Feature 1984. Named by the American Film Institute as one of nineteen artists who influenced the decade in film 1985. Appointed to the Ohio Humanities Council by Governor Celeste 1986. Vice-President of Ohio Valley Regional Media Arts Coalition and Professor in the Department of Theater Arts and the School of Medicine at Wright State University.

Selected films

- 1970 Growing Up Female: codirector
- 1975 Methadone: An American Way of Dealing: codirector
- 1975 Men's Lives: coproducer

- 1976 Union Maids: codirector, editor
- 1983 Seeing Red: Stories of American Communists: codirector
- 1992 Emma and Elvis: director, cowriter, coproducer
- 2003 Welcome to Warren: creative consultant
- 2003 A People's History: Dayton's People's History, Twenty Years Later: cowriter, coproducer

Further reading

- Kleinhaus, Chuck, 'Julia Reichert and Jim Klein', Jump Cut 5, 1975: 11–12.
- Nichols, Bill, Representing Reality, Bloomington, IN: Indian University Press, 1991.
- Reichert, Julia, Doing It Yourself: A Handbook on Independent Film Distribution, New York: Association of Independent Film and Video Makers, 1977.
- 'Feminist Film Comes of Age', in Patricia A. Johnson and Janet Kalven (eds), With Both Eyes Open: Seeing Beyond Gender, New York: Pilgrim Press, 1988.
- Rosenthal, Alan, 'Union Maids', in Alan Rosenthal (ed.), Documentary Conscience, Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1980.
- (ed.), New Challenges for Documentary, Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1988.
- Rubenstein, Lenny, 'Who's Who in Filmmaking: Julia Reichert and James Klein', Sightlines 20, no. 2, 1986–7: 22–5.
- Waldman, Diane and Walker, Janet (eds), Feminism and Documentary, Minneapolis, MN: University of Minnesota Press, 1999.

Reisz, Karel

The film director and producer Karel Reisz was a prominent member of the Free Cinema movement (1956–9), an informal group of young artists that also included Lindsay Anderson, Tony Richardson, and the cameraman Walter Lassally. Free Cinema was concerned with the relationship between art and society, and the need for the film auteur to be free from the commercial constraints of mainstream cinema, so that committed artists might make films that offered significant commentary on contemporary society.

Reisz chose initially to work in documentary film, but was outspoken about his antipathy to what he considered the legacy of the 1930s British Documentary Film Movement, and a tendency to make documentaries about, 'the Lake District, Stirling Moss, old trams and the beauties of spring' (Lovell 1977: 138). He did acknowledge, however, the strong influence of Humphrey Jennings's poetic realism on the Free Cinema practitioners and referred to Jennings's film Fires Were Started (1943) as 'the source film for Free Cinema' (Orbanz 1977: 57).

The Free Cinema movement was essentially six programmes of films presented at the National Film Theatre between 1956 and 1959, and a series of critical articles in journals such as Sequence, which Reisz cofounded in 1947 with Lindsay Anderson, and Sight and Sound, in which they set out the broad themes of the group. Reisz's short documentary film, Momma Don't Allow (1955), codirected with Tony Richardson and funded by the British Film Institute (BFI) Experimental Film Fund, was screened at the first Free Cinema programme in September 1956.

We Are the Lambeth Boys (1959) directed by Reisz, was part of the Last Free Cinema programme in 1959. Both films embody the low-budget production style and the attitude of Free Cinema in capturing the mood of the late 1950s by focusing on the working class and an emerging youth culture in a sympathetic manner.

Reisz, along with Anderson and Richardson, went on to achieve critical acclaim in mainstream cinema and all three became prominent figures in the British New Wave of socially concerned realist films, popular between 1959 and 1963. Focusing on working class experience, their work included Saturday Night and Sunday Morning (Karel Reisz, 1960), A Taste of Honey (Tony Richardson, 1962), and This Sporting Life (Lyndsey Anderson, 1963). Given their Oxbridge background, however, their representations of working-class life have been called into question (Armes 1978: 2–5).

PAT A. COOK

See also: Anderson, Lindsay; Fires Were Started; Jennings, Humphrey; Momma Don't Allow; We Are the Lambeth Boys

Biography

Born in Ostrava, Czechoslovakia in 1926. Emigrated to Britain as a young man and joined the Royal Air Force towards the end of World War II. After the war, studied Natural Sciences at Emmanuel College, Cambridge. Worked for three years as the Programmes Officer at the National Film Theatre. In 1956 became head of the Ford Motor Company's TV and Film Programme. Coauthored, with Gavin Miller, Techniques of Film Editing (1953). Died in London in 2002.

Selected films

- 1955 Momma Don't Allow (UK): director
- 1958 We Are the Lambeth Boys (UK): director
- 1960 Saturday Night and Sunday Morning (UK): director
- 1964 Night Must Fall (UK): director
- 1966 Morgan: A Suitable Case for Treatment (UK): director
- 1968 Isadora (UK): director
- 1974 The Gambler (US): director
- 1978 Who'll Stop the Rain (UK): director
- 1981 The French Lieutenant's Woman (UK): director
- 1985 Sweet Dreams (US): director
- 1990 Everybody Wins (US): director
- 2000 Act Without Words 1 (UK, BBC Television): director

Further reading

- Armes, Roy, A Critical History of British Cinema, London, 1978: 2–5.
- Barsam, Richard, Non Fiction Film: A Critical History, Indianapolis, IN: Indiana University Press, 1992: 249–54.
- Lovell, Alan and Hillier, Jim, Studies in Documentary, London: Secker and Warburg, 1977: 133–72.
- Murphy, Robert, Sixties British Cinema, London: British Film Institute, 1972: 18–21, 73–4, 271–2.
- n.a., Films and Filming 25, no. 4, January 1979: 12–17.
- n.a., Stills 1, no. 4, winter 1982: 7–15.
- Orbanz, Eva, Journey to a Legend and Back: The British Realistic Film, Berlin: Volker Speiss, 1977: 53–63.

Resnais, Alain

'If the short film had not existed, Resnais would surely have invented it', Jean-Luc Godard wrote in praise of Resnais's documentaries in 1959, the miraculous year when the French New Wave was born and Resnais had just made his first feature, Hiroshima mon amour/Hiroshima, My Love. Godard added that without Resnais's work, 'the new young French cinema would not exist'.

Between 1946 and 1948 Resnais made a number of 16mm films including a series of 'Visits' to contemporary artists. These films were not released, but prints are in the archives of the Centre Pompidou in Paris. From 1947 to 1958 Resnais worked as editor on six films made by others. His own career as a professional documentary filmmaker, which lasted for ten years, also began in 1948 with his 35mm Van Gogh.

Resnais's eight short documentaries, generally commissioned works, focus not on people but on things and places. Three are art films; three, including Nuit et brouillard/Night and Fog, are works that focus on places charged with memories; and the last two are explorations of issues surrounding contemporary industrialization. They constitute an important body of work in the history of short film and also served as a testing ground for techniques and themes that have contributed to making Resnais's feature films among the most important works of twentieth-century cinema.

In the documentaries, Resnais shows his lack of interest in the so-called realist cinema and his commitment to raising formal questions and confronting difficult, enigmatic contemporary philosophical and social issues. 'I want to make films that are experiments. All experiments are interesting,' he told an interviewer in 1961 (cited by Armes 1968).

Resnais's training and work as a film editor have had a marked impact on all his films. Except for Nuit et brouillard and Le Mystère de l'Atelier Quinze/The Mystery of Workshop Fifteen, Resnais was both director and editor of all his documentary films. For him the crucial stage in the making of a film is the editing, not only the montage of the images but also sound editing and mixing. The musical score establishes rhythms, punctuates patterns of montage, and plays a central role in the films.

Ghislain Cloquet, who was cinematographer for Les Statues meurent aussi/Statues Also Die, Nuit et brouillard, and Toute la mémoire du monde/All the Memory of the World, comments on the impact of this focus on sound and rhythm on the cameraman. Cloquet sees a development from what he calls 'normal' camera movements or pans in the first documentaries to dolly shots in Night and Fog, and shots that allow a fuller exploration of three dimensions in Toute la mémoire du monde. He writes that Resnais opened his eyes through his patient and careful observation of objects (Pingaud and Samson 1990). The resulting long tracking shots are characteristic of Resnais's style. The camera moves into the subject, whether it is a painting by Picasso, the camp at Auschwitz, or the French National Library, to find traces of the past, to learn, to explore.

Memory and closed worlds are recurrent themes. It has been suggested that by editing his tracking shots, Resnais has created a form that allows one to see and to feel the strange and disturbing resemblance between many seemingly disparate sites of modern life. 'Resnais's short films show the vast imprisonment which controls our lives and our fear of death in a world from which we are separated', Neyrat has noted. He goes on to underscore, however, that 'against this imprisonment the films also bring a power of liberation—the aesthetic power of the cinema, its power of redeeming the contingent through form and beauty'.

In Van Gogh (1948), which won the Academy Award for Best Foreign Short Subject in 1950, Resnais takes the camera on a 'voyage into painting'. We are shown only images from the paintings; there are no photographs of real landscapes. Resnais treats 'the whole of the artist's output as one large painting over which the camera has wandered as freely as in any ordinary documentary' (Bazin 1967). The camera tracks into the paintings, selects and fuses. The material selected serves neither art criticism nor biography but allows the filmmaker to find out, as Resnais stated after finishing the film in 1948, 'whether painted trees, painted people, painted houses could, thanks to the editing, fulfill the role of real objects and whether, in this case, it was possible to substitute for the spectator and almost without his knowing it, the interior world of the artist in place of the world as it is revealed by photography' (Armes 1968). The film is shot in black and white and this reveals hidden potentialities of the paintings and allows the filmmaker more freedom to explore space and create links between the canvases. The musical score by Jacques Besse plays a predominant role in structuring the shots. 'It is no longer there "to accompany the images" but to create the very backbone of the film,' Resnais wrote in 1948 (Armes 1968).

Gauguin (1950) is a much shorter film tracing the journey of the painter, Paul Gauguin, from his native Brittany to Tahiti. It is told in much the same way as Van Gogh, using the paintings and, this time, a musical score by Darius Milhaud and commentary drawn from the writings of Gauguin. Economic circumstances rather than aesthetic choice forced Resnais to shoot this film in black and white; however, the paintings of the great colorist were not suited for this approach and Resnais, in a 1960 interview, spoke of this film as a failure.

Resnais's third art film, Guernica, also made in 1950, takes Picasso's fresco as subject for another black-and-white documentary. Picasso's 'Guernica', painted in black, white, and tones of gray, is well suited for this approach. The filmmaker dismantles the spatial arrangement of the painting and rearranges the pieces along with other Picasso paintings and sculptures, as well as photographs of the ruined Spanish town, newspaper headlines, and graffiti in a new pattern focusing on the destruction and suffering caused by war. Over images of death and desolation the voice of the actress Maria Casarès recites a text written by the poet Paul Eluard. 'Stylistically [...] Guernica represents for the director the first totally successful fusion of all the elements on which his mature style is based. Fragments of photographs, painting and sculpture are welded into a visual rhythm and set against an aural rhythm of music and verbal poetry bound together in a tone that combines documentary realism with pure lyricism,' Armes has written. 'I was very moved by the massacre at Guernica because it seemed to me like the prelude to all the massacres which were to follow,' Resnais recalled in 1983 (Fleischer 1998).

Les Statues meurent aussi (1950–3), codirected with Chris Marker, is a tribute to African art and a rebuke of the colonizer who negated its value, took it out of its context, treated it as folklore, and thus contributed to its decline. The documentary also serves to recall the European efforts to shape Africa in its own image: 'All this is dominated by the White Man who sees everything from his position and raises himself above the contradictions of reality,' the voice of Marker's commentary reminds the viewer (cited by Gauthier 1995). The film, which was awarded the Prix Jean-Vigo in 1954, was banned by the French government for more than ten years.

Nuit et brouillard, shot in 1955 in a mix of black and white and color, is no doubt Resnais's finest and best-known documentary. In this thirty-one-minute film dealing with the Holocaust the filmmaker undertook the challenge of presenting a reality that seems impossible to document. The film is narrated from the perspective of ten years after the end of World War II and opens on a long take of a seemingly peaceful countryside shot in muted color. Then the camera tilts up, moves through torn barbed wire, and tracks slowly through the remains of what was the camp at Auschwitz—the empty buildings, the factories, the latrines, the gas chambers. Intercut with this probing inquisition by the camera, archival footage, in black and white, alternates to show the past and the horror of the camps: the construction of the sites, the rounding up of people all over Europe, the cattle trains, the naked and emaciated prisoners, the massed bodies of the dead. Photographs of piles of eyeglasses, combs, shoes, shorn hair, and endless lists of names bear silent witness to the enormity of the carnage. The camera searches to understand. 'We can only show the surface', the voice-over comments in a low-key, almost neutral tone, which itself seems to question our ability to grasp what is being described. Language seems paralyzed before the moral outrage. Jean Cayrol, the author of the commentary who had himself been deported during the Holocaust, wrote that he and Resnais wanted the film to reach a wide audience not only to have people remember but also to sound a warning against all future nights and fogs (Raskin 1987). The magnificent musical score by Hanns Eisler adds to the profound meaning of the film. In an essay accompanying the DVD release of the film, Philip Lopate has noted that this didactic work against war and violence, this very personal examination of the meaning of memory and forgetfulness, anticipates the modern documentary genre of the essay-film.

In Toute la mémoire du monde, a film about the French National Library made in 1956, Resnais invites the viewer to penetrate the memories that reside in books. Treasures from the past are presented by the camera's eye along with present-day works: the Maya Codex alongside the comic strip of Mandrake the Magician. Who knows, the commentary asks, which will bear more authentic witness of our civilization? The film is technically striking as the camera tracks back and forth through corridors and passageways. Cloquet recalls that 'Resnais wanted us to move through the National Library as if in a rocket, like a fish through water' (cited by Pingaud and Samson 1990).

Resnais and Remo Forlani, who wrote the script for Toute la mémoire du monde, projected a series of forty short films centered on the subject of 'The Organization of Work'. This project was unrealized, although a 35mm documentary, Le Mystère de l'atelier quinze, related to the project, was made in 1957 and codirected by Resnais. It is the least known of Resnais's documentaries and focuses on the case of a workman who falls ill for no apparent reason. The commentary was written by Chris Marker and the film, though entirely planned by Resnais, was actually directed by his former assistant, André Heinrich.

Resnais's last documentary, Le Chant du Styrene/The Song of Styrene, was commissioned by Péchiney Industries in 1958 to show the complex transformation of materials in the manufacture of polystyrene plastic, an entirely manufactured product. Resnais handled the assignment in a surprising manner and in a 1962 interview explained that this film is 'far less an industrial documentary than a synthesis of verbal abstraction and lyricism' (cited by Kreidl 1977). The commentary, written by the novelist and poet Raymond Queneau in alexandrine verse, serves as a humorous and informative accompaniment to the patterns created by wide-screen shots of pipes and machines in brilliant, often unrealistic color. In its use of musical rhythms, Le Chant du Styrene can be seen to prefigure Resnais's later 'musical' films (Fleischer 1998).

Jean-Luc Godard called Le Chant du Styrene 'an Olympian film, a serious film without equal'. Just a few months later Resnais released his first feature, Hiroshima mon amour, a film that won the International Critics' Prize at Cannes in 1959 and worldwide acclaim for the director.

Hiroshima mon amour grew out of a commission to make a documentary on the effects of the atomic bomb. Marguerite Duras, author of the script, calls Resnais's first feature 'a false documentary', and, indeed, one of the themes of this structurally complex love story revolves around memory and the impossibility of documenting the events that had occurred at Hiroshima.

A number of critics writing about Alain Resnais's feature films since 1959 have underscored the importance of the short documentaries in developing the formal and thematic issues central to his work as a whole. Bounoure, Armes, and Monaco have drawn actual parallels between individual documentaries and later feature films. The importance of the work of Alain Resnais as a documentarist cannot be overestimated either in its impact on the filmmaker's later work or, as Neyrat (2002) has observed, 'as an extended meditation on modernity, on the changes of man and art in the age of technology and aesthetics'.

EVA MARIA STADLER

See also: Night and Fog

Biography

Born in Brittany on June 3, 1922. A few years older than Godard and the other young filmmakers associated with the Cahiers du cinéma and the New Wave. As a boy, showed great interest in comics and movies, asked for the gift of an 8mm camera, and began a number of film projects. In 1940 went to Paris, first to study acting and two years later filmmaking/editing.

Selected films

- | | |
|--------|--|
| 1948 | Van Gogh (20 mins, black and white) |
| 1950 | Gauguin (11 mins, black and white) |
| 1950 | Guernica (12 mins, black and white) |
| 1950–3 | Les Statues meurent aussi (30 mins, black and white) |
| 1955 | Nuit et brouillard (32 mins, black and white and Eastmancolor) |
| 1956 | Toute la mémoire du monde (21 mins, black and white) |
| 1957 | Le Mystère de l'atelier quinze (18 mins, black and white) |
| 1958 | Le Chant du Styrene (14 mins, CinemaScope/Eastmancolor) |

Further reading

- Armes, Roy, The Cinema of Alain Resnais, London: A. Zwemmer Ltd and New York: A.S. Barnes & Noble, 1968.
- Bazin, André, 'Painting and Cinema', in What is Cinema? Translated by Hugh Gray, Berkeley, CA: University of California, 1967.
- Bounoure, Gaston, Alain Resnais, Paris: Seghers, 1962.
- Burch, Noel, 'A Conversation with Alain Resnais', Film Quarterly, spring 1960.
- 'Four Documentaries', Film Quarterly, fall 1959.
- Fleischer, Alain, L'Art d'Alain Resnais, Paris: Centre Pompidou, 1998.
- Gauthier, Guy, Le Documentaire—un autre cinéma, Paris: Nathan, 1995.

- Godard, Jean-Luc, 'Chacun son tour', Cahiers du Cinéma 92, February 1959.
- Kreidl, John Francis, Alain Resnais, Boston: Twayne, 1977.
- Marcorelles, Louis, 'Rebel with a Camera', Sight and Sound, winter 1960.
- Monaco, James, Alain Resnais: The Role of Imagination, New York: Oxford University Press, 1979.
- Neyrat, Cyril, 'Horreur/bonheur: métamorphose', in Stéphane Goudet (ed.), Alain Resnais—Anthologie, Paris: Gallimard, 2002: 47–54.
- Pingaud, Bernard and Samson, Pierre, Alain Resnais ou la créations au cinéma, 'L'Arc', Paris: Duponchelle, 1990.
- Raskin, Richard, Nuit et brouillard by Alain Resnais, Denmark: Aarhus University Press, 1987.

Retour, Le

(France, Cartier-Bresson and Banks, 1946)

Le Retour is a thirty-two-minute documentary film depicting the return home of prisoners of war, deportees, and refugees from camps in Germany and former German-occupied territories at the end of World War II. The film was produced by the Office of War Information (US), at the request of the French Ministère des Prisonniers, Déportés et Rapatriés, and it premiered in Paris in January 1946. As its scriptwriter, editor, and technical consultant, French photographer and filmmaker Henri Cartier-Bresson worked with two officers from the US Army Signal Corps.

During World War II the Signal Corps had documented every major military campaign (film and photographs) and gathered visual evidence of the Nazi atrocities on the European Theater of Operations. This material was used in films presenting war crimes, such as Nazi Concentration camps (George Stevens, United States, 1945) or reeducation films such as Die Todesmühlen/Death Mills (Hanus Burger, United States/Germany, 1945). Le Retour also made use of this material, and it added segments about displaced persons and prisoners returning home in 1945.

World War II resulted in destruction and human suffering on an unprecedented scale. Le Retour documents a singular moment in the war, when the arms fall silent and the gigantic task of repatriating millions of displaced persons across the continent began: Allied soldiers liberated from prisoner of war camps; civilian deportees who survived detention in concentration camps; millions of others brought to Germany as slave labor. All wanted to go home. Their immediate needs were enormous—clothing, medicine, transportation—and the chaotic return demanded military organization and Soviet-American cooperation. On the last leg of the journey, the camera witnesses the emotional minutes when former French prisoners get off the train in Paris and look at anxious awaiting relatives and friends. On both sides there was apprehension, hope, and restrained joy.

Henri Cartier-Bresson (1908–2004) was internationally known as a photographer and a reporter. On the Left of French politics, he became interested in film during a visit to the United States in 1935. Afterwards, he became assistant filmmaker to Jean Renoir and a film director in his own right, in the polarized political context of the Spanish civil war (Victoire de la vie, 1937, and L'Espagne vivra, 1938). Having been a prisoner of war from 1940 until his escape in February 1943, he brings sensibility to this film. As with his documentaries on Spain, he envisioned Le Retour as a testimony to human resilience in time of war. Cartier-Bresson mastered composition and always tried to capture the 'decisive moment' defined by a person or an event. As a way of life, he strove 'to place head, heart and eye along the same line of sight'.

The thematic filmography on deportation developed slowly and did not initially identify the specificities of persecutions against particular groups. Films were made in different countries and languages. Le Retour is one of the most well-known documentary films; it focuses on repatriation and the moment of reunion with loved ones. Its time frame is the present and its theme opens the future.

Le Retour presented prisoners of war and deportees in the same breath without differentiating them; this problematic interpretation was supported by the French authorities of 1945, who emphasized national unity. Soldiers became prisoners because of the defeat of the French army in 1940; other prisoners were civilians, arrested and deported for political or racial reasons. The first group were combatants, the latter victims. They were not in the same camps, they were not treated the same way, but the film blurs this distinction by mixing together images from the military camps and the concentration camps. As the title indicates, Le Retour was all about the return and causes were minimally addressed.

People had been taken away by the war; victory allowed their return. At the time, it was not possible to ask the painful question: why were these civilians (resisters, political militants, Jews) deported from France? The Vichy government had collaborated with the German occupation forces and therefore shared responsibility for the criminal internment of deportees from France.

The very name of the Ministry responsible for prisoners and deportees only aggravated the confusion. It was an ambiguous subject for filmmakers. The defeated soldiers of 1940 and racial deportees were not heroes. Apart from Le Retour, this theme was absent from French cinematography until the end of the 1940s. In Retour à la vie/Return to Life (1949), four of five short stories are about prisoners of war. Only Le retour d'Emma, by André Cayatte, was about the return of a deportee. Both Le Retour and Retour à la vie focus on the return as the central event, without venturing into the causes.

It was several years before the necessary distinctions were made and the difficult questions asked. Even then, censorship was watching, as demonstrated by the controversy about the documentary film Nuit et brouillard/Night and Fog (Alain Resnais, France, 1955–6). The film had been commissioned to commemorate the tenth anniversary of the liberation of the camps. Nonetheless, state collaboration was still taboo in French films and Resnais had to camouflage the képi of a French gendarme guarding an internment camp in France in order to break the visual link between the French authorities and deportation.

Before they were screened, films were examined by a Commission de contrôle des films cinématographiques (the film censorship board) and filtered through a system of mandatory visas for internal and export markets. National interest was one of the principal concerns of the state. The military struggle took precedence over the ideological conflicts of World War II. This less contentious interpretation of the war was favored by the government and included in Le Retour. In film, just as in official commemorations, the fate and the wartime experience of racial and political deportees were ignored.

SUZANNE LANGLOIS

Le Retour (France/US, Services américains d'information/Office of War Information, 35mm, black & white, 1944–6, 32 mins).

Produced by the Office of War Information; producer Noma Ratner. Directed by Henri Cartier-Bresson; codirectors Richard Banks and Jerrold Krimsky from the US Army Signal Corps. Scriptwriter and technical consultant: Henri Cartier-Bresson. On-screen commentary: Claude Roy. Cinematography by US Army Signal Corps, Henri Cartier-Bresson and Claude Renoir. Edited by Henri Cartier-Bresson and Richard Banks. Music by Robert Lannoy. Archival material from the last months of the war, American troops in Germany, Dachau concentration camp, Elbe river, aerial views of Paris, Gare d'Orsay. A nineteen-minute version, Reunion (1946), was adapted from Le Retour by the US Army Pictorial Service.

Further reading

- Butler, Margaret, Film and Community in Britain and France: From La Règle du jeu to Room at the Top, London: I.B. Tauris, 2004.
- Cartier-Bresson, Henri, Henri Cartier-Bresson: Photographer, Boston: Little, Brown and Co., 1992.
- Langlois, Suzanne, La Résistance dans le cinéma français 1944–94, de la Libération de Paris à Libérame, Paris: L'Harmattan, 2001.
- Lindeperg, Sylvie, Les Écrans de l'ombre. La Seconde Guerre mondiale dans le cinéma français (1944–69), Paris: CNRS Editions, 1997.
- n.a., De qui s'agit-il? Henri Cartier-Bresson, Paris: Fondation Henri Cartier-Bresson/Gallimard and Bibliothèque nationale de France, 2003.
- Namer, Gérard, Batailles pour la mémoire. La commémoration en France de 1945 à nos jours, Paris: Papyrus, 1983.
- Rouso, Henry, The Vichy Syndrome: History and Memory in France since 1944, Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1994.
- Thompson, George Raynor, The Signal Corps: The Outcome (mid-1943 through 1945), Washington, DC: Office of the Chief of Military History, US Army, 1966.

Riefenstahl, Leni

Leni Riefenstahl is generally regarded as one of the most brilliant and controversial filmmakers in the history of cinema. Though she preferred fiction, in which she excelled as an actress, writer, and director, she will be forever linked to nonfiction on the strength of two classic documentaries—Triumph des Willens/Triumph of the Will (1935), and Olympia (1938).

Trained in classical ballet, Leni Riefenstahl displayed an early interest in and talent for the visual arts and music. She often choreographed her own dance routines, selected the music, and designed her costumes. An injury forced her to suspend dancing, and during recovery she happened to see a film that changed her life. Berg des Schicksals/Mountain of Destiny (1924), a film by Dr Arnold Fanck, was shot in the Dolomite Mountains in northern Italy. The realistic setting, with images of angular rocks and clouds and alpine slopes, made such an impression that she boldly set out to meet the star of the film, Luis Tenker, and the director, Franck, and to offer her services as an actress. The ploy worked, and soon Leni Riefenstahl was starring in mountain films herself. In the first such film, Der heilige Berg/The Holy Mountain (1926), Leni played the role of a dancer, Diotima, caught in a love triangle. She went on to star in other mountain films such as Der grosse Sprung/The Great Leap (1927), Die weiße Hölle vom Piz Palü/The White Hell of Piz Palu (1929), and Stürme über dem Montblanc/Storm over Mont Blanc (1930), her first film with sound. The films required Riefenstahl to master mountain climbing and barefoot rock climbing, and to endure the hardships of freezing temperatures and blizzard-like conditions. All the while she was performing as an actress, Riefenstahl was studying and mastering the techniques of cinema.

By the time she directed her first film, the fairy tale Das blaue Licht/The Blue Light (1932), Riefenstahl was already one of Germany's best-known actresses. With her directing debut she became world famous. The Blue Light, which she produced, collaborated on the screenplay, starred in, directed, and edited, tells the story of Junta, a young mountain girl accused by nearby villagers of being a witch and causing the deaths of young men who perished in their attempts to climb Monte Cristallo on nights when a full moon casts a shimmering blue light over the mountain. Junta inadvertently allows her lover to discover the source of the blue light, a crystal grotto that villagers find out about and loot. Junta, believing she has been betrayed, leaps to her death. The Blue Light was filmed on location in the village of Ticino and the Dolomites. With a perfectionist's eye, Riefenstahl calculated every lens setting and focal length before shooting, and even ordered a special lens and more sensitive film stock to achieve a nightlike effect.

In 1932 Riefenstahl met Adolf Hitler, soon to be named Chancellor of Germany. The leader of the National Socialist German Workers' Party, or Nazis, Hitler was a spell-binding orator whose message of German nationalism and strength resonated with a population beset by unemployment and the still lingering humiliation of defeat in World War I. Like many other Germans, Riefenstahl was attracted to the worldview that Hitler promoted. Hitler in turn admired Riefenstahl's films, particularly The Holy Mountain and The Blue Light. In her autobiography she quotes Hitler as saying, 'Once we come to power, you must make my films.' Despite an apolitical nature, Riefenstahl agreed to make a film about the annual party rally in Nuremberg. Hastily put together, the short film Sieg des Glaubens/Victory of Faith (1933), contained only seeds of what would become the next year the most famous propaganda film of all time, Triumph des Willens/Triumph of the Will (1935).

The timing of Triumph of the Will could not have been more important. Hitler had come to power in January 1933 and had begun immediately to suspend civil liberties and issue anti-Jewish decrees. In August of the next year, the president of Germany, the revered World War I leader Field Marshall Paul von Hindenburg, died, enabling Hitler to combine the office of chancellor and president. A few months before, to appease the military, Hitler had ordered a purge of his own party, assassinating the leader of the SA (Stürmabteilung or 'Brownshirts'), Ernst Röhm.

With the world press raising questions about Germany's direction, and party stalwarts uneasy about their own fates, a film promoting party solidarity and German unity would be a public relations coup. On this score, Riefenstahl delivered a masterpiece of propaganda, a one-hundred-and-fourteen-minute film that would solidify Hitler's role as Führer and forever brand Leni Riefenstahl as a Nazi sympathizer. Ostensibly, Triumph of the Will is an account of the Sixth National Socialist Party Rally held in Nuremberg in September of 1934. Financed and distributed by the German film studio UFA, whose largest shareholder, Alfred Hugenberg, was a supporter of Hitler, Triumph of the Will had a crew of eighteen camerapersons. The documentary is chock-full of speeches, rallies, ceremonies, parades, and ritual, but it is made with such artistry and such an understanding of German values and needs that it rises above the typical propaganda film. Triumph begins with Hitler's arrival in Nuremberg as his plane descends from the clouds and glides above the spires of the ancient city. The mystical quality of the arrival is enhanced by the anticipation of the crowd, straining on tiptoes to catch a glimpse of the Führer. After a motorcade into the city and a welcome rally, Riefenstahl changes the pace of the film, which she likens to the changes in the rhythm of a musical composition. The viewer sees Nuremberg at daybreak, still asleep, the absence of people a prelude to the activity that follows. The pace quickens as the camera captures a tent city of young soldiers and workers—shaving, cooking, playing games, and always smiling and laughing. Next, the viewer is treated to a folk parade in honor of the Führer. After inspecting a group of flag bearers, Hitler boards his open Mercedes limousine and, surrounded by other party leaders, disappears. Riefenstahl allows the camera to lose focus, thereby adding to the mysticism of the moment. For the opening of the Party Congress, Riefenstahl features short clips of speeches by Party leaders. Perhaps the most important of Hitler's speeches is his address to the SA, the only time Hitler refers to the purge several months before: 'Men of the SA and the SS. A few months ago, a black shadow spread over the movement. Neither the SA, nor any other institution of the party, had anything to do with this shadow.'

Ever mindful of the importance of symbols, Riefenstahl makes full use of them and the many symbolic acts carried out—a solemn wreath-laying ceremony, a flag consecration, parades of swastika flags, jack-booted SS troops marching in unison, and always, endless salutes and tributes to the Führer. Nuremberg itself was filled with historic symbolism, its Imperial Castle and medieval walls a reminder of the first so-called Reich, The Holy Roman Empire. Music in Triumph was likewise symbolic. Scored by Herbert Windt, it made liberal use of the Party anthem, the Horst Wessel song, composed by an early martyr of the Nazi Party. Windt also included German folk music and German marches as well as music of Hitler's favorite composer, Richard Wagner.

The film premiered in Berlin in March 1935. After complaints by the German army that it had been slighted in Triumph, Riefenstahl agreed to make a short film of the next Party Conference, focusing on military maneuvers. The result was a twenty-eight-minute film, Tag Der Freiheit!—Unsere Wehrmacht!/Day of Freedom!—Our Armed Forces! (1935).

Riefenstahl claimed that one of the most difficult aspects of making the Party films was working with the propaganda minister Joseph Goebbels. A notorious womanizer who worshipped Hitler and saw Riefenstahl as a rival for the Führer's affections, Goebbels controlled the film industry during the Third Reich and resented competition from Riefenstahl, who at one point earned the unofficial title of 'Film Expert to the National Socialist Party'. Throughout her life Riefenstahl maintained that her relationship with Goebbels was anything but cordial, a result of Goebbels's failure to interest her romantically. Nevertheless, in a 1993 documentary, The Wonderful, Horrible Life of Leni Riefenstahl, director Ray Müller confronted Riefenstahl with excerpts from Goebbels's 1933 diary suggesting that he and Riefenstahl visited one another socially.

Some critics question whether Triumph was really a documentary. Siegfried Kracauer believed the rally was staged for the camera, though, in fact, Nazi Party rallies had been held in Nuremberg since 1927. David Hinton argued that editing Triumph in the chronological order in which events occurred was of little importance to Riefenstahl—that the guiding principle was a 'deliberately conceived sense of rhythm'. Lotte Eisner and Susan Sontag condemned Riefenstahl as a pawn of Hitler. Despite the many criticisms of Triumph as pure propaganda—an ode to fascism or paean to Hitler—Richard Barsam (1975) said it fused art and politics and was 'a masterful blend of the four basic elements of cinema—light, darkness, sound, and silence—but it is not just an achievement in cinematic form, for it has other essential elements—thematic, psychological, mythological, narrative, and visual interest—and it is in the working of these elements that Riefenstahl transcends the limitations of the documentary film and the propaganda film genres'.

Leni Riefenstahl's other major contribution to documentary film was Olympia: Fest der Völker/Olympia: Festival of the People, and Olympia: Fest der Schönheit/Olympia: Festival of Beauty (1938), and a two-part film of the 1936 Berlin Olympics hosted by Germany. The first great sports film ever made, it featured staged prologues, innovative camera techniques, and a fluid editing style that elevated it far above the typical sporting events film. Sanctioned by the International Olympics Committee as the official film of the 1936 Olympics, and financed and distributed by the German film company TOBIS, Olympia begins with a reverential tribute to the origin of the games—Ancient Greece. The camera tracks through smoky, silhouetted statues and ruins of ancient temples. Suddenly one of the statues is transformed into a human being—a discus thrower. A dance scene that includes Riefenstahl herself precedes the lighting of the Olympic torch and a symbolic journey from Ancient Greece to modern Berlin. The first part of Olympia features the many track and field events. Riefenstahl always thought in terms of the most artistically composed shot, so for the pole-vaulting sequence, she had pits dug to capture the athletes catapulted across the sky. In slow motion, their graceful bodies seem to defy gravity. Throughout both parts of the film, Riefenstahl used balloons, dollies, catapults, telescopic lenses, any means she could use to convey the pain and ecstasy of competition. For the diving competition, Riefenstahl used underwater cameras to follow the divers below, as well as above the surface of the water. Perhaps the most famous sequence is the high-diving competition in part two of Olympia. The sequence begins with a series of fast-paced dives that gradually become more silhouetted as the sky darkens. Projected in slow motion, the ballet-like acrobatics of the divers framed against a cloud-laced sky appear almost superhuman. In fact, one of the criticisms of Olympia is that Riefenstahl's seemingly cult-like obsession with beauty, particularly the beauty of the human body, reflected a fascist aesthetic consistent with the ideals of the Nazi Party. This argument is undermined, however, by the fact that the star of the 1936 Olympics was an African American athlete, Jesse Owens, who received prominent attention in the film and contradicted Nazi notions of a superior Aryan race. Olympia premiered in 1938 at the UFA-Palast am Zoo in Berlin and was later shown throughout Europe. It won numerous awards, including the Grand Prize at the International Film Festival in Venice. In 1956 American directors designated it one of the ten best films of all time.

In 1938 Riefenstahl traveled to the United States to promote Olympia, but her visit was marred by anti-Nazi sentiment that followed Germany's Crystal Night, a night of terror in which Jewish synagogues, homes, and businesses were wrecked, burned, and looted, and more than thirty thousand Jews were arrested.

Hitler biographer John Toland noted: 'The reaction from abroad was immediate and the acts of brutality were given an unforgettable name—inspired by the multitude of smashed windows—Crystal Night. On all sides Germany was assailed as a barbarous nation.' Despite a friendly visit in Chicago with automobile tycoon Henry Ford, the film world by and large shunned her. Gary Cooper cancelled an invitation to meet her, and Walt Disney declined an offer to screen Olympia. Later, he told the press he really didn't know who Leni Riefenstahl was.

During World War II Riefenstahl served for a brief time as a war photographer and worked whenever possible on a feature film she directed and starred in, Tiefland/Lowlands (1954), begun in 1934 but not completed until after the war. At the close of World War II she was arrested by US authorities and then released. The US Army concluded that she may not have been aware of what went on in Nazi Germany and that her sin was one of omission, 'which appears all the more serious due to the fact that she, more than any person, had the opportunity to get to the truth. She is a product of the moral corruption which characterizes the regime. But it would be false to picture her as an ambitious female who wanted to attain fame and wealth on the NSDAP bandwagon. She is certainly no fanatical National Socialist who had sold her soul to the regime. Admiration for Hitler had closed her eyes to all that his regime meant for Germany. His protecting hand insured her artistic activities—contrary to those of so many others. His hand offered protection from the political clutches, and built a dream-world for her in which she could live with "her art" [...]. If her statements are sincere, she has never grasped, and still does not grasp, the fact that she, by dedicating her life to art, has given expression to a gruesome regime and contributed to its glorification.'

The French military was less forgiving. Shortly after being released by the US Army, Riefenstahl was arrested by French police and remained in custody until 1947. In 1949 she was officially de-Nazified by a French tribunal. The Baden State Commisariat classified her as a 'fellow traveler'.

Eventually, most of the films that had been confiscated from her were returned, either by government or court action. Though she attempted to resume her career as a filmmaker, press coverage of her activities made financing impossible to obtain. Riefenstahl claimed that Jewish organizations and not the German government were to blame. In the 1950s and 1960s Riefenstahl began traveling to Africa, at first to make a film, but later to take still photographs of tribes in the southern Sudan. The result was her first book of still photographs, published in English as The Last of the Nuba (1974). About the same time, Riefenstahl learned to dive and became an accomplished underwater photographer, using both still and motion picture cameras. With her companion, Horst Kettner, she organized diving expeditions to the Red Sea, Honduras, the Caribbean, the Indian Ocean, and elsewhere to capture the undersea world. In 1976 a second book of Africa photographs was published, The People of Kao, followed two years later by a book of underwater photographs, Coral Garden (1978). She wrote the text and composed the layout for a fourth book, Leni Riefenstahl's Africa (1982). Her autobiography, Leni Riefenstahl: A Memoir, was published in 1987 and another book of still photographs, Wonders under Water, in 1991. The last of her publications, Leni Riefenstahl: Five Lives, appeared in 2000. The 'five lives' refers to her many careers—as a dancer, actress, director, photographer, and diver.

CHURCHILL ROBERTS

See also: Olympia; Triumph of the Will

Biography

Born in Berlin, August 22, 1902. Showed an early interest in gymnastics, music, poetry, and dance. Finished schooling at the Kollmorgen Lyceum in Berlin in 1918, then attended the Grimm-Reiter Dance School and later the Jutta Klamt School and the dance school of Dresden. In 1923 gave first solo dance performance. In 1924 met actor Luis Trenker and director Arnold Fanck and soon starred in her first film, The Holy Mountain. In 1932 directed The Blue Light, followed by Triumph of the Will (1935) and Olympia (1938). War photographer in 1939, worked intermittently on a feature film, Tiefland, completed in 1954. Arrested in 1945 and released in 1947. Made the first of many trips to Africa in 1956 and in 1973 passed a diving test. First of five books of still photographs published in 1973. Photographed the 1972 Olympics for the Sunday Times Magazine and was guest of honor at the summer Olympics in Montreal in 1976. In 1982 awarded a gold cup by the International Olympics Committee for Olympia. Died in 2003 at the age of 101.

Selected films

- 1926 The Holy Mountain: actress
- 1929 The White Hell of Pitz Palu: actress
- 1930 Storm over Mont Blanc: actress
- 1932 The Blue Light: actress, director, editor
- 1933 Victory of Faith: director, editor
- 1933 SOS Iceberg: actress
- 1935 Triumph of the Will: director, editor
- 1935 Day of Freedom!—Our Armed Forces!: director, editor
- 1938 Olympia Part I: Festival of the People: director, editor
- 1938 Olympia Part II: Festival of Beauty: director, editor
- 1954 Tiefland: director, actress, editor

Further reading

- Barsam, Richard M., Film Guide to Triumph of the Will, Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press, 1975.
- Berg-Pan, Renata, Leni Riefenstahl, Boston: Twayne Publishers, 1980.
- Fanck, Arnold, Erführte Regie mit Gletschern, Stürmen, Lawinen, Munich: Nymphenburger Verlagshandlung, 1973.
- Ford, Charles, Leni Riefenstahl, Paris: La Table Ronde, 1978.
- Hinton, David B., The Films of Leni Riefenstahl, third edn, Lanhan, MD: Scarecrow Press, 2000.
- Hull, David Stewart, Film in the Third Reich, New York: Simon and Schuster, 1973.
- Infield, Glen B., Leni Riefenstahl: The Fallen Film Goddess, New York: Thomas Y. Crowell Company, 1976.
- Riefenstahl, Leni, Leni Riefenstahl: A Memoir, New York: Picador USA, 1995.
- , Leni Riefenstahl: Five Lives, Cologne: Taschen, 2000.
- Rother, Rainer, Leni Riefenstahl: The Seduction of Genius, London: Continuum, 2002.
- Salkeld, Audrey, A Portrait of Leni Riefenstahl, London: Pimlico, 1997.

Rien que les heures

(France, Cavalcanti, 1926)

Rien que les heures/Nothing but the Hours was Alberto Cavalcanti's first directed film. The film was produced by Pierre Braunberger, an enlightened entrepreneur, committed to the enhancement of French independent film culture, who also produced films for other independent filmmakers during the 1920s.

Rien que les heures opens with an intertitle stating that 'this film does not need a story, it is no more than a series of impressions on time passing'. Nevertheless, the film does contain a story, concerning a day in the life of the city of Paris, although, unlike other 'city symphony' films of the period, such as Joris Ivens's Regen/Rain (1929), chronology is neither linear nor logical in the film. No explanation is given, either, for these odd discrepancies. The primary function of the characters in the film is also to reinforce the central thesis of Rien que les heures, which is that underlying the apparent civilised façade of bourgeois society there exists a darker reality marked by violence, inequality, and brutality. This thesis, which is represented metaphorically in various sections of the film, is given particular substance in the film's subplot of criminality, violence, and victimisation.

One of the characters in the film is an old woman. Unconnected to the narrative causality of the film's story, she seems to function as a symbol, and metaphorical victim, of the degenerate urban world around her. Although a sense of irony pervades much of Rien que les heures, particularly in the way in which playful juxtapositions and modernist special effects are used, the sequences involving the old woman appear strikingly harsh and harrowing, and the last time she is seen, sitting down in an abandoned rubbish yard, could be interpreted as signifying her impending death.

At a retrospective of his work mounted at the National Film Theatre in 1977, Cavalcanti chose, rather surprisingly, to select a number of light Parisian songs to accompany a screening of Rien que les heures. This apparently had the effect of making the film appear largely ironic and even comic in parts, and of making the figure of the old woman appear paradoxical rather than tragic. The reasons for Cavalcanti's decision to use popular songs to accompany the film are unclear, but it is difficult to imagine how the old lame woman in the film could have been rendered comic by such treatment. Whatever Cavalcanti's motives were in 1977, a careful viewing of the film suggests that this character is to be read realistically, rather than paradoxically.

The use of modernist devices in Rien que les heures, such as wipes, dissolves, and superimpositions, also serves to emphasise the authorial source of the critique of bourgeois norms mounted within the film, and the vision of the filmmaker is foregrounded here through the application of these explicitly modernist devices. Rien que les heures does not use these modernist devices for merely experimental purposes, but to demystify conventional forms of representation in order to critique bourgeois society. The film, therefore, can be said to possess a subversive intent.

Underlying Rien que les heures is also a notion of reality as masked, and the film uses juxtapositions to render the impression that a gradual unmasking process is taking place as the film unfolds. The film also uses a binary oppositional structure as part of this unmasking process, as conventional images based on clichéd perceptions of Parisian life repeatedly give way to others that subvert or contradict them. One example of this is a scene in which shots of food in a marketplace are followed by glimpses of rubbish in a bin. Again, the underlying idea is that, beneath the civilised façade, something far more primal and animalistic lurks.

Rien que les heures undoubtedly cemented Cavalcanti's reputation as an important avant-garde director. It is difficult, however, to compare the film with others of the period. Although Siegfried Kracauer has compared the film to Ivens's Regen, the two films are not really comparable. The anarchistic modernism of Rien que les heures also means that the film cannot really be compared with French cinematic impressionism, or the cinema pur. The use of melodramatic characterisation in the film also means that it cannot be compared easily to the 'city symphony' genre. Perhaps the easiest association is with René Clair's Entr'acte (1924), although Cavalcanti's film still lacks the overtly Dadaist aspirations of Clair's film. Cavalcanti drew on many influences in making Rien que les heures, and the film is best regarded as a distillation of these influences, rather than a film that can be closely associated with others of the period. Rien que les heures was also the first, and almost the last high-modernist film made by Cavalcanti, and he was only to return to this type of filmmaking once more during the course of his career, with the collaborative project of Coal Face in 1935.

IAN AITKEN

See also: Cavalcanti, Alberto

Rien que les heures (France, 1926). Directed and edited by Alberto Cavalcanti. Produced by Pierre Braunberger and Neo-Films.

Further reading

- Aitken, Ian, Alberto Cavalcanti, Realism, Surrealism and National Cinemas, London: Flicks Books, 2001.
- Film and Reform, London: Routledge, 1990.
- The Documentary Film Movement, An Anthology, Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press, 1998.
- Cavalcanti, Alberto, Filme e Realidade, Rio de Janeiro: Editora Artenova, in collaboration with Empresa Brasileira de Filmes—Embrafilme, 1977.
- Ghali, Noureddine, L'Avant-Garde Cinématographique en France dans les Années Vingt, Paris: Editions Paris Experimental, 1995.
- Pellizari, Lorenzo and Valentinetti, Claudio M. (eds), Alberto Cavalcanti, Locarno: Editions du Festival international du films de Locarno, 1988.
- Sussex, Elizabeth, 'Cavalcanti in England', Sight and Sound 44, no. 4, autumn, 1975.

Riggs, Marlon

The filmmaker Marlon T. Riggs used film as a means to inform mainstream America of the complexities of African American gay life, and to deconstruct black visual representation. In terms of focus, Riggs followed in the tradition of documentarians such as William Greaves and alongside filmmakers such as Henry Hampton, both of whom believed in the power and viability of the media to convey important social concerns regarding African Americans. Riggs worked throughout the 1980s and early 1990s, during the presidencies of Ronald Reagan and George H.W. Bush. At that time, the United States enjoyed tremendous financial gains, while simultaneously undermining and eliminating social services for the poor and people of color. The much-touted 'cultural wars' shaped the artistic landscape. The culmination of enhanced commerce and communication advances led to an explosion of visual opportunities, especially via cable.

In his work, Riggs emphasized both commonalities and differences between the black gay community and black communities at large. He calls into question black spirituality, African heritage, black duality, and black humanity. He distinguishes a radical black aesthetic while pushing the boundaries of black aesthetics in general. Riggs's works addressing black gay life include Tongues Untied (1989), Affirmations (1990), Anthem (1991), and Non, Je Ne Regrette Rien/No, I Regret Nothing (1992).

The self-reflexive stance in Riggs's works offers an important commentary on African Americans specifically and others more generally. His confrontational approach of examining black homosexuality locates dialogue discrepancies within black communities. Because his work advocates change, his productions incited critical and popular debate.

Tongues Untied became Riggs's most controversial and celebrated work. Appearing on the national public television series P.O.V. in 1989, the documentary received the Best Documentary Award at the Berlin Film Festival and awards at other film festivals. It later became the center of a heated debate involving funding for the National Endowment for the Arts (NEA) and the Corporation for Public Broadcasting. Criticizing the film as vulgar and amoral, the Christian Coalition edited a sensationalized clip of the film and distributed it to every member of Congress. Republican Patrick Buchanan reedited a twenty-second clip from the film to use in an attack on the NEA during the 1992 presidential primary. Riggs responded with an op-ed piece in The New York Times entitled 'Meet the New Willie Horton'.

Tongues Untied centers on the realities of black, male homosexual love. This was the first televised frank discussion of black homosexuality. In interviews Riggs said that he drew on his own personal experience in creating the documentary. He wanted to speak loudly about the painful experiences of being gay and black. Tongues Untied contemplates the nuances of self-definition, and the pressures and demands of an attempt to define oneself via multiple identities.

In Tongues Untied the audience is directly addressed through the multilayering of both sounds and images. Alone and in concert with other voices, Riggs juxtaposes words, music, and sound to accost his audience. This cacophonous musical tradition plays very much into African-American sensibilities. Black music and oral traditions unify because they confront individuals with the truth of black existence. This same usage of music occurs in his film short Anthem. For example, Blackberri's rendition of the song 'America' is positioned subversively to illuminate its irony for blacks and gays. Riggs uses rhythmic African drumbeats throughout Tongues Untied and Anthem to draw a line of continuity between the present and the past. Through Riggs's positioning of music in the background, as well as in the narrative of his films, he addresses gay and heterosexual African Americans in ways that transcend sexuality and race.

Not all of his projects take this combative, highly personal approach. Ethnic Notions (1987), his first major project, traced the evolution of racial stereotypes. It received an Emmy Award and has become a core text in college courses across the United States. Color Adjustment (1991) takes on television representations of blacks. For its insightfulness and creativity, it received one of television's highest accolades, the George Foster Peabody Award. These documentaries offer more traditional approaches to African American representation in the commodified world of television and film. They use 'voice-of-God' narration, scholarly experts, and multilayered images of blacks depicted over the span of seventy years in film and television. While in some ways Riggs's use of the prevailing techniques of majority aesthetics seems to give credence to them, it serves more usefully to undermine those same techniques by presenting subject matter rarely seen.

In his final work, Black Is ... Black Ain't (1995), Riggs tackled the complex inner workings of black identity. Through his creative production methods, use of black aesthetics, and inclusion of his dying body as a template, Riggs's art functions as a foundation for critical examinations of African American relations as a whole. Overall, Marlon Riggs's documentaries provide a road map for collective introspection and progress.

BERETTA E. SMITH-SHOMADE

Biography

Born in Fort Worth, Texas, February 3, 1957. Graduated magna cum laude from Harvard University and received Master's degree from the University of California, Berkeley. Appointed a professor in Berkeley's Graduate School of Journalism. At the age of thirty-seven died of AIDS, on April 5, 1994. His final film, Black Is ... Black Ain't, was completed by his coproducer Nicole Atkinson and editor/codirector Christiane Badgely from the footage shot previously and notes left by Riggs.

Selected films

- 1987 Ethnic Notions
- 1989 Tongues Untied
- 1990 Affirmations
- 1991 Anthem
- 1991 Color Adjustment
- 1992 Non, Je Ne Regrette Rien/No, I Regret Nothing
- 1995 Black Is ... Black Ain't

Further reading

- Beccuer, Marcos, 'Snap!thology and Other Discursive Practices in Tongues Untied', Wide Angle 13, no. 2, April 1991: 6-17.
- Datcher, Michael, 'Pride and Prejudice: Ground-breaking Filmmaker Marlon Riggs Explores Two of Today's Most Controversial Issues: Race and Sexuality', San Francisco Focus, February 1994: 38-43.
- Grundmann, Roy, 'New Agendas in Black Filmmaking: An Interview with Marlon Riggs', Cineaste 19, nos 2-3, 1992: 52-4.
- Riggs, Marlon, 'Black Macho Revisited: Reflections of a Snap! Queen', The Independent, April 1991: 32-4.

River, The

(US, Lorentz, 1937)

Pare Lorentz's follow-up film to The Plow that Broke the Plains (1936), The River, tells a story of the economic and ecological changes experienced along the Mississippi River and its tributaries. Its goal was to inform US citizens about the problems posed by the rivers and their abuse, as well as to promote the solutions offered by a number of President Franklin Roosevelt's New Deal agencies, chiefly the Tennessee Valley Authority but also the Farm Security Administration (FSA) and the Civilian Conservation Corps (the Resettlement Administration, the agency behind Plow and The River, ceased to exist and many of its missions were absorbed within the FSA). Although it was first screened only to southern US audiences, The River was intended for national distribution, which it eventually got through the assistance of Paramount Pictures. Considered to be Lorentz's greatest achievement, it beat seventy other films (including Leni Riefenstahl's Olympia) when it became the first US film honored as the best documentary film at the Venice International Film Festival.

The film uses a documentary paradigm familiar in the 1930s: an initial situation is described (the Mississippi region was beautiful and held economic value), a problem is revealed (misuse of the land has led to soil erosion and flooding), and finally a solution is recommended (a variety of government agencies can restore the region to its original state). 'Conservation', as suggested in The River, only implied the TVA's policies of flooding vast valleys to create dams and cheap hydroelectric power. Surrounding these federally funded dams were controversial issues including the government creation of electrical power, afforestation, reforestation, and the relocation of farmers from flooded lands to less productive areas in the hills. It was a project that would have massive political, economic, and ecological repercussions for the entire region. A film explaining this project would be representing and advocating many New Deal policies and agencies, and thus Roosevelt was willing to provide a much larger budget for The River than Plow, which was filmed in five states while The River was filmed in fourteen.

Lorentz filmed along the Mississippi River and its tributaries in late 1936, thinking he would use stock footage of floods and flooding as he finished his initial shooting in January 1937. Photographer Willard Van Dyke, whose letters written during the filming provide an important source of information on Lorentz's shooting process, estimated that Lorentz took one hundred thousand feet of film for a final product that would only total three thousand feet. The devastating floods of early 1937 allowed him the rare chance to capture shots of the flooded Mississippi and Ohio Rivers; the fresh memories of that natural disaster must have played a powerful role in the film's critical and popular reception. Furthermore, in contrast to the bleak ending in Plow, which ended, in the more widely shown version without its epilogue, with dust storms and displaced families heading off to an uncertain future, The River has a far more hopeful conclusion, showing images of ecological and economic regrowth: majestic shots of hydroelectric dams and power cables, of workers restoring fields. Its remarkably optimistic tone was popular among politicians, critics, and especially audiences, many of whom were reported to have cheered and applauded at the screenings. The initial four-reel version was shortened to a three-reel version where it enjoyed widespread distribution for many years among schools.

The collaboration between Lorentz and composer Virgil Thomson rivals that of Eisenstein and Prokofiev in their tight coordination between the visual and audible parts of the film. Dialectical gestures involving image and music, such as the alternating major-minor mode contrasts showing fertile and barren soil in Plow, return in The River, where Thomson instead contrasts diatonic and chromatic versions of a trumpet melody to underscore the distinction between lush and abused nature scenes. In addition to recycling parts of his earlier Symphony on a Hymn Tune (1928), Thomson wrote original cues based on a study of southern Protestant hymns and regional folk songs. Thomson's music for the log sequences includes quick-paced arrangements of popular songs like 'Hot Time in the Old Town Tonight' as we see log after log shoot off the sluices into the water. The music accompanying the flood sequence is based on the hymn named 'Mississippi' whose (unheard) lyrics describe an apocalyptic scene, and Thomson's treatment of this musical material builds synergistically with the imagery. As the flood on the image track builds up from dripping icicles to an overpowering deluge, the music grows from a single line stating the hymn melody into a thick fugue, finally culminating in the original harmonization of the hymn as found in the shape-note books. Visuals—long aerial shots of the bloated river and submerged houses—and music climax at this moment. Parts of The River's score were reused in Nicholas Meyer's ABC-TV movie about nuclear bombings, The Day After (1983).

The River has been widely praised for its careful and effective blending of image, word, and music. Lorentz's narration, which has been compared to the poetry of Walt Whitman, and which James Joyce reportedly called the most beautiful prose he had heard in ten years, was not written until after the score had been composed and the film edited into its final form. Epic catalogues of river names and towns are repeated, as are key phrases. Parts of Lorentz's argument in The River have been criticized for being overly subtle, hyperbolic, and obtuse. He perhaps overemphasizes the connection between deforestation and flooding. As in Plow, Lorentz sought to encourage national identification with a regional problem and he again exaggerates the amount of territory in question; the rivers on Lorentz's maps take on Brobdagnian proportions, although without any Swiftian irony. His focus on larger natural and national forces tends to diminish the individuals and their reactions to adversity, although The River contains memorable images of intense human suffering, such as the shots of the faces of flood victims and migrant farmers.

NEIL LERNER

See also: Lorentz, Pare; Plow that Broke the Plains, The

The River (US, black and white; Western Electric Mirrophonic Recording; Farm Security Administration; 1937, 35mm, 36 mins; 16mm, 27 mins). Released October 29, 1937, premiering in New Orleans, Louisiana; Memphis, TN, November 1, 1937; St Louis, November 10; Washington, DC, December 7. Distributed by Paramount Pictures. Written and directed by Pare Lorentz. Photographed by Floyd Crosby, Stacy Woodard, Horace Woodard, and Willard Van Dyke. Music composed by Virgil Thomson, orchestrated by Henry Brant, and conducted by Alexander Smallens. Narrator: Thomas Chalmers. Editors: Lloyd Nosler; Leo Zochling. Research editor: A.A. Mercey. Sound: Al Dillinger. Filmed along the Mississippi River Valley from October 1936 through March 1, 1937. Cost: c. $50,000.

Further reading

- Alexander, William, Film on the Left: American Documentary Film from 1931 to 1942, Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1981.
- Barsam, Richard M., Non-Fiction Film: A Critical History, revised and expanded edition, Bloomington, IN and Indianapolis, IN: Indiana University Press, 1992.
- Lerner, Neil, 'Damming Virgil Thomson's Music for The River', in Jane M. Gaines and Michael Renov (eds), Collecting Visible Evidence, Minneapolis, MN and London: University of Minnesota Press, 1999.
- MacCann, Richard D., The People's Films: A Political History of U.S. Government Motion Pictures, New York: Hastings House, 1973.
- Rabinowitz, Paula, They Must Be Represented: The Politics of Documentary, London and New York: Verso, 1994.
- Rollins, Peter C., 'Ideology and Film Rhetoric: Three Documentaries of the New Deal Era', The Journal of Popular Film 5, no. 2, 1976: 126–45.

- Snyder, Robert L., Pare Lorentz and the Documentary Film, Norman, OK: University of Oklahoma Press, 1968.
- Thomson, Virgil, Virgil Thomson, New York: Dutton, 1966.
- Tommasini, Anthony, Virgil Thomson: Composer on the Aisle, New York and London, Norton, 1997.
- Van Dyke, Willard, 'Letters from The River', Film Comment, 1965: 38–56.
- Widgery, Claudia Joan, The Kinetic and Temporal Interaction of Music and Film: Three Documentaries of 1930s America, PhD dissertation, University of Maryland, 1990.

Rochemont, Louis de

Best known and remembered as the creative head of The March of Time series, Louis de Rochemont was an innovator in other types of filmmaking that were also influential and imitated, all of which featured a certain emphasis on realist technique and style. His early (begun in adolescence) and extensive background was as a newsreel cameraman and director.

In 1934 he created The March of Time (MOT) with Roy Larson of Time magazine (its first issue was February 1935) and remained its head until 1943. The MOT was a twenty-minute monthly news magazine of one to three stories. De Rochemont called it 'pictorial journalism', and it made use of interviews, newsreel footage, and recreations of actual events. In 1940 MOT released a feature-length compilation entitled The Ramparts We Watch, which summarized the European situation after the outbreak of World War II.

From 1943 to 1946 de Rochemont was a producer at Twentieth Century Fox (which was distributing The March of Time). His work included the feature-length Technicolor documentary The Fighting Lady (1944), about the final phase of the war in the Pacific (the title refers to an aircraft carrier, the Yorktown in this case). It was directed by famed still photographer Edward Steichen and narrated by movie star Robert Taylor, both then in the Navy (de Rochemont had himself been a naval officer from 1917 to 1923).

At Fox he began production of semi-documentary features based on actuality: The House on 92nd Street (1945) was about the FBI exposure of a German espionage ring; 13 Rue Madeleine (1947) focused on the training and a mission of Office of Strategic Services (OSS) agents during the war; and Boomerang! (1947) was based on events in the life of Homer Cummings, who became Attorney General under Franklin Roosevelt. Although these films do not otherwise seem to have much in common with the British wartime semi-documentaries, they share the same characteristic documentary concentration on how things are done. Most pointedly, they use a voice of time-style narration over their openings and subsequently to provide explanations and transitions, and to imply their authenticity.

After leaving Fox in 1948, he established Louis de Rochemont Associates. This firm continued to make occasional semi-documentary theatrical features (Lost Boundaries, 1949; The Whistle at Eaton Falls, 1951), sponsored films for advertising and public relations use, and classroom films. His major educational project was The Earth and its Peoples series of thirty-six films, each about twenty minutes long, containing such titles as Eskimo Hunters, Highlands of the Andes, Horsemen of the Pampas, Farmers of India, and On Mediterranean Shores.

As far as documentary film is concerned, de Rochemont remains a peripheral, if highly influential, producer. The March of Time set off a succession of similar series. John Grierson and members of his group were involved with it in England and New York, and Grierson carried its conception with him to Canada as the model for the National Film Board's The World in Action series. In the United States there were several imitative competing series including Pathé News and Paramount News. The influence of The March of Time, and perhaps most especially the compilation feature coming out of it, The Ramparts We Watch, is very evident in the US Armed Forces Why We Fight series supervised by Frank Capra. MOT influence even carried over recognizably into television in the Murrow/Friendly See It Now (1951–8), and 60 Minutes (1968–). De Rochemont's semi-documentaries established precedents for subsequent theatrical features based on fact, including The China Syndrome (1979), about the possible meltdown of a nuclear reactor, and Missing (1982), about the disappearance and death of an American writer in Chile.

However, de Rochemont, while never exactly part of the Hollywood filmmaking community, was not at home among the documentarians working in New York City and Washington, DC. He is best categorized as on the edge of the theatrical film industry, with his early experience in newsreels a central influence.

JACK C. ELLIS

See also: March of Time, The

Biography

Born in Chelsea, Massachusetts, January 13, 1899. Attended Massachusetts Institute of Technology; Naval Aviation School; Harvard Naval Cadet School. Served in British Military Intelligence 1916–17. Officer in United States Navy 1917–23. Cameraman for International, and for Pathé News; director of short film program, Twentieth Century Fox (Adventures of a Newsreel Cameraman and Magic Carpets of Movietone series) 1923–9. Created, with Roy E. Larson, The March of Time series 1934. Creative head of The March of Time 1935–51. Producer, Twentieth Century Fox 1943–6. Founded Louis de Rochemont Associates 1948. Produced The Earth and its Peoples educational series, and films in Cinerama and other wide-screen processes. Received Special Academy Award for The March of Time 1936. Died December 23, 1978.

Further reading

- Fielding, Raymond, The March of Time: 1935–51, New York: Oxford University Press, 1978.
Lafferty, William, 'de Rochemont, Louis', in International Dictionary of Films and Filmmakers, Detroit: St James Press, 1993: vol. 4, 211–13.

Rodríguez, Marta and Jorge Silva

The Colombian team of Marta Rodríguez and Jorge Silva began to make their mark with their first film together, the remarkable Chircales/Brickworkers, a portrait of a family of workers in the brickyards on the outskirts of Bogotá. The film was completed in 1972 after five years of work. It was immediately recognised internationally for its originality and beauty as a quite exceptional fusion of politics, visual poetry, and ethnographic documentary.

Marta Rodríguez came to documentary through sociology and anthropology; Jorge Silva, the cinematographer of the pair, through journalism, photography, and the film club movement. Their collaboration, which ended in 1987 with Silva's early death, was a harmonious union in which the two were entirely complementary. It also conjoined the lyricism of Silva's camerawork with the new radical sociology associated with Camilo Torres, and the new thinking about visual anthropology of Jean Rouch, with both of whom Rodríguez studied in Bogotá and Paris, respectively. As she explained in a 1974 interview, 'When you combine the social sciences with a mass medium like film, you are challenging the uses to which both are put by the privileged class while simultaneously putting them at the service of the working class. In contrast to the kind of hermetic treatise that only five initiates can read, this is a way to use anthropology or sociology so that the working class can put it to use analyzing their particular situation.'

This approach explains the time they took to make Chircales and subsequent films. The methodology required extensive periods of field work, using stills photography and tape recordings, then the elaboration of a script, followed by filming and then editing, all the while allowing time for the subjects of the film to participate in the process at each stage. The result is to draw the discourse of documentary into the subjects' own subjectivity without losing a sociopolitical perspective. In thus uncovering the whys and wherefores of everyday life among the most marginalised victims of social 'progress' in the Third World, their work also exemplified the aims of the new documentary then emerging across Latin America.

Planas, testimonio de un etnocidio/Planas: Testimony About Ethnocide (1970) was made rather more rapidly, while Chircales was still being completed. This is a denunciatory film that documents the genocide of the Guajibo people of the Amazon region and explores the economic and social causes of the slaughter. Then in 1976 they completed Campesinos/Peasants, which turns to questions of popular memory, reconstructing the peasant struggles for land of the 1930s through the recollection of the older generation. For the next five years they worked with an indigenous group in the region of Cauca on Nuestra Voz de Tierra, Memoria y Futuro/Our Voice of Land, Memory and Future (1981), which takes the discourse of documentary further into the interior spaces of social identity and ideology. In telling the story of the creation of the Regional Indigenous Council of Cauca (CRIC), the film uses enactment to visualise an old legend about a landowner who makes a pact with the devil to rob the peasants of their land and labour. However, this is a long way from the docudrama conventions of British or American television, both in style and intent. Here, the social subjectivity of myth and legend is seen as a living metaphor of exploitation, the symbolic expression of the process of extraction of surplus value.

Before Nuestra Voz ... was completed, they again interrupted their work to make another film of denunciation, La voz de los sobrevivientes/The Voice of the Survivors (1980), made at the request of the CRIC to condemn the assassination of a number of peasant leaders. Then followed Amor, Mujeres y Flores/Love, Women and Flowers (completed 1989 by Rodríguez after Silva's death), an investigation of the Colombian flower industry—the country's second largest export industry at the time—and its use of pesticides, made by companies like Bayer, which are banned at home but freely exported to the Third World. There they are used, as in this case, to produce perishable consumer goods that are whisked back to Europe to be sold, leaving the women who sort the flowers with damaged health, and their children born with genetic defects. A multilayered film told from the point of view of the men and particularly women who work within it, the film unfolds a graceful metaphor that brings women and flowers together, intertwining the process of production with the cycle of life and death—the life and death of the flowers against the life and death of the workers. The film refrains from explicit denunciation of responsibility, but critics at home, when it was shown on television, worried that it would damage Colombian flower sales abroad, while one of its foreign funders, the US Interamerican Foundation, was so upset that they took their name off the credits.

After Silva's death, Rodríguez made one more documentary on film, Nacer de nuevo/Born Again (1987), a reflection on death, solitude, and love told by two aged survivors of the eruption of the Nevado del Ruiz, before she turned to video, working with indigenous groups in workshops she helped to set up in 1992, which have joined the indigenous video movement that began in Brazil and has subsequently spread through the countries of the Andes.

Biography

Marta Rodríguez. Born 1938 in Bogotá, Colombia.

Jorge Silva. Born 1941. Died 1988.

Selected films

- 1971 Planas: testimonio de un etnocidio: codirectors
- 1972 Chircales: codirectors
- 1975 Campesinos: codirectors
- 1980 La voz de los sobrevivientes: codirectors
- 1981 Nuestra voz de tierra: memoria y futuro: codirectors
- 1987 Nacer de Nuevo: Marta Rodríguez, director
- 1988 Amor, mujeres y flores: codirectors
- 1992 Memoria vida: Marta Rodríguez, director

Further reading

Burton, Julianne (ed.), Cinema and Social Change in Latin America: Conversations with Filmmakers, Austin, TX: University of Texas Press, 1986.

Paranagua, Paulo Antonio (ed.), Cine Documental en America Latina, Madrid: Editorial Cátedra, 2003 (also Jump Cut No.38).

Roger & Me

(US, Moore, 1989)

Roger & Me was the debut film of radical journalist Michael Moore and an immediate critical and, rare for a nonfiction film, commercial success. It has attracted endless criticism for its formal inventiveness and complex rhetoric, and an equal measure of controversy regarding the filmmaker's supposed violation of the documentary code of ethics. The result, according to one critic, is 'an extraordinary film which is likely to be regarded as a major landmark in contemporary documentary' (Corner 1996: 156).

The film traces the industrial decline of Flint, Michigan, the 'company town' of General Motors (GM) and home to Michael Moore. The filmmaker sets off in search of Roger Smith, GM chairman, to confront him about the factory closures and the plight of the town in the 1980s. Moore draws on a panoply of interactive and reflexive techniques to construct his film: home movies, promotional videos, news sources and interviews combine to produce a hilarious but telling critique of the postindustrial corporate system and the shallowness of public discourses in dealing with the consequences of industrial change.

The production cost of about $160,000 was paid for by Moore, donations, product placement, and various fundraising events. It played to enthusiastic screenings at film festivals and, in one of the saga's many ironies, was acquired for distribution for an unprecedented $3 million by the world's then largest media corporation, Time-Warner. Initially, influential critics like Roger Ebert and Vincent Canby praised the film highly, but accusations of bad practice surfaced in a published interview with Moore in Film Comment, which doubted the validity of the film's depicted chronology; Pauline Kael endorsed this view at the New Yorker and furthermore questioned the derogatory treatment of some of the respondents in the film and its presumed moral superiority. Some radicals were put off by the film's whimsicality. Many were quick to defend the filmmaker, however, and a wide-ranging debate now surrounds Roger & Me, Moore's populism, and his unconventional style and legacy.

Juxtaposition and contrast are the principal characteristics of the film. These are evident in the fundamental opposition of Moore's personal, biographical and hence subjective placement in the text, and his objective responsibility as an investigative journalist in exposing the 'truth' about economic and social conditions in Flint. Moore brilliantly extends this approach to his film style. The local officials' pathetic attempts to talk up the virtues of the town and develop its tourism are stood against a seemingly endless series of evictions of families from their homes. While the wealthy and secure, at their garden parties and golf clubs, harp on about opportunities that await those with the right positive attitude, we meet laid-off workers queuing to sell their blood for a few dollars or forlornly shooting hoop at the local mental health clinic. The callousness of the 'better classes' is further exposed in their thoughtless enjoyment of an opening-night party at a newly commissioned jail, which Moore revisits when it is full of disillusioned and criminalized former car-workers, presided over by former colleagues now forced to work for a much lower hourly rate. The film culminates in a masterly intercut sequence between Roger

Figure 16 Roger & Me, Michael Moore, with Rhonda Britton (Flints Bunny Lady) and Fred Ross (Repo Man) in front of a Buick ad, 1989 (Courtesy of the Everett Collection)

Smith delivering his annual Christmas message to GM workers and stockholders, and the eviction in the snow of a poor black family. While Smith mouths his platitudes, a little child looks on in dismay as the sheriff's men dump Christmas presents on the sidewalk. Throughout, Moore retains a keen eye for the quirky and bizarre: the self-styled Captain Dada, come to rescue Flint in its hour of need, is summarily shot by a nervous police force; the inability of U-Haul to keep any trucks in Flint due to the exodus of people out of the luckless town; and the sudden blackening of a Nightline broadcast on the factory closures following the theft of the OB truck by a disgruntled local citizen.

It is widely assumed that the backlash of negative criticism cost Roger & Me the Oscar for Best Documentary. GM was quick to circulate copies of Kael's scathing review. Moore's manipulations of chronological sequence to heighten thematic and narrative effect seriously undermined the integrity of the film for some, but for supporters these are mere trifles when compared to the larger issues of unemployment, poverty and the abuse of corporate responsibility. After all, no one can dispute the fact of the plant closures and their effects. Adopting this line, Miles Orvell argues that Moore sacrifices historical accuracy for satiric fiction and ‘what Moore delivers is not the “straight” truth of documentary but the oblique truth of satire’ (Orvell 1994–5). From such a position, the film’s radical credentials are not undermined.

The film grossed $7 million on its initial North American run, and was followed up in 1992 with the short Pets or Meat, which updated the story of the earlier film’s leading characters, Deputy Fred and the Bunny Lady. Moore has continued to produce popular, commercial, and controversial documentaries, notably with Bowling for Columbine (2002) and Fahrenheit 9/11 (2004); the latter is likely to become the most successful documentary film of all time.

ALAN BURTON

See also: Moore, Michael

Further reading

- Corner, John, The Art of Record. A Critical Introduction to Documentary, Manchester: Manchester University Press, 1996.
- Jacobson, Harlan, ‘Michael and Me’, Film Comment, November–December, 1989: 16–26.
- Orvell, Miles, ‘Documentary Film and the Power of Interrogation. American Dream & Roger and Me’, Film Quarterly, winter, 1994–5: 10–18.
- Pierson, John, Spike, Mike, Slackers and Dykes. A Guided Tour across a Decade of Independent American Cinema, London: Faber & Faber, 1996.

Rogosin, Lionel

Lionel Rogosin, the controversial director initially recognized by the free cinema movement in the mid-1950s, rejected traditional documentary style and technique. Rogosin emphasized a focused and personal approach toward storytelling. With postwar optimism competing against Cold War paranoia, Rogosin directed his attention to the individual problems that existed against such a politicocultural backdrop.

By the time Rogosin had entered the film world, the development of lightweight equipment, coupled with the advent of magnetic sound tape, allowed the cameraman and film director more freedom of mobility. Suddenly filmmakers were able to easily venture forth, into a variety of environments. Rogosin used this new technology on his first film, On the Bowery (1957), which focused on the inhabitants of New York’s skid row. Rogosin took his camera to the streets where the homeless congregated, capturing the uninterrupted daily exchanges of those living the life of the downtrodden. The images captured in these shots are not only indicative of his work in general, but more often prove to be the key aspect of his work’s influence on subsequent filmmakers and critics.

In his work, the long take is valued for its expansive and atmospheric qualities, rather than as an instrument of pure voyeurism. The direct cinema movement argued that such emphasis on capturing life from a ‘fly-on-the-wall’ perspective was key to the entire documentary enterprise. Many, however, considered this a controversial stance, and questioned whether the camera was picking up life uninterrupted, or was inherently interpreting what was recorded, from the perspective of the director’s point of view.

Rogosin often presented his documentary films as the temporal progression of a loosely scripted narrative. Rather than writing a lengthy script and then contracting actors to portray the characters, however, Rogosin and his crew found real individuals who embodied the characters of his vision.

There are elements of compassion in the mise-en-scène of Rogosin’s work, which at times elevate his films beyond others of the time. Part of this can be attributed to Rogosin’s ability to never fully align himself with just one theoretical approach—he was influenced by Robert Flaherty, as well as John Grierson and others. On the Bowery was recognized for its honest portrayal of the gritty underside of human existence, while maintaining an aversion to melodrama. As significant as his films are, however, they were also criticized for the elements of staging that occurred, a controversial aesthetic that would follow throughout Rogosin’s career, but one that Rogosin himself defended as necessary.

Rogosin’s next film, Come Back, Africa (1960), was received with mixed reviews. It was as if to review the film one had to acknowledge it as two separate films in one. Many seemed to recognize the emotional power of the documentary segments, especially given the difficulty Rogosin faced in obtaining the footage.

At the time of filming, government control forbade depictions of apartheid, and Rogosin's crew obtained visas to film in South Africa only under the false guise of an innocuous musical about mine workers. As bogus dailies of the musical were given to the government for approval, the real documentary footage of widespread repression and poverty was smuggled out of the country in suitcase lining.

As important a feat as it was for Rogosin to make Come Back, Africa, and as powerful as the clandestine footage was, those are only some aspects of the film, not the complete work. As with many of his films, the dialogue sequences proved confusing and left many to ponder the value of their inclusion in the film, and to question Rogosin's decision to include such staged material in what was otherwise a well-constructed documentary. In one particular sequence there is a fifteen-minute roundtable discussion, half improvisational, half scripted, that is broken up only by a musical number from Miriam Makeba. A dialogue sequence of this length would seem somewhat excessive in most pictures, and to many reviewers it appeared especially so with such amateur actors. Rogosin always stuck by the merits of his nonactors and continued to use them in similar socially conscious films for the next two decades.

Rogosin's theories on the documentary were often as controversial as his films. He seemed to support the use of nonfiction almost as a scientific base to help project his interpretations into the mind of the viewer, to create an alternate reality for that viewer. When one takes into account his background in chemical engineering it seems to make sense, if one considers the friction he created by juxtaposing raw realist footage diegetic narratives, for example.

DINO EVERETT

See also: On the Bowery

Biography

Born the son of a wealthy industrialist in New York City, January 22, 1924. Studied chemistry at Yale University before leaving to serve as an engineer during World War II on a US Navy minesweeper. After the war, returned to school and graduated from Yale with a degree in chemical engineering before turning his focus toward film in his early thirties. Hired by the United Nations to direct a public information film in 1956. In 1958 won the grand prize for a documentary from the Venice Film Festival, a British Film Academy award, and was nominated for an Oscar for his first independently produced feature, On the Bowery (1957). In 1960–74 was owner of the Bleeker Street Cinema in Greenwich Village, an important venue for independent films. In 1966, along with Shirley Clarke and Jonas Mekas, was one of the founding partners in the Film-Maker's Distribution Center, a nonprofit releasing venture that sought to spread the films of the avant-garde. Continued to make socially conscious films throughout the late 1960s and 1970s while lecturing on college campuses. Father of producer/director Daniel Rogosin. Died of a heart attack on December 8, 2000, in Los Angeles.

Selected films

- 1956 Out: cinematographer
- 1957 On the Bowery (Sufirin): producer, codirector, cinematographer, cowriter
- 1960 Come Back, Africa (aka An African Story): director, cowriter
- 1966 Good Times, Wonderful Times: director
- 1972 Black Fantasy: director
- 1973 Woodcutters of the Deep South: director

Further reading

- Davis, Peter, 'Rogosin and Documentary', Film Culture 24, spring 1962: 25–8.
- Dickinson, Thorold, 'A Note on Out', Sight and Sound, spring 1957: 174.
- Hey, Kenneth R., 'Come Back Africa (1959): Another Look', Film & History X, no. 3, September 1980: 61–6.
- James, David E., To Free the Cinema, Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1992.
- Rogosin, Lionel, 'Interpreting Reality (Notes on the Esthetics and Practices of Improvisational Acting)', Film Culture 21, summer 1960: 20–8.
- Sufirin, Mark, 'Filming A Skid Row', Sight and Sound, winter 1955–6: 133–9.

Romania

Only five months after its world premiere in Paris, the cinematograph arrived in Bucharest (Romania), on May 27, 1896, brought along by a team of the Lumière Company, led by Edwin Schurmann. The first projections took place inside the building of the French-language newspaper, L'Indépendance roumaine, which had been printed in Bucharest since 1876. Schurmann's team showed a number of early cinéma vérité productions including: A Dinner-Party, Cycling Lessons, The Conservatory, Parishioners Leaving the Church, Breakfast Picnic, Place de l'Opéra, The Buffet, as well as the legendary Arrival of a Train in the Ciotat Station.

The first film made in Romania was a newsreel recording of the Royal Parade in Bucharest on May 10, 1897, shot by the Lumière cameraman Paul Menu (1876–1973). Within two months, sixteen other similar newsreels on various topics followed: The Moshilor Fair, The Hippodrome and the Races at Baneasa, The Terrace of the Capşa Café, The Flood in Galatzi, The Training of Terrestrial Marines, The Ships of the Danube Fleet, and others. Paul Menu became known as a Romanian filmmaker during his stay in the country. His camera was later bought by Dr Gheorghe Marinescu (1863–1938), who used it for his research in neurology, and who eventually completed the first scientific film in the world (Walking Disturbances of the Physical Paresis, 1898), together with the Romanian cameraman, Constantin M. Popescu. The same year, Professor M. Benko introduced audiences from Transylvania to the cinematograph, at a time when the region was still part of the Austro-Hungarian Empire. This accounts for the independent manner in which the cinematographic industry developed across the Romanian territory during the first two decades of its existence (that is, before Transylvania joined the other two provinces, Moldavia and Valachia, in 1918). One of the important figures of this early period was the Hungarian-born filmmaker Eugen (Jeno) Janovics, who made several documentaries about Romania (for production companies based in Cluj), before contributing to some of the first Hungarian fiction films (such as A sarga csiko, 1913), as coproducer alongside Pathé.

The first photographers (turned filmmakers) born in the Balkan region, however, were the Romanian-Macedonian brothers Ienake Manaki (1878–1954) and Miltiade Manaki (1882–1964), who captured still images of a popular uprising in 1903 for the Romanian newspaper Universul. Before them, the Romanian painter Carol Poppe de Szathmary (1812–88), became the world's first war correspondent, taking photographs of the Crimean War in the 1850s. The Manaki brothers successfully exhibited their work at the 1906 International Exhibition in Bucharest, where they saw the cinematographic camera for the first time. The two bought a Bioscope 300 camera from the Charles Urban & Co. firm during a trip that took them from Paris to London, owing to a grant from King Karol I. During the same year they made a documentary film, Household Traditions of the Romanian-Macedonian Women from Pind, soon followed by several other productions showing popular dances, religious rituals, weddings, and funerals of the same region, which can be considered among the first, if not the first ever, ethnographic films in the world. The Manaki brothers also pioneered the longer newsreel film by recording the visits of Sultan Mehmed Rashid V to Salonika and Bitola in 1911. Less than two decades later, in 1928, Professor Dimitrie Gusti and his team of trained sociologists started making the first sociological documentaries: Romanian Folkloric Traditions (1928, directed by Mihail Vulpescu), Draguş—Life in a Romanian Village (1929, directed by Paul Sterian, Nicolae Argintescu-Amza), A Village in Bessarabia—Cornova (1931, directed by Henri Stahl, Anton Golopenția), and Traditions from Bucovina (1937, directed by Henri Stahl, Constantin Brailoiu).

As in most other countries, the documentary as a genre predated fiction films in Romania. The earliest Romanian feature production (Amor Fatal) dates from 1911, shortly followed by the first historical production, The Independence of Romania, in 1912. During World War I the Romanian government was relocated to Iaşi (in Northern Moldavia), where the Cinematographic Service of the Romanian Army came into existence in December 1916. It was one of the earliest state-run production companies in the world that specialised in documentary films. A number of cameramen, such as Constantin Ivanovici, Tudor Posmantir, Georges Ercole, and Nicolae Barbelian, started their careers in this company, making newsreel films during the war. The Cinematographic Service was endowed with its own studio in 1937, a year before the company became independent. A constant production of newsreels on Romanian and foreign current affairs marked the activity of the newly founded National Office for Cinematography during the 1930s. Other topics dealt with in existing newsreels of the period include cultural and sports events, natural disasters, religious services, demonstrations, as well as installments of the serialised documentary, Get to Know Your Country (which presented picturesque places in Romania).

During World War II several Romanian documentaries were awarded prizes at the Venice Film Festival: The Motzilor County (1939, directed by Paul Calinescu, with a commentary by the novelist Mihail Sadoveanu), which disclosed the survival of traditions dating back to the Middle Ages in a remote mountainous community; Romania and the Fight against Bolshevism (1941, directed by Paul Calinescu), a film based on newsreel recordings from the Eastern Front; and We (1942, directed by Ion Cantacuzino), which presented an outline of Romanian history.

The first dedicated studio for documentary films, Sahia, was founded in 1949. At its height the studio reached a maximum turnaround of one hundred films per year. As in the case of other Eastern Europe communist countries, a proportion of these productions represented commissioned propaganda, touristic, or scientific films, but a significant number of documentaries have maintained their interest despite the passage of time. The wave of postwar documentary filmmakers in Romania gained international recognition during the 1960s and 1970s, when an important corpus of films was produced. Mirel Ilieșu won the Palme d'Or at Cannes in 1969 with The Renaissance Songs, a film about the Romanian choir, Madrigal. In 1962 Dumitru Done and Sergiu Nicolaescu codirected Ordinary Spring, which was awarded the First Prize at the International Documentary Film Festival in Prague. The following year Sergiu Nicolaescu completed The Memory of the Rose, a short film that used spectacular slow-motion photography and soundtrack as part of a metaphorical reflection on the transitory nature of beauty, confronted with the violence of barbed wire and machine guns. After winning the Grand Prize at Edinburgh and getting into the official selection at Cannes in 1963, The Memory of the Rose was awarded the Silver Medal at Trieste (1965). The same year, Eric Nussbaum's art documentary Ciucurencu won a prize at the Film Festival in Venice. Dona Barta's Ephemerae (1968), which provided a refined visual meditation on the short-lived existence of insects, won a medal at the Buenos Aires Film Festival. The evolution of the scientific documentary genre in Romania, starting with Dr Gheorghe Marinescu's early experiments with Marey's chronophotographic camera at the Salpêtrière Hospital in 1889, was marked by the activity of a number of exceptional filmmakers during the 1960s and 1970s, such as Dona Barta (The Quiet Swamp, 1967; The Silk Moth, 1975; Diatoms, the Jewels of Nature, 1976), Mircea Popescu (The 14th Element, Silicon, 1969), and Ion Bostan (Under the Eagle's Wing, 1964; The Flooded Forest, 1973; Impressions from the Delta, 1978). One of the founding fathers of the Romanian documentary and the author of an impressive filmography, Ion Bostan remains associated with an exceptional series of documentaries on the Danube Delta, The Sanctuary of Nature, which collected thirteen episodes, spanning several years of shooting and totalling one hundred and sixty-nine minutes of screening time. His outstanding achievement was matched only by Titus Meszaros's Reeds (1966), a memorable feature-length documentary on the harsh life of manual workers in the Danube Delta. It is significant that Ion Bostan's earlier productions included equally compelling explorations of the art world: The Painter Nicolae Grigorescu (1955), The Slaying of the Infants (1957), and Bach—El Greco (1970).

Many filmmakers turned to ethnographic and natural life documentaries during the 1960s and 1970s in an attempt to escape censorship and the increasing ideological pressure of the Communist government. Slavomir Popovici, who started off as a remarkable analyst of social phenomena (The Factory, 1964; Harsh Romances, 1966), later adopted less controversial topics, relating either to artistic creation or ethnography (The Black Sun, 1968; The Chronicle of Hrib, 1974). Among those who chose to pursue their career in exile, Paul Barbaneagra, came to prominence in the early 1960s, with films such as The Conductor (1964), and then settled in Paris, where his visual essays on art achieved wider recognition (for example, Sacred Architecture and Geography, Mircea Eliade and the Re-discovery of the Sacred), earning him a mention in Georges Sadoul's History of World Cinema from its Origins to the Present. Conversely, Nina Behar's outstanding art documentaries were quickly forgotten after the author left Romania for Israel, then France, in the 1970s. Two decades passed before her work was rediscovered and celebrated alongside that of major filmmakers such as Alain Resnais, at the Biennale internationale du film d'art in Paris, in 1996. Nina Behar's early experiments, such as Luchian, 1958; An Artist Accuses the World, 1964; Monumental Art, 1966; The Painter's Hands, 1967; Looking at a Painting, 1972; and Patraşcu, 1973, can still be said to provide some of the finest examples of the rapidly evolving montage and mise-en-scène techniques during the 1960s and 1970s.

The ethnographic documentary genre was given a new impetus at the time by directors who either endeavoured to perfect the art of the cinematographic poem (such as in Paula Popescu Doreanu's work: Head Ornaments, 1967; Caluşarii, 1968; The Nieces' Celebration, 1973), or strove to emphasise the scientific aspect of the commentary (for example, Ion Bostan's productions of the 1950s, such as The Song of the Olt River, which foreshadowed his landmark series of films on the Danube Delta, The Sanctuary of Nature). In a slightly different vein, Iancu Moscu's The Eternal Feminine (1970) won a prestigious prize at the Film Festival in Melbourne, although the author was mostly known in his own country for propaganda works commissioned by the Communist government (for example, Romania, a Country without Arms, and Romania—Songs of Praise). The output of several other talented documentary filmmakers displayed a similar tension between their aesthetic explorations (for example, Ioniţa Octav's Rhythms, 1972), and their commissioned works (for example, Octav's Romania, My Country, 1972; Romania Today, 1974; and Sweet Romania, 1975).

In the area of the cinéma vérité productions, Florica Holban, the first camerawoman at Sahia, directed a number of compelling 'cinematic reports' or newsreel documentaries on daily life: Whose Fault Is It? (1965), which dealt with the situation in Romanian orphanages, and included children's testimonies; Children, Yet Again (1966); Where Can We Play? (1968), and others. Along the same lines, Alexandru Boiangiu's films captured social and psychological aspects of the interaction between individuals and the communities in which they live: Our Beautiful House (1963), which disclosed the contradictions between a GP's professional discourse on hygiene and her lifestyle, and Mr D's Case (1966), an analysis of the situation of old people in residential care.

At the beginning of the 1970s one film in particular seemed destined to become the manifesto of a new generation of documentary filmmakers. Water Like a Black Buffalo (1971) recounted the devastating effects of large-scale flooding in Romania, as well as the fight for survival and rescue operations that took place in remote areas of the country. Seven young directors took part in the filming and contributed to its unique blend of poetic images and objective presentation of events: Dan Piţa, Mircea Veroiu, Petre Bokor, Iosif Demian, Stere Gulea, Dinu Tanase, and Andrei Catalin Baleanu. Even if none of the major documentary authors who emerged later in the 1970s (that is, Constantin Vaeni, Nicolae Cabel, Ada Pistiner, and Felicia Cernaianu) were involved in this film, Water Like a Black Buffalo had an undeniable impact on the work of celebrated fiction filmmakers such as Dan Piţa (Philip the Good, 1974), or Stere Gulea (The Green Grass from Home, 1977), while continuing to inform the stylistic and thematic concerns of the documentary directors during the 1980s. Ada Pistiner's films (for example, And One ..., 1978; A Team of Young People and the Others, 1976; A Community Arts Centre, 1977) can be said to represent the pinnacle of documentary production during the 1970s. Nevertheless, a number of Constantin Vaeni's social studies, in particular And Then the City was Born (1972), which displays strong similarities with Water Like a Black Buffalo, also marked a decisive departure from the restrictive ideological framework of the time and managed to provide, alongside Nicoale Cabel's similar explorations into a poetics of visual language (The Earth Like a Beautiful Gift, 1979; George Bacovia, Tomorrow's Poem, 1983; and The Morning Horses, 1986), the trademark for the most recent stylistic experimentation at the borderline between documentary and fiction films.

During the 1980s a more introspective approach came to the fore, although many young directors also started to privilege the narrative and dramatic potential of the social reality they observed. A significant number of documentaries focused on their protagonists' feelings, or on their reactions to an idea or to a given situation: the wish-fulfilment reasoning of children in Tereza Barta's witty and light-hearted If I Were a Fairy (1980); the feeling of solitude of an international competition athlete in Ovidiu Bose Paştina's And as for Emotion: A Crystal (1987); the unhappiness of construction workers in Sabina Pop's What's a Builder's Life Like, Ion² (1983); the isolation of displaced workers from rural communities in Adrian Sârbu's I'm in Good Health and Doing Well (1982); the anxieties of waiting and the nature of hope in Ioana Holban's If There Was No Love (1983), and Copel Moscu's Evening Classes (1982). Among the more recent productions of the same generation, Sabina Pop's prize-winning Panc (1990), which won important distinctions in Oberhausen, Bordeaux, Zlatibor, Uppsala, and Kaliningrad, followed the tribulations of an amateur theatre group from a deprived, remote village in Romania where the passion for artistic expression manages to transform people's lives.

The popular uprising that toppled the communist government in December 1989 inspired a number of documentaries, starting with the well-known Free Diary/The Romanian Revolution of 1989 (1990), to which a great number of filmmakers contributed: Adrian Sârbu, Sabina Pop, Horia Bolboceanu, Tiberiu Lazar, Ovidiu Miculescu, Cornel Mihalache, Catalina Fernoaga, Anita Gârbea, Doru Spataru, and others. The same intention of capturing the overwhelming emotional charge of the moment, while nevertheless providing an accurate account of events, guided Ovidiu Bose Paștina's directorial vision in Timișoara—December 1989 (1991). The stylistic unity of this film, and its perceptive comments on individual and collective responses to an unprecedented violent upheaval, earned the author a prize at Neubrandenburg and placed him among the twenty best documentary filmmakers to be included in the official selection at Tokyo in 1992. Two other documentary productions made intelligent use of reel-footage (captured on amateur or professional cameras) to reflect on the significance of recent political events: The Shortest Day, by Ștefan Gladin, retraced the presidential couple's movements during the last day before their capture in December 1989, while On Christmas Day We Had Our Share of Freedom (scripted and directed by two students in cinematography, Catalina Fernoaga and Cornel Mihalache) described the euphoria of the early postrevolution days. The film that had the greatest impact in Romania, however, was Stere Gulea's The University Square—Romania (1991), which at times adopted the style of a news report or live commentary of events.

A number of dedicated production companies and studios for documentary films opened after the demise of the communist regime in Romania: Editura Video, FAV (The Visual Arts Foundation), Astra Film Studio, and Video Dialog. This enabled young filmmakers, such as Sorin Ilieșiu, to complete an impressive number of political documentaries in the early 1990s (for example, The Monarchy Saves Romania, 1992; We'll Die and We'll Be Free, 1992; and Liberation, 1993). Another strand in recent years can be said to gather those who, like Viorel Branea, have a background in television and have started to investigate the long-term effects of social and economic neglect on certain categories of the population during the Communist era. As early as 1990, Viorel Branea's shattering documentaries, Apocalypse '90 and Our Working Class Goes to Heaven, disclosed the poverty, humiliation and large-scale ecological disaster in Copșa Mica and Valea Jiului, two of the most deprived mining regions of Romania. The director of the Astra Film Studio, based in Sibiu, Dumitru Budrala, authored, scripted, or produced an impressive number of documentaries, which renewed the tradition of ethnographic films in Romania: Transylvanian Winter (1996); On the Road (1998), which won the Silver Medal at the Kalamata International Festival in 2000, and was a finalist in the Cinéma du Réel competition in Paris, in 1999; Village of the Watermills (2001); Traditions in Festival (2002); and Zina, the Story of a Village in the Carpathians (2004).

Other filmmakers, such as Alexandru Solomon and Radu Igaszag, successfully pursued more formal explorations in the art documentary genre (for example, Duet for Paolincello and Petronome, 1994; Via Regis, 1995). In recent years Alexandru Solomon also directed a feature-length political documentary, The Great Communist Train Robbery (2004), which aired on BBC4. He had previously been awarded twice the prize for the best documentary in the Dakino Film Festival for The Man with a Thousand Eyes (2001) and A Dog's Life (1999). In 1993 he won the prize for the best experimental film at the 'Mediawave' Festival in Hungary for Shriek into the Ear-Drum (1993). The same year, Cornel Mihalache directed an equally memorable docudrama, entitled The Sculptor (1993), inspired by the life and work of the Romanian artist Constantin Brancusi.

The Visual Anthropology Foundation, which was set up in 1995 as a production company and nonprofit, nongovernmental organisation, runs a biennial documentary film festival (the Astra Film Festival). At its seventh festival, in 2004, it had already attracted large numbers of filmmakers, students, and scholars in visual anthropology from across Europe. Another noteworthy initiative concerns the activity of the Visual Arts Foundation, which teamed up with the Swiss Foundation for Culture, Pro-Helvetica, in 1999, and launched The Centre for Audiovisual Memory, with the aim of creating a multimedia archive based on ethnographic and cultural research into the Romanian rural civilisation. A CD-ROM encyclopedia of Romanian traditions is being developed as part of this collaborative project.

RAMONA FOTIADE

Further reading

- Cernat, Manuela, A Concise History of the Romanian Film, Bucharest: Editura Enciclopedica, 1983.
- Damian, Laurent, iu Damian, Filmul documentar. Despre documentar ... înca ceca în plus, Bucureşti: Editura Tehnica, 2003.
- Sadoul, Georges, Histoire du cinéma mondial des origines à nos jours, Paris: Flammarion, 1998.

Romm, Mikhail

After gaining prominence with his much-praised directorial debut, Boule de Suif (1934), Mikhail Romm continued to make films that were both narratively engaging and politically tendentious. His transposing of John Ford's The Lost Patrol to the Russian Civil War as The Thirteen (1936) is typical. These qualities are also present in Romm's first attempts to use nonfiction material: the historical dramas Lenin in October (1937) and Lenin in 1918 (1939). These are gross distortions of the historical facts of the Revolution and Civil War years whereby Trotsky is excised and Bukharin vilified. Lenin becomes an incarnation of perfect justice who all but appoints Stalin his successor.

Romm's first use of documentary film, Vladimir Il'ich Lenin (1949), articulates the same vision of history by combining documentary footage and genuine photographs with paintings incorrectly showing Stalin to have been Lenin's closest confidante from 1905 onwards and to have played a pivotal role in the Revolution. Moreover, despite the film's title, this chronologically constructed narrative reaches 1924, the year of Lenin's death, five reels from the end. As a result, over one-third of the film stresses Stalin's continuation of his cause through industrialisation, World War II, and postwar reconstruction.

Romm's next documentary project, Living Lenin (1958), was made after the death of Stalin had precipitated something of a conversion to a humanistic vision of socialism and seems to be an attempt to atone for the excesses of Vladimir Il'ich Lenin, in that it is entirely composed of authentic newsreel footage of Lenin shot during his lifetime. Yet where the voice-over in the earlier film at times possessed a polemical bite, Romm's concern in this film is solely to corroborate the authenticity of the material and consequently it lacks dynamism.

His next documentary project, Ordinary Fascism (1965), effectively combines a highly expressive voice-over spoken by Romm himself, with a concern for authenticity. It is his most celebrated work and along with his factional film about Soviet nuclear scientists, Nine Days of a Year (1961), one of the Russian films of the period that had the greatest impact. Romm's final documentary project, Yet I Still Believe (1975), about young people, was completed posthumously.

JEREMY HICKS

Biography

Born January 24, 1901 in Butyriatiia, Siberia. Served in the Red Army during Russian Civil War 1918–21. Completed Moscow Higher Institute of Art and Crafts in sculpture 1925. Worked as a screenwriter and assistant director from 1931. Directorial debut Boule de Suif (1934) won a prize at the Venice Film Festival after which made a series of highly commended films. Member of Communist Party from 1939, decorated with the People's Artist of the USSR 1950. From 1949 onwards taught at State Film Institute (VGIK), becoming a professor in 1958, where he taught Andrei Tarkovskii and numerous others. Became a liberal figurehead after his denunciation of Soviet anti-Semitism in 1962, for which he was publicly rebuked by Khrushchev in 1963. Died November 1, 1971.

Selected films

- 1949 Vladimir Il'ich Lenin: codirector
 1958 Zhivoi Lenin/Living Lenin: codirector
 1965 Obyknovennyi fashizm/Ordinary Fascism: co-author, director, voice-over 1975 I vse-taki ia veriu/Yet I Still Believe: co-author and director

Further reading

- Romm, Mikhail, Izbrannye proizvedeniia, 3 vols, Moscow: Iskusstvo, 1980–2.
 Woll, Josephine, Real Images: Soviet Cinema and the Thaw, London: I.B. Tauris, 2000.
 Zak, Mark, Mikhail Rommiego fil'my, Moscow: Iskusstvo, 1988.

Roos, Jørgen

Jørgen Roos, one of the most important Danish documentary filmmakers of the postwar period, combined work for different government agencies with experimental avant-garde films. His work is in some ways typical of the independent filmmakers in Scandinavia. Roos made many films, around one hundred documentaries, both films of information and more artistic films, and one of the characteristic features of his work is that he handles a broad spectrum of themes and genres.

Jørgen Roos started as a camera assistant in the Danish company Minerva Film in Copenhagen in 1939, and his first assignment was photographing the documentary filmmaker Theodor Christensen leaving for England to visit John Grierson. Roos has been categorized as a documentary filmmaker in the Griersonian tradition of social critique, information, and public enlightenment. His first films as a director, however, were the first experimental films in Denmark. Flugten/The Escape (1942), with the artist Albert Merz, and Spiste Horisonter/Eaten Horizons (1950) were among his early experimental films.

Roos worked as a photographer and editor for Theodor Christensen, and his first documentaries were influenced by Christensen and his work. Roos made many short films about cultural history and specialized in portraits of places, cities, and people. His En by ved navn København/A City Called Copenhagen (1960) was disliked by the municipal experts who commissioned the film and was shelved for two years, but was finally released to great acclaim. The success of this beautiful portrait of Denmark's capital resulted in assignments in other countries, but after Jørgen Roos zeigt Hamburg/Jørgen Roos Shows Hamburg (1962) and Oslo/Oslo (1963), he turned down all other offers to make films about cities.

Roos has made his mark on the genre of the portrait. Often he made portraits of artists, like Johannes V. Jensen—Grundtanken i mit forfatterskap/Johannes V. Jensen—The Core of My Authorship (1947), or Carl Th. Dreyer (1966), but he has also made portraits of inventors or explorers. His award-winning portrait of the Danish expert on Greenland, Knud Rasmussen, Knud (1966), is one of his best portraits, and with this film he also started a series of films on Greenland. He made travelogs and portraits of people from Greenland, as well as educational films on language and history. Mostly Roos has depicted modern life in Greenland, and often he has been critical of Denmark's treatment of the Greenlanders, but he has also shown national pride in Denmark's presence in Greenland. His many films about life in Greenland, like 17 minutter Grønland/17 Minutes on Greenland (1967), or Kaláliuvit? (Er du Grønlander?)/Kaláliuvit? (Are You from Greenland?) (1970), have been shown extensively in schools in Denmark, so Roos has heavily influenced several generations of Danes and contributed to their vision of Greenland.

Among his most famous films are his film-essays about bacon production, Den strømlinede Gris/The Streamlined Pig (1952), and noise, Støj/Noise (1965). In films like these Roos is a committed social critic, examining the dysfunctional aspects of modern society. These films inspired a new generation of Danish filmmakers in the late 1960s and early 1970s.

In addition to directing nearly one hundred documentaries, Roos worked as a photographer or editor on many films by other directors. He covered all sorts of issues and themes, from films about cultural history (Historien om et slot/History of a Castle, 1951), to depictions of an urban slum (Slum, 1952); from a film about the photographs made of the writer H.C. Andersen (Andersen hos fotografen/Andersen Visiting the Photographer, 1975), to a three-part film about the history of documentary filmmaking in Denmark (Den levende virkelighed/The Living Reality, 1989). He even made a feature fiction film, Seksdagesløpe/The Six-Day Race (1958).

Roos was regarded as one of the most important European documentary filmmakers, especially in the 1960s, and several of his films received awards at international film festivals. A City Called Copenhagen received second prize in Cannes in 1960, and was nominated for an Academy Award. His portrait of the explorer and expert on Greenland, Knud, received the Golden Bear at the Berlin Film Festival in 1966.

The documentaries made by Roos are characterized by a combination of warmth and sober detachment. His often ironic editing, with great emphasis on details and rhythm, marks him as a personal and committed filmmaker. He is perhaps the most important Danish documentary filmmaker, and his work has influenced many Scandinavian documentary filmmakers.

GUNNAR IVERSEN

See also: Scandinavia

Biography

Born in Gilleleje, Denmark, in 1922. Worked as camera assistant, and later cameraman and director for the company Minerva Film from 1939. Freelance photographer, editor, writer, and director. One of the founders of the Association Internationale des Documentaristes in 1964. Became a Fellow of the Royal Society of Arts in Denmark in 1965. Died in 1998 at the age of seventy-six.

Selected films

- 1942 Flugten/The Escape
- 1947 Johannes V. Jensen—Grundtanken i mit forfatterskap/Johannes V. Jensen—The Core of My Authorship
- 1950 Spiste Horisonter/Eaten Horizons
- 1951 Historien om et slot/History of a Castle
- 1952 Den strømlinede Gris/The Streamlined Pig
- 1952 Slum
- 1958 Seksdagesløpet/The Six-Day Race
- 1960 En by ved navn København/A City Called Copenhagen
- 1962 Jørgen Roos zeigt Hamburg/Jørgen Roos Shows Hamburg
- 1963 Oslo
- 1965 Støj/Noise
- 1966 Carl Th. Dreyer

- 1966 Knud
- 1967 17 minutter Grønland/17 Minutes on Greenland
- 1970 Kaláliuvit? (Er du Grønlænder?)/Kaláliuvit? (Are You from Greenland?)
- 1975 Andersen hos fotografen/Andersen Visiting the Photographer
- 1989 Den levende virkelighed/The Living Reality

Further reading

- Bang, Hans V. (ed.), Jørgen Roos—et liv som dokumentarist, Haderslev: Dok Film Akademiet & Det Danske Filminstitut/Videoværkstedet, 1998.
- Birkvad, Søren and Diesen, Jan Anders, Autentiske Indtryk, Oslo: Samlaget, 1994.

Rossif, Frédéric

Frédéric Rossif, the French director who began his career in the 1950s, was known primarily for his television work on such varied subjects as wildlife, luminaries of the entertainment world, and historical events. Rossif was responsible for several successful French television series, and his historical and political documentary films also met with acclaim. His compilation films were considered both creative and controversial. The combination of his World War II experiences (being of Jewish ancestry, he fled his home in Yugoslavia) with his residence in a postwar country gave his political films a strong, sometimes unsettling presence.

Rossif's documentary work generally displays a realist aesthetic and an observational approach. In television programs on wildlife, Rossif presented his subjects in natural environments, but often adjusted the temporal aspects to heighten the meaning. At times the speed and strength of an animal would be conveyed through quick editing, slow motion, or collision montage, similar to that used by Eisenstein. By using such techniques, Rossif developed a relationship that takes the viewer beyond the observational into a more psychological meditation on humankind's relation to animals.

Rossif's work was generally praised, but at times he was criticized for his extensive use of editing. At a time when the genre was moving away from the influential aesthetic of Vertov, Rossif rarely used the long take, which was gaining favor. In the case of a film such as Brel (1982), his homage to the Belgian-born singer, this contributed to the criticism. Throughout the film, which is rooted in Brel's live performances, Rossif is careful never to let the viewer become too absorbed in the performance of a song. Brel's song performances are broken up, and intercut with elements such as newsreel footage, historical events, and landscape scenes. Rossif collides the various images, runs the clips backwards, and toys with the composition to make some scenes almost unrecognizable. Thus the director plays with the passivity of the documentary viewer.

When focusing on historical topics, Rossif made compilation films similar to those of Vertov by assembling found footage from national archives; however, he enhanced the films through aesthetic manipulations, such as sound editing. In these films, he often addressed painful historical topics, forcing the viewer to confront difficult and unsettling events. These films met with praise and critical acclaim, most notably Mourir à Madrid/To Die in Madrid (1963). As a result, in 1967 Rossif's crew was the first Western film unit allowed to film extensively in the Soviet Union. Rossif was also given access to the Soviet film archives, with permission to reproduce any footage he wished. The resulting film, Revolution d'Octobre/October Revolution (1967), was composed from original footage shot by Rossif, as well as a great amount of archival footage, including segments from Vertov's Chelovek s Kinoapparatom/Man with the Movie Camera (1929).

Rossif was recognized primarily for his overtly political films; however, the bulk of his work was made for television. Ultimately, he contributed to more than three hundred programs. He made one fiction film, Aussi loin que l'amour/As Far as Love Can Go (1971), but it was unsuccessful, and he returned to the documentary genre.

Rossif's film career ended on the same subject it began: World War II. That conflict brought Rossif to France to begin his film career, so it seemed appropriate that his career conclude with an exposé of the atrocities of war criminals—the types of crimes that forced him to flee his homeland. Released posthumously, De Nuremberg à Nuremberg/From Nuremberg to Nuremberg (1989) uses a more traditional approach than much of his work. Nevertheless, it remains shocking and effective.

See also: Man with the Movie Camera; To Die in Madrid; Vertov, Dziga

Biography

Born in Centinje, Montenegro, Yugoslavia, August 14, 1922. Being of Jewish ancestry, fled Yugoslavia in 1941, stopping for a time in Athens, Greece, and then Katerni, avoiding the Germans, until finally arriving in France. Served in the French Foreign Legion until the end of World War II. After the war worked for many years as a draftsman for Renault and Citroën. Worked for the Cinémathèque Française in the 1950s. Directed his first programs for French TV, including Cinepanorama in 1956 and the news program Cinq Colonnes à la Une in 1959. Awarded the Prix Jean Vigo in 1963. Nominated for an Oscar in 1966. Won both the British Academy of Film and Television Arts (BAFTA) Flaherty Documentary Award and the Berlin International Film Festival Golden Bear in 1968. Began a twenty-year collaboration with the composer Vangelis in 1972. Continued to alternate between film and television work and appeared as an actor in a cameo role in Etienne Chateliez's 1990 feature Tatie Danielle. Died April 18, 1990 of a heart attack in Paris. His final film, the two-part De Nuremberg à Nuremberg, was released posthumously.

Selected films

- 1956 Cinepanorama (TV): director, producer
- 1959 Cinq Colonnes à la Une/Five Columns on the Front Page (TV): director
- 1961 Le Temps du Ghetto/The Witnesses: director, cowriter
- 1963 Mourir à Madrid/To Die in Madrid: director, writer
- 1963 Les Animaux/The Animals: director
- 1967 Revolution d'Octobre/October Revolution: director, writer
- 1970 Un mur à Jerusalem/A Wall in Jerusalem: director
- 1976 La Fête Sauvage/The Wilderness Party: director
- 1982 Brel: director, writer
- 1989 De Nuremberg à Nuremberg/From Nuremberg to Nuremberg: director

Further reading

- Chapsel, Madeleine, Mourir a Madrid, Film de Frederic Rossif, Paris: Seghers, 1963.
- Colombat, Andre, The Holocaust in French Film, Metuchen, NJ: Scarecrow Press, 1993.
- Landy, Marcia (ed.), The Historical Film: History and Memory in Media, New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 2001.
- Payne, Stanley G., The Spanish Civil War, the Soviet Union and Communism, New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2004.
- Rossif, Frédéric, Revolution d'octobre, Paris: Hachette, 1967.
- Rubenstein, Leonard, 'Facism Revisted', Film Society Review, February 6, 1971: 41–6.
- 'Facism Revisted', Film Society Review, December 4, 1970: 43–7.
- Vertov, Dziga, Kino-Eye: The Writings of Dziga Vertov, Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1995.

Rouch, Jean

Jean Rouch is a significant figure in ethnographic film, the stylistic development of cinéma vérité, and he inspired the young filmmakers of the nouvelle vague. His career spans more than fifty years and more than one hundred and twenty films. He is best known for his earlier documentary works, but he continued to make films until 2003. More than a documentary filmmaker, Rouch was an ethnographer and cinematic innovator and is often referred to as the Father of African Cinema. He is credited for coining the term cinéma vérité and for developing it with sociologist Edgar Morin. Rouch is responsible for elevating the use of the handheld camera style and natural lighting to a respectable position in the art of cinema. Proponents of the style and techniques of cinéma vérité argue that his stylistic developments allow filmmakers to capture reality.

Cinéma vérité is both a philosophy and a style of filmmaking. The fundamental concept of 'cinema truth' is explored, developed, and demonstrated in Rouch's many ethnographic films. His best-known documentary films are focused on the Songhay people and traditions of the West African state of Niger. Having first gone to Africa as a civil engineer in the early 1940s, Rouch was struck by African culture and belief. His drive to document and understand what he saw inspired him to film this region and its people over the course of many years. This pursuit to capture what he experienced on celluloid has become known as 'visual anthropology'. Yet in doing so, Rouch was careful not to oversimplify, dismiss, or evaluate in his films. His goal was to document and in that pursuit he invited his subjects to participate in the filmmaking process, thus making important strides in developing participatory ethnography. His techniques and cinematic experiments were not universally accepted, and he was criticized by some traditional ethnographers and academics. His movies are thematically centered on racism, cultural interaction, colonialism, the poor, migration of young Africans from traditional homelands to populated coastal cities, and materialism.

During the Nazi occupation of France, Rouch was active in the Resistance. In 1941, however, he left France for Niger where he could work as a civil engineer. He began his civil service career building a road in the isolated town of Niamey. During construction, Rouch became friends with Damoré Zike, a Nigerian road foreman. Zike introduced Rouch to the mysterious spirituality of the Songhay people and would aid him in the making of several films. Damoré's grandmother was a high priestess of the Naimey and initiated Rouch into the world of Songhay magic and possession. Rouch became fascinated by the surreal ceremonies that he attended. As ethnographer Paul Stoller (1992: 31) explains, 'Rouch had entered a truly surreal world ... At that moment Rouch may have realized that film was the best way to capture the dream he was living.' Rouch began documenting the ceremonies in ethnographic writing and photos that he sent to Marcel Griaule in Paris. Griaule introduced Rouch's work to the Institut Française d'Afrique Noire, which took an interest in Rouch. In the early 1940s Rouch presented his first paper on Africa via an IFAN seminar. In 1943 Rouch joined the Free French Army Corps of Engineers and was able to go back to Paris after it was liberated. There he once again returned to his studies with Griaule and held an entry-level position at the Institut Française d'Afrique Noire.

In 1946 Rouch returned to Africa with two French colleagues to travel the length of the Niger River in a dugout canoe. The trip was financed by stories the three wrote for Agence France Press (AFP) before and during the trip and by a financial gift from AFP once they were in Niger and in need of money. Rouch took a war surplus 16mm camera on the expedition and for nine months they traversed the river. Thus Rouch began his filmmaking career in 1947 with Au pays des mages noirs/In the Land of the Black Seers. The film recounts Rouch's trip down the Niger to the ocean. During the trip Rouch was asked to photograph a hippopotamus hunt by the local people. Because of an accident, Rouch was unable to use a tripod and decided to shoot the footage by holding the camera in his hand. Thus he adopted one of his most cherished techniques, the handheld camera. Most of the footage of the trip was stolen along with the bulk of the troupe's possessions, but the hippopotamus hunt and some of the other footage survived and comprises the documentary with the addition of added stock footage. In 1949 Rouch received the Grand Prix du Documentaire at the Biarritz Film Festival organized by Henri Langlois, the founder of the Cinémathèque Française. Rouch was awarded the top prize for his films La Circoncision/The Circumcision (1948–9), and Initiation à la danse des possédés/Initiation to the Dance of the Possessed (1948–9). Both these films and Les magiciens de Wanzerbe/The Magician's of Wanzerbe were shot from 1947–8, when Rouch returned to Niger to complete his ethnographic field work for his thesis. As Stoller (1992: 6) explains, 'the bulk of Rouch's work [...] concentrates on Songhay possession. There are cinematic interviews with possession priests [...] and a score of short films on Songhay yenaandi ceremonies, the possession rites during which spirits are asked to bring rain.'

Les magiciens de Wanzerbe is one of Rouch's less-seen works. It is a portrait of the priests' incantations, medicinal plants, and magician's dance, and this short film introduces the audience to the wizards of Wanzerbe and their rituals. Perhaps the most important aspect of the film is the magician's dance during a purification ceremony. The magician dances for hours and is joined by his son. Both seem to be in trances. At one point he jolts and vomits a magic chain, which hangs from the end of his tongue and is then swallowed again and he will continue to carry the enchanted power chain until he dies. The film also contains footage of the annual ceremony in which a cow is sacrificed and butchered to ensure a healthy and bountiful year. The film provoked critics to accuse Rouch of African exoticism, and Stoller (1992) reported that even the people of Wanzerbe complained of misrepresentation; however, the documentary stands as an important ethnographic recording of these riveting ceremonies.

In the mid-1950s Rouch released Les Maîtres fous/The Mad Masters. The film is a cinematic study of the possession rituals of a group of Songhay known as the Hauka. The ritual is reportedly a means by which the Hauka contact the spirits of their former colonial 'masters'. In the ritual entranced participants behave as the members of the colonial military and then act out a violent ceremony in which a dog is sacrificed, boiled, and eaten. They also cut a chicken's throat and spill the blood on an already bloodstained altar. In their trances they act out military marches and conferences. Afterward, the Hauka people are shown carrying on with their normal daily routines. The Hauka sect became very popular in the region and despite the attempts of government officials, the group grew in numbers. Rouch described the popularity of the group as a way for the people to show defiance toward colonial oppression. He punctuates this belief cinematically by adding scenes of the British colonial military with the scenes of the Hauka ritual. Rouch filmed the ceremony at the request of the leaders of the Hauka sect. The film was controversial and was banned in the region. Some African and French intellectuals rejected the film as reinforcing black stereotypes and for lacking objectivity; others objected to Africans presenting such violent representations of Europeans. Yet the film was awarded the Grand Prix at the Venice Film Festival in 1957 and remains a fascinating view of this ritual that combines elements of traditional spiritual trance and possession ceremonies with modernized spirits in the form of colonial military personnel. In this way the film symbolically represents the clash of traditional African cultures with the enforced modernization brought on by colonialism. This cinematic ideological comment was probably the reason for the film's popularity throughout Europe.

Rouch's La chasse au lion à l'arc/The Lion Hunters (1957–64) follows Songhay hunters as they track and kill a group of dangerous lions with only bows and arrows. The movie presents the viewer with the African bush, a wild and seemingly dangerous place for humans. Then the film juxtaposes the bush with the cultivated land of the hunters, known as the Gow, a subgroup of the Songhay. The hunters must track and kill a lion that is attacking and killing domestic animals of the Fulan people. The lion is not eating its victims, so the hunters know that it is the same lion making all the kills. The film presents many details of the hunt, but its focus is on the rituals that are performed in the course of the expedition. It took Rouch seven years to complete the film, beginning in 1957 and concluding in 1964. Because of delays with the hunt, Rouch had to make several trips to Africa during this time period to film different aspects of the hunt and the related ceremonies such as the making of the poison for the arrows, and the killing of the lions trapped in the Gow hunters' iron leg traps. The hunters first trap and kill a young lion and kill it with their poison arrows. Next they trap a lioness, but she is able to free herself and attack one of the herdsman before she is killed by the hunters. Interestingly, Rouch was unable to film the complete attack, but his sound person captured the frightening incident and so the entire episode is presented in the film. The film was a critical success and was awarded the Golden Lion at the Venice Film Festival. Critics praised this film as Rouch's masterpiece and suggested that it elevated him to the elite group of French filmmakers. Stoller (1992) argued that the film successfully demonstrates the inseparable union of the Songhay people's mundane and sacred lives. Further, Stoller explains that Rouch has dialectically linked film and ethnography but suggests that Rouch crosses the boundary between reality and fictional narrative many times.

Rouch's first feature film, Moi, un noir/I, a Black (1957), combines documentary and fiction. The film was shot fairly objectively in Côte d'Ivoire, in a slum of Abidjan. It follows the daily life of a stevedore, Oumarou Ganda (who calls himself Edward G. Robinson) and two friends. Ganda then records the voice-over narration of the film, filling in his hopes and aspirations as a backdrop to the 16mm cinematography. Later Ganda became a leading figure in African filmmaking as a director in Niger. The film was banned by the Côte d'Ivoire government. Critics of cinéma vérité argue that the move into fictionalized cinema demonstrates that cinéma vérité is no more than a style of filmmaking, where handheld 16mm cameras and natural lighting are the accepted conventions, much like high production values and beautiful cinematic shots are conventions of classic narrative cinema. Rouch followed in 1959 with La Pyramide humaine/The Human Pyramid, which used a fictional story to explore the interaction of black and white teenage students at an Abidjan school, the Lycée d'Abidjan. The film was shot silently and Rouch attempted to have the students revoice the commentary in voice-over, but this did not work out well, as the students were unable to relive their spontaneous conversations after the fact. Proponents of the film argue that it is an important text that seeks to explore racism and segregation in an innovative and stylistically interesting manner.

Before the early 1960s, most documentary film was shot silently, with music, narration, and other sound effects added in after production. This condition resulted from the lack of sound equipment that was portable enough to use effectively and efficiently in the field. The advent of lightweight and reliable portable tape recording equipment with 16mm camera synchronization became widely available in the late 1950s. The availability of the equipment revolutionized the making of documentary film. This was especially true in France, where Rouch led the revolution by using the new technology in the cinéma vérité movement. Rouch was central in the development of cinéma vérité and used it in the style and form of his films in controversial ways. In his Chronique d'un été/Chronicle of Summer (1960), Rouch and Edgar Morin explored French culture just after the Algerian War from the streets of Paris. Rouch uses the same approach that he used in his African documentaries. The film is partly an answer to critics who accused him of only filming in exotic locales and the first film to be self-consciously cinéma vérité. The film is unique in that it incorporates some of the responses of the people interviewed to their own footage, thus undermining some of the 'objective distance' of the documentary. The use of handheld cameras and diegetic sound and a denunciation of the objective narrator were indicative of Rouch's larger rejection of earlier documentary filmmaking style and classic narrative film conventions. Reliance on a classic cinematic style that emphasized beautiful shots and compelling stories was cast aside as an obstacle to filmic truth. From this initial interest in transforming documentary, cinéma vérité moved to a focus on developing innovative narrative film styles. Chronique d'un été was not a commercial success, but Rouch followed it up with La Puniton/The Punishment. Although the film was shot very quickly and in the innovative style of cinéma vérité, the unrehearsed actors and improvised scenes about a girl who is sent home from school and spends the day looking for something to do, preferably with a male, is criticized for being too aimless. Although the cinéma vérité movement was influential to the directors of the French New Wave, these two Rouch films are most significant for what they suggest about the relationship of film to reality rather than as testaments to the success of the style.

Jaguar (1967) is a further development of Rouch's hybrid between documentary and fiction. Some scholars use the term ethnofiction to describe this type of filmmaking. Unlike the docudrama, ethnofiction relies on the basic tenets of ethnographic filmmaking. The film follows the lives of three young Songhay men who migrate from their tribal homes to the Gold Coast of West Africa in a quest of discovery and experience, and who return changed men. Rouch's ethnographic writings on this theme explore the history of this migration and its cultural significance. The film marks a movement away from Rouch's earlier focus on the mystical Songhay world of magic and ritual, by concentrating on the social, or mundane, aspects of these men's lives and their reasons for taking part in the migration. Thus the title of film is not about the animal; for these men being a jaguar means that they are successful and that they look and behave in a 'cool' fashion. Eventually, the men return home with stories and material goods before the seasonal rains begin. The idea for Jaguar was conceived in 1954. The film was shot silently, primarily in 1957. Later, Rouch had the principals do the voice-over commentary as they watched the film. Thus their improvisation is driven by the images locked in the celluloid. The entire commentary was completed in a single day in a sound studio in Ghana. The film was shown at different times before its final release in 1967. In the film we see the men make the long journey to the Gold Coast on foot through the grasslands and mountains. There they meet the Somba, 'primitive others', whose male members wear only penis sheaths. Once they arrive at the coast they split up, and the film crosscuts from one to another as they establish their daily lives and work. The men are able to achieve jaguar status, the condition of being 'with it' and 'cool', but eventually decide that it is time to return to their homes and their old lives. Once they return, they give away all the material possessions that they bring with them and settle back into their former lives and roles. Stoller (1992) suggested that this ethnofiction film exemplifies Rouch's pourquoi pas? (why not?) method of research and filmmaking, and this lends the film a sense of play. Some critics feel that the film stands as Rouch's anticolonial testament and brings to light several problems brought on by modernization facing West Africans at the time.

Rouch wrote many ethnographic books and articles with a wealth of thick description and photographs of the Songhay people and their spiritual artifacts. His written works are more detailed and ethnographically informative than his films. Rouch's 'why not?' method of filmmaking does little to answer the questions that his movies ask. The films themselves are often visually exotic, provocative, and challenging, thus leaving his viewers shocked and interested but confused as to context and explanation.

Rouch was killed in an automobile crash in Niger on February 18, 2004. He had returned once more to Africa to attend a film festival.

J. EMMETT WINN

See also: Chronique d'un été

Biography

Born May 31, 1917 in Paris. His father was a naval scientist and meteorologist who instilled a scientific interest in Jean as the family traveled extensively. In the late 1920s they lived in Morocco, where his father was the Director of the Oceanographic Museum. There Rouch first experienced Africa and its peoples. At school in Paris, in the 1930s, became very interested in surrealism. Also developed into an avid film enthusiast, often attending the programs at the Cinémathèque Française. Studied civil engineering at L'École des Ponts et Chaussées. Active in the Resistance during the Nazi occupation of France. In 1941 left France for Niger to work as a civil engineer. Served as the Director of Research at the Centre National de la Recherche Scientifique 1966–86, and was the General Secretary of the Cinémathèque Française 1985–6, after which he was its Director 1987–91. Rouch was married twice, first to Jane George in 1952, and then to Jocelyne Lamothe in 2002. Killed in an automobile crash in Niger on February 18, 2004.

Selected films

- 1946–7 Au pays des mages noirs: director
 1948–9 Les Magiciens de Wanzerbe/The Magicians of Wanzerbe: director, cinematographer, producer
 1948–9 Initiation à la danse des possédés/ Invitation to the Dance of the Possessed: director, cinematographer, producer
 1948–9 La Circoncision/The Circumcision: director, cinematographer, producer
 1953–4 Les Maîtres fous/The Crazy Masters: director, cinematographer
 1954–67 Jaguar: director
 1957 Moi, un noir/Myself as a blackman: director, writer
 1957–64 La Chasse au lion à l'arc: director, cinematographer
 1958–9 La Pyramide humaine/The Human Pyramid: director, writer
 1960 Chronique d'un été/Chronicle of a Summer: director (with Edgar Morin)
 1960 La Punition/The Punishment: director, writer
 2003 Le Rêve plus fort que la mort/The Dream Stronger than Death: director

Further reading

- Adams, John W. and Marshall, John, 'John Rouch Talks About his Films to John Marshall and John W. Adams', American Anthropologist 80, 1978: 1005–22.
 Armes, Roy, French Cinema, New York: Oxford University Press, 1985.
 DeBouzek, J., 'The Ethnographic Surrealism of Jean Rouch', Visual Anthropology 2, 1989: 301–17.
 Eatons, Mick (ed.), Anthropology—Reality—Cinema: The Films of Jean Rouch, London: British Film Institute, 1979.
 Feld, Steven, 'Themes in the Cinema of Jean Rouch', Visual Anthropology 2, 1989: 223–49.
 Lanzoni, Rémi Fournier, French Cinema: From its Beginnings to the Present, New York: Continuum, 2002.
 Ruby, Jay (ed.), The Cinema of Jean Rouch, London: Harwood Academic Publishers, 1989.
 Stoller, Paul, The Cinematic Griot: The Ethnography of Jean Rouch, Chicago: Chicago University Press, 1992.
 Williams, Alan, Republic of Images: A History of French Filmmaking, Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1992.

Rouquier, Georges

As a teenager, Georges Rouquier already admired the great directors of his time. Having obtained his certificat d'études, he took a job as an apprentice typographer in Montpellier. He gradually learned how to operate the linotype and, at the age of sixteen, he left for Paris and found employment as a skilled linotypist. He dedicated his spare time to the cinema, frequenting such film societies as l'Etoile's and the famous Studio 28 movie theatre.

It was on account of these visits that he met director Eugen Deslaw, who had just completed La Marche des Machines/The Operation of the Machines (1928) with relatively little money. Following Deslaw's advice, he bought a second-hand Debrise Sept 35mm camera and learned how to operate it, even taking it apart for better understanding and mastery. He devoted his next holiday to making his first motion picture, Vendanges/Grapeharvest (1929), about the grape harvest near Lunel. The film was later destroyed. Rouquier then completed his military service before going back to work as a linotypist.

At this point Rouquier was little more than a cultivated, film-loving linotypist. Thirteen years after Vendanges, however, he met the producer Etienne Lallier, who agreed to back the making of a short, Le Tonnelier/The Cooper (1942). The resulting composition focuses on the two-day labour process required for the production of one barrel (a demi-muid) by an elderly artisan and his apprentice, under the supervision of the master cooper. The film was once again shot in Lunel and displays great maturity and harmony. Though derived of ambient sound, it magnifies handicraft, dexterity, and know-how, depicting the craftsmen's traditional techniques in a way that would inspire many other films, including some of Rouquier's own. The next year it was awarded a Grand Prix at the Premier Congrès du Film Documentaire in Paris alongside Marcel Ichac's A l'Assaut des Aiguilles du Diable/Climbing the Peak of the Devil, and René Lucot's Rodin.

Now determined to become a filmmaker, Rouquier directed three commissioned films in 1943. Le Charron could in some ways be compared with Le Tonnelier, while La Part de l'enfant/The Child's share and L'Economie des métaux/The Economy of Metals are much less personal.

Lallier subsequently suggested that Rouquier direct a feature film about peasant life. This came to be Farrebique, often compared with Storck's Symphonie Paysanne/Peasant Symphony, which follows a similar outline. Farrebique succeeds owing to its feeling of authenticity, which the documentary mise-en-scène method respects. Although rewarded several times, this once controversial film, the filmmaker's most famous opus, did not guarantee the director's success.

Rouquier continued to make shorts on commission, addressing diverse subjects. L'Oeuvre scientifique de Pasteur/The Scientific Work of Pasteur (1947) was codirected by Jean Painlevé. Le Chaudronnier/The Boilermaker (1949), a 'handicraft film' again depicts how the artisan technique of the coppersmith had to adapt itself to industrial times. Le Sel de la terre/The Salt of the Earth (1950), 'a documentary western' (Auzel 2002), is an apology for the fertilization plan to the area of the Camargue, albeit an original, lyrical, and aesthetic one.

In 1955 Rouquier produced his young assistant Jacques Demy's first film, Le Sabotier du Val de Loire/The Clogmaker of the Val de Loire. In the mid-1950s he also tried his hand at fiction, with two feature films. Sang et lumière/Blood and Light was the first French film to use the Eastmancolor process. A Spanish version was made concurrently. The results are far from convincing. SOS Noronha (1957), inspired by reality, drew a parallel between the uprising of political prisoners in Brazil and an accident involving the pilot Mermoz, both events perceived from a radio guiding station. This Franco-German-Italian production is no achievement either. More convincing were Rouquier's various performances in a dozen French feature films, among which was Costa-Gavras's Z (1969).

As a filmmaker, Rouquier showed a preference for documentary. His curious Lourdes et ses miracles/Lourdes and its Miracles (1955) was produced by a Catholic corporation, a religious adviser appearing in its credits. The subject matter is that of the allegedly miraculous recoveries of pilgrims. Rouquier endeavoured to present an objective standpoint, maintaining that 'it is up to the spectator to conclude'. Having no facility to record direct synchronous sound outdoors, he nonetheless used authentic (ambient) sound material to full advantage. The way in which Rouquier appears on-screen to introduce and conclude the film prefigures to some extent the 'performative' documentary mode to come.

Rouquier's career came to a close with two films that echoed his first two. Le Maréchal ferrant/The Blacksmith Farrier (1979) is the portrait of a craftsman, which inevitably recalls Le Tonnelier; however, it situates the main character and his trade in a rural world altered by modernisation, and questions the issue of transmitting artisan know-how. Biquefarre (1983) is the sequel to Farrebique that the filmmaker had wished to make for nearly forty years.

The enthusiasm of American scholars and a subsidy from the National Endowment for the Humanities enabled Rouquier to elaborate the script. Two French producers then managed to convince the Crédit Agricole de l'Aveyron to get involved in the project. Rouquier was to depict what his family's farm—and subsistence farming in general—had become. He essentially used the same method as in 1946 (real characters, documentary mise-en-scène). The story, however, displays a finer type of coherence. It intertwines sociopolitical (and ecological) issues with the individual's destiny to demonstrate in a bittersweet mood how a whole world is coming to its end. It remains the testimony of a man who constantly paid tribute to the humble.

JEAN-LUC LIOULT

Biography

Born 1909. Descended from peasants on his father's side. Worked on the family farm as a youth. Having obtained his certificat d'études, returned to the farm for a short while before beginning his job as an apprentice typographer in Montpellier. Left for Paris aged sixteen and found employment as a linotypist. Worked nights, learned the new sound techniques in filmmaking during the day. Called up to military service in 1939 and served as an artilleryman until the end of World War II. Died in 1989.

Selected films

- 1942 Le Tonnelier/The Cooper: director, writer, narrator
- 1946 Farrebique: director, writer, narrator
- 1949 Le Chaudronnier/The Boilermaker: director
- 1955 Lourdes et ses miracles/Lourdes and its Miracles: director, narrator

- 1979 Le Maréchal ferrant/The Blacksmith Farrier: director, writer, narrator
 1983 Biquefarre: director, writer, narrator

Further reading

- Auzel, Dominique, Georges Rouquier, de Farrebique à Biquefarre, Paris: Petite Bibliothèque des Cahiers du Cinéma, 2002.
 Gauthier, Guy, Le Documentaire, un autre cinéma, Paris: Nathan Université, 1995.
 Pault, Marc-Henri, 'Changer sans changements: résister à l'histoire avec Georges Rouquier', in Anthropologie et cinéma, Paris: Nathan Cinéma, 2000.

Rubbo, Michael

Michael Rubbo is an Australian filmmaker who first made his mark at the National Film Board (NFB) of Canada, where he wrote and directed some of its most memorable documentaries—Sad Song of Yellow Skin (1969), Wet Earth and Warm People (1971), Waiting for Fidel (1973), Solzhenitsyn's Children ... Are Making a Lot of Noise in Paris (1978), Daisy: Story of a Facelift (1984), and many more. Rubbo is known for a very personal style of filmmaking that takes the viewer on a journey or exploration and allows the person to experience the subject matter through the thoughts, observations, and feelings of the filmmaker. His on-screen interventions make his films as much about him as about his subjects. Author and filmmaker Alan Rosenthal cites other distinctive aspects of Rubbo's films—a diary form of storytelling and an avoidance of the expected.

These characteristics are especially apparent in Waiting for Fidel (1973) in which Rubbo is one of the major characters. The other two are former Newfoundland premier Joey Smallwood and radio and television tycoon Geoff Stirling. The supposed purpose of the film is to follow Smallwood and Stirling as they visit Cuba and talk to Fidel Castro about socialism, admired by Smallwood but disparaged by Stirling. As they await the meeting with Castro, the camera records their discussions at a protocol house where they are staying and at schools and hospitals they visit. Instead of being a background figure, Rubbo is very much in the foreground, posing questions, getting into arguments, particularly with Stirling, the film's underwriter, and through narration giving the audience a diary-like impression of what he is witnessing.

The title of the film is taken from Samuel Beckett's play, Waiting for Godot, and as in the play, Fidel (Godot) never shows up, so the film turns out to be about Rubbo's encounters with Smallwood and Stirling.

In a number of films Rubbo comes across as a curious, sensitive outsider/amateur observer trying to understand or unravel a foreign culture or a complex personality or an unresolved mystery. Film professor Joan Nicks (1998) says 'Rubbo's on-screen persona foregrounds the inexpert "self", the out-of-place NFB filmmaker acting and improvising his way through the shooting [...] The impulse that propelled Rubbo to "dig in" culturally as an inexpert persona, in the guise of a footloose documentary filmmaker displaced from the Board and Canada (and his native Australia), ultimately mocks the imperialist bias of most Western documentaries about exotic others.'

A good example of Rubbo's tendency to 'dig in' culturally is Sad Song of Yellow Skin (1970), a look at how the Vietnam War and the American presence in Vietnam affected the lives of Vietnamese in Saigon. The film is seen through the eyes of three journalists/peace activists from the United States who, along with Rubbo, are outsiders trying to understand the people and their culture. One journalist lives on a monk's island of peace in the Mekong River. Another seeks to befriend people in a seedy, isolated part of town called the cemetery. A third provides a home, or semblance of a home, for street kids—shoe-shine boys who pimp and steal on the side. Rubbo is along to observe and to tell the viewer what he is observing: street-smart kids who use and are used by American soldiers, young girls turned prostitutes, children laughing and playing in the midst of filth and poverty, the burial arrangements for an old, opium-addicted cabaret performer and mistress whose heyday was during the French occupation. Throughout the film, Rubbo intersperses sounds and images of the United States: popular music, Richard Nixon on television, GIs looking for a good time, and an American Forces weathercast featuring a dancing weather woman billed as a 'bubbling bundle of barometric brilliance'. These sounds and images, along with Rubbo's quiet but pointed commentary about Americans (they believe all Vietnamese are gooks—some good gooks, some bad gooks, but all gooks), about what the Vietnamese think of Americans (Americans either kill or give), and about what he sees as American influence (GIs came looking for girls and marijuana, now all that remains are the babies they left behind), paint a picture of a culture being corrupted by American dollars and American values.

In Wet Earth and Warm People (1971) Rubbo is again the outsider trying to understand another culture, this time Indonesia. 'Watching Indonesia', Rubbo observes, 'is like watching a snake shed skins'. The skins refer to past influences, particularly Dutch influence. In this film Rubbo tries to understand Indonesia's struggle to modernize. He follows Jakarta's chief of police (who is also a singer with his own television program) and also the driver of a Pedi-cab or becak (Indonesia's traditional means of transportation, often regarded as a symbol of its backwardness), and travels to a small village to experience the true Indonesia, with its puppet plays and agrarian practices. The reflexive nature of Rubbo's documentaries is most apparent in Wet Earth and Warm People (1971). In diary-like form, Rubbo accounts for some of the problems and possible resentment that the crew has encountered: the cameraman looks like a colonialist, the sound man (making his first trip outside North America) appears to be on a tropical trip, and Rubbo's own correspondent's suit is mistaken for military. These revelations take the viewer backstage, as well as on stage, and make the process of filmmaking an integral part of the story.

Rubbo's interventionist style is also at the forefront of Daisy: The Story of a Facelift. In part the story of a feisty middle-aged woman (and fellow employee of the NFB) determined to turn back time, it is also the story of a twentieth-century cultural phenomenon—society's preoccupation with physical appearance. Rubbo explores the underlying motives for cosmetic surgery (breast enlargements, tummy tucks, nose jobs, and the like), and follows Daisy on her personal odyssey as she discusses her youth, marriages, growing old, and fears and expectations. The close, personal relationship between filmmaker and subject is apparent in the banter between Rubbo and Daisy and in Rubbo's provocations of Daisy, at one point pushing Daisy to ask a total stranger (in a patient waiting room) what he is doing there. Nicks (1998) believes that the film 'assumes the character of a parody of male voyeurism in Rubbo's obsession with what drives Daisy's pursuit of a more youthful face to recapture a romantic past'.

In Much Ado about Something (2002), commissioned by the Australian Broadcasting Corporation, Rubbo tries to unravel the authorship of William Shakespeare's plays and sonnets. Following some colorful characters known as Marlovians, all of whom are convinced that Christopher Marlowe was the hidden hand behind Shakespeare, Rubbo tests their ideas against what is known—or not known—about Shakespeare and Marlowe. Presented as a kind of tongue-in-cheek, 'whodunit' murder mystery (literally in the case of Marlowe's death), Much Ado about Something (2002) features Rubbo as chief detective and provocateur, a role he has played in previous films. What is different about Much Ado is that Rubbo also does most of the camera work, using an inexpensive, lightweight, digital camera.

CHURCHILL ROBERTS

See also: Canada; Sad Song of Yellow Skin; Waiting for Fidel

Biography

Born in Melbourne, Australia. Studied anthropology at Sydney University and completed a master's degree in film at Stanford University. In 1965 went to work for the National Film Board of Canada, where he wrote and directed more than thirty-five films. 1980–90 wrote and directed feature films for children, among them The Peanut Butter Solution (1984), Tommy Tricker and the Stamp Traveler (1986), and Vincent and Me (1990). Returned to his native Australia in 1995 and headed the documentary division and special projects of ABC TV. At ABC developed the series Race Around the World and produced and directed Little Box that Sings (1999) and The Man Who is Still Going (1999), an update of a 1973 NFB film. Has lectured widely on documentary and has taught at the Australian Film Television and Radio School and at Harvard University. Independent filmmaker and painter residing in Avoca Beach, Australia.

Selected films

- 1970 Sad Song of Yellow Skin: writer, director
- 1971 Wet Earth and Warm People: writer, director
- 1974 Waiting for Fidel: director, editor

- 1978 Solzhenitsyn's Children ... Are Making a Lot of Noise in Paris: writer, director
 1982 Daisy: The Story of a Facelift: director, editor
 1984 Margaret Atwood: Once in August: writer, director
 1984 The Peanut Butter Solution: writer, director
 1988 Tommy Tricker and the Stamp Traveler: writer, director
 1991 Vincent and Me: writer, director
 1998 The Little Box that Sings: writer, director
 2002 Much Ado about Something: writer, director

Further reading

- Ellis, Jack, The Documentary Idea: A Critical History of English-Language Documentary Film and Video, Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice Hall, 1989.
 Nichols, Bill, Introduction to Documentary, Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press, 2001.
 Nicks, Joan, 'The Documentary of Displaced Persona: Michael Rubbo's Daisy: Portrait of a Facelift', in Barry Keith Grant and Jeannette Sloniowski (eds), Documenting the Documentary: Close Readings of Documentary Film and Video, Detroit, MI: Wayne State University Press, 1998: 302–17.
 Rosenthal, Alan, "'Sad Song of the Yellow Skin" and "Waiting for Fidel": Michael Rubbo', in The Documentary Conscience: A Casebook in Film Making, Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1980: 232–44.
 ——— Writing, Directing, and Producing Documentary Films and Video, revised edition, Carbondale, IL: Southern Illinois University Press, 1996.

Russia/Soviet Union

Russia has been extremely influential in the development of documentary film. From early newsreels to avant-garde experimentations to multi-part television series, Russian filmmakers have captivated the world for nearly a century. Supported by a government who not only saw film as an effective tool for reaching the masses but also went so far as to open a state-supported film school, Russian filmmakers have, from the beginning, remained in the forefront of technology and technique.

Shortly after the revolution of 1917 the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (USSR) began to recognize the power of cinema. According to the head of the People's Commissariat of Education, Anatoli Lunacharsky, Lenin considered cinema to be the most important of all the arts for the newly formed republic. During this time, Denis Arkadievich Kaufman (1896–1954), the son of a librarian, was in Petrograd (St Petersburg) studying medicine and psychology. Influenced by the futurist poet Vladimir Mayakovsky, Kaufman began writing his own poetry, rejecting traditional syntax in favor of word montages. Like most futurists, he reveled in the clamor and rhythm of machines in a world quickly becoming industrialized. He created an audio laboratory where he would create sound montages and changed his name to Dziga Vertov, a name that denotes turning or revolving, signaling that he would become a driving force in the new cinematic movement.

In October 1917 Vertov volunteered to serve on the Cinema Committee in Moscow and was appointed editor of its newsreel Kino-nedeyia/Cinema Week. For three years Vertov's job was to take all incoming bits of film, which included fragments of struggle, crisis, disaster, and victory, and assemble them into a meaningful structure before sending them out again for viewing by the public. His mission was to unite the people by keeping them informed of the ups and downs of the struggle. While compiling the newsreels Vertov began to reuse footage, stringing it together to create features that provided a much broader context than was possible in the newsreels. Three of the most important of these early full-length features are Godovchina revoljutsii/Anniversary of the Revolution (1919), La Bataille de Tsaritsyne/The Battle of Tsaritsyne (1920), and Istoriya grazhdanskoj vojny/History of the Civil War (1922). Vertov felt that these films played an increasingly important role in the struggles of the new Soviet Republic.

Soon after the struggle ended, film stock was scarce and new projects sat waiting to be produced. Fiction films returned to theaters and Vertov found himself editing footage supplied by other filmmakers. In 1920–2 he began to write manifestos that attacked the current state of film in the Soviet Union, which he saw as 'movie dramas garbed in splendid technological dressing', and called for a new breed of filmmakers to rise to the challenge of creating a new Soviet Cinema by 'experiment[ing] with this dying organism'. Vertov saw fiction film as 'opium for the people' and wanted the new Soviet Cinema to document socialist reality (Barnouw 1993: 54).

With his wife, Yelizaveta Svilova, as editor and his brother, Mikhail Kaufman, as cameraman, Vertov formed the Council of the Three and began to produce a series of monthly newsreels entitled Kino-Pravda/Cinema Truth (1922–5). During its three-year run, twenty-three issues of the series appeared. Running approximately twenty minutes and generally focused on everyday experiences in the marketplace, bars, and schools. Vertov rarely asked permission to film and usually used a hidden camera to capture the hidden truth of socialist reality. The cinematography is simple, functional, and minimalist. The issues included non-narrative vignettes and exposés: the renovation of a trolley system, the organization of farmers into communes, and starvation in the emerging Marxist state. Although the issues of Kino-pravda rarely included reenactments or stagings, one notable exception is a segment about the trial of the Social Revolutionaries in which Vertov staged several scenes, including newspapers being sold on the streets and read in the trolley. Vertov's tendency toward propaganda is also present. One issue runs the subtitle: 'Tanks on the labor front', as the former Tsar's tanks help to prepare the foundation for a new airport. Although the series continued to run, it had become so experimental after half its issues that critics began to dismiss Vertov's work as 'insane'. This did not deter Vertov who, at the end of the final episode, encouraged his audience to contact him with interesting stories for future projects.

While producing Kino-Pravda, Vertov continued his practice of providing context by expanding shorter pieces into features. The result was Kinoglaz/Kino-Eye: Life Caught Unawares (1924), a documentary that examines the joys of life in a small Soviet village. Some of its various segments are interesting; some are not. One segment focuses on the activities of the 'Young Pioneers', children who spend their days pasting propaganda posters on walls, passing out pamphlets, and encouraging everyone to buy from the cooperative. Other segments highlight a Chinese magician who performs tricks for bread, a cocaine addict, and a murdered factory worker. The three most interesting and experimental portions of the film focus on the slaughter of a bull, the baking of bread, and a series of dives. Each of these segments begins with the final frame and then reverses, showing respectively the entrails moving back into the bull, the skin closing, the bull standing up, walking backwards onto a train car, and rejoining the herd; the bread coming out of the oven, reversing from dough to batter, and eventually from batter to its original ingredients; and divers going into and then coming back out of the water. Kinoglaz also includes one animated segment. The film ends in a mental health hospital. Although there is no structured narrative of any sort—all the images are simply ones captured unaware by the camera eye—Kinoglaz is interesting for its cinematography and techniques. The reverse segments are the first of their kind and are only now beginning to be used in contemporary documentary and fiction films.

Drastic ninety-degree angles capture views of the countryside, city, and people in interesting ways. Ultimately the film is important as a document of a way of life that no longer exists, and for Vertov's experimental techniques.

Five years later, Vertov completed his masterpiece, Chelovek s kinoapparatom/Man with the Movie Camera (1929). Like Kinoglaz, this film is experimental, but is much more cohesive. It is a silent documentary film about filmmaking. Vertov follows a cameraman, his brother Mikhail Kaufman, around various cities. The film intercuts Kaufman's footage with Vertov's footage of Kaufman filming and footage of Yelizaveta Svilova editing. The film introduces a number of innovative cinematic techniques: double exposure, fast and slow motion, freeze-frame, jump cuts, split screens, Dutch angles, extreme close-ups, and tracking shots. The self-reflexive storyline is also the first example of a meta-documentary. Vertov superimposes a shot of Kaufman setting up his camera atop a second camera and later inside a glass. Although at the time cameras were large and noisy, Vertov was sending a message about the prevalence and unobtrusiveness of film and again encouraging Soviet filmmakers to capture life unawares. Claiming that 'we cannot improve our eyes but we can always improve the camera', Vertov ends his film by animating the camera and letting it walk away from Kaufman, no longer reliant on human control. Again critics attacked Vertov and his film for a few obvious stagings and its drastic experimentation, but the film has since become a classic of the genre and was released on DVD in 1996 with a new soundtrack performed by the Alloy Orchestra. Based on notes left by Vertov, the soundtrack incorporates sound effects including sirens, babies crying, and crowd noise.

Over the years Vertov frequently debated film theory and philosophy with his colleague, Sergei Mikhailovich Eisenstein (1898–1948), known mainly for his fact-based historical dramas. Vertov championed the unobtrusive kino-eye, but Eisenstein argued that the Soviet Republic needed a kino-fist to impress on people the message of socialism. Although they differed in their ideas of film construction, they both agreed on the importance of editing to the finished product and the illusion of reality. Although Eisenstein's films were scripted fictions based on historical fact, they often took the form of newsreels and documentaries. In fact, the single most important technique pioneered by Eisenstein that is still used by documentary filmmakers today is montage. Montage stresses the fragmentation of events by rearranging them and juxtaposing shots that do not 'naturally' go together. By using montage techniques, the filmmaker constructs new impressions and insights, creating a visual metaphor that comments on the camera's subject. Eisenstein believed that through cinema, filmmakers were not simply documenting reality, but creating a new reality:

Is this not exactly what we of the cinema do [...] when we cause a monstrous disproportion of the parts of a normally flowing event, and suddenly dismember the event into 'close-up of clutching hands', 'medium shot of the struggle', and 'extreme close-up of bulging eyes', in making a montage disintegration of the event in various planes? In making an eye twice as large as a man's full figure! By combining these monstrous incongruities, we newly collect the disintegrated event into one whole, but in our aspect. According to the treatment of our relation to the event.

(Donald et al. 1999: 34)

Bronenosets Potyomkin/Battleship Potemkin (1925) glorifies the 1905 mutiny against oppressive officers on a battleship. Using the form of a newsreel, Eisenstein carefully crafts his propaganda film by painstakingly editing it in a way that would manipulate the audience and produce the strongest emotional response possible. This subtly crafted montage encourages the viewer to sympathize with the rebellious sailors and despise the cruel officers. The most famous scene from the movie is the Odessa Steps Massacre in which ruthless soldiers of the Tsar, like machines, march rhythmically down an endless flight of stairs and slaughter a crowd of innocents who are attempting to flee. The scene has been imitated and parodied over the years and still has an emotional impact on audiences who travel to the country to see the Odessa Steps. Interestingly enough, the entire scene is fictitious and scripted, a testament to the power of filmed 'reality'.

Two years later, Eisenstein created the first mockumentary with Oktyabr/October: Ten Days that Shook the World (1927). Commissioned by the Soviet government to honor the tenth anniversary of the 1917 October Revolution, Eisenstein used the film to advance what he saw as the further development of his theories of montage, using a concept he described as 'intellectual montage'. The film was not as successful or influential as Bronenosets Potyomkin, and Eisenstein's metaphorical experiments met with official disapproval. Eisenstein was ordered to reedit the work to expurgate negative references to Trotsky and to make it more accessible to the masses. In recent years, however, the film has come to be considered an historical epic and powerful representation of Eisenstein's genius and artistry. Eisenstein's theories and techniques continue to influence documentary filmmakers, both in Russia and internationally, as montage laid the groundwork for the pioneering compilation documentaries of Esfir Shub and the didactic emphasis that John Grierson gave to documentary in Great Britain of the 1930s.

While Eisenstein and Vertov argued and debated, Esfir Shub (1894–1959), a young female filmmaker, diligently worked on her own documentaries. Although she is not as well known as either of her colleagues, her methods and techniques have proven to be more influential to Soviet cinema than either of the other two directors. Born into a family of landowners, Shub studied literature in Moscow before attending classes at the Institute for Women's Higher Education. She joined the State Commissariat of Education and was appointed as Theatre Officer, a job that allowed her to work closely with Vsevolod Meyerhold, a famous avant-garde theatre director. After leaving the Commissariat, Shub joined the Goskino film company where she met Vertov. Although they maintained a lifelong professional friendship, it was often stormy because of their theoretical disagreements. Shub shared Vertov's belief in the intrinsic power of film to reveal the hidden aspects of reality, but she differed from Vertov in that she believed that film could be used in the representation and interpretation of history, not simply as a document of the contemporary world.

She learned the art of editing by recutting 'approved' versions of imported films such as D.W. Griffith's Intolerance (1916) and Fritz Lang's Dr Mabuse, der Spieler/Dr Mabuse, King of Crime (1922). When the film stock shortage slowed down the production of new projects, Shub did not wait for stock to become available or recast existing stock. Rather, she sifted through archival footage in search of material that could be edited and interpreted for the masses. She was so diligent in her work that she was given access to the Tsar's personal film library. The footage she found and compiled enabled her to produce a trilogy of documentary films: Padeniye dinastij Romanovykh/The Fall of the Romanov Dynasty (1927), Velikij put/The Great Way [Road] (1927), and Rossiya Nikolaya II i Lev Tolstoy/Leo Tolstoy and the Russia of Nicholas II (1928). While making the trilogy Shub was faced with two major problems: finding the 'right' footage and compensating for damaged or missing footage. Once she had collected the most valuable existing footage, she 'replaced' any relevant damaged footage with new footage. By doing so, she provided a contemporary context for the archival footage. Padeniye dinastij Romanovykh, the first part of the trilogy, has had the most lasting resonance. It follows the sequence of events in Russia from the first Russian revolution in 1905 to the second revolution in October 1917. Shub introduces leaders of the Duma (the lower house of the Russian parliament), gentry and peasants, soldiers and sailors, the bourgeoisie, and the Tsar. In May 1913 Europe's crowned heads came to Petrograd to celebrate three hundred years of Romanov rule, even as most of them prepared for war. With great skill and care Shub produced a dramatic account of events as they were actually happening. The result is a film that still has an emotional impact when viewed today.

Unknowingly, Shub created a completely new genre: the historical compilation film. She later claimed that she simply wanted to create newsreels with an editorial slant. Both critics and colleagues admired Shub's work. She had successfully found a balance between narrative and documentary forms. Although she remained quiet and out of the spotlight, working sporadically, she did return to the documentary form with a collaboration with Vsevolod Pudovkin (1893–1953) entitled Kino za XX let/Twenty Years of Soviet Cinema (1940). After this successful film Shub left Goskino to become chief editor for Moscow's central studio for documentary film, where she spent her final years confined to editing duties. Although Vertov and Eisenstein helped to define avant-garde filmmaking and theory, Esfir Shub's style and technique have survived as the most prominent form in modern documentary filmmaking. In addition, her scholarly achievement in researching and locating valuable archival footage helped to encourage the development and maintenance of film archives.

The year 1928 brought about yet another change in Soviet cinema, with the publication of Alexei Gan's essay 'Constructivism in the Cinema'. Like Vertov before him, Gan called for a new type of cinema that, though rooted in reality, was poetic and expressed the mark of the filmmaker:

It is not enough to link, by means of montage, individual moments of episodic phenomena of life, united under a more or less successful title. The most unexpected accidents, occurrences, and events are always linked organically with the fundamental root of social reality. While apprehending them with the shell of their outer manifestations, one should be able to expose their inner essence by a series of other scenes. Only on such a basis can one build a vivid film of concrete, active reality, gradually departing from the newsreel, from whose material this new ciné form is developing.

(Gan 1974: 130)

This essay addresses the issue of film form, specifically the assembly of shots into a pattern that affirms the voice of the filmmaker, by calling for a new style that moves beyond simply showing 'attractions' or making unobtrusive scientific observations. Gan, like Eisenstein, was calling on filmmakers not only to document but also to comment on their subjects. Two filmmakers who quickly answered the call were Victor Turin (1895–1945) and Mikheil Kalatozishvili, more commonly known as Mikhail Kalatozov (1903–73).

Victor Turin's Turksib (1929) documented the construction of a railroad linking Turkestan and Siberia through the harshest region of the central Asian desert. The end of the film, showing a locomotive looming on the horizon under a blast of thick black smoke, signals the triumph of modern technology. Turin's organization of his huge project, and his success in giving it innovative dramatic impact, won wide admiration and influenced documentary filmmakers throughout the world. A memorable sequence, introduced with the simple title 'Strangers ...', shows people in a remote Turkestan desert village watching the arrival of surveyors. This scene sets the stage for a later climactic sequence in which an engine arrives on the new track for the first time. Some men on horseback ride up and cautiously inspect the new contraption as it stands at rest, puffing quietly. As the engine starts up, the terror of the horses and men and their temporary retreat provide fascinatingly authentic moments. Later we see them joyfully racing the engine across vast plains. One major innovation of Turin's film is the incorporation of lengthy subtitles that seem to anticipate spoken commentary.

Born Mikhaïl Kalatozishvili in Tiflis, Kalatozov originally studied to be an economist. In 1925, however, he began working as an actor in the Georgian studios. Shortly after this he began to learn the art of shooting and editing film, which led him to create his first short documentary, Mati samepo/Their Empire, in 1928. Two years later he created an amazingly beautiful, stark, and blunt chronicle of life in post-Revolutionary Russia with Jim Shvante (marili svanets)/Salt for Svanetia (1930). The film focuses on a starkly isolated mountain community between the Black and Caspian Seas, which has been deprived of an essential mineral: salt. The villagers and animals all suffer and go to any lengths necessary to find the precious commodity. Kalatozov shows the viewer a farmer lying down in his field to rest from his labor. As he does so, a cow comes to lick the sweat from his brow. After the farmer urinates, the cattle lick his urine. Whenever a baby is born, dogs lick the placental fluid from its body. Kalatozov's film sends out the message that the people are not only suffering from a lack of salt, but also from their cultural isolation from the progress of the new Republic. The villagers retain their primitive beliefs by adhering to their religion and giving what little money they have to the Church, which is powerless to help. The climax of the film comes as a Soviet-built road is constructed, and thanks to Soviet progress, Svanetia is saved by a shipment of salt.

The Stalin regime felt that the film was unbalanced and unfair to Svanetia and that Kalatozov was far too fascinated by the backwardness and superstition of Svanetia, and too overtly pushed the socialist solution. Kalatozov had allowed his voice to sound too loudly in the film as opposed to simply documenting the reality. Kalatozov followed Jim Shvante with Lursmani cheqmashi/Nail in the Boot (1931), a film that received more of the same criticism and was ultimately banned. Kalatozov was then assigned to strictly administrative duties within the film industry. During World War II he was appointed to the office of Chief Administrator of Soviet Feature Film Production. During this time he sometimes worked in Los Angeles as the Soviet cultural representative. After the war Kalatozov received an appointment as Deputy Minister of Film Production and was allowed to resume his directing career. Twenty-seven years after making Jim Shvante, Kalatozov received the Palme d'Or at the Cannes Film Festival for Letjat zhuravli/The Cranes are Flying (1957), a wartime romantic drama. Unfortunately, he left no other documentaries in his short but impressive catalogue.

The Soviet films of this early period helped to develop modern documentary filmmaking style and techniques. Their focus on the modern world, politics, and historical contexts sought to agitate viewers and move audiences to action. Unfortunately, the artistic peak of this early phase of Soviet cinema was short-lived. As Stalin's regime grew stronger and more paranoid in the 1930s, more and more documentaries were censored or banned outright and the voices of their creators silenced. Still, their influence survives in worldwide documentary filmmaking today, even as new voices in Russia are emerging.

Having written, directed, and starred in more than thirty films, Eldar Ryazanov (1927–) has established himself as one of Russia's most formidable filmmakers. His films are distinctly Russian in nature, as he himself says that he can inhabit no other country than his own and embraces his native climate, culture, and language. Ryazanov tends to work in the area of comedic fiction, but he still attempts to capture the reality of Russian life by focusing on stories about ordinary people and unforgettable situations. He believes the most important element of the film director's profession is a carefully balanced combination of tenderness and toughness. He tries to capture the raw reality of life in the most cinematically beautiful way possible. It is this combination that he brings to his four-part documentary series on the Russian bard Vladimir Vysotsky, Chetyre vechera s Vladimirom Vysotskim/Four Meetings with Vladimir Vysotsky (1987). In the documentary, Ryazanov acts as director, writer, and commentator as he explores the life of Vysotsky through four stages. The first part deals with Vysotsky's early life, the second with his career as an actor in the theater, the third with his career as a film actor, and the final installment with his career as Russia's preeminent poet, singer, and musician.

Using archival footage and providing his own modern commentary, Ryazanov beautifully captures the hard-living, hard-drinking actor who was admired by virtually all circles of Soviet society. Through his music Vysotsky was a voice of dissent who was often banned, but through his films he was a simple entertainer. Although he was 'discovered' while playing Hamlet on stage, his most memorable role was captured on Russian television as he took on the role of tough homicide detective Gleb Zheglov in the series Mesto vstrechi imenit nelzya/Can't Change the Meeting Place (1979). With this documentary, Ryazanov in many ways returns to Vertov by making a film about film and its power. Unlike Vertov, however, Ryazanov is not promoting the government through propaganda. Rather he is criticizing it by creating a testament to one of Russia's greatest critics. Although Vysotsky held no office, he did play an important political role by condemning the system under which he was born. Throughout his lifetime the government was able to silence and control his criticism, but through Ryazanov's film Vysotsky's voice has been captured. This marks a major departure from the Stalinist regime that all but destroyed the documentary tradition in Russia.

In the 1990s Stanislav Govorukhin (1936–) emerged as the dominant documentary filmmaker of Russia. A member of the Duma, Govorukhin is not only one of the favorite directors, but also a politician whose opinions are listened to and respected. He is known for making emotionally charged speeches that motivate some listeners and enrage others. With many reforms beginning to take place in his country in the early 1990s, Govorukhin created documentaries with a definitive political slant. His films lash out at emerging criminal elements including corruption and white-collar crime. When criticized for mixing his politics with his art, he replied, 'This is a creative process [...] I don't see much difference between politics and directing.' His films are as up-front and daring as his speeches and the titles make no attempt to sanitize the director's opinions. Tak zhit nelzya/You Can't Live Like That (1990), Rossiia, kotoruyu my poteryali/Russia that We've Lost (1992), and Velikaya kriminal'naya revolyutsiya/Great Criminal Revolution (1994) make up a trilogy that provides Govorukhin's view of historical and contemporary events in Russia, tracing its context and consequences from the final years before the 1917 October Revolution, its public and economic life, the Bolshevik rule that turned out fatal for the people, to the fate of Russia, complete with its historical role and prospects for the future. According to Govorukhin in the films, 'A pessimist is a well-informed optimist [...] What I know suggests that things are pretty bad. Nevertheless, I do hope that life in Russia will gradually improve.' Govorukhin is reluctant to discuss the future, but he often talks nostalgically of the past, stating that his time is the nineteenth century and that it is a pity that he was not born a century earlier. Although he has turned to narrative fiction, another documentary project was a filmed interview with the famous writer Alexander Solzhenitsyn. The film includes narration about Solzhenitsyn's life and work in America, his family, his dreams, and intentions. In 2003 Govorukhin released Blagoslovite zhenshchinu/Bless the Woman, another narrative drama that focuses on a tiny Soviet village in the years before World War II.

Beginning in 1993, the Krupny Plan Motion Picture and Video Association teamed with Castle Communications and Eastern Light Productions to produce documentaries that would reflect the lost footage and films of the Stalin era. By using the talents of a number of directors, including Aizenberg, M.K. Kaufman, and Zolotukhin, Rossiia: zabytie gody/Russia: The Forgotten Years covers such diverse historical topics as the Revolution and the final years of Romanov rule, as well as cultural topics including the Russian ballet and histories of the naval fleet, aviation squadron, and the space race. Istoriya grazhdanskoi voiny/The History of the Civil War (1993) covers the period 1918–22 and informs the viewer of the most significant events on the eve of the civil war through its opening stages. There is a considerable amount of archival footage and newsreels that has been made available for the first time. One of the most interesting segments documents the creation of the Red Army and its vital role in maintaining central Russia and achieving crucial victories on all fronts despite desperate resistance from the White forces. The beautiful cinematography and clever editing capture the suppression of the Kronstadt uprising in 1921 and the final expulsion of Japanese forces from Vladivostok in late 1922, marking the end of five years of conflict and establishing the Soviet Union as a major power.

Velikaya otechestvennaya voina/The Eastern Front (aka The Great Patriotic War) (1993) makes up three films in the series as the filmmakers use various newsreels to recreate a grandiose picture of the 1941–5 battle, with its magnificent victories and enormous losses. The trilogy begins with Hitler's invasion of the Soviet Union in June 1941, possibly the most dramatic campaign of World War II, and follows the war through the anticipated Blitzkrieg on the Eastern Front, and the Wehrmacht's first major defeat at Moscow. The film then dramatically captures the battle at Stalingrad, where the Russian troops fiercely held their ground against overwhelming forces and the momentous tank battle at Kursk. This segment, documenting the epic actions that turned the tide of World War II, could take their place alongside the great war films of history. The trilogy concludes with Operation Bagration, the destruction of the Wehrmacht in Byelorussia. The filmmakers do not hide the fact that the Red Army's thrust to Germany's border turned into a fierce and costly campaign, but show both the horrors and triumphs as Zhukov's two-million man force crushes Hitler's last defenses in Berlin.

Istoriya krasnoi armii/The History of the Red Army (1994) further explores one of the world's most powerful fighting forces. Emerging in 1918 under the control of Lev Trotsky, the Red Army was initially made up of three hundred thousand soldiers, but within two years had grown to more than five million. This documentary traces the first twenty years of its history from the civil war through its battles in World War II. The film strongly criticizes Stalin, who had purged the forces, leaving them decimated as they entered the most important war of their history. Although the footage of the army's victory over the Nazi forces is impressive, the most impressive segments deal with the campaigns against the Japanese in Manchuria, the Finnish, and of the army's later involvement in Hungary, Czechoslovakia, and Afghanistan. Editing together unique and unseen archival footage, the documentary reaches high drama at many points.

One final important film of the Forgotten Years series is Chekisty/The Story of the KGB (1994). The film is divided into two parts, with part one covering the period 1917–33, the beginnings of the KGB, and part two focusing on the professional police force active from 1934–53. Having perfected the art of espionage, political assassinations, and rigged trials under the guidance of Feliks Dzerzhinsky, under Stalin the KGB became the ultimate tool for maintaining control over the country. During the 1930s and 1940s the secret police force orchestrated mass purges and consolidated immense resources and political power and permeated every aspect of Soviet reality. This film in the series again uses archival footage mixed with contemporary commentary to create a great dramatic thriller while representing the reality of the Soviet people.

All of the films in the Forgotten Years series hark back to the style created by Esfir Shub, taking existing footage and arranging it in a way to provide an interpretation for a new audience. Since Vertov, Russian cinema has pushed the boundaries of possibility with film. Ever striving for new styles and techniques, Russian filmmakers all seem to share one bond: the voice of the filmmaker must be heard. Although many critics argue that documentary filmmakers should not be explicit in their views and, like Vertov, should simply attempt to capture 'life unawares', the modern Russian filmmaker is more in line with Eisenstein's kino-fist. The events should not be staged, they should be natural, but in the editing process they should be arranged in a way to achieve the proper response from the audience. After many silent years, Russian cinema is back in the forefront, searching the archives of the past to move forward into the future.

See also: Fall of the Romanov Dynasty, The; Man with the Movie Camera; Shub, Esfir; Turin, Viktor; Turksib; Vertov, Dziga

Further reading

- Barnouw, Erik, Documentary: A History of the Non-Fiction Film, second revised edn, Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1993.
- Bordwell, David and Thompson, Kristin, Film Art: An Introduction, sixth edn, New York: McGraw-Hill, 2001.
- Donald, James et al. (eds), Close Up 1927–33: Cinema and Modernism, Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1999.
- Gan, Alexi, 'Constructivism and the Cinema', in Stephen Bann (ed.), The Tradition of Constructivism, New York: Viking, 1974.
- Grant, Barry Keith and Sloniowski, Jeannette (eds), Documenting the Documentary: Close Readings of Documentary Film and Video, Detroit, MI: Wayne State University Press, 1998.
- Jacobs, Lewis, The Documentary Tradition, second edn, New York: Norton, 1979.
- Mouratov, Sergei, 'The Unknown Cinema: Documentary Screen, Glasnost Era', Journal of Film and Video 44, nos 1–2, 1992: 9–18.
- Nichols, Bill, Introduction to Documentary, Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press, 2001.
- Roberts, Graham, Forward Soviet!: History and Non-Fiction Film in the USSR, New York: I.B. Tauris, 1999.
- The Man with the Movie Camera, New York: I.B. Tauris, 2001.
- Vertov, Dziga. Kino-Eye: The Writings of Dziga Vertov, trans. Kevin O'Brien, Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1995.
- Zimmermann, P.R., 'Reconstructing Vertov: Soviet Film Theory and American Radical Documentary', Journal of Film and Video 44, nos 1–2, 1992: 80–90.

S

Sad Song of Yellow Skin

(Canada, Rubbo, 1970)

Sad Song of Yellow Skin, directed by Michael Rubbo, is one of the most enduring films to emerge from the Vietnam War. The film is representative of the then-recent ascendancy of the director's role at the National Film Board (NFB) of Canada and marks a significant development toward what would become Rubbo's signature style. It also stands apart from more conventional documentary treatments of the war.

In the early 1960s the NFB was organized into production units headed by executive producers. The units functioned in varying degrees automatically, and filmmakers generally were subordinate to producers. In 1964–5 rebellious filmmakers forced a dismantling of the unit system and the adoption of a 'pool' system that gave directors the power often to propose subjects, initiate projects, and choose producers. As a result, a spate of films representing the personal or political interests of the filmmakers emerged in the latter part of the 1960s and continued into subsequent decades.

Rubbo entered the NFB in 1966 and for several years made sponsored films as well as children's films. As the Vietnam War dragged on, he proposed making a film about the war. An overtly antiwar film would not have been permitted at that time, and the NFB had a policy that each of its films had to have 'Canadian content'. Rubbo's proposed film would be centered on the work of a Canadian-sponsored foster parents program in Vietnam. Once in Vietnam, however, he discovered that the program offered meager filmic possibilities. He wired the NFB and got permission from his producer, Tom Daly, to focus on three idealistic young Americans in Saigon who were working against the war and its effects.

Rubbo's change of focus proved pivotal in several ways. Sad Song of Yellow Skin became the NFB's first significant documentary without any Canadian content (with the exception of some NFB films sponsored by the United Nations). By using the three likeable Americans as his guide, Rubbo avoided simplistic anti-Americanism. Most important, the opportunity enabled Rubbo to make a film that did not pretend to project the knowledge he did not have.

Rubbo, who narrates the film off camera, explores Saigon through the three Americans and their work, and the audience discovers Saigon through his search. The film is structured such that Rubbo's initial disorientation in a hectic foreign city is represented in a fast-moving series of images of exotic bustle; our gradual if ultimately limited familiarity with Saigon follows Rubbo's own.

Except for details, the knowledge we ultimately gain is essentially the knowledge of mystery. One of the most moving scenes in the film is the funeral of an opium addict Rubbo had met through one of the Americans. The woman had been a highly admired dancer; she died in wretched destitution. Her tearful older daughter holds the baby sister she must now care for alone while neighbors arrange her mother's corpse in a primitive wooden coffin lined with sawdust. The film ends on the 'Island of Peace', a serene Buddhist colony headed by a withered old priest on an island in the Mekong River. The priest, educated in Europe as an engineer, hopes to bring peace to Vietnam by symbolic means: his daily trek from Hanoi to Saigon on a wooden platform shaped and painted to resemble a map of Vietnam. The film's conclusion in death and spiritual quest is at once strange and familiar. As if Rubbo is aware that he has strayed far from the subject of war, the last sounds we hear are bursts of machine-gun fire laid in over the final credits.

Sad Song of Yellow Skin was dismissed by some for its apparent lack of political analysis. The film is devoid of the anger of such Vietnam-era films as Hearts and Minds (1974) and Intervues with My Lai Veterans (1971) or the battle content of The Anderson Platoon (1967). Its only direct representation of military presence is the occasional shot of a US soldier in Saigon and those bursts of machine-gun fire; the latter seem like less a reminder than an afterthought. Some critics sensed a patronizing tone to the film. When it was shown to a group of Cuban filmmakers, for instance, Rubbo was asked why the camera seemed to always be looking down at the Vietnamese—which it does, but largely because the American subjects were tall and the cameraman was six feet four inches tall. Rubbo's reliance on US guides has also been questioned, but there is an honesty in the way it shows the film's sources on screen. Some people were put off by Rubbo's first-person narration, which he delivers in an almost matter-of-fact, sometimes hesitant, groping style. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation refused to air the film because of its personal, nonobjective point of view.

Although they were perceived by some as shortcomings, Rubbo developed these aspects of Sad Song of Yellow Skin into a distinctive style. Beginning with his next film, Wet Earth and Warm People (1971), Rubbo didn't just personally narrate; he stepped in front of the camera to engage with the material as another character. He would often use intermediaries as guides to the subject of his inquiries, as in Solzhenitsyn's Children ... Are Making a Lot of Noise in Paris (1978). He would treat his villains gently, as in Persistent and Finagling (1971). The quintessential Rubbo film, where the various components of his approach mesh together most effectively, is Waiting for Fidel (1974).

D.B. JONES

See also: Canada; Grierson, John; Hearts and Minds; Rubbo, Michael; Waiting for Fidel

Sad Song of Yellow Skin (Canada, National Film Board, 1970, 58 mins). Distributed by the National Film Board of Canada. Produced by Tom Daly. Directed by Michael Rubbo. Cinematography by Martin Duckworth and Pierre Letarte. Sound by George Croll, Michel Descombes, Les Halman, and Pierre Letarte. Edited by Torben Schioler and Michael Rubbo. Narration written and spoken by Michael Rubbo.

Further reading

- Dobi, Steve, 'Michael Rubbo' (interview), Sightlines, fall 1975: 17–20.
- Handling, Piers, 'The Diary Films of Mike Rubbo', in Seth Feldman (ed.), Take Two, Toronto: Irwin Publishing, 1984.
- Hughes, John, 'Michael Rubbo: Hiding behind the "I"', (interview), Cinema Papers, January/February 1981: 41–5, 89.
- Jones, D.B., Movies and Memoranda, Ottawa: Deneau, 1982.
- The Best Butler in the Business: Tom Daly of the National Film Board of Canada, Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1996.
- Rosenthal, Alan, 'Sad Song of Yellow Skin and Waiting for Fidel', (interview with Michael Rubbo), in The Documentary Conscience: A Casebook in Film Making, Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1980.

Sadness: A Monologue by William Yang

(Australia, Ayres, 1999)

Sadness: A Monologue by William Yang is one of the most innovative documentaries to be produced in Australia in the late 1990s. Sadness existed as a highly acclaimed performance piece by Australian photographer and performance artist, William Yang, before it was adapted for the screen by writer and director Tony Ayres in 1999. It is the combination of performance, documentary, and Yang's evocative monologue that marks Sadness as a unique Australian documentary.

Funded by SBS Independent and Film Australia's National Interest Program initiative, Sadness weaves together a number of different narratives in such a way as to construct a commentary on identity, community, and nationhood. These many narratives represent aspects of Yang's experience that function, for him, as sites of mourning. Following the death of his mother, Yang travels through Australia's north-eastern state, Queensland, in order to discover the truth about the murder of his uncle, William Fang Yuen, which occurred in the 1920s. He visits family and other witnesses, and while the accounts he collects are conflicting, everyone agrees that the misconducted murder trial represented the authorities' lack of regard for the Chinese Australian community.

These scenes concerning family, past and present, are interspersed with sequences devoted to a number of friends Yang lost to AIDS in Sydney's gay community. Yang describes his relationship with Scotty, David, Nicholas, and others, as their physical decline becomes apparent on screen. Through juxtaposing the two discourses of family and gay identity, Sadness problematises the way they are often considered mutually exclusive. As a documentary, Sadness can be understood within a tradition of essayist filmmaking in the sense that the self-consciously subjective and performed nature of the narrative allows for the productive juxtaposition of seemingly divergent discourses.

This bricolage across the different aspects of Yang's experience works to displace the construction of a centre and a margin, or the 'Australian' identity and the 'ethnic' identity, while also denying the possibility of a singular notion of identity.

In Sadness, Yang himself presents his monologue in a type of stage-set environment and his photography is either projected in this space or shown in cutaways. It is through this still photography that the audience is given access to the different characters that inhabit the stories. The differing versions of the murder and Yang's journey are portrayed through reenactments and employ the technique of back-projection, lending a highly stylised aspect to these sequences. The trace of the earlier staged performance piece is present in the documentary in ways that extend and render visible the authored and performative aspect of all documentary. As is the case with many examples of reflexive documentary, in Sadness, realism and documentary truth are rethought in order to privilege a more subjective approach that questions the production of meaning and the relationship between history and experience and identity and cultural stereotypes. Through a personal engagement with narratives of mourning, Sadness works to explore the complexity of a gay Chinese Australian subjectivity. These political and thematic concerns can also be found in Ayres's earlier documentary, China Dolls (1997).

BELINDA SMAILL

Sadness: A Monologue by William Yang (Australia, Film Australia, 1999, 52 mins). Distributed by Film Australia. Produced by Michael McMahaon and Megan McMurchy. Directed by Tony Ayres. Based on the original work Sadness by William Yang. Script by Tony Ayres. Script consultant William Yang. Cinematography by Tristan Milani. Edited by Riva Childs. Sound by Pat Fiske, Livia Ruzic and Peter Walker.

Further reading

- Chan, Dean, 'The Dim Sum vs. the Meat Pie: On the Rhetoric of Becoming an In-Between Asian Australian Artist', in Ien Ang, Lisa Law and Mandy Thomas, Alter/Asians: Asian-Australian Identities in Art, Media and Popular Culture, Sydney: Pluto Press, 2000: 141–51.
- Khoo, Tseen, 'Re-siting Australian Identity: Configuring the Chinese Citizen in Diana Giese's Astronauts, Lost Souls and Dragons and William Yang's Sadness', in Wenche Ommundsen (ed.), Bastard Moon: Essays on Chinese Australian Writing, Melbourne: Otherland Journal, 2001: 95–109.
- Small, Belinda, 'Disorientations: Sadness, Mourning and the Unhomely', The Journal of Australian Studies 73, 2002: 161–9.
- Yang, William, Sadness, Sydney: Allen & Unwin, 1996.

Salesman

(US, Maysles, 1969)

Salesman is a landmark film of the American direct cinema movement of the 1960s and 1970s. In the documentary, the camera accompanies four Bible salesmen over the course of six weeks as they advance from door to door, trying to sell Bibles for the Mid-American Bible Company, first in the greater Boson area and later in the suburbs of Miami. The film is striking for its mixture of humor and melancholia. It is equally striking for its form: filmed and packaged as a documentary, yet generating drama and tension as it documents the decline of a profession.

Salesman, as is the case for many direct cinema films, is shot in black and white, reflecting the origins of new style in photojournalism. The film is one of many collaborations between director and cameraman Albert Maysles and his brother David, his long-standing editor and sound engineer. Until 1961 both had been part of Drew Associates, a group of innovative young filmmakers developing a new documentary film style with journalist and filmmaker Robert Drew.

The technological innovations of the decade before Salesman—faster and more light-sensitive 16mm film stock, portable (and hence less intrusive) wireless cameras, and synchronous sound—had made unobtrusive filmmaking possible. It was henceforth feasible for the camera, as illustrated by Salesman, to follow people into their private spaces, without involving complex planning or, supposedly, resulting in the loss of spontaneity of the subjects. The camera was able to catch people as they were, directly.

It has been argued that, despite their various claims of filming authentic experience, and unlike their French contemporaries participating in cinéma vérité, the practitioners of direct cinema did not always observe life at its most ordinary.

Earlier direct cinema films revolved around celebrities such as John F. Kennedy (Robert Drew, Crisis, 1963) and Jane Fonda (D.A. Pennebaker, Jane, 1962). These films were able to rely on the 'natural' attraction of their subjects to keep audiences engaged (Rosenthal 1988: 127–8). Salesman stands out because it concerns itself with ordinary people.

Salesman portrays four real-life, middle-aged Bible salesmen, their frustrations, and the hardship that accompanies a life on the road and a job where competition is tough, where few get rich, and where many fall by the wayside. The settings alternate between sparse motel rooms, often poor and small homes and constrained lifestyles, and the cars in which the salesmen drive to prospective customers.

The film starts out with the main protagonist, fifty-six-year-old Paul Brennan, confidently explaining (over a screenshot of the Bible with 'Holy Bible' in lavish print across the cover): 'The best seller in the world is the Bible. For one reason. It's the greatest piece of literature of all time.' Paul will never again sound so reassured, as the audience watches him move from one failed sales pitch to another. His colleagues—Raymond 'The Bull' Martos, Charlie 'The Gipper' McDevitt, and James 'The Rabbit' Baker (all nicknamed after their sales strategies)—are both pals and rivals, and as time goes by, Paul's decline, and his resulting anger and frustration, leave him increasingly isolated from these friends. Slowly it becomes clear that Paul is not going to catch up on his subscriptions and will likely lose his job.

Although one of direct cinema's self-declared approaches to documentary was observing, rather than narrating, it is clear from early on that Salesman is a carefully edited film. In fact, the film follows a suspense dramaturgy. The tension is set up just a few minutes into the film, when the manager announces that the company has to 'eliminate a few men'. The audience has already witnessed that Paul is having difficulties meeting the sales requirements, and now they know what is at stake. Paul's situation singles him out among his three colleagues and serves as the structuring point of the narrative.

While 'unscripted and unrehearsed' (Barsam 1973: 302), Salesman uses a range of techniques to maintain the flow of the narrative. When Paul is on a train to the Chicago sales meeting and quietly looks out the window, the off-voice of manager Ken fades in, giving one of his bullying speeches. This technique is more specific to fiction than to documentary storytelling. In blending the image of Paul and the voice of Ken, the filmmakers move beyond what can be known through direct observation alone. Salesman also uses nondiegetic sound, as can be seen later in the film, as the Beatles song 'Yesterday' accompanies Raymond 'The Bull' Martos as he leaves another successful sale. Even more striking is how the protagonist Paul is at one point given control over the narrative. While driving in Miami, he describes his pals and their different sales approaches. Laughing and talking, he looks directly into the camera and his words trigger a string of sequences, illustrating his stories about the sales styles of the Gipper, the Rabbit, and the Bull.

Ultimately, the film's drama is anchored in the sales pitches themselves. The sales pitches provide the moments of tension, with the success of the salesmen depending on their skill in manipulating the prospective buyers—however impoverished—into enough guilt so that they end up buying. Moreover, the absurdity of many of the sales pitches provide comical scenes that are interspersed through the film, as the men try to reconcile the materialistic with the religious aspects of their enterprise, and the desperation of their economic conditions.

JACOBIA DAHM

See also: Drew, Robert; Maysles, Albert

Salesman (US, 1968, 91 mins, black and white). Directed by Albert and David Maysles and Charlotte Zwerin. Produced by Albert and David Maysles. Cinematography by Albert Maysles. Edited by David Maysles and Charlotte Zwerin. Contributing film editor: Ellen Giffard. Assistant editor: Barbara Jarvis. Sound mixer: Dick Vorisek. Filmed in Boston, Chicago, and Miami.

Further reading

- Allen, Robert C. and Gomery, Douglas, Film History. Theory and Practice, New York and London: McGraw-Hill, 1985.
- Barnouw, Erik, Documentary: A History of the Non-fiction Film, Oxford, New York: Oxford University Press, 1993.
- Barsam, Richard M., Nonfiction Film. A Critical History, Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press, 1973.
- Breitrose, Henry, 'On the Search for the Real Nitty-Gritty: Problems & Possibilities in Cinéma Vérité', Film Quarterly, 17, no. 4 (summer 1964): 36–40.
- Bruzzi, Stella, New Documentary: A Critical Introduction, London and New York: Routledge, 2000.
- Kolker, Robert Philip, 'Circumstantial Evidence: An Interview with David and Albert Maysles', Sight and Sound 40, no. 4, autumn 1971: 183–6.
- Levin, G. Roy, Documentary Explorations. 15 Interviews with Film-Makers, New York: Anchor Press, 1971.
- Macdonald, Kevin and Cousins, Mark, Imagining Reality. The Faber Book of the Documentary, London and Boston: Faber & Faber, 1996.
- Mamber, Stephen, Cinema Verité in America, Cambridge, MA: MIT Press, 1974.
- Nichols, Bill, Representing Reality. Issues and Concepts in Documentary, Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press, 1991.
- Rosenthal, Allan (ed.), New Challenges for Documentary, Berkeley, CA and London: University of California Press, 1988.
- Stubbs, Liz, Documentary Filmmakers Speak, New York: Allworth Press, 2002.
- Warren, Charles (ed.), Beyond Document. Essays on Nonfiction Film, Hanover, NH and London: Wesleyan University Press, 1996.
- Young, Colin, 'Cinema of Common Sense', Film Quarterly 17, no. 4, summer 1964: 26–9.

Salt of the Earth

(US, Biberman, 1954)

Salt of the Earth is often recognized as one of the only blacklisted US films from the McCarthyism days of the early 1950s. Although other labor-referent films dating back to the 1920s dealt with their share of opposition, that which surrounded Herbert Biberman's film and its participants stands out in some ways due to the fact the film was made in the face of political and industry opposition. The film continues to find an audience in spite of its original exhibitive difficulties. In many ways it is the film's reliance on telling the story as a bio-fictional fantasy-type narrative, rather than that of a realist documentary, that gives the film its strength and applicable longevity.

Salt of the Earth was made not only at a time of great political upheaval in the Hollywood film industry but also from those with firsthand experience. The idea for the film originated with blacklisted screenwriters Paul Jarrico and Academy Award-winner Michael Wilson, who developed the story from a labor dispute unfolding in Grant County, New Mexico, and presented it to their partner, director Herbert Biberman. Biberman had recently spent time in jail as one of the infamous 'Hollywood Ten' for refusing to discuss his political affiliations after being named as a Communist by Budd Schulberg in one of the House Un-American Activities Committee (HUAC) hearings. The trio had been looking for a film project to develop of exactly this sort, and set about making the film in direct collaboration with the subjects they would be portraying.

The story in Salt of the Earth focuses on a fair wages and conditions strike between the Mexican American members of the International Union of Mine, Mill and Smelters Workers Local #890, and Empire Zinc. For legitimacy, many of the miners portrayed in the film were members of the Local #890, including one of the main characters, Ramon Quintero, portrayed by Juan Chacon, on whom the character was based. As the strike wears on unsuccessfully, the story unfolds with many of the wives of the strikers (spearheaded by Esperanza Quintero (Rosaura Revueeltas), a character based on Chacon's wife Virginia) overcoming their initial sociopatriarchal positioning to join the fight on the front lines, while the men stay at home with the families. Such social reversals took the narrative beyond the labor-capitalist models developed in the silent era and allowed the film enough ambiguity to stand in for oppression of all sorts. This approach, coupled with some early suggested changes in the script from union members, allowed the film to avoid the typical racial and sexual stereotyping of the times. In tandem, this provided the film with fewer polemics to date the fight than bits of optimism, allowing future viewers to apply the struggle to multiple social and political interpretations.

The entire production and exhibition process of Salt of the Earth was met with resistance because the film was made by individuals black-listed in the industry and was being labeled as narratively relative to certain Communist ideology. This obstacle manifested itself not only in the reluctance of Hollywood unions to allow production workers be hired on the film but also in postproduction, as labs and editing houses were threatened with repercussions of their own, should they participate. Opponents as influential as RKO's Howard Hughes and Californian Congressman Donald Jackson labeled the film as anti-American propaganda and broadened the call to stop its production. The fact that a crew was assembled and even did so by breaking with certain industry Jim Crowisms only added to the importance that the film has garnered over the years. Lead actress Revueltas even had a run-in with immigration and was deported and black-listed from the United States. Her remaining scenes and emotional narration had to be completed in Mexico, away from Biberman and the principal production, with film being smuggled back and forth across the border. Revueltas, who was one of the few trained actors in the film, and a successful one, eventually found her career somewhat stifled because of the film, finding only occasional work after Salt of the Earth, such as a short stint in Berlin as part of Bertolt Brecht's company.

Completed in 1954, Salt of the Earth became an enigma of sorts, as initial exhibition was, at best, sparse. The film did manage to run in a few metropolitan areas, such as Los Angeles and New York, but even those were cut short due to continued pressure on the theaters, this time including projectionist unions. In some regard the conservatives appeared to have won: although they were unable to stop the film entirely, they were certainly able to suppress the film from the majority of the 1950s audience.

It wasn't until many years later, when politically active students rediscovered the film and recognized the ongoing relevance of not only the struggle depicted onscreen but the one that occurred in bringing the story to the screen, that the film finally received the widespread exhibition it had always deserved. In 1969 the film began regular showings on university campuses around the United States, at times even accompanied by lectures from Biberman. The dissonance resulting from the students' protests resembled all too closely that which was experienced by Biberman, and diegetically by the Quintero characters.

Aesthetically speaking, Salt of the Earth is a decent film, and one that requires no real concessions for any of its shortcomings. The majority of actors who worked on the film were not professionals, which Biberman acknowledges in the closing credits. Although the performances may come across as rudimentary, perhaps they compensate for the overtly picturesque cinematography, keeping the film somewhat grounded in realism, while the visuals maintain an aura of fantasy. Biberman's style is more that of classical Hollywood than a utilization of documentary conventions, providing more ambiguity in the film's message than the iconoclastic subversiveness of which the film was accused. As with many controversial entities, Salt of the Earth fails to deliver in the way of sensationalism, but its political and social relevance will continue to be recognized for generations to come.

DINO EVERETT

Salt of the Earth (US, Independent Productions Corporation, 1954, 94 mins). Distributed by Independent Productions Corporation. Produced by Paul Jarrico, Adolfo Barela, and Sonja Dahl Biberman. Directed by Herbert J. Biberman. Written by Michael Wilson, additional writing by Michael Biberman. Cinematography by Stanley Meredith and Leonard Stark. Music by Sol Kaplan. Edited by Joan Laird and Ed Spiegel. Filmed in Grant County, New Mexico, and parts of Mexico.

Further reading

Kael, Pauline, 'Morality Plays Right and Left', Sight and Sound 24, no. 2, October/December 1954: 67-73.

- Lorence, James J., The Suppression of Salt of the Earth, Albuquerque: The University of New Mexico Press, 1999.
- Miller, Tom, 'Salt of the Earth Revisited', Cineaste XIII, no. 3, 1984: 31–6.
- Ross, Steven J., Working Class Hollywood, Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1998.
- Trumbo, Dalton, The Time of the Toad: A Study of Inquisition in America, New York: Harper & Row, 1972.
- Wilson, Michael and Silverton Rosenfelt, Deborah, Salt of the Earth, Old Westbury, NY: The Feminist Press, 1978.

Sander, Helke

Helke Sander belongs to the first generation of political filmmakers who emerged from the leftist milieu of the 1960s in Germany. Widely labeled as the 'The New German Film', this movement had ultimately withdrawn from the misguided development of postwar German cinema with the conception of the Oberhausener Manifest, a pamphlet published in 1962 by a collective of twenty-six filmmakers (among them Alexander Kluge and Edgar Reitz). The declaration constituted a clear breach with the commodities and conventions of the films produced within the German industry after World War II, a quixotic mixture of kitschy Heimatfilms and artless comedies.

As a matter of principle, Helke Sander—as well as her contemporaries Ulrike Öttinger, Helma Sanders-Brahms, and Margarethe von Trotta—must be seen in the context of this so-called German New Wave, although Sander soon opposed the authoritative position of her male colleagues, criticizing that their manifesto had not accounted for one single female opinion. Her own films were a radical move away from the predominantly paternalistic practice of political filmmaking in the 1960s and 1970s, which culpably dismissed women as an active political subject. Returning from Finland in 1965 where she had directed a number of television and theater productions, Sander became one of the first female students who graduated from the newly founded Deutsche Film- und Fernsehakademie Berlin (DFFB).

Sander's notion of filmmaking as a political practice shaped not only the first generation of female filmmakers and media workers in Germany but also resonated in the steadily growing women's liberation movement of the early 1970s. Her claim for a radical shift of the social paradigm within German society corresponded with current debates about equal rights, abortion laws, and the economical status of women within the domestic work sphere. Films such as Brecht die Macht der Manipulateure/Break the Power of the Manipulators (1967/8), Eine Prämie für Irene/A Bonus for Irene (1971), and Die allseitig reduzierte Persönlichkeit—Redupers/The All-Sided Reduced Personality (1977) addressed a variety of social and political issues that directly affected women's everyday lives.

By the early 1970s Sander had realized that women's emancipation as societal subjects was likely to fail as long as the means of production remained distributed disproportionately. In November 1973 her conception of a collectively political practice culminated in the Internationale Frauenfilmseminar in Berlin, which established a network of female filmmakers from all over the world and entailed the foundation of the self-published journal Frauen und Film. However, Sander did not succeed in elaborating on a coherent practical framework of feminist filmmaking; rather, she provided a fundamental critique of the patriarchal control mechanisms in Western societies. Considering her inadequate labour conditions, it is no surprise that Sander never accomplished such a practical foundation of her work. Throughout her career many projects had collapsed due to resentments and a lack of funding, which left considerable gaps in her body of work.

Whether Helke Sander's complete work is divided into two categories—the fiction, or rather fictitious, film with biographical and historiographical elements and the classical documentary—one characteristic distinguishes all of her films: her treatment of content over form. Aesthetical issues were never a concern for her. Far from being ideological, Sander's films struggle with the disavowal of female subjectivity in a broader cultural sense and the difficulty of political articulation with a predominantly male terminology. Her 'fictitious' films of the 1960s and 1970s featured playful and ironic approaches to these structural problems and made her a key figure among feminist filmmakers in Germany. However, it was primarily the documentary, Befreier und Befreite (1991/2), a critical account of the war crimes of Russian soldiers towards German women during World War II, that finally put her name on the map of internationally acclaimed documentary filmmakers.

ANDREAS BUSCHE

Biography

Born in Berlin, Germany, January 31, 1937. Studied German Language/Literature and Psychology at the University of Helsinki, Finland 1960–2. Directed productions for Finnish Television 1964–5. Returned to Berlin 1965. Student at the Deutsche Film und Fernsehakademie Berlin 1966–9. Foundation of the women's collective 'Brot und Rosen' 1972. Coorganized the Internationale Frauenfilmseminar in Berlin 1973. One year later founded the journal Frauen und Film, published and edited by Sander until 1982. Teaching position at the School for Plastic Arts in Hamburg 1975. In 1992 her documentary film, Befreier und Befreite, caused controversy in the United States. Professorship at the School for Plastic Arts in Hamburg 1981–2001. 1989–93 codirector of the Bremer Institut Film/Fernsehen.

Selected films

- 1967–8 Brecht die Macht der Manipulateure: director, writer
- 1971 Eine Prämie für Irene: director, writer
- 1977 Die allseitig reduzierte Persönlichkeit: director, writer
- 1981 Der subjektive Faktor: producer, director, writer
- 1983 Der Beginn aller Schrecken ist Liebe: coproducer, director, writer
- 1989 Die Deutschen und ihre Männer: producer, director, writer
- 1992 Befreier und Befreite: coproducer, director, writer

Further reading

- Elsaesser, Thomas, New German Cinema—A History, Basingstoke and New Brunswick, NJ: Macmillan/ Rutgers University Press, 1989.
- Hansen, Miriam, 'Frauen und Film and Feminist Film Culture in West Germany', in Sandra Frieden, Richard W. McCormick, Vibeke R. Petersen, and Laurie Melissa Vegelsang (eds), Gender and German Cinema: Feminist Interventions, Vol. 2, Oxford: Providence, 1993.

- Knight, Julia, Women and the New German Cinema, London and New York: Verso Books, 1992.
- Mohrmann, Renate, Die Frau mit der Kamera, Munchen and Wien: Hanser Verlag, 1980.
- Silverman, Kaja, Helke Sander and the Will to Change, Discourse 6, 1983.

Sang des bêtes, Le

(France, Franju, 1949)

Le Sang des bêtes/The Blood of the Beasts, the first of Georges Franju's documentaries, is among the most beautiful and upsetting of films: for Franju, the two attributes were inseparable. In interviews he observed that 'in my short films, when I could choose the subject, I was always drawn to themes that I didn't want to touch because they frightened me', and that he had chosen to make a film about slaughterhouses 'because I love animals' (Milne 1975). No film before or after Le Sang des bêtes has administered such concentrated doses of pity and terror; yet in defiance of Aristotle's canons of tragedy, Franju offers the viewer no catharsis. Shifting abruptly from surrealist disorientation to misty lyricism to matter-of-fact horrors so extreme as to elicit laughter, Le Sang des bêtes is both indelible and utterly resistant to interpretation. Franju's most famous short film, it is also, at moments, almost unwatchable: a contradiction emblematic of its director's conflicted relationship to documentary.

According to Franju, the subject came first: 'I never wanted to be a filmmaker at all [...] I wanted to investigate a particular subject' (Levin 1971). Thirty-seven years old when Le Sang des bêtes was made, he had been involved with film for more than a decade as an archivist and administrator when the slaughterhouse idea came to him. For a first film, Le Sang des bêtes is extraordinarily accomplished, due in large part to Franju's astute choice of collaborators: the cinematographer Marcel Fradetal (who had worked on Dreyer's Vampyr), the composer Joseph Kosma (who had worked regularly with Renoir and Carné on such films as La Règle du jeu and Les Enfants du paradis), and Franju's colleague at the Institut de Cinématographie Scientifique, Jean Painlevé, maker of documentaries on vampire bats and sea urchins, among other creatures, and author of the voice-over commentary to Le Sang des bêtes.

With the exception of Painlevé, Franju's collaborators did not come from a documentary background, and this accounts (in part) for the film's disconcertingly elegant visual and aural textures, its likeness to the work of such directors as Lang and Murnau. For Franju, in documentary 'you endow what's natural with an aspect of the artificial [...] some of the skies that I waited for in Le Sang des bêtes seem almost to be studio skies' (Levin 1971). As with all his subsequent documentaries, Franju had scripted and planned the editing of Le Sang des bêtes before he began shooting. Yet far from allowing us to feel a comfortable aesthetic distance from the violence that the film depicts, Franju's careful deployment of artifice only brings the reality of the slaughterhouse more painfully, because more deliberately, to light—to light, that is, in a literal as well as a metaphorical sense. Franju later explained that 'the choice of the month of November for shooting the interiors was dictated by the fact that at this season of the year the animals are slaughtered by electric light, and the blood steaming in the glacial cold of the scalding bays allowed us, despite all the technical problems, to compose our images' (Durnat 1967). The animals' blood becomes, perhaps cruelly, an aesthetic means, but a means for revealing, precisely, the horror of bloodshed.

One could describe Le Sang des bêtes as a work composed of a prologue and four movements or episodes, followed by a coda. In the prologue, which Gabriel Vialle has called a 'surrealist overture' (Vialle 1968), we are shown a series of views, from panoramic shots to extreme close-ups, of a wasteland on the outskirts of Paris with scattered high-rises, a bare tree and, incongruously, bits of a flea market: a chandelier hanging from a branch, a man sitting alone at a huge Louis XV table, and, juxtaposed in one shot, a nude armless female mannequin, a phonograph horn, and the line of a train in the distance cutting across the screen. A young woman's voice describes the scene in a lyrical voice-over; a young couple kiss; and Franju cuts to an off-kilter medium shot of a train and a slagheap. The voice-over resumes: at the Porte of Vanves, there are also the abattoirs of Vaugirard; these specialize in the slaughter of horses. A man's voice now takes over, enumerating the different tools of the abattoir as we see a close-up of a hand picking up each in turn: poleaxes, spikes, stun guns. A white horse is led up to the slaughterhouse door. The first movement, then, shows the slaughter of horses; the second, of cattle (another white beast); the third, of calves for veal (whiteness again: 'for the white meat of veal, total blood drainage by decapitation is necessary'); the fourth, of sheep.

The voice-over names each new location, introduces some of the men who work there, and describes the procedures in a scrupulously neutral tone. No outrage is voiced. It is the film's aesthetic composure, in fact, that imprints the horror it reveals so indelibly. Franju does not overwhelm us with gore or use cinematic shock tactics (amplified animal cries, fast cutting, extreme close-ups, weird angles) to augment the violence. Rather, the film's visual style—the diffuse light registered in carefully modulated greys, the use of mainly medium and long shots at eye level, the lucid but unemphatic mise-en-scène—is designed not to hector but to let us see. This is why all the reassuring interpretative claims made for Le Sang des bêtes—the idea, for example, that as we watch, 'a sense of reconciliation floods the screen' (Milne 1980); the idea that the film condemns animal slaughter; the idea that it doesn't condemn animal slaughter; the idea that slaughter stands allegorically for the Holocaust—ring so false. Simply by looking, Franju uncovers the insolite, the strange, in the everyday. A long shot of twelve headless sheep lying on a conveyor belt, their legs still kicking, looks like a dance number out of Busby Berkeley; another shot of six pure white, flayed veal carcasses laid out on six workstands, a mist rising off them, evokes nineteenth-century spirit photographs. Such moments of violence are, in Franju's phrase, 'lyrical explosions' that shock us into seeing, but Le Sang des bêtes does not make our judgments for us.

HAL GLADFELDER

See also: Franju, Georges

Le Sang des bêtes/The Blood of the Beasts (France, 1949, 22 mins). Directed by Georges Franju. Assistant directed by André Joseph and Julien Bonardier. Script by Georges Franju. Commentary by Jean Painlevé, spoken by Nicole Ladmiral and Georges Hubert. Cinematography by Marcel Fradet, assisted by Henri Champion. Edited by André Joseph. Music by Joseph Kosma. Sound by Raymond Verchère. Produced by Forces et Voix de France.

Further reading

- Durnat, Raymond, Franju, London: Studio Vista, 1967.
- Franju, Georges, 'Le Sang des bêtes', shooting script, L'Avant-Scène du Cinéma 41, 1964: 46–50.
- Levin, G. Roy, 'Georges Franju', in Documentary Explorations: 15 Interviews with Film-makers, Garden City, NY: Anchor Press, 1971: 117–29.
- Milne, Tom, 'Georges Franju: The Haunted Void', interview, Sight and Sound 44, no. 2, 1975: 68–71.
- 'Georges Franju', in Richard Roud (ed.), Cinema: A Critical Dictionary, New York: Viking, 1980: 387–93.
- Sloniowski, Jeannette, "'It Was an Atrocious Film": Georges Franju's Blood of the Beasts', in Barry Keith Grant and Jeannette Sloniowski (eds), Documenting the Documentary: Close Readings of Documentary Film and Video, Detroit, MI: Wayne State University Press, 1998.
- Vialle, Gabriel, Georges Franju, Paris: Editions Seghers, 1968.

Sans Soleil

(France, Marker, 1982)

Like many of his other films, Chris Marker's Sans Soleil/Sunless might be described as an imaginary documentary made of real documents—or is it, as the voice that narrates the film repeatedly asks, the other way around? As a work that continually calls into question the status and significance of its own representations, Sans Soleil has been classified as 'an instance of postmodernism' (Branigan 1992), but its closest affinity may rather be with a work like Laurence Sterne's Tristram Shandy, written over two hundred years earlier. Like Sterne's novel, Marker's film is an invented autobiography of often breathtaking digressiveness, complexity, poignancy, and wit, which unfolds not according to a linear chronology or argument but across a network of associations, echoes, and resemblances—both a meditation on history and memory and a disenchanting interrogation of its own form.

Marker has described the 'story' of Sans Soleil in these terms:

An unknown woman reads and comments upon the letters she receives from a friend—a freelance cameraman who travels around the world and is particularly attached to those 'two extreme poles of survival'—Japan and Africa, represented here by two of its poorest and most forgotten countries, even though they played an historical role: Guinea-Bissau and the Cape Verde Islands. The cameraman wonders (as cameramen do, at least those you see in movies) about the meaning of this representation of the world in which he is the instrument, and about the role of memory he helps to create. A Japanese pal of his, who clearly has some bats in the belfry (Japanese bats, in the form of electrons) gives his answer by attacking the images of memory, by breaking them up on the synthesizer. A filmmaker grabs hold of this situation and makes a fiction of it, but rather than present the characters and show their relationships, real or supposed, he prefers to put forward the elements of the dossier in the fashion of a musical composition, with recurrent themes, counterpoints, and mirror-like fugues: the letters, the comments, the images gathered, the images created, together with some images borrowed. In this way, out of these juxtaposed memories is born a fictional memory.

(Marker 1983)

The narrative structure that Marker outlines here is like that of another film he made twenty-five years before, Letter from Siberia (1957), the opening voice-over of which—'Je vous écris d'un pays lointain' ('I'm writing to you from a far-away country')—could stand as the epigraph to his whole career as a filmmaker. As with others of Marker's works, it is unclear where collaboration ends and mythomania begins. According to an end credit, 'Sandor Krasna's letters were read by Alexandra Stewart' (Florence Delay in the French version), but Sandor Krasna, the cameraman, seems to be a fictional surrogate for Marker himself, notwithstanding the straight-faced biography included in the film's publicity material; certainly his letters are unmistakably Markerian in their language, their obsessions, their speculative improvisations on the themes of memory and time. In which case Sandor's brother, Michel Krasna, credited with the film's electronic sound, is presumably yet another of the filmmaker's fictional personae. The 'Japanese pal', Hayao Yamaneko, credited with the synthesized manipulation of the cameraman's images—a key element in the film's provocatively antirealistic visual texture—is perhaps real, but in fact the very uncertainty that Marker creates by listing elusive, untraceable collaborators as coauthors of this intensely personal film is precisely the point: personal identity is rooted in memory narratives that are unstable, impersonal, and endlessly vulnerable to manipulation and decay.

Sans Soleil is typical of Marker's work in the prominence—indeed, the shaping role—of its voice-over commentary. Although there are certainly visual continuities created through the recurrence and transformation of certain motifs (cats, emus, dreaming passengers on ferries and trains, neighborhood festivals, political demonstrations, video games, women in a marketplace), it is the commentary that links the disparate elements of the film together and articulates its principal themes. In part, this could be seen as a response to the practical problem of assembling a single coherent film out of footage accumulated over fifteen or more years from extremely far-flung locales: Iceland, Japan, Guinea-Bissau and Cape Verde, Île-de-France, the Netherlands, Okinawa, San Francisco, the island of Sal, and perhaps others. Of course, this 'problem' was of Marker's own invention. There was no outward necessity to bring these particular materials together, so the decision to do so through the device of a (partly) fictional commentary suggests that the film's real subject is disparateness itself, the myriad forms of temporal, geographical, historical, and social distance that travel and all the varieties of information technology (not least, film itself), far from repairing, only multiply.

The juxtaposition of commentary, documentary image (much of the footage filmed vérité-style with handheld cameras), and electronic manipulations of both sound and image allows Marker to comment in passing on an extraordinary range of philosophical, political, and aesthetic issues. Those most directly relevant to the subject of documentary film involve the fraught relationship between images and different sorts of truth, the image as a repository of cultural and historical memory. Late in the film, half a world away from Japan, the speaker reads these words: 'I remember that month of January in Tokyo. Or rather I remember the images I filmed of the month of January in Tokyo. They have substituted themselves for my memory—they are my memory. I wonder how people remember things who don't film, don't photograph, don't tape'. In this passage, the writer both affirms the efficacy of the mechanically reproduced image in making memory possible and registers a sense of loss: he no longer has the capacity to remember within himself, independent of technological mediation. Perhaps he never had that capacity. If Marker seems sometimes to lament his and our dependence on mechanical forms of memory, at other moments—such as during his account of the revolutionary struggles in Guinea-Bissau that led to the overthrow of the Portuguese dictatorship—the documentary image enables memory to outlast or circumvent historical oblivion. By isolating and reflecting on the images out of which it is made, Sunless places itself in the same relation to documentary as Tristram Shandy occupies in relation to the novel: at once the most singular and, as Viktor Shklovsky contended, 'the most typical' of its kind.

HAL GLADFELDER

See also: Marker, Chris

Sans Soleil/Sunless (France, 1982, 100 mins). Distributed by Argos Films. Conception and editing by Chris Marker. Assistant direction by Pierre Camus. Editorial assistance by Anne-Marie L'Hôte and Catherine Adda. Commentary read by Alexandra Stewart (English version) and Florence Delay (French version). Electronic sound by Michel Krasna and Isao Tomita. Music by M. Moussorgski, J. Sibelius (treated by Isao Tomita); song by Arielle Dombasle. Sound mix by Antoine Bonfanti and Paul Bertault. Special effects by Hayao Yamaneko. Film extracts from Sana na N'hada (Carnival in Bissau), Jean-Michel Humeau (Ranks ceremony), Mario Marret and Eugenio Bentivoglio (Guerilla in Bissau), Danié le Tessier (Death of a Giraffe), and Haroun Tazieff (Iceland 1970). Still photography by Martin Boschet and Roger Grange.

Further reading

- Branigan, Edward, Narrative Comprehension and Film, London: Routledge, 1992.
- Casebier, Allan, 'A Deconstructive Documentary', Journal of Film and Video 40, no. 1, 1988: 34–9.
- Howe, Susan, 'Sorting Facts; or, Nineteen Ways of Looking at Marker', in Charles Warren (ed.), Beyond Document: Essays on Nonfiction Film, Hanover, NH: Wesleyan University Press, 1996: 295–343.

- Lopate, Philip, 'In Search of the Centaur: The Essay Film', in Charles Warren (ed.), Beyond Document: Essays on Nonfiction Film, Hanover, NH: Wesleyan University Press, 1996: 243–70.
- Marchessault, Janine, 'Sans Soleil', CineAction! 5, 1986: 2–6.
- Marker, Chris, unpublished publicity material for New Yorker Films press kit for the American release of Sunless/Sans Soleil, 1983, from Pacific Film Archives (Berkeley, CA) CineFiles website, www.mip.Berkeley.edu/cinefiles
- 'Sunless', Semiotext(e) 4, no. 3, 1984: 33–40.
- Rafferty, Terrence, 'Marker Changes Trains', Sight and Sound 53, no. 4, 1984: 284–8.
- Russell, Catherine, Experimental Ethnography: The Work of Film in the Age of Video, Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 1999.
- Walsh, Michael, 'Around the World, Across All Frontiers: Sans Soleil as Dépays', CineAction! 18, 1989: 29–36.

Sauvage, André

André Sauvage (1891–1975) was one of the most talented filmmakers to emerge in Paris during the 1920s. He figures among the small group of avant-garde cinematographers who were passionate about this new form of expression and who actively explored the medium's formal and social potential. Film historians qualify the short period of European cinema between 1927 and 1933 as the 'nouvelle vague documentaire' (the documentary New Wave of 1928), which ensured the transition between silent and sound film. That brief period was the most important time for André Sauvage's 'poetic modernist documentary films' (Aitken 2001).

The 1920s were years of exciting developments in documentary film. The camera, ever more mobile, was a part of the renewed discovery of the world, near or far. The profound human quality of Nanook of the North (Robert Flaherty, 1923), the Swedish avant-garde interest in nature as an autonomous film subject, and the dynamism of the formal experimentation of the Soviet montage techniques captured the imagination of a generation. Human adventure, the perpetual motion of people in time and space and the technological challenges of his time became André Sauvage's major cinematographic themes. The loose narrative structure of his films, combined with his mastery of film technique and careful imagery, transformed his work into visual poetry. This is especially true of his films on Paris and Greece. He often worked alone (shooting and editing) with limited funding and equipment, or with very small crews. He created his own production company, Les Films André Sauvage, more to suit his independent personality than as a venue for his commercial abilities.

André Sauvage turned his camera on mountain climbers (La Traversée du Grépon, 1923); on the urban environment as the ideal microcosm of modernity and on ordinary Parisians working and strolling in their city (Études sur Paris, 1927); on Greece past and present, deftly depicting the archeological sites, the fishing villages, country roads, and peasants (Portrait de la Grèce, 1927); on his own children playing in the garden of his house (Rue du Pré-aux-Clercs (les Sauvages), 1930); and on the trying but extraordinary car expedition across Central Asia between Beirut and Peking (La croisière jaune/The Yellow Cruise, 1934). André Sauvage did not like to categorize film in genres. Ghali wrote that Sauvage may have been afraid of marginalizing documentary films, whereas his artistic aims were to couple truth and reality without excluding imagination. This is what is implied in the expression 'creative documentary' (Jeancolas 1989).

His best-known films are the series of five short cinematographic studies on Paris, Études sur Paris (1928), an evocative urban journey through the diverse activities of the city, quietly observed using subdued lighting: Nord-Sud; Paris-Port; Petite Ceinture; Les Îles de Paris; and De la Tour Saint-Jacques à la Montagne Sainte-Geneviève. They reflect his intimate knowledge of the city's rhythms and his fascination with movement. He introduced impressionist and sometimes mysterious images of the less well-known parts of Paris, such as the barges slowly passing through the underground section of the Canal Saint-Martin. Some shots take the viewer out to the city's limits, along the old line of fortification, where the rag-pickers in La Zone: Au pays des chiffonniers/The Zone: In the Country of the Ragmen lived and toiled (Georges Lacombe, 1928), or recall sequences of other city films such as Walther Ruttmann's Berlin: Die Sinfonie der Großstadt/Berlin: The Symphony of a Great City (1927).

The 1931–2 film work for La croisière jaune confirmed his talent. This feature-length documentary film was financed by the French car manufacturer André Citroën to display Sauvage's versatile half-tracks. André Sauvage disavowed the film that premiered in March 1934, much delayed by serious postproduction problems and the sponsor's decision to seize the film stock and hire another filmmaker, Léon Poirier, to do the final cut. Sauvage believed that the editing, the music score, and the commentary had destroyed his film beyond recognition; however, enough of the extraordinary images remain of men and machines progressing through magnificent scenery, combined with his mastery of light, his empathy towards ordinary people—local guides and carriers recruited along the way between Persia and China—who made the adventure possible. There are also segments of direct sound—traditional music or brief conversations and messages—recorded by pioneering sound technician Robert William Sivel.

André Sauvage had a keen eye, a sensitive approach to his subjects, and a wonderful sense of humor. In what is left of his films, his empathy is expressed in his choice of characters and how he discreetly captured the social contrasts of his time, whether he was filming workers in Paris or servants in British India. During the Citroën expedition he did not shy away from filming the political violence inflicted on the Chinese people by warlords, as their country moved toward disintegration. In his cinematography he combined the eye of the painter with the eye of the social observer. At the age of forty-three, disgusted by the takeover of his film material of the Central Asia expedition—which, according to Philippe Esnault, amounted to one hundred and fifty thousand metres of negatives, positives, images, and sounds—André Sauvage abandoned filmmaking altogether.

SUZANNE LANGLOIS

Biography

Born July 1891 to a middle-class merchant family from the Bordeaux region in south-western France. Upon his father's death, he quit his graduate studies and in 1917 went to Paris. There, he met a group of young writers and poets and was attracted to artistic work. He began to write, but soon became more interested in painting, before being seduced by film. Sauvage started a career in filmmaking in the early 1920s, but ended it abruptly in 1934, following the sad ending of the croisière jaune expedition. Although he lived to eighty-four years of age, he never returned to filmmaking, preferring farming and painting.

Selected films

- 1923 La Traversée du Grépon: director
- 1927 Portrait de la Grèce: director, producer
- 1928 Études sur Paris: Nord-Sud; Paris-Port; Petite Ceinture; Les Îles de Paris; De la Tour Saint-Jacques à la Montagne Sainte-Geneviève: director, editor, producer
- 1930 Rue du Pré-aux-Clercs (les Sauvages): director, producer
- 1934 La croisière jaune: cinematographer

Further reading

- Abel, Richard, French Cinema: The First Wave 1915–29, Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1984.
- Aitken, Ian, European Film Theory and Cinema. A Critical Introduction, Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press, 2001.
- Albera, François and Gili, Jean A. (eds), 'Dictionnaire du cinéma français des années vingt', 1895 Revue de l'Association française de recherche sur l'histoire du cinéma 33, June 2001.
- De Comès, Philippe and Marmin, Michel (eds), Le cinéma français 1930–60, Paris: Editions Atlas, 1984.
- Esnault, Philippe, 'André Sauvage, cinéaste maudit', La Revue du cinéma 394, May 1984: 92–4.
- Gauthier, Guy, Le Documentaire. Un autre cinéma, Paris: Nathan/VUEF, 2003.
- Ghali, Nouredine, L'Avant-garde cinématographique en France dans les années vingt, Paris: Editions Paris Experimental, 1995.
- Jeancolas, Jean-Pierre, 'N.V.D. 28, appel à témoins', in 100 Années Lumière, Paris: AFAA Intermedia, 1989: 20–7.

Scandinavia

In Scandinavia, the documentary film is highly respected, and documentaries are popular on television and at the cinemas. They play an important role in public debates, and state funding supports the production of shorts and feature-length documentaries. Recently there have been two documentaries with successful commercial releases in the theatres: Heftig og begeistret/Cool and Crazy (2001), about a male choir in a small fishing village in the northern part of the country, and Alt om min far/All about My Father (2002), about a family dealing with a father who is a transvestite. In Sweden and Denmark, important directors such as Stefan Jarl, Eric M. Nilsson, Peå Holmquist, Lennart Nilsson, Jørgen Leth, Jon Bang Carlsen, Sami Saif, and Anne Wivel produce groundbreaking films.

Local actualities were produced in Scandinavia by the late 1890s, and out of the most popular types two documentary genres evolved in the 1920s: the travelogue and the 'nation-film'. The most popular early documentary genre in Scandinavia was the travelogue, and especially the expedition film. In Sweden, directors such as Prince Wilhelm and Oscar Olsson traveled to Africa, and the exotic Bland vildar och vilda djur/Among Savages and Wild Animals (1921) became a huge success. In Denmark and Norway, the camera expeditions looked mostly to colder territories. Knud Rasmussen and Roald Amundsen always made films as a part of their expeditions. The four feature-length documentaries Amundsen's cameramen made in the 1920s were very popular in Scandinavia, and even made an international impact. Unlike a film such as Nanook of the North, the documentaries produced by Amundsen employed a more 'primitive' view and aesthetic quality, resembling a series of magnificent slides, but always looking at the foreign cultures from outside. These expedition films were often marked by a nationalistic pathos, especially when exploring unknown territories.

Scandinavian filmmakers also explored their own countries, in a genre called 'nation-films'. In Sweden, the director Ragnar Ring produced different types of documentaries for the industry or for tourist promotion. In 1924 he made a feature-length film about Sweden, Sverige, vårt vackra land/Sweden, Our Beautiful Country. With this film a new genre was born, and after Ring's poetic homage to his country, several long documentaries were made that explored both countryside and cities. These films were very popular, since most people did not have the means or opportunities to travel, even in their own country. Some of these films from Norway and Sweden were also intended for the population of Scandinavians in the United States—for example, Se Norge/Norway Today by Gustav Lund in 1924. This genre remained popular in the early 1930s, and Norge, vårt Norge—i toner og billeder/Our Norway, in Music and Pictures by Lyder Selvig also became a success in Sweden in 1930.

While the Swedish and Norwegian 'nation-films' were tourist-like and idyllic in their images of their countries, some of the Danish films were more critical, and employed a degree of social commentary. The film Danmark/Denmark (1935), made by the Danish architect and writer Poul Henningsen, was heavily criticized in Denmark. This film has a more poetic form, and marks the beginning of a more ambitious documentary tradition in Scandinavia, both in terms of style and social criticism.

Documentaries in Scandinavia both before and after World War II were seldom concerned with social issues. Another important genre that was popular especially in Sweden and Norway was the nature and wildlife film. The Swedish director Bengt Berg's films about wild birds were popular in the early 1920s, and in Norway the director Per Høst made his first long documentaries in the late 1930s.

In Sweden, Stig Wesslén and Arne Sucksdorff are the most important names in documentary film. Wesslén's wildlife films often use the annual cycle as a way in which to organize his filmic observations of wildlife. A film such as I lapplandsbjörnens rike/The Realm of the Lapp-Bear (1940) depicts a wealth of animal life, but also makes points about the importance of defending the country. Arne Sucksdorff is one of the biggest names in Scandinavian documentary history, and his wildlife films were international hits. He started out making shorts, depicting nature and animals in the films En Sommarsaga/A Summer Saga (1940) and Trut!/Seagull! (1944), but also the city symphony, as in Människor i Stad/City People (1947). Sucksdorff often criticized civilization, but he was himself often criticized for using tame animals and having an anthropomorphic perspective on animals. This is clear in his first feature-length documentary, Det stora Äventyret/The Big Adventure (1953), in which animals sometimes seemingly think and act like people.

Like many other wildlife filmmakers, Sucksdorff turned to a more ethnographic perspective in the late 1950s. His next feature, En Djungelsaga/A Jungle Saga (1957), was a portrait of the Muria tribe in India. In his last features, Pojken i trädet/The Boy in the Tree (1961) and Mitt hem är Copacabana/My Home is Copacabana (1965), he presents fully realized portraits of young people who are alienated by society. His social consciousness is important, and in the 1960s he became the mentor of Stefan Jarl, the most important modern documentarist in Sweden.

Other documentarists in the 1950s turned from wildlife to ethnography. In Norway, the most popular documentary filmmaker was Per Høst. He was a zoologist, but turned to filmmaking, and produced a wealth of short films from the 1940s throughout the 1960s. His most famous film, Same Jakki/The Laplanders (1957), was an ethnographic study of the Lapps in northern Norway and their relationship to nature.

The most famous Scandinavian documentary film in the 1950s was Kon-Tiki, which won an Oscar in 1952. The film was a joint Swedish-Norwegian venture, produced by the Swedish company Artfilm and directed by Olle Nordemar, but based on the 16mm material that the archaeologist and adventurer Thor Heyerdahl filmed when he traveled from Peru to the Polynesian islands on a balsa raft in 1947. This expedition film gave the audience a new and sensuous feeling. The low quality of the filmic material helped convey a sensation of actually being on the raft, due to the fluid and trembling images. This was a new aspect of expedition or wildlife films in the 1950s. Films no longer merely presented the world, but tried to recreate the experience of being in the represented moment with the filmmaker.

The 1950s was a golden age for documentary film in Scandinavia. Short films accompanied most features, and a large number of feature-length documentaries were produced. The introduction of television to Denmark in 1954, Sweden in 1956, and Norway in 1960 brought this golden age of short films to a close. The newsreels disappeared and were replaced by television news. Both short films and full-length documentaries nearly disappeared from the screens during the 1960s. Many filmmakers got jobs in the national television organizations, making programs in the same genres as before—biographies, travelogues, portraits, and so on—but it became harder to produce documentaries outside of the television organizations, and even harder to produce documentaries not intended for television.

Some documentary filmmakers managed to produce short films. In Denmark, Theodor Christensen and Jørgen Roos are among the most important. Theodor Christensen met John Grierson in 1939. During and after the World War II he made several outstanding shorts, including Skoven/The Wood (1941) and Det gælder din frihed/It's about Your Freedom (1946), with Karl Roos. Like most other independent directors, Christensen made shorts for different government agencies, but he managed to turn out films that not only informed the citizens about issues, but he commented on these issues as well, often in an ironic way. Christensen also made important contributions to the documentary film in Denmark when he worked at the new State Film School in the 1960s.

In Norway, the director Erik Løchen had an equal position. He started the production company ABC-Film with friends, and this company produced over one hundred shorts over the course of twenty years. They made films for different government and municipal agencies, but were also pioneers in creating the 'free artistic short film'. Erik Løchen, and friends and colleagues Erik Borge and Carsten Munch, were tired of making purely informative films. They wanted most of all to make documentaries without voice-over, and succeeded in getting the government to support the production of more artistic and poetic meditations, the first being Nedfall/Fallout (1963) by Erik Borge. This film was a poetic impression of village life, but emphasized its vulnerability in the event of atomic fallout. Løchen made several influential modernist documentary shorts, the most famous being Søring Nordover/Southerner Going North (1976), on the differences between south and north Norway.

Many documentaries produced in Denmark after World War II were journalistic or informative in character, but there were also strong connections between the documentary filmmakers and the avant-garde movement. These connections were stronger than in Norway, and the director Jørgen Roos made some of the earliest experimental films in Denmark with Flugten/Flugten (1942), with Albert Mertz, and Spiste Horisonter/Eaten Horizons (1950). Jørgen Roos is one of the most important Danish documentary filmmakers, and his work is in some ways typical of the independent filmmakers in Scandinavia. Roos made many films—informative films as well as more artistic films—and one of the characteristic features of his work is the fact that he handles a broad spectrum of themes and genres. He has made portraits of famous people and cities, travelogues, and even a three-part film about documentary filmmaking in Denmark, Den levende virkelighed/The Living Reality (1989). At the same time, he has made film-essays about bacon production, Den strömlinjede gris/The Streamlined Pig (1952), and noise, Støj/Noise (1965).

Few Scandinavian documentaries made before the late 1960s were overtly political or discussed social issues, but later in the decade this changed. Suddenly a new generation of filmmakers turned to the political documentary, using filmmaking as a weapon in the fight for radical societal changes. In Sweden, the novelist and painter Peter Weiss, another avant-garde artist turning to filmmaking, made the first controversial social documentaries with Ansikten i skugga/Faces in the Shadows (1956) and Enligt Lag/By Law (1957). These portraits of outcasts in the welfare society, made without the use of voice-over, marked the beginning of a new type of social documentary in Scandinavia, focused on attacking the wrongs perpetuated in and by the welfare society.

In the late 1960s and the early 1970s a wave of political radicalism swept through the arts in Scandinavia, leaving its mark on documentary film production. A new, angry generation of filmmakers emerged. Most important of these new filmmakers was the Swedish director Stefan Jarl. He helped to establish the organization Film-Centrum in 1968, which was an important base for the new radical filmmakers, but he is best known for his 'Mods Trilogy'—three full-length films that follow two members of Sweden's underclass, and their children, over several decades. The first two films, Dom kallar oss Mods/They Call Us Misfits (1968) and Ett Anständigt Liv/A Decent Life (1979), made an enormous impact on Scandinavian documentary film and society. The second film was shown in all schools in Sweden and Norway as part of a project to inform schoolchildren about the dangers of narcotics. Jarl's films are frightening, showing how the youngsters Kenta and Stoffe change from happy-go-lucky boys in opposition to bourgeois society, to drug addicts. Although often criticized for his methods, Jarl shows absolute solidarity with the boys. The death of Stoffe gives Ett Anständigt Liv a tragic dimension. In his third film, Det Sociala Arvet/The Social Heritage (1993), Jarl follows the children of Kenta and Stoffe, who, surprisingly, are relatively prosperous and successful. In this film Jarl includes himself to a larger degree, making a reflexive, even performative, auto-critique of his own film practice.

Stefan Jarl is mostly known for his angry social documentaries, which inspired many Scandinavian filmmakers, but also for his nature documentaries, particularly those dealing with Lapps. His film Hotet/The Threat (1987) dealt with Chernobyl's effect on the Lapps, and the short Jävna, Renskötare år 2000/Jävna: Reindeer Herdsman in the Year 2000 (1991) is a portrait of a young boy with a difficult future, squeezed between two cultures. He also made the angry ecological film Naturens Hämnad/The Revenge of Nature (1983) about the havoc wreaked by chemical fertilizers on agricultural cycles. Jarl's attention to detail, interest in regional cultures, and careful integration of the landscape makes him a cinematic poet, a true heir to Arne Sucksdorff.

The nature poet Sucksdorff has also been Jan Troell's inspiration. He switches successfully between documentary and fiction film, like many Scandinavian directors, and has made many short poetic documentaries. Troell is kinder and milder in his artistic temperament. His major documentary is the three-hour Sagolandet/Land of Dreams (1988), which is an essayistic reflection on life in a welfare society, where the state takes care of its citizens from birth to death.

In Denmark some radical films were made in the 1970s, attacking the smug bourgeoisie, but the most important director, Jørgen Leth, was an experimental modernist that kept a distance from any specific trend. He started out making stylistic and ironic commentaries on life and people in Denmark, with films such as Det Perfekte Menneske/The Perfect Man (1967) and Livet i Danmark/Life in Denmark (1971), but turned to making sport films and personal portraits or travelogues. Among his essayistic travel films are the highly original 66 scener fra Amerika/66 Scenes from America (1981) and Haiti—uden Titel/Haiti—Without Title (1996). His most famous films are his cycling documentaries, his full-length film about Giro d'Italia, Sjernerne og Vandbæren/The Stars and the Water-Carriers (1973), and En Forårsdag i Helvede/Springtime in Hell (1976).

Norwegian documentary changed drastically in 1972, when the young filmmaker Oddvar Einarson first used documentary film to attack the government, focusing on the close connections between the Norwegian government and US businesses in Kampen om Mardøla/The Fight for Mardøla (1972). The film depicted the clash between environmentalists and the police, and Einarson used every means available to criticize or ridicule the government, resulting in a fierce debate in society.

The most important modern Norwegian documentary filmmaker, Sigve Endresen, is a typical representative of the generation of radical documentarists after Kampen om Mardøla, and he started working as a member of a student film collective making the short Aldri Mer!/Never Again! (1977)—a film about neo-Nazism. Like many other Scandinavian filmmakers, he was inspired by Stefan Jarl's films about youth and drugs, and his feature-length For Harde Livet/For Your Life (1989) became a huge success. It depicted a treatment program for young drug addicts. Endresen and his team followed a group of young drug addicts for one-and-a-half years. The film has an open ending, and thus offers no traditional narrative closure. Endresen made a follow-up with Store gutter gråter ikke/Big Boys Don't Cry (1995), concentrating on a treatment program for young drug addicts in jail. Endresen's direct cinema-inspired approach has also been fruitful in his more recent works; Leve blant løver/Living among Lions (1998), a portrayal of a group of youths suffering from (and dying of) cancer, and Vektløs/Weightless (2002), about a female artist with an eating disorder.

The main representative of the socially concerned documentary in Norway today, besides Endresen, is Margreth Olin. Whether documenting daily life in a senior citizen's home in Dei mjuke hendene/In the House of Angels (1998) or discussing how Western society encourages women to develop negative body images in Kroppen min/My Body (2002), she makes courageous, personal, and important documentaries.

The personal approach is also an important feature in modern Danish and Swedish documentary. In Denmark, veteran master Jørgen Leth still makes personal portraits of artists, while another veteran, Jon Bang Carlsen, makes provocative self-reflexive documentaries. Sometimes he makes meta-films, such as How to Invent Reality (1996), or portraits, such as Addicted to Solitude (1999), a portrait of two white women living in an undeveloped and sparsely populated part of South Africa. Carlsen's approach has been criticized, since normally he first observes and then stages the entire film, even writing the lines for the characters who play themselves, but like the earlier Før gæsterne kommer/Before the Guests Arrive (1986), his sense of detail and ability to find beauty in any person makes him an important director. Among the younger directors, Sami Saif is one of the most important Danish talents. His Family (2001), about the director's search for his father, is a heart-warming and vulnerable, but still analytical, documentary.

In Sweden, Jarl and Troell still make important documentaries, and among the pioneers working with television documentaries one finds Lennart Nilsson, with his fabulous journeys through the human body, or the highly original essayist Eric M. Nilsson, who makes films about communication (or the lack thereof). Younger directors Kristian Petri, Peå Holmquist, and Susanna Edwards have also made important contributions to the genre.

Documentary filmmaking is important in Scandinavia. The public subsidizing of documentaries, both from film institutes and the 'cassette tax funds', as well as via public service television, guarantees high quality and independence. Factual entertainment and soap documentaries reach increasingly wider audiences on television in Scandinavia, but independently produced documentaries can still be controversial and angry, or essayistic and personal.

GUNNAR IVERSEN

See also: Bang Carlsen, Jon; Roos, Jørgen

Further reading

- Birkvad, Søren, Verden er Leth, Odense: Odense Universitetsforlag, 1992.
- Birkvad, Søren and Diesen, Jan Anders, Autentiske Inntrykk, Oslo: Samlaget, 1994.
- Brinch, Sara and Iversen, Gunnar, Virkelighetsbilder, Oslo: Universitetsforlaget, 2001.
- Edström, Mauritz, Sucksdorff-främlingen i hemmaskogen, Stockholm: Norstedts 1968.
- Furhammar, Leif, Filmen i Sverige, Stockholm: Wiken, 1991.
- Med TV i verkligheten, Stockholm: Etermedierna i Sverige, 1995.
- Nilsson, Mats, Rebell i verkligheten—Stefan Jarl och hans filmer, Göteborg: Filmkonst, 1991.

Schadt, Thomas

Coming from a photography background, Thomas Schadt became one of the most active and respected German documentary filmmakers of his generation. He generally develops his projects, produces them with his own company, Odysee-Film, in Berlin, and then acts as cameraman, shooting the footage himself. However, Schadt also values the input of his team. He discusses his concepts and strategies in his courses at film schools and universities, and published two books in 2002 on these topics.

The structure of an image has tremendous importance for Schadt, and his goal is to capture the right moment, even if only by coincidence. He also favors strong personalities, displaying people with this characteristic prominently in his work. The camera and sound equipment, whether film or video, is determined based on the topic and the conditions of the production.

One of Schadt's first films was Das Gefühl des Augenblicks/Sensibility of the Moment (1989), in which he traced the career of the American photographer Robert Frank. An interview conducted with Frank, which did not go smoothly, communicated the value of authenticity and its importance for documentary. The same aesthetic is evident in Die vergessene Stadt/The Forgotten Town (1992), about the town Butte, Montana, which Schadt shot on 35mm film, for theatrical release.

Schadt gained recognition for his television works, such as Der Autobahnkrieg/War on the Highway (1991), about reckless driving on German highways, and Eiserne Engel/Iron Angels (1995), about medical rescue teams that use helicopters. He followed Gerhard Schröder on his campaign in 1998 and portrayed him again in 2001, and even Schadt got the impression that it was impossible to get close to the Chancellor of Germany. He also faced difficulties while filming Wall Street (1997) because it was difficult to gain access to some locations.

One of his most ambitious projects was Berlin: Sinfonie einer Großstadt/Berlin: Symphony of a City (2002), in which he built on Walter Ruttmann's classic Berlin: Die Sinfonie der Großstadt/Berlin: The Symphony of a Great City (1927) to shoot an actual portrayal of Berlin. He did not want to shoot a remake of the montage film, in which Ruttmann presented a futuristic vision of the metropolis, but rather chose to provide a new interpretation. Schadt appropriated the symphonic concept, the aesthetic of black-and-white photography in 35mm, and the narrative structure in his portrayal of the city from early morning to midnight. His images are supported by modern music composed by Helmut Oehring and Iris ter Schiphorst. Over the course of one year, Schadt and his assistant, Thomas Keller, filmed throughout Berlin, capturing typical moments that reflect Berlin today and its history over the last seventy-five years, since the premiere of Ruttmann's film. They developed a highly abstract concept for the camera movements, which depend on the time of day being filmed. Stills from the film prove the photographic talents of Thomas Schadt.

KAY HOFFMANN

Biography

Born 1957 in Nuremberg, Germany. After a high school apprenticeship as a photographer, worked as projectionist, camera assistant, and theater photographer. From 1980 to 1983 studied at the Film and TV Academy (DFFB) in Berlin. Founded his own production company, Odysee-Film, in 1983. Since 1991 has taught at film schools and universities. Professor of documentary film at the film academy Baden-Wuerttemberg in Ludwigsburg since 2000. Cofounded the documentary initiative Der Zweite Blick (The Second View) in 2001.

Selected films

- 1982 Was hab I in Hawaii verloren: director, camera, producer
- 1983 Für die Ewigkeit: director, camera, producer
- 1986 Unterwegs nach immer und überall: director, camera, producer
- 1989 Das Gefühl des Augenblicks: director, camera, producer
- 1989 Trash-Altenessen: director, camera, producer
- 1990 Das Magazin der Bilder: director, camera, producer
- 1991 Der Autobahnkrieg: director, camera, producer
- 1992 Die vergessene Stadt: director, camera, producer
- 1993 Elf Freunde müst ihr sein: director, camera, producer
- 1994 Mordkommission M I/4: director, camera, producer
- 1995 Eiserne Engel: director, camera, producer
- 1996 Herr W und Herr W: director, camera, producer (together with Gerd Hoffmeister)

- 1997 Wall Street: director, camera, producer
 1997 Manhattan Stories: director, camera, producer
 1998 Augenzeugen: director, camera, producer (together with Reiner Holzemer)
 1998 Leben ohne Arbeit: director, camera, producer (together with Peter Schmidt)
 1998 Der Kandidat: director, camera, producer
 1999 Hauptstadtzeitung: director, camera, producer
 2000 Demokratie im Schloss: director, camera, producer (together with Peter Schmidt)
 2001 My Way—James Last: director, camera, producer
 2001 Kanzlerbilder: director, camera, producer
 2001 Straße des ewigen Friedens: director, camera, producer
 2002 Berlin: Sinfonie einer Großstadt: director, writer, camera, coproducer
 2002 Doppelleben: director, camera, coproducer

Further reading

- Fuhr, Eckhard, 'Berlin zum Kuschnel', Die Welt 12, no. 4, 2002.
 Gottstein, Björn, 'Die Stadt ohne Eigenschaft', Die Tageszeitung 12, no. 4, 2002.
 Menden, Alexander, 'Leistungssport. Hauptstadt-Filmmusik live: "Berlin: Sinfonie einer Großstadt"', Süddeutsche Zeitung 12, no. 4, 2002.
 Schadt, Thomas, Das Gefühl des Augenblicks—Zur Dramaturgie des Dokumentarfilms, Bergisch-Gladbach: Bastei-Lübbe, 2002.
 ———, Berlin: Sinfonie einer Großstadt, Berlin: Nicolai, 2002.

Schlesinger, John

John Richard Schlesinger attended Balliol College, Oxford, where he first became seriously involved with acting and filmmaking. During his student days he acted with the Oxford University Dramatic Society, served as president of the local Experimental Theatre Club, and produced his first short film, Black Legend (1948).

In 1957 he joined BBC TV as a second unit director and piloted several episodes of The Valiant Years about Winston Churchill and short topical and arts features for Tonight and Monitor under Huw Wheldon, winning an Edinburgh Festival prize for The Innocent Eye (1959). Although recent BBC administrations have usually sought to buy in programmes from freelance production companies, in the 1950s current affairs shows such as Monitor were known for nurturing a diverse range of filmmakers. Subsequently, Schlesinger directed pieces on the Cannes Film Festival, Italian opera, and comparative studies of painters.

Out of this experience, which served as a sound technical foundation for his later work, Schlesinger was offered a thirty-minute piece by the veteran documentary maker Edgar Anstey. The British Transport Films-sponsored documentary Terminus (1961) became the celebrated culmination of his series of BBC TV documentaries. Set at Waterloo station, in Schlesinger's hands it became far more than a mere observation piece: substories formed, vanished, and reappeared displaying elements of social realism that foreshadowed his subsequent work. Utilising many different perspectives—close-ups, long shots, and high and low angles—Schlesinger chose on-location sound over narration to show how democratising train travel was. A poignant story of a little boy lost, handcuffed convicts being taken to Dartmoor, discarded flowers meant for an arrival who did not show—these were just some of the many vignettes of everyday life that made up Schlesinger's cinéma vérité portrait of a London railway station. His Terminus won Schlesinger a Golden Lion award at the Venice Film Festival and a British Academy award for Best Short Film.

Schlesinger directed some two dozen documentaries on a vast range of subjects, but he was perhaps best known for his fiction movies, such as Midnight Cowboy (1969), for which he won an Academy Award for Best Director, despite the film having an X rating. Schlesinger's oeuvre was characterised by a lifelong preoccupation with gender relations, particularly homosexuality; an interest in analysing and representing subcultures, minorities, and other discriminated social groups; a relatively intellectual, middle-class outlook; and a commitment to filmmaking as entertainment rather than politics. Schlesinger also directed theatre and opera and in 1970 he was made CBE (Commander of the British Empire).

Biography

Born February 16, 1926, in London. Attended Balliol College, Oxford. After serving in the army in World War II in England and the Far East, studied English Literature and graduated from Oxford in 1950. Produced his first short film, Black Legend, as a student in 1948. Suffered a stroke in 2000 from which he never fully recovered, and died on July 25, 2003, with his companion of many years, the photographer Michael Childers, at his side.

Selected films

- 1948 Black Legend
- 1959 The Innocent Eye
- 1961 Terminus
- 1969 Midnight Cowboy

Further reading

- BBC Education, Face to Face: John Schlesinger in Conversation with Jeremy Isaacs, broadcast February 3, 1993, www.bbc.co.uk/education/lzone/movie/schles.htm (accessed May 17, 2004).
- BBC News, BAFTA to Honour Schlesinger, broadcast April 26, 2002, news.bbc.co.uk/1/hi/entertainment/film/1953423.stm (accessed 17 May 2004).
- Your Tributes to John Schlesinger*, broadcast July 29, 2003, news.bbc.co.uk/1/hi/talking_point/3095415.stm (accessed 17 May 2004).
- Brooker, Nancy J., John Schlesinger: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston: G.K. Hall, 1978.
- Davidson, Ewan, 'Terminus (1961)', Screenonline, British Film Institute, 2003, www.screenonline.org.uk/film/id.520921 (accessed 17 May 2004).
- Phillips, Gene D., John Schlesinger, Boston: Twayne, 1981.

Schoedsack, Ernest B.

Ernest Beaumont Schoedsack is best known for bringing a touch of the grand spectacle to the documentary form in the wake of Robert Flaherty's Nanook of the North (1922), but his films Grass: A Nation's Battle for Life (1925) and Chang: A Drama of the Wilderness (1927) did more than merely capitalize on Nanook's unprecedented success. Made in collaboration with his partner, Merian C. Cooper, Schoedsack's travel adventures marked the height of the expeditionary genre. Curiously, neither film is mentioned in André Bazin's famous essay, 'Cinema and Exploration', although when Bazin discusses the emergence after World War I of what he calls 'travel-films-in-the-grand-manner'—such as Léon Poirier's colonial epic, La croisière noire (1926)—he is describing a genre that Cooper and Schoedsack helped to define (Bazin 1967). Just as John Ford was credited with the coming of the 'sur-western', Cooper and Schoedsack brought an added dimension to the documentary travelogue, imbuing the form with a heightened sense of scale and depth; Cooper himself would go on to produce some of Ford's best-known westerns.

Schoedsack's autobiographical accounts of his adventures leading up to the making of Grass border on the fantastic. He ran away from home aged fourteen, working with engineering road gangs and as a surveyor before starting work as a cameraman at the Mack Sennett Keystone Studios. During World War I he flew combat missions and acted as a photographer for the Army Signal Corps, specializing in images captured while under heavy fire. He sought action even after the Armistice, working as a Red Cross photographer and assisting Polish refugees during the Polish–Russian conflict. Schoedsack drove ambulances, rescued refugees from Russian oil fields, and filmed the destruction of the Dnieper Bridge as the Polish retreated from Kiev. In the midst of this period, in 1918, he first encountered Cooper—a recent prisoner of war—in a Viennese railroad station. In the ensuing years Schoedsack continued to eke out a living doing newsreel camerawork in Europe; in the meantime Cooper was shot down while flying missions for the Polish Army and spent time in a Moscow prison, from which he made a dramatic escape (Schoedsack 1983).

In 1923 Cooper contacted Schoedsack to join a photographic expedition ship in Djibouti and they traveled throughout the Middle East, spending a brief period with Haile Selassie in Addis Ababa. The two men's symbiotic relationship was defined from the start: Schoedsack was primarily an action photographer, whereas Cooper was an enthusiastic promoter and showman. They became determined to make a film about nomadic migrations in Iran and Iraq (then known as Persia and British-occupied Mesopotamia, respectively) because it promised the possibility of witnessing skirmishes between Kurds and their neighbors, a prospect they found 'alluring' (Schoedsack 1983). Cooper went to the United States to secure funds, returning with a budget of $10,000 and accompanied by the journalist Marguerite Harrison, who had assisted him in his escape from a Soviet prison. Attempting to economize with their limited film stock, they began in Turkey, shooting travelogue and newsreel footage.

Cooper and Harrison began filming the migration of Bakhtiari tribespeople in Persia in April of 1924. The three intended first to follow the tribe's journey from winter to summer grazing grounds, then to capture some intimate scenes of daily life between outward and return migrations, and finally to accompany the group on its journey back. Due to financial constraints, however, the film ended up chronicling a one-way journey, and would ultimately lack the personal details that the filmmakers intended. Barnouw criticizes the film for precisely this, noting that, unlike Flaherty's films, the tribespeople in Grass remain strangers, and 'no individual portrait emerges from them' (Barnouw 1983). In place of ethnographic detail, Grass sets up the theme of the documentary filmmaker as an adventurer/explorer, a figure who would reappear later in the barely disguised fictional character of Carl Denham, the showman-hero at the center of King Kong (1933). Like Denham, Cooper is referred to early on in Grass as the impresario behind the spectacle: the 'engineer who conceived the idea of recording the migration'.

Although for Schoedsack Grass would always remain a 'great lost opportunity', fragmented and rushed into completion for economic reasons, the film was successful enough to convince Jesse Lasky to fund a second expedition to Siam (now Thailand) to film Chang (Schoedsack 1983). Chang follows a more carefully scripted narrative than Grass, leading most critics to label it a 'semidocumentary'. It attempts to focus on the personal and domestic details that were absent in Grass, telling the story of a family living on the edge of the jungle and of their constant encounters with wild animals. It is the animals, and the photographers' heroic efforts to capture them on film, that quickly take center stage, and the film culminates with a dramatic elephant ('chang') stampede.

While the epic scale of Cooper and Schoedsack's early films set them apart from most documentary and travelogue work of the day, their talents were quickly (and, apparently, without their resistance) appropriated by Hollywood's increasing demand for fictional adventure films grounded in authentic locations. The Four Feathers (1929) was typical of this hybrid approach, with scenes shot in the Sudan interspersed with principal work done in a Hollywood studio. At the same time, directors such as W.S. Van Dyke were standardizing the practice of the exotic on-location shoot with films such as White Shadows in the South Seas (1928) and Trader Horn (1931).

Rango (1931), which takes place in Sumatra, saw Schoedsack's return to the wild animal adventure drama, but his live-action work was now primarily lending authenticity and immediacy to the mise-en-scène of fictional productions. In many ways King Kong was the next logical step in this migration from fact to fantasy, and is itself a kind of hybrid film: a fascinating and disturbing allegory of the will of the photographer-adventurer to capture spectacular ethnographic images, and of the public's insatiable demand for them. Cooper and Schoedsack would part ways in the 1930s, Cooper to concentrate on producing, while Schoedsack would continue directing, though he was partially blinded in an aviation accident in the 1940s. They joined forces once more for Mighty Joe Young (1949) and another spectacular experiment in actuality filmmaking, This is Cinerama (1952).

JEFFREY GEIGER

See also: Chang; Cooper, Merian C.; Grass

Biography

Born in Council Bluffs, Iowa, June 8, 1893. Worked on road gangs and as a surveyor, then as cameraman for the Mack Sennett Studios, early 1910s. Aviator and picture correspondent in US Signal Corps during World War I. Red Cross photographic unit and freelance cameraman in Europe 1918–22. Joined Merian C. Cooper on photographic correspondence tour 1923. Produced and directed Grass with Cooper and Marguerite Harrison 1924–5, distributed by Paramount. Made Chang with Cooper in Thailand, funded and released by Paramount in 1927. Married Ruth Rose, screenwriter 1926. Made a number of features with Cooper and/or Rose 1928–35, including King Kong. Thereafter worked as feature director in Hollywood. Received permanent eye injury while testing photographic equipment during World War II. Died December 23, 1979, in Los Angeles, California.

Selected films

- 1925 Grass (Grass: A Nation's Battle for Life/Grass: The Epic of a Lost Tribe): codirector, coproducer, cophotographer
- 1927 Chang: codirector, coproducer
- 1929 The Four Feathers: coproducer, codirector
- 1931 Rango: director, producer
- 1932 The Most Dangerous Game (The Hounds of Zaroff): codirector, coproducer
- 1933 King Kong: codirector, coproducer
- 1952 This is Cinerama: codirector, prologue only

Further reading

- Barnouw, Eric, Documentary: A History of the Non-Fiction Film, Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1983.
- Bazin, André, What is Cinema? volume 1, ed. Hugh Gray, Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1967.
- Brownlow, Kevin, The War, The West and the Wilderness, New York: Albert A. Knopf, 1979.
- Griffith, Richard, 'Grass and Chang', in Lewis Jacobs (ed.), The Documentary Tradition, New York: W.W. Norton, 1979: 22–4.
- Mould, David H. and Veeder, Gerry, 'The Photographer-Adventurers: Forgotten Heroes of the Silent Screen', Journal of Popular Film and Television 16, autumn, 1988: 118–29.
- Rony, Fatimah Tobing, The Third Eye: Race, Cinema, and Ethnographic Spectacle, Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 1996.
- Schoedsack, Ernest B., 'Grass: The Making of an Epic', American Cinematographer 64, February 1983: 40–4, 109–14.

Scotland

Scotland has made a substantial and distinctive contribution to documentary tradition, culture, theory, and practice. The contribution of Scotland to documentary film is multifaceted, and a subject of dispute. The debate extends beyond questions of form, aesthetics, and subject matter to issues of theory and the conditions and constraints of cultural production.

There are a number of different Scotlands, each discernible to other Scots by a set of signifiers. The Highlands and the islands are overlapping but distinct, and the Hebrides differ from the Orkneys and Shetlands. What some term the Central Belt contains both Edinburgh and Glasgow, two cities with strongly contrasting cultures. There are three languages spoken in Scotland: English, Scots, and Gaelic. Given these differences, it is inevitable that there are a number of tensions and ambiguities present in the creation, construction, and reception of media texts.

One might expect documentary to reject 'tartanry', and to develop a discourse that moves beyond sentimental, stereotypical depictions of Scotland and Scottish life. However, the enduring strengths of the images, meanings, and iconography of tartan, and the romantic nostalgia for a rural elegiac arcadia were and are such that documentary filmmakers have had to operate within the dominant hegemonic ideology that contained strong (albeit not unchallenged) versions of history and national identities.

The problem for critics and radicals, such as Colin McArthur, is that the image and echoes of tartanry were and remain popular with the populace, and that even when a film attempts modernism, as does Seawards the Great Ships (Harris, 1961), this is at the very time when what is being recorded is about to disappear into the past and comprise a part of an alternative urban and nostalgic mythology of Clydeside. Nonetheless, documentaries as different as Children of the City and Culloden ensure that humane, humanist, and socialist values are made available—in the case of these two films, quite explicitly.

A consideration of Scotland and documentary can reasonably begin with John Grierson, often considered the founding father of the British Documentary Movement. The then somewhat austere, Presbyterian, and patriarchal nature of Scottish society and culture likely informed Grierson's ideology, and thus played a distinct role in the shaping of modern documentary film.

First shown at the London Film Society in November 1929, Drifters (Grierson, 1929) is perhaps one of the most famous documentaries. Filmed in part in the Shetlands, some scenes were filmed in the North Sea on vessels the home ports of which were in England. The film faced technical and logistical difficulties, some of which were impossible to overcome with the cameras and equipment available at that time. The shoals of herring featured in the film, therefore, were filmed in the tank of a marine biological station—and the fish were apparently roach rather than herring. Despite these caveats, this silent film uses montage and a simple storyline to give the viewer an insight into the industrial processes and the human experiences and lives that are required to enable the cook and the shopkeeper to provide a simple and nutritious meal on the family table.

Partly filmed in the fishing village of Footdee in Aberdeen, Drifters gives an impressionistic sense of a community; it has its own rituals and rhythms, its own values and truths. It successfully combines a romanticized vision of masculine labor with the articulation of the economic and industrial context. In so doing, and in common with many documentaries of this type, it never quite succeeds in resolving the tensions that are integral to such an endeavor.

Born in Edinburgh, Harry Watt (1906–87) worked for both the General Post Office (GPO) Film Unit and the Crown Unit, and codirected Night Mail (with Basil Wright, 1936) and London Can Take It (with Humphrey Jennings, 1940). He directed North Sea (1938) and Target for Tonight (1941) and later joined Ealing Studios. A competent rather than a brilliant director, his contribution can be exemplified and his inclusion justified not only because of these films but also because of their ethos, best described by Watt himself when speaking of Target for Tonight as being ‘an understated and unemotional account of an average air raid’. No better epitaph for the Watt tradition and contribution to documentary can be articulated.

North Sea (1938) is an account of a trawler facing difficulty. It had narrative tension and a happy ending, and can perhaps be criticized on those grounds alone, but there are always dangers in post hoc analysis and in applying and projecting the cultural and ideological ideas from one era onto another or into the past. North Sea, like other documentaries, can also be judged by the art of the possible, and by this criterion, it was and remains a significant achievement.

Seawards the Great Ships (1960) was directed by Hilary Harris and made for Films of Scotland. It won the 1961 Oscar for best live action short film, and was the first Scottish-made film to win an Oscar. Based on a treatment by John Grierson, the film celebrates the work of shipbuilders and shipbuilding on the River Clyde at a time when that industry was about to disappear forever. The film is aesthetically distinctive in that it contains a number of abstract and almost surreal shots that use angles and shadows to develop a montage of images and icons that turn machinery and metals into a kind of art in themselves.

Waverley Steps (1947), directed by John Eldridge, presents glimpses of life in Edinburgh, and the activities of individuals visiting or living there over the course of a weekend. Waverley Steps was a commercial and critical success. It avoided tartanry and Scottish stereotypes, and realistically conveyed the thoughts and emotions of the citizens of Edinburgh regarding their city. It also managed to capture something of the contemporary reality of the city for a tourist but also for some natives at a time when it had just launched what was to become the biggest arts festival in the world. The film celebrates Edinburgh as a European city—and as an international, as opposed to merely ‘British’, city.

Jenny Gilbertson (née Brown) is included not because of a prolific output but rather because she is almost unique in being a woman director of documentary during the period in which she worked. Her 1934 film The Rugged Island—A Shetland Lyric is an example of a kind of drama documentary and can be said to foreshadow Michael Powell’s much better known The Edge of the World (1978), which was also filmed in the Shetlands. The Rugged Island is an anthropological study of the tension between choosing to stay in poverty or opting for exile. The documentary aspects lie in the photography and the evocation of land, lifestyle, community, and place.

John Gray (born 1918) worked with the GPO Film Unit and on films such as North Sea. He later moved on to a successful career with the BBC in which he was influential in news and radio. He helped to establish and/or organize the Edinburgh Film Festival and later the Television Festivals, and he thus helped to ensure a continuing and vibrant debate and discourse around film as well as media policies and texts. His own work as a filmmaker includes the somewhat elegiac and impressionistic.

West Highland (1960) was one of the last films imbued with the lyrical documentary style dominant in the 1930s. This BBC Scotland documentary was produced and directed by John Gray, who worked in collaboration with Grierson and the GPO Film Unit. West Highland follows a day in the life of the railway line from Glasgow Queen Street to Mallaig. It clearly demonstrates the linkages between city and country; urban and rural, and traces a society and lifestyle that has now largely vanished. The story is objective and elegiac and the camerawork benefits from the stunning scenery. The context is Scottish, but the message is universal.

Despite his 1967 Academy Award for The War Game (Best Documentary Feature), Peter Watkins remains best known in Scotland for Culloden (1964), a documentary that can be said to have deconstructed, with savagery and accuracy, the romantic and sentimental mythologising of tartanry and Bonnie Prince Charlie.

Based on the historical book of the same name by John Prebble, Watkins elected to film Culloden in newsreel style, with the Battle of Culloden (1746), the last battle to occur on the British mainland, taking place as though cameras were there at the time and reporters were able to ask questions of the combatants. The battle saw the end of the attempts by the exiled Prince to regain power and the throne. It was also the beginning of the end of the clan or tribal lifestyles of the Gaelic ethnic and highland rural minority. Their destruction allowed their culture and symbols to be safely sentimentalised around eighty years later and subsequently through Victorian and early twentieth-century tartanry. Many of the extras and actors in the film were local and native descendants of those who had fought in the battle some two hundred years before, and this added to the authenticity and realism of the sometimes shocking scenes.

The residual folk memory of the ruthlessness of the victors of Culloden, the Hanoverians and the Duke of Cumberland, were well shown in the film, but more moving and powerful was the articulation of the hopelessness of the situation of the common man. The inevitability of the defeat due to the incompetence of the Jacobite leaders, and the pain of a civil war in which family members were on opposite sides are powerfully conveyed in the film, as is the horrifying nature of a mid-eighteenth-century battle. Throughout, the narrative is interspersed with interviews with participants; generals and foot soldiers were each allowed their say directly to the camera and the interviewer.

The Edinburgh Film Guild can lay claim to being one of the oldest continuous film societies in the world, as it was founded in 1930. The Guild continues to meet on Sundays in the Filmhouse in Edinburgh and provides opportunities for the viewing of a range of classic and international films that include documentaries.

The journal Cinema Quarterly (founded in 1932) grew out of the Guild.

The Edinburgh International Festival of Documentary Films was founded in August 1947 with a program of approximately seventy-five films submitted. Although it eventually became the Edinburgh Film Festival, and during the 1950s moved beyond its original focus on documentary, the importance of the festival as a cultural and intellectual event for filmmakers, filmgoers, and film theorists cannot be understated and the stated intention to provide a stage for the documentary idea and practice was achieved.

The Films of Scotland Committee was set up by the Scottish Development Council in the late 1930s in order to ensure that there would be films on modern Scotland for the 1938 Glasgow Empire Exhibition. These films, like many Griersonian documentaries, were a blend of promotion and social comment; of corporate communication and constrained radicalism; of romanticism and modernism. What is significant, however, in the context of the ideological balance of power at the time and since is the fact that as Grierson put it, the committee was a deliberate attempt to use the film for national purposes.

The committee's life began with the need to have available films on contemporary Scotland for the 1938 Glasgow Empire exhibition. The result was four documentaries: The Face of Scotland; They Made the Land; The Children's Story; and Wealth of a Nation. Inevitably, these films present an optimistic view of the policies of development. Despite this, and their clear subservience to and operation within a contemporary unionist and deferential discourse, the films were excluded by the British Council from the 1939 New York-based World Fair on the grounds that they were not complementary to the heritage and royal version of England that was on display.

The Second Films of Scotland Committee operated from 1954 until 1982, and continued some of the traditions of its prewar predecessor. Many of its films were of the travelogue tourism variety, with highland and island landscapes omnipresent. A number were also about Edinburgh's culture, history, and arts, Glasgow's urban redevelopment, and new towns such as East Kilbride and Cumbernauld. Some films about Scottish artists and writers were produced.

The committee acted as a catalyst to persuade other bodies to invest in films and filming. Toward the end of its existence, it became increasingly apparent that although it might be possible to produce, the question of exhibition was becoming ever more problematic given the decline of going to the cinema and the move toward single-feature showings. Television thus became the route and the destination for documentary makers in Scotland and beyond.

ROBERT BEVERIDGE

See also: Drifters; Grierson, John; Target for Tonight; War Game, The; Watkins, Peter; Watt, Harry

Secrets of Nature

(UK, Woolfe, 1922–33)

Secrets of Nature is the name of a series of popular science films produced by British Instructional Films that began in 1922 and continued until 1933. H. Bruce Woolfe founded British Instructional shortly after World War I, with a view toward attracting intellectuals to work in the cinema. The company specialized in nonfiction films; in addition to the Secrets series, British Instructional focused on documentary reconstructions of episodes from World War I, such as Zeebrugge (1924). In the preface to The Secrets of Nature (1939), Woolfe recounts how an encounter with Gilbert White's Natural History of Selborne (1788/9) led him to conceive of a series of nature films. White, a curate in Selborne, made detailed studies of the flora and fauna that surrounded his residence. His reliance on field observations makes him a precursor of the field of ethology, which proceeds from the observation of animals in their natural habitats instead of in laboratory settings. Other practitioners of ethology, such as the French entomologist Jean-Henri Fabre, influenced the popular scientific film of the 1910s in France. Secrets of Nature continued this tradition of utilizing the cinema in a manner consistent with ethological principles of observation, although without any explicit claims to the methods of professional science. Indeed, one of the typical approaches used by the films was to anthropomorphize its plant and animal subjects, and this recourse to analogy is something that professional science would reject. The Secrets series was consciously and expertly produced for a mass audience, providing an excellent example of how 'to administer the powder of instruction in the jam of entertainment'.

Renowned for their high-production values and clever, humorous commentary, the films found favor with audiences not only in England but abroad as well, especially in Europe and America. During the series' twelve-year run, one hundred and forty-four one-reel films appeared; some years saw the release of as many as thirty films whereas in other years none were released. This erratic production schedule may have resulted from the occasional changes in leadership and institutional circumstances, and it may also have been due to the unpredictable nature of the subjects being filmed (some films were said to have taken as long as four years to complete).

Stoll Picture Productions took over British Instructional in 1924, but Woolfe remained the head of the company. His increasing involvement in producing other projects for Stoll, including Anthony Asquith's early films, led him to cede oversight of the Secrets of Nature production unit to Mary Field, who began working for British Instructional as a technical advisor on the subject of seventeenth-century fishing in the West Atlantic before she worked her way up through the ranks. One of the only women in the British film industry to figure prominently in the field of production, Field was the main editor of Secrets of Nature and was responsible for directing the majority of zoo films.

Field's principal collaborator was Percy Smith, whose name has become synonymous with the series. Smith's career as a popular scientific filmmaker began in 1907 when Charles Urban, who was impressed by Smith's photomicrographs of the tongue of a bluebottle fly, employed the young Board of Education clerk. Smith's many films for Urban included Kinematocour time-lapse studies of blooming flowers (The Birth of a Flower, 1910) and studies of insect behavior (The Balancing Blue-Bottle, 1908, and The Strength and Agility of Insects, 1911). These subjects received extensive and enthusiastic press coverage, and the remarkable ingenuity and humor they displayed would carry over into Smith's work on the Secrets of Nature. His work for British Instructional consisted of films about insects, plants, underwater creatures, and microscopic subjects. Smith filmed many of his subjects in the laboratory/studio that he established in his house in Southgate. An inveterate tinkerer, he engineered sophisticated devices for time-lapse films.

Although Smith's quirky charm perhaps best characterizes the Secrets of Nature, he was by no means the only individual to make films for the series. In addition to Field's contributions, no less than half a dozen other naturalists provided their expertise to Secrets. Charles Head shared the insect film duties with Smith, making one of the series' first films, The Lair of the Spider (1922). He also made films about bird life and small mammals. Other prominent contributors included Edgar Chance, who was responsible for The Cuckoo's Secret (1922). The first film of the series, The Cuckoo's Secret detailed the life cycle of the cuckoos of Worcestershire and was the product of many years of field observation. H.A. Gilbert and Walter Higham also provided films about birds and small mammals, as did Oliver Pike, who had contributed films about birds to Pathé's popular science catalogue as early as 1912. The bird films underline the affinity that the Secrets series had with such vernacular scientific activities as bird-watching; in general, the series appealed to a fascination with how scientific observation could transform the everyday world into a fantastic and wonderful place.

The first five years of the series (1922–6) were characterized by various cameramen and editors, but Woolfe's supervision enabled the finished product to maintain a consistent tone. In 1927, when the company went public, the core staff became more stable, with Field and Smith taking over the primary duties and Head, Pike, Gilbert, and Higham providing additional material.

The series made the switch to sound production in 1930. In 1933 British Instructional was acquired by British International Pictures, which was then in turn taken over by Associated British Picture Corporation. The head of the latter company was against what he saw as British Instructional's production of 'films for the intelligentsia'. Woolfe resigned his position shortly after the takeover and founded a similar unit, Gaumont British Instructional (GBI), at the Gaumont British Picture Corporation, where Mary Field and Percy Smith also found employment. Secrets of Nature was retitled Secrets of Life in 1934, and it continued to produce educational short films until the death of Percy Smith in March 1945. Many of the Secrets films are currently held by British Pathé.

OLIVER GAYCKEN

Further reading

- Field, Mary and Smith, Percy, The Secrets of Nature, London: The Scientific Book Club, 1939.
- Gaycken, Oliver, 'The Sources of the "Secrets of Nature": The Popular Science Film at Urban, 1903–11', in Alan Burton and Laraine Porter (eds), Scene-Stealing: Sources for British Cinema before 1930, Trowbridge: Flicks Books, 2003: 36–42.
- Low, Rachel, A History of the British Film 1906–14, London: Allen & Unwin, 1949.
- McKernan, Luke, '"Something More than a Mere Picture Show": Charles Urban and the Early Non-Fiction Film in Great Britain and America, 1897–1925', University of London, PhD thesis, 2004.

Seeing Red

(US, Reichert and Klein, 1983)

Seeing Red (1983) is the last of a series of documentaries codirected by James Klein and Julia Reichert that address feminist and working-class topics from a socialist perspective using contemporary interviews, archival footage, and popular music. Klein and Reichert's first film together, Growing Up Female (1971), is considered the first sustained documentary study of the societal forces in the United States that mold female identities. Methadone: An American Way of Dealing (1975) critiques the use of methadone to combat drug addiction. The Oscar-nominated Union Maids (1976) collects the oral histories of three women who played roles in the unionization drives in the United States during the 1930s.

In Seeing Red, which was nominated for an Oscar, the directors incorporate the direct cinema techniques of their previous films, but they expand the scope of their research and oral interviews. In the early 1980s Reichert and Klein interviewed four hundred of the one million people who had been members of the American Communist Party from the 1930s to the 1950s. Of the four hundred people interviewed, sixteen appear in Seeing Red. The codirectors note that people who were angry and dissatisfied with their involvement in the Communist Party declined interviews, so the sixteen who appear in the film are generally positive about their experiences in the Communist Party (Shafransky 1984: 25). The sixteen were chosen to give a balanced representation of regions, gender, and race in the United States, although the focus of the film is on the rank and file members of the Communist Party.

Critics have noted that the directors' attempts to address controversial issues, such as the undemocratic structure of the Communist Party, are largely unsuccessful, and that those interviewed often have incomplete or dubious historical interpretations. In interviews, Klein and Reichert defend their approach as an emphasis on personal storytelling rather than history and analysis. Cultivating a sympathetic relationship with the people who will elicit their stories, they claim, precludes a separate, analytic voice (Georgakas 1984: 27; Shafransky 1984: 26).

This concern over analytic distance is related to a broader, theoretical controversy over the direct cinema techniques employed in the film. Seeing Red, it should be noted, is by no means a pure form of direct cinema: it employs non-diegetic music, there is no immediate drama (it is concerned with past events recalled by those who lived them), it sometimes shows an onscreen questioner during interviews, and it includes archival footage. Seeing Red is firmly in a tradition of critical political documentary, pioneered by De Antonio's In the Year of the Pig (1969), which draws on direct cinema techniques. In this tradition there are extensive interviews, archival footage, nondiegetic music, and little voice-over narration. Instead of limiting the scope of a film to the immediate representation of a single event in the manner of purer forms of direct cinema, critical political documentary traces broader issues and trends. Films in this subgenre include With Babies in Banners (1978), Word is Out (1979), The Wobblies (1979), The Day After Trinity (1980), and Lodz Ghetto (1989). Often such films would include shots of demonstrations or other current political events, but these are precluded by Seeing Red's focus on the past (archival footage can represent some of these past events, but such footage isn't direct cinema in the strict sense).

Because Seeing Red employs oral interviews extensively and generally eschews voice-over narration and other modes of objective commentary, the directors are less able to analyze their material or develop the broader context of the topics they explore. Indeed, as noted earlier, instead of attempting to maintain any objective distance from the interviewees during the making of the film, the directors were sympathetic both with them and their politics, and they attempted to edit the film in ways that preserved the narrative, and the convictions, of those interviewed. In this sense, Seeing Red can also be categorized as a late example of engaged cinema, not only because of its openly militant stance but also because of its production and distribution. Engaged cinema, which flourished during the 1960s and early 1970s, avoided mainstream media and sought to build alternative collectives to finance and market films. Both Reichert and Klein are founding—and current—members of one such engaged cinema collective, New Day Films, and Union Maids is often cited as a prototypical engaged cinema film (Thompson and Bordwell 1994: 644).

A controversy arose over films in the tradition of critical political cinema and engaged cinema centers on the limited perspective allowed by the direct cinema techniques. Union Maids and Seeing Red, for example, are criticized for oversimplifying social relations by giving an incomplete, uncontested story primarily through oral interviews of small numbers of like-minded people.

Such an approach can be read as a legitimate form of counterhistory, and recent critics have argued for the recuperation of such direct cinema techniques for the creation of counter-histories that dispute conventional representations of authority and give more heteroglossic alternatives (see the entry on Union Maids). However, other critics have argued that Reichert and Klein tend to present oral histories as independent arguments and not as primary source material in need of a broader explanatory frame—a frame that at the very least would make clear the distinction between conveying the recollection of others and the meta-critical, reflexive attempt to question conventional representations of authority and history. The lack of such a frame, it is claimed, can make films such as Seeing Red appear naïve—an endorsement of a partial, self-protective history rather than a meta-critical response to previous histories (Nichols 1991: 252).

See also: Klein, James; Reichert, Julia; Union Maids

Seeing Red (US, Heartland Productions, 1983, 100 mins). Directed by Julia Reichert and James Klein.

Further reading

- Arthur, Paul, 'Jargons of Authenticity (Three American Moments)', in Michael Renov (ed.), Theorizing Documentary, New York: Routledge, 1993.
- Aufderheide, Pat, 'The Good Fight', in Alan Rosenthal (ed.), New Challenges for Documentary, Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1988.
- Boruszkowski, Lilly Ann, 'An Interview with Documentary Filmmaker Jim Klein', Journal of Film and Video 46, no. 1, 1994: 34–42.
- Georgakas, Dan, 'Seeing Red', Cineaste 13, no. 2, 1984: 27–8.
- Kleinhaus, Chuck, 'Julia Reichert and Jim Klein', Jump Cut 5, 1975: 11–12.
- Nichols, Bill, Representing Reality, Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press, 1991.
- Rosenthal, Alan, 'Union Maids', in Alan Rosenthal (ed.), Documentary Conscience, Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1980.
- (ed.), New Challenges for Documentary, Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1988.
- Rubenstein, Lenny, 'Who's Who in Filmmaking: Julia Reichert and James Klein', Sightlines 20, no. 2, 1986–7: 22–5.
- Shafransky, Renee, 'Seeing Red: An Interview with James Klein and Julia Reichert', Cineaste 13, no. 2, 1984: 24–6.
- Thompson, Kristin and Bordwell, David, Film History, New York: McGraw-Hill, 1994.
- Waldman, Diane and Walker, Janet (eds), Feminism and Documentary, Minneapolis, MN: University of Minnesota Press, 1999.

Seidl, Ulrich

Stretching the definition of the term documentary film to an extreme, Austrian filmmaker Ulrich Seidl has developed a controversial method of documentary realism and the visual imagery of the 'authentic' since the late 1980s. Seidl's films are by no means documentaries, although the documentary quality of his oeuvre is indisputable. His style is rather a complex blend of various modus operandi: exploiting core values of cinéma vérité, such as intimacy and immediacy, Seidl's work blurs the boundaries between documentation and fiction, the factual and the poetic, the grotesque and the poignant beyond recognition.

With this unapologetic approach Seidl can confidently be seen as an anticipator of a new generation of documentary filmmakers which has become increasingly popular—not to mention populist—since the late 1990s. The convergence of the documentary toward feature film aesthetics and narrative forms was a widely observed phenomenon during these years, not least due to the international popularity of figures as Errol Morris and Michael Moore. Ulrich Seidl could be fairly credited to this group of filmmakers even if his aesthetics differ from the aforementioned to a considerable extent.

The fashionable hybrid term docudrama captures the idea behind Seidl's method best. Seidl himself, rejecting the categorization 'documentary' for his work, characterizes the nature of his films as 'calculated arrangements'. His films are not so much concerned with authentic depictions of social milieux, but rather with condensed, dramatic reenactments of a social climate, constantly exploring the relation and tensions between public and private spheres in society. This artistic license enables Seidl to create an austere imagery of social milieux that highlights a harsh criticism of contemporary Austrian existential orientations.

As a matter of consequence, his work inevitably touches issues of national identity as Seidl's 'semidocumentaries' are engaged in the typology of 'the Austrian' as such to a great deal. The remaining influence of Catholicism in society, the slow transformation (and deformation) of the vast middle class, its underlying xenophobia, and the connection with the legacy of National Socialism resonate throughout his films. The consideration of this cultural environment is a key to the understanding of Seidl's stylistic and aesthetic choices.

Since his work is not influenced by a certain school or 'limited' by documentary ethics, Seidl can use his films as demonstrations of subjective 'truths'. Dramatization of the largely fact-based material is crucial to his notion of the purposiveness of documentary film: the ability to involve the viewer emotionally by juxtaposing different societal milieux. This decision results in a highly stylized visual conception: rather vérité-like observations of often redundant actions in long and alienated shots are contrasted with concisely framed tableaux vivants that give his images an almost photographic quality.

Seidl's work, largely discussed in the context of the documentary film, is particularly interesting for its laissez-faire attitude toward ethical considerations. It should be noted that Seidl's appreciation for the documentary format was initially a matter of convenience. In the 1980s in Austria documentaries were easier to finance through the public funding system. However, Seidl held fundamental resentments against the 'aesthetical double-standard of the form'. His notion of the traditional canon of ethical values as obsolete ran parallel with a reconsideration of the documentary codices in other European countries during the 1990s. The acknowledgment of new strategic practices and the increasingly casual exposure to far less 'purist' documentary ethics coincided with the rise of the Danish 'Dogma' manifesto that aesthetically bore resemblance to Seidl's method.

The growing popularity of the 'dogma' aesthetics during the mid-1990s was clearly an indicator for the necessity for a repositioning of the documentary film as such. 'Authenticity' was becoming a quality characteristic to which the fiction film laid claim. The significance of Seidl's work must be understood in the context of this shift of paradigm. His films accompanied, partially even anticipated, this continuous development; at the same time it certainly had a sustainable effect on the reception of his work in terms of its 'documentary virtues'. Seidl's work exemplifies a new understanding of the documentary film that has abandoned the paths of traditional thinking. In Seidl's documentary style 'subjectivity' is no longer a discursive address but simply an assumption.

ANDREAS BUSCHE

Biography

Born in Vienna, Austria, in 1952. Studied publishing, theater studies, and art history. In 1978 he attended the Vienna Film Academy and directed his first short films, Einsvierzig (1980) and Der Ball (1982). Dropped Film Academy in 1982. In 1989 Seidl finished the feature-length documentary Krieg in Wien, codirected with his regular cinematographer Michael Glowegger. His 1990 film, Good News. Von Kolporteurern, toten Hunden und anderen Wienern, is widely regarded as Seidl's debut. Since 1984 Seidl has also worked as a freelance filmmaker for Austrian television. In 2001 directed Hundstage (Dog Days), which is generally considered as Seidl's first fiction film, although his method hasn't changed in comparison to his previous films.

Selected films

- 1990 Good News. Von Kolporteurern, toten Hunden und anderen Wienern: director, writer
- 1993 Mit Verlust ist zu rechnen: director, writer
- 1995 Tierische Liebe: director, writer
- 1997 Der Busenfreund: director, writer
- 1999 Models: director, writer
- 2001 Hundstage: director, writer
- 2003 Jesus, Du weißt: director, writer

Further reading

- Dox: Documentary Film Quarterly* 10, winter 1996: 34–7.
- Film Comment* 6, November/December 2001: 16–17.
- Illetschko, Peter (ed.), Gegenschuss—16 Regisseure aus Österreich, Wespennest: Wien, 1995.
- Positif* 500, October 2002: 192–201.

Seleckis, Ivars

Ivars Seleckis's documentary films present realistic representations of human society. His documentaries have been noted for their detailed and sophisticated analysis of the social processes. His is a mission to capture the daily struggle for survival in the world, the continuous battle to raise and educate children, to live a decent life in this difficult day and age. Seleckis sees his role of documentary filmmaker as one of rudimentary importance. Through his films the smallest countries and the most insignificant individuals floundering in an ocean of globalization can explore their growing sense of apparent nothingness. In The Crossroad Street (1988), Seleckis presents the contemporary people of Riga, a town destined to become the capital of the independent Republic of Latvia. The people will face not only a political crisis but also the more cataclysmic threat of losing their connection to their culture, their language, their people, and ultimately themselves.

Seleckis follows this project with an examination of peasant life in the film Come Down Pale Moon. Shot in the Vidzeme region of Latvia in 1993, Seleckis follows the cycle of peasant life from spring through autumn during a critical time in Latvian political history. These men and women spent the last fifty years living, working, and dying under Soviet rule and Seleckis is there to reveal the jubilation, the fear, and the uncertainty of peasants regaining their land after so many years. His use of documentary as chronicler of political and economic transition creates a biography of the peasant, the unexpected victor over the great Soviet military machine.

Seleckis revisits Riga in New Times at Crossroad Street (1998) ten years later. With the Soviet Union in collapse and the creation of the new Latvian Republic, Seleckis chronicles the challenge the people face in preventing themselves from dissolving into a single common primitive mass. The viewer visits inside the evolving world of what by Western standards constitutes the insignificant and discovers the universality of human struggle and achievement.

CHRISTINE MARIE HILGER

Biography

Born in 1934 in Riga, Latvia, and graduated from the Academy of Agriculture and the Faculty of Food Technology in Jelgava in 1957, then from the State Institute of Cinematography in 1966. Began work in a Riga film studio in 1958 as an assistant cameraman. In 1968 directed his first film and went on to receive numerous distinctions, including Merited Master of Arts (1975) and the Three Stars Order, which is the highest reward of the State of Latvia.

Selected films

- 1980 The Widening of the World: director
- 1988 The Crossroad Street: director
- 1994 Come Down, Pale Moon: director
- 1998 New Times at Crossroad Street: director

Further reading

- Ackerman, Peter and DuVall, Jack, A Force More Powerful: A Century of Nonviolent Conflict, New York: St Martin's Press, 2000.
- Aitken, Ian, European Film Theory and Cinema: A Critical Introduction, Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press, 2001.
- Corner, John, Documentary and the Mass Media, London: Arnold, 1986.

Rotha, Paul, Documentary Diary, New York: Hill and Wang, 1973.

Selling of the Pentagon, The

(US, Davis, 1971)

The CBS Reports documentary The Selling of the Pentagon aired on February 7, 1971. Writer and director Peter Davis and correspondent Roger Mudd based much of their investigation of the Department of Defense's domestic public relations apparatus on Senator J. William Fulbright's book The Pentagon Propaganda Machine. The Selling of the Pentagon told an estimated nine million viewers that the Pentagon engaged in a pervasive, persuasive, improper, and expensive propaganda campaign to convince the American people that the United States military and its war in Southeast Asia represented essential and effective checks to the spread of international communism. Instantly controversial, the film drew condemnation and accusations of distortion from government sources, but ultimately won a congressional confrontation by successfully invoking the applicability of First Amendment protection to broadcast journalism.

In The Selling of the Pentagon, director Davis interviews 'major taxpayers' impressed with their elaborate tour of military facilities, shows Pentagon speakers extolling military confrontation to international communism, and juxtaposes a segment featuring Green Berets displaying hand-to-hand combat at an Armed Forces day with shots of nearby children mimicking their combat moves. Davis investigates the Pentagon film program, finding a marketing effort crowded with celebrities and expressing an outdated 'obsession with monolithic communism'. A montage of title cards illustrates the point: 'A Day in Vietnam', 'The Big Picture', 'Why Vietnam', 'Freedom and You', and 'Red Chinese Battle Plan'. Davis excerpts segments featuring Robert Stack cleaning a rifle, Chet Huntly standing atop an aircraft carrier, John Wayne discussing revolutionaries with a well-posed group of Marines, and CBS's Walter Cronkite authoritatively intoning that America 'must build forces at home' to confront communism. Davis examines several scenes from Red Nightmare, the Pentagon's imaginative fictional narrative produced with Warner Brothers to illustrate the dangers of a communist takeover in small-town America.

The Pentagon exalts the virtues of free thought and debate in Red Nightmare, but The Selling of the Pentagon accuses the Pentagon of stifling the free thought and commentary of America's media. Correspondent Roger Mudd describes military sources bombarding local news outlets with thousands of TV and radio tapes and millions of press releases about the military and the war in which 'The only news [...] is good news'. The New York Times's George Wilson adds that reporters assigned to the Pentagon have no alternative but to 'trust big daddy', and shots of daily briefings in Vietnam illustrate their moniker, 'Five O'Clock Follies'. Meanwhile, the Pentagon maintains five teams in Vietnam filming or staging material for television news in what a former Air Force photographer describes as 'propagandizing'.

The Selling of the Pentagon represented a landmark in the confrontation of US journalists with the Pentagon, reinforcing the schism visually with techniques borrowed from direct cinema. By 1971 most journalists reporting on the Pentagon and the war filed stories adversarial to the Pentagon's positive perspective, and even CBS's staid Cronkite openly broke with the administration in 1968 to advocate a negotiated peace and to warn Americans to no longer place any faith 'in the silver linings [American leaders] find in the darkest clouds'. Davis illustrated the dichotomy of perspective in The Selling of the Pentagon by contrasting CBS's handheld camera shots, tight close-ups, focus racking, and occasional whip pans with the slick images emanating from the Pentagon. Davis augmented this direct cinema camerawork with editing in the same tradition, using juxtaposition, jump cuts, and sequential arrangement to serve as an overt tool of commentary.

Responding to The Selling of the Pentagon, The New York Times spoke of 'integrity' while Vice President Spiro Agnew accused CBS of airing 'alleged facts which are untrue'. F. Edward Hébert, chairman of the House Armed Service Committee, called the report a 'hatchet job' and declared it 'un-American'. CBS followed a March 23, 1971, rebroadcast with fifteen minutes of edited critical comments from Agnew, Hébert, and Secretary of Defense Melvin R. Laird, and a rebuttal by CBS News President Richard S. Salant. An estimated fourteen million Americans watched the program, hearing Salant argue that no specific claims had been made against the essential accuracy of the program, only the editing of interviews and one speech within the film. However, the allegations of misleading and misrepresentative editing provided the grounds for another vocal critic, Representative Harley O. Staggers, to mount a congressional investigation.

Staggers, chairman of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, subpoenaed CBS and its president, Frank Stanton, for all materials relating to the production of The Selling of the Pentagon. Stanton testified but refused to turn over outtakes and production notes. CBS admitted that it had violated its own operating standards guidelines relating to attributing answers to questions in taped interviews, but Stanton claimed that congressional oversight of broadcast journalism would have a 'chilling effect', and was in violation of the First Amendment's protection of the press.

Staggers countered that 'the press' does not include broadcast journalism, and added that as a licensee of public airways, CBS was answerable to Congress. In open debate, representatives widely condemned CBS, but recognized the courts' previous decision that 'no rational distinction can be made' between broadcast journalism and print media in terms of First Amendment protection. The House did not act against Stanton and CBS, and it never voted on the 'Truth in News Broadcasting Bill', introduced during the floor debates. The bill demanded any 'factual reporting', including edited events or interviews, to be 'explicitly labeled throughout [the] entire showing'.

The congressional battle over First Amendment protection remains the lasting legacy of The Selling of the Pentagon, especially in connection with the nearly concurrent Supreme Court case over the Pentagon Papers. CBS continued to defy administration intimidation in 1972, when Walter Cronkite broadcast a two-part investigation of the Watergate scandal on the CBS Evening News, becoming the first major media center to support The Washington Post's story. Peter Davis embarked on an independent project that would become the controversial 1974 Vietnam War documentary Hearts and Minds. Taking even more from direct cinema, Davis eliminated a narrator and constructed his argument with carefully edited and assembled interviews, location filming, and historical footage. Cronkite's broadcast and Davis's documentary follow the example of The Selling of the Pentagon, itself following a decade of increasing conflict between journalism and government in the United States. The Selling of the Pentagon represented a major public victory for broadcast journalism both in terms of securing First Amendment protection and demonstrating the potential ability of determined media to inform on political wrongdoing, even in the face of determined official intimidation.

MICHAEL D. ROBINSON

See also: Hearts and Minds

The Selling of the Pentagon (US, CBS, 1971, 60 mins). Produced, written, and directed by Peter Davis, with correspondent Roger Mudd. Executive produced by Perry Wolff. Photographed by William Wagner et al. Edited by Dena Levitt.

Further reading

- Dunham, Corydon B., Fighting for the First Amendment: Stanton of CBS vs. Congress and the Nixon White House, Westport, CT: Praeger, 1997.
- Fulbright, J. William, The Pentagon Propaganda Machine, New York: Liveright, 1970.
- Gould, Jack, 'The Unselling of the Pentagon', The New York Times, March 7, 1971: D17.
- Jowett, Garth S., "'The Selling of the Pentagon': Television Confronts the First Amendment', in John E. O'Connor (ed.), American History, American Television: Interpreting the Video Past, New York: Ungar, 1983.
- Reeb, Richard H., Taking Journalism Seriously: 'Objectivity' as a Partisan Cause, Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 1999.
- Rogers, Jimmie N. and Clevenger, Theodore, Jr., "'The Selling of the Pentagon': Was CBS the Fulbright Propaganda Machine?' Quarterly Journal of Speech 57, no. 3, 1971: 266–74.
- Salant, Richard S., Salant, CBS, and the Battle for the Soul of Broadcast Journalism: The Memoirs of Richard S. Salant, Susan and Bill Buzenberg (eds), Boulder CO: Westview Press, 1999.

Sense of Loss, A

(France, Ophüls, 1972)

Released between The Sorrow and the Pity (Ophüls, 1969) and The Memory of Justice (Ophüls, 1976), A Sense of Loss is one of Marcel Ophüls's least discussed films. When written about, usually in reviews rather than scholarly texts, the film is often damned with faint praise. Ephraim Katz was able to call it 'sensitive'; Leonard Maltin has dubbed it 'thoughtful'. Peter Biskind was somewhat closer to the mark with his observation that 'compassion without commitment leads to the confused, paralysed humanism of Ophüls' A Sense of Loss', and he was using the film only as a point of comparison in a review of Hearts and Minds. The most detailed analysis to date has come from Brian McIlroy (1998), who speaks of it as a 'lightning-rod' on which debate may be focused rather than as a fully realised documentary treatment of its subject.

A Sense of Loss was an attempt to explore the 'Troubles' in Northern Ireland through a series of interviews. The interviews were illustrated with footage shot on location between December 1971 and February 1972. Supplementary scenes and interviews were also filmed in London, Dublin, and New York. Ophüls spoke with people representing nationalist and loyalist traditions, with Protestants and Catholics, with politicians, paramilitaries, and private citizens. An emphasis was given to the experiences of those who had lost relatives during the violence, sometimes by accident, sometimes as a direct result of military or paramilitary activities. Within this framework, Ophüls attempted to provide an overview of the political and social issues at stake in Northern Ireland as seen by those who lived there. By designating it 'A film report by Marcel Ophüls', he presumably hoped to sidestep the social and political issues raised by embarking on a more comprehensive 'chronicle' such as The Sorrow and the Pity.

The film was thematically organised around the idea of human loss, which allowed Ophüls to avoid engaging in active discourse and eliminated the need to come to specific political conclusions. The director's sympathy with the nationalist community was evident, nonetheless, in his selection and juxtaposition of segments, although this partisanship was presented in terms of a liberal-humanist empathy with human tragedy rather than as a political perspective. The film's stated thematic preoccupation with loss raised larger questions about the 'loss' of Northern Ireland itself in broader historical terms, which the film did not fully vocalise. Although he presented the stated views of nationalists and loyalists of varying degrees of extremity, Ophüls's questions led his interviewees to use religious designations rather than political ones. This semantic distinction had the effect of portraying the conflict in Northern Ireland as a relatively clear-cut sectarian antagonism that had been instigated by colonial and imperialist Britain imposing its religious values on the native Irish. This provided safe grounds for an empathetic response to the losses represented in the film: loss of family, loss of peace, and loss of innocence.

The film begins and ends with references to the death of children. Its longest and least interrupted interview is with the parents of a baby who was killed in a bomb blast. As the film begins, Ophüls is heard speaking to his mother. The interview in full is not shown until later, but it is used in the opening as part of a montage sequence to sound a note of human tragedy that will inform the film on the whole. The film's conclusion actually intercuts two deaths, one of an IRA volunteer (whose mother also features in the opening montage), the other of a schoolgirl killed in a road accident involving an army patrol vehicle. Although there is a political subtext, emotion once again centres on the tragic randomness of the latter death and on the familial context of the former. The loss of the future is at issue here; the death of a child represents the end of a life not yet lived. It is in this symbolism that we find the film's controlling metaphor. A Sense of Loss is not concerned with the reasons for loss or the context in which loss has occurred, but rather the effect that loss has on people and their hopes for the future.

The film remains reticent about what shape the future might take. It does represent political viewpoints, but Ophüls chooses to do so through his interviewees, which often prompts a response to his presentation of people's personalities rather than of their arguments. The stiff, smug manner of Sir Harry Tuzo, commander of British army forces in Northern Ireland, the fussy, dismissive attitude of anti-Catholic publisher John McKeague, and the characteristic bombast of Reverend Ian Paisley screaming from his pulpit do little to represent a moderate voice for loyalism. Meanwhile, images of nationalist politician Bernadette Devlin walking by the sea, of left-wing activist Gerry O'Hare making breakfast for his children, and of the grieving family of IRA volunteer Gerald McDade give good reason for sympathy for their cause, especially when the film on the whole lacks a representation of the historical context of the struggle itself.

Stylistically, Ophüls confessed, the film was challenged by its subject. He said, 'The idea is that you rush around to thirty or forty people in different towns, trying to create epic frescoes on the basis of straight interviewing' (quoted in McIlroy 1998). Ophüls's devotion to the interview may have provided The Sorrow and the Pity with a powerful centre, but the director's understanding of, and engagement with, his subject was so much more profound in that case that interviews were merely another tool with which he probed the delicate threads of past and present. In the absence of a true understanding of Northern Ireland and its history, Ophüls was ultimately only barely more enlightening on this subject than the dozens of film and TV crews who had, as Marilyn Hyndman put it, 'parachuted in for a couple of weeks' and left with footage to be used and reused in news and magazine programmes throughout the world. A Sense of Loss was nonetheless banned from broadcast by the BBC, fearful that the film would contribute to the climate of sectarian bitterness, which it sought to envision in terms of its human costs.

HARVEY O'BRIEN

See also: Ophüls, Marcel; Sorrow and the Pity, The

A Sense of Loss (US/Swiss, Cinema X/Société Suisse de Television, 1972, 135 mins). Produced and directed by Marcel Ophüls. Edited by Marion Kraft. Director of photography: Simon Edelstein. Second unit direction by Edouard Fenwick. Assistant director: Ana Carrigan. Additional photography by Elliott Erwit. Production manager: William Stitt. Assistant editor: Anne Lewis. Assistant cameraman: Claude Paccaud. Sound engineer: Claude Pellot. Chief electrician: Alain Borgia. Chaffeur. Social guide: Robert Moon. Research Assistant: Kathy Keville. Rerecording: Richard Vorisek. Contributing journalist: John Whale of The Sunday Times. Executive Producer: Max Palevsky.

Further reading

Baker, Keith, 'Reporting the Conflict', in Martin McLoone (ed.), Broadcasting in a Divided Community: Seventy Years of the BBC in Northern Ireland, Belfast: Institute of Irish Studies, The Queen's University of Belfast, 1996.

- Buruma, Ian, 'Marcel Ophuls', in Kevin Macdonald and Mark Cousins (eds), Imagining Reality: The Faber Book of Documentary, London and Boston: Faber, 1996.
- Butler, David, The Trouble with Reporting Northern Ireland, Aldershot: Avebury, 1995.
- Hyndman, Marilyn, 'Resisting Cultural Arrest', Film Ireland, November/December 1992: 16–17.
- McIlroy, Brian, Shooting to Kill: Filmmaking and the Troubles in Northern Ireland, Trowbridge: Flicks Books, 1998.
- Pryluck, Calvin, 'Ultimately We Are All Outsiders: The Ethics of Documentary Filming', in Alan Rosenthal (ed.), New Challenges for Documentary, Berkeley, CA and London: University of California Press, 1988.

Septemberweizen

(Germany, Krieg, 1980)

Septemberweizen/September Wheat is an especially notable film made by the director Peter Krieg. It brought him an international reputation as well as the Adolf-Grimme-Preis, the prestigious German TV award. The film analyses problems of American agriculture, where many farmers have to give up their small farms and even the large farming corporations do not earn enough money and are in an economic crisis. In the United States around forty thousand farmers gave up in 1978, eight hundred each week. The film shows that farming is closely connected to the capitalist system and is dependent on the agriculture industry, which is continually attempting to create products to streamline farming processes, such as hybrid wheat or a revolutionary fertilizer. The film remains relevant, given its complex and sustained analysis, and the fact that industrial farming remains a controversial issue.

'September wheat' refers to contracts with the wheat exchange in Chicago (harvests are sold in September). The entire American harvest is sold there, fifty percent of it intended for export. Peter Krieg follows the wheat from planning and growth through its sale to the consumer, narrating the tale in seven chapters (the number seven is a reference to the biblical story of Joseph, who saw seven fruitful years and seven years of drought). Krieg's essayistic style avoids an educational commentary, instead concentrating on interviews with people involved, while creating an intriguing montage of images, sounds, and music, which are sometimes used in an ironic way. For example, the crisis of the farmers is accompanied by the song 'America, the Beautiful'; a montage will contrast expensive homes in the United States with photos of hungry children around the world. Many details and facts are conveyed by short radio reports offscreen, which is an original device.

Krieg succeeds in investigating many of the secrets of this business and analyzing the worldwide food problems and political crises, which are strongly related to wheat production. Only six companies controlled the US market in 1980. They set the prices and decided who received wheat. Producers of seed corn developed new hybrid forms and the farmers became dependent on them. The farmers are then forced to pay high prices, and have to invest in efficient new machinery and fertilizer to obtain the most returns from their investment. However, they receive lower prices at the wheat exchange, because of overproduction. The surplus is exported to so-called Third World countries, influencing the agriculture there and manipulated by the US government as a political tool.

Septemberweizen was released at the time when the environmental movement and Third World groups became influential in Germany. Although the system of industrial production has changed and become even more efficient, Septemberweizen is still an interesting case study, an in-depth political analysis free of ideological clichés, which tries to use film as a medium of enlightenment.

KAY HOFFMANN

Septemberweizen/September Wheat (Germany, Teldoc und ZDF/Kleines Fernsehspiel, 1980, 96 mins). Directed by Peter Krieg. Edited by Peter Krieg. Script by Peter Krieg. Sound by Peter Krieg. Mixing by Thomas Buser. Music by Rolf Riehm. Narrated by Ilse Böttcher, Elenor Holder, Rolf Klein, Klaus Krauleidies, Berthold Korner, Peter Loth, and Ullo von Peinen.

Further reading

- Krieg, Peter, Der Mensch stirbt nicht am Brot allein, Frankfurt: Vom Weizen zum Brot zum Hunger, 1984.

Seta, Vittorio de

Sicilian director Vittorio de Seta has been active in the field of documentary film since the 1950s. De Seta's cinema, which may be thought of as poetic anthropology, owes much to Grierson's educational conception of the director's role, and bears a resemblance to Flaherty's work in its attention to nature and the reality of human life, as well as in its ethical ambition of discovering the human story. Even so, De Seta's cinema is utterly original for the creative and narrative function that it assigns to the editing of images and, particularly, of sound, the latter always having a leading role in the construction of rhythm and meaning in his films. De Seta's understanding of southern popular culture is diametrically opposite to mainstream ideological discourse wherein the South is depicted as an irredeemably backward land of poverty, crime, and illiteracy, a burden to the industrialized and progressive North. Following in the footsteps of realist writers such as Giovanni Verga (I Malavoglia) and of filmmakers such as Luchino Visconti (La terra trema/The Earth Trembles, 1948), De Seta polemically portrays the southern condition as a complex, millennial culture that has died a violent death.

De Seta's work can be roughly divided into four periods: the self-produced 35mm short documentaries made between 1954 and 1959, set in Sicily, Sardinia, and Calabria, a phase concluded by the docufiction Banditi a Orgosolo/Bandits at Orgosolo (1961); the fiction, including the highly successful film for television Diario di un maestro/A Schoolmaster's Diary (1973); the 16mm documentaries for television, mostly produced by RAI, the Italian public broadcasting service, from 1978 to 1983; and the return to the cinema after ten years of silence with the documentary In Calabria (1993).

The 1950s in Italy saw the production of hundreds of documentaries every year, owing to a law that encouraged vast production but did not set up criteria for discrimination or quality control. In this context, De Seta's early shorts stand out as innovative and eccentric in their poetic and technical characteristics. Their combination of techniques were widely perceived as conflicting—the 'realism' of the subject matter and of the sound, and the 'unrealism' of colour and cinemascope—which was very unusual compared with traditional Italian documentaries. Their subject matter consisted of:

the catching of swordfish in the Strait of Messina, the tuna processing station, the sulphur mine, the sacred representation at Easter, the fishing boats in the Sicilian Channel, the Barbagia shepherds, the peasants harvesting and threshing grain, the 'forgotten people' of a little village in Calabria, are taken away from historical immediacy, from social phenomenology, from political dialectics, and restored to the long, unforgettable time in which those gestures, those rites, that culture were formed and took on a precise identity.

(Consolo 1995: 37)

Real voices, songs, and sounds were recorded on the set and then mixed in studio—a highly unusual practice at a time when the majority of Italian documentaries adopted the mix of voice-over and studio-recorded music. De Seta's early documentaries, bar the last one of the series, I dimenticati/The Forgotten Ones (1959), were instead completely devoid of voice-over, in an attempt to let reality speak for itself. Another way in which De Seta went against mainstream conventions was by using colour at a time when this was seen as an unnecessary luxury for documentaries, and also as an unrealistic device; and by adopting the cinemascope: 'It was my impression that the wide screen, together with the colour, helped me in presenting those "landscapes". This wideness, this 180-degree look, exalted the realism of the representation, even if it was daring to go and light up the mines and then film them in cinemascope' (De Seta quoted in Fofi and Volpi 1999: 14, my translation). It must be said that this innovatory attitude is not accompanied by a revolutionary ideological stance. An 'aristocratic' author akin to Visconti, De Seta does not share the latter's articulation of a Marxist viewpoint in film, and instead frees the narration of any ideological superimposed reading in an attempt to reach the truth that emerges 'naturally' from faces, actions, and sounds.

Whereas the early ten- and eleven-minute shorts were typically constructed around the twelve hours of daylight, from dawn to sunset, Banditi a Orgosolo is a black-and-white, ninety-eight-minute feature with a story that spans a few days. Shot with a troupe consisting only of himself, his wife and collaborator Vera Gherarducci, cameraman Luciano Tovoli, and casting true Sardinian shepherds, the film is a lucid analysis of the phenomenon of the Sardinian bandits, and of their clash with the alien logic of the State. As in the shorts, it is the silences, the sounds, the gestures, and the environment that take centre stage, making this film a docufiction that impressed the jury and audience of the 1961 Venice Film Festival. Banditi a Orgosolo won the prize for the best debut film, and the critic of Cahiers du cinéma described it as the only revelation of the festival (Douchet 1961). Notable among the documentaries for television produced by RAI is La Sicilia rivisitata/Sicily Revisited (1980), which returns to the settings of the early documentaries only to find that the ancient traditions, rites, and work practices have disappeared, leaving behind an incommensurable void.

After ten years of silence due to the death of his wife and main collaborator, two operations on his eyes, and to a deep discontent for the direction taken by the Western world, he returned to the cinema with In Calabria, a documentary that programmatically highlights the contrast between the sparse surviving areas of an ancient, peaceful culture that functioned in tune with nature, and the questionable 'modernization without progress' of this region, with the monsters that it produced—loss of roots and traditions, emigration, environmental degradation, organized crime, and unemployment.

LAURA RASCAROLI

Biography

Born in Palermo (Sicily), October 15, 1923. Studied architecture in Rome 1941. Joined the Navy 1943. Arrested by the German Army after September 8, sent to a camp near Salzburg, from which he attempted to escape three times. Returned to Rome after the liberation 1945. Joined the Italian Communist Party 1947. Made his debut in the cinema as assistant director of Jean-Paul Le Chanois 1953. His wife and main collaborator, Vera Gherarducci, died in 1979. Had two eye operations in the 1980s. Moved to a family residence in Sellia Marina, Calabria.

Selected films

1954 Pasqua in Sicilia/Easter in Sicily: director, photographer, editor, producer

- 1954 Lu tempu di li pisci spata/The Swordfish Season: director, photographer, editor, producer
- 1955 Isole di fuoco/Islands of Fire: director, photographer, editor, producer
- 1955 Surfarara/Sulphur Mines: director, photographer, editor, producer
- 1959 I dimenticati/The Forgotten Ones: director, photographer, editor, producer
- 1961 Banditi a Orgosolo/Bandits at Orgosolo: director, photographer, editor, producer
- 1980 La Sicilia rivisitata/Sicily Revisited: director, photographer, editor
- 1993 In Calabria: director, photographer, editor

Further reading

- Consolo, Vincenzo, 'De Seta's Use of the Verga Method', in Alessandro Rais (ed.), Il cinema di Vittorio de Seta (The Films of Vittorio de Seta), Palermo: Giuseppe Maimone Editore, 1995.
- Douchet, Jean, 'Le bandit d'Orgosolo', Cahiers du cinéma, October 1961.
- Farassino, Alberto, 'De Seta: The "grand form" of the documentary', in Alessandro Rais (ed.), Il cinema di Vittorio de Seta (The Films of Vittorio de Seta), Palermo: Giuseppe Maimone Editore, 1995.
- Fofi, Goffredo and Volpi, Gianni, Vittorio de Seta. Il mondo perduto, Turin: Lindau, 1999.
- Maffettone, Alberto and Soci, Enrico (eds), Vittorio de Seta. Una vita d'autore, Bassano del Grappa: Istituto Paolo Valmarana, 1989.

79 Springtimes of Ho Chi Minh

(Cuba, Alvarez, 1967)

79 Primavera/79 Springtimes of Ho Chi Minh is one of a number of films by Alvarez from the 1960s in which the leading documentarist of the Cuban Revolution seems to reinvent the agit-prop of Soviet cinema in the 1920s. An incomparably poetic tribute to the Vietnamese leader Ho Chi Minh, the title refers to his age at the time of his death. The film takes the form of a biographical resumé of the principal dates in Ho Chi Minh's political life; decorative titles announce the passing years interspersed among archive footage and other intertitles inscribed with lines of Ho Chi Minh's poetry.

The opening is beautifully constructed: first come slow-motion shots of flowers opening, then a shot of bombs dropping almost gracefully through the sky. The screen goes blank and we hear the human cry of a singer. After the first credit, a negative image of the young Ho Chi Minh appears, which transforms itself into a positive image and then dissolves into close-ups. These close-ups are refilmed on an optical camera to become somewhat grainy, which at the same time serves to emphasize their material nature and intensify the plasticity of the image. We see Ho Chi Minh aging, the image returns to the negative, the screen turns a brilliant white, and the titles resume. At the end of the credits, we see a close-up of Ho sitting in the open air at his typewriter. A title, 'They tied my legs with a rope', is followed by a shot of him washing his feet; another title, 'And they tied my arms', is followed by a close-up of his hands rolling a cigarette—a man, the montage says, like any other.

When the biographical resumé reaches the victory of Dien Bien Phu, the film begins to shift gear. The 'Internationale' is heard and we see the faces of international Communist leaders at the funeral. We cut to a popular Cuban performer singing, 'The era is giving birth to a heart, it is dying of pain and can stand no more ...' and her audience of cheerful Vietnamese children. The scene is violently interrupted by bombs and the devastation of napalm. Over horrific images of children's burned faces and bodies the music becomes violent and discordant. A title declares: 'They began to kill in order to win'. Then, in slow motion, one of the most infamous images of the Vietnam War, a couple of North American soldiers beating a Vietnamese who has collapsed on the ground: we see feet and hands and the rifle butts of his attackers, but not their faces. Then: 'And now they kill because they cannot win'. No one has ever commented on the Vietnam War with greater economy or dignity.

From here the film moves to shots of anti-war demonstrators in the United States holding placards that unequivocally establish a universal message: 'Vietnam, Watts, it's the same struggle', 'Avenge Che', and 'Fuck the draft'. Then another of the most notorious media images of Vietnam—a pair of GIs taking souvenir snapshots of their victims on the battlefield, to which Alvarez attaches another piece of poetry by Ho Chi Minh—and in these lines the film knits its imagery together:

Without the glacial winter, without grief and death, Who can appreciate your glory, Spring? The pains which temper my spirit are a crucible And they forge my heart in pure steel.

At this point, many a filmmaker would have been content to conclude—but not Alvarez, who has the nerve, or the chutzpah, to proceed with more scenes of the funeral, set to the music of Iron Butterfly. This is not simply a grand aesthetic gesture. Since the film was made in a period when sectarians were vocal and Western pop music was banned from Cuban airwaves, Alvarez is making pointed solidarity with popular US protest music.

Then comes the coup de grâce. A new title appears: 'Don't let disunity in the Socialist camp darken the future'. Using animation, the title is torn apart into little pieces that slide off the edges of the frame to leave the screen blank. The music disappears. A gunshot announces a split-screen, multi-image sequence of war footage, freeze frames, scratches, sprocket holes, flashes, guns, planes, bombs, sounds of battle with electric keyboard noises on the soundtrack, in which brutal reality bursts through the limits of its portrayal on celluloid in an unrelenting and terrifying assault that ends in the annihilation of a freeze frame, which burns up before our eyes, again leaving a blank white screen. Then the torn pieces of the title reappear and join up again. The picture cuts to rockets firing, to the accompaniment of energizing music by Bach; bursts of gunfire flash across the screen, the flowers reappear, and a final title appears: 'The Yanquis defeated we will construct a Fatherland ten times more beautiful'.

If 79 Primavera is a testimonial of the solidarity that the Cubans felt with the Vietnamese in their struggle against the same enemy, it is also a paradigm of Alvarez's revolutionary aesthetics. Politically an orthodox Marxist-Leninist-Fidelista, artistically Alvarez had a strong anarchistic streak that made him distrustful of conventions, schools, and aesthetic orthodoxy. Instead, he reinvented the newsreel, the compilation film, the travelog, and every other documentary genre he laid hands on in an irrepressible frenzy of filmic bricolage licensed by that supreme act of bricolage—the Cuban Revolution. He learned to raid the archives and incorporate what he found into a pithy, intelligent, didactic montage, in which, abandoning the all-knowing voice of the commentary, he replaced it with something much more playful and open, something that mobilized the cultural gains of the Revolution's literacy campaign: the animation of words on the screen. The result was a dynamic style where deconstruction meets anti-imperialism in a fusion of politics and poetry.

MICHAEL CHANAN

79 Primaveras/79 Springtimes of Ho Chi Minh (Cuba, ICAIC, 1967, 21 mins). Directed by Santiago Alvarez. Photography by Iván Nápoles. Special effects by Jorge Pucheux, Pedro Luis Hernández, Pepín Rodríguez, and Santiago Penate. Location recording by Raúl Pérez Ureta. Edited by Norma Torrado. Sound and music edited by Isalberto Gálvez. Sound engineer: Carlos Fernández. Archive material: Hanoi Film Studios, Texts y Ho Chi Minh and Jose Martí.

Further reading

Chanan, Michael (ed.), Santiago Alvarez, BFI Dossier No. 2, London: BFI, 1980.

— Cuban Cinema, Minneapolis, MN: University of Minnesota Press, 2004.

Hess, John, 'Santiago Alvarez: Cine-Agitator for the Cuban Revolution and the Third World', in Thomas Waugh (ed.), Show Us Life? Toward a History and Aesthetics of the Committed Documentary, Metuchen, NJ and London: Scarecrow Press, 1984.

Mraz, John, 'Santiago Alvarez: From Dramatic Form to Direct Cinema', in Julianne Burton (ed.), The Social Documentary in Latin America, Pittsburgh, PA: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1990.

Seybold, Katrin

Katrin Seybold is one of Germany's most politically engaged documentarists. To date she has made over fifty films that champion the cause of the political outsider, including children, dissidents, Gypsies, and Jews. Her most celebrated cause is the historical persecution of the Roma and Sinti (Gypsies) by the Nazis and the continuing discrimination against this minority. Seybold and Melanie Spitta, a Sinteza who serves as Seybold's consultant and codirector, have produced four films on the Sinti and Roma. The first and second, Schimpft uns nicht Ziguener/Don't Call us Gypsies (1980) and Wir sind Sinti Kinder und keine Zigeuner/We are Sinti Children and not Gypsies (1981), focus on contemporary Gypsy life and negative attitudes of the general populace toward Gypsy culture. The third and fourth, Es ging Tag und Nacht, liebes Kind: Zigeuner (Sinti) in Auschwitz/It Went on Day and Night, Dear Child: Gypsies (Sinti) in Auschwitz (1982), and Das falsche Wort/Calumny (1987), focus on the nature of Nazi persecution and its echo in official policies that deny reparations to the Gypsies.

Seybold's films make clear that historical and contemporary attitudes toward Gypsies have two major origins: general ignorance about Gypsy culture and received perceptions that distort their culture. Accordingly, her films inform viewers who may know little or nothing about Gypsies. She includes vignettes of home life to correct the cultural and historical stereotypes that have resulted from centuries of cultural and historical misinformation. Thus her films show Gypsies working, studying, and celebrating family life. Absent are the negative images, first encountered in sixteenth-century literature, of the Gypsy as lazy, sneaky, dirty, and promiscuous. Also absent is the nineteenth-century romantic image of the Gypsy as musically inclined and sensual. Seybold's Gypsies are the same as the German viewer, except that they desire to be left alone. That is, they ask that society accept them but not assimilate them.

Seybold's engagement with individuals and groups she feels are left out of the political power structure are the strength and weakness of her style, which is especially apparent in her films on the Sinti and Roma. The rhetoric of the titles reveals from the start that Seybold does not pretend to project objectivity. The films confront viewers with accusations that they turned away from racial genocide, condone the continued use of racial slur, and support government lies. On the one hand, the sympathy she brings to her subjects gives her work an impassioned voice and urgency often missing from the documentary form. On the other hand, her commitment to her subjects has also led to accusations that she 'lacks distance'. Indeed, her films play like broadsides rather than documented reality. Of equal concern is that the lack of objectivity creates its own stereotype—a monolithic, homogeneous world of Gypsies. It is a world that ignores crime, ignores drugs, and for the most part ignores internal dissent. The depiction of Gypsies comes perilously close to the romantic era's noble savage, in particular as it has been manifested in the modern liberal's view of the American Indian or other patronized minorities.

Other Seybold films include Seit ich weiß, daß ich nicht mehr lange lebe, bin ich Stark. Aidskranke berichten/Since I Found Out That I Won't Live Much Longer, I Am Strong. Reports from AIDS Patients (1987), a television documentary in the series Kontakte (Contacts); Deutsch ist meine Muttersprache. Deutsche Juden erinnern sich an ihre christliche Mitbürger/German Is My Native Language. German Jews Remember Their Christian Neighbors (1990), a television documentary; Alle Juden raus! Judenverfolgung in einer deutschen Kleinstadt 1933–45/All Jews Out! The Persecution of the Jews in a Small German Town 1933–45 (1990); and Nein! Zeugen des Widerstandes in München 1933–45/No! Witnesses of the Resistance in Munich 1933–45 (1998).

ROBERT C. REIMER

Biography

Born in 1943. Learned filmmaking with Edgar Reitz, among others. Founded her own production company in 1979. Makes television programs on various social issues. Recognized for her documentary films on the persecution of the Roma and Sinti by the Nazi regime, and the continuing discrimination suffered by this minority.

Selected films

- 1980 Schimpft uns nicht Ziguener/Don't Call us Gypsies
- 1981 Wir sind Sinti Kinder und keine Zigeuner/We are Sinti Children and not Gypsies
- 1982 Es ging Tag und Nacht, liebes Kind: Zigeuner (Sinti) in Auschwitz/It Went on Day and Night, Dear Child: Gypsies (Sinti) in Auschwitz
- 1987 Das falsche Wort/Calumny
- 1987 Seit ich weiß, daß ich nicht mehr lange lebe, bin ich Stark. Aidskranke berichten/Since I Found Out That I Won't Live Much Longer, I Am Strong. Reports from AIDS Patients
- 1990 Deutsch ist meine Muttersprache. Deutsche Juden erinnern sich an ihre christliche Mitbürger/German Is My Native Language. German Jews Remember Their Christian Neighbors

- 1990 Alle Juden raus! Judenverfolgung in einer deutschen Kleinstadt 1933–45/All Jews Out! The Persecution of the Jews in a Small German Town 1933–45
- 1998 Nein! Zeugen des Widerstandes in München 1933–45/No! Witnesses of the Resistance in Munich 1933–45

Further reading

- Bock, Hans-Michael (ed.), 'Katrin Seybold—Dokumentarfilm Regisseurin', in Cine-Graph: Lexikon zum deutschsprachigen Film, Munich, 1984.
- Reimer, Robert C. and Reimer, Carol J., Nazi-retro Film: How German Narrative Cinema Remembers the Past, Boston: Twayne Publishers, 1992: 165–6.

Shannon, Kathleen

From its inception in 1939, Canada's National Film Board (NFB) had regularly produced documentaries on women's topics. Well into the 1960s these tended to reflect a patriarchal de haut en bas approach. However, the burgeoning feminist movement occasioned deep attitudinal changes throughout North American society, and the NFB was not immune. If any one figure came to symbolize a new articulation of the female condition on film, it was producer/director Kathleen Shannon.

Shannon was dismissive of the NFB's professed policy of detached objectivity, regarding it as institutional, fence-sitting blandness. Her attitude toward the director's role was diametrically opposed to that of the increasingly fashionable cult of the auteur. She was adamant that her position as producer be perceived as one of team coordinator, appreciative of the sensitivities of subjects before the camera. She was insistent on personal involvement in the promotion of the finished product through traditional outlets. In this last regard, her thinking ran contrary to that of her superiors. By the mid-1970s NFB films were finding a larger audience on television than in the time-honoured method of viewing in classrooms and community centres. Her series of ten documentaries on the social and economic demands faced by women reentering the workforce, Working Mothers (1974), was not telecast at her insistence. She felt their impact would be dulled by the ambiance of television spectatorship, with its commercial interruptions, focus on ratings, and instant competition from other channels. Attitudes were more likely to be formed, changed, or concentrated when a targeted audience was exposed to the topic in a communal setting without distraction.

The critical and popular success of Working Mothers and the Canadian government's decision to give special recognition to International Women's Year, 1975, prompted Shannon to lobby for a production unit devoted almost exclusively to women's and family issues, again with output intended primarily for nontheatrical venues. The idea came to fruition with Studio D. An overwhelmingly female staff, coupled with a self-proclaimed mandate to explore 'decades, centuries, millennia of repressed or forgotten history and meanings' gave rise to criticism that the NFB had created a feminist cultural enclave where even sympathetic male filmmakers were less than welcome. Nevertheless, under Shannon's tutelage, it rapidly became the most widely recognized and controversial arm of the NFB. Not a Love Story (1981), a scathing condemnation of pornography, gained notoriety by being banned in two provinces. It became, perhaps not coincidentally, the highest grossing film in NFB history. If You Love This Planet (1982), a graphically illustrated, pro-nuclear disarmament lecture by activist Dr Helen Caldicott, elicited government protest in both Canada and the United States for its perceived special pleading.

While Kathleen Shannon raised the profile of female filmmakers in Canada, her mission to create a truly feminist 'counter-cinema' faltered. With contemporary subjects, there tended to be an easy progression in the flow of events that suggested containment and completion, although reality was often far less ordered or coherent. A more theoretically informed approach, especially to historical themes, such as The Burning Times (on the persecution of witches), might have placed as much emphasis on the structural and deep-rooted causes of women's oppression as on their effects.

JAMES M. SKINNER

See also: Canada

Biography

Born in Vancouver, Canada, 1935. Music cataloguer for Crawley Films 1952. Joined the National Film Board of Canada 1956, as sound and music editor. Directed her first film, Goldwood, in 1970. Founded Studio D 1974. Acted as executive producer of Studio D 1974–86. Retired from the NFB 1992. Died 1998.

Further reading

- Evans, Gary, In The National Interest: A Chronicle of the National Film Board of Canada from 1949 to 1989, Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1991.
- Gwyn, Richard and Gwyn, Sandra, 'The Politics of Peace', Saturday Night, May 1984.
- Hart, L., 'Working Mothers Series', Cinema Canada III, no. 15, August–September, 1974.
- Macerola, Francois, Five Year Operational Plan, Montreal: National Film Board, 1984.

Shinjuku Boys

(Japan, Longinotto, 1995)

Filmed in Shinjuku, Tokyo's queer commercial district, Shinjuku Boys focuses on the lives of three onnabes, women who live as men and who work as 'hosts' for female clients at the New Marilyn Club. The film marks the continued investigation of gender and sexuality in contemporary Japan by the documentary filmmaking team of Kim Longinotto and Jano Williams. Their films are explicitly concerned with women whose lives challenge prevalent assumptions about sex and gender in Japan.

Longinotto and Williams have collaborated on documentaries about Japanese women since Eat the Kimono, their 1989 documentary portrait of outspoken feminist and anti-imperial performer Hanayagi Genshu. Shinjuku Boys is the second of three films that the duo made in the 1990s about female gender transgression in Japan. Dream Girls (1993) explores the world of the Takarazuka Revue, an enormously popular musical theater in which young women play the roles of both sexes. Gaea Girls (1999) documents the grueling training regime of aspiring female wrestlers in a camp outside Tokyo.

In all three films Longinotto and Williams employ a mix of interactive and observational documentary modes, combining interviews with closely observed pro-filmic action. Shot by a low-impact, three-woman crew, Longinotto and Williams's films frequently produce a sense of relaxed intimacy and trust between the filmmakers and their subjects. While Dream Girls and Gaea Girls furnish their depiction of particular institutions (the Takarazuka theater school and the Gaea training camp) with representative individual portraits of women within them, Shinjuku Boys is explicitly presented as a documentary about three particular women, Gaish, Tatsu, and Kazuki. The film's pre-credit sequence introduces its 'characters' individually: Gaish is dressing up in front of a mirror, Kazuki is binding his breasts, and Tatsu is at the barber's. At the end of each of these shots, the frame freezes and the subject's name appears across the image.

In a group interview early in the film, the three onnabes are asked to characterize each other. They agree that Gaish is the 'tough guy', Kazuki, the 'cuddly type', and Tatsu, the 'good-time guy'. While this scene performs a conventional documentary shortcut in distinguishing individual subjects as 'character types', Shinjuku Boys does not use them for their common documentary function: to facilitate an overarching narrative plot for the film. Rather, these self-characterizations provide the basis on which the film develops its portrayal of the genuine diversity among onnabes in terms of their sexual and gender identities. Although Shinjuku Boys does use a disembodied female voice-over narration (read in English by Shuko Noguchi), the film restricts it to providing only the most basic expository information. Most of the knowledge the viewer receives about these 'Shinjuku boys' comes either from direct address interviews or observed conversations, including one particularly powerful scene in which Kazuki calls up and reconnects with his estranged mother.

Gaish relishes his womanizing role, maintaining several ongoing relationships with clients outside the club. Yet he declares in an interview that he neither wishes to undergo hormone treatment nor identify as a lesbian. His relationship to his clients relies on maintaining the illusion of maleness, which necessitates keeping his clothes on during sex and never letting the client touch him sexually. Both Kazuki and Tatsu are in long-term relationships sustained outside the culture of the New Marilyn Club. Kazuki lives with Kumi, a male-to-female postoperative transsexual, who is a well-known dancer at a local drag bar (one scene is devoted to Kumi's stage performance with Kazuki proudly watching from the bar). Interviewed together in an intimate medium shot, they frankly describe the relationship's blurring of gender roles and its nongenital sexuality. Tatsu has taken male hormones for several years and lives with Tomoe, a nineteen-year-old female student, whom he met at the club. Their interview together is framed in an even more intimate manner by Longinotto's camerawork, which frames only the subject currently speaking, panning whenever the other subject interjects. Tatsu speaks of his desire to know what it feels like to live and have sex as a biological male, while Tomoe adds that if it could happen even for just one day, they would be able to conceive a child together and start a family.

Shinjuku Boys compellingly demonstrates the performativity of gender. The frequent scenes showing the three onnabes grooming, dressing up, and generally getting ready for their job emphasize such an understanding of gender as performance. Moreover, the film lends credence to Judith Butler's influential argument that women and queer subjects may achieve agency only through the appropriation and resignification of existing gender norms. The queer reconfiguration of norms performed by onnabes consequently generates a proliferation of genders that challenge the hegemony of gendered binaries. Similar to the obsession of teenage girls and housewives with the top 'male' Takarazuka stars seen in Dream Girls, the heterosexual women who make up the majority of the clients at the New Marilyn Club are attracted to onnabes because they see them as 'ideal men'. Their allure resides in a masculinity 'softened' by its female performance. Although both films imply that these institutions (the onnabe club and the Takarazuka Revue) provide women (as performers, hosts, spectators, and clients) with vital opportunities to resist the patriarchal hegemony of Japanese society, Dream Girls qualifies the suggestion of such resistance by emphasizing how the authoritarian discipline of the Takarazuka school in fact produces 'ideal wives' in its performers who are generally pressured to leave the revue in their mid-twenties in order to get married. In its focus on the personal and professional lives of its three principal subjects, Shinjuku Boys largely elides questions about the New Marilyn Club, the institution that brings together onnabes and their clients.

Consequently, the film's remarkable exploration of gender and sexuality overshadows a consideration of class issues within the onnabe scene. Internationally popular at documentary and lesbian and gay film festivals, Shinjuku Boys exemplifies the recent surge of documentaries, including Paris is Burning (1990), Transexual Menace (1996), and Gendernauts (1999), which have been concerned with transgender issues.

ROGER HALLAS

See also: Longinotto, Kim

Shinjuku Boys (UK, Twentieth Century Vixen, 1995, color, Japanese with English subtitles, 53 mins). Distributed by Women Make Movies (USA). Written and directed by Kim Longinotto and Jano Williams. Produced by Kim Longinotto. Cinematography by Kim Longinotto. Music by Nigel Hawks. Edited by John Mister. Sound by Simmy Claire and Rosie Straker. Narrated by Shuko Noguchi. Filmed in Tokyo, Japan.

Further reading

- Brockes, Emma, 'Silent Witness', The Guardian, February 11, 2000: 8.
- Butler, Judith, Bodies That Matter: On the Discursive Limits of 'Sex', New York: Routledge, 1993.
- Elley, Derek, 'Shinjuku Boys', Variety, November 20, 1995: 48–9.
- Lunsing, Wim, Beyond Common Sense: Sexuality and Gender in Contemporary Japan, London: Kegan Paul, 2001.
- Teasley, Sarah, 'Interview with Kim Longinotto', Documentary Box, no. 16, December 1, 2000, www.city.yamagata.yamagata.jp/yidfi/docbox/16/box16-2-1-e.html

Shoah

(France, Lanzmann, 1985)

Claude Lanzmann's epic film Shoah ('wasteland' or 'destruction' in Hebrew) is often considered to be one of the most important documentaries ever made. The film's subject is the Holocaust. Yet, the film's scope and its impact on many different disciplines and fields, from Jewish studies to theories of postmodernism, underscores not only the need for viewers to reflect on the incongruous horror that was and is the Holocaust but also to examine ways in which Lanzmann and his film address issues of historical representation. Over a ten-year period Lanzmann and his camera crew filmed over three hundred and fifty hours of interviews from eyewitnesses to the Holocaust: from death camp survivors, Polish farmers, and Nazi guards now in hiding—all gave their testimonies to Lanzmann who, with his editors, Ziva Postec and Anna Ruiz, distilled the film to its running time of nine hours and thirty minutes. While this long running time may be seen by some as pretentious, it is not; the detailed discussions with the witnesses along with the stark, unsettling nature of many of Lanzmann's exterior shots (such as those from Treblinka) arrest the viewer with their documentation of history.

For the field of documentaries what Lanzmann chooses to show the viewer is of particular importance. For Lanzmann, the decision whether to include archival footage of the Holocaust was an ethical one. Unlike other films the subject of which is the Holocaust, such as Nuit et brouillard/Night and Fog (1955) or more recent works such as The Long Way Home (1997), Shoah contains no trace of archival material. The footage in Shoah concerns present-day accounts detailing the events that took place, as told by eyewitnesses. Lanzmann himself has stated that if he did come across a piece of archival footage showing the gassing of Jews, he would destroy it. There is also no reconstruction seen in Shoah, a device used by documentary as well as other filmmakers of historical subject matter who desire to re-create the past though fabrication. Lanzmann has been critical of such filmmakers who attempt to reconstruct the past through such figurative devices of emplotment, characterization, and external nondiegetic sound, saying that such cinematic techniques by filmmakers trivialize the unique nature of the Holocaust through the directors' transgressions of trying to fictively represent its indescribable horror. In creating a new form, one devoid of archival materials and reconstruction, Lanzmann presents a work of art that, through its content and form, bears witness to what occurred.

As mentioned, the witnesses—the victims, the tormentors, the townspeople who turned a blind eye to the atrocities—all present their unique testimony and commentary on the events. This is where we see the intense human side of the Holocaust, of the people trying to put into words what it was they saw, and at times failing. Simon Srebnik, one of two survivors of the four hundred thousand men, women, and children killed at Chelmno, tells Lanzmann as they walk through the green field that was the crematorium, 'It was terrible. No one can describe it. No one can recreate what happened here. Impossible? No one can understand it. Even I, here, now ... I can't believe I'm here.' Most of the eyewitness accounts, such as Srebnik's, are spread throughout the film. Each interview then acts as if it were its own small narrative within a much larger narrative framework on which it is commenting. In Shoah there is no grand narrative, no overreaching single story that encapsulates the experiences of all those who died in the Holocaust and those who survived. Instead, Shoah can be seen as a series of meta-narratives that, through the accounts told, presents a collection of histories that seek to speak for those unable to.

Lanzmann is very good at getting people to speak, particularly former SS officers who are in 'hiding'. One such person is Franz Suchomel, a former Nazi guard at Treblinka. Through the use of a hidden camera, Lanzmann is able to get Suchomel to sing a disturbing work song from Treblinka ('No Jew knows that today!' Suchomel exclaims) and to describe, in a very matter-of-fact tone, the detailed process of unloading the trains of Jews and then sending them to the gas chambers. Hannah Arendt's concept of the 'banality of evil' is, when viewing the testimonies of the Nazi guards and of the villagers at Chelmno or Treblinka, so very apt; the guards were ordinary men, and those who were in hiding at the time of filming continue to lead very ordinary lives, yet they were responsible for the machinations of the Holocaust.

Shoah is also a film that, through its directness and repetition, steers the viewers into confronting their own perceptions of and feelings toward the genocide that took place. So often in Shoah Lanzmann repeats certain images and locations. The stones at Treblinka, the forests around Sobibor, and the trains that led through the countryside to the death camps are some images that are all repeated, and in doing so a great weight is placed on the viewer in witnessing the somber, yet meticulous, method in which Lanzmann has framed each shot. It is no wonder, then, why Shoah has become such a touchstone in the field of trauma, for the film presents the testimonies of those who have lived through this traumatic reality and are now, in a sense, confronting it; and the viewers who, through their engagement with the film and its testimonies, may go through a traumatic experience of their own.

The power of Shoah is that it disturbs those who watch it. It should: after all, Shoah is a film about death. Lanzmann would return to the subject of the Holocaust with his films Hotel Terminus: The Life and Times of Klaus Barbie (1988) and Sobibor, Oct. 14, 1943, 4 P.M. (2001), yet Shoah remains the film for which he is best known. The final shot of Shoah—that of a train rolling on into infinity—means that the Holocaust has no end.

ALEXANDER L. KAUFMAN

See also: Lanzmann, Claude

Shoah (France, Les Films Aleph, 1985, 570 mins). Distributor: New Yorker Films Video. Directed by Claude Lanzmann. A coproduction by Les Films Aleph and Historia Films with the assistance of the French Ministry of Culture. Production managers: Stella Gregorz-Quef and Séverine Oliver-Lacamp. Production administrator: Raymonde Badé-Mauffroy. Research assistants: Corrina Coulmas, Irène Steinfeldt-Levi, and Shaimi Bar Mor. Assistants to the director: Corrina Coulmas and Irène Steinfeldt-Levi. Interpreters: Barbara Janica (Polish), Francine Kaufmann (Hebrew), and Mrs Apfelbaum (Yiddish). Cameramen: Dominique Chapuis, Jimmy Glasberg, and William Lubchansky. Camera assistants: Caroline Champetier de Ribes, Jean-Yves Escoffier, Slavek Olczyk, and Andrés Silvert. Gaffer: Daniel Bernard. Sound engineers: Bernard Aubouy and Michel Vionnet (in Israel). Editors: Ziva Postec and Anna Ruiz (Treblinka sequence). Assistant editors: Geneviève de Gouvion Saint-Cyr, Bénédicte Mallet, Yael Perlov, and Christine Simonot. Sound editor: Danielle Fillios, Anne-Marie L'Hôte, and Sabine Mamou. Sound editing assistants: Catherine Sabba and Catherine Trouillet. Mixing: Bernard Aubouy. Subtitles: A. White-law and W. Byron. Filmed in Chelmno, Berlin, Munich, Frankfurt, Wannsee, Warsaw, Treblinka, Sobibor, Grabow, Vilna, Wlodawa, Malkinia, Kolo, Auschwitz, Tel Aviv, Ben Shemen, Corfu, Cincinnati, New York City, Washington, DC, and Burlington, Vermont. Awarded the Best Documentary by the

New York Film Critics Circle (1985); the Special Award by the Los Angeles Film Critics Association (1985); the Caligari Film Award, the FIPRESCI Prize, and OCIC Award—Honorable Mention by the Berlin International Film Festival (1986); the BSFC Award for Best Documentary by the Boston Society of Film Critics (1986); the IDA Award by the International Documentary Association (1986); the Rotterdam Award for Best Documentary by the Rotterdam International Film Festival (1986); and the Flaherty Documentary Award by the British Academy of Film and Television Arts (1987).

Shoot to Kill

(UK, Kosminsky, 1990)

In May 1984 John Stalker was appointed to head the inquiry into the deaths of six republican men shot dead by the Royal Ulster Constabulary's (RUC) antiterrorist unit, E4A, in Northern Ireland in 1982. The docudrama Shoot to Kill was based on the 'Stalker Inquiry' and followed the RUC and the 'shoot to kill' incidents of November and December 1982. The program was broadcast by Yorkshire Television in the UK in May 1990.

On November 11, 1982, three Irish Republican Army (IRA) volunteers were shot a total of one hundred and nine times at an RUC roadblock near Lurgan, County Armagh. On November 24 another IRA member was shot dead by RUC members at a hay shed in Lurgan, and on December 12 two more were shot dead by the RUC at Mullacreevie estate, Armagh. The program follows Stalker as he apparently gets closer to the truth and his subsequent dismissal.

Director Peter Kosminsky had planned to make a documentary about the Stalker inquiry, but this proved untenable, given that the majority of those he wished to interview were either dead, unavailable, or could not speak because of the Official Secrets Act. Although Kosminsky recognized the advantage of using drama to reach a wider audience, the focus was that the documentary aspect should have primacy over the dramatic elements: 'We strove very hard to not sacrifice reality to the demands of good television'.

Kosminsky saw the docudrama as an unproblematic vehicle for the telling of 'one of the great untold stories'. Others, however, used the label to diminish any claims made by the film. The full committee of the IBA watched the film before it was broadcast, because of the sensitive nature of the subject matter, and agreed to allow the broadcast on the basis that the film would be clearly marked as a docudrama. This was presumably to safeguard viewers who may have been misled into thinking of it as a 'true' document of the events. The labeling of the film as a docudrama provided a safeguard for the government, in that any material considered as potentially damaging could be dismissed as fictional.

Shoot to Kill does not mimic or utilize documentary aesthetics, or a 'documentary look', in any systematic way. Instead, its referentiality is developed through its use of specific names, places, and dates. The broadcast itself was framed through its use of a voice-over at the beginning, which states that it is based on real events and that actors are used to portray real people. This serves to reinforce the notion that the film uses drama merely to fill in the gaps, and encourages viewers to evaluate it as documentary.

Although the film does not employ documentary codes and conventions systematically, there are instances in which documentary aesthetics are referenced. For example, there is an early scene in which members of the RUC are seen running toward an old farmhouse that has been under surveillance. This is shot from the point of view of the RUC and uses a shaky camcorder style. This serves to suggest the authenticity of the action and heightens the dramatic tension. In another scene, a 'fly-on-the-wall' style is used. Members of the RUC are again on surveillance after being given information regarding 'suspected' members of the IRA. As the suspects are spotted leaving by car, the surveillance team follows them. A car chase ensues and when the suspects refuse to stop, there is a shooting sequence that ends with the killing of the suspects. The car chase takes place from the RUC point of view. Shoot to Kill has a narrative structure that broadly resembles the expositional documentary. The problem has been set up, and the narrative is driven by the desire to collect the facts, analyse them, and present a final solution to the initial question or problem. For example, a key aspect of the investigation is to clarify and confirm the accuracy of RUC officers' accounts of events surrounding the killing of unarmed civilians suspected of terrorist activities. In doing so, Stalker compares officer accounts with the accounts provided by the forensic team in order to establish the truth. However, a final result was never achieved by the Stalker team because as they delved more deeply into the matter, the inquiry was aborted.

After the screening of the film, a televised studio discussion took place. In Shoot to Kill: The Issues, Kosminsky, along with representatives from the Conservative party, the Social Democratic Labour party, the Ulster Unionists, and Amnesty International, were invited to discuss the issues raised by the film. Kosminsky was challenged on the basis that the film was misleading and that it had served to encourage the IRA and to discourage the RUC. David Trimble of the Ulster Unionists stated that 'film has not told the truth, it has told a lie'. He argued that it was misleading because people would be left with the impression that there was a 'shoot to kill' policy. He pointed out that neither the Stalker nor the Sampson inquiries had found any evidence of a shoot to kill policy. However, neither inquiry had been published and so it was difficult to use them as evidence. Although there is little chance of ever reaching a definitive account of the events and issues, Shoot to Kill aligns itself with the discourses of documentary and factuality, thus making claims to truthfulness and accuracy.

JANE ROSCOE

Shoot to Kill. (UK, Zenith Productions, for Yorkshire Television, 1990, 222 mins). Produced by Yorkshire Television. Directed by Peter Kosminsky. Written by Michael Eaton. Starring Jack Shepherd as John Stalker.

Shub, Esfir

Along with Ol'ga Preobrazhanskaya, who worked in conventional narrative film, Esfir (or Esther) Shub was one of the most prominent female filmmakers of her generation. Along with Dziga Vertov, the filmmaker with whom she had a close (and frequently stormy) professional relationship, Shub is credited with the creation of the compilation film, a type of documentary constructed almost exclusively of retrieved archival film. While Vertov worked with more contemporary material, Shub recontextualized old newsreel footage to create new films, most notably the trilogy comprising The Fall of the Romanov Dynasty, The Great Way, and The Russia of Nicholas II and Lev Tolstoi. Produced under the auspices of Sovkino, in cooperation with the Museum of the Revolution, the trilogy represents a formidable amount of research; it is estimated that Shub viewed close to three million feet of newsreel footage. This was material shot by multiple, often anonymous, cameramen who had filmed both prerevolutionary and contemporary events. These films are in effect a visual history of Russia from the end of the nineteenth century, through the October Revolution, and up to the tenth anniversary of the Revolution.

Shub applied to nonfiction film the 'montage of attractions' most commonly associated with Sergei Eisenstein (Bruzzi 2000: 22), but unlike Eisenstein's startling collisions, Shub's films use a subtle method of montage that brings a great deal of ironic play to bear on her material, a technique that radically distinguished her work. The concept she developed for selecting and juxtaposing shots was not schematic but more intuitive and associational. Her ultimate goal was to comment on events by this selection and juxtaposition, while preserving the ontological authenticity of the shots themselves.

This quality was noted with approval by contemporary critics, most notably the Constructivist theorists grouped around the magazine Novy Lef. Shub's strength lay in what was considered her mastery of 'long sequence' montage, which recreated events while preserving their integral characteristics, and their temporal and spatial reality. At the same time, Shub had a refined and sophisticated conception of the implications and limitations of what she called podlinnii material (authentic material). She wrote:

To assemble a documentary film you only have to think clearly. The spectator has to manage to not only see people and events properly, but to memorise them. Let the lovers of cheap montage effects remember, that to edit simply and with a clear sense is not at all easy, but very difficult.

(Shub 1971: 18)

Today (1929, released 1930), in which she set up a number of bold oppositions between what she saw as the spiritual as well as economic crisis in the United States and the development of the Soviet Union, was her last compilation film, except for one further venture in 1939. Like a number of her contemporaries, most notably Vertov, Shub had difficulty entering the Stalinist era. She was the victim of Party philistines and ideological prejudice against formal experimentation. Her style changed; she stayed in documentary mode, but as she was dealing with contemporary themes, she began shooting material herself rather than using archive material. Her only exercise in compilation filmmaking thereafter was Spain (1939), using film shot by Roman Karmen and Boris Makaseev. Her legacy remains in that form of political documentary cinema where archive material is used dialectically or against the grain as part of a historical argument or debate.

MARINA BURKE

See also: Fall of the Romano Dynasty, The; Vertov, Dziga

Biography

Born in 1894 in the Ukraine into a family of landowners. Studied literature in Moscow a few years before the October Revolution. After the revolution, initially worked for the theatrical department of Narkompros (the Commissariat of Education), but then in 1922 entered the film profession through the auspices of the newly formed Goskino, where she worked as a re-editor of foreign and prerevolutionary films for Soviet audiences. Between 1922 and 1925 re-edited and made new intertitles for about two hundred foreign films and ten domestic feature films, most famously Fritz Lang's two-part Dr Mabuse der Spieler (1922), on which Eisenstein worked as her assistant. In 1927 and 1928 made her famous film trilogy, which traces the birth of the USSR through to the tenth anniversary of the October Revolution. Between 1933 and 1935 supervised the montage class in Eisenstein's workshop in VGIIK. In 1935 awarded the title of Most Honoured Artist of the Republic. During the war, edited newsreels and continued to teach montage in VGIIK, then transferred to Alma Ata. In 1942 became chief editor of Novosti Dnya (News of the Day) in the Central Studio for Documentary Film in Moscow. Wrote Krupnym planom (In Close-Up) in 1959, reissued with additional material as Zhizn' moya-kinematograf (Cinema is My Life) in 1971. Died in Moscow in September 1959.

Selected films

- 1927 The Fall of the Romanov Dynasty/
Padenie dinastii romanovykh
- 1927 The Great Road/Velikii put'
- 1928 The Russia of Nicholas II and Lev
Tolstoi/Rossiia Nikoloya II i Lev Tolstoi
- 1930 Today/Segodnya
- 1932 Komsomol—Leader of Electrification/
K-Sh-E
- 1939 Spain/Ispaniya
- 1942 The Native Country/Strana rodnaya
- 1946 On the Other Side of the Araks/Po tu
storonu Araksa

Further reading

- Bruzzi, Stella, New Documentary: A Critical Introduction, London: Routledge, 2000.
- Leyda, Jay, Films Beget Films: A Study of the Compilation Film, London: Allen & Unwin, 1964.
- Petric, Vlada, 'Esfir Shub: Cinema is My Life', Quarterly Review of Film Studies, Fall 1978: 429–47.
- 'Esfir Shub's Unrealised Project', Quarterly Review of Film Studies, fall 1978: 448–56.
- 'Esther Shub: Film as a Historical Discourse', in Thomas Waugh (ed.), Show Us Life!': Towards a History and an Aesthetic of the Committed Documentary, Metuchen, NJ: Scarecrow Press, 1984.
- Roberts, Graham, Forward, Soviet! History and Non-fiction Film in the USSR, London: I.B. Tauris, 1999.
- Shub, Esfir, Zhizn' moya-kinematograf (Cinema is My Life), Moscow: Isskustvo, 1971.
- Yampolsky, Mikhail, 'Reality at Second Hand', Historical Journal of Film, Radio and Television 2, no. 2, 1991: 161–71.

Shuker, Gregory

Gregory B. Shuker was a journalist, filmmaker, and producer, as well as a core member of Drew Associates, a group of journalists and filmmakers, founded in 1959 and commonly regarded as the originators of the pioneering American Direct Cinema Movement.

Born in Charleston in West Virginia, Shuker studied at Northwestern University. As editor-in-chief of the student newspaper he visited Russia in 1954 and on his return had six of his 35mm color slide pictures published by Life magazine. Shuker was later hired as a reporter by Life, where he worked on last-minute foreign and domestic news. There he met Robert Drew, who had been working as a correspondent for Life since 1946. In 1959 Shuker became one of the first members of Drew Associates, an independent production team founded by Robert Drew that was to play a pivotal role in the 1960s renaissance of American documentary film. The idea behind Drew Associates was to make films that would transport the photojournalism as developed at Life magazine into documentary films, in order to move away from the staged, more instructive and illustrative style of documentary filmmaking, and to better represent social realities as they unfold in front of the camera. The most prominent trademark of Drew Associates was the handheld, lightweight 16mm camera and the newly developed synchronous, portable sound, which shaped the style of direct cinema and allowed for a radical rethinking of documentary aesthetics. Other members of Drew Associates alongside Gregory Shuker were Tom Bywaters, Anne Drew, Mike Jackson, Richard Leacock, James Lipscomb, Albert and Davis Maysles, D.A. Pennebaker, and Hope Ryden.

It is often difficult to identify which members of Drew Associates were responsible for which aspects of the work. Since none of these young journalists and filmmakers considered their stories made by them, they generally avoided the use of the term 'director'. Moreover, since many regularly performed multiple tasks in pre-production, shooting, and postproduction, they simply called themselves 'correspondents'. By and large, however, Shuker's role was that of a producer. Shuker's central tasks were to 'find' stories—stories that did not need narrating, that already contained enough dramatic elements to be able to tell themselves. According to Robert Drew, Shuker's success lay in his ability to operate in ways that did not attract attention—crucially important in a genre that is trying to film people as unselfconsciously as possible.

The first documentaries that Shuker produced for Drew Associates were The Children Were Watching, a documentary about racism and desegregation in New Orleans and Kenya: Land of the White Ghost (I) and Kenya: Land of the Black Ghost (II), which in two thirty-minute episodes documented the outcome of the first election after independence in Kenya, all shot in 1961. These films, with cinematography by Richard Leacock, were produced for the Close Up series of the American Broadcasting Company (ABC).

In the years 1961 to 1962 Drew Associates produced a number of television documentaries for The Living Camera, a series of ten direct cinema films later distributed by Time-Life. These films generally focused on one individual, often public figures such as Jane Fonda and John F. Kennedy. Among the films that Shuker produced for the series are Nehru, a fifty-five-minute documentary about the first Indian Prime Minister's last election campaign (in which Shuker breaks the direct cinema 'rules' by asking Nehru a question), Susan Starr, about a nineteen-year-old concert pianist performing at an important international competition, and Eddie (aka On the Pole), about the race driver Eddie Sachs's unpredicted defeat in the Indianapolis 500 race.

Two of Drew Associates' most celebrated films were also produced by Shuker. The first, The Chair (1962), a fifty-five-minute film focused on twenty-two-year-old Paul Crump who had been sentenced to death by electric chair. Crump had befriended a prison warden and asked the warden to be the man to pull the switch. Shuker 'found' this story and entered the prison to film these extraordinary moments. The film was the second-to-last film of the Living Camera Series and won the Special Jury Prize at the Cannes Film Festival.

The second celebrated film was Crisis: Behind a Presidential Commitment, a dramatic documentary shot in 1963, which follows the growing crisis between Alabama Governor George Wallace and President John F. Kennedy over Wallace's refusal in 1963 to allow the enrollment of the first black students (after Autherine Lucy in 1956) at the University of Alabama. Shuker was instrumental in persuading Robert Kennedy to allow the camera into the White House. The film moves between John and Robert Kennedy in the Oval Office, Governor Wallace, the students Vivian Malone and James A. Hood and the Deputy Attorney General Nicholas Katzenbach. As Kennedy federalized the National Guards and each party involved weighs the possibilities, the suspense heightens until, finally, Governor Wallace concedes on June 11. When the film was broadcast on ABC four months later it caused a storm of protest over the admission of cameras into the White House and also received harsh criticism by The New York Times, which called the access given by the President's office 'ill advised' and the film 'a peep-show'.

Another film produced by Shuker—and the last one of the Kennedy series—is Faces in November, made in 1964. The camera quietly observes the funeral of John F. Kennedy by focusing almost exclusively on the faces of the mourners. The film was well received at the Venice Film Festival in the following year.

In 1965 Shuker produced the fifty-minute documentary Letters from Vietnam, the first film to use synchronous sound in the depiction of combat. Shuker and cameraman Abbot Mills flew with over sixty missions with a helicopter squadron in Vietnam, and the film was later broadcast by ABC.

In the mid-1960s—long after Pennebaker, Leacock, and the Maysles brothers had left to start their own companies—Gregory Shuker left Drew Associates and went on to produce films of his own. He continued making films of a highly political nature. An important example is the fifty-two-minute documentary Free at Last: His Final Days, which consists of footage of Martin Luther King, Jr, taken between January and April 1968 during his 'Poor People's Campaign' and breaking off with King's death. The film won the Grand Prize at the Venice Film Festival and an Emmy Award.

In the following years Shuker worked increasingly on industrial projects and made a range of commercial films, alongside films such as Life in Outer Space, sponsored by NASA, and various mini-documentaries for IBM. In 1972 Shuker cofounded Playback Associates, which produced industrial training videos and instructional tapes.

Shuker died in New York on March 29, 2000. His career in filmmaking—as a producer, a cameraman, and a finder of stories—was shaped by a commitment to political concerns and a belief in the educational and the history-shaping power of the medium.

JACOBIA DAHM

See also: Drew, Robert

Biography

Born in Charleston, West Virginia. Studied at Northwestern University. Hired as a reporter by Life magazine. Met Robert Drew and in 1959 became one of the first members of Drew Associates. Died in New York on March 29, 2000.

Further reading

- Barnouw, Erik, Documentary: A History of the Non-fiction Film, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1993.
- Barsam, Richard M., Nonfiction Film. A Critical History, Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press, 1973.
- Bluem, A. William, Documentary in American Television, New York: Hastings House, 1965.
- Breitrose, Henry, 'On the Search for the Real Nitty-Gritty: Problems & Possibilities in Cinéma Vérité', Film Quarterly 17, no. 4, summer 1964: 36–40.
- Gould, Jack, 'TV: Too Many Cameras; Documentary on the Segregation Crisis Termed Just a Peep Show', The New York Times, October 22, 1963: 75.
- Lipscomb, James C., 'Cinema-verite', Film Quarterly 18, no. 2, winter 1964: 62–3.
- Macdonald, Kevin and Cousins, Mark, Imagining Reality. The Faber Book of the Documentary, London and Boston: Faber & Faber, 1996.
- n.a., Cinema vérité. Defining the Moment (videorecording, 102 mins), directed by Peter Wintonick, National Film Board of Canada, 1999.
- O'Connell, P.J., Robert Drew and the Development of Cinema Verité in America, Carbondale, IL and Edwardsville, IL: Southern Illinois University Press, 1992.
- Rosenthal, Allan (ed.), New Challenges for Documentary, Berkeley, CA and London: University of California Press, 1988.
- Watson, Mary Ann, The Expanding Vista: American Television in the Kennedy Years, New York: Oxford University Press, 1990 (also Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 1994).
- Young, Colin, 'Cinema of Common Sense', Film Quarterly 17, no. 4, summer 1964: 26–9, 40.

Silent World, The

(France, Cousteau, 1956)

Jacques Cousteau's The Silent World/Le Monde du silence is a landmark in wildlife documentary filmmaking. Co-directed with the help of the young Louis Malle, the picture follows the trials and tribulations of the crew of the Calypto as they voyage through the Red Sea, the Persian Gulf, and the Indian Ocean. The completed documentary was some two years in the making and is reported to have been founded on more than one thousand dives. Although sharing its title with an earlier Cousteau publication, The Silent World is an original work that served to popularize the previously marginal form of the underwater documentary. Until that film, Cousteau's work had been limited to short reportage-style essays, commercial projects for companies such as British Petroleum, and photographic expeditions associated with publications such as National Geographic. After The Silent World Cousteau was able to develop any number of projects in his own right.

The Silent World premiered in Paris on February 7, 1956, at a formal conservative soirée attended by the then President of the Republic, René Coty. Subsequently it was a commercial success that was also garlanded with many glittering prizes. Thus, in April 1956 it was awarded the Palme d'Or at Cannes and just one year later was presented with an Academy Award for Best Documentary. The victory at Cannes was especially impressive since the film was in competition against Henri-Georges Clouzot's Mystère Picasso and Ingmar Bergman's Smiles of a Summer Night. Remarkably, until the famous victory of Michael Moore's Fahrenheit 9/11 in 2004, The Silent World continued to be the only documentary film to have been awarded the Palme d'Or. Furthermore, it is a fascinating historical coincidence that at the same festival that heralded the arrival of The Silent World, the organizers were unprepared to support Alain Resnais's lyrical work devoted to the Holocaust, Nuit et brouillard/Night and Fog. In contrast to the triumph of The Silent World, Resnais's moving piece was expelled to the fringes of the event, and only shown 'outside competition'. In this context it is important to note that the same Cannes jury included the disgraced actress, Arletty. Like Cousteau, she had worked during the Vichy period (1940–4). Her prominent role at Cannes 1956 therefore marked something of an official return to the mainstream postwar industry. It is in this wider sociopolitical context of the collective rewriting of the war and France's role in the Holocaust that The Silent World proved triumphant and Night and Fog was unjustly marginalised. Clearly, Cousteau's work was far more palatable for audiences who preferred light entertainment over challenging moral or historical reflection.

Figure 17 The Silent World, Jacques Cousteau, 1956 (Courtesy of the Everett Collection)

Cousteau and Malle's treatment of undersea wildlife represented a radical advance in cinematography. Genuinely revolutionary underwater photography was developed in the making of the documentary. New cameras and diving equipment filmed sea life at previously unseen depths of the ocean floor. The Silent World created bold iconic underwater images that have been repeated and modified around the world in numerous films and television series. Thus, it is not an exaggeration to suggest that The Silent World almost single-handedly instigated a minor but entertaining subgenre. More generally speaking, Cousteau and Malle's work launched the global fashion for amateur diving and photography. The fundamental aesthetic 'look' of the film has probably also influenced fictional work ranging from Stephen Spielberg's Jaws (1975) to James Cameron's The Abyss (1989). Rather more amusingly, Cousteau is also referred to extensively throughout Wes Anderson's comedy Rushmore (1998). Such postmodern irony is indicative of the genuine artistic significance of Cousteau's original work.

In retrospect, significant elements of The Silent World appear to be horribly dated. For example, the crew's mode of encounter with sea life is predominantly cast through a quasi-Conradian ethic of man's struggle against the untamed force of the natural world. Such implicit philosophical underpinnings are closer to the social value system of the 1890s than to the undercurrents of reform that were already preparing the way for New Wave cinema and the freedoms of the 1960s. Similarly, the film also predates Cousteau's famous turn to support the ecological movement. For example, The Silent World contains several passages that would make today's environmentalists wince with discomfort. Thus, Cousteau shows his sailors' uncontrollable massacre of a shoal of sharks. Later, the same crew casually hurls dynamite into a coral reef to identify the range of dead crustaceans and fish that gradually float to the surface. Any sense of ecology or environmentalism is limited and it was not until 1960 that Cousteau began to commit himself to that now more fashionable cause.

The production history of The Silent World remains clouded in mystery. Speaking to Philip French in the early 1990s, Louis Malle implied that Cousteau had simply plucked him from the Institut des Hautes Etudes Cinématographiques (IDHEC, the Parisian film academy) to work as an intern on the Calypsa. However, Pierre Billard has suggested that the background to the making of the picture was a more complex commercial affair. For instance, Billard alludes to the fact that Malle not only acted as an assistant director on the film but was also probably influential in obtaining a loan to support part of its production costs. Any investment on the part of the Malle family, who owned the Béghin sugar empire, was richly rewarded, if never explicitly credited. Moreover, the success of the film ensured that the young Malle gained an important profile in the industry. Shortly afterwards, Malle briefly assisted his hero Robert Bresson on Un condamné à mort s'est échappé/A Man Escaped (1956) and then produced his own first solo feature, L'Ascenseur pour l'échafaud/Lift to the Scaffold (1957). Cousteau's future career was also secured by the triumph. It was on the basis of the global success of The Silent World that the Commander resigned his post from the French navy and was appointed to Monaco's oceanographic institute, quickly becoming an international celebrity.

HUGO FREY

See also: Cousteau, Jacques-Yves; Malle, Louis; Night and Fog; Resnais, Alain

The Silent World/Le Monde du silence (France, Requins Associés, 1956, 86 mins). Directed by Jacques Cousteau and Louis Malle.

Cinematography: Edmond Séchan (Technicolor). Photography: J. Cousteau, L. Malle, Frédéric Duma, and Alberto Falco. Music: Yves Baudrier. Editing: Georges Alépée. Special effects: Noël Robert. Commentary: James Dugan (English-language edition).

Further reading

- Billard, Pierre, Louis Malle: le Rebelle solitaire, Paris: Plon, 2003.
- Cousteau, Jacques, and Dumas, Frédéric, The Silent World, London: Hamish Hamilton, 1953.
- French, Philip (ed.), Malle on Malle, London: Faber, 1993.
- Frey, Hugo, Louis Malle, Manchester: Manchester University Press, 2004.
- Madsen, Axel, Cousteau, London: Robson Books, 1989.
- Violet, Bernard, Cousteau, Paris: Plon, 1993.

Silva, Jorge

See entry: Rodríguez, Marta and Jorge Silva

Sinclair, Upton

Writer and political activist Upton Sinclair was a peripheral figure in film history, but he played a vital role in a misadventure involving a far more significant writer/activist—Sergei Eisenstein. Together they embarked on the debacle that was Que Viva Mexico!

By the time Sinclair met Eisenstein he had established a reputation as a leading socialist and the prolific author of muckraking novels. Sinclair's involvement with Que Viva Mexico! was not his first contact with the film world. He had long been keen to break into it so that he could extend the message of his books to a new audience, and make enough money to allow himself the freedom to pursue his political activities.

He had appeared as an agitator in the 1914 adaptation of his 1906 novel, The Jungle, exposing conditions in the Chicago stockyards, the first pro-labor feature in the United States. Another adaptation, The Money Changers (1920), intended as a critical examination of financier J.P. Morgan, became, in Sinclair's view, a melodrama on the Chinatown drug trade. The Wet Parade (on Prohibition) was filmed in 1932. Also, Charlie Chaplin's short

The Adventurer (1917) had been based on a Sinclair story. None of these had been as financially successful as Sinclair had hoped. More lucrative was his 1933 book, Upton Sinclair Presents William Fox, charting the rise and fall of a movie mogul. After Que Viva Mexico! Sinclair adapted the anti-VD propaganda film Damaged Goods (1937).

Eisenstein, together with his assistant Grigori Alexandrov and cinematographer Edouard Tissé, had been invited to the United States in 1930 by Paramount, who wanted to capitalize on his reputation. After failure to agree on a project, and with vocal hostility to his presence in the United States from the right-wing press, Eisenstein's contract was terminated in October. Rather than return to the Soviet Union, he approached Sinclair, through Chaplin, for help in financing his dream to make an independent film in Mexico. Eisenstein had met Robert Flaherty in Hollywood and had discussed an ethnographic approach using amateur actors within the framework of a fictional film.

Sinclair had mixed motives in agreeing: he wanted to participate in a financially successful project but he also felt that Eisenstein had been treated badly in the United States, and wanted him to be able to make at least one film before returning to Moscow. Sinclair and his wife, Craig, raised $25,000 and Eisenstein signed a contract on November 24, 1930, with Craig to make a nonpolitical film in three to four months. The contract was heavily weighted in favor of Craig: there was no reference to Eisenstein editing the film, and crucially everything produced by the Mexican team was to be her property. By signing, Eisenstein showed himself to be naive in business matters, trusting that the Sinclairs' political leaning would render the terms a formality. Eisenstein's party left for Mexico the following month.

Geduld and Gottesman (1970) provide a chronology of the project by means of the principals' letters, although as it is based on Sinclair's archives it is weighted toward him, with Eisenstein underrepresented. Eisenstein clearly considered the contract to be elastic, and conceived a scheme, involving six separate episodes, that could never be completed within the time-scale and budget specified (Eisenstein later claimed that had they adhered to the original agreement his efforts 'would have merely resulted in a pitiful travelogue').

The modest budget and time scale were quickly abandoned as Eisenstein's demands increased in line with his ambition. Unable to compromise his artistic vision, he stayed in Mexico for fourteen months and more than doubled the budget. Eventually, Sinclair, who was spending a huge amount of time raising funds and acting as producer, to the detriment of his writing and health, came to feel that he was being blackmailed by Eisenstein, who indicated that unless he received additional funds and film stock there would be no film and the investment would be lost.

Added to the financial difficulties that Eisenstein's prolonged stay in Mexico were causing Sinclair, political developments in the Soviet Union were creating a climate inimical to the sense of aesthetic adventure that had prevailed when Eisenstein left in August 1929, and the Mexican film's lyricism ran counter to the emerging doctrine of Socialist Realism. Additionally, Eisenstein had originally been granted permission to travel for only one year and had so far exceeded this period that Sinclair received a telegram from Stalin himself in November 1931 warning that Eisenstein was in danger of being perceived as a deserter at home.

Sinclair, under pressure from his wife, finally called a halt in February 1932, leaving shooting unfinished. He had concluded that Eisenstein had no intention of finishing the project, using it as a pretext to avoid returning to Moscow. Having stopped the filming, Sinclair initially still hoped that Eisenstein would be able to edit the footage but ultimately felt he could not trust him or the Soviet authorities. Instead, producer Sol Lesser was engaged to carve a commercial film from it after Eisenstein had returned home. Sinclair needed a return on the investment—thereby endorsing critics who charged that he was a capitalist at heart.

A campaign against Sinclair was mounted by Eisenstein's supporters, notably Seymour Stern, editor of Experimental Cinema, and Sinclair's left-wing credentials were damaged both at home and in the Soviet Union. Given his aspirations, and the problems they had caused, it is ironic that he should have spent such an enormous amount of time and energy struggling to facilitate Eisenstein's relatively nonpolitical film, when shortly afterwards King Vidor wrote and directed the socially aware Our Daily Bread (1934), with its vision of working-class solidarity, the dispossessed organizing to create a collective farm.

In order to recoup some of the costs, in addition to the films that Lesser produced, footage was sold to Marie Seton, an early biographer of Eisenstein, and more to Bell and Howell to make six educational documentaries. Sinclair presented the remaining material to New York's Museum of Modern Art (MoMA) in 1954, where Jay Leyda assembled a six-hour compilation. In 1973 much of MoMA's holding was sent to Gosfilmofond, where Alexandrov also tried to re-create the spirit of Eisenstein's intentions.

TOM RUFFLES

Biography

Born in Baltimore, Maryland, on September 20, 1878. Attended New York City College, funded by writing for newspapers and magazines. Published first novel in 1901, followed by a steady stream of books and articles on social issues. Achieved fame with The Jungle (1906), after which he became known as a muckraking journalist and novelist, exposing institutional corruption. Moved to California in 1915. Active in politics from the age of twenty-four, initially for the Socialist Party, for which he stood for Congress and Senate and for governorship of California. Switched to the Democrats in 1933. Again ran unsuccessfully for governorship of California on platform 'End Poverty in California' (EPIC) in 1934. Wrote over ninety books, fiction and nonfiction. Won the Pulitzer Prize in 1943 for novel Dragon's Teeth. Moved to Buckeye, Arizona in 1953. Died in Bound Brook, New Jersey on November 25, 1968.

Films produced from Eisenstein's Mexican footage

- 1933 Thunder Over Mexico (Sol Lesser)
- 1933 Death Day (Sol Lesser)
- 1933 S.M. Eisenstein in Mexico (Sol Lesser)
- 1939 Time in the Sun (Marie Seton)
- 1942 Mexican Symphony: Mexico Marches; Conquering Cross; Idol of Hope; Land and Freedom; Spaniard and Indian; Zapotec Village (Bell and Howell)
- 1957 Eisenstein's Mexican Project (Jay Leyda)
- 1979 Que Viva Mexico! (Grigori Alexandrov)

Further reading

- Amengual, Barthélemy, Que Viva Eisenstein! Lausanne: Editions L'âge d'homme, 1981.
- Eisenstein, Sergei, Que Viva Mexico!, revised edn, London: Vision, 1972.
- Foner, Philip S., 'Upton Sinclair's "The Jungle: The Movie"', in Dieter Herms (ed.), Upton Sinclair: Literature and Social Reform, Frankfurt: Peter Lang, 1990.
- Geduld, Harry M. and Gottesman, Ronald (eds), Sergei Eisenstein and Upton Sinclair: The Making and Unmaking of Que Viva Mexico! London: Thames and Hudson, 1970.
- Harris, Leon, Upton Sinclair: American Rebel, New York: Thomas Y. Crowell, 1975.
- Scott, Ivan, Upton Sinclair, The Forgotten Socialist, Lewiston, New York: The Edwin Mellen Press, 1997.
- Seton, Marie, Sergei Eisenstein—A Biography, revised edn, London: Dennis Dobson, 1978.
- Sinclair, Upton, The Autobiography of Upton Sinclair, revised edn, London: W.H. Allen, 1963.

Siodmak, Robert

Robert Siodmak is best known as one of the most talented and prolific directors of film noir from the 1940s. One recalls the masturbatory frenzy of a jazz drummer lusting after a B-girl surrounded by expressionistic shadows in Phantom Lady (1944); the placement of killer, potential victim, and avenging angel at different levels on the eponymous structure of The Spiral Staircase (1946); and the hushed resignation of the 'Swede' to his own death in The Killers (1946). Like other notables making noir (Billy Wilder, Max Ophüls), Siodmak was a Jew who began in Germany, fled after 1933 to France, and emigrated to the United States during World War II. Siodmak's importance to documentary is twofold: (1) his work on the semi-documentary Menschen am Sonntag/People on Sunday (1930); and (2) his use in noir of documentary stylistics after World War II.

Siodmak and others raised the funds needed to shoot the late silent Menschen am Sonntag, which he codirected with Edgar Ulmer. As if teaming these notables were not enough, Fred Zinnemann assisted them; the screenplay was by Wilder, based on reporting by Curt Siodmak (Robert's brother): and Eugene Schufftan did the cinematography. Billed as a 'film without actors', featuring people 'before the camera for the first time in their lives', the film connects with the city symphonies of Ruttman, Cavalcanti, and Vertov, even if it is less avant-garde in focusing on specific characters and featuring a straightforward narrative. The film sketches a Berlin summer day as five performers, charmingly unselfconscious, essentially play themselves. Taxi driver Erwin and his ladies' man friend Wolfgang enjoy their day off with record seller Brigitte and film extra Christl. Hurt feelings ensue when Wolfgang flirts with both women, and Erwin returns home to find that his wife, Annie, has slept the day away.

Menschen's freshness surely resulted from the talented neophytes behind the scenes. An early tracking shot of motorcycles and trains links people with the rhythms of the city. The film overflows with documentary moments: shots of street cleaners, field hockey, naked babies, a man dripping water on a caterpillar, and the like. The 'story' scenes also feature extraneous moments (e.g. a disorienting shot of a man playing cards). Lengthy plotless scenes commence even before the picnic, as Erwin and Annie deal with an uncooperative door, read the paper, and have a fight. Reflexive in-jokes appear when they discuss Greta Garbo or angrily destroy film postcards. One later finds playfully vertiginous camera angles, with use of natural shadows, as if the future noirs of Siodmak and Ulmer were present in early form. Nonetheless, it is the reportage aspects that proved most influential. Documentary style is foregrounded in a delightful sequence where photographs are taken and the frame freezes for each, while a montage of statues seems more indebted to Soviet editing and the 'real' city symphonies. Associative editing keeps the story within persuasive documentary contexts, much as neorealism would later do. The film's open-air quality and use of nonprofessionals made it a classic, possibly influenced neorealism and genuine documentary, and proved a poignant record of a Germany soon to vanish.

Siodmak's French and early Hollywood films reprise little of Menschen's documentary qualities. Nonetheless, for all his Germanic stylizations, documentary creeps into his noir in the deglamorized studio streets, the clinical detailing of crime scenes, and a growing penchant for long takes and deep focus. Overtly documentarian noir really emerges after films like Jules Dassin's Naked City (1948). Siodmak's most stunning venture into this realm is the under-rated Cry of the City (1948), set in New York's Little Italy. Siodmak was reportedly unhappy with the location work and preferred the control possible within the studio, but the final product belies his mastery of combining documentary and expressionistic modes within noir. Before returning to Europe, Siodmak helmed a lesser but even more documentary-style film, The Whistle at Eaton Falls (1951), a Capraesque drama about a unionized worker who is named president of a plastics factory. Based on an actual case history, the film strongly bears the mark of March of Time producer Louis de Rochemont. Still, de Rochemont had already produced seminal documentary-style noirs like The House on 92nd Street (1945) and Boomerang! (1947), and the teaming with Siodmak is often successful, as lengthy sequences document mill life in rural New Hampshire.

DAVID M. LUGOWSKI

Biography

Born in Dresden, Saxony, Germany (some sources say Memphis, Tennessee, while his father was on a business trip) August 8, 1900. Attended Marburg University, 1917–20. Got a job writing subtitles for US films shown in Germany 1925. Joined UFA, working as a writing scout, film cutter, assistant director 1927. Left Germany for Paris after the Nazi takeover 1933. Left for the United States the day before Hitler's army marched into Paris; with brother's aid was signed by Paramount 1940. Began working for Universal; signed seven-year contract 1943–4. Returned to Europe, first to France, then Germany 1952. Died March 10, 1973.

Selected films

- 1930 Menschen am Sonntag/People on Sunday: codirector (with Edgar Ulmer)
- 1934 La Crise est finie/The Crisis is Over, or The Depression is Over: director
- 1939 Pièges/Snares, or Personal Column: director
- 1942 Fly by Night: director
- 1944 Phantom Lady: director
- 1944 Christmas Holiday: director
- 1945 The Strange Affair of Uncle Harry: director
- 1946 The Killers: director
- 1946 The Spiral Staircase: director
- 1948 Cry of the City: director

- 1949 Criss Cross: director
- 1951 The Whistle at Eaton Falls: director
- 1952 The Crimson Pirate: director
- 1957 Nachts, wenn der Teufel kam/The Devil Strikes at Night: director, producer
- 1958 Dorothea Angermann: director
- 1967 Custer of the West: director

Further reading

- Alpi, Deborah Lazaroff, Robert Siodmak, Jefferson, NC: MacFarland, 1998.
- Greco, Joseph, The File on Robert Siodmak in Hollywood, 1941–51, Dissertation.com, 1999.
- Hirschhorn, Clive, The Universal Story, New York: Crown, 1983.
- Naremore, James, More Than Night: Film Noir in its Contexts, Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1998.
- Silver, Alain and Ward, Elizabeth, Film Noir, Woodstock, NY: Overlook Press, 1979.

Sokurov, Aleksandr

The Russian director Aleksandr Nikolajevich Sokurov has made about twice as many documentaries as fiction films. One reason for this might be that under the Soviet regime Sokurov's masterly graduate fiction film Odinokiy Golos Cheloveka/The Lonely Voice of a Man (1978) for the State Film School (VGIK), was rejected on grounds of what was called 'formalism' in state socialism: it was more interested in aesthetics than in ideology, which in itself was regarded as anti-Soviet. Already in this first film, Sokurov rejected aiming at (changing) an outside social or socialist reality in favor of an adaptation of realist literature to initiate a process that starts from an internal perspective—in his documentaries sometimes the literary form of a diary provides the internal voice in response to a filmed reality. Sokurov's insightful critic Mikhail Yampolsky observed: 'The mentality of Sokurov's heroes is always limited; they can never comprehend reality as a whole' (Yampolsky 1994: 114).

The reproach of Sokurov's films being regarded as prerevolutionary was thus predictable. The filmmaker did not make things easy for himself. Consequently, Sokurov graduated one year earlier, but was denied the professional qualification for directing feature films—'feature' generally meaning 'fiction' film—and only given official permission to direct documentaries.

Supported alone by Andrej Tarkovsky, who, although in exile and regarded as subversive by the Soviet officials, nevertheless got him work at Lenfilm Studios. Sokurov went on to make feature films with Lenfilm, and the Leningrad Studio for Documentary Films continued to fund his documentaries. However, until 1987 all his films remained unscreened. Sokurov frequently had to hide the film rolls to protect his films from being destroyed by the Soviet censors. His films were only approved by the April 1985 Plenary Meeting of the CPDSU Central Committee in the wake of the democratic reforms of perestroika (Stishova 1995: 260). In 1986 the Soviet Filmmakers' Union appointed a new First Secretary, Elem Klimov, who himself had had several of his films banned and was keen to help other filmmakers who had been subjected to censorship. From 1987 onward, Sokurov's films could be screened publicly at home and abroad.

Like his most successful fiction film, Russkij kovcheg (2002), Sokurov's documentary Elegiya iz Rossii (1992) opens with a black screen. For the first four minutes we hear only the sound of breathing and voices, which seem to indicate that this is the breath of a dying person. After the breathing has stopped, an image emerges from the darkness: only after death, we can finally see. For Sokurov, film is another life (Galetski 2001: 4). His continuous and original explorations of death have specific implications for documentary. Death cannot be documented; it is a fiction for film as well as for the living. 'Documenting' death is a paradox that exceeds comprehension. This is where Sokurov's documentaries go beyond the terrain of conventional subjective documentary about (lived) experience. In many of his documentary elegies (a poetic lament for the dead), as well as in several fiction films, Sokurov explores the subject of death also in terms of movement. His images are often static with barely any motion. Sometimes only the falling of snow, the flying of seagulls, or the moving of light indicate that we are looking at a film and not a photo or a painting. Sokurov's films frequently show people who are only a few movements away from eternal stillness and darkness. In Elegiya iz Rossii an old man is lying immobile on a bed. First we cannot discern whether we see a photo or if he is dead, but then he moves. Sokurov's images evoke uncertainty as to whether their subjects are alive or dead: is the motionlessness of the image or in the image?

Sokurov has taken Tarkovski's rejection of montage and the embrace of the long take even further. As his films emerge with the seemingly least possible movement, they make the already slow pans of his mentor seem like action films. Sokurov's patience with the long take frequently evokes comparisons to André Bazin.

This neorealist critic sought the long take with a deep focus for a truer, spiritual understanding of reality manifested in the documentary quality of the images. In contrast to interpretations of Sokurov's long takes as Bazinian (French 2003), however, this spiritual filmmaker rejects documentary realism and depth-of-field in favor of a flat and opaque painterly look. Unlike the promotion of surface through the long take in Andy Warhol's Sleep—or Sam Taylor Wood's video of the sleeping celebrity David Beckham—when Sokurov films a person with his or her eyes closed or sleeping, it suggests a blocking of externality as superficial in favour of an internal reality. Since external reality is usually that which features in documentaries and is in some quarters regarded as the only reality it is possible to document, his subjective documentaries are frequently classified as 'semidocumentaries' or not as documentaries at all. Recently, critics have linked Sokurov's deliberate, textual exploration of 'blind images' in his work since the late 1970s with the deterioration of Sokurov's own eyesight since the late 1990s (Macnab 2003).

The rejection of reality as external for Sokurov goes together with a heightened importance of often ambient sound. He thus suggested that the visual film and the sound film 'ought to be able to exist apart from one another. If you listen to the sound on the film, it should be enough on its own' (Sokurov in Christie 1999: 16). The stillness in Sokurov's images is equivalent to the silence on the voice tracks. In many of his documentaries—for example Mariya (1978/1988), Dukhovnyje golosa (1995), Hubert Robert. Schastlivaya zhizn (1996), Povinnost (1998), Elegiya dorogi (2001)—and also in his fiction film Russkij kovcheg (2002), the filmmaker narrates in a whisper directly into the microphone as though he were speaking silently to himself. Sometimes his narration describes what we see in the images—often sensual, immediate impressions. In Dukhovnyje golosa (1990), for example, we see a landscape clouded in dust to which his voice repeats 'Everything is clouded with dust'.

However, the repetition of what we see in his narration does not heighten the immediacy; instead, it manifests the distance between the voice of the documentary subject and what it talks about, which is often what is shown. Thus, paradoxically, the closeness of the filmmaker's voice enhances the distance to its object; intimacy here brings isolation. The reality of the narrator is distinct from the external documentary reality—it is not an objective commentary that uses images illustratively as evidence. Apart from the fact that his father was a professional soldier, Sokurov's frequent observation of soldiers is perhaps also motivated by the fact that they—like their documentary observer—are already in an alien environment. Sokurov even assumes a position of distance with respect to his own past thoughts, by using them like quotes from a literary source rather than as direct expressions. In Dukhovnyje golosa, for instance, he narrates: 'Here's another entry from my diary: "I feel calm and unafraid walking along these paths, following these people. I don't feel excluded by them". But maybe I'm wrong. Maybe I'm wrong in thinking that I've become one of them.' Sokurov's documentaries originally have turned observation into a literary, poetic form. They seldom give their subjects a voice in direct speech and they are not informative. For example, Dukhovnyje golosa, depicting Russian soldiers at a border post between Afghanistan and Tajikistan, does not provide any substantial context. Sokurov observes the traces of their existence, not their tasks or their goals. When we finally 'see' a soldier shoot, we do not see what he shoots at. We hear the sound and see the ground on which used ammunition casings fall. A pan upwards then shows a soldier from behind. His aim can only be deduced indirectly.

Sokurov's documentaries often manifest disorientation and question understanding. In Elegiya dorogi the off-screen narrating filmmaker is uncertain about what he sees and where he is. In his fiction film Russkij kovcheg the filmmaker, too, provides the voice of an invisible commentator who wonders where he is. However, whereas in the fiction film the effect of this uncertainty is merely theatrical, in the documentary Elegiya dorogi the purported lack of agency of the filmmaker in and over his video has consequences with regard to referentiality. Sokurov's passive narrator's stance pushes the observational attitude of documentary filmmaking to its impossible limits: he denies knowledge and responsibility as a filmmaker and as his own protagonist. The disorientation is not only with respect to his narrative journey in the video but also with regard to the materiality of the medium and the referentiality of the images he sees: he addresses eighteenth-century paintings as though they depicted his recent past, and his own documentary reality as though it were a distant event, directed by someone else. In Elegiya dorogi Sokurov's exaggeration of the notion of documentary filmmaking as a passive following of events reverts the orders of before and after, of creation and documentation. Sokurov blocks the viewers' comprehension not only of content but also of the very visual image itself. His images are blurred, soft, dark, and contorted or they take an exceptionally long time to focus. It is often hard to make out what they actually depict. Superimpositions haunt his images like ghosts. The viewer is disorientated by long cross-fades with indiscernible transitions. One does not know what one looks at—or in which medium one looks at it: a photo or a moving image, a painting or reality. As with Wittgenstein's duck-rabbit, one can either switch between the two options or see an altogether new image that does not make sense. Sokurov's images keep us from being able to fully comprehend what we see by making themselves hard to read.

SILKE PANSE

Biography

Born July 14, 1951, in Podorvikha, near Irkutsk, Russia. Tenure as director's assistant for Gorki television and MA in history at Gorki University 1968–74. Studied film production in the class of Alexander Zguridi at the State Film School (VGIK) in Moscow with an Eisenstein Scholarship 1975–9. Employed by Lenfilm, Leningrad 1980. Still lives and works in St Petersburg.

Selected films

- 1957–90 Leningradskaya retrospektiva (1957–90)/ Leningrad Retrospective (1957–90) Parts 1–16
- 1978/88 Mariya/Krestyanskaya elegiya/Maria/Peasant Elegy
- 1979/89 Sonata dlya Gitlera/Sonata for Hitler

- 1981 Altovaya sonata: Dmitrii Shostakovich/Sonata for Viola. Dmitri Shostakovich: codirector (with Semyon Aranovitiĭ)
- 1982/7 I nichego bolshe/And Nothing More
- 1984/7 Zhertva vechernyaya/Evening Sacrifice
- 1985/7 Terpenie trud/Patient Labour
- 1986 Elegiya/Elegy
- 1986/8 Moskovskaya elegiya/Moscow Elegy
- 1989 Sovetskaya elegiya/Soviet Elegy
- 1990 Petersburgskaya elegiya/Petersburg Elegy
- 1990 Leningradskaya kinochronika No. 5 'K Sobytiyam v Zakavkazye'/Leningrad Film Chronicle Newsreel No. 5, Special Issue 'On the Events in the Transcaucasian Region'
- 1990 Prostaya elegiya/Simple Elegy
- 1991 Primer intonatsii/An Example of Intonation
- 1992 Elegiya iz Rossii/Russian Elegy, or Sketches for Sleep
- 1995 Soldatski Son/Soldier's Dream
- 1995 Dukhovnyje golosa/Spiritual Voices Parts 1–5
- 1996 Vostochnaya elegiya/Oriental Elegy
- 1996 Robert. Schastlivaya zhizn/Hubert Robert: A Fortunate Life
- 1997 Smirennaya zhizn/A Humble Life
- 1997 Petersburgski dnevnik. Otkrytie pamjatnika Dostoevskomu/The St Petersburg Diary. Inauguration of a Monument to Dostoevsky
- 1998 Petersburgski dnevnik. Kvartira Kozintseva/The St Petersburg Diary. Kozintsev's Flat Povinnost/Confession Parts 1–5
- 1998 Besedy s Solzhenitsynym/The Dialogues with Solzhenitsyn
- 1999 Dolce ... /Tenderly ...
- 2001 Elegiya dorogi/Elegy of a Voyage
- 2004 Peterburgski dnevnik. Motsart Rekviev/The St Petersburg Diary. Mozart's Requiem

Further reading

- Christie, Ian (ed.), 'Dossier: Aleksandr Sokurov, The Russian Idea', Film Studies: An International Review, no. 1, spring 1999: 63–77.
- 'The Civilising Russian', Sight and Sound 13, no. 4, April 2003: 10–11.
- French, Phillip, 'Take a Chance on a Long Shot', The Observer 6, no. 4, 2003.

- Galetski, Kirill, 'The Foundations of Film Art: An Interview with Alexander Sokurov', Cineaste 26, no. 3, 2001: 4–9.
- Halligan, Benjamin, 'The Remaining Second World: Sokurov and Russian Ark', Senses of Cinema: An Online Film Journal Devoted to the Serious and Eclectic Discussion of Cinema, no. 25, March–April 2003.
- Jameson, Frederick, 'On Soviet Magic Realism', in Frederick Jameson (ed.), The Geopolitical Aesthetic: Cinema and Space in the World System, Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press, 1992: 87–113.
- Macnab, Geoffrey, 'Eyeless in Turin', The Guardian 19, no. 11, 2003.
- Schrader, Paul, 'The History of an Artist's Soul is a Very Sad History', Film Comment 33, no. 6, 21.11, 1997: 20.
- Sokurov, Alexandr, 'Sokurov on Sound', Ian Christie (ed.), and 'Returning to Zero', Sight and Sound 8, no. 4, April 1998: 4, 14–17.
- 'Death, the Banal Leveller (on Tarkovsky)', Film Studies: An International Review, no. 1, spring 1999: 64.
- Stishova, Elena, 'Look Who's Here! A New Trend in Soviet Cinema!' in Elle E. Berry and Anesa Miller-Pogacar (eds), Re-entering the Sign: Articulating New Russian Culture, Ann Arbor, MI: University of Michigan Press, 1995: 259–69.
- Tuchinskaja, Alexandra, 'The Creation', The Island of Sokurov, 2001, sokurov.spb.ru/island_en/crt.html
- Yampolsky, Mikhail, 'The World as a Mirror for the Other World', in Michael Brashinsky and Andres Horton (eds), Russian Critics on the Cinema of Glasnost, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1994: 114–15.

Song of Ceylon, The

(UK, Wright, 1934–5)

The Song of Ceylon, a relatively lengthy, intricate, lyrical film directed by Basil Wright, is acclaimed as the crowning achievement of the first phase of the British documentary movement. It clearly displays the shaping influence of modernist aesthetics on early British documentary practice, as well as the more specific influence of documentary pioneer Robert Flaherty. The Song of Ceylon won the Prix du Gouvernement Belge at the 1935 Brussels film festival and has long enjoyed a reputation as one of the key texts in the documentary film canon. In recent years critical interest has extended from analysis of the film's aesthetics to interrogation of its relationship to colonial discourse and acknowledgment of its homoerotic representation of Ceylonese bodies.

The Song of Ceylon's genesis lay in the decision by Gervas Huxley at the Ceylon Tea Marketing Board to sponsor a series of public relations films. In doing so he emulated the policy promoted by Stephen Tallents, his former boss at the Empire Marketing Board (EMB). The initial conception was to produce a series of four short films on topics such as Ceylonese agriculture and fisheries. Production began during a period of transition as John Grierson's documentary film unit moved from the EMB to the General Post Office (GPO). Despite these uncertain circumstances Grierson remained fully committed to Wright's project. As the quality of the material became apparent he encouraged Wright to integrate it into a single, more substantial film. Wright's shorts prior to The Song of Ceylon had attracted positive critical attention, with some commentators even proclaiming him the first British documentary film 'poet'. Although Grierson was resistant to any kind of 'art for art's sake' stance, having one of his filmmakers regarded in this way enhanced the movement's standing within highbrow British film culture.

Wright always considered The Song of Ceylon to be his best film, partly because he became so immersed in the process of directing it. The contemplative aspects of Buddhism impressed him deeply and he sought to incorporate this feeling into the film. Wright, assisted by John Taylor, was responsible for cinematography as well as direction, and his images represent Ceylon as a domain of calm and beauty, ease and grace. Finely judged camera pans made possible by a tripod with a fluid gyrohead contribute to this impression. Wright had worked with Flaherty earlier in his career and his influence can be detected in camera pans that anticipate subjects' movements. This technique is used to particularly good effect in the sequence featuring marvelously adorned male dancers near to the end of the film.

Several British documentary films of this period, for example Night Mail (1936), were influenced by modernist aesthetics. Night Mail, however, inaugurated more narrativised forms of British documentary, whereas The Song of Ceylon's structure is indebted to an earlier tradition. It resembles the modernist 'city symphony', exemplified by films such as Rien que les heures (Alberto Cavalcanti, France, 1926) and Berlin, The Symphony of a Great City (Walter Ruttmann, Germany, 1927) insofar as it is structured in terms of a geographical demarcation and thematic linkages between shots and sequences (Guyn 1998). The Song of Ceylon is subdivided into four sections, each with its own title: '1. The Buddha', concerned with religious observances; '2. The Virgin Island', on traditional handicrafts, house building, harvesting, fishing and the training of dancers; '3. The Voices of Commerce', which represents imperial trade and industrialisation; and '4. The Apparel of a God', which returns to the religious emphasis of the first section.

One important difference between The Song of Ceylon and the city symphonies set in Western metropolises is that they often concentrate on diversity and change, whereas Wright's film privileges uniformity and continuity. The Song of Ceylon implies that the religious and traditional practices it represents constitute the essence of an entire culture rather than a selective record primarily of its rural areas. Urban space and industrial, administrative, and professional work is only briefly represented toward the end of 'The Voices of Commerce', and there is no explicit reference to the existence of different ethnic groups, religions other than Buddhism, or secular lifestyles. By referring to the country as a whole rather than just a particular area or aspect of the culture, the title promises comprehensiveness, but this is something The Song of Ceylon does not actually deliver.

Ceylon also stands largely outside history in this film. As its opening titles explain, the bulk of the voice-over narration consists of extracts drawn from an account of Ceylon written in 1680 by the Scot Robert Knox. Visual images illustrating this account seem to confirm that little has changed in the intervening time. In conventional narrative, film editing dissolves, usually between sequences, denote the passing of a brief period of time, but in The Song of Ceylon they are used so frequently within as well as between sequences that time becomes indeterminate. This is particularly the case in 'The Buddha', when pilgrims ascend the holy mountain known to Europeans as Adam's Peak. This is as much a spiritual journey as a temporal one. Through such devices the film constructs a representation of the eternal spirit of Ceylon.

Contemporary film historians have argued that early British documentaries adapted modernist techniques to represent unified and harmonious rather than conflictual and contradictory social relationships (Higson 1986; Nichols 2001). The Song of Ceylon bears this out. Its editing derives from the modernist European montage tradition but generally emphasises correlation rather than radical juxtaposition. One example at the end of the 'The Buddha' is a series of exquisite shots of a bird perched on a branch and in flight silhouetted against a lake and sky. These alternate with shots of Buddhist monuments. The abruptness of these transitions and the contrast between static monument and moving bird is tempered by careful matching across shots of the bird's flight, the water's flow, and rapid camera pans along the monument. The cumulative effect of this subtle cross-cutting is to conjure into existence a harmonious realm where Buddhism is part of the natural order rather than an historical or cultural phenomenon that changes and develops over time.

The Song of Ceylon's voice-over narration, spoken by Lionel Wendt, does not conform to the stereotype of a reductive, didactic commentary bludgeoning the listener into submission. It is intermittent and does not attempt to explain everything on the image track. Its quietly meditative tone and unusual accent differentiates it from the confidently authoritative southern English, white, middle-class, male voice heard, for example, in Housing Problems (Edgar Anstey and Arthur Elton, 1935). Wendt was a Burgher, an English-speaking descendant of native Ceylonese and early European colonists. His voice-over narration conveys empathy, even reverence, toward the subject matter, rather than a detached assessment or contextualisation of it. This emphasis on feeling and experience as well as explanation includes the recitation of passages from Buddhist religious texts, the delivery of which sometimes approximates a mantra. The Song of Ceylon's unconventional voice-over is comprehensible to white Western listeners but does not provide complete access, except perhaps intuitively, to the alluring non-Western world the film represents.

Tantalising inaccessibility is also rendered visually in Wright's film. Graham Greene, in a perceptive review, noted that The Song of Ceylon begins and ends with dark shots of fans of foliage that stand as a natural barrier between the onlooker and the beautiful existence glimpsed in the film. The Song of Ceylon constructs Ceylon as a desirable space, different to and separate from the world inhabited by its implied white Western viewers. Wendt's voice-over narration tails off toward the end of 'The Apparel of a God'; words are ultimately incapable of providing access to all the sacred mysteries of Ceylonese culture. For this film the essence of Ceylon is something felt rather than something that can be fully explained through rational exposition. The Song of Ceylon's culminating dance sequence eschews voice-over narration and instead utilises anticipatory camera movements to incorporate the viewer into the rhythms of the dancer's movements.

Experimentation with sound was made possible by the British Visatone system newly acquired for the GPO film unit's premises at Blackheath in London. All of The Song of Ceylon's sound was recorded during post-production. Wright, Alberto Cavalcanti, and composer Walter Leigh were the main collaborators at this stage. Cavalcanti was the only member of this trio with significant experience of sound film and, like Flaherty earlier in his career, Wright found him a congenial mentor who encouraged him to innovate. While working on the soundtrack, Wright co-authored a manifesto in the highbrow journal Film Art endorsing the idea of sound-image counterpoint pioneered in particular by Soviet film maker Sergei Eisenstein in the late 1920s (Macpherson 1980).

'The Voices of Commerce' is the only one of The Song of Ceylon's sections where a discordant note is struck. An assortment of voices, including those of Wright, Cavalcanti, Grierson, and Stuart Legg, conduct business and state commodity prices over images of traditional Ceylonese manual labour (Barnouw 1983). These voices sound coldly impersonal and indifferent to the spiritual and human dimensions of Ceylonese culture referred to in Wendt's narration and valorised on the image track. Some commentators familiar with the ideas expounded in Wright's manifesto interpreted sound-image counterpoint in 'The Voices of Commerce' as a concealed critique of imperialist exploitation (Stollery 2000).

'The Voices of Commerce' section obliquely hints at possible criticisms of Empire without openly subverting the sponsor's brief. More pervasive in The Song of Ceylon is a Romantic conception of non-Western otherness. 'The Buddha' opens the film with religious representations and the concluding section 'The Apparel of a God' returns to this theme. The film's overarching structure emphasises the timelessness of Ceylon's profoundly traditional culture and the visual style lends beauty to its representation. The extracts from Robert Knox's text narrated by Wendt accentuate Ceylon's otherness for the white Western viewer. The full text of Knox's 'An Historical Relation of Ceylon' discusses early Portuguese and Dutch colonisation, but there is no acknowledgment of the long record of Western domination and Ceylonese-European interaction in the quotations used in The Song of Ceylon. Apart from what might be gleaned from 'The Voices of Commerce', this history is largely absent from the film. Fundamentally, it posits Ceylon as essentially other, a partially accessible space offering a seductive alternative to Western modernity (Stollery 2000).

One of The Song of Ceylon's most seductive aspects is its focus on Ceylonese male bodies, which seem in tune with nature and at ease with their physicality (Waugh 1996). The British documentary film movement was committed to the cinematic representation of men at work; The Song of Ceylon aestheticises and eroticises this commitment. The buttocks, torsos, and supple limbs of semi-naked men feature prominently in the film. Particularly impressive in this respect is the sequence of a fisherman stripped to the waist standing in water casting his nets in 'The Virgin Island'. Typically, this eroticisation takes place in the context of documenting traditional labour practices, but more languorous moments, such as a semi-naked lone male worshipper praying in 'The Apparel of a God', also carry a similar charge. The experience, which cannot be adequately explained in words, of the dance performed by beautifully adorned men at the end of the film is also a sexual one. Wright's Ceylon is in part the locus for the celebration of a desire that could not be overtly expressed in either fictional or documentary filmmaking at that time.

A Song of Ceylon (Laleen Jayamanne, Australia, 1985) is a nonnarrative film directed by a Sri Lankan-born filmmaker. Like The Song of Ceylon, it experiments with sound, image, and a voice-over narration quoting extracts from a preexistent anthropological text. Unlike its predecessor, A Song of Ceylon does not intimate an essential, timeless Ceylon, elusively located outside Western modernity but perhaps fleetingly accessible through intuition and emotion.

Its concern is not to record or represent Ceylon/Sri Lanka as such but rather to challenge some of the abiding preoccupations and assumptions of Western colonial discourse (Vigneswaran 2000).

The crucial difference between the two films is that A Song of Ceylon rejects the categorical distinction between the Western and non-Western world on which The Song of Ceylon ultimately rests. Instead, it contains utopian moments where unorthodox framing, colour processing, and editing collapse visible differences between Western, non-Western, male, and female bodies. For all its aesthetic sophistication, coded critique of imperialism, and genuine admiration for aspects of Ceylonese culture, The Song of Ceylon still belongs to a tradition of representing inhabitants of the non-Western world as essentially more vital, primitive, and sexual than the white, Western viewers the film is designed to address.

MARTIN STOLLERY

See also: Wright, Basil

The Song of Ceylon (UK, GPO/New Era, 1934–5). Produced by John Grierson. Direction by Basil Wright. Cinematography by Basil Wright. Edited by Basil Wright. Assistant John Taylor. Script by John Grierson, Basil Wright, and others. Commentary by Lionel Wendt. Sound recorded by E.A. Pawley. Sound supervision by Alberto Cavalcanti. Music by Walter Leigh. Filmed in Ceylon (now Sri Lanka) and London.

Further reading

- Aitken, Ian, The Documentary Film Movement: An Anthology, Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press, 1998.
- Barnouw, Erik, Documentary: A History of the Non-fiction Film, New York: Oxford University Press, 1983.
- Guyn, William, 'The Art of National Projection: Basil Wright's The Song of Ceylon', in Barry Keith Grant and Jeannette Sloniowski (eds), Documenting the Documentary, Detroit, MI: Wayne State University Press, 1998: 83–98.
- Higson, Andrew, 'Britain's Outstanding Contribution to the Film': The Documentary-Realist Tradition', in Charles Barr (ed.), All Our Yesterdays, London: BFI, 1986: 72–97.
- Macpherson, Don (ed.), Traditions of Independence, London: BFI, 1980.

- Nichols, Bill, 'Documentary Film and the Modernist Avant-Garde', Critical Inquiry 27, no. 4, summer 2001: 580–610.
- Starr, Cecile, 'The Song of Ceylon: An Interview with Basil Wright', in Kevin Macdonald and Mark Cousins (eds), Imagining Reality: The Faber Book of Documentary, London: Faber, 1996: 102–11.
- Stollery, Martin, Alternative Empires: European Modernist Cinemas and Cultures of Imperialism, Exeter: University of Exeter Press, 2000.
- Sussex, Elizabeth, The Rise and Fall of British Documentary, Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1975.
- Swann, Paul, The British Documentary Film Movement 1926–46, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1989.
- Vigneswaran, Priyadarshini, 'Hysteria and the Hybrid Body in Laleen Jayamanne's A Song of Ceylon', Journal of Australian Studies, June 2000: 173–80.
- Waugh, Thomas, Hard to Imagine: Gay Male Eroticism in Photography and Film from Their Beginnings to Stonewall, New York: Columbia University Press, 1996.

Sorrow and the Pity, The

(France, Ophüls, 1969)

The Sorrow and the Pity is not only the most famous of Marcel Ophüls's films; it is also one of the most controversial documentary films in the history of French cinema. Both its subject and the conditions of its release explain its considerable success in France and abroad. It deals with one of the most contentious periods of contemporary French history—the occupation of France by German troops during World War II. The film also raises the issue of artistic independence from the pressures of politics.

The Sorrow and the Pity is an account of life in Clermont-Ferrand during the German occupation, and mainly consists of interviews. As the full title indicates, it is a 'Chronicle of a French City under the Occupation'. Most of the interviews are with local people from this midsize town in the Auvergne region of France. The choice of Clermont-Ferrand as the setting is significant, given its proximity to Vichy, where the collaborationist government of Maréchal Pétain and Pierre Laval retreated from Paris. It is also in the Auvergne region that the armed Resistance, known as the Maquis, originated in 1943. In its geographical isolation and long history dating back to the Gauls, it is a perfect example of a provincial and insular France, often referred to as 'La France profonde'. The title of the film is taken from the comment made by one of the town residents when asked what she felt about the occupation: 'Sorrow and pity', she replied.

Conducted by Marcel Ophüls and André Harris, the interviews feature several inhabitants of Clermont-Ferrand. Going beyond the local dimension, and avoiding a purely anecdotal version of events, the film also includes interviews with political personalities, among them Pierre Mendès-France the ex-French Prime Minister, Sir Anthony Eden, and Jacques Duclos, a prominent figure in the French Communist Party.

The Sorrow and the Pity portrays a town divided, uncertain how to cope and which side to take. The interviews are interweaved with newsreels dating back to World War II. The film carefully avoids being judgmental or even formulating a specific opinion about these events, giving instead a more balanced view of living conditions during these years. It nevertheless aims to challenge the version of life under German occupation promoted by various regimes since the War, in particular the Gaullist idea of a France united against the occupant, and the glamorization of the Resistance. While the public and most commentators have welcomed this openness about an era largely suppressed until the early 1970s, others criticized its prejudices.

The Sorrow and the Pity is considered a landmark among French documentary films. One of the striking features of the film is the manner of openness with which the interviews are conducted. Marcel Ophüls, who, as a Jew, had to flee France to escape persecution, is often credited with having adopted a humanistic approach to these interviews. He allows for collaborationists as well as resistance fighters, German soldiers, and ordinary French people to talk freely about their experience of the war and their role in it. The result is a strikingly blunt account of life during the occupation.

Wartime newsreels are presented in montage, and emphasize that much of the information made available to the French people at the time was propaganda put forth by the Germans or the Vichy regime. The Sorrow and the Pity also includes film footage from the BBC, in which de Gaulle is given a low profile. Here again, the public is not provided with any particular interpretation of facts, but a mere account of what it was like to live under German occupation.

As such, the newsreels add more depth to the film, giving another dimension to the interviews, and acting as a complement to them.

Marcel Ophüls has frequently explained how he perceives his role as an historian. As a documentary filmmaker, he is not concerned with a history made of great narratives, based on theories and generalisations (a Hegelian vision). He prefers instead to collect stories as told by those who were witnesses, which he then places in the context of the period he is exploring, a pragmatic approach that he developed while working in the United States. The result can be anecdotal, and he has been criticized for a kind of downgrading of events to individual experience, but the use of footage allows him to recreate a wider historical perspective. The Sorrow and the Pity is a perfect example of his method, which broke new ground in documentary film at the time of its release, and offered new ways to analyse and present an historical subject.

In The Sorrow and the Pity, the subject is not just an account of the everyday struggle of the average person. The film is about how memory of a painful time, like the German occupation, can be easily altered, in favour of that of a glorious nation united against the enemy—a version of events that General de Gaulle and the Resistance were all too keen to promote. The film therefore made very uncomfortable viewing for the generation that experienced the wartime events firsthand, and its emphasis on the collaborationists shattered the official version of events that had been passed on to the next generation.

The conditions of the release of The Sorrow and the Pity are highly significant, reflecting the unease of French leaders with the Occupation. Ophüls, who never made a secret of his left-leaning political inclination, belongs to a generation of filmmakers who found themselves in conflict with the Gaullist regime. In the late 1960s he was working for the ORTF, the French state-owned television company, where he was a segment director of Zoom, one of its most popular current affairs programmes. In 1967 he made Munich, or Peace in Our Time, produced by André Harris and Alain de Sédouy, which became a television success. The Sorrow and the Pity would have followed, if it had not been for the unrest of May 1968.

Ophüls was among those who openly criticized the attempts of the government to censure the reporting of the unrest that shook France in May 1968. Having left the ORTF, he found funding with Swiss and German television, and after months of filming and editing over sixty hours of interviews, The Sorrow and the Pity was released in 1969. It became a huge commercial success abroad, and was nominated for Best Documentary at the Academy Awards. It won the National Society of Film Critics Special Award.

In France, The Sorrow and the Pity was first screened on April 5, 1971, in a small left-bank cinema in Paris, the Studio Saint Séverin. Due to the enthusiastic response of the public, it was then screened at the Paramount-Elysées, where it remained a feature for a record eighty-seven weeks. Nevertheless, Ophüls had to wait another ten weeks before his film was shown on French television, for which it was originally intended. Although not censored, as is commonly thought, it was simply either turned down or ignored by French television until 1981, when a leftist administration came into power. The television premiere on FR3 attracted fifteen million viewers, confirming the success it had already had in theatres, and providing vindication for Ophüls.

The film is two hundred and sixty minutes long, divided into two parts. The first part, 'The Collapse', lasts one hundred and twenty-seven minutes, and the second part, 'The Choice', runs over one hundred and thirty-three minutes. It was shot in black and white using a 16mm Éclair Coutant (NPR) and a Nagra with a budget of 500,000 Deutsche Marks. The editing of sixty hours into four and a half is one of the features that made the film so famous, not only to the aficionados of the documentary film but also to the wider public. While Ophüls or André Harris conducted the interviews, the camera operators were trusted with a large degree of flexibility regarding which techniques to use, the result providing an additional layer of texture to these interviews. The cross-cutting technique used in the editing gives a dynamic to the interviews that sustains the attention of the audience over four and a half hours. The depth of the research into the archives for the footage contributes to the richness of the film.

Ophüls directed Nuremberg and Vietnam: An American Tragedy (1976) as a sort of sequel to The Sorrow and the Pity. Apart from working for the radio and making a variety of documentaries in France, Germany, and the United States, his three adopted countries, Ophüls's other major work related to the war years is Hotel Terminus: The Life and Times of Klaus Barbie (1988).

The Sorrow and the Pity played a key role in the reassessment of the French during the German occupation. Ophüls is often credited as the director who inaugurated what are known as the 'retro years' of French cinema. While markedly different as a work of fiction, Lacombe Lucien, directed by Louis Malle in 1974, is a similar attempt to demystify these years. Claude Lanzmann's 1985 Shoah also attempts to determine the truth of a dark and turbulent time in history.

YVAN TARDY

See also: Ophüls, Marcel; Shoah

The Sorrow and the Pity: Chronicle of a French City under the Occupation/Le Chagrin et la pitié: Chronique d'une ville française sous l'Occupation (1969, distributed by Milestone Film and Video Release, Harrington Park, NJ, USA, 260 mins). Directed by Marcel Ophüls. Produced by André Harris and Alain de Sedouy (Productions Télévision Rencontres SA, 1969). Production director: Wolfgang Theile, assisted by Claude Vajda. Script and interviews by Marcel Ophüls and André Harris. Photography by André Gazut and Jurgen Thieme. Edited by Claude Vajda assisted by Heidi Endruweit and Wiebke Vogler. Mixing by Wolfgang Schroter. Sound by Bernard Migy. Music by Maurice Chevalier ('Notre Espoir', 1941) and Jean Boyer ('ça fait d'excellent français', 1939). Publications: Francis Day SA ('ça sent si bon la France', 1942) and Sam Coslow ('Sweeping the Clouds Away', 1930).

Further reading

- Avisar, Llan, Screening the Holocaust: Cinema's Images of the Unimaginable, Bloomington, IN: University of Indiana Press, 1988.
- Canby, Vincent, 'A Look Back in "Sorrow and Pity"', The New York Times, March 26, 1972.
- Cantor, Jay, 'Death and the Image', TriQuarterly 79, fall 1990: 173–98.
- Demby, B.J., 'The Sorrow and the Pity, A Sense of Loss. A Discussion with Marcel Ophüls', Film-makers' Newsletter, Ward Hill, MA: December 1972.
- Greene, Naomi, 'La Vie en Rose: Images of the Occupation in French Cinema', in Lawrence D. Kritzman (ed.), Auschwitz and After: Race, Culture, and 'the Jewish Question' in France, New York: Routledge, 1995: 283–98.

- James, Carol Plyley, 'Documentary and Allegory: History Moralized in Le Chagrin et la Pitié', The French Review 59, no. 1, October 1985: 84–9.
- Kazin, Alfred, 'Don't Believe They Didn't Know about Hitler', The New York Times, November 28, 1971.
- Knight, Arthur, 'Marcel Ophüls: "The Sorrow and the Pity"', in Lewis Jacobs (ed.), The Documentary Tradition, second edn, New York: W.W. Norton, 1979: 521–3.
- Lyon, Christopher, The International Dictionary of Films and Filmmakers, Volume II, New York: Pedigree Books, 1984.
- Porton, Richard, 'The Troubles He's Seen: An Interview with Marcel Ophüls', Cineaste 21, no. 3, 1995: 8–13.
- Reilly, C.P., 'The Sorrow and the Pity', film review, Films in Review, XXIII, no. 4, April 1972: 248.
- Reynolds, Sian, 'The Sorrow and the Pity Revisited: Or, Be Careful, One Train Can Hide Another', French Cultural Studies 1, no. 2, June 1990: 149–59.
- Rubenstein, L., 'The Sorrow and the Pity', film review, Cineaste V, no. 1, winter 1971–2: 15–18.
- Silverman, Michael, 'The Sorrow and the Pity', film review, Film Quarterly XXV, no. 4, summer 1972: 56–9.
- Wakeman, John (ed.), World Film Directors: Volume Two, 1945–85, New York: H.W. Wilson Company, 1988.
- Wilhelm, Elliot, VideoHound's World Cinema, Detroit, MI: Visible Ink Press, 1999.

South

(UK, Hurley, 1919)

South is the best known and most widely shown version of the feature documentary compiled from footage taken by the photographer and filmmaker Frank Hurley (1885–1962) during the 1914–16 attempt to cross Antarctica undertaken by a team of polar explorers led by the former merchant seaman, Sir Ernest Shackleton (1874–1922). Its restoration by the UK's National Film and Television Archive (NFTVA), completed in 1998, stimulated renewed interest and research in British polar exploration in general and Shackleton in particular.

The first decade of the twentieth century saw intense interest in polar exploration, focused primarily on the race to reach the South Pole on foot between Shackleton's former colleague Robert Falcon Scott and the Norwegian explorer Roald Amundsen in 1910–11. The Scott expedition set a precedent that

Figure 18 South, 1919 (Courtesy of the British Film Institute)

Shackleton's team would follow, in that a celebrity photographer (Herbert Ponting) was hired to accompany the expedition and produce still and moving images for subsequent commercial exploitation. As the opening scenes of the Ealing dramatisation of the Scott expedition, Scott of the Antarctic (UK 1948, directed by Charles Frend), point out, fundraising was always a major problem for the Edwardian polar explorers. Advance sales of exploitation rights for photographs and film had proved to be an important source of revenue for Scott.

Although initially reluctant to do likewise, Shackleton was eventually persuaded to hire the Australian photographer Frank Hurley on the strength of his photographs and film (released in Australia as Home of the Blizzard) taken on the 1910–14 Douglas Mawson expedition. The Imperial Trans-Arctic Film Company was filmed to manage the exploitation rights, and the expedition eventually set off in July 1914.

In terms of its stated objective, the Shackleton expedition was, like Scott's, a complete failure. Their ship, the Endurance, became trapped in pack ice some eighty miles from the Antarctic ice shelf, from where it was carried north by tidal currents for nine months before being abandoned on October 27, 1915, and crushed by the pack ice on November 21. The events that then unfolded, however, provided Hurley with some spectacular material that formed the basis of the film as it was eventually released four years later. Footage of the Endurance's gradual destruction by the ice is one such example, and interest in the film was stimulated when details of Shackleton's spectacular rescue operation began to emerge. After abandoning the ship, a group of six crew members sailed a small wooden dinghy for seventeen days and eight hundred miles across the storm-ridden Southern Ocean, eventually reaching the island of South Georgia on May 10, 1916. There then followed a two-day forced march across the island in order to reach its only inhabitants. With help from the Uruguayan and Argentine navies, Shackleton then organised a fresh expedition to rescue his remaining colleagues, including Hurley.

South is the edited version of Hurley's film as released in 1919, two years after the survivors' return to Britain. It performed moderately well at the box office, but suffered to a certain extent from the fundamental change in political climate that had resulted from the events of World War I. This is clearly demonstrated in the opening intertitles to the film as released, which state that the expedition had set off 'one month after Shackleton had offered his ship, stores and all personnel to the cause of the country, only to be told that the authorities desired that the Expedition, which had the full support of the Government, should proceed'. Although the rescue operation was universally acknowledged to be an astonishing achievement and a vastly preferable outcome to that of the Scott expedition (which had resulted in several deaths), there was a school of thought that held that Shackleton's abilities might have been more usefully deployed fighting the Kaiser than on yet another polar exploration venture that had failed in all its key objectives. On the back of the release of Ponting's sound version of the Scott footage, 90° South, a subsequent version of Hurley's footage was shown in 1933 with a synchronised commentary and music. The title says it all—Endurance: The Story of a Glorious Failure.

South remained out of circulation for almost eighty years after its initial release until it was restored from a wide range of surviving elements by the NFTVA. The archivists who worked on the project took several years to establish the correct running order of each shot and select the best quality extant elements from which to construct the version used to produce the new preservation master. The NFTVA finally released the film in new tinted and toned 35mm prints and a DVD with extensive contextualising material. The marketing of Caroline Alexander's book on the expedition, published in the same year, was coordinated with that of Hurley's film.

This raises the issue of the role that moving image archives play in mediating our access to moving image heritage, especially in the area of nonfiction film where exposure through other means (e.g. broadcasts and retail video/DVD sales) is significantly lower. South was an obvious candidate for a major restoration, both from a technical standpoint (i.e. the techniques were available to enable high-quality photochemical duplication from surviving elements, which themselves enabled the complete film to be reconstructed) and a cultural one. The preexisting, almost mythological status of Captain Scott as established by Ponting's footage and Scott of the Antarctic created a public interest in and a market for the polar exploration genre. The details of Shackleton's spectacular rescue mission also ensured the newsworthiness of the restoration of the film, not to mention a revival of interest in Hurley's career as a photographer. However, it also illustrates the increasing tendency of national moving image archives to prioritise major projects around a restricted range of films, which some would argue is to the detriment of other titles that are of equal cultural importance but a less attractive marketing proposition.

LEO ENTICKNAP

See also: Great White Silence, The

Further reading

- Alexander, Caroline, The Endurance: Shackleton's Legendary Antarctic Expedition, New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1998.
- Bickel, Leonard, In Search of Frank Hurley, London: Macmillan, 1980.
- Shackleton, Sir Ernest, South: The Story of Shackleton's 1914–17 Expedition, London: Heinemann, 1919.
- Worsley, Frank, Endurance, London: George Allen & Unwin, 1931.

Southeast Asia

Geographically speaking, Southeast Asia is made up of Brunei, Cambodia, Indonesia, Laos, Malaysia, Myanmar (Burma), the Philippines, Singapore, Thailand, and Vietnam. It is an area covering over forty-three thousand miles and contains a diverse region of countries, dialects, and religions. It is a region that has experienced war, political upheaval, and economic and social instability. These themes are dominant within the documentary films originating from, and being made within, these Southeast Asian nations. A common thread that ties all of these countries together is strong government intervention and censorship, thus documentaries produced and exhibited by citizens of the respective nations are considered to be quite important.

Some countries are yet to rediscover their past through the restoration and rediscovery of documentaries and archives—Laos and Cambodia are prime examples. Decades of war and struggle have resulted in less than favorable conditions for local filmmakers and lack of governmental or private funding in these countries means that most documentaries are produced and distributed overseas, or in neighboring countries. Due to the lack of local education, facilities and services, such as equipment, costs, and bureaucratic red tape, it is quite the norm to have foreign filmmakers shoot documentaries within the region. Traditionally, ‘wealthier’ countries such as Singapore, Indonesia, the Philippines, and Thailand already had an existing documentary film history (and thus professionally maintained and funded archives) that contributed to being able to produce and sustain local documentary film, whereas poorer countries, such as Laos and Cambodia, required more funding and local facilities and education. This status quo has continued to the present day, although it is hoped that as countries such as Laos and Cambodia open up to commerce and tourists this may gradually change. Greater economic power should mean increased funding and facilities to promote documentary film.

In Indochina, it was historically the French who brought cinema and thus documentary film and various cinematic techniques to Southeast Asia. The French colonial government had extended influence (as French protectorates) in present-day Myanmar, Cambodia, Laos, Thailand, and Vietnam, and as such were able to bring in new technology. Myanmar, Malaysia, and Singapore had access to Indian film markets and technology, whereas the Philippines had both Spanish/European and United States influence and money, thus it also maintains a high level of involvement in all matters of film. It is assumed that documentary filmmaking was introduced into the countries by foreign persons, not by the evolution of an internal film industry, and it appears that the trend in foreign filmmaking has continued to the present day.

The majority of contemporary documentaries on Southeast Asia, whether political, economic, socioanthropological, or entertainment, are created and produced either with a fully funded foreign crew or a partially funded local and foreign crew. Singapore, Thailand, Indonesia, Vietnam, and the Philippines are arguably the exceptions, as they have a rich cinematic culture and internal production facilities. However, state censorship is almost always at the forefront of documentary production by domestic producers—especially when dealing with politically sensitive issues.

The Kingdom of Brunei’s independent film industry is virtually nonexistent: most locally produced content is passed by government censors as the privately owned press falls under the Sultan’s jurisdiction (all are family-owned with the exception of satellite television). However, the country has made four historically important documentaries under the auspices of the Brunei Information Service (now Information Department). The 1954 documentaries were of the ear-piercing ceremony of the Princess, the birthday of the King, the birthday celebrations of the prophet Mohammad, and the first landing of aircraft at the local airport. They are important as they map a local history of the Sultan and the introduction of technology to this nation; however, they are difficult to purchase and view.

Myanmar (Burma) had a lively film history and was receptive to Indian cinema from across the border. The most famous of Myanmar producers are U Nyi Pu and U Ohn Maung, who are believed to be the country’s first documentary film directors. At the behest of the Myanmar government, they exhibited their commissioned film in London for the 1919 Empire Exhibition—a documentary on the silk, rice, and teak trade in Myanmar. It was the first Myanmar documentary to be exhibited overseas. U Ohn Maung also shot a documentary on the death of a delegate, U Htoon Shein, his funeral procession shown in the Cinéma de Paris in Yangon. This was the first documentary shown in Myanmar made by a national.

Unfortunately, with the indigenous tribes technically at war, it is virtually impossible to film documentaries within the country any longer without significant risk. Political documentaries do exist in relation to the Junta party, in particular the political struggles of humanitarian Aung San Suu Kyi. Aung San Suu Kyi: The Prisoner of Rangoon (Claude Schauli, 2003) is an example. Major television stations such as the BBC and CNN show documentaries commissioned by themselves, but most are mainly interviews with additional footage of protests dispersed throughout, and are usually dependent on informants within Myanmar for information or permission to film a specified event for a specified amount of time. With the use of hidden cameras, documentaries have increasingly dealt with the indigenous tribes within Myanmar and the problems associated with one-party rule. The Forgotten War (Frank Smith, 2002) is one such example.

King Norodom Sihanouk has arguably been one of the few Cambodian documentary filmmakers to successfully produce and exhibit his own films. Creating documentaries from the early 1960s to the 1990s, King Sihanouk created a Cambodia in his image, the films usually obscuring or avoiding references to poverty, war, and other hardship that the country has suffered at the hands of Pol Pot and the Khmer Rouge. The most well-known documentaries include Cambodia 1965 (1965), The Visit of General de Gaulle to the Kingdom of Cambodia (1966), and The Pagoda of the Emerald Buddha at Phnom Penh (1995).

The majority of available Cambodian documentaries are mainly on Pol Pot and the Khmer Rouge. Most documentaries and their producers are not living in Cambodia, as facilities are lacking. The most famous Cambodian documentary producer is Rithy Panh, who is based in France. Panh produced four well-known documentaries that are considered to be Cambodia's finest attempt at addressing the issue of genocide at the hands of the Pol Pot Regime. Panh shot Around the Borders (1989), semi-documentary Bophana, a Cambodian Tragedy (1996), The Land of Wandering Souls (1999), and S21 The Khmer Rouge Killing Machine (2003). S21 was awarded the International Human Rights Film Award.

Indonesia has an extensive documentary history. It has a state-run center that produces sanctioned and approved documentaries for television. Documentaries and films must be approved by the Directorate of Film of the Department of Information in Jakarta.

Indonesia covers a vast area and many different religions, thus the range of documentary film on offer is quite astounding. Sociological and anthropological documentaries are common, most focusing on cultural aspects of Indonesian society. The Three Worlds of Bali (Ira Abrams, 1979) is especially well known. The Suharto and Sukarno regimes are popular topics, and Chris Hilton's Shadowplay (2002) is perhaps one of the most famous examples of a film on this topic.

Laos, now a Communist nation, once had a promising cinema and documentary film industry. In 1975 the Communist insurgents overthrew the ruling monarchy and, as a result, few official cinematic representations of the country exist. What did exist had been withheld, or kept in Vietnam at the Vietnam Film Institute until 1998, when it was repatriated to the new Lao National Film Archive and Video Center. It was estimated that around one thousand one hundred and ninety-two Lao films were returned; however, it is unknown whether politically sensitive documentaries and footage of the former royal family were retained in Vietnam or destroyed. The Lao National Film Archive and Video Center now consists of over two thousand titles and is seen as the official government body in charge of Lao film and video.

The oldest known independently produced documentary film in Laos was shot and produced around 1956 and featured glimpses of the royal family. The majority of documentaries that exist today are shot by either the Communist Lao Patriotic Front Documentary Film Service, which filmed various documentaries about their activities (post- and pre-wartime), or Lao and Vietnamese soldiers filming incursions into Laos, including Xayxana Ladulaeng/Dry Season Victory (1970) and Xaopi Haeng Karnpathiwath/ Twenty Years of the Revolution (1965). As both Laos and Vietnam are still considered Communist nations, it remains difficult to gain comprehensive and correct information on documentaries produced within the country, especially when dealing with restoration and 'preservation' of important historical records. It is hoped that as the new archive center becomes more autonomous, the Lao will have greater control over visual historical material. Audio-visual material within Laos is also heavily censored.

Documentaries made by non-Lao persons are far more common, however, and receive the most exposure outside of Laos' national boundaries. Some interesting Lao-themed documentaries include The Mekong, A Turbulent River: Laos and Thailand (1989), Moving Mountains (Elaine Velasquez, 1990), and Blue Collar and Buddha (Taggart Siegel, 1987). The latter are documentaries that attest to cultural, social, and political upheaval of Lao to the United States, a theme readily explored in the majority of films shot outside of Laos.

In Vietnam the main topic of documentary interest is the Vietnam War and the postwar era. American involvement in the region and the global consequences of the war have resulted in a higher awareness of the country, and an increased interest in making and showing documentaries. Previously, most readily available (outside of Vietnamese borders) documentary footage shot in Vietnam was shot during the war, with the exception of Vietnamese agents shooting films in neighboring Laos. American GIs and persons stationed in the region to report on the war were avid filmmakers—indeed, quite a lot of documentaries shot in Vietnam are joint productions between US and Vietnamese filmmakers. Domestically, however, Vietnam produces more documentaries than feature films and has had a local history of documentary production. The Electric Line to the Song Da Construction Site (Le Manh Thich, 1981) and Nguyen Ai Quoc-Ho Chi Minh (Pham Ky Nam) are famous documentaries.

The Vietnam Central Documentary Film Unit has been established in contemporary Vietnam, and one of its employees is Vietnam's best-known contemporary documentary producer. Tran Van Thuy's 1998 documentary, The Sound of the Violin in My Lai/Tieng Vi Cam O My Lai, won the 2000 Best Documentary Prize at the Asia Pacific Film Festival. The documentary also won the Golden Dove Prize and the Silver Dove Prize at the Leipzig International Film Festival.

The first set of documentaries thought to have originated in Malaysia were produced by American Frank Buck in the late 1920s to mid-1930s. The relative success of these meant that a series of wildlife documentaries called Bring

'Em Back Alive (Clyde Elliott, 1932), Wild Cargo (1934), and Fang and Claw (1935) were also shot in Malaysia.

Malaysia has had a solid National Archive since 1957. However, the storing and preserving of film media started to occur only in the late 1970s to early 1980s. The Archives have a standing arrangement with the Malaysian National Film Department and Radio Television section to deposit and store such items. Malaysia also purchased quite a number of documentaries from the United Kingdom and Japan to build on the collection. The Japanese occupation of Malaya also saw documentary newsreels and mini-documentary films produced as propaganda tools. It is believed that the Bunka Eiga Gekijjo (Government Propaganda Unit) produced and screened over two hundred such documentaries, although this was also spread throughout the countries that it occupied.

The Philippines has had a tumultuous film culture, possibly due to the intervention of the Spanish, American, and Filipino interests at particular periods in history. Documentary film is thought that have been introduced to the Philippines by two Swiss businessmen in 1987. They presented a captive audience with a documentary of events and natural disasters taking place in Europe. The first locally produced series of documentaries are thought to have been shot by a local filmmaker Albert Yearsley. A documentary of the Rizal day celebrations was filmed in 1909 and the ensuing enthusiasm that surrounded it enabled him to film The Manila Carnival (1910), The Eruption of Taal Volcano (1911), The Tondo, Paco and Pandacan Fires (1911), Igorots to Barcelona (1912), and The Cebu Typhoon (1912). The first Filipino filmmaker was Jose Nepomuceno, who shot a documentary on the funeral of Dona Estefania Velasco Vda. De Osmena (wife to the former president). He went on to produce documentaries on the growing Filipino industrial sector and social commentary documentaries on US presidential elections.

The first color lab in the Philippines created the first color documentaries and newsreels in 1934 and later evolved into feature films. Filipino cinema is one of the top producers of feature films in the world and thus supports the production of a greater number of documentary films. eKsperimEnto, the Festival of Film, Video and New Media in Manila showcases new local documentaries and has gained quite a global following. Various documentaries are shown that might not otherwise have an audience.

The nation of Singapore has a thriving documentary community and supports documentary filmmakers more adequately than most Southeast Asian nations. The annual Singapore International Documentary Film Festival aims to bring international documentary films and their directors to the nation as well as exposing Singaporean and Southeast Asian documentaries to the international community. Sixteen international broadcasting channels have made Singapore their regional base, thus documentaries are readily available and are screened regularly on air. National Geographic Channels International coupled with Singapore Economic Development Board donate from US $8–$10 million for funding documentaries produced in Singapore. This is considered to be the most allocated funding available within Southeast Asia for documentary film production.

Contemporary Singapore has a strong tertiary emphasis on media, thus despite its totalitarian attitude, it appears to be quite free to make documentaries with the minimal amount of intervention. Arguably the most well-known contemporary Singaporean documentary producer is Royston Tan. His cutting-edge documentary 15 (2003) was produced with a grant from the Singapore Film Commission and won the NETPAC/FIPRESCI Award at the Singapore International Film Festival and also represented Singapore at the first Paris Asian Film Festival in 2004.

Thailand is often viewed as the entrance to mainland Southeast Asia and has an extensive cinematic history. Thailand, Vietnam, Indonesia, and the Philippines are often seen as the four countries that produce more documentaries than their neighbors. Thailand has a strong filmic culture, and as such has both the funding and facilities to continue its strong presence. Thailand's National Film Archive is said to have over four thousand documentary films in storage. Most are not considered to fall within the strict confines of 'documentary', as they depict everything from celebrations of the Kingdom to simple visual records of areas, and are not filmed with a narrative. They are regarded as such because they provide a visual documentary history of events that may or may not have been publicized outside of the Kingdom. Historically Thai documentary film (film shot within Thailand by Thai nationals) has been somewhat censored, with authorities and various official departments controlling content, distribution, and exhibition. The United States Information Service played a part in producing anti-Communist-themed documentaries within Thailand during the Vietnam War and the showing of such films (and trading of skills and equipment) saw Thailand become accustomed to the dispensation of information visually.

Thailand remains, as most of Southeast Asia, a censored society, and documentaries that depict political and socioeconomical struggles are rare. Two of Thailand's bloodiest demonstrations calling for constitutional reforms occurred on October 14, 1973, and during May 17–20, 1992. People from different levels in society attended great public rallies. The brutal government crackdown on the protesters in 1973 resulted in an unknown number of deaths, while in 1992 over fifty-two deaths were recorded. For both incidents all nonofficial visual footage of the event was supposedly censored or confiscated. Thus the independent release of October 14 (Anuthin 14 Tula) by Bu Shin Klaipan (1973) is considered to be a very important documentary. Another uncensored, independently produced documentary was handed out on the streets of Bangkok. It is called Bloody May/Phrutsapha Mahawippayok, featured actual scenes of the fighting in 1992, and is an unofficial record of events. It, too, is considered to be of high importance to independent documentary film in Thailand.

An equally important and more well-known political documentary is Hara Factory Workers Struggle/Karn Torsu Kong Kammakorn Rongngan Hara by Jon Ungpakorn (1975). The documentary deals with the fight to keep factory jobs by garment workers in Nakhon Pathom, to the west of Bangkok. Workers were arrested and subject to harassment, and the poor working conditions were caught on film. This documentary, and its sequel in 1976, are rare, as they illustrate Thailand as a military dictatorship where people could not even approach police or welfare agencies for fear of reprisal.

As the region grows and borders open, documentary film will provide both a visual history of change as well as a connection to the past that feature films often fail to capture.

Selected films: Myanmar

- In the Shadows of the Pagodas—The Other Burma (Irene Marty, Switzerland)
 2001 Saved (David Saunders, USA)

Selected films: Cambodia

- 1989 Samsara: Death and Rebirth in Cambodia (Ellen Bruno, Department of Communications, Stanford University, USA)
 1995 Sos Kem (King Sihanouk and Marcel Talabot)
 Cambodge: Le pays du sourire/Cambodia: Land of Smiles
 Guardians of Angkor (Dean Love, National Geographic Television, Singapore and USA)

Selected films: Indonesia

- 1946 L'Indonésie appelle (Joris Ivens)
 1999 Indonesia in Revolt—Democracy or Death (Jill Hickson, Australia)

Selected films: Laos

- 1988 Keeping our Culture Alive (Kmhmu Apprenticeship Program, Boston, USA)
 1991 From Mulberry Leaves to Silk Textiles (Bouyavong, Douang, Deuane, Vientiane Video Center for the Ministry of Culture, Laos)
 2001 Laos: Closed to Prying Eyes (ABC Australia)

Selected films: Malaysia

- 1995 Bakun or the Dam (Bernice Chauly, Malaysia)

Selected films: Thailand

- 1993 October 14, 1973 (Ben Anderson and Kritsadarat Watthanasuwan, Thailand)
 1993 Threads of Life (Susan Morgan, Thailand)

Selected films: Vietnam

- 1991 La Memoire et l'oubli (Ada and Yves Remy, France 3 TV, France)

- 1994 Tolerance for the Dead/Mot Coi Tam Linh (Tran Van Thuy, Channel 4 Productions, Vietnam)
 2003 The Friendship Village (Michelle Mason, Cypress Park Productions, USA)

Further reading

- Alexander, William, 'Vietnam: An Appropriate Pedagogy', Jump Cut, March 31, 1986: 59–62.
 Bayer, William, 'Films in Vietnam', Film Comment 5, no. 2, spring 1969: 46–80.
 Biran, Misbach Yusa, 'The History of Indonesian Cinema at a Glance', in David Hanan (ed.), Film in Southeast Asia: Views from the Region, Vietnam: SEAPAVAA in Association with the Vietnam Film Institute and the National Screen and Sound Archive of Australia, 2001.
 Blum-Reid, East-West Encounters—Franco-Asian Cinema and Literature, London: Wallflower Press, 2003.
 Boonyaketmala, Boonrak, 'The Rise and Fall of the Film Industry in Thailand', East-West Film Journal 6, no. 2, 1992: 62–98.
 Charlot, John, 'Vietnamese Cinema: First Views', in Wimal Dissanayake (ed.), Colonialism and Nationalism in Asian Cinema, Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press, 1994.
 Debrett, Mary, 'Reclaiming the Personal as Political: Three Documentaries on East Timor', Metro Magazine, fall 2003.
 Hanan, David (ed.), Film in Southeast Asia: Views from the Region, Vietnam: SEAPAVAA in Association with the Vietnam Film Institute and the National Screen and Sound Archive of Australia, 2001.
 Latif, Baharudin, 'A Brief History of Malaysian Film', in David Hanan (ed.), Film in Southeast Asia: Views from the Region, Vietnam: SEAPAVAA in Association with the Vietnam Film Institute and the National Screen and Sound Archive of Australia, 2001.
 Morgan, Jennyn, The Film Researcher's Handbook: A Guide to Sources in North America, South America, Asia, Australasia and Africa, New York: Routledge, 1996.
 Pichit, Bouchao, 'Lao Cinema', in David Hanan (ed.), Film in Southeast Asia: Views from the Region, Vietnam, SEAPAVAA in Association with the Vietnam Film Institute and the National Screen and Sound Archive of Australia, 2001.
 Romey, Eliza, 'King, Artist, Film-Maker: The Films of Norodom Sihanouk', in David Hanan (ed.), Film in Southeast Asia: Views from the Region, Vietnam: SEAPAVAA in Association with the Vietnam Film Institute and the National Screen and Sound Archive of Australia, 2001.
 Salumbides, Vicente, Motion Pictures in the Philippines, Manila: Vicente Salumbides, 1952.
 Sotto, Agustin, 'A Brief History of Philippine Cinema', in David Hanan (ed.), Film in Southeast Asia: Views from the Region, Vietnam: SEAPAVAA in Association with the Vietnam Film Institute and the National Screen and Sound Archive of Australia, 2001.

Uhde, Jan and Uhde, Yvonne Ng, Latent Images: Film in Singapore, Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2000.

Spain

Spanish documentary film developed at a relatively late stage. In the early days of cinema, Spanish screens were filled with French films and then, from the 1920s, with American films. The political, social, and economic situation influenced filmmaking in Spain. Spain was a constitutional monarchy, with a powerful king and a universal male vote controlled by important landlords, a phenomenon known as caciquismo, or authoritarianism of local bosses. Some fifty percent of the population were illiterate and sixty-eight percent of the population were rural. Society, dominated by the Catholic church and the military, was preoccupied with colonial ventures in Africa. Employers were continuously confronted with workers' unrest and hired gunmen, and industrial investment depended on foreign capital. In addition, General Primo de Rivera imposed a dictatorship with fascist features in 1923.

The first Spanish images were taken when the Lumière brothers started selling their equipment. Topical reportage was the most developed genre, since it was cheap and brought relatively easy profit. It became a source of industrial funding for companies (Pérez Perucha 1995).

At first, Barcelona dominated the film industry. However, Madrid eventually imposed itself as a national filmmaking centre by the 1920s. As of 1925 the banking industry started to invest in the sector—for ideological reasons, however, and not because of economic considerations. The production diversified but without a great take-off: censorship, foreign competition, and limited exports hindered its expansion. The difficulties caused by the new sound film and the need to invest in new equipment created many problems.

Despite this irregular development, film extended as a popular entertainment. The first cameramen came from different fields, such as photography, optics, theatre, and even cabinetmaking. Some of them studied or worked with large French companies, for example José Gaspar Serra, Ricardo de Baños, and Segundo de Chomón Ruiz, one of the most creative cameramen. In those days only small companies existed, which could not survive due to the lack of capital and industrial organization.

Filmed reports were common topics that ensured success. Images of Alfonso XIII were plentiful; the Spanish audience liked them and they could easily be exported. Reports were also produced about current events, such as Semana Trágica de Barcelona/Tragic Week in Barcelona (José Gaspar Serra, 1909) and La Guerra del Rif/The War of the Rif (Hispano Films, 1909). Some were reconstructions, such as El asesinato de Canalejas/The Assassination of Canalejas, created by the journalist and theatre director Adelardo Fernández Arias in 1912, in which actors interpreted the moment of the assassination. The film also included real images from the funeral of Canalejas, the former Prime Minister of the Spanish government. These films alternated in cinemas with other, everyday life-types of films. The most interesting Spanish films were set around bullfighting.

World War I marked the heyday of Spanish filmmaking. The conflict allowed the Spanish film industry to develop, because the distribution of European films at the time was limited. Twenty-eight production companies produced two hundred and forty-two films, of which seventy-seven were documentaries. When the war was over, however, the foreign production companies returned.

The need for information about World War I led to the creation of the first newsreel in Spain: Revista Española (Spanish Magazine) and Revista Estudio (Studio Magazine, 1915–20), produced by Studio Films under the direction of Solá-Mestres and Fontanals, who edited the first fifty instalments. Shortly before closing its studios in 1921, Studio Films shot España en el Rif/Spain in the Rif, a report about the African issue that did not address any unpleasant aspects of the colonial ventures.

After World War I most nonfiction films covered sports and bullfighting. Some had a strong impact on the audience, but this was owing to the topic, not the quality, as was the case with Trágica muerte de Joselito/The Tragic Death of Joselito (1919). Educational films made by Regia Art Film, whose manager was the expert José Gaspar Serra, also gained a high profile. Many of these films were made in Catalonia and Valencia. They dealt with the small industries typical of these regions, such as bobbin lace-making. Their quaint character led to their presentation in US cinemas.

One of the most important reports was Las Hurdes, País de Leyenda. Viaje de SM el Rey Alfonso XIII/Las Hurdes, Land of Legend: Journey of HM the King Alfonso XIII (1922), created by Armando Pou, a specialist in colonial film and film advertising. It focused on three basic elements: the land, responsible for social misery; its inhabitants as the victims of the situation; and the royal delegation as their saviours. The king represented hope and change: 'His Majesty enters the Alberca being proclaimed redeemer of Las Hurdes'. Ten years later the famous Spanish director Buñuel went on the same trip and, in Las Hurdes, tierra sin pan/Las Hurdes, Land without Bread, proved that nothing had changed.

The Spanish avant-garde did not greatly contribute to the film industry, but a notable avant-garde documentary was Esencia de verbena/The Essence of Feasts (1930) by the writer and politician Ernesto Giménez Caballero. Through popular feasts, it reflected on the character and the typical customs of the people of Madrid. It has a remarkable montage based on associating visual ideas, close-ups, and sophisticated techniques.

When the monarchy fell, the Spanish Second Republic was proclaimed. In these times of political agitation and the establishment of a regime that defended civil rights, social conditions of the working class improved and the growth of the entertainment industry was encouraged. The contribution of film clubs, which created film audiences, were important. However, the various republican governments showed little interest in film: censorship was regulated, national production was protected, and taxes were introduced.

Filmmakers and distributors increasingly responded to informational needs. The Casanova family founded Cifesa (Valencia, 1932), one of the most important production companies of the day. Its political orientation was conservative, Catholic, and anti-Marxist. Spanish newsreels appeared (Spanish Film Information and Spanish Sound News) and, between 1931 and 1936, approximately ninety-five documentaries were produced. They dealt with a variety of topics—for example, travel and cultural issues that have a strong tradition in Spain. Enrique Guerner, a Jewish refugee, produced the following documentaries for Cifesa in 1935: Costa Brava, Granada, and Valencia. They stand out because of the camera technique and lighting used. Un río bien aprovechado/A River Well Used (1935) by the Catalan Ramón Biadiu had an original theme: it followed the river Llobregat from its source to its estuary, describing the industries that were lined up alongside it.

Documentaries that focused on formal expression were produced as well, dealing with literary and artistic themes. They were meant for entertainment purposes, and did not attempt to reflect the social reality. A notable example is Canto a la emigración/A Hymn to Emigration (Antonio Román, 1934).

The most important documentary references of these years are Carlos Velo and Fernando García Mantilla. Velo was a biologist and a university professor. Collaborating with Fernando García Mantilla, a radio and film critic, he produced many documentaries for Cifesa in 1935, such as Felipe II y El Escorial/Philip II and El Escorial, Castillos en Castilla/Castles in Castile, Tarraco Augusta, Galicia y Compostela/Galicia and Compostela, and La ciudad y el campo/The Town and the Country. Infinitos/The Infinite, based on an idea by the writer Mauricio Maeterlinck, stands out. It is a scientific and poetic film that, with imagination and artistic ability, recreates the world of microbes. However, his most important piece was Almadras/Trap-Nets, about fishing for tuna on the coast of Cadiz. It initiated the tradition of social documentaries in Spain, which was interrupted in 1939. The nets full of tuna caught by the fishermen with harpoons and hauled into the boat, as well as the quartering and preparation of the cans, make for expressive scenes. The main storyline focuses on the nature of the human labour, analysed by the camera with an extraordinary functionality, without succumbing to the picturesque.

In 1933 Luis Buñuel produced Las Hurdes, tierra sin pan. This anthropological film showed the causes of the ailments suffered in a region of Extremadura, and served to denounce the political, social, educational, and religious circumstances of the time. The film team included Eli Lotar, Pierre Unik, and Sánchez Ventura. The means and funds for the shoot were limited. Some scenes were constructed for the camera, such as the shot in which a goat is to be thrown off a cliff. The documentary contains many surrealistic elements. It was drawn up using a dramatic architecture: a problem is presented, hope is raised, and then hope is destroyed.

During the Spanish Civil War (1936–9), film acquired new momentum: it was used as an instrument of propaganda by both sides. On the Republican side the initiatives were taken by the central and regional governments, as well as by political parties and trade unions. High-quality newsreels, such as España al día (Spain Today), were given great importance.

The anarchists used film for indoctrination and social revolutionary purposes. Their production concentrated on the campaigns of the anarchist leader Durruti: Aguiluchos de la FAI por tierras de Aragón/Eaglets of the FAI in the Lands of Aragon (1936), Bajo el signo libertario/Under the Libertarian Sign (1936), and En la brecha/In the Division (1937).

The Communists regularly produced films, as a result of the creation of the production company Film Popular. They distributed Soviet films and produced documentaries and reports. They cooperated with the Catalan newsreel España al día, of which they later created their own version. Their goal was to defend the ‘single command’ (Mando único, 1937) and to show the educated character of the Republic (Tesoro artístico nacional/National Artistic Treasure, 1937).

The Republican government in Madrid used film to project a favourable image of the country abroad. España 1936/Spain 1936, created by Buñuel and Le Chanois, is an example of this strategy. Film also served the specific needs of the country, such as mobilization (Movilización del campo/Mobilization in the Country, and Cuando el soldado es campesino/When Peasants Become Soldiers, both from 1937), or instructing popular militia how to handle weapons (El manejo de la ametralladora/Handling a Machine Gun, 1937).

The regional government of Catalonia (the Generalitat) created large film campaigns with its production company Laya Films. This company edited the newsreel España al día between March and June 1939 together with Film Popular. It produced numerous documentaries about the war (Jornadas de victoria: Teruel/Days of Victory, Teruel, 1938) and the brutality of the enemy, in order to discredit them (Catalunya mártir/Martyr Catalonia, 1938), and about government actions, culture, and work (Danzas catalanas y aragonesas/Dances from Catalonia and Aragon, 1936–7) to portray Catalonia abroad as an educated and hard-working region.

The film production of the Basque government was more limited. It focused on showing the Catholicism of the government (Semana Santa en Bilbao/Easter in Bilbao, 1937), because the Basques were worried about the anticlericalism attributed to the Republic.

In the Nationalist (Franco’s) camp, film was treated in a different way. Initially, only military operations were shown, without any propaganda. From October 1936, the Falange (a party with its own organization of propaganda) and private production companies (Cifesa) produced documentaries about military successes, such as the series Para España/For Spain. Film was also used to spread awareness of political messages and platforms. When the government of Burgos was created in February 1938, the Francoist Film Services gained power. The entente with Nazi Germany was decisive. Documentaries were created to spread the principles of the new state (Juventudes de España/Youth of Spain, 1938) and to respond to Republican attacks (Prisioneros de guerra/Prisoners of War, 1938). Similarly, the Noticiero Español (Spanish newsreel) was created, which edited news items to reflect the propagandistic needs of the state.

When the conflict ended, a fascist and Catholic dictatorship was established in Spain, with General Franco as the caudillo, or leader. His objective was to obtain ideological unity—many different groups had participated in the rebellion—and to justify his actions. Propaganda was therefore essential. Filmmaking was marked by this political situation, the postwar economic crisis, and the situation of isolation.

During Franco’s rule, professional competition barely existed as a consequence of the exile of many technicians who left the country after the war. Documentary films were considered a subgenre. Distribution mechanisms were lacking, as well as governmental policies to protect and aid this type of film. The film protection norms were established in 1941 and 1944, and showing documentaries became obligatory. In practice, this requirement was met by showing foreign newsreels (by Fox, UFA, and Luce) and, from 1943, NO-DO, the official Spanish newsreel.

In the 1950s the dictatorship tried to create a more positive image for itself, in the wake of the Allied victory in World War II. Spain became a member of various international organizations and signed, in addition to the Concordat with the Vatican, a bilateral agreement with the United States. Institutions were reorganized and the Ministry of Information and Tourism (July 1951) was put in charge of film production. García Escudero, a man with liberal ideas, was named film director, but lasted only one month in this position.

In 1952 a new Classification and Censorship Board was created to evaluate the moral, political, and social content of films. Financial aid increased; however, it was given based on national interest'. Films with certain social or political commitment did not receive any subsidies. Nevertheless, the law favoured 'Spanish feature films distributed together with Spanish short films'. The following prizes and festivals were founded: National Prizes for Short Films; the International Film Festival in San Sebastián (1953), which included prizes for documentaries; and the International Latin American and Philippine Documentary Film Contest (1958), later called the Documentary Film Festival of Bilbao. These festivals were designed to promote Spanish documentaries and to present foreign documentary films in Spain. Financial protection and film rates (quotas of screen time) improved, but the main problem remained: the organizers showed little interest in documentaries.

The Spanish newsreel NO-DO (1943–81) was created as a joint stock company, but with a state subsidy. It enjoyed a monopoly over film-related information. It also controlled documentary production and means of distribution (Tranche and Sánchez-Biosca 2001). Its main activity was the creation of the newsreel. To make use of news items, the film magazine Imágenes (Images) was organized in 1945, offering reports.

Documentary film production developed sporadically until the 1960s. The usual topics were towns, customs, museums, and geography. The films showed false popular reality, with a timeless appearance. Technically, they were mediocre. Official film, however, gathered great momentum throughout the 1940s and 1950s. Official bodies such as the Ministry of Agriculture, the Ministry of Industry, the National Trade Union Office, and the National Train Network organized their own services to produce documentaries promoting their activities.

Several production companies specializing in documentary film were founded (Hermic, Studio Film, and Filmarte). They encountered many obstacles: a limited range of topics, difficulty in obtaining the licence for filming (which was managed by NO-DO), and censorship. Their financial profits were marginal. Art documentaries made the most interesting contribution. They did not cause political problems and made use of the newly added colour feature. A remarkable documentary series was shot about the black paintings by Goya (Desastres de la guerra/Disasters of War, La tauromaquia/The Art of Bullfighting, and Los Caprichos/The Caprices). With great precision, they reflected the violence and power that Goya applied in his paintings—thanks to a perfect symbiosis between the camera movement and the painting (López Clemente 1960).

José Val del Omar was an exception in the filmmaking industry of those years. He was an original author who was not understood by his contemporaries. He tried to build a new audiovisual architecture—the so-called pulsating lighting that consisted of changing rhythm, intensity, color, and light location—in order to achieve a more complete vision. He also created the panoramic overlap technique, based on a double projection of the same still, and the diaphonic sound technique, which contrasted two sound sources.

Val del Omar produced two documentaries. The first one was Aguaespejo granadino/Watermirror of Granada, shot between 1952 and 1955, which garnered attention at the Berlin Film Festival in 1956. The second documentary was Fuego en Castilla/Fire in Castile, which was awarded a prize at the Cannes Film Festival in 1961 for its technical innovations.

In the 1960s Spanish film was given a new lease of life. The so-called Conversations of Salamanca (1955) were an important starting point. This meeting was organized by the film club of the University of Salamanca and directed by Basilio Martín Patino. The participants, film professionals and critics, published a manifesto with the following conclusions: 'Our documentary film must acquire a national character by creating films that fulfill a social function and reflect the life of the Spanish people, their conflicts, and their reality in our time.' They defended realism against the fascist aesthetics of the regime. Similarly, they demanded the end of the monopoly of NO-DO.

By the end of the 1950s young filmmakers were making films that were close to the proposals of the Conversations of Salamanca. Cuenca (1958) by Carlos Saura is an example. This documentary continued the tradition set by Buñuel in Tierra sin pan. It was funded by the city. It is divided into three parts. The first shows the inhabitants of the place, peasants, shepherds, and woodcutters. The camera focuses on their faces and sweat, caused by their labour. The second part deals with the history of kings and castles. In the last part, everyday life is the centrepiece displayed through popular feasts: 'Cuenca: different, yet always the same'.

España 1800/Spain 1800 (Jesús Fernández Santos, 1958) is also part of this renewal. It recreated eighteenth-century Spain through Goya's paintings. Hombres y toros/Men and Bulls (José Luis Font, 1958) about the feasts of San Fermín, is another exponent of the renewal.

Definitive societal change came in the 1960s. The decade witnessed rapid economic growth due to the Development Plans launched by the government. Tourism and Spanish emigration favoured openness towards the outside world. In 1966 Franco organized a referendum, which maintained his position as the head of state, and in 1970 he appointed the then Prince Juan Carlos as his successor.

The administration dedicated itself to celebrating the 'twenty-five years of peace'. The campaign was designed by the Ministry of Information and Tourism. It did not focus on commemorating the end of the Civil War, but rather on emphasizing the 'successes' of the regime. Two documentaries supported this endeavour: Franco, ese hombre/Franco, That Man (Sáenz de Heredia, 1964), a hagiography of the dictator, and Morir en España/To Die in Spain (Mariano Ozores, 1965), which was conceived as a reaction to the French documentary Mourir à Madrid/To Die in Madrid (Frédéric Rossif, 1963). No political film existed that would challenge the official line. Owing to the political changes since 1973, militant filmmaking developed under the auspices of trade unions and community and student associations.

In 1963 a new Censorship Code was approved and García Escudero was again named head of Film Direction (1962–9). The Code prevented arbitrariness and was valid until February 1975 (Franco died in November of that year). Work techniques improved with the use of lighter and more portable cameras, direct sound, and more sensitive unexposed film. Production costs were lower. New companies, such as Eurofilms, appeared, encouraged by the governmental financial aid programmes of 1964. Exhibition space was increased: festivals became stronger, film clubs expanded and, in 1964, the alternative Art and Performance Halls appeared, in which films were shown in their original versions and subtitled. The number of spectators increased, as well as that of spectators who participated in cultural discussions and read specialized magazines, such as Nuestro Cinema (Our Film) and Film Ideal (Ideal Film). Regional filmmaking developed in Catalonia, the Basque Country, and Galicia, due to the recovery of cultural autonomy.

A group of anti-establishment filmmakers, calling themselves New Spanish Film, was set up in Madrid, and the New School of Barcelona in Barcelona. They came from the Film Research and Experience Institute (1947–62) and the Official Film School (1962–76). Their documentaries dealt with the typical Francoist topics (towns, geography, travels, art), but employed a vision that differed from the official perspective.

Juguetes rotos/Broken Toys (Manuel Summers, 1966) presents the world of boxing, football, and entertainment through pathetic losers who in other times were praised and admired by the great audience. Spectators are presented with a critical version of the 'national myths.' Censorship forced the producers to add a commentary, which was ironic and sharp, with a moralist content repeating that all Spanish people were responsible for forgetting the old national glories. Even without listening to the voice-over, the images speak for themselves with an overwhelming force through stereotypes, prejudices, and images of black Spain. It was not commercially successful. Torerillos 61/Little Bullfighters 61 (Basilio Martín Patino, 1962) won the top prize at the Documentary Film Festival in Bilbao. It is a chronicle of a Spain that is hungry and lives in poverty. Its reality is shown through the characters of three boys who want to become bullfighters, who wish to escape their world and become famous.

In the 1960s NO-DO started a new era as a company producing documentaries on travel, art, and sports as a result of competition with television. In 1956 Spanish Television (TVE) started to broadcast. Its monopoly lasted until 1983, when the first regional television broadcasters were founded. Private channels were authorized in 1990.

Initially, TVE received its news, technical means, and staff from NO-DO. It also produced documentary films. Biographies, travelogues, art, and industry were broadcast for educational purposes. Series were created with screenplays written by specialized authors. They were produced by the staff of TVE. Some examples are Figuras en su mundo/Figures in Their World (1966), Lo que va de siglo/The Century until Now (1968), and La noche de los tiempos/The Night of the Times (1971).

Other documentaries responded to the requirements of informative production, such as the series A toda plana/A Full Page (1964), dedicated to important international reports. Nature documentaries by Dr Félix Rodríguez de la Fuente were very successful: Fauna (1968), Mi amigo el océano/My Friend the Ocean (1970), and the different series of El Hombre y la Tierra/Man and the Earth.

Several years before Franco died, the dictatorial regime had started to break down. These years of disintegration until the proclamation of the Spanish democratic Constitution in 1978 are known as the Transition. Measures were taken to free up the process of film production. From 1975 NO-DO lost its monopoly status, and in 1981 it disappeared altogether. In 1977 the Ministry of Information and Tourism was renamed the Ministry of Culture and Welfare (later only Culture). The National Entertainment Trades Unions and the practice of censorship disappeared as well. A new system of subsidies came into place that favoured artistic and cultural values, cinema ratings, and film distribution. However, the reforms were not able to ward off the effects of the world economic crisis. The number of filmgoers diminished, and the production costs of filmmaking increased.

Two emblematic films of those years were El desencanto/Disenchantment (Jaime Chavarrí) and Canciones para después de una guerra/Songs for after a War (Basilio Martín Patino). The first documentary was made in 1971 and the second in 1975; both were shown for the first time in 1976. They represented two different documentary forms. El desencanto dealt with the present through interviews in the style of cinéma vérité. Canciones para después de una guerra is a montage that recreates the past. Forty songs—hits of those years—summarize life in Spain in the ten years after the Civil War.

The images follow each other in a collage. However, each shot is carefully selected. Music is related to the image in order to achieve specific meanings. The documentary is very powerful and creative. As in El desencanto, the lack of objectivity is not disguised.

The change in the political climate allowed filmmakers to tackle delicate topics from the past, such as the Civil War and the dictatorship. Documentary film was used to present viewpoints that differed from the official one. ¿Por qué perdimos la guerra?/Why Did We Lose the War? (Diego Santillán and Luis Galindo, 1977), for example, delivers an anarchist version of events.

Film also lent a voice to those who had actively participated in the Civil War, and whose voices could not be heard in Franco's Spain. La vieja memoria/The Old Memory (Jaime Camino, 1977) offers interviews with left-wing politicians, intercut with archival material. Opinions are compared and organized into dialogues that never existed in reality, such as the statements of Dolores Ibarruri and Federica Montseny about the disagreement between the Communists and the anarchists.

The figure of Franco inspired several documentaries, such as Caudillo/The Leader (Basilio Martín Patino, 1975). Patino gathered diverse material, some of it unpublished. There is no chronological order; themes follow each other in a dynamic montage, full of contrasts. The music, the way of using image and colours (warm tones for the Republican camp and cold ones for the Francoists), without commentary, creates a specific analysis of the Civil War, close to the anarchist view. Franco is portrayed as a grotesque dictator who caused devastation and death.

Raza, el espíritu de Franco/Race, Franco's Spirit (Gonzalo Herralde, 1977) mixes fragments of the film Raza/Race (1942), the screenplay of which was written by Franco himself, with interviews with the main character, the actor Alfredo Mayo, and the General's sister, Pilar Franco. Documentary films that treat the dictatorship period leniently were also produced—for example, España debe saber/Spain Must Know (Eduardo Manzanos, 1976).

The political openness allowed newsreels and documentaries to become tools of nationalism. In Catalonia, the newsreel Noticiari de Barcelona (Newsreel of Barcelona, 1977–80) was created. It was directed by Joseph María Forn and financed by the city government of Barcelona. In 1981 it was replaced by Noticiari de Catalunya (Newsreel of Catalonia), which was less critical and protected by the regional government. In the Basque Country, reports focused on nationalist issues, appeared. Documentaries were made with the same objective. One of the most controversial documentaries of those years was El proceso de Burgos/The Process of Burgos (Imanol Uribe, 1979), which recalls the trial of several ETA militants during the dictatorship. It takes the side of the terrorist organization.

Documentary film was able to shed light on topics previously prohibited by censorship. They began to publicize the plight of the mentally ill, homosexuals, and others perceived as living outside mainstream society. Examples include El asesino de Pedralbes/The Murderer of Pedralbes (Gonzalo Herralde, 1978) and Vestida de azul/Dressed in Blue (Jiménez Rico, 1983).

The most significant progress was made in television, which gained a large audience. Documentaries about nature topics, successfully developed by Rodríguez de la Fuente, were consolidated. Notable reports, in which the figure of the reporter became very important, also achieved great success (Otros pueblos/Other Countries, Los marginados/The Down-and-Outs, and La ruta de los conquistadores/The Route of the Conquerors). Together with these reports, documentaries about folklore and popular traditions (the series Flamenco, Fiesta/Feast, directed by Pío Caro Baroja, and Raíces/Roots), and travel were successful.

When the political enthusiasm of the Transition years waned, the documentary film greatly diminished in importance. During the socialist era (1982–96), with Pilar Miró as General Director of Film, public subsidies were very high, but the effect of this policy was negative: nothing was produced without a subsidy. In 1989 Jorge Semprún, the then Minister of Culture, adjusted the aid to the European model and full control was given to autonomous regional administrations to create protection policies for their own films. This legislation was mainly favourable to fiction films. Even the Goya Prizes, awarded by the Academy of Arts and Film Science, neglected the documentary genre; the prize for the best short film was abolished in 2001.

Nevertheless, the documentary has gained in strength in contemporary Spain, in parallel with developments in Europe. Its main source is television. Public channels, especially TV2, broadcast the largest number of documentaries between 1998 and 1999, supported by their own production. Among the private channels, Canal Plus offers the most documentaries; Spanish documentary films represent the minority, but the number of coproductions with Spanish private companies has grown recently. Among the regional channels, those in the Basque Country offer a reasonable number of documentaries. Canal 33 in Catalonia does so as well, favouring European productions.

Despite this progress, the old problems remain. A solid industry dedicated to this type of production is missing, as are specific public subsidies (until 1999 documentaries were not included in the agreements between RTVE, or Spanish Radio and Television, and producers). The same applies to exclusive distributors of documentary films as they exist in other European countries (Català, Cerdán and Torreiro 2001). Television channels buy documentary films from international markets because it is less expensive.

However, the Spanish audience increasingly demands Spanish-made films about specifically Spanish topics. Documentary films are increasingly screened in cinemas, as the artistic possibilities of the genre have become more widely recognized.

El sol del membrillo/The Sun of the Quince Tree (Victor Erice, 1992) is a documentary film following the work of the painter Antonio López in a very natural manner, depicting the way the artist creates the painting, as well as his moral strength and search for beauty. The camera is involved in the figurative universe of the painter and his memories, as the quince tree he paints is part of his childhood memories. The camera also captures the environment, including the artist's wife, friends, a house that is being built, the surroundings of the town, and the sky. It is a continuous dialogue between film and painting, two artistic forms of visual representation.

In Sevillas (1992) and Flamenco (1995) Carlos Saura merges film with music, showing different varieties of these genres. In Sevillas, which was shot in a studio, dance, dimension, and sense of space, as well as colours and movement, prevail. In Flamenco the best artists in each style act on different stages. In this case, the singing, the gestures, and the characters are stressed. The camera gets into the heart of the melody in a magical way. These films are not musical catalogues, but rather documentaries that show the history of the art of a nation.

Historical documentaries have become more successful. Asaltar los cielos/Attach the Skies (Javier Rioyo and López Linares, 1996) reconstructs the life of Ramón Mercader, the assassin of Leon Trotsky. It explains the context and conditions in which Mercader lived, the influence of his mother, and his obsession with the Soviet Union. It involves great research work, including archive images, photographs, documents, and evidence. The range of testimonies of politicians, relatives, friends, and artists is quite varied.

Francisco Boix, un fotógrafo en el infierno/Francisco Boix, a Photographer in Hell (Lorenzo Soler, 2000) narrates the story of the Spanish photographer Francisco Boix, a Republican who, when the Civil War was over, left to fight in France. Taken prisoner, he was interned in the Mauthausen concentration camp, where he worked in a photographic laboratory, hiding the pictures that were proof of the Nazi regime's murders. His evidence was decisive at the Nuremberg trials. As with the previous documentary, it does not just describe the heroic deeds of this Spaniard, but deals with many other topics, such as the agreement between Franco's and the Nazi governments to exterminate the Spanish Republicans.

The Civil War is again the primary inspirational theme for documentaries. They are not about claiming political positions—although all of them are anti-Franco—but rather about preserving the testimonies of the victims of the conflict: members of the International Brigades and the Spanish Division who fought against the Russians in World War II (Extranjeros de sí mismos/Foreigners to Themselves (Javier Rioyo and López Linares, 2000); children sent to the Soviet Union to save their lives during the conflict (Los niños de Rusia/The Children of Russia (Jaime Camino, 2001); and those who continued fighting against Franco clandestinely—los maquis—(La guerrilla de la memoria/Guerrilla of the Memory (Javier Corcuera, 2001).

Social documentaries are important as well. Their goal is to move the spectators' consciences. One of the most striking films is La espalda del mundo/The Back of the World (Javier Corcuera, 2000), in which three stories are intertwined, stressing the extreme situations of the characters: a Peruvian eleven-year-old child who works in a quarry; a Turk exiled in Stockholm who lives alone; and a prisoner sentenced to death.

Monos como Becky/Monkeys Like Becky (Joaquín Jordá and Nuria Villazán) investigates the life of Egas Moniz, a Nobel Prize winner for medicine in 1949 for his work in neurosurgery. The monkey, Becky, was the patient on which he performed surgery to eliminate aggressiveness of the mentally ill. It is a complex mixture of archive images, theatrical representation of the ill in a mental hospital, and camera movements that are typical of horror films. The film is a metaphor of the many strategies used by the forces in power to control any kind of behaviour considered antisocial.

En construcción/Under Construction (José Luis Guerin, 2001) found great success at the Festival of San Sebastián. The theme is rather simple: a block of flats being built in a popular neighbourhood in Barcelona. The camera captures all of the events that happen during the construction and the characters that are, in different ways, related to it, such as emigrants, pensioners, children, drug addicts, and prostitutes. It shows how the changing urban landscape also implies a change in the human landscape.

MARÍA ANTONIA PAZ REBOLLO

See also: Land Without Bread

Further reading

- Bonet, Eugeni and Palacio, Manuel, Práctica filmica vanguardia artística en 1925–81 (Film Practice and Artistic Avant-Garde 1925–81), Madrid: Universidad Complutense de Madrid, 1983.
- Català, Joseph María, Cerdán, Jostexo and Torreiro, Casimiro (eds), Imagen, memoria y fascinación. Notas sobre el documental en España (Image, Memory, and Fascination. Notes about the Documentary Film in Spain), Madrid: Ochoy Medio, 2001.
- De la Madrid, Juan Carlos, Primeros tiempos del cinematógrafo en España (The Early Days of Film in Spain), Oviedo: Universidad de Oviedo, 1996.
- Del Amo, A. and Ibáñez Ferradas, M.L., Catálogo general del cine de la Guerra Civil (General Catalogue: Film of the Spanish Civil War), Madrid: Cátedra, 1996.
- González Ballesteros, Teodoro, Aspectos jurídicos de la censura cinematográfica en España (Legal Aspects of the Film Censorship in Spain), Madrid: Universidad Complutense, 1981.

- López Clemente, José, Cine documental español (Spanish Documentary Film), Madrid: Rialp, 1960.
- Medina, Pedro, Mariano y Velásquez González, Luis and Martín, José (eds), Historia del cortometraje español (History of the Spanish Short Film), Madrid: Film Festival in Alcalá de Henares, 1996.
- Pérez Perucha, Julio, 'Narración de un aniciago destino (1896–1930)', in Roman Gubern, José Enrique Monterde, Julio Pérez Perucha, Esteve Rimbau and Casimiro Torreiro (eds), Historia del Cine Español (History of Spanish Film), Madrid: Cátedra, 1995: 19–121.
- Sáenz de Buruaga, Gonzalo (ed.), Insula Val del Omar: visiones en su tiempo, descubrimientos actuales (The Isle Called Val del Omar: Visions in his Days, Current Discoveries), Madrid: Consejo Superior de Investigaciones Científicas, 1995.
- Tranche, Rafael R. and Sánchez-Biosca, Vicente, Nodo. El tiempo y la memoria (Nodo. Time and Memory), Madrid: Cátedra, 2001.
- Vallés Copeiro del Villar, Antonio, Historia de la política de fomento del cine español (History of the Policies Supporting the Spanish Film), Valencia: Filmoteca de la Generalitat Valenciana, 1992.

Špáta, Jan

Jan Špáta is among the most prolific and well-known filmmakers in the history of Czech documentary. He is a cameraman-director whose career spanned the series of ideological and political shifts that gripped the Czech nation in the second half of the twentieth century. With his sensitive portraits of individuals and cultures, his interest in philosophical questions of life and death, Špáta pioneered a style of documentary filmmaking that is markedly his own, and that has become a trademark of the Czech documentary tradition.

Špáta graduated from the camera department at FAMU, the Film Faculty of the Academy of Music and Performing Arts in Prague, in 1957, preceding by a few years the filmmakers of the Czech New Wave. At the end of the 1950s documentary in Czechoslovakia had begun a fundamental shift, moving away from the socialist notion of film as the propagator of an idealized image of society—'smiling socialism', as Czech film critic Antonín Navrátil (2002) has called it—to an interest in authenticity and facts.

This process of change resulted from a combination of internal and external forces in the early 1960s in Czechoslovakia. Internally, as economic and social inequalities in the socialist state became increasingly evident, the notion of reality put forth by the Communist party began to seem false. As politicians began to grapple with new realities, a vanguard of journalists adopted a rational, scientific attitude toward the events they reported, relying on facts rather than ideology to describe events. Simultaneously, international film culture was shifting toward an interest in authenticity. Cinéma vérité and direct cinema, aided by technological developments such as portable sound equipment and lighter, handheld film cameras, such as the Eclair, allowed filmmakers to represent the world as they encountered it. Students at FAMU (if not the general public) were exposed to films by John Cassavetes, Shirley Clarke, Richard Leacock, Robert Drew, and others, and graduates in the late 1950s and early 1960s started to integrate cinéma vérité techniques into their filmmaking.

It was amidst this trend of rational investigation and renewed interest in authenticity that Špáta began his career. After working as a cameraman for a series of documentary directors (among them Jiří Papoušek, Jaroslav Šikl, and Václav Táborský), in 1962 Špáta met director Evald Schorm, with whom he would have a long collaborative relationship, both as cameraman and codirector. In 1963 the two men codirected Proč?/Why? (1963), an exploration of the declining birth rate in Czechoslovakia. Why? was the first Czechoslovak film to use the man-on-the-street interview, combining methods of sociological investigation with cinéma vérité techniques. Špáta revisited this method in later films, including his directorial debut (and the film for which he is best known), 1964's Nevětší přání/The Greatest Wish, in which he asked young people to describe their greatest wish.

Beyond their interest in people's lives and work, Špáta and Schorm shared a philosophical concern with human attitudes towards life and death, and explored these questions in successive films. Their 1965 vérité film Zrcadlení/Reflections, shot in a hospital, examined the border between life and death, ultimately asking the unanswerable: What is the meaning of life? Reflections' combination of poetic vérité images and philosophical voice-over became a trademark of Špáta's style in films such as Respice finem/Hospice, which he directed after Schorm began to work in fiction filmmaking. In this 1967 film he showed viewers the lives of solitary elderly women in the country—women for whom death is a constant presence. The film ends in a shot taken from within a grave—an existential, poetic vision that is striking in a film the style of which is so fundamentally based in objectivity.

Špáta's interest in humanity extended to the lives of people in foreign countries. Between the 1960s and 1990s he made films in locations as far flung as Cuba, Ireland, and Greece, documenting cultures, livelihoods, and customs. Among the most well-known of his travel films is Zeměsvatého Patricka/The Land of St Patrick, shot in Ireland in 1967. It is notable that after August 1968, when the Soviet invasion put an end to the Czechoslovak political thaw and implemented the twenty-year period of so-called normalization, Špáta was able to continue making films; it is especially remarkable that he was allowed to travel out of the country. It is perhaps precisely his humanism that allowed Špáta to keep working. His films, especially after 1968, focused on 'small' human stories such as that of a doctor whose hobby and passion is the family tradition of making and playing violins, in Terapie Es dur/Therapy in E-minor (1974). These films were politically innocuous, as were films like Šumavské Pastorale/Sumava Pastoral (1975) and Molto Cantabile (1989), practically wordless symphonies of poetic images and music.

Some writers have criticized Špáta as being a prisoner of his own style (Brdečková and Hádková 1990) and have written that his post-1960s films tended toward sentimentality. Regardless, several of the many films Špáta shot or directed between 1968 and 1989 are noteworthy. Music is a great theme in Špáta's work, and several of his films from those years figured musical personalities. Particularly significant is Etuda o zkoušce/Study of a Rehearsal (1976), Špáta's last collaboration with Schorm, this time as a cameraman. The film, a portrait of conductor Václav Neumann preparing Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, highlights Špáta's mastery of the camera as an expressive medium, particularly in one unbroken ten-minute shot of Neumann conducting.

After the collapse of the Soviet regime in Czechoslovakia in 1989, Špáta revisited an old theme in Nevětší přání II/The Greatest Wish II, which he combined with 1968's Nevětší Přání to make a feature-length documentary that demonstrates the continuity in human desires and values between moments of social upheaval twenty years apart. In 2001, after completing his final films, Laská, kterou opouštím I & II/The Love I am Leaving I & II, and when he could no longer operate a camera with ease and grace, Špáta decided to end his career in filmmaking.

Alice Lovejoy

Biography

Born October 25, 1932, in Náchod, Czechoslovakia. Graduated from the camera department at FAMU, the Film Faculty of the Academy of Music and Performing Arts in Prague, in 1957. Taught at the Hochschule für Gestaltung in Ulm (NSR) in 1967. From 1992 taught in FAMU's documentary department, where he was named professor in 2002. Špáta's films have been honored at numerous festivals. He died in August 2006.

Selected films

- 1963 Proč?/Why? (with Evald Schorm)
- 1963 Žít svůj život/To Live One's Life: cameraman (directed by Schorm)
- 1964 Nevětší přání/The Greatest Wish
- 1965 Zrcadlení/Reflections (with Schorm)
- 1967 Respite finem and Zeměsvatého Patricka/The Land of St Patrick
- 1974 Terapie Es-dur/Therapy in E-minor
- 1975 Šumavské pastorale/Sumava Pastoral
- 1976 Etuda o zkoušce/Study of a Rehearsal: cameraman (directed by Schorm)
- 1980 Variace na téma Gustava Mahlera/Variations on the Theme of Gustav Mahler
- 1989 Molto Cantabile
- 1990 Nevětší přání II/The Greatest Wish II
- 1998 Laská, kterou opouštím I & II/The Love I Am Leaving I & II

Further reading

- Brdečková, Tereza and Hádková, Jana, Jan Špáta Dívej se dolů (Jan Spata: Look Down), Prague: Czech Film Institute, 1990 (in Czech).
- Buchar, Robert, Czech New Wave Filmmakers in Interviews, Jefferson, NC: McFarland, 2004.
- Hames, Peter, The Czechoslovak New Wave, Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1985.
- Liehm, Antonín J. and Liehm, Mira, The Most Important Art: Eastern European Film After 1945, Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1977.

- Navrátil, Antonín, Cestykpravděčlži: 70 letčeskoslovenského dokumentárního filmu (The Path to Truth or Lies: 70 Years of Czechoslovak Documentary Film), Prague: FAMU, 2002 (in Czech).
- Slater, Thomas J., 'Czechoslovakia', in Thomas J. Slater (ed.), Handbook of Soviet and East European Films and Filmmakers, New York: Greenwood Press, 1992.
- Stoll, Martin, Hundred Years of Czech Documentary Film (1898–1998), Prague: Malá Skála, 2000.
- Okamžiky radosti: Rozhovor Martina Štolla s Janem Špátou (Moments of Joy: Jan Spata Interviewed by Martin Stoll), Prague: Malá Skála, 2002 (in Czech).

Spellbound

(US, Blitz, 2003)

Producer/director Jeff Blitz's Academy Award-nominated debut documentary Spellbound examines regional spelling bee competitions and the 1999 Scripps Howard National Spelling Bee in which they culminate. The film begins by introducing eight of two hundred and fifty National Spelling Bee contestants: Angela, a second-generation Mexican immigrant in rural Texas; Nupur, a middle-class girl of Indian descent in Miami; Ted, an aloof loner in a lower-class Missouri town; Emily, an upper-class daughter of academic parents in Connecticut; Ashley, an African American teen living with her mother and sister in a Washington, DC apartment; Neil, an affluent Indian American living in a beach house in California; Amber, a working-class daughter of a bartender in a small, industrial hub of Pennsylvania; and Harry, the son of an office worker in New Jersey. The action intensifies when the eight converge in Washington, DC for the actual spelling bee and the film climaxes in a duel between the last two spellers.

Blitz masterfully constructs a narrative arc that is at once comedic, dramatic, and suspenseful. The children, at times overzealous in their desire to succeed, and the parents, supportive, indulgent, and proud, provide comic relief. The personal narratives of each family make the film enthralling and socially relevant, and ongoing competition at the regional and culminating spelling bees builds an uneasy sense of competition and conflict that propels the film out of its steady state.

Blitz provides no narration of his own, but sews together interviews from the spelling bee participants, their family members and mentors, and former spelling bee contestants. This technique adds to the authentic, intimate, and seemingly objective nature of the film, yet it does not remove Blitz from the film; instead, his presence is often detectable and never far from the lens of the camera. Blitz uses interstitial slates and consistent music to orient the viewer, introduce the participants, and buttress the narrative.

Although the narrative is structured around the children's preparation for and participation in spelling bees, Blitz uses the spelling bee as an exemplar for the value of education and the opportunity that it holds for Americans. By selecting children from various ethnic and socioeconomic groups, Blitz shows a plurality of children working diligently to better themselves through America's educational system.

Blitz emphasizes the distinctively American roots of spelling bees, and, by extension, education in general, by engaging images, sounds, and commentary that provoke a sense of Americana and patriotism. A former spelling bee champion comments, 'It's just a great American tradition that has filtered out to the world.' Blitz peppers the film with shots of the American flag, Washington Monument, and a parade, as well as Harry strumming the American Anthem on his guitar. Spellbound suggests that despite one's race or social class, anyone can advance economically in America, given enough fortitude. Ashley is shown ascending an escalator much as she hopes to rise in the world, with the frame freezing as she is about to step off at the top. In another sequence, while Ashley comments 'as I go higher my goals go higher, too [...] I just keep on reaching', images of the Washington Monument are shown, reminiscent of both American ideals and the March on Washington.

This message is articulated more directly by the spelling bee announcer, who says, 'In America back in the eighteenth century, people had this sense of opportunity, you could leap out of one social class, you could move up, and I think they understood education was a basic part of that.' Other interviews serve to reinforce the assertion. An Indian mother remarks, 'You don't get second chances in India the way you do in America.' Another Indian émigré, the father of Neil, comments, 'There's no way you can fail in this country [...] if you work hard you will make it [...] that's nonexistent in other parts of the world'.

On the surface, the subtext in Spellbound is valid: education is a fundamental means of advancing one's economic class in America regardless of one's racial background or economic status; however, the finer nuances of this assertion go unexamined. Using primarily pathos, Spellbound puts little substantial evidence, by way of sociologists, historians, and statistics, behind its assertions. Spellbound implies that through hard work and perseverance access members of any race or class can achieve success in America. Unfortunately, this optimistic portrait of American life fails to impart the burdens that racism, prejudice, and poverty truly place on American minorities, immigrants, and lower classes.

Rather, the film's emphasis on diversity within such a small sample, and with a necessarily superficial treatment of its eight subjects, runs the risk of perpetuating race- and class-based stereotypes. For instance, Ashley, the only African American individual in the film, has two uncles who are incarcerated; Ted and his brother, who live in rural Missouri, like to 'shoot guns'; Emily, an only child whose parents have a large colonial home in New Haven, speaks of the 'au pair' as though they are her possession; and Angela, the only Mexican American, is the daughter of parents who tried to cross the border illegally. By attempting to achieve diversity with such a small group of students, Blitz ultimately may have presented his subjects as little more than stereotypical caricatures. Moreover, although the children are from disparate backgrounds, they may not be as dissimilar as they seem. In fact, they share some critical commonalities that transcend race and class. They all have supportive, involved parents; teachers or tutors who provide sustained mentorship; and determination, self-motivation, and high cognitive skills.

Ultimately, Spellbound is entertainment, and the characters are perhaps more entertaining than widely representative. On her uphill walk home from school, Ashley hints that this might be the case; she says, 'My life is like a movie [...] I go through different trials and tribulations and then I finally overcome'. In Spellbound, we see the trials and tribulations, but we do not quite see any of them overcome. Herein lies the false promise of Spellbound: in America, just like elsewhere, there is no guarantee of who will get the last word.

JEFF BERGIN

Spellbound (US, THINKFilms, 2003, 97 mins). Distributed by HBO/Cinemax. Produced by Jeffrey Blitz and Sean Welch. Directed by Jeffrey Blitz. Edited by Yama Gorskaya. Musical score composed by Daniel Hulsizer. Graphics by Adam Byrne. Additional Producer: Ronnie Eisen. Rerecording Mixer: Peter Brown. Sound FX Editor: Joe Dzuban.

Further reading

- Bruzzi, Stella, New Documentary: A Critical Introduction, New York: Routledge, 2000.
- Howard, Maureen, 'You Are There', in Charles Warren (ed.), Beyond Document: Essays on Nonfiction Film, Hanover, NH: University Press of New England, 1996.
- Nichols, Bill, Introduction to Documentary, Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press, 2001.
- Plantinga, Carl R., Rhetoric and Representation in Non-fiction Film, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1997.
- Shapiro, Arnold, 'Ten Golden Rules', in Michael Tobias (ed.), The Search for Reality: The Art of Documentary Filmmaking, Studio City: Michael Wiese Productions, 1998.
- Sherman, Sharon R., Documenting Ourselves: Film, Video, and Culture, Lexington, KY: University Press of Kentucky, 1998.

Spottiswoode, Raymond

As a student at Oxford University, Raymond Spottiswoode had written A Grammar of the Film: An Analysis of Film Technique, published in 1935. Though in it his approach is resolutely aesthetic and mainly devoted to the fictional feature film, he gives what must have been considered an inordinate amount of attention to the early documentary film, beginning with the statement that: 'England's only solid contribution to the cinema lies in her documentary groups, and in particular the G.P.O. Film Unit'.

He proceeds to offer one of the most adequate definitions of documentary, as it was being made in the 1930s, at any rate: 'The documentary film is in subject and approach a dramatized presentation of man's relation to his institutional life, whether industrial, social or political; and in technique a subordination of form to content.' However, Spottiswoode does not acknowledge as part of documentary the filmmakers' social purposes or their concern with the effects of their films on audiences.

Spottiswoode was subsequently hired at the General Post Office (GPO) Film Unit by John Grierson, who had read that important book of theory and classification (had reviewed it severely, in fact) and ordained, as a result, that Spottiswoode should begin his training as a tea boy. After six months, Grierson thought Spottiswoode still was not humble enough, according to a popular anecdote, anyway. Grierson regarded the purposes and effects of films of ultimate importance.

After Grierson became founding head of the National Film Board (NFB) of Canada in 1939, he brought Spottiswoode, then at Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer in Hollywood, to Canada, along with other veterans of British documentary. By this time a trained technician and producer, Spottiswoode was made coproducer with Stuart Legg on a Film Board production about the Commonwealth Air Training Plan, entitled Wings of Youth. After producing some other films, along with teaching NFB apprentices, he became supervisor of technical services for the Board, writing a valuable summary of 'Developments at the National Film Board of Canada, 1939–44', published in the Journal of the Society of Motion Picture Engineers (of which he was a Fellow).

When Grierson left the Film Board after the war to set up the short-lived The World Today in New York City, Spottiswoode went with him. He produced the most successful by far of its few films, Round Trip: U.S.A. in World Trade (1947). Directed by Roger Barlow (who had also directed Wings of Youth), it was sponsored by the Twentieth-Century Fund, a foundation that sought to promote liberal economic policy, including lowering or total removal of tariff barriers. Spottiswoode also produced a film for the Motion Picture Association of America on new techniques for teaching classroom subjects. Subsequently he became particularly interested in stereoscopic film, returned to England during the Festival of Britain in 1951, and was technical director of the stereoscopic film program at the Telekinema in London.

Spottiswoode also became a writer on film of considerable distinction, particularly regarding technical subjects. In 1950 the University of California Press republished his A Grammar of the Film, and in 1951 his Film and its Techniques. In the 1950s he was engaged in thorough research into the potential development of 3-D systems of cinematography, and co-authored the book, Theory of Stereoscopic Transmission (1953). Among other publications was his general editorship of The Focal Encyclopedia of Film & Television Techniques, a monumental work begun in 1964 and published in 1969.

JACK C. ELLIS

Biography

Born 1913 in London. Oxford University, MA c. 1933. General Post Office (GPO) Film Unit c. 1935–7. Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer c. 1937–9. National Film Board of Canada, producer and then technical supervisor c. 1940–5. The World Today, New York City 1946–8. Technical director of the stereoscopic film programs shown at the Telekinema during the Festival of Britain 1951. His principal books are A Grammar of the Film, 1935; Film and its Techniques, 1951; and The Theory of Stereoscopic Transmission (with Nigel Spottiswoode), 1953. Died 1970.

Further reading

Ellis, Jack C., John Grierson: Life, Contributions, Influence, Carbondale, IL: Southern Illinois University Press, 2000.
Hardy, Forsyth, John Grierson: A Documentary Biography, London: Faber & Faber, 1979.

Stern, Bert

Bert Stern stands as an unusual case in documentary history, for he entered and left in a whirlwind that closely resembles his career as a photographer. Stern has made only one film, Jazz on a Summer's Day (1960), but it exists as perhaps one of the greatest concert films ever made, and certainly the most well-known film about the jazz experience.

Stern began his career as an art director, but his ambition and skill quickly made him a preferred artist in freelance photography. His sharpness and artistry vaulted him into high commodity status with his work on various advertisement campaigns, and eventually his unique style brought him world fame through fashion photography and the images he created of Marilyn Monroe. Stern's photographs have appeared in Vogue, Esquire, Life, Glamour, and many other magazines. It is apparent that his career as a photographer and designer prepared him well for his single cinematic effort. Stern's desire to find new angles on his subjects makes Jazz on a Summer's Day a celebratory experience and less a traditional documentary, once again putting him outside the mainstream, while at the same time making his work highly distinct.

Stern's first experiences with filmmaking and photography came as part of the US Army's Motion Picture Division from 1951 to 1953. Self-taught, he advanced quickly from mailroom clerk to art director of Mayfair Magazine. From there he went on as a freelance photographer in the mid-1950s. His unique vision, often brash and irreverent, proved to be a success in Stern's commercial work. This led to clients as diverse as IBM, Pepsi, Volkswagen, Smirnoff, US Steel, DuPont, and others. Stern was able to break away from the standard photographic experience because he was able to recognize and capture both artistry and effectiveness in his commercial photography, and later, in his fashion and profile work. He was capable of selling ideas, products, people, lifestyles, and visions without commercial crassness. Stern's style has strictly adhered to the 'less is more' concept, and his use of lighting and composition replaced the cluttered and contrived photographs that inundated the commercial market before his arrival.

Perhaps Stern's greatest breakthrough and legacy is his photographic essay on Marilyn Monroe titled 'The Last Sitting'. Stern's two-day shoot of Monroe was her last before her death, and the photographs are as passionate as they are revealing, both externally and internally of the movie star.

Much of his passionate technique and irreverence transferred to his only attempt at filmmaking as well in 1958 at The Newport Jazz Festival. Jazz on a Summer's Day remains an engaging and elegant film, though its place in the history of documentary is murky. The reason lies somewhere between its experimental format and singularity. Jazz on a Summer's Day is shot as Stern would have photographed one of his beautiful models or objects. It is highly stylized and dramatically executed. Stern designed the festival's stage lighting and chose all the film's camera movements and placements. Stern fashioned still photographic long lenses to his film cameras so that he could invade spaces unnoticed. In technique and film mechanics, he was an innovator.

He was not afraid to get in his subject's face. He often used extreme close-ups, where performers would be-bop in and out of frame. He manages to use extremely static shots but still convey the passion and urgency of the performance. Stern, filming within an audience of hundreds, was able to provide a separate and unique intimate experience for his film audience. It is the result of the relationship that is obtained between artist and subject and artist and audience.

Jazz on a Summer's Day flows gracefully. Stern's editing is a stream of fluid crosscuts between the festival and the concurrent World's Cup Race. He uses images of water, boats, and birds as matching visuals to the festival's swaying beats.

Stern is as interested in the audience as much as in the performing artists. The woman in the red sweater, the man in the little hat, the dancing, drinking coed, the interracial couple all become as important to the film as the musicians. The film celebrates a musical form and a cultural movement.

Jazz on a Summer's Day began as a single passion for Stern. A life goal of the artist was to make a film by the time he was thirty. The project was almost abandoned on several occasions, but Stern credits his final decision to a conversation he had with another passenger on a plane. On returning from a scouting trip of the grounds, Stern wrote off the location as uninteresting and unmanageable. The gentleman he was sitting next to on the plane, after hearing about the reason for Stern's trip, insisted that Stern must make the film. Coming out of that experience Stern was finally convinced that the film should be made.

At the start of production the film went through many trials and changes. It began as a hybrid documentary/fictionalized narrative. Stern and his team devised scripts, and even shot rehearsals for an improvisational love story. The idea felt stale and unbelievable when it came time for actual filming and Stern dropped the contrived storylines. In an interview in 1999, included on the DVD release, Stern discussed the film's development: 'We tried to devise a story, but I wasn't equipped to produce a story [...] so I stuck to the festival and to the music, and interpreted that with my camera.'

Some controversy hovers over the making of the film. Stern's producing partners still claim more stake in the film's creation than Stern has given them. While others claim directorial credit, Stern writes it off as his vision created entirely by himself. He sums the argument up in the 1999 interview by saying, 'I don't know if you want to call the movie directed. It's more of a happening [...] Jazz on a Summer's Day is not directed. It was produced and filmed.'

Jazz on a Summer's Day does not adhere to traditional investigative or exploratory documentary formulas. The film exists as a celebratory film documenting a people, place, and event. Stern brings glamour to an open field in Rhode Island and brings 'jazz into the sun', as he describes it. Stern achieves what most concert films hope to with the experimentalism and newness of the form it documents: a lasting image of a singular moment in musical history.

ROBERT A. EMMONS, JR

See also: Jazz on a Summer's Day

Biography

Born in Brooklyn, New York, October 3, 1929. US Army 1951–3. Freelance photographer with L.C. Gumbiner Agency, New York, NY 1953–71; freelance commercial and magazine photographer 1959–. Founder and president of Libra Productions, a television commercial production company, New York, NY 1961–71. Has exhibited his photographs around the world from New York to France, Germany, and Switzerland. Author of several books, publishing his own library of work as well as texts on photographic process and technique. Received the Documentary Film Award, Venice Film Festival for his only film, Jazz on a Summer's Day, 1960, as well as several Art Directors Club Awards 1964–71.

Selected film

1960 Jazz on a Summer's Day: producer, writer, director, editor

Further reading

Silverman, Harold, Gilbert Simon, Bert Stern, and Milton Glaser, The Pill Book, New York: Bantam Books, 1980.

Stern, Bert, The Photo Illustration, New York: Crowell, 1974.

—, The Last Sitting, New York: William Morrow & Co., 1982.

Stern, Bert and Sobieszek, Robert A., Bert Stern: Adventures, Boston: Bantam Books, 1998.

Stern, Horst

In the 1970s the television series Sterns Stunde (Stern's Hour) broke new ground in exposing and examining the relation of society to nature and animals. Horst Stern eschewed traditional filmmaking in his approach to his chosen topic. To Stern, an examination of our relationship to nature is important because it teaches us about ourselves and our society.

Twenty-six episodes of Sterns Stunde were produced between 1969 and 1979. The topics covered included animals as a food source, animals as pets, and animals in scientific experiments. He also devoted episodes to single species and creatures, such as spiders, butterflies, and hedgehogs. He always spoke the commentary with his hoarse and rough voice. His style was sharp, provocative, ironic, sometimes even polemic. His approach was marked by a scientific and educational, as opposed to entertaining, tone. His programs were always meticulously researched.

Stern did not refrain from airing his opinions. On Christmas Day in 1971, his program Bemerkungen über den Rothirsch/Remarks on the Red Deer was broadcast, in which he criticized German hunters for not hunting and killing enough deer. Other episodes attacked industrialized agriculture, which submits chickens and cows to miserable, mass production conditions. Other episodes discussed the use of animals in sports and the circus. The 1978 three-part program on animal experimentation in the pharmaceutical industry generated much discussion and controversy.

Besides these political statements, he and his cameramen, especially Kurt Hirschel, produced cinematographic masterpieces, for which they developed new techniques to shoot animals such as spiders and bees. One of his theses was that the best way to respect animals in nature is to simply leave them alone.

Horst Stern was under the impression that all his efforts to change society were not as successful as he had hoped, thus he stopped shooting films and started a print magazine in 1980. In the mid-1980s he resigned and started to write literature. In his novel Klint, he describes a journalist who despairs over his love for unblemished nature and his sorrow about the destruction of the environment.

KAY HOFFMANN

Biography

Born in Stettin, Germany, October 24, 1922. Did an apprenticeship at a bank. Served in World War II. Worked as a court reporter for a Stuttgart newspaper in 1947. Worked as a consultant for the publisher Delius Claasing in Bielefeld. Became Editor-in-Chief for various leisure magazines. In the 1960s wrote more than fifty radio programs on animals for the school program of Süddeutscher Rundfunk (SDR), the public broadcaster for southwest Germany. From 1969 on, directed the ecological television series Sterns Stunde for SDR. In 1972 founded the Gruppe Ökologie (Ecology Group) with Konrad Lorenz, Irenäus Eibl-Eibesfeldt, Bernhard Grzimek, and Heinz Sielmann. In 1974 awarded an honorary doctorate from the University of Stuttgart-Hohenheim. In 1980 started the magazine Natur. Publisher and Editor-in-Chief until 1984. Published three novels, which were quite successful in Germany.

Selected films

- 1970 Bemerkungen über das Pferd/Remarks on the Horse: director, writer
- 1970 Bemerkungen über die Biene/Remarks on the Bee: director, writer
- 1970 Bemerkungen über das Rind/Remarks on the Cow: director, writer
- 1971 Bemerkungen über das Huhn/Remarks on the Dog: director, writer
- 1971 Bemerkungen über den Rothirsch/Remarks on the Red Deer: director, writer
- 1973 Bemerkungen über das Tier im Handel/Remarks on the Animal in Handel: director, writer
- 1973 Bemerkungen über den Storch/Remarks on the Stork: director, writer
- 1975 Bemerkungen über die Spinne/Remarks on the Spider: director, writer
- 1976 Bemerkungen über den Hund als Ware/Remarks on the dog as a commodity: director, writer
- 1978 Die Stellvertreter—Tiere in der Pharmaforschung: director, writer
- 1979 Bemerkungen über Gemse: director, writer
- 1997 Sterns Bemerkungen über einen sterbenden Wald: director, writer

Further reading

- Grefe, Christiane, 'Horst Stern—Das Vertrauen ins Fernsehen ist verloren', in Cornelia Bolesch (ed.), Dokumentarisches Fernsehen, Munich: List, 1990: 76–80.
- n.a., 'Horst Stern', in catalogue 16, Internationales Dokumentarfilmfestival München, Munich, 2001.
- Stern, Horst, Sterns Bemerkungen über das Pferd ... die Biene ... die Hunde, Munich: Kindler, 1971.
- Tierversuche in der Pharmaforschung, Munich: Kindler, 1979.
- Jagdnovelle, Munich: Kindler, 1989.
- Klint. Stationen einer Verwirrung, Munich: Knaus, 1993.

Stewart, Charles

Although not a household name, cameraman and director Charles Stewart has played a crucial part in the development of television documentary from the 1960s to the present day. He is probably best known for his work with Roger Graef, for whom he has shot a number of programmes. He also codirected Police (BBC, 1980–81) with him. He thus played a central role in the dissemination of direct cinema techniques within British television during the 1960s and, most prominently, the 1970s (when the 'fly-on-the-wall' documentary began to become an established part of British television). He has also worked in other forms, such as television drama, feature films, and anthropological documentaries.

Stewart became an early innovator in the use of handheld, sync-sound camera work. He quickly became adept at using the Éclair NPR and, as lightweight cameras became increasingly taken up within television, his services were in more and more demand. Using the NPR, he could handhold the camera and thus capture a large range of different events in many different spaces. Free from the restrictions of lighting set-ups and camera repositioning, Stewart could work faster and create a fluid sense of action, breaking down the distance between action and camera.

It was unsurprising that Stewart began to work for Alan King Associates (AKA), which became a kind of centre for young, innovative filmmakers working with new, lightweight equipment. Stewart first worked with Graef when making a film under the aegis of AKA: The Life and Times of John Huston Esq. (BBC, 1967) was a Graef-directed documentary on the film director that mixed vérité techniques with some dramatic, symbolic sequences. This programme led to the creation of a twelve-part series on artists that mixed vérité techniques with occasional experimental sequences: Who Is? (BBC, 1968) was an attempt to break new ground in arts documentaries and was the first series to be coproduced by four different television companies from around the world (the BBC, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, National Education Television, United States, and Bayerischer Rundfunk, Germany). In between the Huston programme and the Who Is? series, Stewart had worked on the Mike Hodges-produced series New Tempo (ABC, 1967), an extremely experimental, montage-based arts series.

Towards the end of the 1960s, in line with the growing confluence of documentary and drama in many areas, Stewart shot many documentary-influenced television dramas and feature films. These included work with directors such as Ken Loach and Jean-Luc Godard, who represented the 'realistic' and 'experimental' sides of lightweight camera use, with both of which Stewart was associated. Perhaps the most controversial documentary-influenced drama that Stewart shot in this period was Roy Battersby's Some Women (BBC, 1968), a film covering interviews with women who had been in prison. Based on extensive research, the film used actresses to reenact original interviews and was not transmitted until 1969 because of the manner in which it was seen to confuse the boundaries between fact and fiction. Stewart shot the film in an intimate, still manner, diverting from the more roving manner associated with lightweight equipment.

In the 1970s Stewart undertook work with Graef on a number of fly-on-the-wall documentaries, most often documenting a number of decision-making processes. The first of these was The Space Between Words (BBC, 1972), a five-part series that filmed a series of incidents that reflected communication problems within different environments (such as in a family, at work, and at school). This documentary marked a new stage of vérité within Britain, a much more austere and painstaking detailing of words, movements, and gestures. This called for Stewart to observe a whole set of details at quick speed, so that he could shift his focus appropriately. The series was shot on a relatively high ratio of 30:1, which allowed the crew to amass a wealth of film and thus select what they thought were the most interesting sequences for transmission. Graef continued this style for a number of documentaries made for Granada, including State of the Nation: A Law in the Making (Granada, 1973) and Decision (Granada, 1976). In 1981 Graef and Stewart made the now famous Police (transmitted 1982) for the BBC, a thirteen-part, minutely focused portrait of the Thames Valley police force, which attracted more than ten million viewers, an enormous number for a documentary.

Stewart is most famous for his work with Graef, but he has also worked in many other fields, and has often worked as sole director. His first directorial assignment was an ATV documentary on a road-widening scheme, Could Your Street Be Next? (ATV, 1972). In the late 1970s he made two television dramas, both of which evidence a realistic tone: Speech Day (Thames, 1977) and Billy (BBC, 1979). In the 1980s Stewart began to work on programmes that documented environmental and political aspects of Ethiopia in Seeds of Despair (Central, 1984) and Seeds of Hope (Central, 1985). These programmes (the second of which was a six-part series) evidenced influences of both vérité and anthropological television that had developed in the 1970s and with which Stewart was involved. Stewart shot some episodes of Granada's popular anthropological series Disappearing World (Granada, 1970–91), as well as Adrian Cowell's well-received, experimentally tinged anthropology programme The Tribe That Hides from Man (ATV, 1970).

Although Stewart's work was varied, it was also marked by certain thematic and stylistic preoccupations: capturing 'authentic', minimally mediated action; detailing events often 'hidden' or ignored by the media; plus a sensitivity to detail and an ability to capture the minutiae of human interaction, such as facial expressions or significant body gestures. He was, along with Dick Fontaine, among the most innovative camera stylists working with lightweight equipment in British television during the 1960s, helping to break down the boundaries between drama and documentary in the late 1960s and early 1970s, and was involved in the new wave of politically sensitive anthropological documentaries in the 1970s and 1980s.

JAMIE SEXTON

See also: Graef, Roger

Biography

Born in Newcastle-upon-Tyne, 1937. Two years national service in the navy from 1956. In 1958 went to Regent Street Polytechnic to study photography. Moved to London in 1961 and started to work as a fashion photographer. Started documentary film production in 1964. In 1965 began working with AKA, and first met Roger Graef.

Selected films

- 1967 New Tempo: photographer (ABC, series, various directors)
- 1968 The Life and Times of John Huston Esq.: photographer (BBC, Graef)
- 1968 Who Is?: photographer (BBC, series, various directors)
- 1969 Some Women: photographer (BBC, Battersby)
- 1970 The Tribe that Hides from Man: photographer (ATV, Cowell)
- 1970 The Important Thing is Love: photographer (ATV, Kitts)
- 1971 Rank and File: photographer (BBC, Loach)
- 1972 The Space Between Words: photographer (BBC, series, Graef)
- 1972 Could Your Street Be Next: director (ATV)
- 1973 The State of the Nation—A Law in the Making: photographer (Granada, Graef)
- 1974 Disappearing World: Masai Women: photographer (Granada, Curling)
- 1974 Disappearing World: Masai Manhood: photographer (Granada, Curling)
- 1974 Retirement: End or Beginning?: director (ATV)
- 1975 The State of the Nation: Inside Brussels HQ: photographer (Granada, Graef)
- 1976 Decision: photographer (Granada, series, Graef)
- 1977 Disappearing World: The Rendille: photographer (Granada, Curling)
- 1978 Decision: British Communism: photographer (Granada, Graef)
- 1979 Billy: director (BBC)
- 1982 Police: director, producer (BBC, series co-directed and produced with Roger Graef)
- 1984 Seeds of Despair: director (Central)
- 1985 Seeds of Hope: director (Central)
- 1991 Cutting Edge: Plague in Your Own Home: director (Channel 4)
- 1992 Town Hall: director, producer (BBC, series)
- 1995 Witness: Mecca on the Thames: director (Channel 4)
- 1996 True Stories: Inside Sellafeld: director, producer (Channel 4)
- 1996 Red Base One Four: director, producer (Channel 4)

Further reading

- Orbanz, Eva (ed.), Journey to a Legend and Back: The British Realistic Film, trans. Stuart Hood, Berlin: Edition Volker Spiess, 1977.
- Petley, Julian, 'The Good Stewart', Broadcast, July, 19, 1985.
- Swallow, Norman, 'Television, the Integrity of Fact and Fiction', Sight and Sound 45, no. 3, summer 1976.
- Winston, Brian, Claiming the Real: The Griersonian Documentary and its Legitimations, London: BFI, 1995.
- Wyver, John (ed.), Nothing but the Truth: Cinéma Vérité and the Films of the Roger Graef Team, London: ICA/BFI, 1982.
- 'Police Taped', Framework 18, 1982.

Stoney, George

George Stoney is a leading figure in the American documentary film movement, having made more than fifty documentaries and founded a movement of community-based media producers in the 1960s and 1970s in North America. He has played a major agenda setting role in debates about documentary, its forms, its ethics, and its social function. Stoney began his career working in 16mm as a socially aware documentary filmmaker using aspects of direct cinema, and later switched to video format in the 1970s as it was ideal for the mobility and ease needed for the informal community-based media he produced or over which he saw production. In addition to using video as a means of making media more democratically available to nonprofessionals, he also was responsible for leading the creation of public access cable, a designated community 'free speech' zone negotiated with cable operators. Stoney also provided the pedagogy and philosophy to underpin the production of this new genre of video documentary. As the cofounder of the influential Alternative Media Center in 1970, which became a training ground for the first generation of producers, Stoney played a major role in influencing the content of this programming. Besides working in television, Stoney has collaborated on numerous films around the world, including those by his many former students, which share a common commitment to social change media in their production, content, and distribution.

From his first documentary, All My Babies in 1953—a training film for the Georgia Department of Public Health of a dramatic reenactment of a black midwife's work from her perspective—he has been committed to producing films and videos that show life from the perspective of people who have been disenfranchised or excluded from mainstream media. He uses narrative as a strategy, preferring to tell a story or cover an event than letting the camera be a 'fly on the wall'. This extends to letting participants in the film take the microphone, use direct address and other surprising rule-breaking moments in the films, and video productions that have, as their goal, social change and education rather than aesthetic purity.

Stoney's filmmaking practice and philosophy challenges the auteurship that defined direct cinema. A former student of Basil Wright and an educator for the FSA using Pare Lorentz's films, his filmmaking practice comes with an awareness of the history and practices that inform his work. His interest in the history of documentary film culminated in his intensive study of documentary pioneer Robert Flaherty in How the Myth Was Made (1978). This acclaimed film critically explored the early roots of documentary practice. Indeed, despite his critical approach, all of Stoney's films are informed by fundamental attributes of cinéma vérité such as direct address, natural lighting, and ambient sound, but always with a question of the morality of filmmaking, an issue that some direct cinema directors eschewed. Thus, Stoney's interest in who and how the story is being told—its fidelity to truth—is more than an aesthetic but an ethical working out of the filmmaker-subject relationship, a debate that shaped the direct cinema movement.

His respect for the subject's perspective extends to letting them shape the final cut, a process that few directors would ever allow. This active engagement with the subjects allows them to retain authorial control. He established this practice early on, and it has stayed with him throughout his career. It was his concern with retaining the subjectivity of the participants in documentary that led him to take a job as an executive producer of an experimental project at the Canadian Nation Film Board (NFB) in 1968. One of his first films, You are on Indian Land, involved an Indian film crew that was trained by the NFB and covered a border dispute from an Indian perspective, countering the view of the television news. It was used also as a tool of understanding and shown to Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the local police.

It was while at Challenge for Change that Stoney recognized the importance of the newly developed lightweight video portapak in community production. It enabled filmmakers to make documentary films in the field, cheaply and without expert training, making it an ideal medium for social activists who could now gain the authority of media producers without the cost or technical expertise of film. A documentary of the use of this early video tool was VTR St. Jacques. Shot on 16mm, it chronicles the first use of half-inch, consumer grade black-and-white video as a tool for community building and people empowerment. In 1970, when he returned from the Challenge for Change program, he took the next step toward creating a democratized distribution to match the style and content of the video's community-based productions when he cofounded the Alternative Media Center at New York University. In this effort, he is fundamentally concerned with the documentaries-audience relationship, which owes its concern to political activism and the pedagogical strategies of Paulo Freire. Stoney uses media in situations that would encourage dialogue and understanding and lead to political change. This meant creating other groundbreaking forums for viewing in and out of the public sphere, as in public access's carving out of a space for community media in a medium surrounded by mainstream productions, and also in other ways, such as in the screenings of films in unusual places or to facilitate dialogue among groups.

DANIELLE SCHWARTZ

See also: Wright, Basil

Biography

Born in 1916, studied journalism at the University of North Carolina and at New York University. Worked as freelance journalist, an information officer for the Farm Security Administration and a photo intelligence officer in World War II. Joined the Southern Educational Film Service as a writer and a director in 1946. In 1948 he received a Rosenwald Fellowship. Appointed the first executive director of the Canadian Film Board's Challenge for Change Program 1968. In 1972, with Red Burns, he cofounded the Alternate Media Center at New York University. In 1976 he was founder of the National Federation of Local Cable Programmers. Stoney is currently Paulette Goddard Professor in Film, Tisch School of the Arts, Department of Film and Television.

Selected films

- 1953 All My Babies
- 1965 The Mask
- 1972 First Transmissions of ACTV
- 1978 Shepherd of the Night Flock (with James Brown)
- 1978 How the Myth Was Made
- 1978 VTR St. Jacques
- 1989 We Shall Overcome
- 1995 The Uprising of '34: codirected with Judith Helfand

Further reading

- Barnouw, Eric, Documentary: A History of the Non-Fiction Film, New York: Oxford University Press, 1993.
- Mertes, Cara, 'Toasts and Tributes', Wide Angle 21, no. 2, March 1999: 137–65.
- n.a., special issue devoted to George Stoney, Wide Angle 21, no. 2, 1999.
- Rapport, Leonard, 'George Stoney, Writer: The Early Years', Wide Angle 21, no. 2, March 1999: 19–25.
- Stoney, George, 'The Mirror Machine', Sight and Sound 41, no. 1, winter 1971–2: 9–11.
- 'The Future of Documentary', Sightlines, fall–winter, 1983–4.

Sturken, Marita, 'An Interview with George Stoney', Afterimage, January 1984.

Watson, Patricia, 'Challenge for Change', Art Canada 1970: 142–3.

Winston, Brian, 'Documentary: How the Myth Was Deconstructed', Wide Angle 21, no. 2, March 1999: 71–86.

Storck, Henri

Having made more than seventy films, comprising for the most part documentaries and shorts combined with a few medium- and feature-length films, Henri Storck is undoubtedly the leading figure of Belgian cinema. Throughout his varied career he dealt to a greater or lesser degree with such practices as formalism, impressionism, social and political concerns, and ethnography. He generally worked in an ordered fashion, gained a certain reputation with art critique films, but never fulfilled his Hollywood dreams. He fought relentlessly for a national cinema, sometimes displayed ideological flexibility, never abandoned his life's passions and remained a genuinely modest individual.

His first attempts at film, shot on 9.5mm and subsequently on 35mm, focused on his immediate surroundings, and combined formal research, an acute study of social behaviour and a surrealist sense of rebellion. Films d'amateur sur Ostende/Amateur Films over Ostende (1928) and Images d'Ostende/Images of Ostende (1929), with their poetic mood and rhythmic feeling, recall the early works of Joris Ivens. In 1930 Trains de plaisir/Trains of Pleasure, Les Fêtes du centenaire/Feasts of the Centenary, Ostende, reine des plages/Ostende, Queen of the Beaches all display an aptitude for observing rituals and feasts. Storck had in fact been declared 'the official cinematographer of the city of Ostende'.

Images d'Ostende, Trains de plaisir, and Une pêche aux harengs/Herring Fishing (1930) were shown at the 2nd International Congress of Independent Cinema, held in Brussels between November 27 and December 1, 1930. Storck's work met with acclaim. During the congress Storck met Joris Ivens, with whom he would later collaborate on Borinage, Boris Kaufman, Jean Painlevé, and Jean Vigo, who was to become his close friend. In 1931 he moved to Paris and became involved with Zéro de conduite, in which he had a small role, that of a priest. By the end of 1933, however, Storck had moved back to Brussels.

In 1932 Storck directed two films: Sur les bords de la caméra/On the Edge of the Camera and Histoire du soldat inconnu/History of the Unknown Soldier. These two short films, made on commission (Storck had to edit sequences of athletics taken from news images), exploit a surrealist and often satirical vein reminiscent of René Clair's Entr'acte (1924) or Vigo's A propos de Nice (1930). Histoire du soldat inconnu is, in addition, a pacifist manifesto denouncing the illusions of the Briand-Kellogg Pact (1928), the rise of fascism, and the impotence of the League of Nations.

In 1933, at the behest of the Screen Club of Brussels (Club de l'Écran de Bruxelles), Storck began the Borinage project (Misère au Borinage). Contacted by the leaders of this leftist cine club, known for its projection of avant-garde and political films, Storck took on the project and requested the collaboration of Joris Ivens, who accepted immediately. The film, largely based on a study into the wretched living conditions of the mining community, written by a doctor and published by Workers Aid International (Secours Ouvrier International), depicts the strike movement and the confrontations with law enforcement. It is a testimony to the consciousness of filmmakers and left-wing intellectuals with regard to the subject. The film ends with a direct call for the dictatorship of the proletariat. The film was made with little money: there is no soundtrack and it is filmed largely with light-weight cameras that are, above all, hidden from the authorities.

To depict the episodes concerning the strikers' conflict, however, the two directors were faced with the problem of reconstruction. They needed to show, for example, the tactic implemented by the community to avoid eviction (other miners would arrive and strategically sit on the furniture to prevent the bailiff from seizing it). The directors had no other choice than to 'produce an honest and direct imitation' (Ivens), and for this they needed to hire two police uniforms and find two miners willing to act the part of policemen. The other important scene that had to be reconstructed was that of the demonstration that appears at the end of the film and that had taken place to commemorate the fiftieth anniversary of the death of Karl Marx. The directors asked the miners to proceed as normal. The portrait of Marx, held by two men, leads the march, followed by small groups of men, each group separated by about ten paces from the next, thus rendering them an impossible target and facilitating escape in the event of police intervention. According to Ivens, the miners forgot that they were participating in the making of a film, and the scene became a genuine demonstration, hence the arrival and intervention of the police and the urgent need to hide the camera.

In 1934 Henri Storck, along with René-Ghislain Levaux, created the organisation Cinéma-Edition-Production (CEP), which would later fulfil numerous commissions. Les Maisons de la Misère/Houses of Poverty (1937), made for The National Society for Low Cost Housing (Société Nationale des Habitations à Bon Marché), is reminiscent of both Housing Problems (Anstey and Elton, 1935), which Storck had viewed, and certain scenes of Borinage. One of the two cameramen was Eli Lotar, who worked for Buñuel on Las Hurdes and would subsequently direct Aubervilliers. Whereas Borinage used the real protagonists and adhered to a documentary structure, the production of Les Maisons de la Misère opted for professional stage actors.

La Belgique nouvelle/New Belgium (1937) is essentially a film of election propaganda for the Prime Minister Van Zeeland, and it is entirely a product of its context, that of the front against fascism. Le Patron est mort/The Boss is Dead (1938) retraces the funeral procession of socialist leader Emile Vandervelde (nicknamed le patron, the boss). The particular attention paid to the behaviour of the largely working-class crowds during this ritual prefigures the ethnographic approach of his later works.

In the period leading up to World War II Storck devoted much energy to an historical production about the colonisation of the Congo, Bula Matari. His associate, Le Vaux, from the CEP, spent a long period between 1939 and 1940 in Hollywood, trying to secure the interest of the majors. He seemed to be on the verge of success when the war broke out. The project was relaunched in 1950 with Alexander Korda, only to fall through once again.

In the middle of World War II, from 1942 to 1944, Storck devoted himself to Symphonie paysanne/Peasant Symphony, a feature-length documentary in five parts (the four seasons plus a rural wedding celebration, which serves as a conclusion). Aesthetically speaking, this film is probably Storck's chef-d'oeuvre; however, from an ideological and symbolic perspective, the film is somewhat surprising. This chronicle of rural farm life in Brabant, which omits any reference to the current world conflict, seems to glorify the values of 'a return to the land', 'back to nature', and 'national cohesion', values greatly extolled by the occupying forces. The semi-ethnographic approach is also completely ahistorical, and the continual insistence on the timeless rural rituals and the cyclical concept of time immemorial are in total opposition to any progressive vision.

After the war Storck mainly focused on films about art. In 1945 the innovative short film Le Monde de Paul Delvaux/The World of Paul Delvaux broke new ground in its seeming ability to penetrate the interior of the art works. Storck would later return to this subject in 1970 with Paul Delvaux ou les femmes défendues/Paul Delvaux or Forbidden Women. Rubens (1948), made in collaboration with the critic Paul Haesaerts, anticipated an analytical approach that would become widespread many years later. The use of split screen, crosscutting, extreme close-ups, and the superimposition of geometric lines on the artwork, all produced on 35mm black-and-white film, prefigured the video effects which made the French series Palettes (Alain Jaubert) so successful in the 1990s.

In this postwar period, Storck also worked on one of his rare fiction films, Le Banquet des fraudeurs/The Smuggler's Banquet (1951), which deals with the creation of Bénélux in the context of the Marshall Plan. This humorous chronicle of a village with three borders, two of which are going to disappear, paradoxically goes to great lengths to appeal to a wide European audience.

Without interrupting his numerous and diverse commissions such as Au Carrefour de la vie/At the Crossroad of Life (1949), commissioned by the United Nations on the subject of the rehabilitation of young offenders, Storck increasingly turned to films about Belgian society, history, and traditions. Fêtes de Belgique ou l'effusion collective/Feasts of Belgium or Collective Effusion (1970–1), a series of ten short films on 35mm, provided a perfect ethnographic example of the country's folk traditions.

Storck's career drew to a close in 1985 with a feature-length biopic on the painter Permeke. Toward the end of his life, Storck, anxious to pass on his experiences and documents, agreed to participate in various interviews by filmmakers and researchers. Such examples include Henri Storck, Cinéaste/Henri Storck Filmmaker (1986) by Robbe de Hert and Mes entretiens filmés/My Conversations on Film (1998) by Boris Lehman.

Storck was always motivated by his love of the cinema. He initiated many projects. He was cofounder of the Cinématheque Royale de Belgique (1938), he created the Audiovisual Centre in Brussels (Centre de l'Audiovisuel, CBA), and the Centre for Films on Art (Centre du Film sur l'Art). In 1950 he carried out a study for the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) into the recreational film for the child spectator. In 1959 he produced Les Seigneurs de la forêt/Masters of the Congo Jungle (Heinz Sielmann and Henri Brandt), and in 1967 Luc de Heusch's Jeudi on chantera comme dimanche/Thursday We Shall Sing Like Sunday. In 1975 he appeared in Chantal Ackerman's film Jeanne Dielman.

In terms of Storck's ideas, he was not devoid of certain surprising contradictions: a poetic filmmaker who admired John Ford, a modest director who dreamed of making Hollywood blockbusters, a staunch socialist who sometimes accepted astonishing political concessions, a quiet man who was also a determined rebel. In the famous May 1968 revolt in Paris, despite being a teacher at the renowned National School of Cinema (IAD, Ecole Nationale de Cinéma), he took the side of the students, a decision that cost him his teaching post.

Storck was acquainted with many highly esteemed directors and lived through the leading cinematic trends of the twentieth century. The imprints left by this father figure of Belgian cinema are still visible today. A formal invention, an openness to international subjects, and a commitment to social concerns—which today epitomise the Belgian documentary movement—are all inherent in Storck's varied work.

JEAN-LUC LIOULT

See also: Ivens, Joris

Biography

Born September 5, 1907 to shoe shop owners. Graduated with a degree in physics from the Université Libre de Bruxelles. Died September 23, 1999.

Selected films

- 1928 Films d'amateur sur Ostende/Amateur Films over Ostende: cinematographer, director
- 1929 Images d'Ostende/Images of Ostende: cinematographer, director
- 1930 Une pêche au hareng/Herring Fishing: cinematographer, director
- 1932 Histoire du soldat inconnu/History of the Unknown Soldier: cinematographer, director, editor
- 1933 Borinage: co-cinematographer, codirector, writer
- 1936 Les Maisons de la misère/Houses of Poverty: director
- 1944 Symphonie paysanne/Peasant Symphony: cinematographer, director, writer, editor, producer
- 1949 Rubens: director, writer, editor, producer
- 1971 Paul Delvaux ou les femmes défendues/Paul Delvaux or Forbidden Women: director
- 1973 Les Fêtes de Belgique/Feasts of Belgium: director
- 1998 Mes entretiens filmés/My Conversations on Film (Lehman): actor

Further reading

- Aubenas, Jacqueline (ed.), Dic Doc, Le Dictionnaire du Documentaire—191 réalisateurs, Bruxelles: Communauté Française de Belgique Wallonie-Bruxelles, 1999.
- Geens, Vincent, Bula Matari: Un rêve d'Henri Storck, Crisnée: Fonds Henri Storck/Yellow Now Côté cinéma, 2000.
- Lioult, Jean-Luc, 'Autour du Rubens de Storck et du Van Gogh de Resnais: quels films sur l'art?' in Le Film sur l'Art et ses Frontières, Aix-en-Provence: Publications de l'Université de Provence & Institut de l'Image, 1998: 45–60.
- n.a., 'Le Borinage: "la grève des mineurs de 1932 et le film de Joris Ivens et Henri Storck"', Revue belge du Cinéma 6–7, 1983–4, Bruxelles: APEC.
- Vichi, Laura, Henri Storck—De l'avant-garde au documentaire social, Crisnée: Yellow Now Côté cinéma, 2002.

Strand, Paul

Paul Strand is one of the most important figures in the development of modern American photography, as well as contributing to a series of groundbreaking documentary films between the 1920s and early 1940s. A pioneer of photographic abstraction in the 1910s, Strand dealt with subject matter that ranged from urban scenes and landscapes to found objects and intensely personal close-ups. He was particularly interested in the purity of simple images and geometric patterns and composed his photographs to capture what in 1917 he called 'a formal conception born of the emotions, the intellect, or of both'. He was a modernist in his belief that the camera gives access to the truth of objects, and the photograph brings to life a hidden potentiality often overlooked in daily life. Alan Trachtenberg has argued that although Strand was interested in documenting the factual world, he developed a romantic version of modernism in searching for organic properties within hard forms, heightening perceptions and illuminating hidden depths.

Born into a Jewish family on the Upper West Side of New York City, Strand was educated at the Ethical Culture School in New York in 1904–9. His teacher, the social reformer Lewis W. Hime, taught Strand how to use a camera to document working-class life and introduced him to art exhibitions in 1907. After graduation and a short trip to Europe, Strand joined the Camera Club of New York and worked briefly as a commercial portrait photographer. He began working in pictorialist and impressionist modes, but in the mid-1910s became very interested in 'straight photographs', in which he achieved a high measure of objectivity by reverting to a sharp-focus lens and refusing to tamper with the negative. The purity of Strand's work caught the interest of the photographic innovator and art exhibitor Alfred Stieglitz in 1915. Stieglitz held Strand in high esteem; he was the only photographer Stieglitz would exhibit in the late 1910s, and in a June 1917 issue of Camera Work, Stieglitz praised him for his 'brutal directness' and for resisting trickery for his visual effect.

Towards the end of his career, in 1971, Strand spoke about three roads that opened for him after he saw Stieglitz's Armory Show of 1913: first, 'to understand the new developments in painting'; second, 'a desire to express certain feelings I had about New York'; and, third, a desire to 'photograph people without their being aware of the camera'. Strand followed Stieglitz's preference for a handheld camera to take instantaneous pictures, which enabled events to come together by chance, rather than viewing composition in a fixed, unmoving way. He discussed ideas with artists that Stieglitz exhibited in his 291 Gallery on Fifth Avenue, including Morgan Russell, Marcel Duchamp, and Francis Picabia. However, where Duchamp and Picabia's art explored the chaos of modernity, Strand sought a heightened objectivity that was epitomized by the modernity of Manhattan. Sometimes he appeared to celebrate urban designs through his sharply focused images and his interest in light, line, and volume, whereas at others (such as a 1922 essay in Broom), he set his work against the destructive force of mechanization. Just as Stieglitz was interested in the relationship between industry and nature, so Strand was keen to rescue a sense of organicism from inanimate forms.

In the mid-1910s and early 1920s (on either side of serving in the US Army Medical Corps as an X-ray technician), Strand spent most of his energy putting into effect his 'brutal directness' to document New York City life. His photograph of 'Wall Street' (1915), for example, on one level portrays just another day in the life of the financial district; however, the photograph depicts a group of figures reduced to little more than silhouettes: no facial features are discernible, and they walk mechanically and in isolation from each other. Long shadows are cast by a restricted light source located outside the frame, and the sombre mood of the photograph is exacerbated by a sequence of gigantic dark windows of Wall Street that loom over the figures. Other photographs from this time are more conventional and lighter in tone, replicating Stieglitz's interest in the interaction between urban and natural forces (such as 'City Hall Park', 1915), but with much closer attention to the abstract shapes conjured up by the developing city. Although Strand photographed nonurban images (such as 'Abstraction, Porch Shadows' and the almost cubist 'Still Life, Pear and Bowls' in a 1916 trip to Twin Lakes, Connecticut), he was deeply engaged with the variety of city life, where European impulses fused with native experiences. Although he spent time photographing working Manhattan, he was also interested in the poor immigrants living in areas such as the Bowery. One of his most haunting images is 'Blind Woman' (1916), depicting an ageing woman with a 'blind' placard around her neck who stares away from the camera without recognition. In a different context, this could be seen as an exploitative image, but Strand had deep respect for his subjects and he spoke of the blind woman's 'absolutely unforgettable and noble face'.

Many of the still images of New York, including 'Wall Street' and 'City Hall Park', were reused in Strand's seven-minute documentary collaboration, Manhatta, with the painter Charles Sheeler (1921). Manhatta pioneered the vogue for city symphonies, leading to documentaries on Berlin, Amsterdam, and Moscow in the 1920s. Strand and Sheeler used Walt Whitman's poetry as a lyrical contrast to the multiple perspectives they deployed to depict a working day in downtown Manhattan. Just as Strand's written statements shift between fascination with the modern city and a critique of new forms of alienation created by urban development, so Manhatta can be read either as a paean to, or a critique of, city life. The plumes of smoke pumped out by boats in the Hudson Bay contrast ironically with the still image of the celestial city that frames Whitman's celebratory lyrics (see Manhatta entry). This interest in textuality resurfaced later in Strand's mid-1940s collaboration with Nancy Newhall, Time in New England (1950), in which written texts were juxtaposed with ninety-four images of New England to create 'a portrait more dynamic than either medium could present alone' (although Strand was not altogether pleased with the result).

From the mid-1920s Strand moved away from New York City as his primary location, taking his 'brutal directness' to other North American scenes, particularly New England, Canada, and the Southwest. He shared an interest with Mexico and the Southwest with Stieglitz's partner Georgia O'Keeffe, but Strand offered a different perspective from O'Keeffe's painterly exuberance. He visited the Southwest regularly between 1930 and 1932, developing location and portrait photographs that retain a directness born out of his urban sensibility, together with a respect for the peoples of the region. Strand also became more radical in the early 1930s, advising the Group Theatre, visiting the Soviet Union (where he met Sergei Eisenstein), and collaborating on the documentary The Plow that Broke the Plains (1935), the first publicly shown federal government documentary that focused on the creation of the Dust Bowl as a result of over-ploughing and the drought of 1929. He shared the photographic credits for the film with Ralph Steiner and Leo Hurwitz under Pare Lorentz's direction. Lorentz had been inspired by Dorothea Lange's photographs of the effects of the Depression and had been commissioned by the Resettlement Administration to document the plight of workers in the Great Plains region. Strand and Hurwitz favoured a script that would cast blame on greedy capitalists, but Lorentz was more moderate in his politics and argued that this would undermine the emphasis on the drought and the 'melodrama of nature'. Strand and Hurwitz spent much of their time taking location shots of dust-storms, with Lorentz working closely with Ralph Steiner on the narrative sections. Although Strand thought that 'the guts had been taken out' of the film, his influence can be seen in the montage of still images (skull, disused machinery, cracked earth, desolate landscape) that heighten the impact of the disaster.

Strand's work on The Plow that Broke the Plains had been preceded by his work on The Wave/Redes, sponsored by the Mexican government, completed in 1934 but not shown in the United States until 1936. The Wave explored the economic problems faced by a fishing village near Vera Cruz, developing Strand's interest in working Mexican life, emphasizing the meagre wage that fishermen receive for a long day's work and the united action of workers. Strand was the chief architect of the film, even though it was directed by Fred Zinnemann. William Alexander argues that one of Strand's photographic signatures is used to great effect in The Wave: a technique in which shots 'begin with a single, posed figure in close-up or medium close-up; movement in the shot then consists of a single movement of the head'. This aesthetic mode was developed in Heart of Spain in 1937, co-edited by Leo Hurwitz, which dealt with the Loyalist fight against Franco. The central focus of Heart of Spain is on the relationship between Spanish peasants and the land, which creates a romantic-poetic drama rather than a narrative-based documentary.

Strand's most important film project was the pro-labor film Native Land in 1942. Once again Strand collaborated with Hurwitz, this time as codirectors, under the label of Frontier Films, which had been formed in 1936 as a development of the Group Theatre project. Frontier Films was 'an independent, nonprofit motion picture organization devoted to the production of realistic depictions of American life' set against Hollywood's emphasis on individualism and sentimentality. The influence of Eisenstein and Dovzhenko is apparent in Native Land, which is filmed in a Soviet documentary style to expose pernicious right-wing forces in America. It was scripted by Ben Maddow and uses Paul Robeson's narrative voice against a panoply of stark images to highlight the perversion of American ideals, the deep-rooted corruption of exploitative capitalists, and the fascism of the Ku Klux Klan. The film is deeply pro-labor and anti-fascist, as emphasized at the end of Robeson's spoken epilogue: 'With the united power of field and factory and arms, we will deliver the blows to crush fascism. For only absolute victory over Hitler and Japan can safeguard our democratic gains and preserve the independence of America.'

Through his film projects, Strand retained his interest in photographic montage, but Native Land is much more impressionistic than Strand's 'straight photography' of the 1910s and 1920s. This shifting style demonstrated that he did not wish to be pigeonholed as an artist who could only work within a single aesthetic mode. His work was much more politicized in the 1930s and 1940s; his involvement in the left-wing film projects of Frontier Films actually led to un-American accusations being levelled against him and the blacklisting of the Photo League in 1947. Strand stood firmly along with photographers, such as Ansel Adams, against the blacklisting, and when the Photo League called a special meeting in December 1947 to discuss what action should be taken, Strand commented defiantly: 'although artists have not in the past wanted to mix art with politics the politicians have already mixed politics in art. So we are now in politics, very much so.' Strand was active in the late 1940s in defending the blacklisted Hollywood Ten, and he joined with the playwright Clifford Odets in June 1949 in calling for a Bill of Rights conference to protest 'the police state methods of certain Army and FBI officials'. The charges against him and the blacklisting of Leo Hurwitz were the main reason why Strand moved to France at the beginning of the 1950s, but these statements on the intermingling of art and politics are a gauge of how far his art had progressed since the 1910s.

Strand turned away from filmmaking after World War II (partly for financial reasons), settling in Orgeval near Paris in 1951 and spending time travelling and photographing in Europe and Africa. The first full Paul Strand exhibition was held in the Museum of Modern Art, New York City in 1945, which was followed by a Strand retrospective at the Philadelphia Museum of Art in 1971, and exhibitions at the New York Metropolitan Museum of Art and the Los Angeles Country Museum in 1973.

MARTIN HALLIWELL

See also: Heart of Spain; Manhatta; Native Land; Plow that Broke the Plains, The

Biography

Born in New York City, October 16, 1890 to middle-class Jewish parents. Attended the private Ethical Culture School from 1904–9, where he was introduced to photography by Lewis W. Hime. First photographs published in 1911. Began correspondence with Alfred Stieglitz in the 1910s; started to visit the 291 Gallery in Manhattan. Began abstract phase of photography in 1916 and was published in Stieglitz's Camera Work. From September 1918 to July 1919 served in the US Army Medical Corps as X-ray technician. Experimented with a movie camera owned by Charles Sheeler and released Manhatta as New York the Magnificent in 1921. Married Rebecca Salsbury in 1922; worked on news and sports coverage and experimented with machine photographs. Freelance work dried up when film industry moved to California and first marriage broke down in 1931; spent time in the Southwest and Mexico 1930–4; visited the Soviet Union in 1935. Worked on documentary films and photography through the 1930s and early 1940s. Married Virginia Stevens in 1935–48 and then Hazel Kingsbury in 1951. Settled in Orgeval, near Paris, in 1951. Frequently exhibited in Europe and America and travelled to Africa in 1960s. Stopped working due to cataracts in 1970s; died at home in Orgeval in 1976.

Selected films

- 1921 Manhatta: codirector and photographer (with Charles Sheeler)
- 1935 The Plow that Broke the Plains: photographer (with Ralph Steiner and Leo Hurwitz)
- 1936 The Wave/Redes: director, producer and photographer (with Augustine V. Chávez, Henwar Rodakiewicz and Fred Zinnemann)

- 1937 Heart of Spain (edited by Paul Strand and Leo Hurwitz)
- 1942 Native Land: codirector and photographer (with Leo Hurwitz)
- 1944 Tomorrow We Fly: photographer

Further reading

- Alexander, William, Film on the Left: American Documentary Film from 1931 to 1942, Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1981.
- Busselle, Rebecca and Stack, Trudy Wilmer (eds), Paul Strand Southwest, New York: Aperture, 2004.
- Crowther, Bosley, 'Native Land, Impassioned and Dramatic Documentary Film on American Civil Liberties', The New York Times, May 12, 1942: 16.
- Hammen, Scott, 'Sheeler and Strand's "Manhatta": A Neglected Masterpiece', Afterimage 6, no. 6, January 1979: 6–7.
- Homer, William Innes, Alfred Stieglitz and the American Avant-Garde, Boston: New York Graphic Society, 1977.
- Horak, Jan-Christopher (ed.), Lovers of Cinema: The First American Film Avant-Garde, 1919–45, Madison, WI: University of Wisconsin Press, 1995.
- MacCann, Richard Dyer, The People's Films: A Political History of U. S. Government Motion Pictures, New York: Hastings House, 1973.
- Newhall, Nancy, Strand: Photographs 1915–45, New York: The Museum of Modern Art, 1945.
- Rosenblum, Naomi, Paul Strand: The Stieglitz Years at 291 (1915–17), New York: Zabriskie Gallery, 1983.
- Strand, Paul, 'Photography', Seven Arts 2, August 1917: 524–25 (reprinted in Camera Work 49–50, June 1917: 3–4; and in Classic Essays on Photography, ed. Alan Trachtenberg, New Haven: Leete's Island Books, 1980: 141–4).
- Time in New England, ed. Nancy Newhall, New York: Oxford University Press, 1950 (reprinted New York: Aperture, 1980).
- Paul Strand: Sixty Years of Photographs, New York: Aperture, 1976.
- Essays on his Life and Work, ed. Maren Stange, New York: Aperture, 1990.
- Whelan, Richard (ed.), Stieglitz on Photography: His Selected Essays and Notes, New York: Aperture, 2000.

Strick, Joseph

During World War II, Strick was a cameraman with the US Army Air Force. After the war he worked with Irving Lerner, jack-of-all-film-crafts, to learn how to make movies, while serving as copyboy at the Los Angeles Times. Together they created the short Muscle Beach (1948), candid impressions of muscle-builders beside the Pacific Ocean in Venice, California. Later Strick became a wealthy businessman, owning a controlling interest in several large electronic corporations, and was able to form a new collaboration that led to The Savage Eye (1959), which he initiated. It was worked on part-time for four or five years, mostly on weekends. Strick's first feature, the most important of his few documentaries, it was an anomaly in many ways.

Made mostly by people who had been on the political left, The Savage Eye attempted to combine a scathing view of current social ills and disorders with the new emphasis on American documentaries on individuals, narrative, and characterization. The film is credited as being 'by' Ben Maddow, Sidney Meyers, and Joseph Strick. Cinematographers are listed as Jack Couffer, Helen Levitt, and Haskell Wexler. The last of these would subsequently become a highly valued Hollywood cameraman (with Academy Awards for Who's Afraid of Virginia Woolf?, 1966, and Bound for Glory, 1976), and also sometime director (Medium Cool, 1969). Two others are listed as 'contributing photographers', but it was said that Strick was responsible for about half the camera work, though he took no cinematography credit. Music is by Leonard Rosenman. Irving Lerner is credited as technical consultant.

The visuals are made up largely of unstaged scenes of the seamier side of Los Angeles: sleazy bars, beauty and massage parlors, wrestling matches, traffic jams, animal cemeteries, addicts and transvestites, strippers and faith healers. All this is seen through the eyes of a recently divorced, alienated, and angry woman (played by Barbara Baxley); hers is 'the savage eye'. As she wanders through these urban settings, she carries on a dialogue with a subjective interlocutor, 'the poet' (voice of Gary Merrill), who introduces himself to her as her 'vile dreamer, conscience, ghost'.

Initially The Savage Eye received a great deal of attention, including several international festival awards. At the Edinburgh International Film Festival, instead of being shown once, as scheduled, it had to be shown eight times to accommodate all those who wanted to see it. Reviewing it in the New York Post (June 7, 1960), Archer Winston concluded: 'The Savage Eye is all of one piece, masterfully, artfully wrought by its three makers, a work that must be recognized as great no matter how unlikable, a film that will be seen for many a year no matter who rejects it now.'

The contrary proved to be the case. It soon fell into virtual obscurity, remembered chiefly as a precursor of cinéma vérité, which was about to begin. Today we are more likely to agree with another critical reaction at the time: 'The fragments of documentary film in themselves are bitterly sure-footed. They show us clearly the irresolute and pernicious side of modern American life. Personally, I would like very much to see this footage combined into another form, without the contrived story and dialogue' (Jackson 1960).

In the 1960s Strick turned away from documentary to a succession of literary adaptations including his controversial version of James Joyce's Ulysses (1967). The only noteworthy exception was Interviews with My Lai Veterans (1970), which he wrote, produced, and directed. It received an Oscar for Best Documentary Short.

JACK C. ELLIS

Biography

Born 1923, in Pittsburgh. Attended University of California at Los Angeles c. 1941–3, until military service as cameraman in the US Army Air Force c. 1943–5. Worked on the Los Angeles Times and then television.

Selected films

- 1948 Muscle Beach
- 1949 Jour de Fête
- 1953 The Big Break
- 1959 The Savage Eye
- 1970 Interviews with My Lai Veterans

Further reading

- Jackson, Benjamin T., 'The Savage Eye', review, Film Quarterly 13, no. 4, summer 1960: 53–7.

Swallow, Norman

Norman Swallow was a pioneer of British documentary television and a leading producer at both the BBC and independent companies. He helped to determine a specific identity for documentary television, which initially was in the thrall of the critically praised traditions in film and radio, developing a more journalistic approach while maintaining the reformist character of the earlier forms. This was evident in his first great achievement, the current affairs series Special Enquiry (1952–6), which each month addressed national problems such as immigration, illiteracy, and slum housing. Swallow was determined to make the programme accessible, ‘to be doing the programme from the point of view of the audience, not from the top down, but from the bottom up. We were not the Establishment. We were not the BBC telling the people what they should think’ (quoted in Bell 1986: 78).

His contribution to current affairs programming continued at the BBC, where he served as assistant editor on the acclaimed Panorama series. In 1963 he joined the thriving commercial channel Granada, based in Manchester, where he produced the influential A Wedding on Saturday (1964). The film was an observational treatment of this family occasion occurring in a Yorkshire mining village. It used the minimum of intervening narration or commentary and won the Prix Italia for its pioneering use of video to record unobtrusively a natural and ordinary event.

Norman Swallow made significant contributions to arts television in Britain, being editor of the celebrated Omnibus series at the BBC in the late 1960s, and acting as head of arts programmes for BBC TV between 1971 and 1974. His status in television documentary was evident in his participation in international coproductions like Ten Days that Shook the World (1967), made with Grigori Alexandrov to mark the fiftieth anniversary of the Soviet Revolution, Lorna Pegram’s and Robert Hughes’s acclaimed Shock of the New (1980), and ambitious series like Television, a detailed history of the medium made for Granada in 1985. He was awarded BAFTA’s Desmond Davis Award for his ‘outstanding creative contribution to television’.

ALAN BURTON

Biography

The son of a headmaster born in Eccles, Lancashire in 1921, educated at the Manchester

Grammar School, and awarded a scholarship to Oxford where he read History and Moral Philosophy. Served in the Duke of Cornwall’s Light Infantry during the war and later in Palestine as an intelligence officer. Joined the BBC in Manchester in 1946 as a radio features producer, transferred to the BBC TV Service at Alexandria Palace in 1950 and was Assistant Head of Films 1957–60. In 1963 moved to Granada TV, but later in the 1960s was back at the BBC working primarily in arts programming. Produced several prestigious series for Granada in the 1970s and 1980s. Died in London on December 5, 2000.

Further reading

Bell, Elaine, ‘The Origins of British Television Documentary: The BBC 1946–55’, in John Corner (ed.), Documentary and the Mass Media, London: Edward Arnold, 1986.

Swallow, Norman, ‘Documentary TV Journalism’, in Paul Rotha (ed.), Television in the Making, London: Focal Press, 1956.

— Factual Television, London: Focal Press, 1966.

Switzerland

Switzerland is one of the few countries in the world where documentary feature films are regularly released in theaters and find an audience. A cinephile country where almost one-third of a total of roughly six hundred screens are located in art house theaters, Switzerland has also been a fertile ground for documentary production for several decades, with theatrical films being shown on television after their initial release and television production of documentaries feeding back into the theatrical market in important ways. Because of the constraints of a domestic market of only seven million divided into three language groups and the reluctance of the country’s famous, and sometimes infamous, financial service industries to invest in a business as unsafe as film production, fiction film production in Switzerland has always been relatively weak, despite occasional peak periods in the war and postwar years, when a domestic popular cinema with its own set of stars and patriotic themes flourished briefly, and in the 1970s and 1980s, when directors such as Alain Tanner, Claude Goretta, and Fredi M. Murer put the Swiss auteur film on the map of the art cinema world.

By contrast, documentary production has been characterized by an impressive continuity both in terms of the quantity and the quality of output. Nonfiction films account for the majority of films produced before the 1960s, and nonfiction film production has served as both the economic backbone of film production in general and as a fertile training ground for both fiction and documentary filmmakers and technicians throughout the decades. Until fairly recently, critics considered documentary as the domain of Swiss German filmmakers, and the fiction film was considered to be the domain of their Swiss French colleagues—a notion, however, that was always rather dubious. Culturally, the strength of the Swiss documentary may also be rooted in the country's strong tradition in pedagogy (Johann Heinrich Pestalozzi, one of the founders of modern pedagogy, was a Swiss school teacher) and in Switzerland's predominantly protestant urban culture, which tends to favor art forms with pedagogical and other useful side effects over those that merely aim to please and entertain.

Although many of the directors working in nonfiction film before the 1960s remain virtually unknown even inside the country—their work has been researched only in recent years—avant-garde filmmakers such as Hans Richter found work in Switzerland directing public service films for state authorities and private companies in the 1930s and 1940s. In the early 1960s the federal government started funding for film production, joining a trend toward similar programs in other European countries. State funding was initially limited to documentary films, a restriction that proved to be productive in the sense that it contributed to the emergence of an auteurist documentary cinema, a tradition of documentaire de création, to cite the French term generally used in the French part of Switzerland that has continued to this day. In fact, conventional film histories suggest that the New Swiss cinema of the 1960s and 1970s began with a series of documentary films produced by such notable figures as Henry Brandt in connection with the Swiss national exhibition in Lausanne in 1964, and with the work of documentarists Walter Marti and Reni Mertens who, after a number of short films, attracted particular notice with Ursula oder das unwerte Leben (1966), a portrait of a handicapped woman.

The year 1964, the same time as the Swiss national exhibition, also saw the production of Siamo Italiani/We are Italians, directed by Alexander J. Seiler, June Kovach, and Rob Gnant, the first feature-length auteur documentary in Swiss cinema. Siamo Italiani focused on the daily lives of Italian immigrant workers in Switzerland and awakened the Swiss public to the presence and the plight of an important migrant workforce in their midst, a migrant workforce that had remained mostly invisible despite its substantial contribution to the country's postwar economic boom. Financed in part with money from the Swiss government, Siamo Italiani was a social documentary in a kind of direct cinema style that signaled a departure for, as well as a departure from, a commercial film production in crisis. If state funding laid part of the groundwork for documentary feature production in Switzerland and the emergence of the New Swiss film, television also played an important role. The contribution of television is particularly evident in the early work of Swiss French filmmakers such as Alain Tanner and Claude Goretta. Formed in the creative climate of 1950s British cinema, where they attracted critical attention with their experimental short Nice Time in 1957, Tanner and Goretta joined Swiss French television TSR on their return to Switzerland in the 1960s to work as documentary filmmakers. In the late 1960s Tanner, Goretta, and a number of their television-trained colleagues, such as Michel Soutter, moved into fiction films and emerged among the figureheads of the New Swiss cinema in the 1970s. The respective careers of Alexander J. Seiler and Alain Tanner are quite typical for the trajectories of Swiss directors in and through the field of documentary. Seiler devoted his entire career to the documentary genre, but Tanner used the documentary as a stepping stone to the feature film and only once returned to the genre after his move into fiction in 1969 with Charles mort ou vif, with Les hommes du port, a documentary about port workers in Genoa harbor from 1995. Like Tanner, other important fiction film directors, such as Fredi M. Murer and Daniel Schmid, made a passage through documentary cinema at one point in their careers. The country's most important experimental filmmaker in the 1960s, Fredi M. Murer, shot Wir Bergler in den Bergen ..., a documentary about three small alpine valleys in his native canton of Uri in 1974. He later developed the material into his fiction film Alpine Fire from 1985, a story of an incestuous relationship between a mute peasant's son and his sister and arguably the most artistically accomplished film ever to come out of Switzerland. Daniel Schmid, a friend and sometime collaborator of German director Rainer Werner Fassbinder in the 1970s, went back and forth between fiction and documentary throughout his career. After a series of fiction films, Schmid turned to documentary in 1984 with Il Bacio di Tosca, a film about a retirement home for opera singers in Milan, and in 1995 he traveled to Japan for the production of The Written Face, a documentary portrait of a male Kabuki actor who specializes in female roles. Both Il Bacio di Tosca and The Written Face count among Schmid's strongest works.

Although Schmid has remained an occasional documentarist, his two films about artists are quite representative of one of the four main strands of documentary filmmaking in Switzerland, the artist documentary. Apart from films about art and artists, the four major strands include a strong tradition of ethnographic documentaries, a continuous output of political documentaries, particularly of films focusing on state authorities and institutions and their procedures, and a more recent, but very strong tradition of filmmaking about migration and the blurring of ethnic and geographical boundaries.

The two major representatives of ethnographic filmmaking in Switzerland are Jacqueline Veuve, a documentary auteur of the first generation and a creator of an important body of work on rural handicraft, and Erich Langjahr, whose films and particularly his peasant trilogy, Sennenballade (1996), Bauernkrieg (1998), and Hirtenreise ins dritte Jahrtausend (2002), chronicle the rapid transformation of rural life in Switzerland over the last twenty-five years. If ethnographic filmmaking in Switzerland focuses on the country's alpine interior rather than on more traditionally 'exotic' (foreign) subjects, this may be read as an indication of the important symbolic charge that rural life carries in Swiss society, despite the fact that farmers now make up only two percent of the working population. Not least under the influence of Jean-Jacques Rousseau, a Swiss native, modern Switzerland has defined itself as a democracy historically rooted in rural self-governance, even at a time when it was the most industrialized country on the continent. According to this somewhat delusional self-definition, what happens to the peasant happens to the country. In addition, in the 1970s, and again in the spirit of Rousseau, critical documentary filmmakers chose rural life as one of the privileged sites in which to locate alternatives to the rampant capitalism of the urban and industrialized parts of the country. Thus many filmmakers sought the remedy to capitalist alienation on the green pastures of the Alps, only to find there more evidence of the destructive forces of capitalism at work. Apart from the films of Jacqueline Veuve and Erich Langjahr, this logic informs, in varying degrees of consciousness, Fredi M. Murer's Wir Bergler in den Bergen ... and another one of the key works of the filmed ethnography of rural life in Switzerland, Beatrice Michel and Hans Stuerm's Gossliwil (1985), a monumental long-term study of one peasant village in the Swiss Mittelland.

Whereas Jacqueline Veuve and Erich Langjahr have stayed true to the ethnographic documentary throughout their careers, few filmmakers have limited themselves to the field of documentaries about artists and art with such consistency. The major example is perhaps Felix Kappeler, whose portraits of artists such as the popular singer-songwriter Mani Matter (2002) have sometimes reached audiences as large as those of Hollywood mainstream films. A number of filmmakers have been active in both documentaries about artists and the political documentary. Hans-Ulrich Schlumpf started out with a portrait of Armand Schulthess (Armand Schulthess—j'ai le téléphone, 1974), a key figure of 'art brut' in the 1970s, and later went on to make Kongress der Pinguine in 1993, an ecologist manifesto about the life of penguins in the Arctic that was one of the major box office successes for Swiss cinema in the 1990s. Richard Dindo, perhaps the best-known documentary filmmaker of his generation outside of Switzerland, has combined political issues with an interest in art and particularly the literary genre of the autobiography in his films, often using literature and painting as a means to approach political topics such as the Holocaust (Charlotte—vie ou theater, 1992, a film about a French Jewish painter who disappeared in the Nazi concentration camps), the Middle East conflict (Genet à Chatila, 1999), or the violent police crackdown on rebellious youths in Switzerland in the 1980s (Dani, Michi, Renato und Max, 1987). Feminist filmmakers have made an important, albeit critically somewhat neglected contribution to the political documentary in Switzerland, with key works such as Gertrud Pinkus Il valore della donna è il suo silenzio (1980) often blurring the boundaries between fiction and nonfiction filmmaking. Working at the crossroads of ethnographic and political documentary, one of the most interesting filmmakers of the 1990s, Thomas Imbach, explored the professional world of bank employees in Well Done in 1994, and the private lives of suburban youths in Ghetto in 1997. Using a distinctly innovative style of serial montage of dialogue and action fragments, the films of Imbach, who has moved on to experimental fiction films since, broke new ground both in terms of documentary aesthetics and subject matter in Swiss documentary and beyond.

Although political documentaries have always formed an important part of documentary production in Switzerland, a number of strongly political films have been among the most important films released in theaters in recent years. Although reflecting a worldwide surge in interest in nonfiction formats and critical documentary films, as witnessed in the global successes of Michael Moore, this trend can also be explained by the emergence of a new generation of documentary filmmakers who replace the dour didacticism of much earlier work in political documentary with a new kind of critical stance that is both penetrating and humorous. Key figures are Sabine Gisiger and Marcel Zwingli, who chronicle the adventures of a group of Swiss would-be terrorists from the 1970s in Do It (2000), and Jean-Stéphane Bron, who casts an ironic look at the Swiss secret service in Connu de nos services (1997), and paints a highly engaging and dramatic portrait of a parliamentary commission at work on a new law on genetic engineering in Le génie helvétique (2003). Continuing a long tradition of documentaries dealing with state authorities and institutions at work, Bron's films found a wide audience, and Le génie helvétique was even picked up by the Swiss foreign ministry to explain the Swiss political system to audiences in emerging democracies (a backhanded compliment of sorts).

Finally, films about migration and the crossing and blurring of ethnic, as well as other boundaries, have formed a major part of Swiss documentary filmmaking in the 1990s. Swiss-Canadian filmmaker Peter Mettler insistently and inspiringly explores geographically and socially marginal spaces in such films such as Picture of Light (1994), and Gambling, Gods and LSD (2002); Andrea Staka, a Swiss-born filmmaker of Bosnian origin, reflects on her condition as an artist in exile in Yugodivas (2000), a group portrait of female artists from the former Yugoslavia living in New York; Samir Jamal Aldin, a Zurich film director and producer, traces his Iraqi family origins in Forget Bagdad (2002); and finally, Gabrielle Baur ventures into world of drag kings in Venus Boyz (2002), a documentary exploration of the boundaries of gender and geography that covers the nightclub scenes of London, New York, and other cities.

If there is anything distinctly Swiss about these films and filmmakers, it is perhaps their shared sensibility for the lives of cultural differences, a sensibility that is easily gained and lost in a society that is in itself composed of a multitude of language groups and cultures.

VINZENZ HEDIGER AND ALEXANDRA SCHNEIDER

Further reading

- For further information and documentation see also www.swissfilms.ch
- Blöchlinger, Brigitte, von Niederhäusern, Claudine, Ganz-Blättler, Ursula and Keil, Erika (eds), Cut: Film- und Videomacherinnen Schweiz von den Anfängen bis 1994: eine Bestandesaufnahme, Basel: Stroemfeld, 1995, Nexus, 11.
- Buache, Freddy, Trente ans de cinéma suisse: 1965–95, Paris: Centre Georges Pompidou, 1995.
- Giger, Bernhard et al., Film in der Schweiz, München: Hanser, 1978.
- Giger, Bernhard and Scherer, Theres (eds), 1957–76—von Nice Time bis Früchte der Arbeit: Materialien zur Entwicklung des Dokumentarfilms in der Schweiz, Bern: Kellerkino, 1977.
- Roth, Wilhelm, Der Dokumentarfilm seit 1960, München: Bucher, 1982.
- Schlappner, Martin and Schaub, Martin, Vergangenheit und Gegenwart des Schweizer Films (1896 bis 1987): eine kritische Wertung, Zürich: Schweizerisches Filmzentrum, 1987.

T

Target for Tonight

(UK, Watt, 1941)

In Target for Tonight, documentary approach and technique was applied for the first time to a feature-length war film. The result was the most commercially successful documentary film of the time.

Unlike Britain Can Take It, Target for Tonight is, in Watt's words, a 'hitting back film'. Unlike the Why We Fight series, it is primarily concerned with people, not battles, and focuses on small groups in operation rather than a vast struggle between right and wrong. Like other British war films, it exalts the sense of mission, not destiny. Undeniably aimed to propagandize, its approach in human terms is congruent with Humphrey Jennings's notion of 'propaganda for the human race'.

An account of a night bombing raid on Germany, Target for Tonight describes the operation as an apparently easy, if carefully planned, procedure. Out of real individuals it creates an anonymous collective hero of unshakeable optimism.

Harry Watt had been previously assigned to direct another Royal Air Force (RAF) film, Squadron 992 (1939), about the work of a balloon squadron, which he found boring. For Target for Tonight, he went through two or three thousand reports of bombing raids. He came to an agreement with the RAF Bomber Command on a script he considered 'utterly straightforward, just the choice of a new small target, the selection of a squadron to bomb it, and the adventures of one bomber, 'F for Freddie', during the raid'. The Mildenhall RAF bomber station (renamed 'Millerton' in the film) had been chosen as the operations base.

Watt greatly valued the use of nonprofessional actors, and he insisted on using the airmen themselves, casting every single one in his own role, from gunners to pilots to officers, up to the Commander-in-Chief. These amateurs proved to be so good that Variety could not believe that they were not actors. Watt also carefully struck a balance of the men's origins: one half of F for Freddie's crew appears to be English; the other three men can be identified as one Scot, one Australian, and one Canadian. Conversely, only two women—of the Women's Auxiliary Air Force (WAAF)—come into view.

The script reproduces the airmen's idiomatic language, with a good amount of humour. The pilot suggests that they should 'go down and smell the breath' of a little German city 'famous for its breweries', or asserts 'the natives appear hostile' as flak bursts around the aircraft.

Shooting on location at Mildenhall started on the second week in April, and the film delivery deadline was mid-summer. Watt and his crew were able to gather documentary footage of the N 149 Squadron and its two-engined Vickers Armstrong Wellington aircraft, but procuring good images of bombing turned out almost impossible because of the lack of film stock sensibility; however, some dramatic shots of F for Freddie flying against the clouds were obtained.

Every interior sequence was made in the studio. The airmen's changing room was reconstructed at Elstree Studios. A sound stage at Denham Studios was converted into a replica of the Operations Room. To convey a sense of action on board the aircraft, the camera and lights had to be placed in a split-up Wellington fuselage. The shots of anti-aircraft guns operated by men in German helmets were provided by the Army Film Unit. Twelve feet of German newsreel material appear in reel four.

Target for Tonight had its premiere in London on July 24 at the Empire Theatre. As early as August 18, two councillors of the Ministry of Information in film distribution, Sidney Bernstein and Arthur Jarratt, left for the United States, carrying a copy of the film. Bernstein came to an agreement with Warner Brothers for its commercial distribution, which turned out to be an enormous success. Fifty million people overall viewed Target for Tonight in the United States. The film made a profit of over £73,000 for the Ministry during the war.

JEAN-LUC LIOULT

See also: Watt, Harry

Target for Tonight (UK, Watt, 1941, 48 mins). Distributed by Warner Bros. Produced by Crown Film Unit and Ministry of Information. Directed by Harry Watt (uncredited). Written by Harry Watt (uncredited). Cinematography by Teddy Catford and Jonah Jones. Edited by Alfred Hitchcock and Stewart McAllister.

Further reading

- Aitken, Ian, 'The Crown Film Unit, 1941–52', in The Documentary Film Movement, An Anthology, Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press, 1998.
- Barsam, Richard M., 'British Films for World War II', in Non-Fiction Film, A Critical History (revised and expanded), Bloomington, IN and Indianapolis, IN: Indiana University Press, 1992.
- Liolult, Jean-Luc, 'Autour de Passage to Marseille : figures du héros de la 2ème guerre mondiale, du mythique au politique, et retour', in Trudy Bolter (ed.), Cinéma anglophone et politique: vers un renouveau du sens, Paris: L'Harmattan, 2007.
- Short, K.R.M., 'RAF Bomber Command's Target for Tonight (1941)', Historical Journal of Film, Radio and Television 17, no. 2, 1997: 181–218.
- Swann, Paul, 'The Documentary Movement during the War, 1939–45', in The British Documentary Film Movement, 1926–46, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1989.

Taylor, John

John Taylor's work in documentary was firmly tied to that of John Grierson, leader of the British documentary movement. To begin with, he was Grierson's brother-in-law, younger brother of Grierson's wife, Margaret. He joined the Empire Marketing Board Film Unit in 1930, shortly after it was formed, at the age of sixteen. His first noteworthy assignment was in 1931, accompanying and assisting Robert Flaherty in the production of Industrial Britain. After that he was loaned to Flaherty in 1932 to assist on Man of Aran; it was said (by Harry Watt, who was also assisting) that Taylor shot more than a little of the footage. After that, in 1933, he went with Basil Wright to serve as his assistant on The Song of Ceylon. While with the General Post Office (GPO) Film Unit Taylor served as cameraman on Housing Problems (1935), made for the British Commercial Gas Association, and on four films that Alberto Cavalcanti made in Switzerland for the GPO and Pro Telephon, Zürich.

When Grierson left the GPO in 1937 Wright also left to form the Realist Film Unit and Taylor joined it shortly thereafter. For Realist he directed The Smoke Menace (1937). The next year Wright left Realist to join Film Centre, a promotional body that Grierson had helped to set up, and Taylor ran Realist from that time on through the war. Realist's most ambitious prewar production was The Londoners (1939), which Taylor wrote and directed.

During the war the government was the sole sponsor of documentary films in Britain, and the Ministry of Information assigned hundreds of nonfiction films on all sorts of subjects to the independent documentary units. For example, Cameramen at War (1943), Atlantic Trawler (1944), and Plastic Surgery in Wartime (1944) were among the forty-seven films assigned to Realist, one of the busiest of the units. Taylor seems to have been credited as producer on all of these. Though he directed a few films of value, his real strengths appear to have been as cinematographer in the early part of his career and producer in the latter part; a steady contributor rather than a star.

After the war Taylor became producer in charge at the Crown Film Unit (in January 1947) and remained in that position until 1949. After Grierson's return to Britain to become head of the Films Division of the Central Office of Information (peacetime equivalent of the Ministry of Information), under which Crown Film Unit came, Taylor was moved to the Colonial Film Unit. After a year he returned to private documentary production. This included involvement with Countryman Films and its biggest success, The Conquest of Everest (1953), most of the profits of which, curiously, went to the government-funded Group 3, which Grierson by then coheaded.

Although these postwar events strained their relationship, Taylor remained close to Grierson. Taylor and his wife, Barbara Mullen, a popular actress (and daughter of Flaherty's cicerone on Aran, Pat Mullen), were the only persons other than his wife Margaret whom Grierson would see in his last days before he died.

JACK C. ELLIS

See also: Flaherty, Robert; Grierson, John; Housing Problems; Industrial Britain; Man of Aran; Song of Ceylon, The; Wright, Basil

Biography

Born 1914, London. Employed: Empire Marketing Board Film Unit, 1930–3; General Post Office (GPO) Film Unit, 1933–7; Realist Film Unit, 1937–47; Crown Film Unit and Colonial Film Unit, 1947–9; private documentary production units from 1949. Most significant productions: assistant on Industrial Britain, Man of Aran, The Song of Ceylon; cinematographer on Pett and Pott, Housing Problems; director on Smoke Menace, The Londoners. Died September 15, 1992 in London.

Further reading

Ellis, Jack C., John Grierson: Life, Contributions, Influence, Carbondale, IL: Southern Illinois University Press, 2000.

Hardy, Forsyth, John Grierson: A Documentary Biography, London: Faber & Faber, 1979.

Rotha, Paul, Documentary Diary: An Informal History of the British Documentary Film, 1928–39, New York: Hill and Wang, 1973.

—Robert J. Flaherty: A Biography, Philadelphia, PA: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1983.

Testimony on Non-Intervention

(UK/Spain, Montagu, 1938)

Testimony on Non-Intervention is one of several films produced by the British Left in response to the Spanish civil war, urging their fellows to protest against it and to support the Popular Front, Spain's democratically elected government, as a buttress against fascism. Though the subject was covered by filmmakers from several countries, in Britain this flurry of films was in large part driven by the communist aristocrat Ivor Montagu. Montagu had been involved with several left-wing film organisations and in March 1935 helped set up the Progressive Film Institute (PFI), which began as a distribution company before moving into production, making several films on the Spanish civil war. The best known of these is The Defence of Madrid (1936), which Montagu directed, but there were also social documentaries such as Spanish ABC, directed by Sidney Cole and Thorold Dickinson (1938) and dealing with the literacy campaign. Other countries also joined in, and Joris Ivens's The Spanish Earth (1937) is particularly famous, perhaps for the participation of Ernest Hemingway. Testimony on Non-Intervention's severe aesthetic, however, has prevented it from becoming popular or even relatively well known, and it fell under the shadow of these other films.

In January 1938 producer/director Montagu arrived in Barcelona with his small PFI crew: cameramen Arthur Graham and Alan Lawson, assistants Philip Leacock and Ray Pitt, and editors Sidney Cole and Thorold Dickinson. They intended to make three films on a range of subjects, but conditions were such that they completed only Spanish ABC, though they did shoot material towards several other projects.

Germany and Italy were among the countries that had agreed not to become involved in the Spanish civil war, but it was clear that troops from both nations were supporting Franco. To show this participation to a wider public, Montagu filmed Italian and German prisoners of war relating their experiences, and back in London used these to make the short Prisoners Prove Intervention in Spain. At the time, and to make the same point, they made Behind the Spanish Lines. Despite its dryness, Prisoners Prove Intervention in Spain was popular and useful in raising funds for Spanish relief, and Montagu returned to the footage almost immediately, drawing on it much more extensively, and within three months released the seven-times longer Testimony on Non-Intervention.

The content of the forty-minute Testimony on Non-Intervention can be easily described: four soldiers (three Italians and a German) are interviewed about their involvement in the Spanish civil war. Questions include how they came to take part and the degree of their nations' involvement. The static camera looks over the questioner's shoulder and edits within the interviews are minimal. Each interview begins with the soldier giving his name and rank, before going on to explain how he came to go to Spain.

The interviews show that rank and file soldiers entered the conflict unwillingly if not in ignorance. One was told that he would be a trainer in an unspecified foreign country, while another reports having volunteered. When the interviewer expresses surprise at this, the prisoner says that 'nonvolunteers' would have been punished. Some Italians were diverted from Africa implying that intervention in Spain was seen as more important than their own conflict in Abyssinia. They continued to think of themselves as Italian and not Spanish soldiers despite being paid by both Italy and Spain, showing the home country's collaboration and underlining the soldiers' uncertain position, as they did not know when they were to be sent home. While Spain is made complicit, Spaniards themselves were used only in menial, non-fighting positions.

Both Germany and Italy provided and exclusively used their own weaponry and transport, though the German prisoner exposes the underhand measures by revealing that the markings on armaments were removed to conceal their provenance. He further says that both 'armies', composed exclusively of men from their respective countries, were kept completely apart, knowing nothing of each others' activities but then, as he notes, 'I'm a nobody'. Despite this, the German thinks that his compatriots are clearly the better fliers.

Testimony of Non-Intervention's antifascist message is particularly pointed by its use of soldiers from Germany and Italy, the other two centres of European fascism, and Franco's natural allies. Unfortunately in doing this it massively simplifies the situation, ignoring splits within 'right' and 'left' and the role of the Catholic Church.

The film clearly attempts to persuade the viewer of its objectivity, with its unblinking camera and catechism of questions; however, even before that, the title, with its echoes of legal process, implies that this is a cinematic court, investigating all the circumstances, a proposal strengthened by the lack of any credits that could remind the viewer of the makers' presence. Yet the title's 'Non-Intervention' is obviously an ironic comment, the film's only moment of lightness, counterbalancing Testimony's 'objectivity'. The format had worked well for Prisoners Prove Intervention, but Testimony's attempts to persuade the viewer of its objectivity quickly becomes boring: the shorter, first film had made the point more concisely. For the monoglot English viewer, the film is rendered even more difficult by the number of exchanges that are completely untranslated, and this must have affected its popularity and effectiveness, if not making people suspect that only those sequences that were politically acceptable were translated.

In 1939 Britain recognised Franco's government and as the wider world situation darkened, British left-wing film circles turned to the wider threat and the home front. Having thoroughly documented the civil war, the PFI moved on, though quickly fell into abeyance.

JOHN RILEY

See also: Montagu, Ivor

Testimony on Non-Intervention (Progressive Film Institute, 1938, 40 mins). Director Ivor Montagu.

Further reading

Dickinson, Thorold, 'Experiences in the Spanish Civil War', Historical Journal of Film Radio and Television 4, no. 2, 1984: 189–94.

Hogenkamp, Bert, Deadly Parallels: Film and the Left in Britain 1929–39, London: Lawrence and Wishart, 1986.

Jones, Stephen G., The British Labour Movement and Film, 1918–39, London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1987.

Thin Blue Line, The

(US, Morris, 1988)

The title of Errol Morris's third film is taken from Doug Mulder's closing arguments in the 1977 capital murder trial of Randall Adams, a 'drifter' accused of shooting Dallas police officer Robert Wood. Mulder referred to law enforcement personnel as the 'thin blue line' protecting law-abiding citizens and ordered society from chaos and crime. This compelling metaphor also serves as the thesis of Morris's self-described 'nonfiction Twilight Zone episode', a piece that marked a simultaneously emerging investment and investigation into reflexivity and performativity within documentary film (and photography) in the late 1980s.

The Thin Blue Line opens with the story of how a chance meeting between two men—twenty-eight-year-old Ohio native Randall Adams and sixteen-year-old Texas teenager David Harris—on November 27, 1976, resulted in both the death of a police officer and the conviction of an innocent man. Morris spends the majority of the film dissecting the multiple players in this crime drama, directing the viewer's attention to they ways in which individuals construct events according to their beliefs and obligations. In an effort to enhance both the contradictory and fragmentary nature of testimony, Morris focuses on three surprise witnesses from the original trial who, under the camera lights, reveal personal stakes in the case that significantly undermine their credibility. It is here that Morris's investment as 'director-detective' appears most clearly on screen, even as his physical presence does not. There is no attempt to disguise the theatrical nature of the interview; the subjects are staged for the camera by the director. 'That unblinking eye in some strange way makes people willing to talk', Morris asserts. It is this staging and its artificiality, argues Morris, that lures the informants into revealing themselves with a kind of complicated honesty that is too often lost in documentary's use of 'natural' surroundings: 'What I do has absolutely nothing to do with cinéma vérité [...] We go in with a lot of equipment, the camera is on a tripod, and the person who speaks to the camera is perfectly aware of what is going on. In some sense, he is performing for the camera' (Dieckmann 1988).

Each eyewitness account is accompanied by a dramatic reenactment. These staples of fictional storytelling appear in this documentary, however, to undermine the veracity of the witnesses without conceding the factuality of the investigation. The original score by Philip Glass pulses underneath the film with an unrelenting theme, punctuated by slight but significant variations in tone or pitch to match the film noir elements (lighting and camera angle specifically) of the reenactments without forfeiting their surrealist qualities to melodramatic emotionalism. Tight close-ups on the neon clock and popcorn popper at a drive-in concession stand, the slow-motion catapult of a chocolate milkshake to the ground, a partial view of the words of a police report, iconic images of the tools of the crime—these details do not culminate, at least not on screen, into a climatic reversal of fortune for the story's hero, Adams. Instead, they are parts of a puzzle whose final image changes depending on who selects and connects them. Slowly, inexorably, the drama that unfolds in The Thin Blue Line exposes how many of the puzzle pieces were reformed during Adams's investigation and trial and forced fit into a predetermined portrait, one created and controlled by the police and prosecutors in their rush to justice for a heinous crime.

The Thin Blue Line straddles multiple narrative categories, a hybridity not lost on critics who struggled with genre-specific language available to them on the film's debut. Morris engages an uncanny mix of styles, because, as the filmmaker himself asserts, the film is not just an investigation of a murder mystery, it is a murder investigation. In light of the evidence he uncovers, Morris himself describes the film as a 'non-fiction feature' in the tradition of Truman Capote's In Cold Blood. For Morris, this documentary pushes the envelope, with its generic expectation of objectivity, focusing instead on the possible rhetorical and aesthetic value of the form. He argues: 'There's no reason why documentaries can't be as personal as fiction filmmaking and bear the imprint of those who made them. Truth isn't guaranteed by style or expression. It isn't guaranteed by anything' (Bates 1989).

Perhaps in response to definitions of the 'postmodern' emerging in cultural theory in the late 1980s as nihilist, anarchist, and apolitical, Morris maintains that his intention, unlike Akira Kurosawa's in Rashomon, a film to which The Thin Blue Line is often compared, was to expose the 'fact of what happened [...] We have access to the world out there. We aren't just prisoners of our own fantasies and dreams. I wanted to make a movie about how truth is difficult to know, not how it's impossible to know' (O'Connor 1989). Morris's very personal and political document engages and embraces the idea that subjectivity, historicity, and cultural predispositions imbue our perception without conceding that this particular form of investigation could uncover a truth capable of 'combating the pernicious scapegoating fictions that can put the wrong man on death row' (Williams 1998).

Many critics assumed that Morris's highly praised film would garner the 1988 Academy Award for Best Documentary, but the film was not even nominated. Writers have speculated that this exclusion was due to any number of factors, including the employment of Morris's footage in Adams's appeals process, his own assessment of the piece as a 'non-fiction feature', the use of stylized reenactments, and subsequent charges of manipulation by informants. Nonetheless, this omission would serve to fuel subsequent debates over documentary film's form, focus, and function. In the year surrounding the release of The Thin Blue Line, other films that extended the boundaries of foundational documentary film principles would appear (for example, Roger and Me, Who Killed Vincent Chin, Tongues Untied, and Surname Viet Given Name Nam), some even gaining both mainstream box office success and Academy Award nominations, reflecting the growing incursion of postmodernist perspectives, politics, and innovations on the 'real' and its documentation.

JULES ODENDAHL-JAMES

See also: Morris, Errol

The Thin Blue Line (US, Third Floor Productions, 1988, 101 mins). Distributed by Miramax Films. Produced by Mark Lipson, Lindsay Law, and Brad Fuller in association with Channel 4 (UK), The Program Development Company and American Playhouse. Directed by Errol Morris. Original score by Philip Glass. Cinematography by Robert Chappell and Stefan Czapsky. Edited by Paul Barnes. Production design by Ted Bafoloukos. Interviews filmed in Dallas, Huntsville, and Vidor, Texas. Reenactments filmed in locations in New York City and New Jersey with Randall Adams played by Adam Goldfine, David Harris played by Derek Horton, Officer Robert Wood played by Ron Thornhill, Officer Teresa Turko played by Marianne Leone. Received following awards: Best Movie of 1988, Washington Post Film Critics Survey; Best Documentary, New York Film Critics Circle, 1988; Best Documentary, National Board of Review, 1988; Best Documentary, International Documentary Association, 1988; Best Documentary, National Society of Film Critics, 1988; Best Documentary, Kansas City Film Critics, 1988; Best Foreign Film, Taiwan International Film Festival, 1988; Best Motion Picture, Edgar Allan Poe Award, 1989; #95 on Premiere magazine's list of '100 Most Daring Films Ever Made', 1998; selected for National Film Registry by National Film Preservation Foundation, 2001.

Further reading

- Barnouw, Dagmar, 'Seeing and Believing: The Thin Blue Line of Documentary Objectivity', Common Knowledge 4, no. 1, 1995: 129–43.
- Bates, Peter, 'Truth Not Guaranteed: An Interview with Errol Morris', Cineaste 17, no. 1, 1989: 16–17.
- Dieckmann, Katherine, 'Private Eye', American Film 8, no. 4, January/February 1988: 32–8.
- McIlroy, Brian, 'Observing and Walking the Thinnest of Lines: Phenomenology, Documentary Film and Errol Morris', Recherches-Semiotiques/Semiotic-Inquiry 13, nos 1–2, 1993: 285–99.
- Michaels, Lloyd, 'The Thin Blue Line and the Limits of Documentary', Post Script: Essays in Film and the Humanities 13, no. 2, 1994: 44–50.
- Nichols, Bill, "'Getting to Know You ...': Knowledge, Power, and the Body", in Michael Renov (ed.), Theorizing Documentary, New York: Routledge, 1993: 174–92.
- O'Connor, John, 'The Film That Challenged "Dr. Death"', The New York Times, May 24, 1989: C22.
- Plantinga, Carl R., Rhetoric and Representation in Non-fiction Film, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1997.
- Sherwin, Richard K., 'Law Frames: Historical Truth and Narrative Necessity in a Criminal Case', Stanford Law Review 47, 1994: 39–83.
- Williams, Linda, 'Mirrors without Memories: Truth, History, and the New Documentary', in Barry Keith Grant and Jeannette Sloniowski (eds), Documenting the Documentary: Close Readings of Documentary Film and Video, Detroit, MI: Wayne State University Press, 1998: 379–96.

Thomas, Antony

Antony (sometimes Anthony) Thomas's documentary films have made a significant contribution to British and American public television broadcasting since the late 1970s. His documentaries are predominantly news-style films produced for television. In the style of public television and investigative documentary filmmaking, his documentaries are characterized by in-depth research, numerous interviews, and a narrator. His films have a Rashomon-esque quality, presenting varying subjective perspectives; he juxtaposes interviews, paces sequences, and includes voice-over narration to create a cohesive argument that reveals his own perspectives through cinematic and editorial techniques. Although his films address a range of topics over several decades, they share one commonality; they deal exclusively with social or political topics contentious at the time of their release. His views on certain issues have changed over time, particularly those on apartheid and South African politics as expressed in The Anatomy of Apartheid (1964), The South African Experience (1977), and the feature film Rhodes: The Life & Legend of Cecil Rhodes (1997). His biases, particularly in his later films, are intentionally transparent, making them best understood within the cultural context of their production. His contribution to documentary film, particularly in the realm of public television, has been to challenge public opinion on controversial topics through his own occasionally contentious stances.

Not shy of debate, his films espouse positions on issues as diverse as celibacy in the Catholic Church, animal rights, issues of genetic predisposition in biology and psychology, and the role of fundamentalism in politics, whether American or Saudi. His 2002–4 film Celibacy presents celibacy as a late Medieval amendment to Catholic doctrine that assures priestly wealth revert to the Church on death, and the film explores the potential relationship of repressed sexuality to the contemporary abuse scandals of the Catholic Church. Fat (1997–8) explores cultural and medical views on obesity that submit to cultural aesthetics and disregard genetic diversity when diagnosing clinical obesity. Twins: The Divided Self (1997), which won eight international awards, probes genetic predispositions for character and intelligence. Winning six prestigious awards, To Love or Kill: Man vs. Animal (1995) reveals human-animal relationships as both loving and gory. Thy Kingdom Come, Thy Will Be Done (1987) links the Christian Right and American politics. Thomas won the US Emmy for Frank Terpil: Portrait of a Dangerous Man (1982), for which he interviewed the ex-CIA agent, who was living in hiding at the time. David Fanning produced this film; he also co-wrote and produced the docudrama Death of a Princess (1979–80), which aired to one of the highest ratings in PBS broadcast history, won The Gold Award at the New York International Festival, and disrupted British-Saudi diplomatic relations. The film reenacts Thomas's investigation of the public execution of a Saudi princess and her lover. The subject matter and docudrama style both provoked debate and criticism; however, the genre choice made it feasible to present explosive subject matter without compromising the safety of Thomas's sources by revealing their identities.

By 1980 Antony Thomas had already demonstrated his affinity for politically transgressive topics. The South African Experience (1977) had exposed the apartheid regime, and earned him both the British Academy Award and prohibition from his home-country, South Africa. The publicity scandal surrounding Death of a Princess, however, irrevocably established both Antony Thomas and co-writer/producer David Fanning as provocative documentary filmmakers. It also established a long-term relationship between Antony Thomas and Frontline, for which Fanning is the cofounder and executive producer. In the vein of public television, the framework within which the majority of his films have been created, Antony Thomas's documentaries are story-driven and pointedly controversial, stimulating debate on and adding liberal nuance to mainstream media representations.

SHEENA WILSON

See also: Death of a Princess

Biography

Born Calcutta, India in 1940. Lived in South Africa between 1946 and 1967. Aged twenty-seven, moved to England. Later banned from South Africa because of political views expressed in The South African Apartheid Experience (1977, trilogy). Continues to reside in Britain. Has won prestigious awards including the George Foster Peabody Award for Twins: The Divided Self (1997), the Grierson Award for Best British Documentary for Man and Animal (1995), an Emmy for Frank Terpil—Portrait of a Dangerous Man (1982), and the British Academy Award for his trilogy The South African Experience (1977). Since the 1994 fall of apartheid has been able to return to South Africa, which provided a rich backdrop for the six part historical feature film Rhodes: The Life & Legend of Cecil Rhodes (1997), and the two-part documentary The Real Olympics (2002–4). Continues to write, direct, and produce TV documentaries that are aired internationally on PBS, HBO (United States), ITV, BBC, CBC (Britain & Canada), Televisio Valencia (Spain), Odeseia (Spain & Portugal), Yes TV (Israel), ATV (Hong Kong), and SABC (South Africa). His portfolio also includes non-documentary films and he is the author of Rhodes (1996) and co-author of The Arab Experience (1975).

Selected films

- 1964 The Anatomy of Apartheid: director
- 1970 A Touch of Churchill, A Touch of Hitler (The Life of Cecil Rhodes); director
- 1977 The South African Experience (trilogy): director, producer
- 1979–80 Death of a Princess: writer, director
- 1982 Frank Terpil: Portrait of a Dangerous Man
- 1987 Thy Kingdom Come, Thy Will be Done (two parts): director
- 1990 Never Say Die: The Pursuit of Eternal Youth (UK title: Heaven Must Wait)
- 1994 By Satan Possessed: The Search for the Devil (UK title: In Satan's Name)
- 1995 To Love or Kill: Man vs. Animal (UK title: Man & Animal)
- 1996 Between Life and Death
- 1997 Twins: The Divided Self
- 1997–8 Fat (six-part series)
- 1999–2000 A Question of Miracles (UK title: Miracles): writer
- 2002–4 The Real Olympics (UK title: The Ancient Greek Olympics) (two parts)
- 2004 Celibacy (UK title: Flesh and the Devil): director

Further reading

- Bullert, B.J., Public Television Politics and the Battle Over Documentary Film, New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 1997.
- Burns, James, 'Biopics and Politics: The Making and the Unmaking of the Rhodes Movies', Biography 23, no. 1, 2000: 108–26.
- Hees, Edwin, "'Truly, the Ways of the White Man Are Strange': Tribal Utopianism in Two South African Propaganda Films", South African Theatre Journal: SATJ 5, no. 1, 1991: 74–97.
- Pfaff, Françoise, Focus on African Films, Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press, 2004.
- Rosenthal, Alan (ed.), Why Docudrama? Fact-Fiction on Film and TV, Carbondale, IL: Southern Illinois University Press, 1999.

Thomson, Margaret

Margaret Thomson's prolific instructional filmmaking career, like many of her female contemporaries in the nonfiction sector, has been neglected in most histories of documentary film. Thomson worked more or less continuously in instructional filmmaking for more than forty years. Arriving in Britain from New Zealand in 1934 with a degree in zoology, she started her film career at Bruce Woolfe's Gaumont-British Instructional. After a year in the library shot listing films, she was offered a series of her own, and in 1936–7 she directed six educational films examining different ecosystems in Britain. These films were in the tradition of the Secrets of Nature series using animation, diagrams, and macro-photography as well as actuality footage and proved an excellent training ground for Thomson; however, the film industry slump in 1938 found Thomson out of work. For the next three years she did a variety of jobs both in and out of the film industry including editing for various documentary units, making travelogues with Marion Grierson for the Trade and Industrial Development Association, teaching English in Spain, and beginning to retrain as an electrician.

In 1941 Thomson found regular work at the Realist Film Unit making instructional films as part of the wartime Home Front propaganda campaign, mainly for nontheatrical distribution. Her first six films, made for the Dig for Victory campaign, illustrate the basic skills required to work an allotment, and store, produce, and maintain gardening tools. Later films were made for specialised audiences such as the farming community and introduced new farming methods, showcased traditional crafts, and exemplified ways of increasing yields. Thomson also made four films about anaesthesia for medical undergraduates. Considering the diversity of the subject matter, all of the films are characterised by their visual simplicity, clear instruction, and ability to relay complex information to the audience in a clear, nonpatronising way.

After the war, Thomson produced two children's hygiene films, but she returned to directing to make two recruitment films for the Ministry of Education, Children Learning by Experience (1946) and Children Growing Up with Other People (1947). She filmed children playing on London's bomb sites and in parks and said that she tried not to intrude on the children's environment, allowing shots to run longer than normal to consider the significance of the children's behaviour. She believed this to be an early example of the cinéma vérité style. In 1948 she returned to New Zealand where she directed several cinemagazines for the New Zealand Film Unit before coming back to work for the Crown Film Unit in Britain in 1950. In 1953 she made a fiction film for children, Child's Play, which was funded by the government-backed feature unit Group 3. After several years as a children's acting coach at Pinewood Studios, she returned to nonfiction filmmaking, directing industrial and government-sponsored medical films, including several for the Coal Board, until she retired in 1977.

SARAH EASEN

Biography

Born Australia, 1910 and educated in New Zealand. Emigrated to Britain in 1934. Film librarian, Gaumont-British Instructional 1938. Director, Gaumont-British Instructional 1936–37. Freelance cutter, 1938. Director, editor, and producer, Travel and Industrial Development Association; New Zealand Trade and Industrial Development Association 1939. Director, Realist Film Unit, 1941–7. Director, New Zealand Film Unit, 1948–9. Director, Crown Film Unit, 1950–1. Director, Group 3, 1954. Children's acting coach, Pinewood Studios, 1954. Director, various production companies, 1955–77. Died December 30, 2005.

Selected films

- 1936–7 Chalk Downlands, Meadowlands, Moorlands, Oakwoods, Salt Marshes, Healthlands
- 1941 Cultivation, Storing Vegetables Indoors, Storing Vegetables Outdoors
- 1942 Clamping Potatoes, Hedging, Ditching, Making a Compost Heap, Garden Tools
- 1943 Clean Milk, Making Good Hay, Making Grass Silage, Re-seeding for Better Grass, Save Your Own Seeds
- 1944 The Technique of Anaesthesia (series): director of four of the eleven films in the series

- 1945 Your Children's Ears, Your Children's Eyes, Your Children's Teeth: producer
- 1946–7 Children Learning by Experience, Children Growing Up with Other People
- 1948–9 Cinemagazines for the New Zealand Film Unit
- 1950–1 A Family Affair, Cross-infection in Children's Wards No. 1 and No. 2
- 1954 Friend of the Family
- 1955–6 Continuous Observation of a Depressed Patient, Understanding Aggression
- 1957 Yorkshire Imperial on Thames, Yorkshire Imperial Way With Water
- 1960s Medical training films for the nursing profession
- 1967–77 Coal Board filmstrips, TB: The Forgotten Disease, Margin of Safety

Three Songs About Lenin

(USSR, Vertov, 1934)

Contemporary Western film scholars typically consider Soviet director Dziga Vertov's Tri pesni o Lenine/Three Songs about Lenin less important than his reflexive masterpiece Chelovek s kinoapparatom/Man with the Movie Camera (1929). In the Soviet Union, however, Three Songs about Lenin represented the more acceptable face of Vertov's work, even though the director himself continued to be regarded with suspicion by the cinema authorities because of his modernist leanings. Although hampered by considerable difficulties during its production and initial distribution, Three Songs about Lenin earned Vertov the Order of the Red Star and was endorsed by film industry chief Boris Shumyatksy as an improvement on his earlier work. The film was reedited in 1938 to include additional material favouring Stalin. The hundredth anniversary of Lenin's birth in 1970 saw a version closer to the original print restored by Vertov's editor, Elizaveta Svilova. Whatever its aesthetic value, Three Songs about Lenin was more central to Soviet cultural history than Man with the Movie Camera.

Three Songs about Lenin, produced to mark the tenth anniversary of Lenin's death, documents his funeral and includes shots of him working, meeting people, and giving speeches.

In an attempt to document how Leninism has enabled the country to progress in the intervening ten years, the film represents the liberation of Soviet Asian women and industrial achievements of the First Five-Year Plan in diverse parts of the Soviet Union. There is, of course, no indication of the scale of coercion and sacrifice involved. Footage from the civil war is also included to remind viewers of the momentous struggle to secure the revolution.

Like Shestaya chast' mira/One Sixth of the Earth (Dziga Vertov, 1926), Three Songs about Lenin was an ambitious undertaking, combining library footage with new material shot across a vast geographical area. Three Songs about Lenin's cinematography is less distinguished than Man with the Movie Camera's; the earlier film's outstanding cameraman Mikhail Kaufman had left Vertov's group to direct his own documentaries. Svilova painstakingly trawled through archives and collated fragments of newsreel film of Lenin to construct a fuller cinematic record of the revered leader's public activities than had previously been possible. Similarly, sound engineer Shtro reconstructed part of a Lenin speech for the film. According to Vertov's diaries, this arduous work was constantly disrupted by a lack of support and resources during production and attacks from opponents critical of his conception of documentary film. Finally, there were difficulties getting the completed film distributed.

Contemporary Western film scholars tend to dismiss Three Songs about Lenin not only on aesthetic grounds but also because they see it as a wholesale capitulation to Stalinism and the pseudo-religious Lenin cult (Michelson 1992). These retrospective judgements need to be carefully contextualised. From a Stalinist perspective, one of the film's shortcomings was the initial lack of prominence it gave to Stalin. Also problematic is the stridency of the Lenin speech heard midway through the film and reiterated on revolving intertitles near the end. 'The landowners and capitalists, destroyed in Russia, will be defeated throughout the world' was inconsistent with mid-1930s Soviet foreign policy as it moved toward its more conciliatory Popular Front phase (Roberts 1999). Three Songs about Lenin highlights how there was some scope within the Lenin cult for emphasising different aspects of his political legacy. Equally, a limited range of different perspectives on Lenin himself was possible. This film stresses Lenin's exemplary humanity, industriousness, and unpretentiousness—his status as a role model for good Soviet citizens—rather than just his deification.

Vertov saw Three Songs about Lenin as a continuation of his ongoing kino-eye and, after the coming of sound, radio-eye experiment to develop an international film language. It can be seen and listened to as one of the last examples of early European film modernism. Vertov wanted to develop a film practice that would facilitate communication between workers in geographically disparate locations. Three Songs about Lenin represents their unity and, according to Vertov, the film's combination of sounds and images achieved a 'crystalline' purity of universal accessibility (Michelson 1984). Thus, even if the spoken language of the industrial and collective farm workers and engineer who address the camera directly towards the end of the film is not translated, their gestures and facial expressions enable them to be understood within its overall context.

As the film's title suggests, it is primarily structured around various types of music rather than interviews or voice-over narration. Folk songs sung by Soviet Asian women subdivide the film, moving gradually from lamenting their oppression in the first song, to sorrow at Lenin's death in the second, to optimism in the third. Two other types of music also feature significantly; nineteenth-century classical at Lenin's funeral, and Yuri Shaporin's modern Soviet 'The March of the Shock Workers,' written specially for the film. Shaporin's composition dominates the soundtrack whenever intense productive activity is represented, particularly the final section's images of coal transportation, steel works, and newly constructed factories, canals, and dams. Ultimately, Shaporin's music is the sound of the future in Three Songs about Lenin.

Three Songs about Lenin was quite well received by Soviet and Western audiences in the 1930s, gaining plaudits from luminaries as diverse as Walter Benjamin and Cecil B. de Mille. The documentary Turksib (Viktor Turin, USSR, 1929) had scored a similar success several years earlier. What the two films share is a basic ideological contrast between progressive modernity and the backward East that cuts across Soviet–Western differences. In its representation of primitive, stagnant Islamic cultures and veiled women, Three Songs about Lenin taps into a fund of imagery familiar to other European imperial cultures (Stollery 2000). Revealingly, the film's most blatant transgressions of Vertov's commitment to filming 'life caught unawares' occur in shots underwriting the notion that Soviet power in Central Asia constitutes liberation and not domination. Early in the film women unveil and smile at the camera. Later on close-ups of their eyes signify sadness at Lenin's death and the new Leninist vision they have attained. These are carefully lit, manifestly staged images rather than any kind of documentary record of reality.

MARTIN STOLLERY

See also: Vertov, Dziga

Three Songs about Lenin (USSR, Mezhrabpomfilm, 1934). Direction and scenario by Dziga Vertov. Edited by Elizaveta Svilova. Assisted by Ilya Kopalín, Semiramida Pumpyanskaya. Cinematography by Mark Magidson, Bentsion Monastyrsky, Dmitri Surensky. Sound by Pyotr Shtro. Music by Yuri Shaporin. Filmed in Turkmenistan, Uzbekistan, Azerbaijan, and elsewhere in the Soviet Union.

Further reading

- Leyda, Jay, Kino: A History of the Russian and Soviet Film, London: George Allen and Unwin, 1983.
- Michelson, Annette, 'The Kinetic Icon in the Work of Mourning', in Anna Lawton (ed.), The Red Screen, London: Routledge, 1992: 113–31.
- (ed.), Kino-Eye: The Writings of Dziga Vertov, London: Pluto Press, 1984.
- n.a., 'Intertitles to Three Songs of Lenin', October 52, 1990: 40–51.
- Petric, Vlada, 'Vertov, Lenin and Perestroika: The Cinematic Transposition of Reality', in Charles Warrent (ed.), Beyond Documents: Essays on the Non-fiction Film, Hanover, NH: University Press of New England, 1996: 271–94.
- Roberts, Graham, Forward Soviet! History and Non-fiction Film in the USSR, London: I.B. Tauris, 1999.
- Stollery, Martin, Alternative Empires: European Modernist Cinemas and Cultures of Imperialism, Exeter: University of Exeter Press, 2000.
- Taylor, Richard, Film Propaganda: Soviet Russia and Nazi Germany, London: I.B. Tauris, 1998.
- Taylor, Richard and Christie, Ian (eds), The Film Factory: Russian and Soviet Cinema in Documents 1896–1939, London: Routledge, 1988.
- Tumarkin, Nina, Lenin Lives!: The Cult of Lenin in Soviet Russia, Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1997.

Youngblood, Denise, Soviet Cinema in the Silent Era, 1918–35, Austin, TX: University of Texas Press, 1991.

Times of Harvey Milk, The

(US, Epstein, 1984)

On November 27, 1978, Dan White climbed through a window into San Francisco City Hall and shot to death Supervisor Harvey Milk and Mayor George Moscone. White fired eight times at Moscone, reloaded his gun, and then went down a hallway and emptied it again into Harvey Milk. The deaths shocked the city and its gay community. With the killing, Milk had become the modern gay movement's first martyr (Benson 1984: 1).

Dan White was an embittered ex-supervisor who had resigned and then wanted his job back. Moscone, backed by Milk, refused to have him reinstated. The rejection precipitated the murders. White had resigned because of the defeat of Proposition 6, an amendment that barred gays and lesbians from employment in California public schools.

The planned documentary was originally to focus on White. However, director and coproducer Robert Epstein found White uninteresting. 'The more we got into the story', Epstein said, 'the more rich it became as to what it represented—which was trying to better humanity. Harvey Milk was really trying to do something positive' (Smith 1985: 1). This shift in focus resulted in The Times of Harvey Milk, a ninety-minute portrait of San Francisco's first openly gay elected official. Shot in 16mm, the documentary took six years and cost $300,000 to make.

Narrated by Harvey Fierstein, the documentary opens with news footage. Included are the gurneys carrying the bodies of Milk and Moscone, the attempt to capture Dan White, and the tearful press announcement by supervisor (now senator) Diane Feinstein of the murders. The footage was on-the-scene coverage, as the story unfolded, adding to its drama.

The film then turns to the years leading up to the murders. While some of Milk's youth is disclosed, the filmmakers focus on his emergence as a political leader. The viewer sees Milk transformed from a quirky ex-hippy into a savvy, polished politician who advocated for gay and minority rights, senior citizen rights, and rent control. One of his first political challenges came after California State Senator John Briggs introduced Proposition 6 onto the State ballot. It was intended to ban all openly gay people from working in the public school system, playing on parents' fears that their children might hold up gay people as role models or be molested by them. Milk debated Briggs and is credited with helping to defeat the measure, which for a time seemed certain to pass. Milk's stature and reputation grew.

The film's closing scenes are powerful. The filmmakers recorded a silent candlelight walk by forty thousand people held on the evening of Milk and Moscone's deaths. The film then moves ahead six months when White is found guilty, not of murder, but of the lesser charge of involuntary manslaughter. His defense attorney argued that White had become deranged by eating too much junk food, which became known as the 'Twinkie defense'. The verdict caused a riot in San Francisco. City Hall was stormed, and six police cars were burned.

White served five and a half years of his seven-year sentence. He received no psychiatric treatment. In October 1985, nearly two years after his release, White committed suicide.

The film's structure includes segments focusing on eight San Francisco men and women, both heterosexual and homosexual, who each talk about how Harvey Milk affected their lives. One of the more poignant remarks of the eight is spoken by Jim Elliot, a machinist and secretary of a local union. When he first met Milk, and heard he was gay, Elliot wondered how he was 'gonna go back to these guys at the union and tell them that we're supporting a fruit?' Then Elliot goes on to say, 'But as I listened to him, you realized that he wasn't only for gay rights. He was for anything that affected little people'.

The film does not examine Dan White's character or trial in any depth. Some critics considered this one of the film's few weaknesses. Other than this, the film's critics were nearly unanimous in their praise for this 'extraordinarily wise and sensitive' film (Mathews 1984).

Although eloquently partisan, the film is much more than a 'gay' film. It is a positive story about one man who made a difference in the lives of others. The film is a triumph of democratic hope. As many have said, the story is not about gay rights, but human rights.

The Times of Harvey Milk (US, Black Sand Productions/Pacific Arts, 1984, 90 mins). Distributed by New Yorker Films and TC Films International. Directed by Rob Epstein. Written by Judith Coburn and Carter Wilson. Academy Award Winner: Best Feature. New York Film Critics Circle Award: Best Documentary. Three National Emmy Awards.

Further reading

- Benson, Shiela, 'The Times of Harvey Milk', Los Angeles Times, November 2, 1984: 1.
Galbraith, Stuart, IV, 'The Times of Harvey Milk', www.dvdtalk.com/reviews/read, 2, n.d.
Mathews, Jack, 'Hollywood', USA Today, October 16, 1984.
n.a., 'The Times of Harvey Milk', The New York Times, October 28, 1984.
Smith, Lynn, 'Harvey Milk Film—Pride, Sorrow: UCI Presentation of Honored Picture Triggers Emotions' (Orange County Edition), Los Angeles Times, October 31, 1985: 1.

Tire Dié

(Argentina, Birri, 1956, 1959)

Tire dié/Throw Me a Dime is considered to be the most important documentary short from Latin America. It was made collaboratively between Argentine filmmaker Fernando Birri and his students at the Documentary School of Santa Fé at the University of Litoral (Santa Fé, Argentina), the first school of its kind in Latin America. Tire dié is a thirty-three-minute document of poor children in Santa Fé, (a city in a northern province of Argentina) where a mode of survival is for the children to await passing trains, balance precariously on the elevated tracks, and to run alongside the trains, begging for small change by shouting 'Tire dié! Tire dié!' (throw me a dime).

On its release in 1958, the film marked the entrance of an Italian neorealist-inspired political filmmaking that was to indelibly mark the landscape of Latin American film production from the late 1950s to the 1970s. Dubbed the New Latin American Cinema movement, these films documented and exposed the economic, social, and political disparities in Latin America, often made absent in the studio-made films from the 1940s and 1950s. Fernando Birri was trained at the prestigious film school, the Centro Sperimentale in Rome, where he worked as an assistant to Zavattini and De Sica. There he was inspired by neorealism, or what he described as ‘the tenderness of the Italian films that in a simple manner document the everyday’ (Sendros 1994). On returning to Argentina and seeing the lack of infrastructure for filmmaking, coupled with the harsh reality of poverty, Birri resolved to make what he dubbed a ‘cinema of underdevelopment’. He condemned apolitical cinema in a manifesto by stating that ‘one must place oneself face to face with the reality with a camera and document it, document underdevelopment [...] Cinema which makes itself an accomplice of that underdevelopment is sub-cinema’ (Birri 1987).

Figure 19 Tire Dié, 1956, 1959 (Courtesy of the British Film Institute)

Tire dié is a landmark film because of the direct, honest, and gritty portrayal of its subject matter, but it was also important in terms of the production process. Birri worked with two borrowed film cameras and nonprofessional sound recording devices. Birri's aim was to make films despite the lack of infrastructure and financing, because he felt that social problems were important to make visible vis-à-vis the cinema. His philosophy of making films under difficult circumstances and not for commercial profit would not be labeled until the late 1960s with the term an imperfect cinema (un cine imperfecto), coined by Cuban filmmaker Julio García Espinosa.

Birri's class of eighty students was split up into various groups to spend time with the subjects in a riverside squatters' community. Birri described the making of the film:

Tíre dié was the product of constant, ongoing discussion. During that two-year period [that the film took to complete], we went almost every afternoon to the river flats to film. We went to observe and understand and exchange ideas with the people who lived there, but we ended up sharing their lives. The film became secondary to the interpersonal relationships that developed between us.

(Burton 1986: 6)

The film opens with an aerial shot of Santa Fé. The voice-over narration that accompanies these shots of the city describes in a matter-of-fact manner the typical information one would ascribe to a traditional documentary (for example, geographic location, population). As Julianne Burton observes:

As conventional descriptive data give way to the less conventional (statistics concerning the number of streetlamps and hairdressers) the parodistic becomes clear. As the houses give way to shanties, the narrator declares, 'Upon reaching the edge of the city proper, statistics become uncertain. This is where, between four and five in the afternoon during 1956, 1957, and 1958, the following social survey film was shot.'

(Burton 2000)

Birri and his students first spent time documenting the children and their families with a still camera and a tape recorder and then later transformed the photo documentary into a film.

The film project was first cut as a sixty-minute version. During the premiere of the film in Santa Fé, a cross-section of the population numbering four thousand in total filled the university theatre. Present were the subjects of the film along with the filmmakers, the children of the slums and their parents, along with the student filmmakers. In addition, university and city officials and film critics were in attendance. The film met with an enthusiastic crowd and was replayed three times that evening for the same audience. After the screening, hundreds of questionnaires were given out, and consultations were done with the film subjects about which parts were effective, and why. Through this collaboration to some extent the film advocated for the problems of the poor in Santa Fé. Moreover, it served as a model of collaborative filmmaking, one in which subjects determined, to some extent, how they were being represented.

The result was a more concise, thirty-three-minute version replete with a new voice track. Two revered film actors of the time, Francisco Petrone and Maria Rosa Gallo were asked to speak over the voices in the film that were poorly recorded. According to Birri and his student filmmakers, the point was not to dub over what people were saying, but rather to have the actors' additional vocal support for the subjects. Some critics have charged that this voice-over approach ultimately undermined the original intent of the film's democratic agenda. Although this may have altered the objective of having a marginalized community speak for itself, it worked on a practical level to vastly improve the sound quality of the original film. Inadvertently, it provided increased opportunities for the film to be screened outside of local settings.

The film was shown at film festivals in Argentina and Uruguay, and it circulated throughout the provinces of Argentina via a rudimentary mobile cinema van that provided a no-cost viewing opportunity for poor residents. This was especially important in areas with an absence of movie theatres.

Tíre dié is a groundbreaking film and has significant historical importance in the annals of Latin American film scholarship. Despite its great influence, however, the film is practically impossible to see, in Latin America included. As Julianne Burton points out, 'most viewers know only the fragment presented in Fernando Solanas and Octavio Getino's three-part documentary on Argentine politics, The Hour of the Furnaces (La hora de los hornos) (1969)' (Burton 2000). Nonetheless, Tire dié epitomized and served as a template for the continent-wide movement of political filmmaking in Latin America through the late 1970s.

TAMARA L. FALICOV

See also: Hour of the Furnaces, The Tire dié (first version) (Argentina, 1956, 60 mins). Produced by the Institute of Cinema of the National University of the Litoral. Directed by Fernando Birri and students Hugo Abad, Blanca C. de Brasco, Eduardo Ates, Elena de Azcuenaga, Cesar Caprio, Manuel Horacio Gimenez, Rodolfo Neder, Juan Oliva, Carlos Pais, Ninfa Pajon, Eduardo Pallero, Jose M. Paolantonio, Jorge Planas, Viader y Enrique Urteaga. Script, Birri and above-mentioned students. Narrator, Alfredo Daniel Carrio; Editor, Antonio Ripoll; Sound, Leopoldo Orlazi; Film stock, black and white, 16mm film, developed at Alex Laboratories. Shot in Santa Fé, Argentina.

Tire dié (second, more widely released version) (Argentina, 1959, 33 mins). Distributed by Argentina Sono Film. Produced by the Institute of Cinema of the National University of the Litoral. Produced, scripted and directed by the above-mentioned people. Voices, Francisco Petrone, Maria Rosa Gallo. Narrator, Guillermo Cervantes Luro. Assistant Director, Manuel Horacio Gimenez; Sound, Mario Fezia; Rerecording, Argentina Sono Film; Film stock, transferred to black and white, 35mm. Shot in Santa Fé, Argentina. Awarded the following: Grand Prize for the Best Short Film, SODRE festival, Montevideo, Uruguay (1956); Grand Prize for the Special Jury Selection, 4th International Documentary and Experimental Film Festival of Montevideo, Uruguay (1956); Special Prize at the Educational Film Festival in the Province of Buenos Aires (1962).

Further reading

- Birri, Fernando, La escuela documental de Santa Fe, Santa Fe: Editorial Documento del Instituto de Cinematografía de la UNL, 1964.
- Pionero y peregrino, Buenos Aires: Editorial Contrapunto, 1987.
- Burton, Julianne, Cinema and Social Change: Conversations with Filmmakers, Austin, TX: University of Texas Press, 1986.

— The Social Documentary in Latin America, Pittsburgh: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1990.

— 'Tire dié', in Sara Pendergast and Tom Pendergast (eds), International Dictionary of Films and Filmmakers, Vol. 1, Detroit, MI: St James Press, 2000: 215–17.

Pick, Zuzana, The New Latin American Cinema: A Continental Project, Austin, TX: University of Texas Press, 1993.

Sendros, Parana, Fernando Birri, Buenos Aires: Centro Editor de America Latina con el Instituto Nacional de Cinematografía, 1994.

Titicut Follies

(US, Wiseman, 1967)

Filmed from April to June 1966, over twenty-nine days, and culled from forty hours of material, Titicut Follies would lay the foundation for Frederick Wiseman's vision of documentary film, with its observational shooting style and exclusion of voice-over narration. Wiseman and codirector James Marshall captured the day-to-day routine of the patients, guards, and care staff at the Massachusetts Correctional Institution at Bridgewater. The facility, designed to hold both criminal offenders and nonthreatening psychiatric patients admitted for observation, was selected by Wiseman because of his familiarity with Bridgewater and its superintendent, Charles Gaughan, after visits made by the filmmaker as part of summer seminars during his time as a law instructor at Boston University during the late 1950s. An indictment of the practices captured on film at Bridgewater is never explicitly stated, but it is clear that the filmmakers take issue with the treatment of the patients.

Titicut Follies will likely be remembered as much for its content as for the stories surrounding both its production and its troubled release. With his portrait of the patients at the MCI Bridgewater, first-time filmmaker Wiseman presented audiences with a controversial glimpse inside the state-funded facility and was met with both harsh criticism and praise. The film was banned in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts for twenty-four years for reasons pertaining to the issue of informed consent with regard to the patients and their appearance in the film and, secondarily, the right of the state to approve of the finished film. Commercial screenings did occur outside of the Commonwealth after several other state Supreme Courts refused to ban the film: Titicut Follies' first public showing occurred at the 1967 New York Film Festival. All screenings within Massachusetts during that period, however, were required to meet strict regulations related to the nature of the viewing audiences. Only students and professionals in fields related to the concerns of the film were permitted to view Titicut Follies, and the screenings were not open to the general public. Its first national television broadcast did not occur until 1993. As the only film ever censored in the United States for reasons other than national security or obscenity, the legacy of Titicut Follies and its status as a canonical non-fiction film is tied to these issues of censorship and documentary ethics.

From daily cell inspections that reveal the startling conditions of the facility, to conversations between guards and patients that reveal the human side of Bridgewater (particularly senior correction guard Edward Pacheco who figures prominently throughout the film), the lives of the men at the institution are observed with a cool detachment rarely inflected by a humanist concern. That is not to suggest that Titicut Follies should be considered an attempt to objectively present life at the institution; the creative rendering of events at Bridgewater through Wiseman's editing confirms the constructed nature of the film's central narrative, thus fracturing any notion of a strictly observational positioning. Sequences spotlighting specific patients seem designed to promote sympathy and identification with the men, a viewer position presumably shared by Wiseman.

The sequence for which Titicut Follies is best remembered is the most stylized of the film and illustrates Wiseman's subjective construction of the text. It involves the tube-feeding of an aged and starving patient and offers one of Wiseman's most direct attacks on the senior staff at Bridgewater. Repeated scans of the patient's body as the chief medical officer inserts a rubber tube into his nostril are cross-cut with images of a mortician prepping a corpse for embalming. The intensity of these inserts increases during the feeding until the corpse, dressed and placed behind the steel door of a morgue storage compartment, is positively identified as the force-fed man. Throughout Titicut Follies, Wiseman casts particular members of Bridgewater's senior staff in a suspect light while patients appear as victims; in this case, it is with the inclusion of footage clearly detailing the doctor's disregard for the patient as he carelessly inserts the feeding tube well beyond the safety threshold indicated by a white marker. The doctor, smoking a cigarette with its ash dangling over the patient's head, notices his error only after an assisting guard points it out to him. It is this type of parallel editing system that would be further developed in Wiseman's subsequent work and operates as a virtual commentary guiding the viewer through the narrative, absent in its conventional documentary form of voice-over commentary.

That James Marshall acted as director of photography while Wiseman handled the sync-sound recording equipment not only indicates the magnitude of the role Marshall played in the production, but also suggests the importance of sound in Wiseman's representation of life at Bridgewater. All through Titicut Follies, Wiseman bridges distinct segments of the film with a lapse in the synchronous soundtrack. The result not only suggests a temporal and spatial linearity of the presentation, but comments on the manic sonic environment of the facility. This privileging of the sonic space of the profilmic location greatly informs Wiseman's representation of reality.

Described by some as a film that created one set of social problems as it sought to alleviate another, the production of Titicut Follies, its exhibition, and its trials raise crucial issues about the relation of social documentary to its subjects and audiences (Anderson and Benson 1991). As is the case with all of his films, Wiseman is the sole distributor of the film through his own company, Zipporah Films. In spite of the legal issues that marred the original release of Titicut Follies and restricted its audience for decades, the film remains a critical text with regards to issues of consent, participation, and representation within non-fiction film.

MICHAEL B. BAKER

See also: Wiseman, Frederick

Titicut Follies (US, Bridgewater Film Company, Inc., 1967, 84 mins). Distributed by Zipporah Films. Directed and produced by Frederick Wiseman. Co-directed and photographed by James Marshall. Edited by Frederick Wiseman. Associate editor, Alyne Model. Associate producer, David Eames.

Further reading

- Anderson, Carolyn and Benson, Thomas W., Documentary Dilemmas: Frederick Wiseman's Titicut Follies, Carbondale, IL: Southern Illinois University Press, 1991.
- Armstrong, Dan, 'Wiseman's Realm of Transgression: Titicut Follies, the Symbolic Father, and the Spectacle of Confinement', Cinema Journal 29, 1989.
- Atkins, Thomas R. (ed.), Frederick Wiseman, New York: Monarch Press, 1976.
- Ellsworth, Liz, Frederick Wiseman: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston: G.K. Hall, 1979.
- Grant, Barry K., 'Ethnography in the First Person: Frederick Wiseman's Titicut Follies', in Barry Keith Grant and Jeannette Sloniowski (eds), Documenting the Documentary: Close Readings of Documentary Film and Video, Detroit, MI: Wayne State University Press, 1998.
- Voyages of Discovery: The Cinema of Frederick Wiseman, Urbana, IL: University of Illinois Press, 1992.
- Levin, G. Roy, Documentary Explorations: 15 Interviews with Filmmakers, New York: Doubleday, 1971.
- Stevenson, Jack, 'Interview with Frederick Wiseman', Pandemonium 3, 1989.

To Die in Madrid

(France, Rossif, 1962)

On March 26, 1962, French producer Nicole Stéphane asked the Spanish government for permission to shoot in Spain some scenes needed for a TV documentary entitled Espagne éternelle/Eternal Spain, to be directed by the prestigious filmmaker Frédéric Rossif. The Francoist officials were uncertain and surprised, because the proposed script dealt with the most crude clichés about Spain: gypsies, flamenco music, bullfights, and Catholicism, for example. The production was supported by Marcelin Defourneaux, then cultural attaché to the French Embassy in Madrid and representative of Unifrance Film, who assured the administration that the image of contemporary Spain presented in the film would be absolutely positive. Subsequently permission to film was granted, as was the unconditional cooperation of the local authorities involved in the five weeks of shooting.

Some months later, in an interview to the weekly magazine Candide, Rossif discussed the Espagne éternelle affair, stating that his intention was not to make a film on contemporary Spain, but only to find images to complement the archive footage that he had selected for a full-length documentary on the Spanish civil war to be titled Mourir à Madrid/ To Die in Madrid. Since the approach was to be anti-Franco, the images captured in 1962 Spain were clearly appointed to give the audience the impression that Franco's victory had been disastrous for Spain.

The film premiered in Cannes during the Festival—but not in the Festival, due to its documentary condition—and received unanimous critical acclaim, mainly for its proloyalist, anti-Franco bias, but also for its technical skill in the editing of the great amount of old footage taken from various film archives around the world. The contemporary shots defined Rossif's message: the foggy, somber Castilian landscape, inhabited by long-suffering, impoverished peasants, was a symbol of Franco's victory and his subsequent reign of terror.

Nevertheless, some objections to the film were raised. Conservative Roman Catholics reacted angrily against the film for its attack on the right-wing side of the Spanish civil war. According to the traditionalist interpretation, the Alzamiento was a crusade against the enemies of Spain and the religion. However, there was also criticism from the Left. The prominent Catalan anarchist and former minister in the days of the Popular Front, Frederica Montseny, accused Rossif's film of being communist propaganda that deliberately ignored the contribution of the Libertarian movement to the Revolution in Spain. In fact, this was partly true. Rossif centers its interpretation in the defense of Madrid, defining very well the enemy, that is, the 'evil ones'—the Army, the Church, the Falange, the Italians, and the Germans—but is somewhat imprecise in the depiction of the 'good' Republicans. The viewer learns little about the Republican ideology. One curious example is that the gigantic posters with the faces of Lenin and Stalin, which decorated the streets and squares of Madrid during all the war years, are never shown on screen. Spanish Republicans are seen only as innocent victims of savage bombardments and sadistic repression, through such events as the Guernica massacre, or the murder of Federico García Lorca. On the other hand, the role of the International Brigades is overemphasized. Another objection was addressed to the 'aestheticist' treatment of some episodes, heavily supported by a solemn (especially in the French soundtrack) spoken commentary. It is curious to note that Rossif's only concession to ‘impartiality’ is his approbation of one of the classic myths of Francoist propaganda: the siege of the Toledo Alcázar.

Figure 20 To Die in Madrid, 1962 (Courtesy of the British Film Institute)

The reaction of Spanish authorities to the critical and commercial success of Mourir à Madrid was a blend of impotence and anger. They were unable to forbid its release abroad, but did try, via diplomacy, to curb its reception in ‘friendly’ countries, with some degree of success. The Spanish government also sponsored two full-length documentaries intended to refute Rossif’s thesis. Morir en España/To Die in Spain (1965, Mariano Ozores) made relatively imaginative use of some interesting archive shots, but ¿Por qué morir en Madrid?/Why to Die in Madrid? (1966, Eduardo Manzanos) was considered ineffective, and the film was never released. The original Mourir à Madrid premiered in Spain in May 1978.

RAFAEL DE ESPAÑA

See also: Rossif, Frédéric

Mourir à Madrid/To Die in Madrid (France, Rossif, 1962, 83 mins). An Ancinex production. Written and directed by Frédéric Rossif. Narrated by Madeleine Chapsal. Voices: Suzanne Flon, Germaine Montero, Roger Mollion, Pierre Vaneck, and Jean Vilar. English adaptation: Helen Scott, with the voices of John Gielgud, Irene Worth, William Hutt, and George Gonneau.

Further reading

- Crusells, Magí, La Guerra Civil española: cine y propaganda, Barcelona: Ariel, 2003: 107–32.
- Cuenca, Carlos Fernandez, La Guerra de España y el cine, Madrid: Editora Nacional, vol I, 1972: 427–41.
- de España, Rafael, ‘Images of the Spanish Civil War in Spanish Feature Films, 1939–85’, Historical Journal of Film, Radio and Television 6, no. 2, 1986: 223–36.
- del Amo, Alfonso (ed.), Catálogo general del cine de la Guerra Civil, Madrid: Catedra/Filmoteca Española, 1996: 637–9, 765–6.
- Furhammar, Leif and Isaksson, Folke, Politics and Film, London: Studio Vista, 1971: 54–5.

- Gubern, Roman, 1936–39. La Guerra de España en la pantalla, Madrid: Filmoteca Española, 1986: 132–4.
- Rossif, Frédéric and Chapsal, Madeleine, Mourir à Madrid, Paris: Seghers, 1963.

Tokyo Orinpikku (Tokyo Olympiad)

(Japan, Ichikawa, 1965)

Tokyo Olympiad is generally recognized, along with Leni Reifenstahl's Olympia (1938), as one of the finest documentaries on the Olympics. The film was originally to be directed by Kurosawa Akira. In the course of preproduction, however, it became evident that Kurosawa desired an unprecedented degree of creative control that spilled out into the events themselves. He demanded, for example, the right to design and choreograph the Opening Ceremony himself in order to lend the event to cinematography. Kurosawa was summarily replaced by Ichikawa Kon, who was known both for his cinematic craftsmanship and also for reliably rescuing troubled films in mid-production. Ichikawa was also famous for his adaptations of previous texts, which also may have been a factor in his selection; unlike Kurosawa, he was not interested in tampering with the original text of the Olympics.

The year 1964 was a crucial time in Japanese history. The government was intent on using the Olympics to signal Japan's reemergence on the world stage after its devastating defeat in World War II. They had renewed their security relationship with the United States, and their economy was entering a phase of high growth. Tokyo, which had been leveled to dust during the war, was transformed into a bustling modern landscape of paved roads and a newly modernized environment, something to which Ichikawa gestures at the beginning with images of prewar buildings being torn down with a wrecking ball. He also seems to inject the film with the faint stench of Japanese nationalism with stylized images of the rising sun, stunningly shot by the renowned documentary cameraman Hayashida Shigeo.

The finished film, however, was roundly criticized by both the conservative government and the Communist Party, which we can probably take as a measure of Ichikawa's achievement.

Before the film was even finished, it ran into severe problems with the government ministry that was overseeing the production. A preview was staged for Hirohito, and rumors flew in the popular media that the emperor was displeased. Numerous government officials publicly attacked Ichikawa, baffled by his aestheticization of the games and calling for a new version that was 'record centric' (kirokuchushin) and not 'artistic' (geijutsuteki). Ironically, a similar debate over the nature of documentary aesthetics took place in 1930s Japan and was resolved in favor of artfulness by the immensely popular reception of Reifenstahl's Olympia. Ichikawa basically prevailed and completed a one-hundred-and-fifty-four-minute film that became the highest grossing film in Japanese history in 1965. The film has recently been restored to Ichikawa's original one hundred and sixty-nine-minute cut. There are countless regionalized versions, however, as local distributors typically cut out what they felt was unimportant: for example, the initial US version was thirty minutes of gold medal victories by American athletes.

It seems that one cannot discuss the film without mentioning a slew of statistics that indicate its unusual scale: one hundred and sixty-four cameramen, one hundred cameras, two hundred and fifty lenses, fifty-seven sound recordists, one hundred and sixty-five thousand feet of audio tape, and seventy hours of film exposed. The film was made 'under the sign of gigantism', as Jacques Demeure so aptly put it (Cazdyn et al. 2001: 315). Seen in today's era, when the Olympics are an exclusively televisual event, the film is truly a wonder to behold. Ichikawa shot in CinemaScope and stereo sound, with enough access and control to set his cameras where he wished and light scenes with the polish of his feature films. The director's eye for abstract pattern and spectacular splashes of color found ample material in the pageantry of the Olympics. Although he certainly knew he was expected to produce a document of national pride, Ichikawa managed to undercut the political nature of the games with his patent irony, a wry attention paid to the banal margins adjacent to the spectacle of Olympian feats of bodily strength, and an unusual emphasis on the athletes' pain and suffering in their quest for gold. For every predictable, if unforgettable, image of Olympic spectacle, there is a sequence so ambiguous or perplexing that it infuses the film with contradiction that simultaneously invites and frustrates interpretation. The film is often singled out to represent the best of Japanese documentary, but it is really quite anomalous (other Tokyo Olympics films by Noda Shinkichi and Kuroki Kazuo are far more typical, especially in their political charge). Ichikawa's film is best seen as a great Olympics film, perhaps the last great one now that we have entered the age of global live television, to which it stands in such striking and admirable contrast.

ABÉ MARK NORNES

Tokyo orinpikku (Tokyo Olympiad) (Japan, 1965). Produced by Taguchi Suketaru. Directed by Ichikawa Kon. Written by Ichikawa Kon, Shirasaka Yoshio, Tanikawa Shuntaro, Wada Natto. Cinematography by Miyagawa Kazuo, Murata Shigeo, Nagano Shigeichi, Nakamura Kenji, Tanaka Tadashi. Music by Mayuzumi Toshiro. Sound recorded by Inoue Toshihiko. Edited by Ehara Yoshio, Nakashizu Tatsuji. Art direction by Kamekura Yusaku. Narration (Japanese version) by Mikuni Ichiro.

Further reading

Cazdyn, Eric, Nornes, A.M., Quant, James, Russell, Catherine and Yoshimoto, Mitsuhiro, 'Tokyo Olympiad: A Symposium', in James Quant (ed.), Ichikawa Kon, Toronto: Cinematèque Ontario, 2001: 315–6 (reprinted as liner notes for Criterion Collection's DVD of Tokyo Olympiad, 2002).

Vaughn, Dai, 'Tokyo versus Berlin', in Documentary: Twelve Essays, Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1999: 90–110.

Toscano, Salvador

Toscano's career began at the end of nineteenth century, shortly after Lumière's representatives brought the cinematograph to Mexico, and ended around 1920, when Hollywood fiction films practically put an end to the commercial exhibition of documentaries. Unfortunately, most of Toscano's works have not survived as they were originally edited—silent and with titles—but many fragments were reedited in Memorias de un mexicano (Carmen Toscano, 1950), a fiction film made by his daughter.

In his first years as a filmmaker, Toscano shot city monuments, landscapes, theater numbers, popular festivals, parades, bullfights, and the results of catastrophic events such as floods and earthquakes. Thematically similar to their French models, most of these documentaries were only a few minutes long and composed of conservative shots, with no camera movement or outstanding emplacements. They simply recorded, from a fixed point of view, selected events from reality. Toscano, like other filmmakers and the Mexican public in general at that time, shared the assumption that documentaries had an informative or recreational purpose similar to that of the press. In any case, they satisfied communicative needs in an almost totally illiterate country.

By 1906 the development of film narrative allowed Toscano to make longer and more complex films, such as Fiestas presidenciales en Mérida (1906), Inauguración del tráfico internacional en el istmo de Tehuantepec (1907), and his first feature, Fiestas del centenario de la Independencia (1910). Their character was again journalistic, but at the same time they were in a sense propaganda films, because they invariably presented a fairly positive image of dictator Porfirio Díaz and the material achievements of his administration. As far as we can see in the surviving fragments, the style of these films was still based on a very discreet use of the camera, although there is some innovation in shots.

Fiestas del centenario de la Independencia, which registered the one-month celebrations held to commemorate the centenary of the beginning of the war of independence against Spain, was a popular film, but its success was far surpassed by the 1911 documentaries, which showed episodes related to Francisco I Madero's military rebellion against President Díaz. Toscano's main work about that event was La toma de Ciudad Juárez y el viaje del héroe de la revolución don Francisco I Madero (1911), a long film that combined information and propaganda. Until then, the image of Porfirio Díaz had been emphasized in documentaries about his trips and the high points of his government. Now, there was also a trip, but in this case it was enhanced by a much more important element for the construction of a charismatic image—that of military victory.

Madero defeated Díaz and became the new president of the country, but was attacked and put to death by his own army. After that there was another revolution, which lasted for about five years. Many documentary makers of this period showed Pancho Villa, Álvaro Obregón, Venustiano Carranza, Emiliano Zapata, or some other caudillo defeating their enemies in battles or cities under siege. These films almost always presented the perspective of the winner and ended with the victory of one group, as in Toscano's Historia completa de la revolución de 1910 a 1915 (1915). They were propaganda films intentionally covered up with the objective aura of informative reportage: partial victories were presented as definite, local processes as national, and so on. The effect produced by their sensational contents guaranteed their success, although their form was still conservative. They were structured in chronological order, their 'clear' shots aimed basically at fulfilling the minimum requirements needed to make the events represented intelligible for any public. In a sense, this lack of aesthetic or narrative risks is what characterizes Toscano's style and that of most Mexican revolution documentary makers. Another central characteristic is that almost none of them resorted to using recreated scenes, studio shots, or other inauthentic documentary material.

Toscano went beyond combining information and propaganda, however. In his long career as a filmmaker, he collected scenes of different political regimes, and this in turn became the source of a panoramic historical film first entitled Historia de la revolución de 1910 a 1920 (1920), and finally, with the addition of excerpts filmed by other documentary makers, Historia completa de la revolución mexicana, 1900–1927 (1927). In this last thirty-five-reel film, there were no value judgments about the actions of the protagonists or about the traumatic social process that occurred during that period. That is, the film gave equal legitimacy to all its main characters, both on the side of the government and of the rebels. Other Mexican documentary makers, like Jesús H. Abitia, also intended to give an encompassing, historical overview of the same period, but their pictures inevitably revealed their sympathies for one caudillo or another. Only Toscano, who never fully embraced a political cause, managed to give a detached version of that turbulent episode.

The Mexican revolution ended in 1917. That same year, a crucial transformation of documentaries occurred when war films came to an end. Filmmakers became involved with the new government and redirected their production. Toscano was commissioned to film Las riquezas de Quintana Roo (1917) so as to promote inversion in, and migration to, that abandoned region; a few years later he was again contacted to make the official film of the festivals held to commemorate the centenary of the consummation of independence: Las fiestas del centenario (1921). Although this was in fact his last documentary, he never stopped adding scenes, filmed by others, to his great work in progress, Historia de la revolución mexicana.

ÁNGEL MIQUEL

See also: Mexico

Biography

Born in Guadalajara, Jalisco, Mexico, March 24, 1872. Graduated as an engineer from Universidad Nacional de México, 1897. Up to 1921, combined his career with filmmaking and exhibition; afterwards, worked mainly in highway construction. Collected films, stereographic photographs, and early film posters which now form part of one of Mexico's main private historical archives. Died April 14, 1947 in Mexico City.

Selected films

- 1906 Fiestas presidenciales en Mérida
- 1907 Inauguración del tráfico internacional en el istmo de Tehuantepe
- 1910 Fiestas del centenario de la Independencia
- 1911 La toma de Ciudad Juárez y el viaje del héroe de la revolución don Francisco I Madero
- 1915 Historia completa de la revolución de 1910 a 1915
- 1920 Historia de la revolución de 1910 a 1920
- 1921 Las fiestas del centenario
- 1927 Historia completa de la revolución mexicana, 1900 a 1927

Further reading

- de los Reyes, Aurelio, Vivir de sueños, vol. I of Cine y sociedad en México 1896–1930, Mexico City: UNAM, 1983.
- Miquel, Angel, Salvador Toscano, Mexico City: Filmmoteca de la UNAM, Universidad de Guadalajara, Universidad Veracruzana, Secretaría de Cultura del Estado de Puebla, 1997.

Ramírez, Gabriel, Crónica del cine mudo mexicano, Mexico City: Cineteca Nacional, 1989.

Toscano, Carmen, Memorias de un mexicano, Mexico City: Fundación Carmen Toscano, 1996.

Vaidovits, Guillermo, El cine mudo en Guadalajara, Guadalajara: Universidad de Guadalajara, 1989.

Trinh T. Minh-ha

The filmmaker, writer, composer, and cultural critic Trinh T. Minh-ha radically redefines cinematic conventions through films that attempt to challenge the structures of oppression and domination in commercial cinema and in Western society as a whole. A key figure among contemporary postcolonialist feminists, Trinh uses innovative forms such as poetic language, disruptions of linear time, negative space and silences, multiple voices, repetition and recontextuality, and cultural repositioning in her films and writing to critique patriarchal fixed meanings and notions of Otherness.

Trinh has been influenced by the work of influential postmodern thinkers including Jacques Derrida, Michel Foucault, Roland Barthes, Jean-François Lyotard, and Hélène Cixous. Like them, Trinh questions the viability of scientific objectivity and linguistic certainty. Trinh's work also shares the commitment to reclaiming marginalized subjectivities with feminists such as Gloria Anzaldúa and Audre Lorde. A filmmaker of the Asian diaspora, Trinh is part of an intellectual movement of women of color whose work has been particularly affected by the shift from colonialism to a global capitalist economy, which has fostered migrations, the dominance of Western mass media, and the commodification of 'native' cultures. Trinh has written extensively about cinematic theory, and her films serve to put those theories into practice. She has also gone to great lengths to share her own 'readings' of her films through numerous interviews and essays.

Trinh's films aim to deliberately blur the boundaries of genre. Her documentaries such as Reassemblage (1982) on Senegal, Naked Spaces—Living is Round (1985) on rural West Africa, Surname Viet Given Name Nam (1989) on Vietnamese female subjectivity, Shoot for the Contents (1991) on culture and politics in China, and The Fourth Dimension (2001), a digital video on Japanese culture, all incorporate narrative and poetic language, carefully manipulated visuals, and experimental sounds and music. Moreover, her films use nonlinear structure, silences, abrupt jump cuts, repetition of images and sounds, and unsynched rhythms. She also uses almost random panning to, in her words, avoid moving from one captured object to another, and to expose the limits of a camera eye that purports to present the viewer with a unified, 'objective' package. In all her films, Trinh repeats diverse images and sounds with slight changes in an effort to displace viewers and to avoid the certainty and closure of traditional documentaries.

Trinh questions the motives and methods of commercial filmmaking through her own departures from mainstream conventions, which serve to foreground and interrogate these practices. For example, instead of speaking for or speaking about her subjects, Trinh describes her position as 'speaking nearby'. None of her works use a traditional, objective, male voice-over concerned with informing spectators about 'other' cultures. An example of her method is provided by Reassemblage, a montage of images and sounds of the everyday life of women and children in Senegal. This film features Trinh's own voice, which, according to interviewer Berenice Reynaud, proves 'unsettling', since the narrative is 'unmistakably feminine, unmistakably foreign, hesitant yet resolute, ironical yet poetic' (Trinh 1999). Naked Spaces, on life in Senegal, Mauritania, Mali, Burkina Faso, Benin, and Togo, also departs from the omniscient voice-over with three female narrators from different yet nonconflicting stances.

Trinh's departure from traditional documentary practice is most evident in Surname Viet Given Name Nam. The film includes staged reenactments of interviews with Vietnamese women, although the viewer is never informed that the interviews are inauthentic. Surname also confronts viewers with a barrage of voices, in the form of simultaneous voice-overs, written text, and speech in both English and Vietnamese. Shoot for the Contents, Trinh's film about Chinese culture, features narration by two Chinese American women, a series of interviews, and Trinh's own voice. Again, not all of the language is translated, drawing attention to the notion, as Trinh has pointed out, that documentaries constitute a form of translation on both the part of the filmmaker or speaker, and the spectator.

Trinh's films feature both difference and similarity within differences. The appearance of a different albino child in her two films about Africa, the use of Vietnamese Americans in the staged interviews of women in Surname, and the appearance of an African American interviewee speaking on Chinese culture in Shoot all function as subtle reminders of the unfixed boundaries of subjectivity. As Trinh has noted, most documentaries use scholars or other 'experts' on a culture to push the filmmaker's message. Her practice of featuring nonexperts or unexpected voices of authority calls that into question and asserts the mobility of marginalized peoples across boundaries. Trinh's own relationship to Africa, Vietnam, China, and Japan in her documentaries underscores the shifting quality of insider/outsider status. Although she is an outsider filming these peoples, as a Vietnamese American she shares their marginalization by Western culture.

In recent years, Trinh has incorporated more narrative into her work. The Fourth Dimension (1991) is a visual essay on time and ritual. A Tale of Love (1995), a story about a Vietnamese American model who investigates a traditional Vietnamese love poem, and Night Passage (2004), on a spiritual journey undertaken by two Asian women and a little boy, are both feature-length narratives.

SHARON SHELTON-COLANGELO

Biography

Born in Hanoi, Viet Nam, in 1952. Graduated from Wilmington College in Ohio in 1972 with a BA in French literature and music. Received MA in French literature in 1973, MFA in music composition in 1976, and PhD in French literature in 1977 from the University of Illinois. Taught at the National Conservatory of Music in Dakar, Senegal, and in US universities including San Francisco State, Cornell, and Harvard. Currently teaches in the Departments of Women's Studies and Rhetoric at the University of California at Berkeley. Winner of numerous awards including the 1991 AFI National Independent Filmmaker Maya Deren Award, the 1992 Sundance Film Festival Jury's Best Cinematography Award, the 1992 Athens International Film Festival Best Experimental Feature Documentary, the 1990 American Film and Video Festival's first-prize Blue Ribbon Award for Best Film as Art Feature, the 1990 Society for the Encouragement of Contemporary Art's first prize Film as Art Award, the 1990 Bombay International Film Festival's Merit Award, the 1987 American Film and Video Festival's first prize Blue Ribbon Award for Best Experimental Feature, the 1986 Athens International Film Festival's Golden Athena Award for Best Feature Documentary, the 1984 Hong Kong International Film Festival's Certificate of Recognition, and the 1982 Humboldt State Film Festival's Honorable Mention Award.

Selected films

- 1982 Reassemblage
- 1985 Naked Spaces—Living is Round
- 1989 Surname Viet Given Name Nam
- 1991 Shoot for the Contents
- 2001 The Fourth Dimension

Further reading

- Feng, Peter X, Identities in Motion: Asian American Film and Video, Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 2002.
- Foster, Gwendolyn Audrey, Women Filmmakers of the African and Asian Diaspora: Decolonizing the Gaze, Locating Subjectivity, Carbondale, IL: Southern Illinois Press, 1977.
- MacDonald, Scott, Avant-Garde Film: Motion Studies, New York: Cambridge University Press, 1993.
- Meskimmon, Marsha, Women Making Art: History, Subjectivity, Aesthetics, New York: Routledge, 2003.
- Peckham, Linda, 'Surname Viet Given Name Nam: Spreading Rumors & Ex/Changing Histories', in Peter X. Feng (ed.), Screening Asian-Americans, New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 2002.
- Trinh T. Minh-ha, Women, Native, Other: Writing Post-coloniality and Feminism, Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press, 1989.
- When the Moon Waxes Red: Representation, Gender and Cultural Politics, New York: Routledge, 1991.
- Framer Framed, New York: Routledge, 1992.
- Cinema Interval, New York: Routledge, 1999.

Triumph of the Will

(Germany, Riefenstahl, 1935)

Triumph of the Will/Triumph des Willens is a documentary—some have even called it a staged documentary—of the Nationalist Socialist Party rally held in Nuremberg in 1934. One of the best-known documentaries ever made and certainly the best-known German documentary, Triumph des Willens brought its director Leni Riefenstahl both fame and infamy that continued to follow her throughout her life. The controversy surrounding the filmmaker and her film focused on three major issues: the extent to which the Ministry of Propaganda, under the control of Joseph Goebbels, was involved in the project; the degree to which the film is an authentic document of history; and the genuineness of Riefenstahl's claim that she did not make the film because of any belief in or support for the ideology of National Socialism.

The genesis of the making of a documentary film of the 1934 National Socialist Party Congress in Nuremberg contributes to doubts that Riefenstahl worked independently of National Socialist control on Triumph des Willens. One year earlier the director had completed a film on the 1933 Party Congress, Sieg des Glaubens/Victory of Faith (1933). The film was short, according to accounts, either because Riefenstahl had not been informed by Joseph Goebbels that she was to make the film and thus, with only three cameramen to assist her, hurried it into production only a few days before the Congress was to begin (Hinton 1978: 28) or because Goebbels placed so many obstacles in her path during production that she could not get enough footage. Her difficulties with Goebbels, whether preproduction or during production, reportedly moved Hitler to offer her a chance to direct a film of the 1934 Nuremberg Congress, which she at first declined (Infield 1976: 62).

Riefenstahl initially turned down directorial duties for Triumph des Willens to work on a narrative feature film Tiefland/Lowlands (1940–53). She turned the project over to Walther Ruttmann, director of Berlin: Die Symphonie der Großstadt/Berlin: The Symphony of a Great City (1927), who completed the opening credit sequence before Riefenstahl, at Hitler's insistence, took over directorial duties. Perhaps because Hitler was intent on having Riefenstahl make the movie (Berg-Pan 1980: 98), the director insisted on three conditions: the film had to be made by her production company, neither Hitler nor Goebbels could see the film before completion, and Hitler would never ask her to make another film (Hinton 1978: 30). Yet even if her production company made the movie, evidence indicates that the main source of financing came from the Nazi Party. Moreover the Party's cooperation before and during filming suggests that even if Riefenstahl had artistic control, the film nonetheless suggests outside involvement.

Persistent allegations that Triumph des Willens is not a genuine documentary, but that the events of the party congress were staged for the film, can be traced back to Siegfried Kracauer's comments in his book From Caligari to Hitler. Kracauer insists that 'the Convention was planned not only as a spectacular mass meeting, but also as spectacular film propaganda' (Kracauer 1947: 301). Susan Sontag, in her essay 'Fascinating Fascism', likewise claims that Riefenstahl's film 'was from the beginning, conceived as the set of a film spectacle' (Sontag 1975: 24), backing up her accusation with a quote from a book that Riefenstahl published in 1935 in which the director wrote that 'the ceremonies and precise plans of the parades, marches, processions, the architecture of the halls and stadium were designed for the convenience of the cameras' (Sontag 1975: 25). On the other hand, that the rally accommodated Riefenstahl's crews does not prove that the film rally was staged for the documentary. David Hinton asks: 'is it really logical to presume that the Rally, and the architecture designed for it, would have been any different without the presence of Riefenstahl and her camera crews?' (Hinton 1978: 55).

Riefenstahl's commitment to Nazi ideology, as related to Triumph des Willens, is unambiguous for most critics. Berg-Pan summarizes the film's reception in her book on Riefenstahl, concluding herself that 'there is little doubt, however, that no director or producer could have made a film such as Triumph of the Will without having an avid interest in the subject: Hitler and the Nazi Party'. Riefenstahl herself, however, maintained that the film was simply the result of accepting a commission to document history: 'A commission was proposed to me. Good. I accepted. Good. I agreed, like so many others, to make a film [...] It is history. A pure historical film [...] It reflects the truth as it was then' (quoted in Berg-Pan 1980: 127). As late as 1997, when Riefenstahl was interviewed by Ray Mueller for a documentary on the filmmaker, Riefenstahl maintained that she was not political and neither was her film.

Critics may disagree about the extent of Nazi participation in the planning and producing of the film, the integrity of the film as a document of a genuinely historical rally, and Riefenstahl's commitment to the Nazi cause. Yet, they are unanimous in their belief that the film is a powerful work of Nazi propaganda, owing to Leni Riefenstahl's insistence on artistic perfection.

The director's skill for creating emotional response in viewers through editing, image content, and soundtrack is indeed astonishing, although the incessant marching scenes and speechifying might lessen the impact on non-sympathetic viewers. That is, removed from the historical context, audiences, whether German or non-German, could easily find the film tedious.

That contemporary audiences were moved by the film testifies to Riefenstahl's love of movement. The film differs from the newsreels or documentaries of the time in that the film is never static, and because of the flow of images, the film can eschew conventional narration. Riefenstahl attributed the movie's power as follows: 'It's a feeling for links between images, a connection between one picture and the next [...] or from one visual colour-range, say from grey tones, to another. It's like a musical composition. It's very important to put a climax at the right point in a film [...] so that there's a continuous build-up.'

A close analysis of any of the twelve to sixteen sequences (depending on how one divides the segments) reveals that Riefenstahl did indeed score the film's images like a musical composition, beginning with quiet images, for example, a plane flying through the clouds (opening sequence showing Hitler's arrival in Nuremberg), a glimpse of church towers in the morning dawn (third sequence introducing labor's role in Nazi Germany), and a roll call of workers (fifth sequence, relating labor's role to the military). She intensified the scenes, building excitement through faster and faster editing (opening sequence), a series of segments displaying an escalating degree of fun among the camp participants (third sequence), and increasing emotional content (fifth sequence). She ended each of these sequences with a crescendo, crowds along a parade route shouting 'Heil Hitler' (first sequence), participants being tossed high in the air in a blanket (third sequence), and flags that had been lowered being suddenly lifted into the air (fifth sequence). Scenes of dramatic intensity are interspersed with ones of tranquility. Thus sequence two shows a crowd outside Hitler's window at night. The screen reveals points of light in an otherwise dark landscape. The camera slowly glides over underlit images finding rest on the words 'Heil Hitler', which are flanked by Nazi flags. Sequence four presents the Nazi leadership, each speaker iterating the theme of Hitler's contribution of work and peace to the nation. In these sequences and throughout the film, the motion and rest seem paramount, as Riefenstahl emphasized what she viewed as the movie's main themes, employment and peace, and underscores the idea that Germany was improving because of Hitler.

If Triumph des Willens emphasizes the themes of work and peace, it does so, as many film historians and critics have pointed out, to present, or even sell, Hitler and the Nazis first to the German people and then to the rest of the world. Although the Party had been in existence since the early 1920s, and Adolf Hitler had gained notoriety through the Munich Putsch (1924) and was known to Germans as the head of the National Socialist Party and as a member of parliament, he and his party had been in power only nineteen months, as the film proclaims in its prologue. The footage of Victory of Faith, Riefenstahl's attempt at filming the Nazi Rally of 1933, shows a more chaotic meeting. More important, the footage suggests a less central role for its leader, who appears as part of the Nazi leadership, rather than above and apart from it. For example, during one speech, Sturmabteilung (SA, Storm Section) leader Ernst Röhm appears next to and on the same level as Hitler. By the time of the 1934 Rally, Hitler's clique in the Party was beginning to solidify its power, having assassinated Ernst Röhm and other SA members a few months early in a violent purge known as the 'Night of the Long Knives'.

Viewed from this historical context, Triumph des Willens becomes more than a movie to sell Hitler and the Nazis to the public. It becomes one of the first films of the Nazi era to legitimize him and the Party, to place National Socialism into German history, indeed into world history. The opening credits, for example, imprinted in Gothic script and styled like woodcarvings, create a link to Nuremberg, the city of emperors and also the city of the great artist Albrecht Dürer. The text further relates Nazi Germany to the Germany of Kaiser Wilhelm, lamenting Germany's defeat in World War I and proclaiming its rebirth, thus jumping over and essentially discounting the intervening years of the Weimar Republic. The opening scene of Hitler's arrival continues the fusion of past and present, as Hitler deplanes to cheering crowds as a returning Roman leader might have marched triumphant in earlier times. The soundtrack in this scene intones Herbert Windt's score, which here approaches the grandeur of Wagnerian opera, followed by the strains of the Nazi anthem, 'Die Fahne hoch'. In sequence four Windt's soundtrack continues, weaving a thread between past and present, as a melody from Wagner's Meistersinger von Nürnberg underscores a visual of Nuremberg's cathedral towers in the dawn. The subsequent sequence varies the theme, showing how universally German the Nazi movement is, presenting workers individually and in unison from every part of Germany, united under Hitler. However, even a connection is made to the past, as the workers take part in a ceremony honoring the fallen heroes of World War I. The scene is meant to once again connect pre-1918 Germany to Nazi Germany and remind viewers at the same time of the ignominy forced on the country by the intervening and now past years of the Weimar Republic, whose books had been burned in a sequence preceding this one. Throughout the film Riefenstahl makes connections between Germany past (pre-1918) to Germany present, German regionalism to Germany united, German youth to German leadership.

Triumph des Willens is much more than Riefenstahl's interpretation of a simple documentation of Hitler and what he meant to the German populace. It is also more than a propaganda document meant to introduce Hitler and more than a love feast meant to impress and scare with its scenes of unity and militaristic power. Feature films of the Third Reich were generally not political in theme, but their content was certainly political in that they were concerned with German classics, historical leaders, and great men of letters, hoping the viewer would make the association between Nazi Germany and past German greatness. In similar fashion, Riefenstahl's film is also not political, or not just political. It is a narrative playing to the emotions of a public wanting answers to problems but also wanting to connect to a more heroic German past.

Although we cannot answer definitively whether the Nuremberg Rally was genuine, whether the Nazis or Riefenstahl produced the movie, and whether Riefenstahl supported Nazi ideology, it is clear that the overly controlled nature of the film's style produces the effect of something that was staged. Furthermore, there is no doubt that the Nazis benefited from the film, whether or not they were involved in its making.

Finally, whether or not Riefenstahl supported Nazi ideology, her film clearly does. The movie is an undeniably powerful piece of propaganda filmmaking, glorifying the political and military power of the Nazis. Riefenstahl uses the human form as architectural building blocks, elevates military marching into a religious ritual, and encloses and opens space with banners, flags, and columns.

Whether one sees the film as serving the art of documentary filmmaking or the evils of National Socialism, however, there is no denying its effect as propaganda and its influence on filmmakers. Erwin Leiser uses several scenes from the film, including the well-known sequence of the Nazi labor corps (earlier discussed as sequence five) in his documentary Mein Kampf (1960). Directors of entertainment films have also referenced Riefenstahl, including George Lucas in Star Wars (1977), Lewis Teague in Jewel of the Nile (1985), Jim Sharman in The Rocky Horror Picture Show (1975), and Paul Verhoeven in Starship Troopers (1997).

ROBERT C. REIMER

See also: Mein Kampf; Riefenstahl, Leni

Triumph of the Will/Triumph des Willens (Germany, Riefenstahl, 1935, 114 mins). Produced by Leni Riefenstahl-Produktion and NSDAP Reichsleitung. Directed by Leni Riefenstahl. Written by Leni Riefenstahl and Walter Ruttmann.

Further reading

- Berg-Pan, Renata, Leni Riefenstahl, Boston: Twayne Publishers, 1980.
- Hinton, David B., The Films of Leni Riefenstahl, Metuchen, NJ: Scarecrow Press, 1978.
- Hull, David Stewart, Film in the Third Reich: A Study of the German Cinema 1933–45, Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1969.
- Infield, Glenn B., Leni Riefenstahl: The Fallen Film Goddess, New York: Thomas Y. Crowell, 1976.
- Kracauer, Siegfried, From Caligari to Hitler: A Psychological Study of the German Film, Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1947.
- n.a., 'Leni Riefenstahl—Regisseurin, Schauspielerin', in Hans-Michael Bock (ed.), Cinegraph: Lexikon zum deutschsprachigen Film, Munich, 1984.
- Schwartzman, Roy J., 'Racial Theory and Propaganda in Triumph of the Will', in Bonnie Braendlin and Hans Braendlin (eds), Authority and Transgression in Literature and Film, Gainesville, FL: University Press of Florida, 1996: 136–51.

 Sontag, Susan, 'Fascinating Fascism', The New York Review of Books, February 6, 1975: 23–5.

Troubles We've Seen, The

(France, Ophüls, 1994)

Although the primary topic of the film is the war in Bosnia and its journalistic coverage, Veillees d'armes: le journalisme en temps de guerre, 1er et 2ème voyages/The Troubles We've Seen: A History of Journalism in Wartime, 1st and 2nd Journeys, Marcel Ophüls's postmodern documentary collage, is dedicated to a wider investigation into Western reporting on conflict and its underlying motives. To Ophüls, concern for others is only an extension of a self-centered interest, hence the variety of inherent ethical tensions found in international news production.

Troubles was produced by the director's friend Bertrand Tavernier, who secured most of the financing (Jacobsen 1996). Contributions to the budget were made by the BBC (quoted at £80,000) and by the French subsidy system. The plan was to make a three-part documentary, but by 1994 only two parts were completed and shown. Ophüls has said on various occasions that Troubles should be regarded as a work in progress. There were indications that in the late 1990s he was still thinking of completing it, but no third part had been released as of 2011.

The first two parts of what was supposed to be a trilogy, First Journey (92 mins) and Second Journey (139 mins) were screened at the closing day of Cannes Film Festival in 1994, with little preliminary information released. Later, the film was screened at the festivals in Toronto and New York and was broadcast by the BBC in September 1995.

Ophüls's central concern is the effect of the media's instant and continuous live reporting on Western perceptions and reactions to conflicts abroad. He looks into a wide spectrum of journalistic behaviour by placing it into the framework of morality in war reporting. Even though the focus is on Bosnia, there are numerous references to media coverage and construction of past conflicts, mostly the Gulf War, but also the Vietnam War, World War II, and the Spanish civil war. In an interview, Ophüls hinted that it was the distinction between legitimate show business and 'perverted show business' that sustained his interest in news production and international conflict coverage (Jacobsen 1996).

The two parts of the film are structured loosely around two journeys to Bosnia, with the first part concentrated mostly on the logistics and the morals of reporting from the war zone and the second on war reporting at the recipient end and its function within the Western (mainly French) public discourse. Even though the filmed interviews are cut and presented in a mosaic fashion, one can distinguish two main spheres of investigation. In Bosnia, Ophüls talks to numerous Western journalists based in Sarajevo (The New York Times' John F. Burns, the BBC's John Simpson, France Presse's Remi Oudran, TF1's Isabelle Ballancourt), uses footage of reporters such as Christiane Amanpour (CNN) and Martin Bell (BBC), and enters street dialogues with some ordinary inhabitants of the city and visiting Westerners (such as film director Romain Goupil). The investigation in this part looks mostly into the inherent ethical tensions of the trade and the journalist's special attitudes to danger, courage, and moral responsibility.

The second part explores the coverage of conflict as seen at the recipient's end, in Western Europe, and mostly in France. Ophüls uses his friend Philippe Noiret to deliver some biting commentary on the indifference of French politicians and their evasive PR strategy over Bosnia. He features interviews with intellectual critic Alain Finkielkraut and with self-proclaimed humanitarian Bernard Kouchner. No one is spared, from General Philippe Morillon to Simone Veil and François Mitterand; all are shown making compromising statements. Ophüls also challenges the superficial approach of French TV star anchor Patrick Poivre d'Arvoir, dispatched into Sarajevo on a twenty-four-hour parachute-style visit.

In this film Ophüls is particularly sensitive to the 'rhetorical potency of Eisensteinian montage' (Lopate 1994). He cuts back and forth between seemingly unconnected footage, to impose his own political associations on the viewer and build the argument. From a Serb priest blessing a house, he cuts to an archival newsreel of a Nazi cleric blessing the troops. He exposes the evasiveness of the United Nations (UN) by featuring embarrassing press conference moments of officials such as José María Mendiluce and Boutros Boutros-Ghali. He adds scenes of President Clinton's jogging routine, President Mitterand's interview with the wife of one of his own ministers, and footage of public statements made by Chancellor Kohl and Prime Minister John Major. In addition, the film cross-references a range of well-known Hollywood pictures—from the Marx brothers' Duck Soup (1933) and Max Ophüls's De Mayerling à Sarajevo (1940), to Mark Sandrich's Holiday Inn (1942) and Fellini's 8½ (1963)—to sharpen the contrast between a self-obsessed West and a forsaken Bosnia. A frequently used ironic device, for example, is Bing Crosby's song from the film Holiday Inn, hummed by the war correspondents stationed at the infamous 'Holiday Inn' hotel in Sarajevo. Another sequence of the film shows a woman and child running through a snowy square in Sarajevo to escape sniper fire. The background music is the song 'White Christmas', again from Holiday Inn.

Yet another line of referencing is the inclusion of staged episodes from everyday life routines in the West, once again asserting the indifferent attitude of ordinary Westerners to conflict between faraway peoples. These include footage from Venice; for example, like Sarajevo, it is a dying city, yet one that is absorbed by its self-importance. Ophüls does not spare himself either, and extends the sarcasm by including a set-up scene showing him in a Viennese hotel room, shortly after he has left Sarajevo, discussing the Bosnian project on the phone, while in the background a naked woman sips champagne, waiting for him in bed. It is a clear statement of self-criticism: as a Westerner he is, by default, complicit in the attitudes he exposes.

As far as the Bosnian dimension of the film is concerned, Ophüls never becomes too involved, even though he has declared his official commitment to the plight of Bosnian Muslims. During his Northern Ireland investigation in Sense of Loss (1972) he talked extensively to the ordinary victims of terror, but in Sarajevo his discussions with local people are restricted to occasional street interviews. Although present throughout the film, the experiences of ordinary Bosnians remain outside the main narrative and do not integrate into the investigation, which remains preoccupied with Western journalists' coverage of the conflict.

As a legendary filmmaker, Ophüls enjoys privileged treatment and is granted exclusive interviews with some of the main players in the conflict, including Nikola Koljević, Radovan

Karadžić, and Slobodan Milošević. Because his investigative focus lies elsewhere, however, he does not make much use of this rare material and only includes occasional sound bites from these conversations. Pursuing his own line of inquiry, he takes this particular conflict as a backdrop for the moral investigation that evolves around Western coverage.

Ophüls neglects important statements made by the Yugoslav and Bosnian players and fails to analyse the rhetoric of blaming Western media coverage, widely practised by these politicians. Many of the issues discussed in The Troubles We've Seen make sense only in the wider context of themes such as history, remembrance, and morality, which have been the focus of Ophüls's work throughout his career. It is a context in which Bosnia's function is of a case study, a background against which he develops his views.

The main line of inquiry in Marcel Ophüls's work has always been a moralistic one, from dissecting the reasons why ordinary people turn a blind eye to historical horrors such as the deportation of Jews in occupied France (The Sorrow and the Pity, 1971; The Memory of Justice, 1976; Hotel Terminus, 1988), through exposing the tragic consequences of the mismanaged dialogue in Northern Ireland (A Sense of Loss, 1972), to dealing with the side effects of the German reunification (November Days, 1992). Ophüls's mature brand of investigative sarcasm sets the tone also in Troubles, where he once again looks into the question of why knowledge of injustice and atrocities does not change the outcome of conflicts and why Western politics are once again inoperative when confronted with abundant evidence of ethnic cleansing and terror. Opening with evidence of uninformed shallowness in war reporting, he explores whether the superficiality in reporting is due to intrinsic media patterns or to the deeply ingrained smugness of institutionalised consumer culture. He remains sceptical about the possibility of adequately conveying information across borders and cultures. Some critics read his pessimism as a general 'radical scepticism about the moral decency of any image-making' (Lopate 1994: 74), whereas others found that the turns of his investigation were taking 'rambling, frequently surprising ways' and were excessively subjective (Maslin 1994). Yet, given the fact that officially sanctioned injustice was Ophüls's lifelong topic and that the métier of the director was exposing complicity in all its subtle forms, according to others, Troubles was to be seen as a logical continuation in his earlier investigations (Jacobsen 1996).

As with most of Ophüls's other films, the reception of Troubles was a mixture of admiration and reservation over the ponderous and long-winded format that causes 'bafflement and irritation' (Dunkley 1995). Once again, critics noted, it was a profoundly subjective piece of work, which never pretends otherwise. Even though the film was seen as 'too elliptical' (Dunkley 1995), critics noted with satisfaction that Ophüls had managed to once again successfully sustain his obstinate role as a 'thorn in the side of all authorities' (Jacobsen 1996) and that it was 'tremendously valuable to have one person ignoring the perpetual straining after balance and objectivity to go instead for ultra subjectivity' (Dunkley 1995). Many critics questioned the associative choices made by the director, but all were unanimous that if one is ready to trust Ophüls and follow his investigation, many answers become clear at the end.

In an international political climate marked by a continuous range of armed conflicts and civil wars, the theme of The Troubles We Have Seen remains persistently important. The film became topical, once again, with the 2002 resignation of the Dutch government over revelations of the 1995 inaction of its soldiers in the Bosnian safe heaven in Srebrenitza, which resulted in the deaths of more than seven thousand Bosnian men. Alongside academic investigations on the workings of media in covering armed clashes (by authors such as Daniel Hallin, Philip Taylor, Tim Allen, Jean Seaton, Susan Carruthers, and others), Troubles could be considered a classical work on issues of media and international coverage. Even in its unfinished format, the film should be made available to wider audiences.

DINA IORDANOVA

See also: Ophüls, Marcel; Sorrow and the Pity, The

The Troubles We Have Seen: A History of Journalism in Wartime (1st and 2nd Journeys)/ Veilles d'armes: le journalisme en temps de guerre (1er et 2ème voyages) (France/UK/Germany, Little Bear Productions (Paris); premiere (Germany), with the participation of Canal+, BBC, 1994, 231 mins). Produced by Bertrand Tavernier and Frederic Bourboulon. Directed and written by Marcel Ophüls. Cinematography by Pierre Boffrey, Pierre Milon. Assistant direction by Dominiki Moll, Laurent Cantet. Edited by Sophie Brunet. Sound by Michel Faure and Eric Devulder. Sound edited by Ariane Doublet. Filmed in Sarajevo, Zagreb, Vienna, Paris. Dialogue in English, French, German, Serbian and Croatian.

Further reading

- Dunkley, Christopher, 'War from a Different Perspective', Financial Times, September 2, 1995: xii.
 Iordanova, Dina, Cinema of Flames: Balkan Film, Culture and the Media, London: BFI, 2001: 153–5.
 Jacobsen, Kurt, 'Memories of Injustice: Marcel Ophüls's Cinema of Conscience', Film Comment 32, no. 4, July 1996: 61–71 (includes an interview with Ophüls).
 Johnson, William, 'A Short Take on Long Films, Very Long Films', Film Comment 31, no. 5, September 1995: 78.
 Lopate, Phillip, 'New York Film Festival', Film Comment 30, no. 6, November 1994: 72–7.
 Maslin, Janet, 'A Report on Reporters in the World's Hot Spots', The New York Times, October 6, 1994: C-17.
 Nesselson, Lisa, 'The Troubles We Have Seen', Variety, June 19, 1994.

True Glory, The

(UK, Carol Reed, 1945)

The last film in the victory series—which included Desert Victory (1943), Tunisian Victory (1944), and Burma Victory (1945)—The True Glory covers the period from the preparations for the D-Day landings in Normandy through the fall of Berlin to the establishing of contact between the Western Allies and Soviet troops at the Elbe River. Made from five and a half million feet of combat footage shot by five hundred American, British, and other Allied cameramen, it is a vast panorama, yet intensely human, even intimate at moments.

Emotional involvement is gained largely through the experimental use of commentary. Alternating with blank verse choruses are multiple voices representing soldiers involved with the particular action being shown. The words are complementary to the images, sometimes in humorous or ironic counterpoint to them. The general's version, spoken by Dwight D. Eisenhower himself, supreme commander of Allied forces in Europe, is irreverently interrupted by enlisted men who were there: New York cab driver, cockney Londoner, member of the French Maquis, and others. One marvelous moment occurs when a black American MP directing military traffic at a crossroads explains that the situation is tough, that the invasion forces are bottled up in the Caen Peninsula. 'Then we heard that the Third Army was taking off', he says. 'They'd pulled a rabbit out of a hat—and what a rabbit! A rabbit with pearl-handled revolvers'. As he says this a tank bearing an erect General George S. Patton roars by.

The True Glory was the triumphant record and hymn to Allied victory in Europe. The occasion permitted a kind of boasting and self-congratulation without it appearing to be so. Pride is expressed in the massiveness and efficiency of the military machine and in its democratic nature. The participation of many nations is indirectly reiterated without explicit statement being required. The Allied attitude toward war is presented as being purposeful and matter-of-fact, its violence accepted as part of a job to be done, as in the British semi-documentaries (Target for Tonight, 1941; Fires Were Started, 1943; Western Approaches, 1944). Unlike the semi-documentaries, however, dislike and distrust of the German enemy are strongly stated. The horrors of what the advancing forces found at the Belsen concentration camp are included. An American GI, talking about guarding German prisoners of war, says: 'I just kept 'em covered [...] It wasn't my job to figure 'em out [...] But, brother, I never gave 'em more than the Geneva convention, and that was all'. Finally, though, it is the positive corollary of the GI's attitude that receives the strongest emphasis. What The True Glory is saying mostly is that this was a just and necessary war and that those on the Allied side can all feel proud of their part in winning it. Like Desert Victory before it, it was awarded an Oscar by the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences as 'the most Outstanding Documentary Feature of 1945'.

JACK C. ELLIS

See also: Burma Victory; Desert Victory; Tunisian Victory

The True Glory (US/UK, British Army Film and Photographic Unit and American and Allied Film Services, 1945, 87 mins). Distributed by Office of War Information and Ministry of Information. Produced and directed by Carol Reed and Garson Kanin. Screenplay by Eric Maschwitz, Arthur Macrae, Jenny Nicholson, Gerald Kersh, Guy Trosper. Music by William Alwyn. Cinematography by British Army Film Unit and American Army Pictorial Service. Editing supervision by Robert Verrell; edited by Leiberwitz, Bob Farrell, Jerry Cowen, Bob Carrick, Bob Clarke. Commentary read by Robert Harris.

True Story of Lili Marlene, The

(UK, Jennings, 1943)

The True Story of Lili Marlene raises important questions relating not only to the films of Humphrey Jennings but to the entire British documentary film movement, and indeed to any canonical hierarchy selected from a more general range of expression and discussion. The films that we write about and remember contribute much to our critical attitudes and our historical understanding. A closer look at the films that we have not remembered reminds us of how arbitrary the processes of selection and validation can be.

Discussions about the work of Humphrey Jennings have often proceeded in terms of masterpieces and also-rans, with the latter quickly disappearing from view. Contemporary reports suggest that this division is rooted in the initial reactions to the various films. The acknowledged masterpieces Listen to Britain, I Was a Fireman/Fires Were Started, and A Diary for Timothy were much remarked upon and generally, though not universally, appreciated from the start. Some of the other films, less effective, or perhaps more elusive, also elicited immediate responses, which seem for the most part to have been quite a bit cooler.

The hardening of this division into a kind of received wisdom probably begins with Lindsay Anderson's celebrated appreciation of Jennings's work, which first appeared in Sight and Sound in 1954. This critical eulogy, entitled 'Only Connect', is a superb piece of sympathetic criticism that is largely evaluative. This is to say that Anderson is speaking of good films and bad films, and that his judgments are based on criteria that are more personal than they are textual or historical. The result is a critical position that is quite defensible without being quite comprehensive.

The Humphrey Jennings in Anderson's portrait is an intellectual and a propagandist, who in his finest work avoids by his great humanity the pitfalls of these parts, the elitist inaccessibility and the hectoring coercion to which intellectuals and propagandists are prone. This is certainly a true likeness, or at least part of one, and through its continued inclusion (Jacobs 1975; MacDonald and Cousins 1996) or reflection (by Barnouw, Ellis, Barsam) in the most popular documentary anthologies and histories, it has become a matter of record.

In a survey sense this is as it should be, but connected to all this enthusiasm there has emerged a consistent and connected idea that appears even in the more specialized studies of Jennings's work. This idea is that the other, more complicated elements of Jennings's personal and aesthetic makeup—the scholarly complexity, the intellectual's irony, the surrealist's awareness of the indeterminate—are not as easy to contain or to comprehend. It is suggested that the films that are reflective of these less tractable qualities are less coherent, less representative, and, finally, less useful.

The True Story of Lili Marlene is one of these films, and if its almost universal dismissal needs reconsidering, then its undoubted difficulties also need to be accounted for. Both its subject and treatment are unlikely. It traces the permutations of a sentimental German song, 'Lili Marlene', from its first appearance in the 1920s, through its appropriation as part of the Nazi propaganda machine, to its final 'capture' and recouping by the victorious Allies. Its careful juxtapositions and its telling use of music are typical of Jennings's work, but the lack of a real protagonist, single or collective, and the lack of a clearly unifying mood or message or even through line separate it from the best known and, most would say, the best of his films.

The record suggests that Jennings himself was frustrated during the film's production and not fully satisfied with the final result. It is not coincidental that this frustration, the mixed feelings and lack of focus, would become the explicit subject of Jennings's next film and last unequivocal success, A Diary for Timothy. With regard to finding a place for Lili Marlene, it could at the very least be argued that its production provided a refining space in which Jennings confronted and came to terms with his own confusions, the better to counsel with and console his countrymen in their own.

However, Lili Marlene has merit beyond its contribution to more acclaimed works. As with Jennings's similarly underconsidered Eighty Days and The Silent Village (both 1943), in this film we see the intellectual emerging from beneath his propagandist's banner. If the results are uncertain then it is at least partly because Jennings is exploring new ground, both in representing the war and in critically questioning the documentary film's place in that representation.

Lili Marlene reveals much about the conflict during late 1943 and early 1944, as well as the state of the nation and its citizens. With the tide having turned and victory becoming a real possibility, the need for unambiguously reassuring propaganda gave way and made room for admissions of doubt and vulnerability, for searching and questioning. If Eighty Days hints at how bewildered and broken the victims of German bombings must have been, even in the days when London was proclaiming how well it could take it, then Lili Marlene reaffirms the common ground—humanity, sentimentality and sentiment, susceptibility to suggestion—that all of the combatants shared.

It is particularly in exploring that susceptibility, in turning its gaze on its own workings, that Lili Marlene marks an advance, however tentative, in the history and maturing of the documentary film, most particularly in Britain. The elusiveness of its story suggests that story is only the ostensible subject, a means to investigate the rhetorical and ideological underpinnings of our unquestioned communications. Its formal and narrative strategies and its much criticized unconventionality and artificiality all inhibit conventional illusion and identification, allowing for and even demanding a deeper intellectual engagement. This is not a propaganda film, so much as it is a film about propaganda.

The True Story of Lili Marlene raises the possibility that there is a substantial neutrality in the songs, stories, ideas, and representations that we take to heart and take for granted. It is no wonder, then, that a wartime film about propaganda's neutral nature, and its susceptibility to tone and context, a film that exposes the workings of narrativity by tracing the history of a not-so-Nazi air, did not quite motivate the masses like the standard words for battle. These many years later such notions are familiar and just as disconcerting. Jennings's neglected film deserves credit and attention for its contribution to this current and always relevant discussion.

DEAN DUNCAN

See also: Diary for Timothy, A; Fires Were Started; Jennings, Humphrey; Listen to Britain

The True Story of Lili Marlene (UK, Crown Film Unit, 1943, 30 mins). Produced by J.B. Holmes. Direction and script by Humphrey Jennings. Narrated by Marius Goring. Cinematography by Henry 'Chick' Fowle. Music by Dennis Blood, directed by Muir Mathieson. Edited by Sid Stone. Sound by Ken Cameron.

Further reading

- Brecht, Bertolt, 'The Modern Theatre is the Epic Theatre', in John Willett (ed. and trans.), Brecht on Theatre, New York: Hill and Wang, 1957.
- Hodgkinson, Anthony W. and Sheratsky, Rodney E., Humphrey Jennings: More than a Maker of Films, Hanover, NH: University Press of New England, 1982.
- Jackson, Kevin (ed.), The Humphrey Jennings Film Reader, Manchester: Carcanet Press, 1993.
- Jacobs, Lewis (ed.), The Documentary Tradition, New York: Hopkinson and Blake, 1979.
- Jennings, Mary-Lou (ed.), Humphrey Jennings: Film-Maker, Painter, Poet, London: British Film Institute, 1982.
- MacDonald, Kevin and Cousins, Mark, Imagining Reality: The Faber Book of Documentary, London: Faber, 1996.
- Sussex, Elizabeth, The Rise and Fall of British Documentary, Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1975.
- Swann, Paul, The British Documentary Film Movement, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1989.
- Winston, Brian, Claiming the Real, London: British Film Institute, 1995.

Tsuchimoto Noriaki

One of the most important directors of his generation, Tsuchimoto Noriaki was among the first Japanese documentary filmmakers to chart a genuinely independent course. In the process he became one of the most important directors of Japanese 'art' documentaries. His highly politicized, self-reflexive, predominantly 16mm films were distributed not by major studios but through a variety of independent routes. Along with his friend and colleague Ogawa Shinsuke, Tsuchimoto established a paradigm of steadfastly independent Japanese documentary filmmaking that remains influential to this day. Tsuchimoto's influence, however, extends not only to the construction and distribution of documentary films, but also to the social function and cultural status of documentary filmmaking. Between the 1960 rebellion against the Japanese-American security treaty and the even more violent protests against the renewal of that treaty in 1969 (protests that Tsuchimoto eloquently documented in Paruchizan zenshi/Prehistory of the Partisans, 1969), a major shift in the meaning of documentary filmmaking occurred. At the start of the decade, the word documentary referred almost exclusively to purportedly objective public relations and social problem films; by its end, documentaries had become part of a vast spectrum of cinematic 'image arts' embraced, dissected, and internalized by a highly dynamic film culture. Tsuchimoto played a crucial part in effecting this transformation by pioneering a participatory, 'continual' mode of activist documentary that spilled over into reality, a mode exemplified by films such as Paruchizan zenshi and Ryugakusei Chua Sui Rin/Exchange Student Chua Swee Lin (1965).

Although he made his directorial debut with Aru kikanjoshi/An Engineer's Assistant (1962), Tsuchimoto's career proper began one year earlier when he became a founding member of 'Ao no Kai' (The Blue Group), a film research group that called for creative and financial independence. Ao no Kai was the documentary equivalent of the Shochiku nouvelle vague (made up of filmmakers such as Oshima Nagisa and Imamura Shohei and formed a year earlier), and the highly collaborative, experimental spirit of the group would remain a powerful influence on Tsuchimoto for the remainder of his career. In early PR films such as Aru kikanjoshi and Dokumento rojo/Document: On the Road (1963), Tsuchimoto created highly evocative, lyrical portraits of ordinary Japanese workers notable for the precision of their montage and their acute sense of the rhythm of daily life. With Ryugakusei Chua Sui Rin, however, Tsuchimoto, a member of the newly formed 'Image Arts Society', became truly independent and broke new ground by partially dissolving the barrier between film and spectator. The film, about a Malaysian exchange student expelled from Chiba University for participating in the Malayan independence movement, reflected some of the major social issues of the day while also treating its protagonist as a multifaceted individual, not simply as fuel for an ideological argument. Indeed, as passionate and engaged as it is, Tsuchimoto's film never devolves into reductive propaganda. In yet another break with Japanese documentary tradition, rather than simply recording protests from a distance, it actually launched a movement in support of Chua Swee Lin.

Tsuchimoto extended his participatory approach in Paruchizan zenshi, a collaborative film documenting student preparations for the final phases of the 1969 protests against the renewal of the security treaty. The title of Tsuchimoto's most important theoretical book, Film is the Work of a Living Thing, is a cogent epigram for his methodology in this period, which focused on dynamic, starkly individual protagonists like Chua Swee Lin or Takita Osamu (the 'star' of Paruchizan zenshi) and called for audience activism. Tsuchimoto didn't want to simply overwhelm his audience with blind fervor, however, and made an effort to encourage reflection by creating a crucial distance from the action on screen at the moments of greatest emotional pitch. In the midst of a particularly tense scene in Paruchizan zenshi, for example, Tsuchimoto cuts from the increasingly virulent student protesters to a long shot of Kyoto University from the perspective of nearby Mt Hiei. This carefully modulated tension between distance and identification, with neither pole dominating the form of the film for too long, is the essence of Tsuchimoto's art, and it is one of the reasons why his works of the 1960s became, and remain, so influential.

Two years after he made Paruchizan zenshi for Ogawa Productions, Tsuchimoto launched the epic Minamata series of films that became his most iconic works. Minamata is a village in Kyushu where the deadly effects of mercury poisoning, caused by the pollution spewed by nearby chemical companies, first came to light; the disease, which can result in severe physical handicaps and death, is now known as Minamata disease, and Tsuchimoto's three-hour film Minamata: kanjo-san to sono sekai/Minamata: The Victims and Their World (1971) made the disease public. As the title suggests, Tsuchimoto's goal here is to represent the worldview of the victims by abandoning the constructivist editing of his early films and extending the dialectical tension of Paruchizan zenshi to a less individualized, more epic scale.

A member of the Communist Party and former leader of the student movement Zengakuren, Tsuchimoto, in his films, has always privileged the political over the aesthetic, but in the Minamata films this tendency became an overriding operating principle. According to his former assistant director Koike Masato, when presenting his films before an audience unfamiliar with the disease, Tsuchimoto would stop the film at a critical juncture to reiterate key points with a slide show. The Minamata films are progressive in spirit and have proved highly influential. Some audience members who have seen the film have even taken decisive action to help curb the mercury poisoning. That said, the Minamata films are hampered by a didacticism and an overt political heaviness that many would argue mar most of Tsuchimoto's work from 1971 on (Genpatsu kirinukicho/A Scrapbook About Nuclear Power Plants, 1982, is a notable exception).

Regardless of the issues that they are tackling and the mode of address they adopt, however, Tsuchimoto's films are always acutely, often penetratingly, intelligent. What they sometimes lack in poetry they make up for in the careful selection of their images, the cogent lucidity of their arguments, and the urgency with which they present their causes. In addition, Tsuchimoto has left a powerful legacy that may, in the end, prove even more important than the films themselves. His influence can be felt in the work of filmmakers as diverse as Hirokazu Koreeda and Koike Masato, and his extensive body of work continues to stand, for many, as a paragon of documentary 'image art' and a model of cinematic independence.

RICHARD SUCHENSKI

Bibliography

Born in Gifu Prefecture December 11, 1928. In 1946 he joined Waseda University and became an active member of the Communist Party. He was later expelled from Waseda for participation in sometimes violent student revolts, and he spent much of the 1950s working with leftist political organizations such as the Japan/China Friendship Society. In 1956 he became a contract director for Iwanami Productions, then the dominant force in Japanese documentary production. In 1961 he became a founding member of the 'Ao No Kai' film group, and he made his directorial debut the next year with Aru kikan joshi. After directing the highly regarded Document rojo, he directed his most influential film, Ryugakusei Chua Sui Rin. After directing Paruchizan zenshi for Ogawa Productions, he launched the epic Minamata series of documentaries with Minamata: Kanjasan to sono sekai in 1971. In the following years he directed a series of films such as Yomigaeru karezu/Afghan Spring (1989) and Genpatsu kirinukicho/A Scrapbook About Nuclear Power Plants (1989), which protested against social injustice, state oppression, and ecological destruction. He died June 24, 2008.

Selected films

- 1962 Arukikanjoshi/An Engineer's Assistant: director, writer
- 1963 Dokumento rojo/Document: On the Road: director, writer
- 1965 Ryugakusei Chua Sui Rin/Exchange Student Chua Swee Lin: director
- 1968 Shiberiajin no sekai/The World of a Siberian: director
- 1969 Paruchizan zenshi/History of the Partisans: director
- 1971 Minamata: Kanjasan to sono sekai/Minamata: The Victims and Their World: director
- 1973 Minamata ikki-issho o tou hitobito/Minamata Revolt—A People's Quest for Life: director
- 1974 Igaku toshite no Minamatabyo-daiichi bu: shiryo-shogen hen; Daini bu: byori-byozo hen/Minamata Disease: A Trilogy: director
- 1975 Shiranui kai/Shiranui Sea: director
- 1976 Minamata: Sono 20 nen/Minamata: Those 20 Years: director
- 1982 Genpatsu kirinukicho/A Scrapbook About Nuclear Power Plants: director
- 1984 Umitori—shimokita hanto hamasekine/Sea Thief: director
- 1987 Minamata: Sono 30 nen/Minamata: Those 30 Years: director
- 1989 Yomigare karezu/Afghan Wind: director
- 2003 Mo hitotsu no Afuganisutan—Kabul nikki 1985 nen/Another Afghanistan—Kabul Diary 1985: writer, director
- 2003 Arishihi no Kabul hakubutsukan—1988 nen/Traces: The Kabul Museum 1988: writer, director

Further reading

- Burch, Noël, To the Distant Observer: Form and Meaning in the Japanese Cinema, Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1979 (also Ann Arbor Center for Japanese Studies, Electronic Reprint Series, 2004).
- Gerow, Aaron, 'Documentarists of Japan, No. 7: Tsuchimoto Noriaki', Documentary Box 8, 1995.
- n.a., Tsuchimoto Noriaki Filmography 2004, Tokyo: Tsuchimoto Noriaki Firumogurafii ten 2004 Jikkoiinkai, 2004.
- Yoshio, Yasui (ed.), Japanese Documentaries of the 1960s, Tokyo: Yamagata International Documentary Film Festival, 1993.
- (ed.), Japanese Documentaries of the 1970s, Tokyo: Yamagata International Documentary Film Festival, 1995.

Tunisian Victory

(US and UK, Capra and Stewart, 1944)

Jointly produced by the British and US army film units during 1943–4, Tunisian Victory was designed to provide domestic audiences in both countries with a vivid pictorial account of the Allied victory in North Africa and put a positive face on Anglo-American cooperation in the conduct of the war. The making of the film, however, also revealed the challenges and limitations of coordinating international efforts in the production of wartime propaganda in light of national divisions that the rhetoric of Allied unity inevitably masked.

Work on Tunisian Victory originated in separate British and American projects: Africa Freed, a follow-up to Desert Victory (1943), the British army and air force film units' acclaimed account of the expulsion of Rommel's African Korps from Libya and Egypt; and Operation Torch, undertaken by Frank Capra's newly formed US Signal Corps Special Coverage Unit (with John Huston, Anthony Veiller, and George Stevens) in an effort to give greater visibility to the participation of US forces in the North African campaign. Under pressure to promote the trans-Atlantic partnership, and hoping to reap the benefits of pooled combat footage, officials at the British Ministry of Information and the Office of War Information decided to merge the projects in the summer of 1943. Capra joined Hugh Stewart in London as coproducer/director, and writing duties were divided between Veiller and H. Hodson, the latter the author of Desert Victory's spoken commentary. By all accounts collaboration was tense and work proceeded slowly, in part because of what Capra later described as 'sticky high policy decisions involving dual command and national pride and prejudices' (Capra 1971: 352). Capra and Stewart oversaw postproduction in Los Angeles in the winter of 1943–4, with Stewart using the opportunity to encourage stronger ties between the British and American film industries. At its commercial release in March 1944 the completed documentary received high praise from the Hollywood trade press but mixed reviews from US critics and still less favorable ones in Great Britain.

Like Desert Victory, Tunisian Victory outlines military strategy in North Africa, links battle preparation to events at home, and uses voice-over commentary to provide an overarching narrative of the unfolding campaign. During combat passages, camera jolts, rapid montages, and percussive sound effects register the impact of explosions and artillery fire. Even Tunisian Victory's controversial fabrication of two night battles—the British crossing of Wadi Zig-Zauo (shot at Pinewood studios) and the American assault on Tunisia's Hill 609 (staged by Capra and Huston in the Mojave Desert for Operation Torch)—have precedent in combat scenes reconstructed at Pinewood for Desert Victory.

However, Tunisian Victory's strenuous evenhandedness—evident in the patterned alternation between US and British convoys, camps, and combat sites—makes for a knottier story, as does its tentative effort to incorporate French forces into the drama. The complicated logistics are clarified in part through the use of slick animated diagrams and extensive commentary by Veiller and his British vocal counterpart, Leo Glenn. In a bid to personalize the drama, Tunisian Victory also adds into the mix the voices of a fictional British Tommy (Bernard Miles) and a fictional American GI (Burgess Meredith), who convey the thoughts of soldiers in their respective camps, then enter into a colloquy at the close. Both praised and criticized at the time, this last device provides the occasion for the film to consider the prospects for postwar renewal, as an array of Germans prisoners of war (POWs), North African refugees, and Allied soldiers from many nations appear on screen. Here Tunisian Victory trades the immediacy of a combat record—victory in Tunis, after all, was by now a full year past—for a longer view in which the fate of postwar international alliances must be considered.

CHARLES C. WOLFE

Further reading

- Aldgate, Anthony, 'Creative Tension: Desert Victory, the Army Film Unit and Anglo-American Rivalry, 1943–45', in Philip M. Taylor (ed.), Britain and the Cinema in the Second World War, London: Macmillan, 1988.
- 'Mr Capra Goes to War: Frank Capra, the British Army Film Unit, and Anglo-American Travails in the Production of "Tunisian Victory"', Historical Journal of Film, Radio and Television 11, no. 1, 1991: 21–39 (reprinted as 'National Pride and Prejudices: Tunisian Victory', in Anthony Aldgate and Jeffrey Richards (eds), Britain Can Take It: The British Cinema in the Second World War, second edn, Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press, 1994).
- Capra, Frank, The Name above the Title: An Autobiography, New York: Macmillan, 1971.
- Chapman, James, The British at War: Cinema, State and Propaganda, 1939–45, London and New York: I.B. Tauris, 1998.
- Coultass, Clive, 'Tunisian Victory—a film too late?', Imperial War Museum Review 1, 1986: 64–73.
- Images for Battle: British Film and the Second World War, 1939–45*, Newark, NJ: University of Delaware Press, 1989.
- Huston, John, An Open Book, New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1980.
- Krome, Frederic, "'Tunisian Victory' and Anglo-American Film Propaganda in World War II', The Historian 58, no. 3, spring 1996: 517–30.
- McBride, Joseph, Frank Capra: The Catastrophe of Success, New York: Simon and Schuster, 1992.

Turin, Viktor

Viktor A. Turin was a Russian director who lived in America and trained in Hollywood before the Russian Revolution. His best-known film, Turksib (1929), is a documentary on the construction of the Turkestan–Siberian railroad, one of Stalin's projects for industrializing the Soviet Union. An argument for efficient transportation and trade between regions of the country, the film best illustrates Turin's ideas about what the documentary should accomplish. Although it makes a dry economic argument comprehensible, it also tells a story and rouses an emotional response. Soviet cinema made a distinction between 'played' (or fiction) and 'unplayed' (or documentary) films, but Turin was willing to blur that distinction to make the film's message more effective. This included staging scenes to make a point that was valuable in the film's larger argument. Turin's philosophy of the documentary, then, is at the intersection of communism and Hollywood: a film should appeal to the masses, but it should also teach them something.

Turin began working on Turksib at a time when the Soviet culture-film (a didactic documentary) had fallen out of favor. Most of the films were so poorly or cheaply done that bad filmmaking turned the audiences away from ideologically good ideas. Turin felt that documentary films could present complex ideas to mass audiences, but only if they were presented in an exciting (and often staged) narrative that made the ideas worthy of attention. His ideas about the making of documentary film differed dramatically from those of Dziga Vertov, the most important Soviet documentarian of the era. Vertov was opposed to fiction films and staged scenes, arguing instead for films that showed 'life caught unawares' and presented unfiltered reality. In contrast, Viktor Turin used his Hollywood training to plan for and construct Turksib in a way that was remarkably similar to a fiction film. Viktor Shlovkii wrote a scenario for the film (though much of it was abandoned in production), and Turin expressed regret at several 'good shots' that he missed. This position resulted in many elements of the film that seem more allegorical or stereotypical than realistic. The characters are very broadly drawn and easily understood 'types' like the noble savage and the heroic engineer, for example, and the film's economic argument is thematized in anecdotal scenes like the race between native horse and modern automobile.

Turin adhered to a more constructed version of the documentary because he felt that structure and story was necessary to make complex ideas palatable to the average viewer. He spoke to a worker's club on the obligation of filmmakers to come into contact with and speak to the working classes; the culture-film's lack of recent success was, he felt, a result of its inability to connect with the masses through a clear and compelling story. In this respect, Turin believed a film's successful communication of an argument can be judged only by its reception:

The greatest defect in most of the culture-films produced up to now seems to be the absence of a precisely articulated theme[...] The usual result is a tiresome hodgepodge of shots spliced together with merely mechanical links [...] This makes even the sharpest facts grow dull on the screen and leaves the spectator unmoved.

(Leyda 1960)

The director and editor have the responsibility to plan the story and shape the shots' relationship to one another so that the film presents not mere reality but a precisely articulated argument that can change the spectators' minds, both through facts and through emotions. The first section of Turksib, for example, tells spectators the facts about Turkish production of cotton; it also affects spectators by cutting from worried faces to wilting fields to a panting dog, links that are emotional rather than merely mechanical. Also, the film's editing begins at a leisurely pace when it lays out the background information for its argument, but it speeds up at the end to create excitement in the audience as the film concludes. Most critics feel that the film's success was due to the clarity of its argument and the simplicity of its structure, one that combined the comprehensibility of the fiction film and the articulacy of the culture-film.

The need for both emotional impact and a clear argument leads to a disjunction between two important elements of Turin's style. Although his characterizations and anecdotes within the film are often stereotypical, the film is consistently shot in a style that was much more direct, similar to a newsreel in its graininess and focus. Jay Leyda, for example, marvels at the fact that a Hollywood-trained director would make such an 'anti-pretty' film, particularly because he made Turksib at a time when even documentaries had a more glossy style and used a cameraman accustomed to shooting fiction films (Leyda 1960). This choice of style may have been Turin's way of maintaining a visual authenticity that gave credence to his argument—another way of creating an emotional connection with the audience by giving them the sense that this problem was an immediate and real one.

Turin's gritty style shared important characteristics with those of other filmmakers working in the same era. The newsreel was one of the most important documentary forms during and after the Russian Revolution, and other filmmakers used newsreel footage in larger documentary work (like Esfir Shub) or imitated its style (like Sergei Eisenstein) to communicate immediacy and realism. Like these other filmmakers, Turin used 'newsreel' realism as a style with a specific and intentional emotional result, an aesthetic choice rather than a direct or unproblematic way of representing the real world.

This combination of fiction and reality is one of Turin's most important contributions to the theory of the documentary in Soviet Russia. In addition, his emphasis on the residents of Turkestan as exotic and Eastern led to an interest in orientalism in films such as Vertov's Tri pesni o Lenine/Three Songs About Lenin (1934). Critics disagree about the effects of Turksib on Turin's career, but all agree that his union of Hollywood and communism—the live and the staged, the East and the West—was unique and influential in Soviet documentary history.

SUNNY STALTER

See also: Turksib

Biography

Born c. 1895 in Leningrad, Russia. Died 1945.

Selected films

1929 Turksib
1938 Bakinty

Further reading

- Leyda, Jay, Kino: A History of the Russian and Soviet Film, New York: Macmillan, 1960.
Payne, Matthew, 'Viktor Turin's Turksib (1929) and Soviet Orientalism', Historical Journal of Film, Radio, and Television 21, no. 1, 2001: 37–62.
Roberts, Graham, Forward Soviet!: History and Non-fiction Film in the USSR, London and New York: I.B. Tauris, 1999.
Shlapentokh, Dmitry and Shlapentokh, Vladimir, Soviet Cinematography 1918–91: Ideological Conflict and Social Reality, New York: Aldine de Gruyter, 1993.

Taylor, Richard and Christie, Ian (eds), The Film Factory: Russian and Soviet Cinema in Documents 1896–1939, London and New York: Routledge, 1988.

Youngblood, Denise, Soviet Cinema in the Silent Era, 1918–35, Ann Arbor, MI: UMI Research Press, 1985.

Turksib

(USSR, Turin, 1929)

Turksib is a Soviet culture-film (a didactic documentary) about the Turkestan–Siberian railway. The film was directed by Viktor A. Turin and released by Vostok-Kino, a studio mandated to make films for the eastern areas of the Soviet Union. Acclaimed at home for its comprehensible argument and compelling story, it was also critically lauded in Europe and America for its modernist techniques and exotic subject. In spite of its initial critical and popular reception, Turksib was banned in the mid-1930s. The film was thought not to give enough credit to Stalin for the railway plan, it did not deal with communist ideals like class-consciousness, and some Russian critics found fault in the film's combination of documentary and fiction film techniques. Today, the film is best understood both in the tradition of Soviet orientalism and the communist belief in technology's power to conquer nature, as well as in the wider context of modernist meditations on the primitive and the machine.

Documentary film had an important role as propaganda in the Soviet Union from the time of the Russian Revolution. The Soviet film industry in the 1920s, however, moved away from overtly didactic films. One of the key reasons for this shift was that documentaries were often so poorly made that they alienated their audiences and worked against their own ideological purposes. Turin believed the failure of the culture-film in the 1920s was based on its failure to articulate its theme, something he tried to accomplish through a combination of logical structure and exciting storytelling (Payne 2001).

The interest in storytelling was what led to later suspicion and criticism of the film. The background of those involved and Turin's intentions in making the film place Turksib squarely in opposition to the philosophy of documentary film espoused by Dziga Vertov. The most important Soviet documentarian of the 1920s, Vertov harshly criticized all fiction film and even staged documentaries, famously stating that film should display 'life caught unawares'. Turin had spent ten years working in Hollywood, and the rest of his crew had similar experience in the world of fiction. The scenario was written by Viktor Shlovskii, a noted literary critic, and his cameraman, Evgeni Slavinsky, had worked on fiction films since before the Revolution.

Turksib is perhaps closest to the films of Sergei Eisenstein in its combination of staged scenes and gritty visual aesthetic. Turin's film uses the techniques of fiction film to tell what would otherwise be a dry economic argument about the need for efficient transportation and trade between different regions of the Soviet Union. The first section, called 'Cotton', shows Turkestan farmers laboring in hot fields. Because of their limited supply of water, they are forced to choose between irrigating the cotton they could trade with the rest of the Soviet states and the wheat they need to survive. These problems are all presented rapidly, in an abbreviated and impressionistic style. The heat is suggested by panting dogs, concern over the crops by cuts between close-ups of worried faces and wilting fields.

The film's second section, called 'The Way of the Road', deals with movement as the underlying cause of the economic impediments in regions like Turkistan and Siberia. Transportation's inefficient progress is subject to the whims of the natural world. In the best-known sequence illustrating this conflict, the Turks' camel caravan, while attempting to trade the cotton and wool, is halted in the desert by a sandstorm. This scene has a surreal quality, reveling in the sculptural beauty of the sand dunes but juxtaposing this with an intertitle describing the scene as 'a burial ground for travelers and their cargoes'.

This chaos contrasts dramatically with the abilities of the planners introduced in the third section, 'Here Come the Engineer-Surveyors'. Not only can they move efficiently through and above the Kazakh steppes in their car and airplane, but they can also rationalize movement through this area with their maps and plans for railroad construction. This section moves from a direct illustration of the region's problems to an imagined solution. In a scene indebted to avant-garde art styles such as constructivism and Russian futurism, stop-motion, animated blueprints, charts, and numbers dance around the screen; an animated train draws its path across a map, showing the distance between the regions it will be connecting.

This section of the film has the most obviously staged sequences, including a race between the engineers' car and a Kazakh nomad on a horse. This scene makes clear the film's intentions in equating the Eastern with the primitive and the Western with the technologically advanced or modern. Some critics think that Turksib avoided conventional communist issues of this era, such as class conflict, to emphasize the clear distinction between East and West, a distinction that may have led to the film's popularity elsewhere (Payne 2001).

Primitivism places the film within the modernist colonialist tradition. The audience is meant to be fascinated by and desire to subjugate cultural others. In addition, the film's belief in the conquering power of the machine over nature is both part of Marxist theories of collectivization and the American theories of Taylorist efficiency. The railroad workers' labor is naturalized through crosscutting with the work of reapers, but the construction of the railroad is meant to rationalize nature by taming it. The cutting speeds up as the film moves back and forth between the mechanized movements of workers and the humanized movements of machines. The film ends with the exhortation to finish the railway line by 1936, but Turin's combination of logic and emotional appeal make the construction seem inevitable.

Western film critics have dismissed the film in the recent past, characterizing it as unsuccessful or not truly documentary; however, even more recent assessments of Turksib ignore genre arguments to address its historical and cultural complexity. The film's stylistic and ideological impurity both lead to unevenness in technique between different sections of the film, but it has an overall emotional and intellectual coherence that is quite powerful. Turksib is an underrated Soviet documentary, one that uses modernist film techniques in a powerfully populist way.

SUNNY STALTER

See also: Russia/Soviet Union; Turin, Viktor; Vertov, Dziga

Turksib (USSR, Vostokkino, 1929, 57 mins). Distributed by Amkino Corporation and Kino International Corp. Directed by Viktor A. Turin. Written by Yakov Aron and Viktor Shklovsky. Cinematography by Boris Frantsisson and Yevgeni Slavinsky.

Further reading

- Leyda, Jay, Kino: A History of the Russian and Soviet Film, New York: Macmillan, 1960.
- Payne, Matthew, 'Viktor Turin's Turksib (1929) and Soviet Orientalism', Historical Journal of Film, Radio, and Television 21, no. 1, 2001: 37–62.
- Roberts, Graham, Forward Soviet!: History and Non-fiction Film in the USSR, London and New York: I.B. Tauris, 1999.
- Shlapentokh, Dmitry and Shlapentokh, Vladimir, Soviet Cinematography 1918–91: Ideological Conflict and Social Reality, New York: Aldine de Gruyter, 1993.
- Taylor, Richard and Christie, Ian (eds), The Film Factory: Russian and Soviet Cinema in Documents 1896–1939, London and New York: Routledge, 1988.
- Youngblood, Denise, Soviet Cinema in the Silent Era, 1918–35, Ann Arbor, MI: UMI Research Press, 1985.

Tyneside Story

(UK, Gunn, 1944)

Tyneside Story was one of the wartime films of social purpose that has led some critics to believe that British documentary cinema contributed to the radicalisation of the public during the 'People's War' and ushered in the postwar Labour government with the mandate to win the 'People's Peace'. Numerous shorts and documentaries distributed by the Ministry of Information, films like Dawn Guard (1941), New Towns for Old (1942), World of Plenty (1943), and The Plan and the People (1945), articulated a set of peace aims about reconstruction and postwar planning. These helped to determine an outlook that firmly rejected the bankrupt prewar social and political framework and raised expectations about a planned and managed economy predicated on state welfare.

The film commences with a documentary sequence concerning the history and tradition of shipbuilding in Newcastle, which had declined as a result of depression. The great Eldon Yard is now closed, but we are reminded of its proud tradition. It built the first oil tanker, and it once launched three iron steamships in a single day. In the wartime emergency the yard is being made good again, brought back to life through orders from the Admiralty. The Ministry of Labour tackles the problem of a shortage of skilled workers and seeks out former employees to re-recruit them. Some are keen to return and reignite their skills, but Fred is less sure. He now works on a building site and does not want to uproot only to get thrown out again at some future date. Within a short time British craftsmen are active again building ships and a vessel is launched. Skilled men are in short supply, however, and to confront the problem women are being instructed at a government training centre where they are told that there are 'hundreds of jobs in the yards that can be done by women as well, or better than, men'. There are carefully presented scenes of women being trained as welders and other essential skills of shipbuilding, and viewers are informed that one operative, Betty, 'is as good as any man in the yard'.

The wartime policy is a success and the resurrected industry on Tyneside now builds cargo ships, tankers, submarines, and aircraft carriers. As the narrator patriotically declares: 'As long as Britain calls for ships, the call will be answered by the ring of steel on steel in the shipyards of the Tyne.' Finally, Fred returns as the voice of scepticism and declares direct to camera: 'Aye, but wait a minute. Tyneside's busy enough today, old uns and young uns hard at work makin' good ships, but just remember what the yards looked like five years ago: idle, empty, some of 'em derelict, and the skilled men that worked in them scattered and forgotten. Will it be the same again five years from now? That's what we on Tyneside want to know.'

The presentation of peace aims was officially avoided during the war, and attention was concentrated on the difficult job of winning the conflict. It has been argued, however, that 'by the close of World War II, significant sections of the British people had been treated to visions of a grandiose post-war Utopia which exceeded anything promised during World War I' (Pronay 1983). Paradoxically, this propaganda emanated from the Films Division of the Ministry of Information (MOI), which commissioned huge numbers of documentary films during the war and distributed them nontheatrically to vast audiences. The progressive nature of some of these films derived from the left-leaning members of the documentary film movement who contributed seventy-four percent of the titles produced or commissioned by the MOI. Basil Wright and Paul Rotha were perhaps the most outspoken advocates of the 'world revolution', but New Jerusalem ideals found their way into significant numbers of documentaries. Gilbert Gunn and Michael Hankinson at Spectator Films preceded Tyneside Story with Birth of a Tank (1942) and Women Away from Home (1942), two people's war titles documenting wartime social changes and the home front's contribution to the war effort. Gunn followed it with Housing in Scotland (1945), a significant example of the later wartime emphasis on planning and reconstruction. Taken together these films were typical presentations of the loosely articulated peace aims that circulated through wartime documentary cinema.

Tyneside Story was a classic example of this wartime progressive documentary cinema. The cast was drawn from the local socialist drama collective, the People's Theatre Company, and its message conformed to the characteristic 'never again' idealism of the time and its rejection of the boom and bust polarities of unregulated private enterprise and the newly acknowledged potential of the fully planned economy. The wartime emergency had produced the will to resurrect the idle yards; the will now had to be carried forward into the peace and the commitment to maintain jobs and to draw on workers' skills.

ALAN BURTON

See also: Wright, Basil

Tyneside Story (UK, 1944, 14 mins). Produced by Spectator Films for the Ministry of Information. Directed by Gilbert Gunn and produced by Michael Hankinson. Story by Jack Common. Photography by A.H. Luff. Edited by Ralph Kemplen. Sound by W.S. Bland. Music by Ken Hughes. Featuring Alf Simpson, Alan Thompson, W. Crabtree, John Bell, G.G. Whitingham, Sal Sturgeon and F.R. Gibson.

Further reading

- Addison, Paul, The Road to 1945, London: Jonathan Cape, 1975.
- The Arts Enquiry, The Factual Film, London: PEP, 1947.
- Burton, Alan, 'Projecting the New Jerusalem: The Workers' Film Association, 1938–46', in Pat Kirkham and David Thoms (eds), War Culture. Social Change and Changing Experience in World War Two, London: Lawrence and Wishart, 1995.
- Forman, Helen, 'The Non-theatrical Distribution of Films by the Ministry of Information', in N. Pronay and D.W. Spring (eds), Propaganda, Politics and Film, 1918–45, London: Macmillan, 1982.
- Pronay, Nicholas, "'The Land of Promise': The Projection of Peace Aims in Britain', in K.R.M. Short (ed.), Film and Radio Propaganda in World War II, London and Canberra: Croom Helm, 1983.
- Swann, Paul, The British Documentary Film Movement, 1926–46, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1989.
- Thorpe, Frances and Pronay, Nicholas, British Official Films in the Second World War, Oxford: Clio Press, 1980.

U

Union Maids

(US, Reichert and others, 1976)

Union Maids is one of a number of films that emerged out of the growth of the women's movement in the United States at the end of the 1960s. As women began to move into documentary filmmaking in increasing numbers, a number of films in which women and their environments were made visible in a new way appeared. This was frequently done through the use of archival film material and contemporary interviews, an aesthetic derived in many cases from Emile de Antonio's prototype In the Year of the Pig (1969). Union Maids, made by the team of Julia Reichert, James Klein, and Miles Mogulescu in 1976, was one such project of historical excavation.

The film is a collective portrait of three women labour organisers in the late 1920s and 1930s, who were part of a community of working-class Chicago socialists. Using a compilation structure that mixed archive footage and direct interview, the filmmakers attempt to reconstruct a history of women's involvement in labour organising. The women, Kate Hyndman, Stella Nowicki, and Sylvia Woods, tell their stories in the course of three separate interviews, which are intercut with each other and with period newsreel footage. In a partial retreat from direct cinema aesthetics, these interviews are conducted by audible and sometimes visible interviewers, a technique that adds to the personal and strongly narrative thrust of the documentary. The interviewees recount their experiences of organising to counteract exploitation in the workforce from a strongly radical perspective. They also tell a tale of sexism on the job, as well as within the unions and among leftist men. The one black woman, Sylvia, speaks of racial discrimination and her own conversion to interracial class unity by evidence of white class solidarity.

Union Maids works best as a tale of three working-class heroines in a period of great working-class power. The film is full of stirring stories of the women's militancy and bravery. Sylvia Woods describes how in the laundry where she first worked the women conducted what she believes may have been the first sit-down strike of the 1930s. Stella Nowicki recounts how often the packing house workers would stop the line, shutting down production. Kate Hyndman, the most obviously radical of the women, was laid off after writing an article for the Daily Worker. The use of three exceptional women, however, means that the film denies the larger reality of women's working lives, which were concentrated in mainly nonunionised clerical and service work. The film also skirts somewhat coyly around the question of the women's likely affiliations with the Communist Party, a strategy that ultimately serves to weaken both the film's documentary stance and radical underpinnings.

On a formal level, critical reception of Union Maids was initially informed by the 1970s critique of realism that affected both nonfiction and fiction film studies. A number of feminist film critics objected to the use of direct cinema techniques in the presentation of history. It was felt that the privileged film subjects of the interview format could become problematic if a film relied on them as the primary informants. The accounts of oral history subjects could be partial, fragmentary, idiosyncratic, and possibly misleading. In the context of a perceived need to construct a cinema that could both present individuals within the context of a complex social structure and simultaneously critique the film process itself, Union Maids was viewed as a flawed text.

The film was seen by several contemporary critics as deriving its central importance as an organising tool for women's and worker's organisations. Its importance as a potential catalyst was thus considered to render it immune from ideological analysis (McCormick 1977; Nichols 1991). The problem is one of unaccustomed 'against the grain' readings of leftist texts, texts that may contain a number of ideological contradictions. In the case of Union Maids, these devices could be said to be the interview format itself and the intersection of discourses of biography, autobiography, and popular narrative history. For Noel King, these discourses coalesce to present a problematic humanist-historicist, populist mode, particularly evident in the interview format used in the film. In this reading Union Maids tells its story of past events through an uncontested representation of the memories of the three women, suppressing any awkward questions on the social construction of these women themselves. Bill Nichols has also drawn attention to the epistemological problems presented by the use of archival footage as a confirmation for commentary, which normalises the footage as authentic (Renov 1993).

More recently, a critical recuperation of the realistic strategies used in Union Maids and similar historical documentaries has underlined its status as a feminist counterhistory. While recognising the dangers of an uncritical acceptance of documentary's realist illusions, several writers have pointed out that the same formal attributes of interviews, photographs, or voice-over narration can serve different functions in different films (Waldman and Walker 1999). Recognition of past struggles of working-class women, such as those depicted in Union Maids, can illuminate the extent to which individual volition and equal opportunity can be illusory or at least conditional.

MARINA BURKE

See also: In the Year of the Pig; Reichert, Julia

Union Maids (US, New Day Films, 1976, 54 mins). Produced and directed by James Klein, Miles Mogulesco, and Julia Reichert. Edited by James Klein and Julia Reichert. Cinematography by Sherry Novick and Tony Heriza.

Archival Film and Photographic Research by Julia Reichert with Barbara Tuss and Sherry Novick.

Further reading

- Erens, Patricia, 'Women's Documentary Filmmaking: The Personal is Political', in Alan Rosenthal (ed.), New Challenges for Documentary, Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1988.
- Gordon, Lynda, 'Union Maids: Working Class Heroines', in Peter Steven (ed.), Jump Cut: Hollywood, Politics and Counter-Cinema, Toronto: Between the Lines, 1985.
- Kaplan, E. Ann, 'Theories and Strategies of the Feminist Documentary', in Alan Rosenthal (ed.), New Challenges for Documentary, Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1988.
- King, Noel, 'Notes on "Union Maids" and "Harlan County USA"', Screen 22, no. 2, 1981: 7–18.
- Lesage, Julia, 'The Political Aesthetics of the Feminist Documentary Film', Quarterly Review of Film Studies, fall 1978: 506–23.
- McCormick, Ruth, 'Union Maids', Cineaste 8, no. 1, summer 1977.
- Nichols, Bill, Representing Reality, Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press, 1991.
- Renov, Michael (ed.), Theorising Documentary, London: Routledge, 1993.
- Waldman, Diane and Walker, Janet (eds), Feminism and Documentary, Minneapolis, MN: University of Minnesota Press, 1999.
- Winston, Brian, Claiming the Real, London: British Film Institute, 1995.

United Kingdom

The emergence of documentary filmmaking in Britain may be traced back to footage shot by amateur and professional cameramen who chronicled various expeditions during the early years of the twentieth century. Although such footage hardly resembles documentaries in the sense in which the term is commonly used today, these films used the cinematic medium to document 'realistic' elements that later would be exhibited for public audiences. Such visual records include the wildlife films of Cherry Kearton (which began production as far back as 1908) and the long-running Secrets of Nature series (1919–33), produced by Harry Bruce Woolfe and Percy Smith. After World War I, filmmakers such as Woolfe, Walter Summers, and Geoffrey Barkas produced films (including Armageddon (Woolfe, 1923), The Battle of the Falkland and Coronel Islands (Summers, 1927), and Q Ships (Barkas, 1928)), which combined authentic combat footage with reconstructed sequences. Although Britain was not the first to document elements outside the realm of fiction, such works were foundational in using film for educational and instructional purposes. Films such as these may be considered logical predecessors to what would become the British documentary film movement of the 1930s, arguably Britain's greatest contribution to the development of cinema.

After World War I, the outlook of domestic politics changed in Britain. The nature of the British government began to transform from the limited hierarchical undertakings of the nineteenth century to one that embraced a more active public interaction. The state began to feel an obligation to become involved in how its citizens were informed about various policies via publicity. The Empire Marketing Board (EMB) was set up in May 1926 by a Conservative government to administer the newly created Empire Marketing Fund to improve trade. Although the majority of the EMB's budget was spent on research, the Board became most recognized for its publicity activities.

The EMB's approach toward publicity was greatly influenced by public relations policies practiced in the United States. Such policies stressed the importance of education as the foundation for public relations initiated by government departments. Developments in media such as the use of film for publicity had effectively been used in the United States during World War I, and it soon became clear to the EMB that any official department would logically use film as a means to instruct and educate citizens. The secretary of the EMB was Stephen Tallents (1884–1958), an instrumental figure in the formation of the British documentary film movement. It was Tallents who would meet and collaborate with John Grierson and, in the process, initiate the assemblage of filmmakers who would compose the movement.

John Grierson (1898–1972) was born in Scotland and graduated from Glasgow University with an MA degree in English and moral philosophy in 1923. The next year he traveled to the United States on a Rockefeller research fellowship in social science. It was while studying in America that he became interested with how mass media (the popular press and eventually the cinema) could be used to propagandistic ends. During the late 1920s Grierson became influenced by the work of American author Walter Lippmann, whose views on education made quite an impression on him. Lippmann's Public Opinion (1922) is widely credited for inspiring Grierson to consider American propaganda expertise to develop films that would serve as educational tools. Grierson believed 'that because the citizen, under modern conditions, could not know everything about everything all the time, democratic citizenship was therefore impossible' (Grierson, in Forsyth Hardy, H (ed.) Grierson on Documentary (London: Faber & Faber, 1946), p. 207). Considering that motion pictures are a form of expression that target a mass audience, Grierson became dedicated to developing films that would inform citizens of social concerns with which they perhaps weren't familiar, ideally contributing to the formation of citizens who could make informed decisions based on democratic ideals.

Grierson believed that documentary films (or all films constructed from natural material, as he describes) were better suited to portray the reality of social issues in Britain than the dramatic conventions of fiction. Hollywood's motivation was purely commercial by his assessment, completely devoid of qualities he believed to be moral or artistic. Early cinematic influences on Grierson were the films of Robert Flaherty (1884–1951) and Soviet cinema of the 1920s; both provided an alternative to Hollywood through their tendency to dramatize fiction. Grierson himself familiarized the term documentary when he used it in a review of Flaherty's Moana (1926), describing it as 'a poetic record of Polynesian tribal life which had "documentary value"'. Grierson's insistence that documentary film was the most effective means to educate the public is reiterated in his three principles of 'documentary proper'. First, 'Documentary would photograph the living scene and the living story' (Grierson, in Forsyth Hardy, H (ed.) Grierson on Documentary (London: Faber & Faber, 1946), p. 147). Grierson believed that studio films largely ignored the potential for film to open up the screen to reality and instead relied on artificiality to communicate to an audience. Second is '(the belief that the original (or native) actor, and the original (or native) scene, are better guides to a screen interpretation of the modern world' (ibid.)). Finally, Grierson subscribed to '(the belief that the materials and the stories thus taken from the raw can be finer (more real in the philosophic sense) than the acted article' (ibid.)).

Grierson returned to Britain from the United States in 1927 and met Stephen Tallents, who at the time was developing a feature film suggested by Rudyard Kipling for the EMB entitled One Family. Tallents had appointed Walter Creighton, a man who knew little of filmmaking, as director of the project at the suggestion of Kipling. On meeting Grierson, Tallents was impressed with his ideas but had already appointed Creighton as the EMB's first Film Officer. Unwilling to lose Grierson as a collaborator, Tallents asked him to write a series of reports on film production for the EMB Film Committee. The first report (which dealt with the two issues most valuable to the Committee—how to use film as propaganda and how to compete with the American film industry) was titled 'Notes for English Producers'. In it, Grierson stated his interest in establishing a permanent film unit within the EMB. Grierson's second report dealt with the topic of film distribution and explained the possibilities of non-theatrical distribution as a means to circulate the films he envisioned the EMB producing. He also began to organize a series of screenings at the Imperial Institute where he screened various films such as British Instructional's Secrets of Nature series and various Russian films from the early 1920s.

In early 1928 Grierson proposed the production of two films to the Film Committee, to be made from newly shot footage. One of the films was to concern the herring industry, a topic that interested Financial Secretary to the Treasury Arthur Samuel (who contributed in approving the decision to begin film work) because of his position as Britain's authority on herring. On approval, Grierson set out to direct his first film, Drifters, in the summer of 1928.

The EMB entered into a contract with New Era Films in order to finance and distribute Drifters, as production of Creighton's feature film One Family had secured a generous amount of the Board's funding without any tangible results. The film was shot quickly and for the sum of nearly £3,000. Running for fifty minutes, the film depicts fishermen as they pursue herring shoals along the east coast of Britain. Shot by professional cameraman Basil Emmott, Drifters is obviously influenced by the silent Soviet filmic style, which Grierson was familiar with and admired. The film is among the first attempts at national cinema to stray from the Hollywood style of illusionism and to make use of montage to locate melodramatic effects in realistic material. It also portrays the working class in a romantic manner, a thematic development to which Grierson's productions would repeatedly return.

Drifters was finished in the summer of 1929. It premiered in a noncommercial setting on a bill with Eisenstein's Battleship Potemkin in front of the London Film Society, where it was well received. The film enjoyed commercial success as well, practically recouping its production costs after one year of distribution. The major triumph of Drifters was that it suggested that an alternative method of obtaining finance for filmmaking was possible, which existed largely (although not entirely) outside commercial concerns. Its success aided Grierson in convincing the EMB to set up its own film unit in January 1930.

After officially being appointed Assistant Film Officer of the EMB Film Unit in 1930, John Grierson began to assemble a crew of collaborators who would produce many of Britain's most important early documentary works. Among Grierson's first recruits for the EMB Film Unit was Basil Wright (1907–87), who began work in December 1929. Under Grierson, Wright assembled Conquest in 1930, a compilation film designed for schools about the wilderness of North America and the effects of technology, which pulls a portion its source material from footage of American westerns such as The Covered Wagon (James Cruze, 1923). In addition to Wright, those filmmakers who would become the first generation of the documentary film movement in Britain included Arthur Elton, Edgar Anstey, Stuart Legg, J.N.G. Davidson, John Taylor, Paul Rotha, Donald Taylor, Grierson's sisters, Marion and Ruby, Evelyn Spice, and Margaret Taylor, who would become Grierson's wife. The EMB Film Unit was also among the few units that would employ women behind the camera during this period. The majority of the recruits were middle class and had had a public school and university (Oxbridge) education. Of these new recruits, only Davidson, Elton, and Rotha had previous significant filmmaking experience.

Nearly all of Grierson's collaborators spent the early part of their time with the unit assembling films out of existing footage, as budget limitations prevented excessive shooting of new footage. These films found their source material from large stocks of film available from various parts of the Empire, primarily Canada, where a large number of travel films were available. The unit also produced 'poster' films, which were loops of film intended for use on projectors at EMB exhibitions and in shop windows. These early predecessors to the television commercial typically involved promoting Empire products such as Scottish tomatoes, Empire timber, wool, and butter.

By the 1920s American film industries had managed to dominate ninety-five percent of the film market in Britain, which led to the establishment of the Cinematograph Films Act in 1927. The purpose of the Act was to introduce a system of quotas that would increase the number of British films shown in the country, but in reality it had little effect. Although the British film industry did recover somewhat in the 1930s, American films still made up for more than seventy percent of films shown in Britain after the drafting of the Act. In addition, many of the films that were produced to meet the quota were made cheaply and shown to empty cinemas. Documentary films typically did not count in meeting the demands of the quota. It was not until the Cinematograph Films Act of 1938, when a separate standard of quotas were introduced for short films, that documentary films became eligible. The failure of documentary films to be incredibly successful in commercial release would lead Grierson and his collaborators to look toward nontheatrical distribution for the films that they were producing.

In January 1931 Grierson wanted to expand the production of the unit by producing a series of films that would be intended purely for nontheatrical distribution, including distribution to schools. He and the unit began to produce films that were slightly more advanced than previous efforts. Arthur Elton (1906–73) produced An Experiment in the Welsh Hills (1931), which documents a professor's experiments to obtain grasses and increase the suitability of sheep rearing in the Welsh mountain region. Elton also made Upstream (1931), which concerns salmon fishing in Scotland and makes use of impressive visuals, including a sequence of salmon leaping from waterfalls. Basil Wright made a one-reel film called Lumber (1931), which compiles footage from Canada about lumberjacking, and also shot The Country Comes to Town (1931), which draws connections between the countryside and the food industry. Wright also made his first truly personal film in 1932 with O'er Hill and Dale, a film about a Border shepherd in the lambing season. Documentary pioneer Robert Flaherty collaborated with Wright on The Country Comes to Town and became loosely associated with the unit in 1931. Grierson decided to spend nearly £2,500 to allow Flaherty to produce a film for the unit on craftsmanship in industry. Flaherty set out to film the steel bridge at Saltash, but the result was footage that began to come back to London without a concrete script. The EMB could not afford to continue the project, so the collaboration ended. Industrial Britain was later produced, however, combining the Flaherty footage with footage of waterways shot by Basil Wright and footage of coal mining shot by Arthur Elton. The film was released in 1933 under a combined production credit of Grierson and Flaherty. The necessity to maintain films for use in schools and other nontheatrical venues led to the creation of the Empire Film Library in October 1931. By 1936 the Empire Film Library was the largest film distributor to schools in Britain.

The incorporation of sound into motion pictures made it more difficult for the EMB Film Unit to get their films commercially released. The unit possessed no resources for recording sound, and all of the films made by the unit were silent, with some manner of musical accompaniment produced during exhibition. By 1932 it was difficult for silent films to obtain commercial distribution at all. Grierson, realizing the potential for the unit's films to obtain commercial distribution if sound were to be incorporated, asked the Film Committee in December 1931 for additional funds to create a sound studio. Although the Committee denied his request, both Tallents and Grierson began to negotiate with Gaumont-British Distributors in 1932 for the sale of six EMB films for commercial release. The films that were purchased—Shadow on the Mountain (Elton, 1933), King Log (Wright, 1932), The Country Comes to Town, Industrial Britain, Upstream, and O'er Hill and Dale—were given commentaries and musical scores by Andrew Buchanan (a leading short film director and producer) and packaged as the Imperial Six in 1933. Shadow on the Mountain and King Log were actually Elton's An Experiment in the Welsh Hills and Wright's Lumber, but were retitled and slightly edited when synchronized sound was added to them. Unfortunately, the films of the Imperial Six compromised Grierson's original vision. The commentaries and musical scores proved to be quite contradictory to the films themselves, and the Imperial Six proved to be the only films the EMB Film Unit would get into commercial release.

Grierson soon realized that industrial sponsorship could provide additional resources to finance films. Individual members of the unit were successful in obtaining sponsorship from industry and Arthur Elton made Voice of the World for His Master's Voice Gramophone Company in 1932, the first film to be made for an outside body by the unit. By this time Grierson's abilities as a producer were known outside of the confines of the unit, and he advised government agencies such as the Travel and Industrial Association and the Ministry of Labour on the unit's film activity. Such films produced as a result included Donald Taylor's Lancashire at Work and Play (1933) and Spring Comes to England (1934), as well as travel films such as So This is London (1933) and For All Eternity (1934) by Marion Grierson. Edgar Anstey (1907–87) emerged with his first two solo efforts, Eskimo Village and Uncharted Waters in 1932, while Aero Engine established Arthur Elton as a skilled filmmaker in 1934. Another film financed outside the central government was Stuart Legg's The New Generation, completed for the Chesterfield Education Authority in 1932.

By 1932 an earlier decision by the Select Committee on Estimates to abolish the EMB had begun to reveal its consequences. It had become increasingly difficult for Grierson to maintain funding for the unit, and he had begun to keep Tallents and many of his collaborators in the dark about financial and production concerns. Around this period, Tallents had been appointed the first public relations officer of the Post Office and ensured that the film unit would be among those organizations saved from the dissolution of the Board. Tallents believed in Grierson's vision that film had the potential to play perhaps the most important role in public information services and, in September 1933, he and the unit moved under the authority of the Post Office.

The commercial film trade industry began to become hostile toward the newly christened General Post Office (GPO) Film Unit after its transition from the EMB. The Gaumont-British group of film companies entered into the field of educational films in late 1933 and believed that the unit's intention to produce films for agencies outside the GPO would provide unfair competition. Even the Accountant-General's Department within the GPO felt that the unit's current home perhaps was not the best agency for a film unit to take on work for other departments and semipublic bodies. Despite the protests, the Treasury authorized the transfer of the unit to the Post Office for a trial period of six months.

The unit's transfer to the GPO provided the acquisition of sound recording equipment, although what was provided was not competitive with the equipment used by the Hollywood studios of the era. Nevertheless, the ability to record sound allowed the unit to become potentially more competitive in securing regular commercial distribution for their films. Grierson and his collaborators continued to operate much in the same manner that they did when the unit was part of the EMB. Grierson ensured that only himself and his office manager Stanley Fletcher were on the GPO's official payroll. The others members of the unit were employed by New Era Films, which by then no longer operated as a commercial company and largely participated solely in carrying out work for the GPO. Grierson used the employment of his unit by New Era to deter any accusations by the commercial film trade of using public resources to enter into competition with private enterprise. Grierson claimed that the unit was actually employing a commercial contractor in hiring New Era, and thereby satisfied requests by the film trade for the unit to exclusively hire outside contractors for their film work. The Treasury eventually realized what the unit was up to and ruled that the unit had to directly employ its staff and would not be allowed to produce work for other governmental departments and outside bodies.

Grierson then reorganized the unit according to the Treasury's requirements while largely ignoring the other restrictions it implemented. He continued production as he saw fit by maintaining that staff members not on the official payroll would continue to produce films for outside bodies, but those films already in production could be completed by staff members on the payroll. One of the most interesting films begun while the unit was still under the EMB was Granton Trawler (1934), a companion piece to Drifters that chronicles dragnet fishing off the Scottish Coast. Although John Grierson has claimed that he produced the film himself, various records list J.D. Davidson as cameraman and Edgar Anstey as editor. Other significant films beginning their production while the unit was still under the EMB included The Song of Ceylon (Basil Wright, 1934), BBC: The Voice of Britain (Stuart Legg, 1934), and Workers and Jobs (Arthur Elton, 1935).

The Empire Tea Marketing Expansion Board had requested four one-reel films of Ceylon in 1933 and Basil Wright traveled there to shoot them after completing footage for Cargo from Jamaica, Liner Cruising South, and Windmill in Barbados shortly beforehand the same year. He returned to cut The Song of Ceylon in 1934 and a soundtrack was subsequently added. The film, a combination of the four one-reelers, juxtaposes its soundtrack (including a seventeenth-century description of Ceylon and the modern echoes of radio broadcasts and phone conversations) with a beautiful visual depiction of the practices and rituals of Ceylon's inhabitants. The result draws attention to a contrast between the effect that the soundtrack provides and the stability of traditional practices in Ceylon. The Song of Ceylon is widely considered to be one of the most important documentaries to be produced by the movement and received first prize in the documentary class at the International Film Festival in Brussels. The film signified a renewed level of artistic achievement for the films of the British documentary movement.

The GPO Film Unit received £7,500 from the BBC in 1932 to produce BBC: The Voice of Britain. Like The Song of Ceylon, the film is a collaborative effort under the primary guidance of one filmmaker, in this case Stuart Legg. The film was the longest and most expensive venture the movement had undertaken up to that point, and even Grierson expressed some doubt that it would be completed efficiently. BBC: The Voice of Britain chronicles one day of broadcasting in Britain, which served to assist the BBC in showing the public a glimpse behind the scenes of its operations and a view of its new building. The film was widely shown in cinemas and was regarded as a triumph by the public and the film trade. While working for the GPO Film Unit, Arthur Elton produced Workers and Jobs for the Ministry of Labour in 1935. Elton wasn't officially on the payroll and thus was able to complete the work in accordance with the Treasury's requests. The film is about the work of Labour Exchanges and is revolutionary in its pioneering use of direct speech recording on location. The film resembles a newsreel and predates technically similar television reports by several years.

A major addition to the GPO Film Unit to come from the commercial film industry was Brazilian filmmaker Alberto Cavalcanti (1897–1983) in 1933. Cavalcanti had previously been a director in France and perhaps saw the GPO Film Unit as a way to break into the British feature film industry. He initially contributed to The Song of Ceylon by suggesting various experiments to Basil Wright, and he directed the films The Glorious Sixth of June and Pett and Pott for the GPO Film Unit in 1934. Cavalcanti's contribution to the film Coal Face (1935) is particularly notable. Although there is some dispute about the screen credits for Coal Face, it generally is regarded as Cavalcanti's film. It portrays an informative account of Britain's coal industry and emphasizes the tragedies of mining labor. The film features the collaboration of W.H. Auden and Benjamin Britten on the film's script and musical score, respectively, and '(foregrounds) the use of music and sound in a non-naturalistic way, so that natural sounds, dialogue, speech, music, and choral singing (are) integrated into a dramatic unity' (Aitken 1990). Although the film was not widely praised on its release, it received a medal of honor at Brussels. Grierson labeled the film 'Empo', a term he used to label films he thought were experimental.

The British Commercial Gas Association and the Gas Light and Coke Company commissioned Arthur Elton and Edgar Anstey early in 1935 to produce a number of films, two of which would prove to be significant: Housing Problems (1935) and Enough to Eat? (1936). Elton and Anstey had begun to allow subjects they were filming to speak directly for themselves on the soundtrack while filming. Housing Problems was significant in that it was among the first films to make use of interviews in this manner (predating the March of Time style of interviewing, which was typically manipulated in the studio) and to be sponsored by an industry that has no direct promotion in the film. The film introduces slum dwellers who in their own words explain their living conditions. For the first time, underprivileged people spoke freely about the condition of their lives, a radically different portrayal of citizens compared to the romantic image of the working class in many other films produced by Grierson. In 1936 Anstey wrote and directed Enough to Eat?, a film based on the work of Sir John Boyd Orr, which draws parallels between malnutrition and social class in Britain.

The direct interviews in the film were of 'experts' commenting on the film's subject, an innovation that would set the standard for thousands of informative documentary films.

Also in 1936 came Night Mail, directed by Basil Wright and Harry Watt (1906–87). Watt began working for Grierson in 1931 as a general assistant at the EMB. The film portrays a postal express train traveling from Euston to Glasgow, collecting and distributing mail. It contains little commentary and sound for the film was shot on location. One scene depicting letters being sorted in a railway carriage was actually recreated in a studio. Films such as Night Mail 'were not, significantly, of the straightforward pedagogical type of film, but were much more humanistic, and most important perhaps, employed narrative devices such as scripted dialogue, studio sets, and conventional dramatic development and resolution, which engaged viewers like regular commercial motion pictures' (Swann 1989). Paul Rotha mildly criticized Grierson for the use of overt romanticism toward the end of Night Mail, speculating that its inclusion may have been prompted by an attempt for box-office appeal (Rotha 1973). Regardless, the film proved to be one of the most popular documentaries turned out by the movement, achieving wide critical success and enjoying a modest theatrical run in commercial cinemas.

Paul Rotha (1907–84) was among the first of Grierson's collaborators to venture away permanently from the unit. Rotha wanted to make what he believed to be more personal films, an ambition that was not possible while working with Grierson's unit. Having previously made short trailers for the unit, Rotha produced Contact in 1933, a film that was financed by Shell-Mex and British Petroleum for £2,500. The film demonstrates how air routes and planes are assembled and concludes with a journey by air. Rotha would receive commercial backing from British Instructional over the next several years and would produce films such as Roadwards (1933), Rising Tide (1934), and Great Cargoes (1935). For Vickers Armstrong and the Orient Shipping Line, Rotha made Shipyard, a project shot over a period of months in 1934–5. The film documents the building of an Orient liner called the Orion and communicates the notion that, on completion of the ship, thousands of workers will face unemployment. Another significant film directed by Rotha is The Face of Britain (1935), which was sponsored by Hugh Quigley of the Central Electricity Board and deals with the use of electricity to organize a more efficient Britain. In 1935 Rotha would join an independent company called the Strand Film Unit as Director of Productions, producing sponsored documentary films to be shown in commercial cinemas.

Eventually, the restrictions placed on the GPO Film Unit and the desire to work elsewhere led to a number of significant departures. Arthur Elton left to make films for the Ministry of Labour and later would create the Shell Film Unit. Edgar Anstey departed to work for Shell and then ran the American March of Time series British film unit. Stuart Legg left to work for the Strand Film Company and Basil Wright parted ways to establish the Realist Film Unit. Finally, John Grierson left the unit in June 1937 to create Film Centre, an organization with the intent to take over the functions of Associated Realist Film Producers, which included the organization of sponsors and filmmakers.

Grierson's departure from the GPO Film Unit was met with the promotion of A.G. Highet to the position of Controller of Publicity and J.B. Holms to the post of Production Supervisor. Alberto Cavalcanti and Harry Watt both stayed on with the unit and brought a significant change to the kind of films the unit would produce. Cavalcanti and Watt led the GPO Film Unit away from the type of filmmaking for which the unit was previously known and toward films that used narrative techniques commonly associated with commercial cinema. Harry Watt made one of the first of these types of films while Grierson was still at the GPO Film Unit, called The Saving of Bill Blewitt (1936). The film makes use of scripted dialogue and studio sets and is based around a fictitious story. The film also is largely shot on location and uses nonprofessional actors. It proposes that the Post Office Savings Bank is the solution to the small businessman's problems. Harry Watt was to continue to produce these types of story documentaries on a much larger scale with North Sea (1938), a film he made for presentation at the Empire Exhibition in Glasgow. Based on true events, the film dramatizes a series of reports that Watt read involving ships caught in winter storms. The film was the most widely distributed film of all films produced by the GPO Film Unit, even receiving commercial distribution overseas.

The GPO Film Unit also produced a series of films dealing with international communications, including We Live in Two Worlds (1937) and Line to Tcherva Hut (1937), both directed by Alberto Cavalcanti. In addition to North Sea, other films produced for the Empire Exhibition included Mony a Pickle (1938) and The Tocher (1938). Another film the unit produced for the Ministry of Health was Health for the Nation (John Monck, 1939), which was a social documentary film directly about its sponsor. The unit also produced a series of films for display in the British Pavilion at the 1939 New York World's Fair dealing with British workers, including Men in Danger (Pat Jackson, 1939), British Made (George Pearson, 1939), and Spare Time (1939) directed by Humphrey Jennings (1907–50), one of the most significant directors of the British documentary movement. Spare Time is based on Jennings's connection with Mass Observation, a movement that attempted to apply ethnography to British society. The film shifts among portrayals of a brass band in the steel industry, the marching of a carnival band in the cotton industry, and the singing of a coal miners' choir. It contains hardly any commentary and tends to place its emphasis on the individuals in the various industries. The film paints a sympathetic, yet hardly romanticized, depiction of working-class leisure activities, later leading John Grierson to criticize the film. It would be the beginning of an artistically impressive output of production from Jennings during World War II.

The GPO Film Unit became the Crown Film Unit early in 1941, after the relocation of the unit's activity to the newly created Ministry of Information. The Crown Film Unit continued to produce documentaries that possessed a style similar to commercial films, a trend that had been occurring more frequently toward the end of the 1930s. The result was a steady output of films that were readily embraced by commercial audiences. Harry Watt's Target for Tonight (1941), which portrays a day in the life of a bomber squadron, became the most commercially successful documentary produced during World War II. Pat Jackson's Western Approaches (1944) was cast entirely from merchant seamen and depicts the aftermath of a torpedo attack on a convoy. Desert Victory (Roy Boulting, 1943) won the Academy Award for best feature-length documentary. By this point the unit had access to increased budgets and elaborate studio sets, factors that would distinctly separate their films from other documentaries of the time. The films they produced were also now regularly rented commercially.

The films of Humphrey Jennings during this period have been especially praised for their contribution to film art. His short film, Listen to Britain (1942), depicts a day in the life of Britain during wartime, presenting such imagery as factory workers juxtaposed with leisure activities taking place in a dance hall. Jennings's Fires Were Started (1943) documents a unit of the Auxiliary Fire Service and uses actual firemen as performers, and A Diary for Timothy (1944–5) combines the four stories of a farmer, an RAF pilot, a miner, and a railway engineer with the tale of a baby named Timothy. The contribution of Jennings's poetic marriage of sound and visual image remains a focus of critical attention on the documentaries produced by the Crown Film Unit.

The development of documentaries for television in Britain had begun as early as 1934, when the Selsdon Committee was formed to consider the medium's development. The BBC had established itself as a major sound broadcasting organization and was reluctant initially to invest its attention in television. By 1939 television in Britain had become a modest success, although during World War II the BBC would close down its operations and not reinstate them until 1946. By 1953 the BBC had begun to prioritize television's development and appointed former Grierson collaborator Paul Rotha as Head of Documentaries. Rotha saw the potential for television documentary and was committed to developing the new medium to socially inform Britain's citizens.

The television unit at the BBC during these early years was characterized by members who came from a multitude of backgrounds including Steve McCormack (theatre), Robert Barr and Norman Swallow (journalism), Caryl Doncaster (education), and Denis Mitchell (radio features). Three categories of programs that fell under the identification of 'documentary' were the dramatized documentary, the actuality documentary, and the magazine documentary (Bell 1986).

The dramatized documentary was a scripted, live production that featured professional actors. Locations were typically reproduced in the studio if possible, and the content of the stories for these films was taken from true life situations. Various subjects these films engaged included

'hooliganism, borstal, drugs, working women, children in care, problems of youth, marriage and old age, prostitution, industrial relations, declining industries' (Bell 1986). These programs were met with immediate popularity, but the cost of their production was significant. These dramatized documentaries re-created situations that caused controversy among those purists who were used to the documentation of real life events or 'actualities' in documentary film. Rotha defended these dramatized films through his assessment that realism within subject material was the true nature of documentary, regardless of how films are constructed.

Both the magazine and the actuality documentaries possessed content that was more journalistic than the dramatized documentary. Both used 'actualities' rather than scripted acting and interviews. One such notable actuality documentary production was the monthly series Special Enquiry (1952-7), which involved such national dilemmas as racial discrimination, illiteracy, slums, and international problems such as refugees, malaria, and soil erosion (Bell 1986). Special Enquiry was the first television program to speak from the point of view of the audience. It began to invite a consideration of documentary as a form of reporting (Corner 1991). Each episode was forty-five minutes long, consisting of an introduction from a studio presenter and concluding with a discussion with a studio guest following a filmed location report. The series was influential to the structure of British television journalism through its presentation of nonofficial speakers and presented a documentary type that moved beyond the sole portrayal of filmed or photojournalistic depiction.

The magazine documentary was far less serious in its intentions. Among the most popular television documentaries to be developed at the time, the magazine documentary resembled 'highly skillful travelogues with less scenery and more people' (Bell 1986). Within this form, represented by series such as London Town and About Britain, the first unscripted interviews in television documentary were used. The Documentary Department at the BBC was dissolved with the arrival of commercial television in 1955, with Rotha and its staff moving on to other projects.

Beginning in 1956, screenings at the National Film Theatre were organized in London. The films screened were organized by a group of young filmmakers and exhibited under the banner of Free Cinema. Those organizing the screenings (including Lindsay Anderson, best known as a critic at the time, and Karel Reisz, who had been program planner of the National Film Theatre) exhibited a variety of films, including documentary films they had produced. 'In the broadest terms, Free Cinema had two objectives: to show what it valued in the cinema, with the emphasis on the work of young contemporary filmmakers; and (to show) films to encourage other films to be made' (Hillier and Lovell 1972). The Free Cinema programs were committed to demonstrating the relationship between society and art, and the documentaries screened were assumed by the young organizers to portray this notion.

The films shown in the Free Cinema programs were generally free from the formal constraints placed on many commercial documentaries of the era. Their subject material, including a candid study of a jazz club in Momma Don't Allow (Karel Reisz and Tony Richardson, 1956), and an examination of popular culture through the people and exhibits of an amusement park in O Dreamland (Lindsay Anderson, 1953), were far different than many conventional documentary topics. Lindsay Anderson's Every Day Except Christmas (1957) offers a celebratory portrayal of British working-class people and owes much of its formal technique to the wartime films of Humphrey Jennings. Such films made use of new, lightweight equipment, which brought a renewed level of intimacy to documentary. The films were more ambiguous than previous documentary efforts and brought the viewer into places that were previously restricted. Lorenza Mazzetti's Together (1953) stands apart from other Free Cinema offerings because of its unique composition. The film uses long takes and slow editing rhythms to portray two oppositional communities, one of deaf-mutes and the other of traditional working-class people. Although most all of the documentaries screened at the Free Cinema programmes may be described simply as portrayals of British society in the 1950s, they approached their representations from a contemporary perspective that had not been experienced before. The Free Cinema showings lasted for nearly three years and included a total of six programs. Its organizers would shortly thereafter venture into the realm of feature filmmaking, producing films that would make use of many of the techniques of the Free Cinema documentaries. Such notable examples include Look Back in Anger (Tony Richardson, 1959), The Entertainer (Tony Richardson, 1960), A Taste of Honey (Tony Richardson, 1961), and Saturday Night and Sunday Morning (Karel Reisz, 1960).

In the early 1960s, the nature of programming at the BBC began to change. New possibilities were offered through technological advances (such as the use of videotape), allowing broadcasts to depart from transmitting live dramatic performances. The boundary between fiction and documentary subsequently began to blur in broadcasts known as documentary dramas, programs that took advantage of the opportunities offered by the advances such as editing and the incorporation of nonprofessional actors into productions. Among the most influential directors of such works is Ken Loach (1936–), who along with socialist playwright Jim Allen (1926–99), would produce some of the most important documentary dramas of the era.

Loach's career at the BBC began as director of three episodes of Z Cars (1962–78) in 1964 and soon led him to direct three episodes of the six-part series Diary of a Young Man in late 1964. These early works, however, were not representative of the stylistic blurring of documentary and drama that Loach would use in his later films. In 1965 he began to direct the first of ten plays he would produce for The Wednesday Play series. Three of these plays, Up the Junction (1965), Cathy Come Home (1966), and In Two Minds (1967), would establish Loach as a politically minded visionary whose films combine social and political dilemmas as a commentary on the contemporary climate of Britain.

Up the Junction's realistic depiction of abortion was viewed by more than ten million people during its first transmission. More than four hundred complaints were expressed to the BBC after its broadcast, most concerning the film's use of language and portrayal of abortion. The film uses documentary elements including an interview with a doctor who suggests the revision of laws preventing legalized abortions. Many viewers were confused as to whether they were watching a news broadcast or a fictionalized drama when the film originally aired, as it was shown directly after the evening news. Loach claimed that '(he) was very anxious for (his) plays (to) not be considered dramas but as continuations of the news'. Up the Junction makes use of 1960s pop music and uses a fragmentary narrative structure similar to its source novel, written by Nell Dunn.

Cathy Come Home's portrayal of homelessness and poverty has reached iconic status in Britain since its original broadcast in 1966. The film's blending of documentary elements with fiction realistically portrays the tragedies that befall a working-class family after an accident, eventually resulting in the family's destruction. In one particularly memorable scene, Social Services removes Cathy's (Carol White) children from her after her separation from husband Reg (Ray Brooks). The film favors location shooting, and its formal techniques owe much to the stylistic influence of the Free Cinema documentaries. Cathy Come Home also prompted political outrage from its audience after its original broadcast, so much so that its re-airing a few months later revealed several omissions from the version originally broadcast. The reaction from the film's audience eventually led to the establishment of Shelter, a homelessness charity.

In Two Minds involves the story of Kate Winter (Anna Cropper), a young woman who eventually is driven to madness by her familial environment. Loach would remake the film in 1971 as Family Life, but not before controversy would surround the original. In Two Minds prompted concern from critics such as James Thomas in the Daily Express, who believed that its intense style was too realistic not to carry announcements before and after broadcasts explaining the film's fictional nature. The film also received criticism from the psychiatric community, who judged its portrayal of schizophrenia and of medical workers who assist Kate as inaccurate.

Loach's collaborations with Jim Allen are arguably his most politically important works produced for television. Having previously written scripts for the British soap opera Coronation Street in 1964, Allen was commissioned to write The Lump for Wednesday Play in 1967. His first collaboration with Loach, The Big Flame (1969), recounts the story of the occupation of a port in Liverpool by dock workers. Widely considered to be among Loach's most political films, The Big Flame 'dealt head-on with fundamental questions of ownership, class conflict, the role of the state, and political organization and mobilization' (Petley 1997). The dock workers form a port workers' council and attempt to run the dock themselves. Eventually they are defeated by forces that include the trade union movement and the Labour Party. 'Here appears the key theme which will dominate much of Loach's subsequent work, whether in dramas such as The Rank and File (1971) and Days of Hope (1975), or ill-fated documentaries, such as Questions of Leadership (1983): namely, that Labour politicians and trade union leaders are terrified of mass action by the militant working class, since it threatens the very structures on which their own power and position are based' (Petley 1997).

Loach and Allen would again work together on the film The Rank and File, based on the Pilkington's glass workers' strike of 1970. The film was followed by yet another collaboration, the ambitious four-part Days of Hope in 1975, a film that traces the upheavals of the British Labour movement from 1916 to the General Strike in 1926. The film (Loach's first historical piece) unveils its narrative through the lives of three characters. It is strongly influenced by the politics of 1970s Britain and was condemned by Conservative politicians for its harsh portrayal of the government. The film's style continues Loach's naturalistic visual approach and breaks the conventional expectations of television drama through the use of a technique with spoken dialogue that seems improvisational and disorganized. Ultimately, Allen was accused of mixing fact and fiction and of distorting the facts of history to deliver a political message, and some critics began to suspect that the BBC was adopting a left-wing philosophy. Loach would move toward directing feature films in the years after working for the BBC including Poor Cow (1967), Land and Freedom (1995), Carla's Song (1996), My Name is Joe (1998), and The Navigators (2001).

Another important figure who produced groundbreaking documentary dramas for the BBC is Peter Watkins (1935–). After receiving his education at Cambridge, Watkins became an amateur documentary filmmaker, producing short works such as The Diary of an Unknown Soldier (1959), in which a World War I soldier narrates his last days of being alive, and The Forgotten Faces (1961), a film concerning a revolt in Hungary. In 1964 Watkins was hired by the BBC and produced his first notable work, Culloden. The film showcases Watkins's trademark style, which combines drama with handheld camerawork and faux 'newsreel' interview footage of nonprofessional actors who were instructed to acknowledge the camera. Culloden follows a television crew as they cover the 1746 Battle of Culloden and contains realistic battle footage as Watkins places the viewer 'on location' with the news crew, complete with jarring camerawork and a soundtrack that allows the viewer to hear the horrors of war without actually viewing them. The film not only challenges the notion of how history has traditionally been recorded but also makes evident the fallacies of historical fiction.

Watkins's next film was The War Game (1965), which again uses his distinctive style to portray the atrocities of nuclear war. The film features interviews with 'survivors' of a nuclear strike on Britain and is convincing through its use of documents, scientific studies, charts, and face-to-face interviews. The BBC originally banned the film from being broadcast in 1966 because of its intensely graphic nature and the chance that it could convince its viewers into believing its authenticity. The film was eventually transmitted on television nearly twenty years later in 1985. The War Game did receive a small theatrical run shortly after its completion, winning the Oscar for Best Documentary Feature in 1967. Watkins later would direct his only feature film, the science fiction failure Privilege, with funding from Universal in 1966 and subsequently worked primarily in Scandinavia after leaving the United Kingdom. Punishment Park (1971), a pseudo-documentary that follows a group of soldiers as they escort liberals across a desert, and Edvard Munch (1974), a biography of the Norwegian artist, later followed.

In 1964 Britain's Granada Television began what would become the longest running documentary series in visual history with the production of 7Up (Paul Almond), a film that interviews a group of British children from various backgrounds about a variety of subjects, including their outlook on life and prospects for the future. Michael Apted (who was an assistant on the film) revisited the same children seven years later and directed 7 Plus Seven in 1970. Apted would revisit the children in seven-year intervals after 7 Plus Seven, resulting in the films 21 Up (1977), 28 Up (1984), 35 Up (1992), and 42 Up (1999). The films provide an interesting chronology of the social progression of Britain and contemporary culture at large, as various participants become poverty stricken while others appear to find fulfillment in their lives.

One of Britain's most recognizable documentary filmmakers, Nick Broomfield (1948–), is also one of documentary film's most innovative. His insistence on placing himself within the context and frame of those subjects and situations he documents has become characteristic of what Stella Bruzzi calls 'performative' documentary filmmaking. Broomfield's presence within his films draws attention to the construction of nonfiction filmmaking as one type of representation, as opposed to a portrayal of unmediated reality (Bruzzi 2000).

Broomfield was born in London and made his first film, Who Cares? (1971), a study of a working-class community in Liverpool, with financial assistance from the British Film Institute. After studying law at Essex University, he joined the National Film School at Beaconsfield and produced Proud to Be British in 1973. The film is a series of opportunities for various citizens to explain what it means to them to be British. Behind the Rent Strike was completed in 1974 and features people from Who Cares? as a companion piece to the earlier film. Beginning in 1976, Broomfield made the first of several films with American filmmaker Joan Churchill and began to apply a style more aligned with the observational cinema of Fredrick Wiseman. Juvenile Liaison (1976) follows two police officers and their dealings with youth. The film documents the incredibly harsh treatment of youth at the hands of the police and was later withdrawn from distribution after pressure from the authorities. Broomfield would later revisit the subject in 1990 with Juvenile Liaison 2 (1990).

After temporarily dissolving his partnership with Churchill, Broomfield began to more readily exhibit the confrontational, participatory documentary style that has characterized his career, with 1988's Driving Me Crazy. The film, about the making of a film of a black stage musical, begins to take an unfortunate turn, and Broomfield soon places himself within the film's frame. The result is what Broomfield believes to be a more honest approach to filmmaking, allowing the viewer to make decisions based on the interaction between interviewer and interviewee instead of the former hiding behind the scenes.

Broomfield uses the same stylistic approach in his film The Leader, His Driver and the Driver's Wife (1991), a documentation of Eugene Terreblanche, the leader of the neo-Nazi Afrikaner Resistance Movement (the AWB) in South Africa. Tracking Down Maggie (1994) continues to use the same participatory approach through its attempt to document Margaret Thatcher, with little success, as do many of Broomfield's more recent and financially successful documentaries, including Aileen Wuornos: The Selling of a Serial Killer (1992), Heidi Fleiss: Hollywood Madam (1995), Kurt and Courtney (1998), and Biggie and Tupac (2002).

Filmmaker Molly Dineen similarly uses herself as an active participant in her films. Instead of becoming actively visible like the stylistic approach of Broomfield, however, Dineen uses her voice behind the camera not only to communicate with on-screen interviewees but also to constantly remind the viewer of the constructedness of documentary. Her earlier work includes Home from the Hill (1985), a film made while she was attending the National Film and Television School that documents a retired soldier and safari operator returning from Kenya to England, and My African Farm (1988), a portrait of Colonel Sylvia Richardson and her servants on a farm in Kenya over Christmas. A documentary about people working at the Angel Underground Station, 1989's Heart of the Angel, characterizes Dineen's early style in that it refuses explanatory voice-over narration in an exchange for Dineen's personal encounters with her subjects. 'As with many 1960s direct cinema films such as Salesman, Heart of the Angel is reliant upon the subjects' performances for and to the camera' (Bruzzi 2000).

Dineen's 1993 BBC effort, The Ark, is a series of four one-hour films about London Zoo during six months of crisis. Facing financial ruin, the zoo exports more than 1,300 animals (about one-third of the entire zoo's collection) and 26 keepers. The film clearly continues the observational style of Dineen's previous efforts, with scenes extending for minutes without any commentary from the director. Critics drew parallels between the situation presented in the film and growing turmoil within official bodies such as the Labour Party, The Church of England, and the BBC itself. The film never really sentimentalizes the subject material and instead offers the observation of stunning visuals to communicate to its audience. Dineen's later work includes: In the Company of Men (1995), a series of three one-hour films with The Prince of Wales company of the Welsh Guards on a tour of duty in Northern Ireland; Tony Blair (1997), a ten-minute portrait of Tony Blair broadcast before the 1997 election campaign; and Geri (1999), a ninety-minute documentary that follows Geri Halliwell (also known as Ginger Spice) in the three months after her departure from the pop group The Spice Girls. In 2002 Molly Dineen produced The Lord's Tale, a film for Channel 4 about the reform of the House of Lords.

Another notable filmmaker hailing from Britain who helped to destroy the conventions associated with documentary is Nicholas Barker. Barker's television series, Signs of the Times (BBC, 1992) consists of a series of interviews with individuals about good and bad taste. The approach to the series 'is minimalist, stylized and possesses a stylistic uniformity that gives it a clear identity and lends it a fetishistic intensity, mesmerized by superficialities, appearance and detail' (Bruzzi 2000). Stella Bruzzi argues that because Signs of the Times is self-conscious in its style, it reflects its subjectivity and authorship and thereby becomes performative by challenging notions of fixed identity and truth. The characters on the show 'are performative on two counts: they are performing their words by being the embodiments of their identified tastes and attitudes, and they perform their interviews in such a way as to raise questions about spontaneity and documentary authenticity' (Bruzzi 2000).

Barker's film Unmade Beds (1997) expands on this notion through setting up a premise that calls attention to the authenticating procedures of documentary. Barker, deciding to make a film about the personals scene in New York City, began interviewing more than 400 candidates before eventually deciding on the four individuals used in the film. Working from the actors' own versions of their life stories, Barker produced a script that the actors followed while shooting the film. The result is a fictional documentation based on real life events and acted out by the people on whom those events are based. Questions of authenticity are problematic in the film and in the process raise important questions about the possibility of truthful representation. Unmade Beds demonstrates that perhaps all representations contain elements of both fiction and nonfiction, and that the attempt to capture 'reality' in visual media is indeed an impossible pursuit.

See also: Anderson, Lindsay; Anstey, Edgar; BBC: The Voice of Britain; Cavalcanti, Alberto; Coal Face; Desert Victory; Drifters; Elton, Arthur; Enough to Eat?; Every Day Except Christmas; Granton Trawler; Grierson, John; Housing Problems; Industrial Britain; Legg, Stuart; Line to Tcherva Hut; Loach, Ken; Momma Don't Allow; Night Mail; Reisz, Karel; Song of Ceylon, The; Target for Tonight; War Game, The; Watkins, Peter; Watt, Harry; We Live in Two Worlds; Wright, Basil

Further reading

- Aitken, Ian, Film and Reform: John Grierson and the Documentary Film Movement, London and New York: Routledge, 1990.
- Bell, Elaine, 'The Origins of British Television Documentary: The BBC 1946–55', in John Corner (ed.), Documentary and the Mass Media, London: Edward Arnold, 1986.
- Bruzzi, Stella, New Documentary: A Critical Introduction, London and New York: Routledge, 2000.
- Corner, John, 'Documentary Voices', in John Corner (ed.), Popular Television in Britain: Studies in Cultural History, London: British Film Institute, 1991.
- Grierson, John, Grierson on Documentary, London: Fabor & Fabor, 1946.
- Hillier, Jim and Lovell, Alan, Studies in Documentary, London: Secker & Warburg, 1972.
- Izod, John, Kilborn, Richard and Hibberd, Matthew (eds), From Grierson to the Docu-Soap: Breaking the Boundaries, Luton: University of Luton Press, 2000.
- Laing, Stuart, 'Ken Loach: Histories and Contexts', in George McKnight (ed.), Agent of Challenge and Defiance: The Films of Ken Loach, Westport, CT: Praeger Publishers, 1997.
- Low, Rachael, Documentary and Educational Films of the 1930s, London: Allen & Unwin, 1979.
- Orbanz, Eva, Journey to a Legend and Back: The British Realistic Film, trans. by Stuart Hood, Berlin: Volker Speiss, 1977.
- Petley, Julian, 'Factual Fictions and Fictional Fallacies: Ken Loach's Documentary Dramas', in George McKnight (ed.), Agent of Challenge and Defiance: The Films of Ken Loach, Westport, CT: Praeger Publishers, 1997.
- Rotha, Paul, Documentary Diary, New York: Hill & Wang, 1973.
- Sussex, Elizabeth, The Rise and Fall of British Documentary, Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1975.
- Swann, Paul, The British Documentary Film Movement 1926–46, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1989.

Urban, Charles

Charles Urban is arguably the leading pioneer of the nonfiction film. Others, such as the Lumières, Léon Gaumont, Charles Pathé, and George Kleine, may have worked in similar fields, but none spoke as loudly or covered so wide a range as Urban. His ambitions were laid out in his 1907 booklet, The Cinematograph in Science, Education and Matters of State, which expounded his belief in the instructional role that film had to take in society (as well as having what is probably the first use in English of the word documentary in a filmic sense). Urban's career is distinctive not only for its idealistic espousal of nonfiction film, but because he tried to marry this mission with the fields of salesmanship and showmanship in which his career was grounded. His career demonstrates both the exciting range of options for the producer that the early cinema period seemed to promise and the narrowing of those options in reality as the cinema programme became established along specific lines.

Urban's rise and fall can be traced through five distinctive phases, each illustrative of the options open to the producer of nonfiction film in the first years of cinema. The first phase, to 1903, was that of the American salesman galvanising the complacent early British film business. Urban's first thirty years were spent in America, where he started out as a high-class book salesman, moving through the systems of automation and production found in office stores to market phonographs, Kinetoscopes, Vitascope, and finally his own film projector, the Bioscope. It was with this practical device that he came to Britain in 1897, turning an American off-shoot company into the dynamic Warwick Trading Company. As producer, distributor, and equipment supplier, Urban made an indelible stamp on the British film business and laid the groundwork for what seemed like a native aptitude for film of reality.

The second phase saw Urban as owner of his own company, the Charles Urban Trading Company (founded 1903). Here Urban opened up the range of nonfiction films as fiction films themselves began to grow in length and range of forms. For Urban, his films of science, travel, sport, exploration, and medicine were every bit as entertaining as the fiction film, with the added value of social usefulness. 'To amuse and entertain is good', ran one of his slogans, 'to do both and instruct is better'. Urban employed skilful scientific filmmakers with a populist bent, such as F. Martin Duncan and Percy Smith, French surgeon Eugène-Louis Doyen, mountaineer F. Ormiston-Smith, and war cameraman Joseph Rosenthal, all of whom could contribute to Urban's proudest slogan, 'We put the world before you'. At a time when fifty percent of all British film production was nonfiction, at least fifty percent of all British nonfiction film was produced by Urban. He established Britain's national cinematic picture of itself.

In 1908 Urban launched Kinemacolor (first named in 1909), a natural colour process using red and green filters, which seemed to promise cinema's greatest fidelity to real life yet. Urban's Kinemacolor productions caused a sensation in the period 1909–13, for the dazzling nature of the colour (inadequate as it now seems to modern eyes), for its theatrical presentation and consequent high prices, for the unprecedented length of its programmes, and particularly for its emphasis on royal spectacle. Urban's greatest Kinemacolor triumph came with With Our King and Queen Through India (1912), which ran for two and a half hours and featured the spectacular Delhi Durbar ceremonies.

Kinemacolor fiction films were made as well, but Urban had little aptitude for drama, and the results were notably poor. Urban sold exclusive Kinemacolor licences to international territories and seemed to have made his fortune, but a court case from a rival colour system in 1913 led to the invalidation of the patent.

World War I saw Urban faced with the reality of putting his motion pictures at the service of the state. What Urban had advocated urgently, in practice proved far more problematic. He produced a documentary feature for the covert War Propaganda Bureau, Britain Prepared, and was directed to take it to America in 1916. Urban battled equally against hostile American exhibitors and British propagandists unsympathetic toward his showman's sensibilities. Urban edited the outstanding documentary feature, The Battle of the Somme, but found this no easier to get onto American scenes, blundering badly when he tried to get a distribution deal with the anti-British Hearst's International Film Service. America's entry into the war made Urban's task suddenly much easier, and he proved an effective editor and distributor of British official films in America for the remainder of the war.

The British film business now in ruins, Urban decided to settle once more in America and, in the final phase of his career, to establish himself as an educational filmmaker. Urban had always viewed himself in this light, producing the world's first educational film catalogue in 1908, even if the specific educational utility of his films was never made clear. In postwar America, the Visual Education movement was encouraging greater use of moving pictures in the classroom, and Urban was one among many producers fighting for this new market. Urban became over-ambitious, creating the grandiose Urban Institute building in Irvington, NY, and pouring thousands into a filmless disk viewer called the Spirograph; however, all that Urban had to support this activity were two minor magazines and some imaginative documentary features made with the naturalist Raymond Ditmars. His business collapsed in 1924. Ironically, 16mm film and a fully fledged non-theatrical film circuit now emerged, just as Urban—who had so long advocated for film to reach out to where specific audiences needed it—was forced to bow out of the scene.

Urban was the preeminent advocate of the full function of cinema at just that time when the options for exhibiting films were at their narrowest. As the cinema programme evolved, the nonfiction film came to occupy an increasingly small portion of what was shown on the screen. Exasperated by the inexorable rise of the fiction film, Urban was ultimately a prophet for the nontheatrical film who never himself made it to the promised land.

LUKE MCKERNAN

See also: Battle of the Somme

Biography

Born Cincinnati, Ohio, April 15, 1867. Settled in Detroit in 1889, opening Phonograph parlour, 1893. Expanded business to include Kinetoscopes, 1895. Obtained Michigan agency for Vitascope projector, before developing own projector, the Bioscope, 1896. Moved to Britain as manager of London branch of Maguire & Baucus, 1897, which became Warwick Trading Company, 1898. Formed own film business, Charles Urban Trading Company, 1903. Launched two-colour natural colour film system, later called Kinemacolor, 1908. Natural Color Kinetograph Company forced into liquidation, 1914. Produced documentary feature Britain Prepared for War Propaganda Bureau, 1915. Marketed British official war films in America, 1916–18. Formed Urban Motion Picture Industries, based in Irvington, NY, 1920. Urban Motion Picture Industries bankrupt, 1924. Returned to Britain by end of 1920s and retired from film business. Died in Brighton, August 29, 1942.

Selected films

- 1902 Le Sacre d'Edouard (Méliès): producer
- 1907 Torpedo Attack on HMS Dreadnought: producer
- 1908 The Balancing Bluebottle: producer
- 1910 A Day in the Life of a Coal Miner: producer
- 1910 S.S. Olympic: producer
- 1911 The Coronation of King George V and Queen Mary: producer
- 1912 With Our King and Queen Through India: producer.
- 1915 Britain Prepared: producer
- 1916 The Battle of the Somme (McDowell, Malins): editor
- 1921 The Four Seasons (Ditmars): producer
- 1921 Permanent Peace: producer
- 1923 Evolution (Ditmars): producer

Further reading

- McKernan, Luke, 'Putting the World Before You: The Charles Urban Story', in Andrew Higson (ed.), Young and Innocent? The Cinema in Britain, 1896–1930, Exeter: University of Exeter Press, 2002.
- Urban, Charles, A Yank in Britain: The Lost Memoirs of Charles Urban, Film Pioneer, Luke McKernan (ed.), Hastings: The Projection Box, 1999.

V

Vachek, Karel

From his cinéma vérité films of the 1960s through his ‘film novels’ of the 1990s, maverick Czech filmmaker Karel Vachek has been known for his outspoken refusal to conform to aesthetic or political trends and for pioneering a new visual and narrative style for social documentary. A 1963 graduate of FAMU, the Film Faculty of the Academy of Music and Performing Arts in Prague, Vachek has been called the enfant terrible of the Czechoslovak New Wave (Navrátil 1992), a group of artists whose formal and conceptual experimentation gained international recognition in the 1960s. This reputation was born with his FAMU thesis film, Moravská Hellas/Moravian Hellas (1963). The thirty-three-minute documentary, filmed at the Strážnice folk festival, satirized communist perversion of folk culture, using a hybrid style that combined elements of cinéma vérité with staged interviews. The film was so controversial that after its release Vachek was banned from filmmaking until 1968, when the reforms of Alexander Dubček’s ‘socialism with a human face’ eliminated censorship and lessened restrictions on personal and creative expression. That year, Vachek produced the cinéma vérité film Spřiznění volbou/Elective Affinities (1968).

Shot on a handheld 16mm Éclair camera, the film chronicles the events and climate surrounding Antonín Novotný’s fall from power and the beginning of Ludvík Svoboda’s presidency. Less than six months later, Warsaw Pact armies invaded Czechoslovakia, marking the end of the Prague Spring and heralding the beginning of more than twenty years of Soviet rule. With censorship and restrictions on artists more stringent than ever, Vachek, like many other intellectuals and artists, was unable to make films.

After a five-year period of exile in France and the United States, and a number of years working outside of the film industry in Czechoslovakia, Vachek returned to his profession in 1989.

Vachek’s films of the 1990s mark a shift in his style and approach, although his new work retains characteristics of his cinéma vérité heritage. The four parts of the Little Capitalist Tetralogy, each between three and four hours long, are Nový Hyperion aneb Rovnost volnost bratrství/New Hyperion or Equality Liberty Brotherhood (1992), which traces the presidential elections of 1990 in Czechoslovakia; Co Dělat? Cesta z Prahy do Českého Krumlova aneb Jak jsem sestavoval novou vládu/What Is to be Done? A Journey from Prague to Cesky Krumlov or How I Formed a New Government (1996), which follows a group of artists and intellectuals on a bus trip between the two cities, capturing their debates and arguments alongside the mystical history of Cesky Krumlov; Bohemia Docta aneb Labyrint světa a lusthauz srdce (Božská Komédie)/Bohemia Docta or Labyrinth of the World and Paradise of the Heart (Divine Comedy) (2000), a commentary on the state of the intellectual in the Czech Republic; and Dalibor: Kdo bude hlídat hlídače aneb Klíč chaloupce strýčka Toma/Dalibor: Who’s Gonna Watch the Watchman? or The Key to Uncle Tom’s Cabin (2003), a probing of the state of the nation at the end of the millennium, set during a piano rehearsal of Bedřich Smetana’s opera Dalibor. Taken collectively, the films comprise a dialogic history of the political and social changes that gripped the Czech lands between 1990 and the end of the millennium.

The films of the Tetralogy develop their narratives with a mixture of vérité moments, staged sections, and long on-screen conversations between the director and a series of subjects, set in aesthetically interesting or connotative locations. Most of the men and women who populate the films, many of them recurring figures, were generally dissidents or outsiders under the Soviet regime and remain on the fringes of post-1989 society. They are artists and professors, writers and political activists. Vachek guides these subjects through philosophical or political debates in circuitous, frequently comical paths toward a poetic vision of the state and the individual in the modern world. Although politics are central to these films, Vachek is primarily concerned with the philosophical aspects of politics. His perspective is that of an exile, guided by a conviction that social and political change can originate only on the periphery of society.

Although the Tetralogy draw its characters and themes from the era in which it was created, the films resist strict categorization as documentary, moving instead between reportage and fictionalization, performance and poetic reflection. The director, in fact, objects to his films' classification as documentaries, preferring to call them 'film novels'. Their titles, indeed, are derived from literature—New Hyperion, for example, from Holderlein, and What Is to be Done? from Chernishevsky. Further distinguishing his work from traditional documentary, Vachek uses aesthetics borrowed from fiction films. He shoots with cumbersome, expensive 35mm film instead of video or 16mm film; his sequences and shots are highly planned; and, alongside documentary moments, Vachek inserts staged scenes. Although Vachek's films have been criticized as hermetic or provocative, his work has nonetheless proved a central influence on a successive generation of documentary filmmakers in the Czech Republic, among them Jan Gogola Jr and Vít Janeček, and has found a pedagogical home in the documentary department of FAMU, where Vachek has taught since 1993.

ALICE LOVEJOY

Biography

Born August 4, 1940 in Tišnově, Czechoslovakia. Attended FAMU, the Film Faculty of the Academy of Music and Performing Arts in Prague, from 1958–63, where he studied directing under Elmar Klos. Banned from filmmaking after the release of Moravian Hellas in 1963, and again after the release of Elective Affinities in 1968. Emigrated in 1979, first to France, and then to the United States. Returned to Czechoslovakia in 1984. Awarded the Berlinale Camera award in 1990. Since 1993, has taught documentary at FAMU; since 2002, chair of FAMU's documentary department.

Selected films

- 1963 Moravská Hellas/Moravian Hellas
- 1968 Spříznění volbou/Elective Affinities
- 1992 New Hyperion or Equality Liberty Brotherhood
- 1996 Co Dělat? Cesta z Prahy do Českého Krumlova aneb Jak jsem sestavoval novou vládu/What Is to be Done? A Journey from Prague to Cesky Krumlov or How I Formed a New Government
- 2000 Bohemia Docta aneb Labyrint Světa a Lusthauz Srdce (Božská Komédie)/Bohemia Docta or Labyrinth of the World and Paradise of the Heart (Divine Comedy)
- 2003 Dalibor: Kdo bude hlídat hlídače aneb Klíč chaloupce strýčka Toma/Dalibor: Who's Gonna Watch the Watchman or The Key to Uncle Tom's Cabin

Further reading

- Buchar, Robert, Czech New Wave Filmmakers in Interviews, Jefferson, NC: McFarland, 2004.
- Camhi, Leslie, 'Spring Forward', The Village Voice, February 13–19, 2002.
- Hames, Peter, The Czechoslovak New Wave, Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1985.
- Liehm, Antonín J. and Liehm, Mira, The Most Important Art: Eastern European Film After 1945, Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1977.
- Navrátil, Antonín, 'Nejdelsí Cesky Film', in Lidové Noviny, April 16, 1992 (in Czech).
- Slater, Thomas J., 'Czechoslovakia', in Thomas J. Slater (ed.), Handbook of Soviet and East European Films and Filmmakers, New York: Greenwood Press, 1992.
- Stoll, Martin, Hundred Years of Czech Documentary Film (1898–1998), Prague: Malá Skála, 2000.

Varda, Agnès

Agnès Varda is often referred to as the 'grandmother' of the French New Wave. Varda is the only woman strongly connected to this avant-garde film movement of the 1950s and 1960s, and her work is both technically innovative and politically motivated as she uses the camera as a tool for social investigation. Varda's interest in the construction of gender and the inherent codification of gender via popular representation is seen throughout her body of work. Her La Pointe Courte (1956) is often cited as the first New Wave feature. Sandy Flitterman-Lewis argues for this association as she describes the aesthetics of the film, noting its 'concern with temporality, the interfacing of subjective realities, the articulation of discursive modes, the pervasive "sense of place", the aspect of research, both sociological and linguistic, the interest in permutations of the narrative form, the techniques of distancing and cultural critique, the redefinition of spectatorship, the self-reflexivity about cinematic meaning, and the challenge to establish forms of cinematic storytelling' (Flitterman-Lewis 1990: 260). The film explores the struggles of people in a small Mediterranean fishing village. Her L'Opéra-Mouffe (1958) displays her evolving documentary technique, as it shows scenes from a market without the intervention of reportage or other narration.

As her work continued, Varda made both documentary and fictional narratives, using each to engage in social commentary. Her films deal with personal expression, the differences between people and the way they behave, and the social and cultural contexts that shape us. After a few well-received feature narratives, Varda made two documentaries in the United States in the late 1960s. Her Uncle Yanco (1967) deals with the 'discovery' of Varda's uncle living in San Francisco, California. This was followed by her 1968 documentary, Black Panthers, a piece that showed this politically active group as an integral part of the shifting culture in the United States. The work shows the experience of a rally to free Panther Huey Newton from jail. Panthers Stokely Carmichael, Bobby Seale, and H. Rap Brown are also shown.

Daguerreotypes (1975) looks at the use of the still image within a motion picture. There are close-ups of objects and shopkeepers in Rue Daguerre. As the film continues, objects are shown in different contexts, and the ways in which this causes the image to change is paramount. At the end of the film, the human subjects shown each turn to face the camera for several seconds, a live, in-motion, still moment. The interplay between the filmed image and the photographed still is contemplated as the piece ends. Varda's documentary works began to look at the idea of memory and the passage of time as an element of our culture in the late 1970s and into the 1980s.

Jacquot de Nantes (1990), Varda's tribute to the life and work of her late husband, uses black-and-white images for tales from Demy's childhood in the 1930s and 1940s and color images of Demy in the 1980s. These are edited into this charming work along with clips from Demy's films to show the ways in which his work reflected his life and interests.

Varda's The Gleaners and I/Les Glaneurs et la Glaneuse (2000) was shot entirely on digital video. The work looks at people who harvest the castoff belongings of others and survive from their 'hunting' in gutters, trash bins, and other such places where useful but unwanted things are found. This is a vision of recycling and reusing in a grand sense. Varda's film explores this notion in an art-making context as well; she sees herself as a collector of images, a gleaner in both the gathering of material and the assemblage of it. Varda spoke of her approach to this work: 'I think that documentary means "real", that you have to meet these real people, and let them express what they feel about the subject. The more I met them, the more I could see I had nothing to make as a statement. They make the statement; they explain the subject better than anybody. So it's not like having an idea about a subject and "let's illustrate it". It's meeting real people and discovering with them what they express about the subject, building the subject through real people. So it is a documentary, but the shape that I gave to it—including the original score and the editing—is really for me a narrative film. Not that documentary is "not good" and narrative is "good". But I really work as a filmmaker, I would say, to give a specific shape to that subject. And so far, it's worked, because whether people are cinephiles or not, they like the film. They like the people they meet in the film' (Anderson 2001: 25–6).

When Varda received the 2003 Inaugural Eisenstein Award from University of Southern California's School of Cinema-Television, University Provost Lloyd Armstrong described Varda as an artist 'whose work challenges the artificial constructs that separate people and ideas' (In Motion 2004: 10). The award honors filmmakers with international stature for their visionary work and distinguished contributions to the cinematic arts. Varda continues to work in documentary film and to explore cultural diversity in ways that delve into the experience of being human.

TAMMY A. KINSEY

Biography

Born May 1928, Brussels, Belgium. Trained in art history and photography. Worked as official photographer for Jean Vilar's Theatre National Populaire. Married to filmmaker Jacques Demy from 1962 until his death in 1990. Commissioned to make two short films for French National Tourist Office, late 1950s. Won César Award for Best Documentary Short for Ulysse, 1982. Museum of Modern Art Retrospective show, 1997. Awarded Méliès Prize for Best French Film of 2000 by French Union of Film Critics for The Gleaners and I.

Selected films

- 1958 L'Opéra-Mouffe
- 1958 Du côté de la Côte
- 1959 La Cocette d'Azur
- 1960 Champagne France
- 1960 Italy
- 1963 Salut les Cubains/Salute to Cuba
- 1964 Les Enfants du musée/Episode of television series Chroniques de France
- 1967 Loin du Vietnam
- 1968 The Black Panthers
- 1975 Daguerreotypes
- 1980 Murs Murs/Murals, Murals
- 1984 Les Dites Caryatides
- 1993 Les Demoiselles ont eu 25 ans/The Young Girls Turn 25
- 1995 L'Univers de Jacques Demy/The World of Jacques Demy

Further reading

- Anderson, Melissa, 'The Modest Gesture of the Filmmaker: An Interview with Agnès Varda', Cineaste 26, no. 4, fall 2001: 24–7.
- Anthony, Elizabeth, 'From Fauna to Flora in Agnès Varda's Cleo de 5 à 7', Film Quarterly 26, 1998: 88–96.
- Darke, Chris, 'Refuseniks', Sight and Sound 11, no. 1, January 2001: 30–3.
- Flitterman-Lewis, Sandy, To Desire Differently: Feminism and the French Cinema, Urbana, IL: Illinois University Press, 1990.

In Motion, winter 2004, USC School of Cinema-Television.

Vas, Robert

Hungarian exile Robert Vas went from being a marginal figure on the periphery of Free Cinema to one of the most highly regarded documentary film directors working at the BBC in the 1960s and 1970s. During those years he made thirty films before his tragically early death at the age of forty-seven. Essentially an autodidact strongly influenced by the work of Humphrey Jennings, Vas was less concerned with political ideology than with liberal humanist consciousness.

The personal sensibility that marks Vas's best work cannot be grasped without reference to his experiences as a refugee living in exile. Although his family survived the Holocaust in the Budapest ghetto by acquiring Swedish passports, his mother committed suicide after the war and his father abandoned the family, emigrating to Australia. Military service as an army projectionist was terminated by a nervous breakdown and a spell in a psychiatric hospital. Unable to acquire a formal education, Vas did, however, attend lectures at the Academy of Dramatic Arts and later worked as a trainee script editor at the National Theatre in Budapest. The failure of the 1956 Hungarian Uprising led him to leave the country, crossing the border into Austria with his wife and child and making his way to London shortly afterward.

Initially working in menial cleaning jobs, he soon found a niche in the Information Department at the British Film Institute (BFI), where he gained an encyclopaedic knowledge of world cinema as well as a passion for the films of Humphrey Jennings. Contact with Lindsay Anderson and Karel Reisz led to his first film, funded by the newly formed BFI Experimental Film Fund. Refugee England combined documentary observation with acted scenes to tell the story of a refugee's first day in London. This was screened in the final Free Cinema programme in March 1959 alongside Reisz's We Are the Lambeth Boys. Vas's next project, The Vanishing Street (1962), about a Jewish community in the East End was followed by his first film for the BBC, the autobiographical The Frontier shot on the Austro-Hungarian border.

During the next fourteen years, Vas consolidated his work as a freelancer, straddling different departments at the Corporation and making films for strands such as Omnibus and Horizon. Subjects included popular culture in The Golden Years of Alexander Korda (1968) and Cuckoo—A Celebration of Laurel and Hardy (1974); science and society in films on Arthur Koestler (Koestler on Creativity, 1967) and Claude Lévi-Strauss (The Savage Mind, 1970); portraits of artists (Miklos Radnoti, 1969) and directors Miklos Jancsó (The Quiet Hungarian, 1967) and Humphrey Jennings (Heart of Britain, 1970); and the world of music in Bartók (1970) and the Austrian conductor Bruno Walter (1972).

It was in a series of historical films that Vas made his mark, in some cases even causing political controversy. The Issue Should Be Avoided (1971), an investigation into the 1941 Katyn Forest massacre where more than four thousand captive Polish officers were murdered by the Soviet NKVD, was later to be complemented by the magisterial two-and-a-half-hour Stalin in 1973. Nine Days in '26 (1974), exploring untold accounts of the 1926 General Strike from the miners' point of view, was deemed to be sufficiently sensitive to be unofficially shelved by the BBC for several months, much to Vas's dismay. To Die—To Live (1975) dealt with the legacy of Hiroshima; Orders from Above (1975) examined the forcible repatriation of Russian prisoners of war by Allied troops between 1945–7. Based on The Last Secret by Nicholas Bethell, the film triggered extensive debate.

Vas's filmmaking methods were eclectic and varied. He used actors to portray historical figures on location and in the studio and combined eyewitness reports with archive, poetry, and commentary to create work that, although not overly marked by formal experiment, was multilayered and complex in its range. My Homeland (1976) arguably his finest film, was both an elegy on the twentieth anniversary of the Hungarian Revolution and a deeply subjective meditation on memory and loss in the poetic tradition he so admired in Jennings. Very much an authored essay, the film stands out in its use of counterpoint, juxtaposing banal colour travel films of the 1970s with starkly contrasting black-and-white stills of the uprising. Often taking over at the editing table himself, Vas could be single-minded to the point of obstinacy, but his visionary passion also engendered fierce loyalty amongst his collaborators.

Robert Vas saw his artistic mission as being to remind and warn, primarily of the abuses of power. Regarding himself as a victim of both totalitarian ideologies of the twentieth century, he avoided making explicit political judgments other than putting forward a broad liberal humanism, but he defined his task according to a strict moral imperative, untrammelled by relativism. Likewise, although his Judaism was secular rather than religious, he could never forget that ninety percent of Budapest's Jews did not survive the Holocaust.

Vas's death in 1978 came as a shock to friends and colleagues, who held him in highest regard. Ironically, after a lifetime's insecurity, he had only just signed a staff contract at the BBC. Years later the circumstances and cause of his death still raise strong and contradictory passions. The drug overdose and weeks of ensuing coma and death on April 10, 1978 are regarded by some as suicide and by others as a tragic accident. Perhaps also lost with him was the tradition of the subjective, poetic vision that he had made his signature as a filmmaker.

JOHN BURGAN

See also: Anderson, Lindsay; Jennings, Humphrey; Reisz, Karel

Biography

Born in Budapest, Hungary, March 3, 1931. Survived the Holocaust in the ghetto. Military service interrupted by a spell in psychiatric hospital. Fled to the West after the failure of the 1956 Hungarian uprising, arriving in London as a refugee. Worked in the Information Department of the British Film Institute and wrote criticism for Sight and Sound and Monthly Film Bulletin. First film made in 1959 for the British Film Institute's newly formed Experimental Film Fund. Worked as a film editor in the early 1960s, then as producer/director for the BBC 1964–78. Died in London on April 10, 1978 after a drug overdose and lengthy coma.

Selected films

1959 Refuge England: writer, director
1964 The Frontier: director

- 1968 The Golden Years of Alexander Korda: writer, producer
- 1970 Heart of Britain: writer, director
- 1971 The Issue Should Be Avoided: writer, director
- 1973 Stalin: writer, producer
- 1974 Nine Days in '26: producer
- 1975 Orders from Above: producer
- 1976 My Homeland: writer, director

Further reading

- Lovell, Alan and Hillier, Jim, Studies in Documentary, London: Secker and Warburg, 1972.
- Rosenthal, Ian, The Documentary Conscience: A Casebook in Film Making, Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1980.

Vertov, Dziga

The Soviet Russian director Dziga Vertov was instrumental in transforming actuality and newsreel filmmaking into what became known as documentary. Extending Russian and communist traditions of interpretive political journalism to cinema, Vertov's films used the inherent evidential power of documentary footage rhetorically, not simply to illustrate and record, but overwhelmingly for political persuasion, revealing film's immense capacity for the visual presentation of an argument. At the same time, Vertov's enduring commitment to formal experimentation meant that his greatest films combined this rhetorical force with poetry's heightened expressive freedom and associative combination of images. This example exerted a powerful influence not only on documentary filmmaking from Grierson to Marker and beyond, but also on the style of 1920s Soviet Montage films, particularly those of Sergei Eisenstein. His expansive style of filmmaking jarred with the tight control of cinema in 1930s Soviet Union and led to his marginalisation for unacceptably formalist tendencies.

Although Vertov's theoretical writings bear the heavy imprint of an age of iconoclastic modernist manifestos, he nevertheless makes a seminal attempt to defend and define what was dubbed documentary film. Vertov drew a fundamental distinction between unstaged (neigrovyie) films such as his and staged, acted films. Not content simply to dispense with the use of actors, he advocated the method of 'life caught unawares' (zhizn' vrasplokh) aimed at ensuring that the subjects photographed are not posing. He attempt to achieve this by a wide variety of means including telephoto lenses, as well as hidden and decoy cameras. Yet probably the most characteristic aspect of Vertov's concept of filmmaking is the stress on the 'organisation' of this ontologically authentic material through editing so as to show 'life as it is' (zhizn' kak ona est). This misleading notion does not imply a striving to be impartial or objective. On the contrary, the material is to be analysed and arranged so as to persuade the spectator of the communist perspective. Characteristic of this method was his groundbreaking newsreel series, Kino-Pravda (film truth), named by analogy with the Soviet Communist Party daily newspaper, Pravda (meaning truth). In place of the long takes recording official visits, portraits of dignitaries, sports events, and train crashes that were the staple of newsreels of the time, Kino-Pravda strove to use editing to combine images in a dynamic and highly tendentious manner, as, for example his coverage of the famine on the Volga in Kino-Pravda no.1 (1922), which begins with the slogan 'Save the starving children' as an intertitle. Shots of children starving are then intercut with pictures of the destruction of icons for their valuables. The sequence ends with an image of children being fed soup accompanied by the intertitle 'Every pearl saves a starving child'.

Vertov called his approach to filmmaking kino-eye, and dubbed his collaborators and followers kinoki, a neologism combining the Russian words for cinema and for eye. The kinoki were conceived as a grassroots international organisation of filmmakers and would-be filmmakers, dedicated to rescuing cinema from entertainment and commerce and turning it to the rational political analysis of everyday life. Films were to develop from observation, rather than from an already written screenplay. The term kinok also symbolizes Vertov's determination that the technology of film should be used to enable a step change in perception and thought. The camera for Vertov was associated with the enhanced power of scientific optical tools such as the microscope and the telescope. Whereas the microscope enabled the human eye to see natural phenomena invisible to the naked eye, Vertov thought that by means of techniques such as superimposition, reverse motion, and editing the camera could enable people to see the meaning underlying the misleading chaos of the world as it appears to unassisted human vision. A typical example of this approach is his treatment of Lenin's death in Kino-Pravda nos 21 and 22 (1925), whereby the slogan 'Lenin is dead but his cause lives on' is illustrated by superimposition of the image of Lenin on the mausoleum in Red Square. Similarly, Kino-Eye (1924) uses reverse motion to resurrect grazing cattle from the butcher's slab so as to prove that meat bought in a cooperative comes directly from the countryside. This kind of sequence attracted criticism as unwarranted stylistic exuberance in a film, the main purpose of which should be to inform. This commitment to formal experiment grew stronger in films such as Forward, Soviet! and One Sixth of the World. In the latter the organisation of much of the film has been shown to resemble that of the poetry of Walt Whitman (Singer 1987). The culmination of this drive to innovate was the film for which he is most celebrated outside Russia, The Man with the Movie Camera (1929), a silent film made without intertitles, 'directed toward the creation of a genuine, international purely cinematic language' (Feldman 1979). Various described as celebration of the city (Roberts 2000), meta-cinema (Mayne 1975), and the first database film (Monovich 1999), this dazzling display of cinema's expressive power is at the same time demythification of that power and an extended enquiry into the nature of film and the place of cinema in society.

In his lifelong hostility to films made with actors, Vertov was articulating a view influential in the 1920s Soviet avant-garde. In particular productivists and constructivists argued that art, and especially fiction, was conceived by bourgeois societies to distract people from their essential dissatisfaction with the capitalist world. Art under communism should not divert people from real life, but rather be a reworking of real material, a remaking of life, using tools and techniques derived from art. It is this perspective that informs Vertov's striving not only to use documentary footage for the purposes of political persuasion, but also to seek to experiment formally, to expand the borders of cinematic expression. Vertov's practice, however, was not always as rigorous as his programmatic statements might lead us to believe. Even his most experimental films, Kino-Eye and The Man with the Movie Camera included obviously staged footage, notably in the latter of a man holding a camera.

Although, like many other Soviet Montage filmmakers, he found it increasingly difficult to work in the 1930s, unlike them, Vertov immediately welcomed the coming of sound cinema as affording new opportunities. Indeed, Vertov had anticipated sound cinema as early as 1925 with his theory of radio-eye, an audio concept of documentary equivalent to kino-eye. Indeed Enthusiasm (1930) was the name of his first sound film, a celebration of the industrial transformation of the first five-year plan, which incorporated a wide variety of source sound, recorded on location in the Donbass region. This is a bold experiment in which the sounds of heavy industry, church bells, and military bands interact symbolically, not simply illustrating the image with which they are combined. Vertov's other major film of the talking era was Three Songs about Lenin (1934). This film revisited a theme treated with much success by Vertov in the 1920s, but this time he drew on popular conceptions of Lenin in the folk songs of Azerbaijan, Turkmenistan, and Uzbekistan. Made in physically demanding circumstances in a critical climate increasingly hostile to Vertov's approach to documentary film, this film nevertheless retains much of the engaging visual style, creative use of sound, and poetic qualities of his earlier films. After considerable delays and wrangles it eventually reached the public and won Vertov critical and official recognition, but all was not as it seemed. Three Songs about Lenin broke the unwritten laws of the Lenin cult film of the time by failing to show Stalin to have been his right-hand man and faithful disciple. It was withdrawn soon after its release and later reedited so as to foreground the role of the Soviet leader (Feldman 1979). The point was not lost on Vertov. When next given an opportunity to make a feature-length documentary, Lullaby (1937), he made sure it included the requisite lengthy standing ovation to Stalin. Yet, in this film little remains of the stylistic élan of his earlier works, and it is barely distinguishable from the run-of-the-mill products of the Soviet Newsreel Studio. The years of administrative obstruction and hostility began to take a toll on his creative powers as well as his health, and by the end of World War II, Vertov gradually ceased even to produce new projects. The last decade of his life was spent editing newsreels of the kind he had long abhorred.

JEREMY HICKS

See also: Man with the Movie Camera; Three Songs About Lenin

Biography

Born David Abelovich (later Denis Arkadievich) Kaufman in Bialystok, then Russia, now Poland, on January 2, 1896. Mobilised by Russian Imperial army during World War I and sent to Military-Musical College in Chuguev, Ukraine, before being decommissioned on grounds of ill health. Enrolled in St Petersburg Psycho-neurological Institute. After February revolution of 1917 came to Moscow, where in early 1918 he became secretary of the newsreel department of Moscow Cinema Committee (later the All-Russian Photo-Cinema Department or VFKO). Changing his name to Dziga Vertov (meaning something like ‘spinning gypsy’), directed group of newsreel filmmakers 1918–19 making Kinonedelia/Cine Weekly, ran cinema section of agittrains and ships, 1920, and made propaganda shorts about Russian Civil War (1918–21). From 1922 initiated Kino-Pravda newsreel series, as well as making Goskino’s newsreel series Goskinokalendar from 1923 to 1925. Also employed from 1924 by Kultkino, a educational or documentary films department of Goskino (later Sovkino) until sacked in 1926. Worked for the rival Ukrainian Film Directorate (VUFKU) from 1927 to 1932. Visited Western Europe in 1929 and 1931 to promote his films and views of film. Made Three Songs About Lenin at Mezhrabpom Films from 1932, for which he was awarded The Order of the Red Star in 1935. Taken on by Soviet Newsreel Films (Soiuzkinokhronika) in 1935. Here, with the exception of a short spell at the Soviet Children’s Film Studio (Soiuzdetfilm) between 1939 and 1941, he continued to work editing Novosti dnia/News of the Day newsreel compilations until his death, in Moscow, February 12, 1954.

Selected films

- 1922–5 Kino-Pravda/Film-Truth (23 editions): writer, director
 1924 Kino-Glaz/Kino-Eye: writer, director

- 1926 Shagai, Sovet!/Forward, Soviet!: writer, director 1926 Shestaia chast’ mira/One Sixth of the World: writer, director
 1928 Odinnadtsatyi/The Eleventh Year: writer, director
 1929 Chelovek s kinoapparatom/The Man with the Movie Camera: writer, director
 1930 Simfoniia Donbassa (Entuziazm)/Enthusiasm, Or the Symphony of the Donbass: writer, director
 1934 Tri pesni o Lenine/Three Songs About Lenin: writer, director 1937 Kolybel’naia/Lullaby: writer, director

Further reading

- Feldman, Seth, Evolution of Style in the Early Work of Dziga Vertov, New York: Arno Press, 1975.
 ——— Dziga Vertov: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston: G.K. Hall, 1979.
 Mayne, Judith, ‘Ideologies of Metacinema’, unpublished PhD thesis, State University of New York at Buffalo, 1975.
 Monovich, Lev, ‘Database as Symbolic Form’, Milennium Film Journal 34, fall 1999: 24–43.
 Petric, Vlada, Constructivism in Film: The Man with the Movie Camera: A Cinematic Analysis, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993.
 ——— ‘Vertov’s Cinematic Transposition of Reality’, in Charles Warren (ed.), Beyond Document: Essays in Nonfiction Film, Hanover, NH and London: Wesleyan University Press, 1996.
 Roberts, Graham, Forward Soviet!, London and New York: I.B. Tauris, 1999.
 ——— The Man with a Movie Camera, London and New York: I.B. Tauris, 2000.
 Roshal, Lev, Dziga Vertov, Moscow: Iskusstvo, 1982.
 Singer, Ben, ‘Connoisseurs of Chaos: Whitman, Vertov and the “Poetic Survey”’, Literature/Film Quarterly 15, no. 4, 1987: 247–58.
 Stollery, Martin, Alternative Empires: European Modernist Cinemas and Cultures of Imperialism, Exeter: Exeter University Press, 2000.
 Vertov, Dziga, Dziga Vertov: stat’i, dnevniki, zamysly, edited by Sergei Drobashenko, Moscow: Iskusstvo, 1966.
 ——— Kino-Eye: The Writings of Dziga Vertov, ed. Annette Michelson, trans. Kevin O’Brian, Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1984.

Victory at Sea

(US, Salomon and Kleinerman, 1952–3)

This epic-length television documentary concerning naval operations during World War II combined wartime footage with narration and music to present an emotional view of combat history. Produced during the Korean conflict of the Cold War, the compilation film series, as its title implies, focused on the strength and ultimate triumph of Allied forces (particularly American forces) during wartime. One of the most ambitious documentaries produced by network television, the twenty-six-episode series originally aired on NBC from October 1952 to April 1953 on Sunday afternoons from 3:00pm to 3:30pm. Critically acclaimed during its time, the series won more than thirteen industry awards, including a George Peabody Award and a special Emmy for Best Public Affairs Program. The series demonstrated that an historical compilation documentary was a viable television format and led to the production of several others in the genre, particularly The Twentieth Century (CBS, 1957–69).

Victory at Sea was the brainchild of World War II veteran and naval historian Henry Salomon and his former college classmate, Robert Sarnoff, the son of RCA/NBC patriarch David Sarnoff. Robert Sarnoff was then an executive at NBC-Television. In the early days of television, film projects had distinct practical advantages over live television shows, particularly the idea for residual incomes through syndication. The half-hour series relied on archival footage obtained from many sources including the US Signal Corps, the US Navy and newsreels, and European and Japanese archives. The archival footage obtained amounted to approximately eleven thousand miles of film, which was then reduced to sixty-two thousand feet. The editor for the series, Isaac Kleinerman, relied on an indexing system of sixty thousand note cards so as to organize the quantity of film for the compilation series. The addition of composer Richard Rodgers's name to the credits added further prestige to the project. It also allowed NBC to gain additional revenues through the marketing of LP recordings of the series' musical score. The Richard Rodgers score was sold in several record versions by RCA-Victor. By 1963 the album had grossed US $4 million, and one tune from the score, 'No Other Love', earned additional sales as a single.

Unlike many wartime propaganda films, Victory at Sea presented a narrative of more historical sweep encompassing as it did both the Eastern and Western hemispheres. The series, however, was not without bias toward the victors. Produced at a time when the world was in the depths of the Cold War struggle between the United States and the Soviet Union, the series had an organizing theme—the triumph of democracy and freedom over totalitarianism. The active role of the United States in international affairs is constantly invoked, as is the determination to bring 'freedom' to those parts of the world under the yoke of military despotism. Its ethnocentric viewpoint was constantly expressed using the rhetoric of liberation and military strength by reinforcing the historical conflict as a lesson of history, a rhetoric that continued to grow into the polarity of Cold War era politics and diplomacy.

RONALD WILSON

Victory at Sea (US, NBC Television, 1952–3, 26 episodes). Produced by Henry Salomon. Written by Henry Salomon with Richard Hanser, based on the multivolume History of the United States Naval Operations in World War II by Samuel Eliot Morison. Directed by M. Clay Adams. Music by Richard Rodgers. Musical arrangement by Robert Russell Bennett conducting the NBC Symphony Orchestra. Narrated by Leonard Graves. Edited by Isaac Kleinerman. Technical Advisor Captain Walter Karig, USN Film research by Daniel Jones and Douglas Wood. Television coordinator Robert M. Sarnoff.

Further reading

- Bartone, Richard C., 'Victory at Sea: A Case Study in Official Telehistory', Film and History XXI, no. 4, December 1991.
- Kepley, Vance, Jr., 'The Origins of NBC's Project XX in Compilation Documentaries', Journalism Quarterly 61, 1984: 1–2.
- 'Victory at Sea', in Horace Newcomb (ed.), Encyclopedia of Television, Chicago: Fitzroy Dearborn Publications, 1997.
- Leyda, Jay, Films Beget Films, New York: Hill and Wang, 1964.
- Morison, Samuel Eliot, History of United States Naval Operations in World War II, 15 vols, Boston: Little, Brown and Co., 1947–62.
- Rollins, Peter C., 'Victory at Sea: Cold War Epic', Journal of Popular Culture VI, spring, 1973.

Video Diaries

(UK, BBC, 1990–2001)

The Video Diaries series was a product of the BBC's Community Programme Unit (CPU), developed by unit head Jeremy Gibson and series producer Bob Long. First broadcast on Saturday evenings on BBC2 in the summer of 1990, the series proved an immediate success with audiences and critics. Exceptionally for BBC access programming, it regularly received up to 1.5 million viewers and won a number of awards for both the series and individual programmes.

Video Diaries was a radical extension of the CPU's remit to provide members of the public with access to television broadcasting. It built on the department's previous access programming strands Open Door and Open Space, where selected individuals and groups who approached the Unit worked alongside professional crews to produce programmes on specific topics of concern. The innovative approach taken by Video Diaries involved training chosen applicants in the use of domestic video camcorders, enabling them to record their own material themselves. This experiment was both an attempt by the CPU to engage with the newly emerging camcorder culture, and a genuine attempt to redefine the parameters of access television. Allowing individual subjects to control their own representation was directly aimed at circumventing the mediating influence of professional filmmakers, with their often highly developed personal or institutional methodologies.

Selected Video Diaries applicants received training in the basics of film grammar and use of S-VHS or Hi-8 camcorders. Diarists gathered their own footage and later edited this in collaboration with the CPU postproduction team. Throughout the process there was both support and monitoring from CPU staff who oversaw the development of the project. Although the aim was to give the individual as much control as possible, the Unit always exerted a corrective influence, steering the project through in an attempt to ensure that the structure of the programme was both intelligible to audiences and communicated the diarists' intentions in the most efficient way. The early series of Video Diaries were also notable for having programmes of variable length. Within a range that spanned between one and two hours, programme-makers were allowed to find the duration that best suited the requirements of the project. In 1993 the CPU introduced Teenage Diaries, which followed a similar approach but were produced by diarists under 18 years of age.

The degree of control exerted by the CPU over the outcome has been an area of critical debate. Although the CPU has been seen as providing a constraining influence on the diarists' intuitive approach to their subject, it could equally be said that they often challenged diarists to step outside the normative approaches to documentary practice as absorbed via their own television viewing. It was this dynamic between the diarists, who underwent a demanding developmental experience as they sought to tell their stories, and the guiding hand of the experienced CPU staff that produced a blend of formally inventive programmes, which, if sometimes demanding of their audience, were nonetheless coherent. The diarist, as well as offering insights into their specific areas of concern, also provided, via piece-to-camera or voice-over, a diary of the production process. Thus, elements usually excluded in mainstream documentary filmmaking were often a central part of the diary's developing narrative, as the diarists sought to find their own voice, while negotiating the video technology and developing a working methodology. The often crude technique and undisguised subjectivity of the diarist seem to give Video Diaries an honesty and an emotional impact that was regarded by many as a welcome revitalization of the television documentary form. If technical naivety in itself is no guarantee of 'authenticity', the particular production context of the CPU did provide an ethical framework that mitigated against the 'amateurish' technique becoming just a stylistic device (Keighron 1993).

Video Diaries covered a wide range of subjects, from light-hearted offerings such as Steve Feltham's monster-quest Desperately Seeking Nessie (1990), to the Bafta Award-winning The Man Who Loved Gary Lineker (1992), Ylli Hasani's account of his life as an Albanian doctor and refugee. One of the most challenging programmes in the first series was Willa Woolston's My Demons (1990). In this programme the diarist returned to her hometown to confront the personal legacy of systematic abuse she had suffered from her stepmother as a child. This high level of introspection was regarded by some as an uncomfortable precedent, pushing television documentary into the realms of personal therapy. It could be debated that the relative success of this series encouraged the shift toward a more populist, character-centred documentary programming, a widely observed trend in the more competitive multichannel environment of contemporary British television. However, My Demons provoked a significant response from viewers who had also suffered abusive family situations, and led to the establishment of a support network for sufferers. By often dealing with significant situations and issues, the diaries, although based on intensely personal stories and subjective viewpoints, could also be seen as a continuation of the more overtly social campaigning work of the CPU.

Video Diaries was undoubtedly important institutionally for challenging barriers to broadcast television access that had been long-maintained through rigid standards of professional practice and an insistence on the use of expensive video or film formats as guarantors of image quality. Although these distinctions have, to a certain extent, been rendered obsolete by the high-quality images now afforded by digital camcorders, Video Diaries was influential in opening up British television screens to a much wider range of video material from nonprofessional sources.

The video diary form has become an integral part of many other documentary and television genres such as travel programmes and 'reality' television. Despite the ubiquity of the approach and the less serious ends to which it is now often used, the series' innovative force should not be underestimated. Video Diaries represented a significant widening of the BBC's Public Service remit and extended democratization of the broadcast documentary. It also encouraged many more people outside television to realize the potential of domestic camcorders for personal exploration and social activism.

DAVID CHAPMAN

Video Diaries (UK, BBC Community Programme Unit, 11 series between 1990 and 2001). CPU Head, Jeremy Gibson. Series producer/CPU Head Bob Long. Producers/Series Producers, Rachel Foster and Steve Sklair.

Further reading

- Barker, Paul, 'The Rise of Camcorder Culture', The Times, July 27, 1992. (Reprinted in MacDonald, Kevin and Cousins, Mark, Imagining Reality, London, Faber & Faber 1998.)
- Dovey, Jon, 'Old Dogs and New Tricks: Access Television in the UK', in Tony Dowd (ed.), Channels of Resistance, London: BFI 1993.
- Humm, Peter, 'Real TV: Camcorders, Access and Authenticity', in Christine Geraghty and David Lusted (eds), The Television Studies Book, London: Arnold, 1998.
- Keighron, Peter, 'Video Diaries: What's Up Doc?', Sight and Sound 3, 10, 1993: 24–25.
- Keighron, Peter and Wayne, Mike, 'Video Diaries', Independent Media 101–2, July–August 1990: 8–9.
- Kilborn, Richard and Izod, John, An Introduction to Television Documentary, Manchester: Manchester University Press, 1997.

Visions of Eight

(US/West Germany, various directors, 1973)

Leni Riefenstahl's poetic record of the 1936 Berlin Games, Olympische Spiele/Olympia (1938), is often singled out as a sensual celebration of the human form in flight and—despite its links to the Nazi Party—is generally thought to be 'the definitive cinematic treatment of the Games'. Nevertheless, it falls short of the pyrotechnics on display in what is perhaps the most unusual of Olympic documentaries, Visions of Eight/München 1972–78 berühmte Regisseure sehen die Spiele der XX Olympiade.

On the surface, this multi-director episode film produced by legendary documentarian David L. Wolper and Stan Margulies (then vice-president of Wolper Productions) appears curiously 'empty' insofar as it captures only fleeting, impressionistic glimpses of the festival held in Munich (from August 26 to September 11, 1972) and furthermore only begrudgingly alludes to the deadly act of terrorism that capped the Olympics that year. Nevertheless, as an omnibus film composed of eight discrete yet connected sections, each averaging ten minutes, Visions of Eight is in fact a very 'full' evocation of the Olympic experience, for it manages to convey both the personal and collective aspirations of the participants involved (athletes as well as filmmakers) through a narrative form naturally amenable to political allegory and the theme of competition.

Ironically, it was Wolper's interest in the ostensibly apolitical world of sports-based entertainment (he had already made October Madness: The World Series (1965) and Pro Football: Mayhem on a Sunday Afternoon (1965)) that gave him a decided advantage in the race to make the official film about the 1972 Summer Olympics. This event would become mired in political debate when, on September 5, eight Palestinian guerrilla fighters known as 'Black September' climbed the cyclone fence surrounding the Olympic Village and took eleven members of the Israeli wrestling team hostage before killing them. Dedicated to the memory of the martyred athletes, Visions of Eight actually makes only passing reference to the actions of the terrorists, who easily circumvented the minimum-security measures that fateful day in Munich and put all of Germany—a nation eager to dissociate itself from Hitler's Berlin Games—on high alert. That the film at first appears so uncommitted in its political aspirations, that it seems so disinterested in the ideological implications of the Olympics, can be partly attributed to the fact that ninety percent of its principal photography had been completed by the time the terrorists took their hostages. Wolper, who had no intention of extending the schedule to include footage of an event that would already be telecast around the world before the film's theatrical debut the next year, left the task of footnoting the tragic occurrence to the one filmmaker who had not yet completed his contribution to Visions of Eight, John Schlesinger.

Although the making of any documentary is rife with potential problems, filming the Olympics proves to be particularly challenging, even for those producers like Wolper who are experienced in the fine art of on-location shooting, crowd control, juggling simultaneous events, deploying large numbers of crew members, and maintaining a balance between proximity and distance. Given the vast nature of the event, just choosing what to shoot can be a vexing and time-consuming endeavor. Fortunately, Wolper had hit on the novel idea of apportioning those choices to a handful of the world's top directors—Juri Ozerov, Mai Zetterling, Arthur Penn, Michael Pfléghar, Kon Ichikawa, Claude Lelouch, Milos Forman, and John Schlesinger.

Fittingly, the film kicks off with The Beginning, Ozerov's tension-filled depiction of athletic preparation. Through powerful yet whimsically juxtaposed images that foreshadow the yawning judge in Forman's Decathlon episode, Ozerov captures the preperformance jitters and boredom faced by the world's greatest athletes—men and women fluttering between patience and nerve-jangling anticipation. A Soviet filmmaker who would later direct the feature-length account of the Olympic Games held in Moscow, O Sport, Ty-Mir (1980), Ozerov—an outspoken communist—draws on the theories of dialectical and poetic montage launched by his cinematic predecessors (Eisenstein, Vertov, Pudovkin) and turns the clash between individuality and community, between secular and spiritual comforts into a profound (if all-too-brief) meditation on the underlying ideals of Western culture.

Following Ozerov's episode is Mai Zetterling's contribution to Visions of Eight, a look at the men's weightlifting competition entitled The Strongest. Although initially attracted to the idea of filming the women athletes in Munich, Zetterling instead set her sights on what she described as the most 'sensual' and 'obsessive' of Olympic events. As a result, this pioneering feminist filmmaker (who admits in the episode's introduction to not being interested in sports) expanded her already diverse repertoire of key themes—sexual awakening, personal isolation, and the various forms of violence perpetrated against women—to accommodate these mutually impacting images of masculine hegemony and physical prowess. The Highest, Arthur Penn's contribution, comes next—a decidedly apolitical and poetic vision of pole-vaulters reaching for the heavens.

With little-to-no sound to accompany the balletic movements of the vaulters' bodies rising and falling in midair, this sequence is the most abstract and impressionistic of the film, capturing in slow motion (96 to 600 frames/second) and soft-focus shots the sense of transcendence and freedom that only a select few experience in their struggle against gravity to clear the fragile bar.

After witnessing these men plant their poles in the ground and push themselves upward, the viewer—perhaps struck by the conflation of sexual and spiritual aims implicit in such imagery—can be excused for feeling disappointed when literally brought back to earth in the fourth episode. Entitled The Women, this episode finds German filmmaker Michael Pfléghar casting a decidedly male gaze at female athletes. Among the cinematically fetishized bodies are fifteen-year-old Australian swimmer Shane Gould, Russian gymnast Ludmilla Tourischeva, and West German pentathlete Heidi Rosendahl (world record-holder in the long jump), whose accomplishments in Munich and capacity for liberating mobility and agency are undercut by Pflieger's leering close-ups and fragmented editing. Putting as much emphasis on their hairdressers as on the finish lines, this episode nevertheless says less about women than men—its reliance on film's traditional visual paradigm (masculine viewing subject and feminine object of desire) unwittingly underscoring an engrained facet of Western culture, which continues to perpetuate gender stereotypes through ocular-centric fictions.

Thankfully, this low point in the film is followed by one of its most effective and self-reflexive sequences: Kon Ichikawa's The Fastest. Armed with a battalion of thirty-four over-cranked cameras, Ichikawa and his cinematographers filmed the men's 100-meter dash as it had never been filmed, effectively transforming this most accelerated of sports into a decelerated evocation of the dedication and training that goes into the Olympics. By stretching a ten-second race into a grueling, eleven-minute mini-marathon of facial contortions and wobbling muscles, Ichikawa not only conveys a Muybridge-like fascination with human physiology and locomotion, but also taps into the very technological preconditions behind their cinematic recording (the medium's ontological grounding in photographic realism plus the various apparati that confer the illusion of movement onto still images). This reflexive gesture is compounded by the director's decision to show all eight sprinters in a line, head-on, their individual yet contiguous lanes connoting the eight separate yet linked episodes of the film. A voice-over draws the spectator's attention to the runners' expressions, their eyes focused and full of yearning. After the gunshot is fired, one of the runners falls behind and gives up. These small details, in addition to Ichikawa's decision to show with 600mm telephoto lens each runner individually before capturing the entirety of the event in wide-shot, evokes the sense of humanity that comes, ironically, from selfhood—a theme for which the filmmaker has become famous.

Like Ichikawa, who had earlier made Tokyo Olympiad (1965), Claude Lelouch was no stranger to the Olympics. Four years before Visions of Eight, the French director had teamed up with François Reichenbach to chronicle the 1968 Winter Olympics held in Grenoble. Titled Treize jours en France/Thirteen Days in France (1968), this documentary gave international audiences a taste of the joy of victory, juxtaposing images of such heroic gold-medallists as skater Peggy Fleming and skier Jean-Claude Killy with political figures like President Charles de Gaulle. In Munich, however, Lelouch was drawn not to the Flemings and Killys of the world, not to the record-setting swimmer Mark Spitz (the famous Californian who in 1972 took home seven gold medals), but rather to the nearly seven thousand 'nameless' men and women who—like the runner who gives up mid-race in Ichikawa's episode—know the bitter taste of defeat and sudden loneliness. These imbricated themes inform The Losers, which segues from a boxer throwing a 'hissy-fit', to an injured bicyclist, to weeping women athletes, to equestrian collisions, to dejected swimmers, to injured yet persistent wrestlers.

Of interest, The Losers comes in sixth, not last, among the eight episodes, immediately preceding Milos Forman's humorous interlude The Decathlon. Ostensibly concerned with the most demanding and drawn-out of the disciplines (ten different events performed over two days), Forman's episode opts for a satiric critique of Olympic officialdom and spectatorship itself, a mode of dispassionate engagement personified by a green-suited judge who struggles to stay awake in the stands during the decathlon. Departing periodically from the Games to explore the city's various manifestations of local color (yodeling, bell-ringing, Bavarian folk-dancing, and the Munich Symphony Orchestra's performance of 'Ode to Joy' from Beethoven's Ninth), Forman manages to convey yet another aspect of Olympic spectatorship, which is pulled in several directions by cultural and sporting events and therefore dispersed or discursive in a way that resonates with both the multi-event decathlon and episodic film spectatorship (a mode of engagement that can be literally wrenching insofar as viewers are habitually yanked from one story, setting, or group of characters to a completely different one).

If Forman's comic juxtapositions undercut the grandeur of the Olympics, this irreverence seems downright irrelevant in light of the tragedy that befell the 'Games of Peace and Joy'.

As mentioned earlier, the only episode that references the act of terrorism is the final one, John Schlesinger's The Longest. Like runners with tunnel vision, the first seven contributing directors focus exclusively on the nonpolitical aspects of the Olympics. Ironically, the concept of tunnel vision is personified by British runner Ron Hill, the ostensible subject of Schlesinger's episode whose utter refusal to see beyond his personal goal and whose outward indifference toward the incident disquieted the politically committed filmmaker. Although Schlesinger was as unprepared for the shocking news at Munich as the rest of Wolper's crew, he was the most prepared insofar as he had done extensive filming back in England. Having set up camp in the Lancashire countryside where Hill did his rigorous training (running approximately 130 miles a week outside his Manchester home), the director was able to interview his subject about the upcoming marathon, a twenty-six-mile race that he and his forty-five camera units would eventually cover with sixty-five cameras. In a sense, Schlesinger had been preparing for this moment his entire career, which stretches back to the mid-1950s, when he was first drawn to the documentary form during his prep school days at Uppingham. (There he shot Sunday in the Park (1956), eventually cutting his teeth making dozens of short nonfiction films for Tonight and Monitor, two BBC series enjoying popularity during the 1950s.)

Images of the last runner finally trickling into the stadium in the rain are intercut with a shot of Olympic official Avery Brundage declaring the Games officially ended. The flame is extinguished, and shots of the Olympic flag at half-mast and the Israeli flag provide sobering reminders that, behind the joyful façade, several lives have been wasted. A sign reading 'Montreal 1976' is visible in these final images, which bring closure to Visions of Eight and gesture toward the next Olympics.

DAVID SCOTT DIFFRIENT

See also: Ichikawa, Kon; Lelouch, Claude; Schlesinger, John; Zetterling, Mai

Visions of Eight (München 1972–78 berühmte Regisseure sehen die Spiele der XX Olympiade) (US and West Germany, Wolper Productions, 1973, 109 mins). Distributed by Cinema 5 Distributing and EuroVideo. Directed by Juri Ozerov, Mai Zetterling, Arthur Penn, Michael Pfleghar, Kon Ichikawa, Claude Lelouch, Milos Forman, and John Schlesinger.

Further reading

- Guttman, Allen, The Erotic in Sports, New York: Columbia University Press, 1996.
 ——— The Olympics: A History of Modern Games, Urbana, IL: University of Illinois Press, 2002.
 Phillips, Gene D., John Schlesinger, Boston: Twayne Publishers, 1981.
 Plimpton, George, 'Olympic "Visions of Eight"', Sports Illustrated 39, August 27, 1973: 30–5.
 Quand, James (ed.), Kon Ichikawa, Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press, 2001.
 Wolper, David L., Producer: A Memoir, New York: Scribner, 2003.
 Young, David C., The Modern Olympics: A Struggle for Revival, Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2003.

Voigt, Andreas

Voigt's participation in Leipzig im Herbst/Leipzig in Autumn, the documentation of the protests in Leipzig in October and November 1989, established his international reputation. He became one of the most important younger directors to document the political changes in East Germany after unification. Particularly his five films on the city of Leipzig function as a sensitive seismograph of the feelings of the people. Voigt started his career as director quite late. His diploma film Alfred (1987), in which he portrayed a worker who was expelled from the party, had already gotten him into political trouble with the Communist Party. The film could be seen only at restricted screenings, because it indirectly criticized the economic system of the German Democratic Republic (GDR), when a group of workers sit together to complain about their working conditions. 'The fact that Voigt was given a contract as a director of the DEFA-Studios für Dokumentarfilme is categorical proof that times were changing. During the early and mid-eighties barely any filmmakers had been given full contracts' (Hughes 1999: 288).

The protests against the GDR government began on October 7, 1989, but the documentary studio did not begin shooting until October 16, after the filmmakers met at the film festival in Brandenburg and realized that they could sit together and discuss the issues, but the real changes were taking place on the streets. Therefore, they decided to document these events in different towns. The DEFA team, with its heavy 35mm camera and additional lighting, was welcomed warmly by the protesters, a sequence that opens the film Leipzig im Herbst. In the interviews, they openly demand more freedom, free elections and travel, and the right to express their political opinions. In contrast, the state officials were thinking only of how best to control the situation. The aesthetic style is typical for the DEFA, with an interesting cadrage in black and white, long takes, and patient interviews with the protesters to get the essence of what was happening. The camera actively participates in getting an impression of the atmosphere at this demonstration. There are also ironic situations, as for example when the street cleaners remove protest banners from the streets, but at the same time agree that their demands are totally correct. The film, collectively made by Andreas Voigt, Gerd Kroske, and cameraman Sebastian Richter, was shown at the Leipzig Documentary Festival, the most important documentary festival in the GDR, and won the Jury Prize there in 1989.

His next film, Letztes Jahr Titanic/Last Year Titanic (1991) follows a journalist, a worker, a left-wing skinhead, a teenager, and a pub owner between December 1989 and 1990, the last year of the GDR and the first one in reunified Germany. This film centers not on political opinions but on actual situations, developments, and personal feelings. Of course, at the beginning of the shoot reunification could not have been predicted, so the film is an important document about the time of change, the social and economic insecurity, but it also has some ironic and even absurd moments and uses the metaphor of the last dance. Voigt's fourth Leipzig film, Glaube Liebe Hoffnung/Faith, Love, Hope (1994), portrays a group of skinheads, some politically left wing, others extremely right wing. One feels the cold atmosphere of the society. The film was controversial. It was praised by some for its insight into the skinhead scene, but attacked by others for giving these radicals a platform for their arguments. Even more confusing were the images in its brilliant black-and-white cinematography. The last film in his Leipzig cycle is Großse Weite Welt/Big Wide World (1997). It addresses the statements of the protagonists of his other Leipzig films by showing their development and how their lives have changed. His most recent film, Invisible—Illegal in Europe (2004) follows five people, who are either illegal refugees or trying to enter Europe, over a one-year period. It is a film about hopes and dreams, about the search for luck, and the despair of a system that did not allow existence under humane conditions. The wall has fallen, but Europe is still protecting its borders.

KAY HOFFMANN

Biography

Born August 25, 1953 in Eisleben, Germany. Grew up in Dessau. Studied physics for one year in Kraków, then political economy and economic history in Berlin from 1973 to 1978. From 1978 on, Voigt worked as a dramaturgist at the DEFA documentary studio and shot children's programs as a director. 1984–7 external study at the film school in Potsdam Babelsberg. 1987–90 director and author at the DEFA documentary studio. 1988–90 member of directory of the Federation of Film and TV Creators of the GDR. After 1991 independent documentary filmmaker, author and producer for cinema and television, Voigt won many prizes at national and international film festivals (for example, Adolf-Grimme-Preis, Silver Wolf Amsterdam, Taube Leipzig Festival, Grand Prix Strasbourg).

Selected films

- 1987 Alfred: director
- 1988 Leute mit Landschaft/People with Landscape: director
- 1989 Leipzig im Herbst/Leipzig in Autumn: director with Gerd Kroske, co-script
- 1991 Letztes Jahr Titanic/Last Year Titanic: director, co-script
- 1992 Grenzland eine Reise/Frontierland, a Journey: director, script
- 1994 Glaube Liebe Hoffnung/Faith, Love, Hope: director, script
- 1995 Ostpreussenland/Land of East Prussia: director, script
- 1995 Mr Behrmann Leben Traum Tod/Mr Behrmann Life Dream Death: director, script
- 1995 Begegnung mit Krystof Kieslowski/Meeting with Krystof Kieslowski: director, script
- 1996 Neues Leben/New Life: director, script

- 1997 Großse Weite Welt/Big Wide World: director
 1999 Trouble Spots: director
 2001 David@New York: director, script
 2004 Invisible—Illegal in Europe: director, script

Further reading

- Hauke, Lutz, 'Deutschland, Deutschland. Wertewandel im Prozeß der Wiedervereinigung im Blickfeld Berliner Dokumentarfilmer (1988–91)', in Peter Zimmermann (ed.), Deutschlandbilder Ost. Dokumentarfilme der DEFA von der Nachkriegszeit bis zur Wiedervereinigung, Konstanz, 1995: 201–15.
 Hecht, Heidemarie, Der letzte Akt. 1989 bis 1992, in Schwarzweiß und Farbe. DEFA-Dokumentarfilme 1946–92, Günter Jordan and Ralf Schenk (eds), Berlin, 1996: 235–67.
 Hughes, Helen, 'Documenting the Wende: The Films of Andreas Voigt', in Séan Allan and John Sanford (eds), DEFA. East German Cinema, 1946–92, New York and Oxford, 1999: 283–301.

Voyage au Congo

(France, Allégret and Gide, 1927)

Voyage au Congo at first appears to be a simple travelogue of Marc Allégret's journey with his uncle, André Gide, through what was then known as French Equatorial Africa. Gide, sensing his age and seeking renewed inspiration for his writing, sold his collection of presentation copies in 1925 and set sail with Allégret for the Congo, hoping to retrace the steps of Joseph Conrad's Heart of Darkness. Working from an itinerary determined by Allégret, the pair wound their way up the Congo River and beyond, passing through what is now the Congo, Central African Republic, Chad, and Cameroon. The trip would yield the twenty-five year old Allégret's first motion picture, initiating an illustrious career in the French film industry. Gide himself remained largely detached from the filming process, absorbed in writing the journals that would later be published successively as Voyage au Congo (1927) and Le retour du Tchad (1928).

In spite of opening titles that proclaim, 'rapportées par André Gide et Marc Allégret', the film is almost wholly Allégret's, with participation from Gide that mainly extended to the intertitles. Allégret performed the essential geographical, ethnographic, and medical research for the journey, and it was Allégret's idea, in the summer of 1924, to further validate his role by including still photography and, soon after, a motion picture camera (Allégret 1987). What resulted was neither a simple travelogue, nor an ethnographic study, nor a documentary, but an experimental mixture of approaches loosely organized around the theme of the journey. It includes images of travel; staged reenactments of indigenous daily life; actuality scenes of local performances, games, and customs; as well as brief shots of landscapes and exotic flora and fauna. At times the film's episodic structure seems to follow the example of Robert Flaherty, whose Nanook of the North (1922) was much admired in France. Daniel Durosay, however, argues that Allégret consciously went against these tendencies, deliberately suppressing in the film any visual impression of effort, risk, or adventure (Allégret 1987). In this sense, the principles behind Voyage au Congo could be seen as more closely aligned to Flaherty's second film, Moana (1926). Subtitled 'a romance of the Golden Age', Moana focused more on domestic daily activities, physical sensuality, and bodily movement. A little more than a month after returning from his African trip, Gide wrote of seeing the 'voluptuous' Moana in Paris, though it is unknown whether the film had an influence on Allégret's final cut (Geiger 2000).

Allégret's fantasy of the primitive shares with Flaherty a tendency towards romantic idealism and fails to acknowledge the colonial framework within which it operates and the effects of that colonial system. Allégret was hardly shielded from the fact of colonialism; on the contrary, as Gide's journals attest, French commercial interests and the exploitation of African labour were everywhere in evidence, and even prevented the pair from finding the ideal, unspoiled Africa they were seeking. Yet the film also suggests contemporary trends in ethnographic surrealism as practiced by Paul Rivet, Lucien Lévy-Bruhl, and Marcel Mauss, who were establishing the Institut d'Ethnologie in Paris during the same year as Allégret and Gide's travels. The primitivist fantastic would take on other forms in Allégret's later work, particularly in such projects as the Josephine Baker film Zou Zou (1934), which portrayed Baker as a bird in a golden cage.

The content and style of Voyage au Congo gesture to various modes of documentary practice, but as a whole it does not comfortably fit into any single category. Opening with scenes on the deck of the Asie off the coast of the Canary Islands, the film sets itself up as a spectacular travel narrative seen through Western eyes. The viewer is at first positioned with the traveller, as the camera shows a woman playfully taking a pair of binoculars and looking through them in the direction of the camera. Soon afterward the viewer follows the route of the Matadi-Kinshasa colonial railroad, with the camera perched on a moving train. Assisted by maps marking the route, the traveler is encouraged to identify with the camera as a journeying eye. One of the first glimpses of a native, near Bangui, takes on overtones of romanticized first contact, as out on the river a young man standing in a canoe glides across the water toward the camera, arriving like a guide who embodies primitive life harmoniously at one with nature.

Allégret includes some visually powerful images, such as the falls at M'Bali and a dance presented by the Dakpas near Bambari. These fragments lead to the core of the film, which is made up of episodes structured around five indigenous groups. Each sequence incorporates a distinct style and theme, always with an emphasis on display and performance. The Bayas are shown at work, as men hunt and women dig for tubers, suggesting a self-sustaining world at harmony with nature. The film then moves to the Saras where Allégret, in perhaps the film's most striking episode, inserts an intricately staged tale of a marriage negotiation between two young lovers, Kaddé and Djimta. The film's underlying voyeurism and primitivism is suggested in the shot introducing Kaddé, which tightly pans along her torso to her breasts, then moves across her body to reveal her face, where a small disc is fixed to her upper lip. The image recalls an earlier shot of Sara's girls: their bodies are examined in a slow left-to-right pan while the intertitles explain that they 'in turn prove their value'.

The Kaddé and Djimta interlude is followed by further travelogue sequences. The Massas are featured for their striking architecture, and the scenes among the Moundangs are almost wholly given over to an extravagant dance. The final episode shows a ceremony filmed at Rei-Bouba, offering a glimpse of local hierarchies, games, and the equestrian displays that Gide also describes with admiration in his journals. Though the film rarely achieves the sort of sensitivity to the colonial setting found in Gide's writings, or in Conrad's novel, it is a remarkable feature-length work, full of the rich aesthetic sensibilities also on display in Allégret's still photographs. Though it resists argument or instruction, its final moments do begin to incorporate a sense of ambiguity. After scenes at Rei-Bouba, images of 'la civilisation' flash across the screen: a protestant mission school, school-children playing in uncomfortable-looking Western clothing, the endless transit of boats arriving and leaving at the port of Douala, and finally the sky over the sea, fading to black.

JEFFREY GEIGER

See also: Allégret, Marc; France

Voyage au Congo (France, 1927, 100 mins approx.). Produced, directed, written, photographed and edited by Marc Allégret. Titles by Allégret and André Gide. Filmed in Congo, Central African Republic, Chad, and Cameroon.

Further reading

- Allégret, Marc, Carnets du Congo: Voyage avec Gide, Introduction and notes by Daniel Durosay, Paris: Presses du C.N.R.S., 1987.
- Durosay, Daniel, 'Analyse synoptique du Voyage au Congo de Marc Allégret avec l'intégralité des inter-titres', Bulletin des Amis d'André Gide, January 22, 1994 : 71–85.
- 'Les "cartons" retrouvés du Voyage au Congo', Bulletin des Amis d'André Gide, January, 22, 1994: 65–70.
- Geiger, Jeffrey, 'Sightseeing: Voyage au Congo and the Ethnographic Spectacle', in Tom Conner (ed.), André Gide's Politics, New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2000: 111–30.
- Gide, André, Travels in the Congo [Voyage au Congo/Le retour du Tchad], trans. Dorothy Bussy, Hopewell, NJ: Ecco Press, 1994.

W

Waiting for Fidel

(Canada, Rubbo, 1974)

Waiting for Fidel is the film in which Australian-born National Film Board (NFB) of Canada director Michael Rubbo consolidated his inimitable style of personal filmmaking. The film meshes three elements tentatively present in his earlier documentary, Sad Song of Yellow Skin (1970), and that here, in full-bodied combination, make Rubbo's style distinctive to him. These elements are his participation in the on-screen action, his generosity toward his subjects, and a recognition of the superficiality and unreliability of documentary truth.

The film begins with three men in an airplane on their way to Cuba to film a promised interview with Fidel Castro. Geoff Stirling, a hip, capitalist media mogul, is making the film in coproduction with the NFB. Rubbo is the director. Joining them is the former Prime Minister of Newfoundland and the man who brought the province into confederation with Canada, the socialist Joey Smallwood. Different as their personalities are, at a certain level of generality the three share the hope that the interview with Castro will promote understanding between Cuba and the capitalist West.

As hinted in the film's title, the interview never happens. The film team bides its time in comparative luxury, waiting and hoping for the phone call summoning them to meet Castro. The focus of the film becomes the interaction among the three characters and their responses to Cuba. It is through this interplay among characters and between them and Cuba that the film rewards the audience with entertainment and insight.

The most famous scene in the film occurs late, when the three men have become frustrated at the stonewalling their quest for a promised interview has met. Rubbo has been filming their dinners, their recreations, and their controlled visits that their Cuban liaison man set up for them at such sites as a housing project, two schools, a chicken farm, and the Bay of Pigs. Stirling, who has put up the outside money for the project, gets into a heated argument with Rubbo over his shooting ratio. Rubbo has been filming at roughly a 25:1 clip. Stirling insists that a 3:1 clip would be more than sufficient. He berates Rubbo for his profligacy and calls him incompetent. Rubbo defends his way, and the NFB's way, of making documentaries. During their argument, they curse a lot, their cuss words bleeped out on the soundtrack. It is funny and revealing, but its charm also lies in Rubbo's involvement as an actor, not just an observer, and his willingness to allow his own foolishness to remain on screen. Few directors who appear in their films are as willing to be as harsh on themselves as they are on others.

Rubbo's generosity toward his characters is remarkable. Stirling could have been made to look merely ridiculous and unsavory. He seems incapable of acknowledging anything positive in the Cuban system, railing against the fact that schoolchildren have to spend part of their day working in a factory and complaining that a broadcaster like him would not be allowed on the air in Cuba. Smallwood, who is in his seventies, could have been portrayed as tiresome and dotty, but he comes off as admirable in his low-key but stubborn determination to think the best of Cuba and to do his best to ensure that the film contributes positively to international understanding. Interspersed throughout the film are brief scenes of Smallwood preparing his questions for Castro. The film's Cuban liaison comes off as a likeable, unofficious human being, somewhat bemused by the antics of his Canadian charges. Rubbo's willingness to see himself as one of the characters, with foibles and blind spots of his own, saves the film from the kind of condescension or sanctimony that so often detracts from films featuring the filmmaker as the documentary protagonist.

Ostensibly the film may appear to offer a vision of Cuba in lieu of the hoped-for scoop with Castro. In the state-sponsored location scenes, we get some interesting, off-the-cuff interaction with Cubans speaking without script. A pair of university students set the visitors straight on finer points of Marxism. An inmate of a mental hospital suggests that Rubbo, not her, may be the crazy one. A lyrically shot scene of a pick-up baseball game seems to capture a certain innocence in the Cuban personality. However, these encounters are superficial, and Rubbo knows it. What matters is not what they reveal about Cuba, because they reveal very little. Far more interesting is what they reveal about Stirling, Smallwood, and Rubbo. They interpret the encounters so that they fit in with their existing ideological concerns. For Stirling, nothing he sees is good; only the restoration of capitalism can save Cuba. Smallwood is impressed by the progress Cuba has made and thinks it is headed in the right direction. Rubbo is ambivalent, wanting to be impressed. What the film finally demonstrates has little to do with Cuba and everything to do with how our mind-sets shape the way we perceive and interpret new experiences.

It is now quite common for documentary filmmakers to assume an on-screen role of provocateur. What remains rare, however, is the willingness to keep one's on-screen role roughly equal in dramatic force to other characters. Rubbo's awareness of the limitations of documentary, while widely shared, is rarely expressed in such a natural way, organic to the story, but instead is typically announced or stated in a way external to the narrative.

D.B. JONES

See also: Rubbo, Michael; Sad Song of Yellow Skin

Waiting for Fidel (Canada, National Film Board, 1974, 58 mins). Distributed by the National Film Board of Canada. Produced by Tom Daly and Michael Rubbo. Directed and edited by Michael Rubbo. Cinematography by Douglas Kiefer. Sound by Jacques Chevigny.

Further reading

- Denby, David, 'How to Make a Castro Movie Without Castro', The New York Times, November 16, 1975.
- Dobi, Steve, 'Michael Rubbo' (interview), Sightlines, fall, 1975: 17–20.
- Handling, Piers, 'The Diary Films of Mike Rubbo', in Seth Feldman (ed.), Take Two, Toronto: Irwin Publishing, 1984.
- Hughes, John, 'Michael Rubbo: Hiding Behind the "I"', (interview), Cinema Papers, January–February 1981: 41–5, 89.
- Jones, D.B., Movies and Memoranda, Ottawa: Deneau, 1982.
- , The Best Butler in the Business: Tom Daly of the National Film Board of Canada, Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1996.
- Knelman, Martin, 'Waiting for Fidel', Toronto Globe & Mail, July 24, 1976.
- Rosenthal, Alan, 'Sad Song of Yellow Skin and Waiting for Fidel' (interview with Michael Rubbo), in The Documentary Conscience: A Casebook in Film Making, Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1980.
- Sloniowski, Jeannette, 'Questioning the Master Narratives: Michael Rubbo's Waiting for Fidel', in James Leach and Jeannette Sloniowski (eds), Candid Eyes: A Canadian Documentary Reader, Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 2003.

War Game, The

(UK, Watkins, 1965)

Peter Watkins's meticulously researched vision of a 'limited' nuclear attack on England, The War Game, was officially banned from television screens worldwide for twenty years. It was produced for BBC Television in 1965, released for cinema in 1967, but not shown on television until 1985. The extent of its suppression and the political controversy that hounded it are perhaps unparalleled in UK television history. Watkins believed that there was a conspiracy of silence on the subject of nuclear warfare. Certainly this film touched such a raw nerve that the BBC, the government, and the right-wing press (which dubbed it propaganda for the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament) all conspired to suppress it. However, it had its champions as well as denigrators, and the debate about whether to shelve it raged for over a year.

Watkins's film is a tour de force of cinematic techniques, using a fluid, handheld camera style that he had developed since his amateur days. He subverts the forms of documentary and newsreel to deliberately disorientate the viewer, engaging them emotionally, intellectually, and actively. In this way the film has been compared somewhat to Orson Welles's radio broadcast of The War of the Worlds (1938). The War Game is a drama shot to look like a documentary, a film with an inner logic that immediately suspends disbelief and invites the viewer to question the morality of nuclear weapons and the state's civil defence policy. As its narrative unfolds, the consequences of nuclear war at a very human level are explored, creating a reaction that is overpowering in its intensity.

Brechtian detachment techniques are deployed at times to create emotional distancing, such as the cameos to camera of some of the 'experts' attempting to reassure us of the 'wisdom' of nuclear weapons, but the effect is one of ironic counterpoint to the dramatic newsreel-like action on the screen. The contrast between these scenes is like attending a lecture on thermo-nuclear weapons and being there when one explodes. Occasionally Watkins breaks the narrative to question the cast directly about their knowledge of nuclear weapons, civil defence, and the Cold War. The War Game was shot on 16mm black and white to add to its illusory documentary/newsreel feel. This effect was further enhanced by a deliberate increase in tonal contrast at the processing stage to give the scenes after the bomb had dropped a stark, nightmare quality. The War Game used an amateur cast, as is Watkins's preference. He has been criticised for the occasional 'stiffness' of their performances, but feels that new faces and actors free from the traditional conventions of film acting are important additions to his conception of film realism. The stunning special effects of The War Games (such as the battlefield combat scene using 'tactical' nuclear weapons in Europe and the hellish firestorm depicted in England) all owe much to the crew's inventiveness rather than a big budget.

The film achieved notoriety even before it was screened. The cofounder of the 'Clean-up Television' campaign, Mary Whitehouse, wrote on September 5, 1965 to Hugh Carleton Greene, the Director-General of the BBC, and Prime Minister Harold Wilson that nuclear war was not a subject for 'entertainment'. She added, ominously, that 'the Home Office, not the BBC' should decide whether or not to show it. The letter was quoted in The Guardian (1965) and other sources. The decision to ban The War Game was raised at 10 Downing Street, discussed in the Cabinet, and debated in Parliament. A salvo of communication passed between the Home Office (the government department responsible for broadcasting and civil defence) and the BBC. It should not be forgotten that The War Game exposed, for the first time on film, the rudimentary 'protect and survive' methods that were promoted by the government against nuclear attack.

The Guardian (1999) reported that Prime Minister Churchill personally intervened in 1955 when the BBC proposed to make a film about the newly developed hydrogen bomb. These new weapons were thousands of times more deadly than the atomic bombs used on Japan in 1945. Churchill's edict to the BBC declared that any plans for a film on the H-bomb should be discussed in advance. The BBC 'at once accepted—very willingly' his order. Cold War tension was the underlining factor here, but also the curious relationship between the BBC and the British government, which only grants the BBC a licence to broadcast for a period of usually up to ten years at any one time. In 1965 the protocol was that the Home Office could instruct the BBC via the Postmaster General to ban any programme it considered 'not in the National interest'. The BBC Chair of Governors in 1965 was Lord Normanbrook, whose previous posts included Secretary to the Cabinet and Head of the Civil Service, and was reputedly one of Churchill's most trusted advisers (Colville 1985). In 1954 he headed a top-secret committee to advise on civil defence and war strategy in the event of a nuclear attack, a role well documented in Hennessy (2002).

Retired Member of Parliament and ex-Cabinet Minister Tony Benn was the Postmaster General in 1965. He told me personally and in writing (2003) that he was instructed by the Home Office to officially ban The War Game: 'My recollection is that the Home Secretary—[Frank] Soskice—decided to ban The War Game and, as PMG [Post Master General] and Minister for the BBC, I was told to transmit the instruction to them.'

The film was eventually granted a licence for cinema release but only after public protest, led by Watkins himself. It was shown in church halls, municipal buildings, and independent cinemas and immediately galvanised support. Cultural icons, such as John Lennon and Yoko Ono, Paul McCartney, and the Beatles' manager, Brian Epstein, all supported Watkins's film. The respected theatre and film critic, Kenneth Tynan (1966), wrote in the Observer: 'It may be the most important film ever made. We are always being told that works of art cannot change the course of history. Given wide enough dissemination, I believe this one can.' Lennon, in Rolling Stone (1970), said that seeing the film and corresponding with Watkins 'was like getting your call up papers for peace'. This impact on Lennon and Ono's 'give peace a chance' activities is elaborated in Coleman (1995).

The War Game further embarrassed the BBC by winning the Academy Award in 1967 for the Best Documentary Feature of 1966. Typically, Watkins declined to attend. Kenneth Adam, the Director of BBC Television, was sent to represent him, although one of the BBC's explanations for its decision not to show the film was that it was 'less than a masterpiece' and a failed 'experiment' (Gomez 1979). However, Watkins sent a telegram insisting that Adam was not to accept the Oscar if he won and the BBC was denied this opportunistic moment of reflected glory.

As a child Watkins lived in London and experienced the Blitz, the V-1 flying bomb, and the even more terrifying V-2 rocket. After the war he was conscripted for military service, and his abhorrence of war found expression in most of his subsequent work.

Tynan (1966) wrote that Watkins is 'the finest auteur we have', responsible for 'three masterpieces, more than any other living English director' (Culloden, 1964; The War Game, 1965; and Edvard Munch, 1973).

PATRICK MURPHY AND JOHN COOK

See also: Watkins, Peter

The War Game (UK, BBC Television, 1965, 47 mins). Distributed by the British Film Institute, London, on VHS or DVD with voice-over commentary and audio essay by Patrick Murphy. Written, produced and directed by Peter Watkins. Photography Peter Bartlett.

Editor Mike Bradsell. Art direction Tony Cornell and Anne Davey. Action sequences Derek Ware. Sound Derek Williams, Lou Hanks, and Stanley Morcom. Costumes Vanessa Clarke. Make-up Liliias Munro. Production assistant Peter Norton. Commentaries Dick Graham and Michael Aspel. Filmed in Kent, England.

Further reading

- n.a., 'Letter to PM on TV Film', The Guardian, UK, September 7, 1965: 5.
- n.a., Rolling Stone, US/UK, February 7, 1970.
- BBC, The BBC Handbook, London, published annually.
- Coleman, R., 'Peace', in Lennon: The Definitive Biography, London: Pan Books, 1995, revised edn.
- Colville, J., The Fringes of Power, London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1985.
- Cook, J. and Murphy, P., 'After the Bomb Dropped: The Cinema Half-Life of the War Game', The Journal of Popular British Cinema 3, 2000: 129–32.
- Ferris, P., 'The War Game', in Sir Hugu: the Life of Huw Wheldon, London: Michael Joseph, 1990.
- Gomez, J., Peter Watkins, Boston: Twayne Publishers, 1979.
- Hennessy, P., The Secret State, London: Allen Lane, The Penguin Press, 2002.
- Murphy, P., 'Let Them Watch Strindberg', The Times Higher Education Supplement, London, February 7, 1997.
- 'The Film the BBC Tried to Bury', The New Statesman, London, August 24, 1997: 22–4.
- 'The War Game—The Controversy, Sweden', Film International 3, 2003: 25–8.
- Rosenthal, A., 'The War Game', in The New Documentary in Action, Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1971.
- Travis, A., 'Churchill Gagged BBC on H-bomb', The Guardian, August 20, 1999: 6.
- Tynan, K., 'A Warning Masterpiece', Observer, London, February 13, 1966.
- Watkins, P., The War Game, London: Sphere Books/Andre Deutsch, 1967.
- Welsh, J.M., Peter Watkins—A Guide to References and Resources, Boston: G.K. Hall, 1986.

War Room, The

(US, Pennebaker and Hegedus, 1993)

The War Room follows two documentary traditions pioneered with Primary (1960): cinéma vérité and the insider's view on US presidential election campaigns. Like Primary, The War Room observes events on the campaign trail, but instead of limiting itself to one state, the film follows Bill Clinton's 1992 odyssey through the New Hampshire primary, the Democratic Party nomination and bus tour, the debates, and the election night victory. The film also addresses the monkey wrenches thrown into the works, including Jennifer Flowers's allegations, draft-dodging accusations, and other mud-slinging on platform issues. In all, filmmakers D.A. Pennebaker (who worked on Primary) and Chris Hegedus spent almost thirty-five hours inside the war room, Clinton's moniker for his campaign headquarters in Little Rock, Arkansas.

The film does show some moments with Clinton (one features him wearing a baseball cap, an Arkansas Razorbacks T-shirt, a digital watch, and running shoes as he talks to a reporter on the phone), but The War Room is more about his image and his image-makers than Clinton himself. As such, the focus is more on campaign manager James Carville and communications director George Stephanopoulos. The two are polar opposites, yet both are dedicated to seeing their candidate win. With his Southern affectations, quick mind, and dazzling one-liners, 'Ragin' Cajun' Carville brings his passionate spirit to meetings, press conferences, and even radio talk shows. George Stephanopoulos plays the straight man to Carville's one-man act, though he brings no less dedication to the efforts.

Pennebaker and Hegedus also incorporate television clips and shots of newspaper headlines to fill in some gaps in their timeline. In doing so, they provide an additional perspective on events, that of the mass media. Television footage reveals the dents in the candidate's reputation. One early segment juxtaposes Flowers's press conference ('Did Governor Clinton use a condom?' asks one reporter) and her revelation of their affair with shots of reporters asking Clinton for comments on the accusations. Newspaper headlines chart Clinton's rise and fall at both primary and public opinion polls.

The filmmakers played the cinéma vérité waiting game in making The War Room, but Carville delivers an emotional climax. During a staff meeting, Stephanopoulos calmly introduces Carville with a thank you. Carville gets up to give a final rally cry for the troops, but a close-up reveals his chin quivering as he speaks. A tear emerges and he wipes it away, fighting the wash of tears coming on.

The filmmakers also risked Clinton losing the election. If he had lost, according to Hegedus,

'the value of a film about a losing campaign staff wasn't going to be too salable for us. There is a risk in any story where you're following real life and you don't know what's going to happen' (Stubbs 2002: 46). Voters elected Clinton by a 'landslide', in Stephanopoulos's word.

The film shows how an unconventional candidate needs an unconventional team. By mixing observed footage with television clips and newspaper headlines, Hegedus and Pennebaker create a forum in which to showcase Carville, Stephanopoulos, and the rest of Clinton's staff.

HEATHER MCINTOSH

The War Room (US, Pennebaker Associates, 1993, 96 mins). Distributed by October Films. Directed by Chris Hegedus and D.A. Pennebaker. Produced by R.J. Cutler, Wendy Ettinger, and Frazer Pennebaker. Cinematography by Nick Doob, D.A. Pennebaker, and Kevin Rafferty. Film Edited by Chris Hegedus, Erez Laufer, and D.A. Pennebaker.

Further reading

Pennebaker Hegedus Films, www.phfilms.com
Stubbs, Liz, 'D.A. Pennebaker and Chris Hegedus: Engineering Nonfiction Cinema', in Documentary Filmmakers Speak, New York: Allworth, 2002: 41–68.

Warhol, Andy

Pop artist Andy Warhol made many films in the 1960s in his New York studio, the well-known 'Factory'. Warhol began working with 16mm film around 1963 and continued to produce great numbers of cinematic works for several years. These films are among the most noted of the 1960s avant-garde and are counted among the canon of experimental film, as they challenged narrative convention and explored daily life in exciting new ways. This movement into filmmaking was a natural progression for Warhol, whose work as a painter and illustrator was already revered. The pop icon was always interested in new ways to replicate the events and people of the world around him, and the film camera provided a direct and seemingly truthful means of capturing this. As Warhol evolved as a filmmaker, his works became less clearly documentary and more fictional in their content. So, too, the formal aspects seen in Warhol's early films changed as the decade continued, an apparently organic aesthetic response to the times.

The first Warhol films recall the simple constructions of the Lumières' actualities from the 1890s. These works are far more complex, however, and may be seen as a perfect representation of the prevailing attitudes and concerns of their time. Sleep (1963), the first Warhol film shown publicly, is a record of John Giorno in bed sleeping. The film is in real time, so it lasts more than five hours and is a complete document of a man sleeping. The impact of showing such an event in real time cannot be underestimated. Viewers are often disturbed by this technique, and they may become agitated or angry, perhaps even verbally abusive to the screen itself. Warhol continued his investigation of real time with such works as the trio of Haircut films (1963), Empire (1964), and Eat (1964). Each of these titles refers rather directly to the content of the film. In the Haircut works, numbered consecutively in order of creation, we witness various men having haircuts. In Eat, we watch painter Robert Indiana slowly consume a mushroom, an experience that lasts nearly forty minutes. Warhol's notorious Empire is an eight-hour study of the Empire State Building. The camera is unmoving, and only a full viewing of the film can show that there is much movement indeed, as sunlight shifts and falls, clouds drift by, and electrical lights are switched on and off in the building.

This cinematic experimentation evolved in several different ways. These very early films investigated time in a meditative way, but other 'real time' works moved less slowly in the same period. Kiss (1963–4) is a series of short works that cleverly defies the viewer-viewed comfort zone. Warhol was interested in voyeurism and sought to play with this concept in his film work. Kiss also exploits the single-spool (reel) of home movies and independent filmmaking. Each set of people seen in the Kiss works engages in kissing for nearly three minutes, the length of one reel of 16mm film. The couples are diverse (same sex, opposite sex, questionable gender, etc.), as are the styles of kissing seen (from very passionate to softly tender). What is undeniable here is the atypical experience of watching anyone kiss for more than the usual thirty seconds or less seen in typical movies.

Blow Job (1964) is of the same time period, and it also strongly deals with the nature of voyeurism and the viewer's experience. In this film, a man leans against a brick wall as fellatio is performed on him. The framing of this scene is paramount, as the shot shows the man's head, shoulders, and torso, but nothing below his midsection. The viewer is left to ponder the unseen person kneeling in front of the subject, and as the film lasts more than thirty minutes, the act of watching the subject's face is clearly the point of the exercise.

One of the most fascinating projects seen in the Warhol film archive is that of the Screen Tests (1964–6), which also exploited the 100' reel of 16mm film as a time element. There are more than five hundred known Screen Tests (The Andy Warhol Museum is in the process of identifying and cataloging all of the works that have surfaced in Warhol's belongings), each a three-minute study of a person's face. With the camera mounted on a tripod, turned on, and left to create a record, each subject reacted differently. Facing a camera is a difficult task for some, a chance to perform for others, but each Screen Test shows a change in the subject's face as the minutes of this confrontation pass. These works are beautiful in their formal simplicity and extremely intriguing as complex explorations of individuals.

These types of investigations continued throughout the 1960s and into the early 1970s, as Warhol turned his camera onto the people who hung around the Factory. Documentary studies were still the bulk of the films made, but they became more elaborate studies of the artists, musicians, junkies, and superstars who were a part of the Warhol scene. Chelsea Girls (1967) is a double-projected film (two reels shown side-by-side and simultaneously) that is more than three hours long. It moves from room to room in the Chelsea Hotel, pausing for various periods of time to reveal these people in various scenarios in largely unscripted scenes. The 'actors' play themselves here, and the film is a document of these people in this time doing the strange things they did. Other works were made with this same kind of curiosity and honesty as these lives were memorialized in hundreds of films.

Biography

Born near Pittsburgh, PA, 1928. Attended Carnegie Institute of Technology (now Carnegie Mellon University). Moved to New York City 1949. Began working in commercial art as an illustrator. First exhibition, Ferus Gallery 1962. Included in group show at the Guggenheim Museum 1963. Received Independent Film Award from Film Culture 1964. Film installation exhibited in New York Film Festival 1964. Produced Exploding Plastic Inevitable, multimedia events that included performances by the Velvet Underground 1966. Produced first rock and roll album by Velvet Underground and Nico 1966. Shot and seriously wounded by Valerie Solanas, former Factory dweller 1968. First retrospective show, Europe 1968. First issue of Interview magazine published 1969. Major retrospective show, United States and Europe 1970. Produced short segments, 'Andy Warhol's TV' for use on Saturday Night Live 1981. Directed music video for the Cars 1984. Hosted Andy Warhol's Fifteen Minutes, regular program on MTV 1985–87. Died from complications following routine gallbladder surgery 1987.

Selected films

1964 Couch
 1965 Horse
 1966 Suicide
 1968 Blue Movie

Further reading

Koch, Stephen, Stargazer, New York: Marion Boyars, 1973.
 O'Pray, Michael (ed.), Andy Warhol: Film Factory, London: British Film Institute, 1989.
 Warhol, Andy and Hackett, Pat, POPism: The Warhol 60s, New York: Harper & Row, 1980.
 Wolf, Reva, Andy Warhol, Poetry, and Gossip in the 1960s, Chicago and London: University of Chicago Press, 1997.

Watkins, Peter

In 2000 Peter Watkins completed a three hundred and forty-five-minute documentary commissioned by La Sept ARTE, the French-German TV network. La Commune de Paris 1871 was produced with a cast of more than two hundred, recruited from newspaper adverts, who researched and improvised together the story of the uprising. Told through the eyes of two fictional TV stations, the actors, in and out of character and in and out of period, debate the issues of the Commune, but also the role of the media in 1871 and at the end of the millennium. La Sept ARTE first tried to reedit, then scheduled the programme for the graveyard shift. Distributed on video by supporters, the film has done the round of festivals to considerable acclaim and some controversy. It has also been effectively kept off the television screens for which it was designed and on which it comments so directly. It is, as far as there is such a thing, a typical Watkins project.

In his online account of the film, Watkins's comments of TV that 'The medium has become a thoroughly mean-spirited profession, ruthlessly resisting all dialogue for change, completely devoid of respect, and allied without reservation to the development of globalization in its most centralizing and brutal forms.' The bitter tone is all too familiar and only too understandable. A prizewinning amateur filmmaker, Watkins clearly relished the inventive, improvisational character of nonprofessional documentary and continues to draw on it in his most recent work. With Culloden (1964), he achieved star status, bringing his vérité camera, direct address, voice-over, and volunteer cast aesthetic to the network public and critical esteem. His follow-up, The War Game (1965), despite its Best Documentary Oscar, was banned from British broadcasting for twenty years. Characterized by the same gritty montage of dramatization, recitations of fact, and precise naming of protagonists that characterised his earliest films, The War Game's depiction of the likely effects of a nuclear strike on Kent, England, made the fatal error of tying its horrors not just to Vietnam, as he had done in Culloden, but to the fire-bombing of Dresden, subject of at least two other documentaries banned on British television.

Forays into speculation as a mode of political commentary followed—1966's Privilege, 1969's The Gladiators (The Peace Game), 1971's Punishment Park—beginning Watkins's peripatetic career outside a United Kingdom that remained closed to him and largely closed to his films. In 1974 he completed Edvard Munch for Norwegian television, a vivid historical reconstruction of the decaying society and personal tragedies of the celebrated painter. Far removed from the norms of costume drama, this docudrama uses a cold palette dominated by greens and blues to communicate the tubercular world of its protagonist, and in what seems a deeply personal statement, covers the artist's family and professional life as a series of Brechtian 'gestus', marked by incomprehension, refusal, and despair.

There followed a series of low-budget experiments, mainly with Scandinavian companies, exploring with increasing fascination the powers of the long take and mobile camerawork to reveal with increasing intensity the emotional life of his characters. In 1987 the various strands of Watkins's career came together in an extraordinary project, released as The Journey. More than fourteen hours long, shot in more than a dozen countries, always with scraps of money, short-ends, volunteer craft and cast, The Journey documents not so much the international effects of nuclear war, its ostensible subject, as its own process. Actors move in and out of character to debate the rights and wrongs of their actions, and Watkins's theatrical investment in revealing his sets as sets moves toward making explicit the produced nature of the documentary, while at the same time assaulting the network wisdom that an hour is forty-three minutes punctuated by adverts. The duration of the piece derives from its internal logic, not that of broadcast sales, two reasons for its lack of distribution.

The Freethinker (1994) returns to the territory of Munch in its dramatization of the life of Strindberg. Shot on video with cast and crew derived from a film school where Watkins was working, the film also resembles Munch in its portrait of a reviled creator. Like The Journey, The Freethinker expends much of its energy investigating the conditions of its making, a self-conscious essay on the potential of documentary to inform drama; to engage its performers' knowledge, opinions, and passion into the script; to foreground the medium by intrusive anachronisms, especially direct 'TV' interviews of characters; and the willingness to allow viewers time to watch, listen, and decide about the actions presented. The Freethinker is also characterised by a complex spiral structure interweaving five distinct times in Strindberg's life, not just contesting chronological biography, but allowing complex rhymes and analogies between phases of a life to emerge into the light.

The bulk of critical writing on Watkins concentrates on earlier work, largely because

The War Game and Culloden remain the easiest of his films to find. The disastrous relationship with La Sept ARTE means that his most significant achievement to date, La Commune, is scarcely beginning to have the impact it deserves. The film draws together previous technical developments in his oeuvre but also develops a powerful use of wide-angle lenses and handheld mobile camera takes of up to ten minutes to assert the complexity of understanding a history made by crowds rather than by individuals or even types. As the amateur cast debate the action and its relation to contemporary events in France, Watkins draws racism, gender, and colonialism into the history of the Commune. All the while, the stories are conveyed by two contrasting TV stations, using, as in The War Game, intertitles to add information and draw parallels. Characters and actors alike disagree with the film's thesis, apologizing for the massacre of the communards, appealing for the past to be forgotten. None of this is excluded, though the direction frequently allows an expression of opinion to be interrupted by new narrative action, and vice versa. Still committed to a pedagogical documentary form, still at war with the 'monoform' standards of broadcast media, Watkins can easily be portrayed as a dinosaur. His work, however, is increasingly relevant to any claim that documentary has a public role in a postmodern mediascape.

SEAN CUBITT

See also: War Game, The

Watson, Patrick

Patrick Watson's influence on Canadian television is profound. Affected by Marshall McLuhan's ideas of electronic media producing a global village, Watson has stridently challenged the medium of television as a tool for mass communication and thought-provoking work.

To develop these ideas, Watson initially delved into the political realm of Parliament Hill, producing and presenting news and current affairs programs such as Close-Up (1959) and Inquiry (1960). Dissatisfied, Watson wanted to produce a cutting-edge current affairs programme that could combine McLuhan's philosophy, approach controversial topics, and have entertainment value. The satirical This Hour Has Seven Days (1964–6) fulfilled his ideas for merging political and current affairs to the general television public. It was the most watched programme in Canada and caused a furore of complaints and compliments—exactly what Watson had wanted.

After the cancellation of This Hour, Watson, with his newly formed independent production company, started to produce and direct a wider range of television programming, including such examples as Steeltown (1966), The Undersea World of Jacques Cousteau (1968), Witness to Yesterday (1970), 51st State (1970), and Question of Television Violence (1972). Most of these documentaries try to understand the world in which we live, and with this information, encourage the public to ask questions about that world.

The 1970s and 1980s saw more of Watson's penchant for Canadian history and politics with an array of programs such as The Watson Report (1975–81) and The Canadian Establishment (1980). Reaching viewers beyond Canada, he wrote, produced, and presented the highly acclaimed series The Chinese (1983) and The Struggle for Democracy (1989).

The Struggle for Democracy would become his crowning achievement. To explore the idea of democracy, this series would be five years in the making and take him to thirty countries. It was an ideal project that brought together all of Watson's talents as a presenter, researcher, philosopher, and historian. It was the first documentary series to be transmitted simultaneously in French and English on the CBC in January 1989. This series cemented Watson's status as an auteur.

Watson's thirty-year career with the CBC came to a climax in 1989, when he became chairman, with the mandate to strengthen the CBC and help turn it into a world-class broadcasting organization. Watson soon found this challenge frustrating, as the board of directors was rife with Conservative patronage appointments, which in turn fuelled the on-going debate over privatization. Most frustrating of all was the public's high and unrealistic expectations of Watson, in an ineffectual role, as saviour of the CBC. Watson resigned in 1991, four months before his tenure expired.

Patrick Watson saw the potential of television as a limitless device for communicating and provoking discussion. He made Canadians aware of social and political issues, as well as their global environment. Long before his 1989 mandate to strengthen the CBC as a world broadcaster, Watson wanted the Corporation to be at the forefront of this media revolution, constantly pushing them to have more ingenuity with programming ideas. He saw the general television public as people with a thirst for knowledge, which is why as a documentarian, Watson is so successful and popular: he connects high ideals with popular communication.

MELISSA BROMLEY

Biography

Born Toronto, Ontario, Canada, December 23, 1929. Graduated from University of Toronto, MA, DLitt. Companion in the Order of Canada 2002. Radio actor 1943, producer, writer at the CBC 1955–66. Became an independent producer, director, and presenter founder of Patrick Watson Enterprises 1966. Cofounder of Immedia 1967. Chair of the CBC 1989–94; first North American filmmaker to film in the People's Republic of China; recipient of ACTRA Outstanding Achievement to Canadian Broadcasting; creative director of the CRB Foundation's Heritage Project and commissioning editor, documentaries, for History Television.

Further reading

- Barber, Benjamin and Watson, Patrick, The Struggle for Democracy, Toronto: Key Porter Books, revised edn, 2002.
- Lee, Rohama, 'The Struggle for Democracy', Sightlines 4, 1989: 32–3.
- Manera, Tony, A Dream Betrayed: The Battle for the CBC, Toronto: Stoddart Publishing Co. Ltd, 1996.
- McLuhan, Marshall, Understanding Media, London: Routledge Classics edn, 2001.
- McLuhan, Marshall and Fiore, Quentin, The Medium is the Message, Corte Madera, CA: Gingko Press, 2001.
- Nash, Knowlton, The Microphone Wars: A History of Triumph and Betrayal at the CBC, Toronto: McClelland & Stewart Inc, 1994.
- Watson, Patrick, The Canadians: Biographies of a Nation, Volume III, Toronto: McArthur and Co., 2002.

Watt, Harry

Harry Watt was a key figure in the rapprochement between British documentary and realist feature film production during World War II. In a career spanning the documentary movement of the 1930s and early 1940s, and Michael Balcon's regime at Ealing studios in the 1940s and 1950s, he successfully directed both types of film. He came into his own as a filmmaker in the latter part of the 1930s at the General Post Office (GPO) Film Unit, having joined its previous incarnation, the Empire Marketing Board (EMB) Film Unit, after studying at Edinburgh University and working at various jobs including sailor and shop worker. In this respect he differed from other recruits to the British documentary movement, for example Basil Wright, who joined immediately after university. Watt shared a middle-class background with his colleagues, but his down-to-earth manner and personal experience of some of the occupations represented in the movement's films partly account for his ability to coax credible performances from nonactors in documentaries such as North Sea (1938) and Target for Tonight (1941).

BBC-Droitwich (1935), one of the earliest documentaries that Watt directed, benefited from a concluding experimental sound montage of radio transmissions devised by Alberto Cavalcanti. Temperamentally, Watt found Cavalcanti's professional yet Catholic approach to filmmaking more congenial than John Grierson's. Watt's career as a director with an emerging style of his own flourished after Cavalcanti succeeded Grierson as head of the GPO Film Unit in 1937. Subsequent developments in Watt's filmmaking emphasised previously neglected or subordinate aspects of the documentary project. One ambition Watt and Cavalcanti shared, which Grierson gave less emphasis to in the later 1930s, was to get documentaries screened in mainstream theatrical circuit cinemas. North Sea, a narrative documentary reconstructing an actual incident in which a fishing trawler caught in a storm was guided home by a radio station, was specifically designed with this in mind.

Rudimentary narrative structures and reconstruction of events that had happened or would typically happen existed within British documentary before Watt's work (Winston 1995). Drifters (John Grierson, 1929), like North Sea, used the basic journey structure of a trawler's fishing expedition and incorporated footage shot on a specially constructed set to represent the interior of the trawler's cabin. From the outset rudimentary narrative structures and reconstructions were taken for granted as a standard part of documentary practice, but what generated support from critics and endowed the documentary movement with cultural legitimacy during its earlier phase was modernist experimentation in, for example, Drifters, The Song of Ceylon (Basil Wright, 1934–5), and even BBC-Droitwich (Stollery 2000). Watt's innovation in documentaries such as North Sea was to explicitly prioritise narrative and characterisation and attract attention and praise for doing so.

Night Mail (1936) is Watt's transitional film. It uses a multifunctional voice-over, and its cinematography and editing are indebted to the modernist experimentation of the documentary movement's earlier phase (Guynn 1990; Aitken 1998). At the same time, the sync-sound equipment, which had been available only to the GPO Film Unit for a couple of years, enabled Watt to direct sequences featuring actual postal workers conversing in a set built to resemble the interior of a sorting carriage. The scripted dialogue they speak nominally individualises their characters, advances the narrative, and conveys information about the mail sorting process. Combined with the narrative momentum of the train's journey and the use of diegetic sound, this gives a particular sense of realism to the actions represented. These broad similarities to feature film technique partly account for Night Mail's relative success in mainstream cinema exhibition.

In The Saving of Bill Blewitt (1937), a robust Cornish fisherman saves money with the Post Office and in the latter part of the narrative works to a deadline to achieve his goal of buying a new boat. The film largely eschews voice-over commentary and uses an attenuated version of continuity editing favouring long and medium shots to draw the spectator into its narrative while locating its protagonist within a social context. North Sea (1938) is more sophisticated. Its narrative structure and editing strategies are similar to, yet more complex than, Watt's previous film (Higson 1986). Suspense is engendered by alternating between a worried community and radio operators on land, and endangered men at sea. The storm provides modestly spectacular action recorded in over-exposed footage, giving the film a compellingly raw texture. Editing links the actions of different crew members and radio operators to construct a visceral impression of integrated team work. Voice-over commentary is used briefly at the end to generalise the incident by referring to the numerous Post Office radio stations guarding Britain's ships.

North Sea was a commercial success, heralded as a minor breakthrough by reviewers and the trade press. Nonetheless certain British documentary filmmakers closer to Grierson felt Watt's approach to narrative made the film less informative about work processes than it should have been (Aitken 1998). Unlike some of his colleagues, Watt was not inclined to theoretical debate, but in an article written to accompany North Sea's release, he argued that what gave the film credibility was its narrative restraint. For him the absence of the dramatic embellishment that a fictionalised treatment would have brought to the narrative guaranteed its documentary authenticity (Vaughan 1983). Watt further refined the template he established in North Sea in Target for Tonight, a classic wartime documentary about an RAF bombing raid (Short 1997).

The influence of North Sea and Target for Tonight is evident in prestigious Crown Film Unit documentary productions for the Ministry of Information (MOI), such as Western Approaches (1944), directed towards the end of the war by Watt's former assistant Pat Jackson (Jackson 1999). Watt's activities during World War II included recording and reconstructing some of the earliest iconic documentary images associated with this period in The First Days (Watt, Humphrey Jennings, Pat Jackson, 1939). Subsequent films, London Can Take It (Watt, Jennings, 1940), and Christmas Under Fire (1941), narrated by American journalist Quentin Reynolds, were designed to build American support for Britain's war effort.

In 1942 Watt followed Cavalcanti to Ealing Studios to direct his first feature, Nine Men (1943) (Barr 1999). This was a logical extension of the direction his documentaries had taken. Other Ealing films such as The Foreman Went to France (Charles Frend, 1942) and certain British wartime features beyond Ealing registered the influence of what critic Dilys Powell described as Watt's 'semi-fictional documentaries' (Short 1997). In retrospect, the films in this category directed by Watt have been criticised, along with other strands of 1930s and 1940s British documentary, for ignoring controversial social, political, and economic issues because of institutional constraints. Watt himself concedes this criticism in his candid memoirs (Watt 1974). Yet his most notable documentaries played an historically significant role, contributing to an emerging tendency within wartime and postwar British cinema towards a new type of realist representation.

MARTIN STOLLERY

See also: Night Mail; Target for Tonight

Biography

Born in Glasgow, Scotland, October 18, 1906. Attended Edinburgh University. Joined Empire Marketing Board (EMB) Film Unit 1931–2. Assisted Robert Flaherty during the production of Man of Aran (1934). Codirected his first film, Six-Thirty Collection, with Edgar Anstey 1934. Moved with the film unit to the General Post Office (GPO) in 1934, stayed on when it became the Crown Film Unit 1939, and also worked for the Army Film Unit between 1939 and 1942. Contributed items to The March of Time 1936–37. Directed second unit on Jamaica Inn (Alfred Hitchcock, 1939). Directed numerous documentaries including North Sea (1938) and Target for Tonight (1941). Joined Ealing Studios in 1942 and directed seven features there including The Overlanders (1946), on location in Australia, and Where No Vultures Fly (1951), in Africa. Worked as a producer at Granada Television 1955. Published his memoirs Don't Look at the Camera in 1974. Died April 2, 1987.

Selected films

- 1935 BBC-Droitwich: director
- 1936 Night Mail: director
- 1937 The Saving of Bill Blewitt: director
- 1938 North Sea: director
- 1939 The First Days: codirector (with Humphrey Jennings and Pat Jackson)
- 1940 London Can Take It: codirector (with Humphrey Jennings, both uncredited)
- 1941 Christmas Under Fire: codirector (with Charles Hasse)
- 1941 Target for Tonight: director and writer (uncredited)
- 1943 Nine Men: director

Further reading

- Aitken, Ian, The Documentary Film Movement: An Anthology, Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press, 1998.
- Barr, Charles, Ealing Studios, third edn, Moffat: Cameron and Hollis, 1999.
- Guynn, William, A Cinema of Nonfiction, London: Associated University Press, 1990.
- Higson, Andrew, 'Britain's Outstanding Contribution to the Film: The Documentary-Realist Tradition', in Charles Barr (ed.), All Our Yesterdays, London: BFI, 1986: 72–97.
- Jackson, Pat, A Retake Please! Night Mail to Western Approaches, Liverpool: Liverpool University Press, 1999.
- Short, K.R.M., 'RAF Bomber Command's Target for Tonight (1941)', Historical Journal of Film, Radio and Television 17, no. 2, June 1997: 181–218.
- Stollery, Martin, Alternative Empires: European Modernist Cinemas and Cultures of Imperialism, Exeter: University of Exeter Press, 2000.
- Vaughan, Dai, Portrait of an Invisible Man, London: BFI, 1983.
- Watt, Harry, Don't Look at the Camera, London: Elek, 1974.
- Winston, Brian, Claiming the Real, London: BFI, 1995.

We Are the Lambeth Boys

(UK, Reisz, 1959)

We Are the Lambeth Boys was the main film in The Last Free Cinema programme shown at the National Film Theatre in March 1959, and was the second (and last) in the Ford-sponsored Look at Britain series (of which Lindsay Anderson's Every Day Except Christmas was the first). The film is linked in several ways with Every Day Except Christmas: both were part of the Free Cinema movement, and Reisz was coproducer of Anderson's film. At least one of the youths in We Are the Lambeth Boys worked in Covent Garden market, where Anderson's film was shot; Every Day Except Christmas looks at work, while We Are the Lambeth Boys looks at leisure time, documenting the activities of the Alford House youth club in Lambeth. That the film was explicitly about working-class young people links it strongly to the so-called British New Wave of fictional features, of which Reisz's Saturday Night and Sunday Morning (1960) was a key film.

Like Every Day Except Christmas, We Are the Lambeth Boys was photographed by Walter Lassally and recorded and edited by the often overlooked John Fletcher, but the years between the two films were marked by important changes in technology. Whereas Every Day Except Christmas appears to have little or no direct sound—though efforts are made to fake it from time to time—some major sequences in We Are the Lambeth Boys make important use of it (as well as of more mobile cameras). The discussion about murder and the death penalty, for example, and the late-night chip shop sequence—both relatively controlled situations—rely on it. Indeed, near the start of the film, when the boys are in the cricket nets and the girls are chatting in groups, and they begin to tease each other, the film seems to celebrate its ability to use direct sound recorded on location.

Elsewhere, however, sound is used in the same 'creative' way that it was used in Every Day Except Christmas, and the same way it was used in most 1930s and wartime British documentary films. Having shown us the end of a club evening, and larking about in the chip shop and street, the film fades to black then fades in on: morning, deserted block of council flats, one boy leaves on his own on his bicycle, sound of a train (atmospheric, though no train is visible); voice-over: 'Being young in the morning is different from being young at night ...' This is followed by a sequence of two younger boys arriving at school and singing a hymn ('The King of Love My Shepherd Is') in school assembly, which is continued over a sequence of shots of other young people at work—seamstress, office worker, post office boy, butcher's apprentice, assembly line pie-maker, all later put into context—learning a trade, waiting to get married, and so on—by the voice-over.

Although it is undoubtedly true that Free Cinema films, and perhaps We Are the Lambeth Boys in particular, offered relatively new, fresh images (and sounds) of British society and especially of youth culture—images in which we could at last, however partially, recognise ourselves—such a sequence raises large questions about the way the film uses voice-over commentary and music, and about the film's use of 'we' in its title. Though the subjects of the film—aside from those (barely glimpsed) who run the club and the Mill Hill School boys (who seem really only a foil for the Lambeth boys)—are working class, the filmmakers are conscious that they are not. The heated club discussion about capital punishment, for example, is both introduced by the middle-class voice-over and crucially framed by it.

It is less likely that the filmmakers were conscious of the implications of their choice of music—orchestrated jazz composed by Johnny Dankworth. The music is generally effective at setting the tone of the film (and for punctuating it at certain points), but why jazz? Remembering Momma Don't Allow (one of the first Free Cinema films, directed by Tony Richardson and Reisz, 1955), about a traditional jazz club, and even the Happy Wanderers street jazz band in Every Day Except Christmas, jazz seems to be one of the popular culture credentials of the middle-class filmmakers, whereas, as the film makes clear, what the young people themselves like is rock 'n' roll and 'skiffle'. The jazzy score, then, functions as another, unspoken judgment or commentary, implying that jazz is a superior popular form, just as the voice-over implies that the boys' political or moral judgements are defective or underdeveloped (though it could be argued that the film's critique is directed at the education system).

Overall, the class aspects of the film are quite difficult to discern, partly because the film sometimes suggests a critique but then withdraws from elaboration into easier conclusions. Having raised questions about the adequacy of the boys' judgements in the capital punishment discussion, for example, the voice-over retreats with: 'Not that they're worried. They're good at making the most of everyday, and just talking about things, like this, is a beginning. And it's good for a giggle.'

The extended sequence that follows, of the boys' trip to Mill Hill School for the annual cricket match, and an occasion allowing the overt juxtaposition of the working-class boys and the public school class, is more difficult to read. The boys' initial exuberance is replaced by what may be sullen passivity or jealousy, or just reflection, as they see the sumptuous facilities of the school. The return to Lambeth is marked by the boys' apparently wanting to leave their noisy mark on Central London as they pass through, but the film wants us to believe that, on crossing Westminster Bridge, the boys fall silent and, again, reflective or even morose. Why? Are we to feel that the boys are conscious of their class disadvantages, of their more limited opportunities? This is not made at all clear or explicit, and the film ends on a less uncomfortable note: Saturday night dancing at the club and the commentary's conclusion that 'a good evening for young people is much as it has always been, it's for being together with friends, and shouting when you feel like it—things we'd all like to do' (although the close of the film, with its nocturnal views of council flats, perhaps strikes a darker note).

JIM HILLIER

See also: Every Day Except Christmas; Reisz, Karel

We Are the Lambeth Boys (UK, Graphic Films for the Ford Motor Company Ltd, 1959, 52 mins, the second film in Look at Britain series). Distributed by the British Film Institute. Produced by Leon Clore. Directed by Karel Reisz. Cinematography by Walter Lassally. Music composed by Johnny Dankworth, played by members of the Johnny Dankworth Orchestra. Edited by John Fletcher. Commentary spoken by Jon Rollason. Assistants Louis Wolfers and Raoul Sobel. Filmed in London.

Further reading

- Anderson, Lindsay, 'Free Cinema', Universities and Left Review 2, summer 1957 (reprinted in Barsam, Richard Meran (ed.), Nonfiction Film Theory and Criticism, New York: E.P. Dutton, 1976).
- Ellis, Jack, The Documentary Idea, Englewood Cliffs, NJ and London: Prentice-Hall, 1989.
- Gaston, Georg, Karel Reisz, Boston: Twayne Publishers, 1980.
- Hoggart, Richard, 'We Are the Lambeth Boys', Sight and Sound 28, summer–autumn, 1959.
- Lambert, Gavin, 'Free Cinema', Sight and Sound 25, spring 1956.
- Lovell, Alan and Hillier, Jim, Studies in Documentary, London: Secker & Warburg; New York: Viking, 1972.
- Reisz, Karel, 'A Use for Documentary', Universities and Left Review 3, winter 1957.
- Sussex, Elizabeth, The Rise and Fall of British Documentary, Berkeley, CA and London: University of California Press, 1975.

We Live in Two Worlds

(UK, Cavalcanti, 1937)

We Live in Two Worlds (1937) was the second of the seven films that Alberto Cavalcanti directed for the Swiss telephone company Pro-Telephone Zurich between 1936 and 1939. The seven films are Line to Tcherva Hut, We Live in Two Worlds (1937), Who Writes to Switzerland? (1937), Message from Geneva (1937), Four Barriers (1937), Alice au pays romand (1938), and Men of the Alps (1939). We Live in Two Worlds is also the best known of these films, principally because of the involvement of the novelist and public figure, J.B. Priestley. Paul Rotha thought the film to be the best General Post Office (GPO) Film Unit film, alongside Harry Watt's The Saving of Bill Blewitt, to emerge in 1937. Forsyth Hardy, John Grierson's biographer, also thought We Live in Two Worlds to be particularly successful. However, Cavalcanti himself believed that another of the Swiss films, the less well-known Line to Tcherva Hut (1936) was a better film than We Live in Two Worlds.

The origins of We Live in Two Worlds lay in John Grierson's wish to utilise the footage left over from the making of Line to Tcherva Hut. Such a practice of reusing stock footage to make new films was common within the documentary film movement. To achieve this goal in this particular film, Grierson asked J.B. Priestley to compose an appropriate 'film talk', which could then be illustrated by the leftover footage. Priestley then constructed the narrative around the footage. Priestley called this process of 'turning a series of photographs into a narrative', 'creating a film backwards', and he went on to 'concoct a little talk about nationalism and the new internationalism of transport and communication' (Aitken 2001: 86–7).

Priestley had been associated with the documentary film movement for a few years before the making of We Live in Two Worlds. His book English Journey (1934) had directly inspired Paul Rotha's The Face of Britain (1935), and he had also published several articles in World Film News, one of the house journals of the documentary film movement. In books such as Angel Pavement (1930) and English Journey, Priestley focused on problems of corruption, unemployment, and poverty in Britain, and he was also active in the antifascist movement of the late 1930s. All this made him sympathetic to the general aims of the documentary film movement and eager to participate in the making of We Live in Two Worlds.

In We Live in Two Worlds, a distinction is made between the two worlds that characterise modern society: the world of separate nation states, and the 'growing international world'. The film begins by depicting traditional Swiss folk and labour practices. Then the film shifts to the theme of the modernisation of Switzerland and, in particular, to the role played by mass communication in creating links with Switzerland's neighbours. In contrast, the growth of nationalism and militarism in neighbouring Germany is explicitly criticised and contrasted with Swiss internationalism.

We Live in Two Worlds could be regarded as a Griersonian documentary because of its emphasis on international communications and the relationship between labour and institutional structures, and this, in turn, may explain why Griersonians, such as Paul Rotha and Forsyth Hardy, thought so highly of it. The truth is, however, that We Live in Two Worlds is a rather mediocre film, whilst Priestley's commentary, which is full of pompous, vernacular Yorkshire gravitas, is often predictable and rudimentary.

Cavalcanti's influence on We Live in Two Worlds can be found mainly in the film's use of sound and in the music track, which was composed by Cavalcanti's old acquaintance, Maurice Jaubert. That influence can also be seen most clearly in the final sequences of the film, in which Priestley's pedestrian didacticism gives way to an idealistic proclamation concerning the way in which the natural world transcends artificial nationalistic demarcations. These final sequences are almost abstract in quality as, for example, when superimposed images of ships at sea fade into a shot of the earth against Priestley's rhetorical claim that 'rain and sea and air serve all men'. The final shots of the film recreate abstract patterns of rain drops, and this leads on to the end titles of the film.

These final sequences, with their innovative and impressionistic use of sound and image, are reminiscent of other Cavalcanti films from the mid-1920s to the late 1950s. They can be clearly associated with Cavalcanti in We Live in Two Worlds, and it is this aspect of the film, rather than Priestley's commentary, that makes the film still worth watching today.

IAN AITKEN

See also: Cavalcanti, Alberto

We Live in Two Worlds (UK, 1937). Directed and edited by Alberto Cavalcanti. Music by Maurice Jaubert. Produced by John Grierson and Alberto Cavalcanti. Commentary by J.B. Priestley.

Further reading

- Aitken, Ian, Film and Reform, London: Routledge, 1990.
- The Documentary Film Movement, An Anthology, Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press, 1998.
- Alberto Cavalcanti, Realism, Surrealism and National Cinemas, London: Flicks Books, 2001.
- Cavalcanti, Alberto, Filme e Realidade, Rio de Janeiro: Editora Artenova, in collaboration with Empresa Brasileira de Filmes—Embrafilme, 1977.
- Rotha, Paul, Documentary Film, London: Faber & Faber, 1939.
- Sussex, Elizabeth, 'Cavalcanti in England', Sight and Sound 44, no. 4, autumn, 1975.

Weiss, Andrea

Independent documentary filmmaker Andrea Weiss engages a complex terrain of simultaneous roles. Weiss is a director, author, educator, archival researcher, producer, and historian. In 1984 Weiss and her partner Greta Schiller cofounded the nonprofit film company Jezebel Productions. Weiss's successful negotiation of her numerous roles has resulted in a rich array of projects that bespeak her commitment to pedagogy, representational ethics, and creative ingenuity.

Weiss has made or participated in making films about a range of provocative subjects, including: the US election process (Recall Florida); the lives of Thomas Mann's oldest children during Hitler's ascendancy (Escape to Life); a Hungarian girl's life during the Holocaust (Seed of Sarah); the stereotyping of gay characters by the mainstream British film industry since World War II (A Bit of Scarlet); the role of women in the literary and art world of the Parisian Left Bank during the early twentieth century (Paris Was a Woman); a multiracial all-women jazz and swing band of the 1940s (International Sweethearts of Rhythm); the long-term relationship of African American lesbian jazz musicians Tiny Davis and Ruby Lucas (Tiny & Ruby: Hell Divin' Women); and the history of the gay and lesbian community in the United States before the onset of the modern LGBT liberation movement (Before Stonewall).

During the introductory voice-over to Paris Was a Woman, the audience is told, 'Neither mistress nor muse, Paris became a haven for a new kind of woman'. This 'new kind of woman' not only indexes the independently minded (and often bourgeois) intellectual women who moved from the United States to Paris at the beginning of the twentieth century to make a 'new life', but implicitly refers to the largely open orientation toward lesbianism and other homosocial alliances between women in Paris at that time.

In Paris, Janet Flanner describes cubism as 'what you cannot see rendered visible'. This remark could also be made regarding the film's treatment of lesbian relationships in early twentieth-century Paris.

Flanner's statement likewise announces the film's stance and Weiss's perspective as a filmmaker: there is value in uncovering 'silenced' voices and 'missing' texts, and it is crucial to critique oversimplified and often romanticized revisionist histories by presenting the crucial contributions of multidimensional people who speak on their own behalf in the films and books that represent and describe them. By speaking with and through her films' images and by sensitively promoting her narrators' voices, Weiss points out that, as African American lesbian musician 'Ruby' puts it, '[the past] wasn't quite as open as it is now' (Tiny & Ruby). Weiss's work teaches viewers about racism, homophobia, classism, and sexism, and promotes social justice.

In her discussion of minority-produced feminist documentaries, Alexandra Juhasz notes that "'realist" footage ends up recording people reflexively discussing the meaning, reinterpretation, and importance of their own identity' (Juhasz 1999: 208). Juhasz asserts that this is especially important '[b]ecause so much of feminist and other "identity" video movements are specifically about constructing our own identities in a society that has usually done this for minorities' (ibid., original emphasis). Thus, the formal elements of 'realism' in these kinds of films may be used to forward a specialized feminist cultural critique, a visualizable social constructionism.

According to Juhasz, feminist documentaries have the potential to engage anti-essentialist notions of identity for political ends, because they can '[provide] a space in culture where political women with limited access to cultural production can partake in "radical postmodernism"' (Juhasz 1999: 212). Explaining 'radical postmodernism' (as borrowed from bell hooks), Juhasz states, 'the political instance of access to media production allows us to speak our needs, define our agenda, counter irresponsible depictions of our lives, and recognize our similarities and differences' (ibid.). As vehicles for marginalized narrators, both living and as depicted posthumously, Weiss's films are instances of 'radical postmodernism'.

Escape to Life is described on the Jezebel Productions website as a 'remarkable pairing between fiction and nonfiction'. Using a 'post-modernist' orientation to blur the boundaries between reality/fantasy and truth/fiction, Escape frames the relationship between Erika and Klaus Mann. In its meta-narrative form and content, the film may be read as doubly postmodern, because Erika and Klaus Mann enacted their own fusion of fiction and nonfiction in order to survive. Using an approach that today might be called 'passing', they pretended to be identical twins when they were different genders and more than a year apart in age.

Weiss's films consistently show how those who have social dominance wield power and how disempowered individuals strategically engage their subject positions. During a portion of Tiny & Ruby, the narrators discuss the racially segregated lesbian house parties of the 1940s through 1960s. Feminist scholars Kennedy and Davis (1994) argue that these parties played a crucial part in setting a tone for the American lesbian and gay liberation movement in the decades preceding Stonewall. At one point Tiny looks directly at the camera and asserts that if one wants to 'do something' and 'has the power', then one can 'do it'. Tiny's advice, a note of appreciation for having the opportunity to tell her story on film and a commentary on her identity, relays to both the audience members and the filmmakers her awareness of her power as compared with the power of the filmmakers who re-present her story.

As part of a supplement on film and history, Weiss was recently asked by the editors of Cineaste magazine to respond to a documentary filmmaker questionnaire. She remarks, 'I'm searching for something too through these women's lives and through the stories of all the people in my entire collection of films—I'm searching for clues for how to live my own life, a life lived by my own wits, in several different countries, a life without conventional forms or models to follow' (n.a. 2004: 60). Weiss, an out Jewish lesbian who lives in the UK and the United States, is a role model for those who negotiate a variety of complicated borders and boundaries in order to function within and critique late capitalism.

DIANE R. WIENER

Biography

Born in New York City, 1956. PhD Cultural History, Rutgers University 1991. Won a 1987 Emmy Award for Best Historical Research for her work on Before Stonewall, which also won an Emmy for Best Historical and Cultural Program. Won a 1989 Teddy Award for Best Documentary Film for Tiny & Ruby at the Berlin International Film Festival. Won 'Best of the Fest' award for A Bit of Scarlet at Edinburgh Film Festival in 1996, and also won Best Documentary at the Creteil women's film festival, Festival de Films de Femmes. Artist-in-residence at the Banff Centre for the Arts in Canada 1998, where she produced the short experimental video Seed of Sarah (a revisiting of the longer film made three years earlier), which premiered in the Marseilles Documentary Festival, Vue sur les Docs. Escape to Life, which premiered at the 2001 Rotterdam International Film Festival and was a special festival program at Berlin, was chosen as the closing night event of the New German Film Series at the Museum of Modern Art in New York and won the 'Award for Excellence' for Best Documentary at the 2001 Seattle Lesbian and Gay Film Festival. Co-author (with Greta Schiller) of Before Stonewall: The Making of a Gay and Lesbian Community (1988). Author of Vampires and Violets (originally published 1992), Paris Was a Woman: Portraits from the Left Bank (published 1995, won a Lambda Literary Award in 1996), and Flucht ins Leben: Die Erika und Klaus Mann Story (2000, published in English as Escape to Life: The Erika and Klaus Mann Story). Resides in London with partner and collaborator Greta Schiller.

Selected films

- 1985 Before Stonewall: The Making of a Gay and Lesbian Community: archive research director
- 1986 International Sweethearts of Rhythm: codirector and coproducer
- 1988 Tiny & Ruby: Hell Divin' Women: codirector and coproducer
- 1995 Paris Was a Woman: writer, researcher, coproducer

- 1995 Seed of Sarah: director, editor, coproducer
 1997 A Bit of Scarlet: director and editor
 2000 Die Erika und Klaus Mann Story (aka Escape to Life: The Erika and Klaus Mann Story): cowriter and codirector
 2003 Recall Florida: writer, editor, coproducer

Further reading

- Jezebel Productions website, www.jezebel.org
 Edelman, Rob, 'Greta Schiller', in Amy L. Unterburger (ed.), The St James Women Filmmakers Encyclopedia: Women on the Other Side of the Camera, Detroit: Visible Ink Press, 1999: 370–72.
 Gross, Larry, Up From Invisibility: Lesbians, Gay Men, and the Media in America, New York: Columbia University Press, 2001.
 Holmlund, Chris and Fuchs, Cynthia (eds), Between the Sheets, in the Streets: Queer, Lesbian, Gay Documentary, Minneapolis, MN: University of Minnesota Press, 1997.
 Hooks, Bell, Yearning: Race, Gender, and Cultural Politics, Boston: South End Press, 1990.
 Hunn, Deborah, 'Andrea Weiss', in GLBTQ: An Encyclopedia of Gay, Lesbian, Bisexual, Transgender, and Queer Culture, n.d., www.glbtc.com/arts/weiss_a.html
 Juhasz, Alexandra, 'They Said We Were Trying to Show Reality—All I Want to Show is My Video: The Politics of the Realist Feminist Documentary', in Jane M. Gaines and Michael Renov (eds), Collecting Visible Evidence, Minneapolis, MN and London: University of Minnesota Press, 1999: 190–215.
 Kennedy, Elizabeth Lapovsky and Davis, Madeline D., Boots of Leather, Slippers of Gold: The History of a Lesbian Community, New York: Penguin Books, 1994.
 Murray, Raymond, 'Greta Schiller', in Images in the Dark: An Encyclopedia of Gay and Lesbian Film and Video, New York: Plume (Penguin Books), 1996: 118–19.
 n.a., 'Film and History: Questions to Filmmakers and Historians', Cineaste 29, no. 2, spring 2004: 55–68.
 Weiss, Andrea, In the Shadow of the Magic Mountain, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2008.
 ———, Paris Was a Woman: Portraits from the Left Bank, San Francisco: Harper San Francisco, 1995.
 ———, Vampires and Violets: Lesbians in Film, New York: Penguin Books, 1993.
 Weiss, Andrea and Schiller, Greta, Before Stonewall: The Making of a Gay and Lesbian Community, Tallahassee: Naiad Press, 1988.

Welfare

(US, Wiseman, 1975)

In Welfare, by American filmmaker Frederick Wiseman whose films tend to focus on institutions and their operations, a New York City Welfare Office where the film was shot is presented as the closed system par excellence, a nightmare vision of institutional bureaucracy out of control. It is no accident that, chronologically, Welfare comes between Primate (1974) and Meat (1976), for the titles of these two films express how far, for Wiseman, living has become objectified and commodified.

The film, like the welfare center itself, is swamped with various kinds of forms. We see or hear about application forms; referral slips; notarized, registered, and certified letters; verifications of pregnancy; marriage licenses and driver's licenses; bills and receipts; change of address forms and prenatal forms; written budgets and pay stubs; food stamps; Medicaid cards and social security cards; housing deeds, disability checks and pro-ration checks; carbon copies and photocopies; time clock cards; computers; and printouts. One client complains that she has to 'get a notarized letter for this, a notarized letter for that'. Another client, standing aimlessly against a post, launches into a monologue about the 'rigamarole of forms' he must fill out; 'Papers, papers, papers', he says, finally dropping them on the floor and leaving in frustration.

In the film, the camera leaves the building just once—at the beginning. After this we remain confined within, unlike most of Wiseman's films, which at least offer periodic exterior shots as rhythmic punctuation. Here, though, our physical point of view remains claustrophobically confined within the harsh walls of this one welfare office, an absurd huis clos where we as spectators must dwell along with the system's needy clients. The first thing we hear in the film, a receptionist's 'Please have a seat', is not only a self-reflexive acknowledgment to the viewer that the film is now beginning, but also an ironic invitation to sit through a long ordeal, as the applicants themselves must. Welfare's lengthy running time of just under three hours is itself an expression of the labyrinthine and involved system of procedures and paperwork through which welfare applicants must navigate.

Consistent with the film's sense of enclosure and entrapment, Wiseman structures the film through a motif of circles. Clients are frequently trapped in a variety of Catch-22 situations, the victims of circular logic. One client, for example, wants to move but cannot, because there is no record of housing violations, but she is unable to get a buildings inspector to come and formally record the necessary violations; another client becomes ineligible for benefits because he missed his appointment at the welfare office while attending his hearing required by welfare procedures. Toward the beginning of the film, a man seeking immediate help says that he is getting a 'run around'. The phrase is echoed periodically by several other clients, and yet again toward the end by the woman who, speaking for her mother, angrily complains that she is caught in a never-ending 'vicious cycle'. The first couple interviewed in the film are shown again at the end, waiting, suggesting that they have hardly progressed in their application.

In Welfare, social and economic relations are reduced to a seemingly interminable series of exchanges between welfare workers and clients, the clients seeking the money that the workers have the power to dispense. Welfare foregrounds the economic disparity shown in some of Wiseman's other films, as everyone seeking help from the welfare system is penniless, many seeming on the verge of starvation, and they must prove their poverty. As Mr Hirsch, the final client shown in the film, says, 'There's no middle class any more. There's just the rich and the poor'.

Like a pressure cooker, this enclosed world of Welfare inevitably reaches the boiling point. So after watching a parade of clients being frustrated in every possible way for two hours, we are not surprised when two of them are unable to restrain themselves any longer and tempers flare. The welfare worker Elaine also loses her temper in turn: 'Get a job', she snaps unhelpfully at one of the clients. The evident anger and frustration of both worker and clients in this climactic scene are the understandable result of everything that has come before. The institutional workers at the welfare center, as in many other Wiseman films, have become inured to the pain and misfortune of the clients in order to cope with the burdens of administering an overloaded public system. In one problematic case, the supervisor instructs the worker to reject or accept the client, 'either one', not wanting to become involved any further.

The institution's regulations and procedures have overwhelmed the human element in the welfare office. The welfare workers speak of 're-entertaining applications' and 'financial servicing' for the clients, their language like the euphemistic discourse of military indoctrination in Basic Training and of nuclear holocaust in Missile. 'Void this 913', says one worker, using a kind of newspeak to avoid the harsh reality of the client's fate. Like the split between morality and technology in High School, one client complains that in the welfare office 'You give me technicality. I'm telling you about a condition.'

In keeping with its depressing depiction of the welfare system, the film ends on a bleak and ironic note. One of the clients, Mr Hirsch, who has been made to sit and wait alone on a bench, looks up and addresses the neon firmament and an absent God, saying he will wait as long as He deems it necessary.

BARRY KEITH GRANT

See also: High School; Meat; Wiseman, Frederick

Welfare (US, 1975, 167 mins). Distributed by Zipporah Films. Produced, edited, and directed by Frederick Wiseman. Cinematography by William Brayne. Sound recorded by Frederick Wiseman.

Further reading

- Atkins, Thomas R. (ed.), Frederick Wiseman, New York: Monarch Press, 1976.
- Benson, Thomas W. and Anderson, Caroline, Reality Fictions: The Films of Frederick Wiseman, Carbondale, IL: Southern Illinois University Press, 1989.
- Grant, Barry Keith, Voyages of Discovery: The Cinema of Frederick Wiseman, Urbana, IL and Chicago: University of Illinois Press, 1992.
- Mamber, Stephen, Cinema Verite in America: Studies in Uncontrolled Documentary, Cambridge, MA: MIT Press, 1974.
- Nichols, Bill, Ideology and the Image, Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press, 1981.

West Indies and the Caribbean

Historically, documentary films in the Caribbean, like films in the Caribbean generally, make up a broad array of productions, the diversity of which on one level is defined by language (including the work of Anglophone Caribbean, Francophone Caribbean, Hispanic Caribbean, and Dutch Caribbean producers) (Cham 1992). Consideration of some key documentary productions from the Caribbean region, however, reveals common themes, styles of production, and similar experiences shared by the documentary filmmakers of this ethnically, historically, culturally, and linguistically diverse region. Documentary films of the Caribbean are a heterogeneous body of work representing a culturally complex region, but there are many Caribbean productions that deserve to be included in the broader canon of documentary film. This article provides introductions to key producers of Caribbean documentary film, the cultural significance of Caribbean documentary, and the economic and political issues dealt with by Caribbean documentary filmmakers.

The local development of film industries and documentary film production has been a concern for both independent producers and Caribbean governments alike to varying degrees for more than fifty years. State-authored manifestations of these concerns include Jamaica's 1948 Motion Picture Industry (Encouragement) Law (Lent 1977), Martinique's 1977 Service Municipal d'Action Culturelle (Cham 1992) and Trinidad and Tobago's 2003 Master Plan for the Strategic Development of the Trinidad and Tobago Film Industry (Tourism and Industrial Development Company of Trinidad and Tobago, 2003). Documentaries from and about this region reflect the significant social and political struggles of the constituent countries as they emerged from colonial domination, through social revolution to cultural revitalization. Christian Lara's definition of Caribbean or Antillean film provides a basis on which Caribbean documentary film can be defined. Caribbean documentary is used here to include productions whose directors are from the Caribbean, with subject matter focusing on the Caribbean, featuring Caribbean lead actors, using Creole, and produced by a Caribbean production unit (Cham 1992). Although these criteria provide useful guidelines for attempting to represent a canon of Caribbean documentary film, there are also films whose place in such a canon is significant even though they may not fulfill one or two of the outlined criteria.

In the Caribbean from the 1970s to the early 2000s, nongovernmental documentaries were produced as a result of Caribbean filmmakers' struggles for recognition within local media cultures in which prepackaged, imported programs were readily received and broadcast for economic reasons (Lent 1977; Brown 1987). During this period, television stations across the Caribbean justified the high percentages of imported (usually North American or European) programs, including documentaries, by citing the lower costs associated with importing programs against the higher costs of producing local programs. Station-originated television documentaries were thus a low priority in the management of television stations across the Caribbean (Lent 1977). Further, after the advent of television in the 1960s and color in the 1970s, television stations placed emphasis on investigative reports on contemporary issues, while local documentary film production was ignored (St Juste 2004).

In the preindependent Caribbean, documentaries were also produced by colonial governments, tracing the stories of peoples of the then-colonies and the development of the Caribbean from colonial rule to independence (Warner 2000). Spanning the 1950s and 1960s, these colonial documentaries provided valuable insights into colonial rule. In the preindependence era, the Colonial Office in England sent documentaries to the colonies for viewing. In later colonial times, however, the Colonial Film Unit was closed down, as it became more cost effective to train people in the colonies in documentary filmmaking. These documentaries were produced in black-and-white, 35mm film and usually dealt with population and health issues (St Juste 1992).

This archive of preindependence Caribbean documentaries included: a film intended to motivate Jamaican teachers in the face of adversity (Builders of the Nation) (Warner 2000); coverage of prerevolutionary Cuba (Cuba Collection, 1950s); Marketing What We Grow (1963), a documentary about farming practices in Jamaica; This is Ska (1964), a two-part production on the origins of Ska music by the Jamaican Film Unit; The Lion of Judah (1966), a documentary account of the state visit of Ethiopian Emperor Haile Selassie to Jamaica; The Royal Tour of the Caribbean (1966), a film produced by the Colonial Office about the Queen's 1966 visit to British Guiana, Trinidad and Tobago, Grenada, St Vincent, Barbados, St Lucia, Dominica, Montserrat, Antigua, St Kitts-Nevis, Tortola, Grand Turk, the Caicos, the Bahamas, and Jamaica. Outside the realm of colonial pasts, historically there has been significant interest by international producers, researchers, and scholars to use film to document different aspects of culture, geography, and history of the Caribbean region (Found 2003–4).

After Caribbean nations gained their independence, documentary film, like other media, became an outlet for the expression of emerging national identities and a medium for the exploration of regional development. Documentary film, against the broader backdrop of the visual mass media, became sensitive to building and maintaining cultural sovereignty within the Caribbean (Brown 1987). In the Caribbean in the 1970s significant social and cultural development included the rise in popularity of Caribbean music, struggles for political or economic independence, and the increasing empowerment of the previously disempowered. Further along this path of evolution, in the 1980s, 1990s, and early twenty-first century, Caribbean filmmakers (and documentary filmmakers) placed emphasis on and explored themes of postcolonial nationalism and concerns for cultural imperialism resulting from foreign investment and ownership (Brown 1987; Cham 1992; Warner 2000).

Several significant documentary films exemplify this Caribbean focus on themes of postcolonialism, national identity, and the effects of globalization and tourism in the countries that make up this geographical region. Three such films are And the Dish Ran Away with the Spoon (1992), Los Hijos de Baragua/My Footsteps in Baragua (1996), and Life and Debt (2001). And the Dish Ran Away with the Spoon, originally produced to address regional environmental problems, took the unique approach of exploring the dominance of North American programming in the Caribbean region as an environmental issue (Laird 2004). Los Hijos de Baragua explores the cultural history of Anglophone West Indians in Cuba and the socio-political reasons for their migration. In Life and Debt documentary filmmaker Stephanie Black explored aspects of Jamaican everyday existence that are affected by economic agendas of such entities as the World Bank, the Inter-American Development Bank (IADB), and the International Monetary Fund (IMF). This documentary reveals the contradictions of Jamaican life most often not seen by visiting tourists (Black 2001–2). These three Caribbean documentaries explore identity and culture, the Caribbean diaspora, postcolonialism, and the search for cultural and political sovereignty.

One series of documentaries, Caribbean Eye, was produced in 1992 by Banyan, a video production house based in Trinidad and Tobago, whose contributions across the Caribbean included coproductions and the training of video units throughout the region (Banyan 2004). Key players in the founding and development of Banyan included Bruce Paddington, Christopher Laird, and Anthony Hall. Thirteen one-hour episodes made up the full series of Caribbean Eye, with each episode focused on a different aspect of Caribbean culture, including dance, theatre, festivals, indigenous peoples, music, oral traditions, women, leaders, games, and film. The Caribbean Eye series was recognized for excellence in documentary production and won numerous awards including the Caribbean Publishers and Broadcasters Association award for ‘Best Caribbean Television Series’ and the Caribbean Community (CARICOM) Prize ‘for fostering regional integration’ (Banyan 2004). One episode of Caribbean Eye, titled Film Caribbean, explored factors influencing regional production, featuring the works of filmmakers from the Dutch-, French-, Spanish-, and English-speaking Caribbean, noting that Cuba is the only Caribbean territory in which there had been significant production up to the date of production for that episode (Banyan 2004).

Banyan produced And the Dish Ran Away With the Spoon in 1992, the same year as the Caribbean Eye series. This documentary, which was part of the BBC/TVE Developing World series, focused on the domination in the Caribbean of television programs from the North, primarily the United States. And the Dish Ran Away With the Spoon illustrates the wider project of Banyan and its producers, ‘to produce a uniquely Caribbean approach’ to television and documentary production. This unique Caribbean approach positions this documentary as both reflexive and performative (Hight and Roscoe 2001). Through juxtaposition of interviews, poetry, music, performance, and excerpts of imported and indigenous television programs, the producers explored the question, ‘What happens when people have to dream other people’s dreams?’ And the Dish Ran Way with the Spoon was not simply an account of a trend in Caribbean media, it was also an indictment of the North American practice of jamming signals from Cuban broadcasting houses, in response to Cuba's policy to restrict programming to local, or at least regional (and non-North American), content. 'Dish' and the Caribbean Eye series crystallized the talents of Caribbean documentary producers and showcased the wealth of documentary material in the Caribbean, and the ability of local filmmakers to produce high-quality, regionally significant films using local production resources and talent.

The documentaries of Cuban filmmaker Gloria Rolando provide important windows into Afro-Cuban culture and serve the strategy of Rolando's desire to 'rescue and preserve afro-cuban [sic] cultural expressions' (Rolando 2004). Themes of transcending borders take on multiple forms in Rolando's documentaries, including Nosotros y el Jazz/Us and Jazz, which spotlights the common cultural history of Afro-Cubans and African Americans, and El Acaran/The Scorpion, which celebrates the music and dance styles of Congo origin that are popular in Cuban carnivals (Rolando 2004). Los Hijos de Baragua (1996) is a feature documentary by Rolando, about the presence of English-speaking West Indians settled in Cuba. Rolando's documentaries have advanced themes of diaspora, exploring cultural artifacts and texts that survived through migration. In Los Hijos de Baragua Rolando revealed the stories of Caribbean men and women who traveled throughout the Caribbean seeking work and opportunity in the early twentieth century. Like And the Dish Ran Away with the Spoon and Life and Debt, Los Hijos explored themes of imperialism, colonialism, exploitation, identity, and culture. In Los Hijos de Baragua these themes are traced by following the stories of West Indians in Cuba, who preserved their traditions and cultural pride through music and dance, despite their existence in segregated towns culturally dominated by North American companies.

From the mid-twentieth century to the early twenty-first century, documentary filmmaking in the Caribbean required resourcefulness and dedication on the part of producers and directors. Financial collaboration and other support frequently came from institutions both within and outside the Caribbean (UNESCO, TVE, and the BBC in the case of Banyan; PBS in the case of Stephanie Black's Life and Debt; and ICAIC, the Cuban national film institute, in earlier Rolando productions). In her later productions (including those documentaries produced under her own organization, 'Images del Caribe' or Images of the Caribbean), Gloria Rolando relied on the unpaid work of friends and family. Like many independent documentary filmmakers in the Caribbean, Rolando often began her documentary projects without the means to finish them, but with a desire to share the documented stories of Caribbean people and Caribbean life through film (Morris 1998).

North American documentary filmmaker Stephanie Black produced Life and Debt in 2001. Black had previously produced H-2 Worker, a documentary about the abuses of Caribbean farm workers in the sugarcane fields of Florida (Black 2001–2). According to Lara's definition of Caribbean film, Black's films could be excluded from the canon of Caribbean documentary films because she is not a Caribbean filmmaker. However, Life and Debt becomes a significant inclusion, as the film spent many weeks in Jamaican cinemas, playing to audiences eager to see Jamaica represented on screen (Popplewell 2003), demonstrating the film's significance to the local audience. Life and Debt also underscored issues that are key to the Caribbean experience, including economic and political subjugation by external forces. This documentary was successful in achieving acclaim and exhibition success both in Jamaica and internationally, which to many Caribbean critics became further indicative of cultural imperialism at work and raised the question of why documentaries by native Jamaicans or Caribbean filmmakers were not received with equal local and international interest.

Life and Debt received international critical acclaim (winning the Paris Human Rights Film Festival Special Jury Prize and the 2002 One World Prague Human Rights Film Festival Audience Award for Best Film of the Festival), but it also became the focus of debate regarding Jamaican emphasis on tourism and development and the severe costs that were paid in the struggle toward development as tradition and modernity collided (Black 2001–2). Discourse in the Jamaican context surrounding the release of Life and Debt was divided along the lines of pro-development versus pronationalism, the former represented by Jamaicans who argued the importance of tourism and foreign investment in Jamaica's economy, and the latter asserted by those who believed that Jamaican everyday life was negatively affected by the mounting billion-dollar debt under which Jamaica, according to Black's film, had become enslaved to the IMF, the IADB, and the World Bank.

The style of Life and Debt was similar in significant ways to that of And the Dish Ran Away with the Spoon. Life and Debt mixed interviews, poetry, music, and narration in its exploration. The genesis of this documentary was, in fact, the nonfiction text A Small Place by Antiguan writer Jamaica Kincaid, whose voice provides narrative bridges throughout the film (Black 2001–2). Using this hybrid style, director Stephanie Black delved into the complexity of Jamaican sovereignty against the backdrop forces of globalization, tourism, and industrial development. Life and Debt thus represented the voices of the Jamaican government, the workers whose lives were changed by the coming and going of multinational corporations, the Jamaican farmers whose crops went unsold, the executives within the IMF and the World Bank, and the American tourists. The result of this approach was a documentary that manifests as a polyvocal ethnography, consisting of partial truths and fragments of discourse that provide the viewer with a handle for entering the world of others through the stories of ethnographers (Clifford 1986; Tyler 1986) and, in this case, the stories told by the documentary filmmaker.

Life and Debt captured the widespread recognition in Jamaican society of the implications of Jamaica's ties to the IMF and the World Bank. Black interviewed farmers who asserted their views on the role that these institutions play in Jamaican policy-making and in everyday life. Jamaican audience reception of this documentary also illustrated the widespread relevance and concern that these issues held in Jamaican society at the time of this film's release. When Life and Debt was shown in Jamaican cinemas, audiences filled the cinemas, a fact that confirmed the dual significance of this film (Poppowell 2003–4). The first significance was that Jamaican (and wider Caribbean) audiences were drawn to images and representations of themselves on large and small screens. The second significance of audience reception of Life and Debt was that a documentary dealing with sober sociopolitical issues had significant appeal to a broad cross-section of Jamaican society.

In the English-speaking Caribbean, the University of the West Indies has played an important role in the training of emerging visual artists, filmmakers, and documentary producers (Brown 1987). At the Mona campus in Jamaica, the Caribbean Institute of Mass Communication (CARIMAC) offers an undergraduate program in Broadcast Journalism, with an emphasis on television. This program provides students with 'a variety of creative experiences in the conceptualization [sic], development and production phases of film and television' (UWI Mona 2004). In Trinidad and Tobago, at the St Augustine Campus, the Centre for Creative and Festival Arts offered a Bachelor of Arts degree in Visual Arts, including courses in Film and Video production (UWI St Augustine 2002). By 2004 students of this Visual Arts program had produced more than sixty short films, including documentaries. One such film, shown at the 2004 end-of-year exhibition, looked at basic infrastructure in a developing country and explored the problems with pipe-borne water in Trinidad and Tobago (Holder 2004). Modules in the St Augustine program were taught by scholar/producer/director and one of the original founders of Banyan, Bruce Paddington, and by Yao Ramesar, a prominent contemporary Caribbean filmmaker who refers to his production aesthetic as 'Caribbeing' (UWI 2003). The focus in this program at St Augustine was helping filmmakers to develop a unique Caribbean and local aesthetic, and an understanding of local, small-budget filmmaking (Gibbons 2004). The philosophical emphases of Paddington and Ramesar, as well as of Rawle Gibbons (the Head of the Centre for Creative and Festival Arts) have been geared notably toward the development of local voices and local visual aesthetics (Gibbons 2004).

Caribbean documentary films also feature narratives that focus on musicians and dancers of the region or that use music and dance in their telling. Chutney in Yuh Soca (1996) is one such film, which explored the fusion of Afro-Caribbean and Indo-Caribbean culture. Calypto Dreams (2002) explored the stories and music of key calypsonians from Trinidad and Tobago, celebrating the history and evolution of calypso as an art form. Horace Ové's Reggae (1970) also built on the centrality of music to Caribbean culture and documented the significance of the 1970 London Reggae Festival at Wembley through interviews, songs, and the narration of Caribbean author Andrew Salkey. In 1988 Christopher Laird produced a musical documentary titled Crossing Over, the narrative of which follows a Trinidadian calypso musician to Ghana to explore Ghanaian highlife music and then follows a Ghanaian musician to Trinidad where Trinidadian musicians and practitioners of West African Orisha embrace him (Banyan 2004). As outlined earlier, the work of Cuban filmmaker Gloria Rolando also uses music to trace Caribbean migrations and cultural influences.

Caribbean filmmakers have produced documentaries despite the often-lacking incentives to produce local features. The focus on the importance of localizing visual culture through television and cinema continued to increase through the early twenty-first century. In Trinidad and Tobago a new community-based television station was born of the production house Banyan. Launched in 2004, Gayelle the Channel promised ninety percent local content, and used its archive of shorts, series, features, and documentaries, as a source of programming. With such changes taking place in the first few years of the new millennium, scholars, filmmakers, and other media practitioners were optimistic that the media landscape would change toward increasing localization, including increases in the numbers of Caribbean documentary films produced. With the popularization of digital technologies, production budgets for documentaries decreased, as did the training required, thereby increasing access of a wider cross-section of producers and directors to the equipment used for documentary production. In the late 1990s and early 2000s digital video technology became significant to increased activity in and the localization of production (Laird 2004) and specifically to increased activity in the production of Caribbean documentary films.

SUSAN MCFARLANE-ALVAREZ

Selected films

- 1992 And the Dish Ran Away with the Spoon (Banyan Ltd/BBC, 49 mins; dirs Christopher Laird and Anthony Hall)
- 1996 Los Hijos de Baragua/My Footsteps in Baragua (Images Caribes, 53 mins; dir. Gloria Rolando)

- 2001 Life and Debt (Tuff Gong Pictures, 80 mins; prod. and dir. Stephanie Black)

Further reading

- Banyan, 'Inside the People TV', 2004, www.pan-caribbean.com/banyan/banyan.htm
- Black, Stephanie, Life and Debt: A Film by Stephanie Black, www.lifeanddebt.org, Kingston: Tuff Gong Productions, 2001–2.
- Brown, Aggrey and Sanatan, Roderick, Talking with Whom? A Report on the State of the Media in the Caribbean, Mona: CARIMAC, University of the West Indies Printery, 1987.
- Caribbean Studies Black Asian History (CASBAH), www.casbah.a.uk/cats/print/224/OFTP00001.htm
- Cham, Mbye, 'Introduction: Shape and Shaping of Caribbean Cinema' in Mbye Cham (ed.), Ex-iles: Essays on Caribbean Cinema, Trenton, NJ: Africa World Press, 1992.
- Clifford, J., 'Introduction: Partial Truths', in J. Clifford and G. Marcus (eds), Writing Culture: the Poetics and Politics of Ethnography, Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1986.
- Found, William, 'Documentary Films on Caribbean Islands', York University, www.arts.yorku.ca/geog/wfound/video, 2003–4.
- Gibbons, Rawle (Head/Theatre Arts Coordinator, Centre for Creative and Festival Arts, The University of the West Indies), Personal interview, January 2004.
- Hight, Craig and Roscoe, Jane, Faking It: Mock Documentary and the Subversion of Factuality, Manchester: Manchester University Press, 2001.
- Holder, Zia, 'Films with Local Flavour: UWI Students Exhibit 12 Pieces', Trinidad Express, May 13, 2004: 27.
- Laird, Christopher, Personal Interview, Trinidad and Tobago, January 2004.
- Lent, John, Third World Mass Media and Their Search for Modernity: The Case of the Commonwealth Caribbean 1917–76, Lewisburg, PA: Bucknell University Press, 1977.
- Morris, Holly, 'Winging It on Lots of Dream', www.abcnews.com, 1998.
- n.a., 'Overseas Film and Television Centre Collection Description', London: Institute of Commonwealth Studies, 2002.
- Popplewell, Georgia, 'Picture This', Business Trinidad and Tobago, 2003–4 edn.
- Rolando, Gloria, www.gloriarolando.com, Havana, Cuba (accessed June 2, 2004).
- St Juste, Franklyn, 'Interview', in Mbye Cham (ed.), Ex-iles: Essays on Caribbean Cinema, Trenton, NJ: Africa World Press, 1992.
- Telephone and e-mail interviews, Jamaica-Atlanta, May to June 2004.
- Tourism and Industrial Development Company of Trinidad and Tobago, A Master Plan for the Strategic Development of The Trinidad and Tobago Film Industry, 2003.

Tyler, S., 'Post-modern Ethnography: From Document of the Occult to Occult Document', in J. Clifford and G. Marcus (eds), Writing Culture, Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1986.

UWI, 'Second Festival of African and Caribbean Film', humanities.uwichill.edu.bb/filmfestival/2003, Cave Hill, Barbados: University of the West Indies, 2003.

UWI St Augustine, 'Centre for Festival and Creative Arts', www.festival.uwi.tt/courses5.htm, University of the West Indies St Augustine, 2002.

UWI Mona, 'CARIMAC', www.mona.uwi.edu/carimac/Pubjt.html, University of the West Indies at Mona, 2004.

Warner, Keith, On Location: Cinema and Film in the Anglophone Caribbean, London and Oxford: Macmillan Education, 2000.

When the Dog Bites

(UK, Woolcock, 1988)

Throughout the 1970s the loosely affiliated independent film sector in Britain maintained a difficult relationship with the industry trade union, the Association of Cinematograph and Television Technicians. One particular contention concerned the status of independent filmmakers working unpaid or supported by small grants, an important framework for radical cinema practice. A degree of rapprochement was achieved at the end of the decade with the Workshop Agreement, 'an extraordinary innovation which gave formal recognition to the principles of workshop practice and opened up the possibility of extending them as a basis for fully professional participation in the industry' (Dickinson 1999: 58–9). This new policy endorsed a number of workshops around the country managed by the workers and operating on a nonprofit basis. Trade Films in Gateshead was established on this format and immediately set about the task of documenting the stark economic and social prospects of the North-East in the Thatcher period.

When the Dog Bites (WTDB, 1988) is an unconventional documentary that deals with the town of Consett in County Durham in the years after the closure of the principal industry, the steel works. It draws on a plethora of documentary techniques to assess the impact of economic restructuring on the town, the resulting frustration and nostalgia engendered in the community, and efforts to establish alternative forms of employment. By using juxtaposing interviews (sometimes in strikingly unexpected settings), observational techniques, stylistic allusions to canonical fictional films, dramatic enactments, and a degree of self-parody, the film displaces the conventional evidential foundation of vérité and traditional journalistic modes with a more associational and playful approach. Director Penny Woolcock, recently having worked on Trade Films' Northern Newsreels, had felt constrained thematically and formally by the predictable framework of current affairs programming and purposely set out to create 'an element of fantasy and desire, a more dreamy quality' (Corner 1996: 151).

The formal inventiveness of WTDB arguably undermined the film's accessibility, and, although acceptable in a radical independent work, was untypical of a film destined for national television broadcast. Aired on Channel 4 Eleventh Hour slot, a showcase for new approaches and experimentation, WTDB proved controversial in Consett, where the film was deemed too arty and audiences were unready for self-conscious directorial stylisation. In addition, local officials and representatives thought the film was irresponsible and had portrayed the area negatively; some of the people in the film thought they had been treated dishonestly. The film now stands as a fascinating imaginative response to acute social change and once again raises the time-honoured problem of balance between form and purpose, so central to the documentary project.

ALAN BURTON

When the Dog Bites (UK, Trade Films, 1988). Directed by Penny Woolcock. Produced by Belinda Williams and Ingrid Sinclair. Cast includes Lisa Sanderson and Art Davies.

Further reading

Corner, John, The Art of Record. A Critical Introduction to Documentary, Manchester: Manchester University Press, 1996.

Dickinson, Margaret, Rogue Reels. Oppositional Film in Britain, 1945–90, London: BFI Publishing, 1999.

When We Were Kings

(US, Gast, 1996)

When We Were Kings portrays the 1974 match between heavyweight boxing champion George Foreman and underdog Muhammad Ali, which promoter Don King staged in Zaire (now the Democratic Republic of Congo). The film highlights Ali's mix of boxing prowess, black politics, and comic bravado, all of which strives to link African Americans and their ancestral home. A chronicle of press conferences, training, travel, and especially a black music festival precedes the fight and builds the expectation that Foreman, a heavy favorite, will annihilate Ali. The audience is well prepared for the stirring upset and the aftermath pays homage to Ali's courage and determination.

The film is a hybrid of documentary trends, blending sports, biography, music, and cultural history into a heroic political anthem. When We Were Kings combines observational filming of the 1974 events, compilation materials that develop historical perspective, and contemporary interviews reflecting on Ali's mix of self-promotion, physical ability, and social concern. Its extraordinary emotional impact arises from its graceful design and harmonious synthesis of elements.

The subject evolves out of the history of its production. When We Were Kings was initially planned as a concert film. Leon Gast, a New York filmmaker and still photographer, was commissioned to shoot the three-day music festival that was to precede the 1974 bout and produce an African American Woodstock in the direct cinema style. Gast had already made Hell's Angels Forever and two music films, The Dead, on the San Francisco rock band The Grateful Dead, and Salsa, featuring the Panamanian singer Rubén Blades. Four days before the title fight, however, George Foreman received a cut over his eye that required the bout to be delayed for six weeks.

The concert went ahead as scheduled, but the tie-in with the fight was aborted and the audience inconsequential. Nonetheless, Gast remained in Zaire after the concert, filming the scene as everyone lingered. More than three hundred thousand feet of film was shot, but financing for the movie dried up. Gast nursed plans to complete the project for twenty-two years. In 1989 David Sonenberg, a talent manager in the music business, raised money and over the next six years he and Gast put together eight different versions. Eventually they decided to shift the focus onto Muhammad Ali and acquired additional fight footage and archival material to frame the story around the boxing champion. In addition to the nine concert numbers, Sonenberg added two new songs at the close of the film, 'When We Were Kings' and 'Rumble in the Jungle'. The music track functions as a rhythmic foundation thoroughly integrated into the unfolding montage of events and underlining the film's politics.

In 1995 Taylor Hackford joined the team and convinced them to include contemporary interviews. The commentators included Norman Mailer, George Plimpton, and Malik Bowens, each of whom witnessed the bout more than twenty years before and remembered it vividly. A screening at the Sundance Film Festival drew seventeen offers to distribute the motion picture. Its successful theatrical run culminated in its winning the Academy Award for Best Documentary Feature in 1997. Over the years, When We Were Kings evolved from a concert film into an homage to a boxing legend. In doing so, it had taken on an historical perspective that turned out to be essential to its impact.

Leon Gast constructs his documentary like a heroic legend that unfolds in four movements. The first movement focuses on Ali's background as a fighter and the announcement of the forthcoming title bout in Zaire. Episodes from Ali's early career are associated with the Civil Rights struggle and further matched with images from the anticolonial rebellion in the Democratic Republic of Congo. The film treats Ali as a political leader working to reunite black America and black Africa. The film's second movement follows the Americans to Africa, and, as they prepare for the bout, Ali meets his brethren in Zaire, serenaded by songs from the black music festival such as 'Say It Loud, I'm Black and I'm Proud'. The former champion ties himself so closely to the destiny of the black community that the Africans express surprise when the champion arrives and they discover that he is black, too. George Foreman, meanwhile, displays an underdeveloped social consciousness. Ali ties his quest to awakening black America from the political apathy personified by Foreman. The third movement begins with the injury to Foreman, which delays the fight and allows the alliance between Ali and the Africans to grow. The movement culminates in the bout and Ali's victory, which becomes a triumph for a renewed American African brotherhood. The closing act meditates on the meaning of Ali as an historical hero and suggests a reunification of black and white America in their mutual recognition of, and admiration for, the heroic boxer. The film embraces Ali as a crusader whose courage and determination evokes a time 'when we were kings', when heroism raised common men and women to majesty.

When We Were Kings attempts to revive African American solidarity in the 1990s through a quest for racial identity. The film highlights the connection between blacks in America and Africa, but finally the quest focuses on the black athlete as a community hero. History and memory link the racial politics of 1974 to the need for revival in 1996. The crossing between continents parallels the crossing back through time to embrace the heritage embodied in Muhammad Ali.

In addition to promoting the Ali legend, When We Were Kings celebrates the optimism, fortitude, and determination necessary to command one's destiny. The hero in When We Were Kings emerges as a crusader for social justice whose identity is drawn from his racial community. The closing 'When We Were Kings' montage does not simply valorize Ali, but inspires the audience to acknowledge the prospects for heroic action that combines physical excellence with social leadership, fervent conviction, self-sacrifice, and a commitment to others. When We Were Kings imparts a feeling of renewed possibility and the suggestion of the potential for heroism in everyday life.

LEGER GRINDON

When We Were Kings (US, 1996, 87 mins). A Gramercy Pictures release, a DAS Films presentation. Directed by Leon Gast. Produced by David Sonnenberg, Leon Gast, and Taylor Hackford. Edited by Leon Gast, Taylor Hackford, Jeffrey Levy-Hinte, and Keith Robinson. Cinematography by Maryse Alberti, Paul Goldsmith, Kevin Keating, Albert Maysles, and Roderick Young. Cast features: Muhammad Ali, George Foreman, Don King, James Brown, B.B. King, Mobutu Sese Seko, Spike Lee, Norman Mailer, George Plimpton, Thomas Hauser, Malik Bowens, Lloyd Price, The Spinners, the Crusaders, and Miriam Makeba. Music Credits: 'Am Am Pondo' (written by Miriam Makeba, performed by Miriam Makeba), 'Say It Loud, I'm Black and I'm Proud' (written by James Brown and Alfred James Ellis, performed by James Brown), 'Young Rabbits' (written by Wayne Henderson, performed by The Crusaders), 'Musical Interlude' (written by Tabu Ley Rochereau and Seigneur Rochereau, performed by L'Orchestre Afrisa International), 'I'm Coming Home' (written by Thom Bell and Linda Creed, performed by The Spinners), 'Sweet Sixteen' (written by B.B. King and Joe Josea, performed by B.B. King), 'In a Cold Sweat' (written by James Brown and Alfred James Ellis, performed by James Brown), 'Gonna Have a Funky Good Time' (written by James Brown, performed by James Brown), 'African Chant' (written by Franco Luongo, performed by OK Jazz), 'When We Were Kings' (written by Andy Marvel, Amy Powers, and Arnie Roman, performed by Brian McKnight and Diana King), 'Rumble in the Jungle' (written by Wyclef Jean, Prakazrel Michel, Lauryn Hill, Benny Anderson, Bjorn Ulvae, Stig Anderson, Chip Taylor, Kamaal Fareed, Malik Taylor, Trevor Smith, and John Forte, performed by The Fugees).

Further reading

- Corliss, Richard, 'When We Were Kings', Time 49, no. 7, February 17, 1997: 83.
 Denby, David, 'When We Were Kings', New York 47, no. 7, February 24, 1997: 123.
 Early, Gerald, 'Ali's rumble', Sight and Sound 7, no. 5, May 1997: 10–12.
 Gelder, Lawrence Van, 'In Africa with Ali and the Rope-a-Dope', The New York Times, Friday, October 25, 1996: C26–7.
 McCarthy, Todd, 'When We Were Kings', Variety 362, no. 2, February 12, 1996: 82–3.
 Macdonald, Kevin, 'When We Were Kings', Sight and Sound 7, no. 5, May 1997: 56.
 Mailer, Norman, The Fight, Boston: Little, Brown, 1975.
 O'Brien, Richard, 'When We Were Kings', Sports Illustrated 85, no. 19, November 4, 1996: 20.
 Ryan, Susan, 'When We Were Kings', Cineaste 22, no. 4, fall 1996: 54–5.

Whitehead, Peter

Peter Whitehead is renowned as the consummate documentarist of the 1960s counter-culture. In a series of films made between 1965 and 1969 he not only captured the events, places, people, and attitudes that defined the decade, but succeeded in tapping deep into its shifting zeitgeist. Whitehead's knack for being in the right place at the right time (and switching the camera on at the right moment) has certainly contributed amply to the compulsive mythography of the 'swinging sixties', but his films also offer a sophisticated analysis and critique of the procedures by which such legends are created. They register and extend the wider preoccupations of an era when the role of media representations in shaping, controlling, and potentially transforming human experience was at the forefront of radical artistic, intellectual, and political concerns.

Whitehead's early films show his fascination with the immediacy and involvement of American cinéma vérité. In later works vérité shooting methods are fused with the visual lexicon of underground cinema and the self-reflexive, Brechtian strategies developed by Jean-Luc Godard. This stylistic amalgam points to Whitehead's distinctive authorship of his work, a fact materially underlined by his artisanal working methods as director, producer, editor, and cameraman of his own films. From the outset Whitehead approached vérité filming as a subjective process, openly acknowledging that his works register personal choices, opinions, and reactions to circumstances, and refusing the shibboleth of objectivity that has tended (unjustly) to dominate responses to American vérité work.

The film that first made Whitehead's reputation was Wholly Communion (1965), a record of the International Poetry Incarnation that took place at the Royal Albert Hall on June 11, 1965. Whitehead borrowed an NPR Éclair 16mm camera to film the proceedings with minimal disturbance and took in forty-five minutes' worth of film stock. For an event scheduled to last more than three hours, this meant that he was compelled from the outset to be highly selective in what he chose to shoot. The resulting thirty-three-minute film clearly registers Whitehead's personal interpretations and reactions to the occasion, as the trademark zooms, pans, and sweeps of vérité filming are used to shift focus between performers and audience, and to frame the poets differently according to the tone, delivery, and reception of their readings (Sargeant 1997). Gregory Corso's introspection is conveyed by initially framing the seated poet between two chatting spectators, and then holding his face in a tight close-up. In contrast, the public gravitas of Adrian Mitchell reading his cathartic Vietnam poem 'To Whom It May Concern' is carried by using a medium close-up of the poet and cutaways to rapt faces in the audience. Whitehead's focus on the collective experience of the event in the interaction of performers and listeners anticipates the subsequent view of the Royal Albert Hall reading as less about individual performers and their work than as a defining moment in the self-awareness and public visibility of the counterculture.

On the strength of Wholly Communion, Whitehead was approached by The Rolling Stones' manager, Andrew Oldham, and invited to film the band. Charlie Is My Darling (1965), a film diary of the Stones' 1965 tour of Ireland, predates better-known rock documentaries like D.A. Pennebaker's Dont Look Back (1967) in minting the trademark vérité iconography of the mundane routines of touring, and probing the enigmatic contrast between on-stage and off-stage performance. Unlike Pennebaker's film, which follows many vérité documentaries in avoiding direct interaction with its subject by filming press interviews, Charlie Is My Darling includes sequences in which Whitehead interviews the band members, his articulate voice on the soundtrack probing and questioning them in a manner that occasionally—notably when targeting a diffident Charlie Watts—ruptures the vérité protocol of invisible observation and feels painfully intrusive. Whitehead's use of the same technique when pressing a group of fans about why exactly they like the band and getting only vague and unconvincing replies has the disquieting effect of making the Stones' undeniable talent and power as performers seem suddenly fragile and insubstantial, which perhaps explains the frequent assessment of the film as melancholy and elegaic.

For Benefit of the Doubt (1966), Whitehead filmed a performance of Peter Brook's Royal Shakespeare Company production of the anti-Vietnam War play, U.S., and conducted a series of interviews with Brook and his cast members including Glenda Jackson. The treatment of the performance recalls Wholly Communion in attending as much to the audience as to the actors, but the film also anticipates Whitehead's later film, The Fall, in its ultimate scepticism toward the political efficacy of radical theatre.

Whitehead's involvement with The Rolling Stones led him into filming other bands and making pop promos for Top of the Pops. His position at the centre of the London counter-culture led him to undertake a wider exploration of the scene, galvanized by the media spectre of 'Swinging London' launched by Time magazine in 1966. Tonite Let's All Make Love in London (1967), billed by Whitehead as 'a Pop concerto for Film', remains an unparalleled celebration and dissection of the mystique of the 1960s. It features stage and studio footage of rock bands, including the Animals and The Rolling Stones (material reused from Charlie Is My Darling), and impressionistic sequences shot in London's streets and nightclubs, some processed in slow motion or edited to create lyrical stop-motion effects. Interviews, both relatively formal encounters with celebrities like Michael Caine, Julie Christie, Mick Jagger, and David Hockney, and spontaneous vox-pops with anonymous 'dolly birds' sound out the moral temper of the times. Whitehead again proves willing to press his subjects hard from behind the camera about their opinions and values, situating himself as a detached observer as much as a participant and bringing out both conviction and flimsiness in contemporary attitudes. The critical stance toward the poses and values of 'Swinging London' is enhanced by the Brechtian (Godardian) division of the film into chapters, and the ambitious early montage of the media images and articles that spawned the phenomenon, which is reminiscent of the ironic all-out visual assaults found in the underground films of Bruce Conner.

The Fall (1969), Whitehead's most searching and accomplished film and his final contemporary meditation on the iconic images and realities of the 1960s, may have started out as 'Tonite Let's All Make Love in New York', but quickly mutated under subjective and external pressures into something very different. The film is divided into three sections: 'Image', 'Word', and 'Word + Image'. The first two explore shooting and editing as stages in the production of filmed images, and all three together reconstruct Whitehead's attempt to document political and underground activity in New York (while conducting an affair with a fashion model), his increasing loss of faith in the ability of media images to have any significant impact in a revolutionary situation, and finally his discovery of a solution in direct political action, when he joins and films the student occupation of Columbia University and its eventual violent liquidation by police in the spring of 1968.

The Fall is a landmark of counter-cinema in its reflexive interrogation of personal commitment, media imagery, and the possibility of direct political intervention, but it also retains tremendous documentary significance as a work that captured and gave form to the rapidly shifting temper and fortunes of the counter-culture as the 1960s drew to a close, when protest was abandoned in favour of direct action, and the response of the authorities escalated to the use of extreme violence.

Although The Fall was not Whitehead's last film, the journey out from under the weight of media representations that it records was to prove prophetic. In 1973 Whitehead abandoned filmmaking for falconry, judging that the vérité camera that he had believed connected him to the world was in fact keeping him apart from it.

CATHERINE LUPTON

Biography

Born 1937, Liverpool. Degree in Philosophy of Science and Crystallography from Cambridge 1961. Scholarship to Slade School of Art 1963. News cameraman for Italian television in London 1964. Made scientific documentary, Perception of Life, for the Nuffield Foundation 1964. Wholly Communion won the Gold Medal at the Mannheim Documentary Film Festival 1965. Published English translations of thirty-two classic film scripts under the Lorrimer imprint 1966–71. Took up falconry 1972. Directed two further films, Daddy (1974, with Niki de St Phalle), and Fire in the Water (1977). Ran falcon-breeding centre for Prince Khalid al-Faisal in Saudi Arabia 1982–90. From 1990 published novels: Nora and ... (1990), The Risen: A Holographic Novel (1994), Pulp Election: The Booker Prize Fix (1996, under the pseudonym Carmen St Keeldare), Brontëgate (1997), Girl on the Train (1998), Tonite Let's All Make Love in London (1999); interactive novel Nohzone (2000).

Selected films

- 1965 Wholly Communion
- 1965 Charlie Is My Darling
- 1966 Benefit of the Doubt
- 1967 Tonite Let's All Make Love in London
- 1969 The Fall
- 1994 Pink Floyd, London: 1966–7

Further reading

- Crofts, Stephen, 'Peter Whitehead Talks About His New Film—The Fall', Cinema, December 1968: 18–21.
- Drummond, Phillip, 'Peter Whitehead and The Fall', Isis 21, May 1969.
- Durnat, Raymond, 'Tonite Let's All Make Love in London', Films and Filming 14, no. 5, February 1968: 22–3.
- 'The Falconer: Three Lives of Peter Whitehead', Entropy 1, no. 1, 1997: 10–21.
- Paul, R.F., 'The Inadvertent Agent', Mondo, 2000: 46–59.
- Sargeant, Jack, 'A Few Poets Trying to Be Natural', in Naked Lens: Beat Cinema, London: Creation Books, 1997.
- Whitehead, Peter (ed.), Wholly Communion, London: Lorrimer Films, 1965.

Who Bombed Birmingham?(UK, Granada, 1990)

During the 1990s there were a number of drama documentaries produced in the United Kingdom based on the Troubles in Northern Ireland, and 1990 stands out as a particularly fruitful year with the production of Shoot to Kill (Yorkshire TV), The Treaty (Thames/RTE), and the controversial Who Bombed Birmingham? (Granada), also known in the United States as Investigation: Inside a Terrorist Bombing.

Drama-documentary has been produced with relative frequency on British television and is a hybrid genre based on journalistic research and evidence, in a similar mode as the traditional documentary, but that also uses the aesthetic codes of drama to mediate the real world. There have been a number of docudrams produced in the United Kingdom that have dealt with the cases of innocent people charged by the state and wrongly convicted for crimes they did not commit.

One of the most eminent in the genre is Who Bombed Birmingham?, which recounts the British Labour MP Chris Mullen's campaign to free the Birmingham Six and which also led to public pressure to free the men wrongfully convicted of the IRA terror attack on a pub in Guildford fifteen years earlier.

The programme recounts how Mullen challenged the convictions and eventually ascertained that the Six were never members of the IRA, that their confessions emerged after suffering assaults by the police, that the forensic evidence was seriously flawed, and that the police were aware of the identity of the actual bombers. The programme is based on Mullen's journey to establish who planted the bombs and on the reconstruction of the night of November 21, 1974, when five Irish immigrants with families in Birmingham were arrested as they prepared to return to Northern Ireland. The five men were travelling back to Belfast for the funeral of an IRA man, James McDaid, killed by his own bomb in the West Midlands city of Coventry.

The programme recounts the journey as the group made their way to catch the ferry back to Belfast, and as the IRA detonated two bombs in two pubs, The Mulberry Bush and The Tavern, killing twenty-one people and injuring more than one hundred and sixty in Birmingham city centre. All five were arrested and later a sixth man was also arrested. Confessions were extracted from some members of the group by West Midlands Police after their arrests.

Indeed, there was widespread revulsion at the attack and the men received heavy sentences despite withdrawing their confessions and claiming police brutality at their trial. After a campaign by the men's families, investigative journalists, human rights activists and politicians, however, many began to believe that the Six were in fact innocent. What the programme also uncovered was a police file that detailed the interrogation of an alleged IRA informer in December 1975. The programme-makers claimed that this exonerated the Six and identified the perpetrators.

Questions were subsequently raised about the tactics deployed by the West Midlands Police to gain the confessions, with widespread allegations of police brutality and dubious forensic evidence. The case also had particularly sensitive aftereffects for the British legal system after an unsuccessful appeal and allegations that the judiciary did not want to admit to a miscarriage of justice.

The imminent broadcasting of Who Bombed Birmingham? provoked widespread discussion within the various authorities involved, and the British Home Office, the Chief Constable of Birmingham Police, and the British Prime Minister were in complete agreement in their claim that no new evidence would emerge and therefore nothing would change. Indeed, Who Bombed Birmingham? undeniably brought the appeal cases of the Birmingham Six to the attention of huge television audiences, with a pre-broadcast furor in Parliament seeing Conservative ministers having to answer difficult questions and Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher claiming that no television programme would alter any decisions concerning the case.

Programme makers Granada Television's current affairs programme World in Action had declared that they were about to reveal the identities of the people they believed to be responsible for the Birmingham bombs. The programme was by now highly controversial and the ethics of this decision were widely discussed in the British press in the days before the broadcast, which ensured a massive build-up in publicity and virtually guaranteed large viewing figures. The programme was finally broadcast on various ITV channels and also on RTE on a Wednesday evening in March 1990.

Despite the staunch position in Parliament, the programme did indeed reveal evidence to suggest that the Six were wrongly imprisoned, and the police and government were forced to investigate the case once more. A year later the sentences of the Birmingham Six were quashed.

The programme was undeniably powerful in its aims and managed successfully to portray realistic depictions of an investigative reporting programme, as the team interviews various people and tries to disprove the tests through the use of flashbacks, and follows the current affairs team's attempts to prove the men's innocence by querying the reliability of the forensic evidence.

The three lead actors, John Hurt as Mullen, Roger Allam as World in Action journalist Charles Tremayne, and Martin Shaw as his producer, Ian McBride, give commanding performances, and the Six, played by Ciaran Hinds, Niall Tobin, Brendan Laird, Niall O'Brien, Vincent Murphy, and Brendan Cauldwell, in turn offer heartbreaking performances with the occasional poignant comic interplay. Bob Peck, Terence Rigby, and John Woodvine provide fascinating portrayals of different faces of the law and, most notably, John Kavanagh's depiction of the IRA gang's bomb-maker, Donal McCann's indignant republican, and Sean McGinley's tormented terrorist.

Despite the eventual triumph of Who Bombed Birmingham?, the programme raises a number of critical concerns about the hybrid nature of docudrama as a form. The method of casting well-known charismatic actors such as John Hurt in the roles that the programme makers endorse and often unknown performers to portray the opposition, which, coupled with the visual grammar of television journalism designed to portray the truth, makes a potent combination that more than any other genre leaves the viewer hopelessly dependent on the good faith of the director.

Yet Who Bombed Birmingham? is without doubt a powerful television programme that has since set the standard for British TV docudramas based on real events, including Jimmy McGovern's Hillsborough, Paul Greengrass's Bloody Sunday, and the more recent Omagh.

KIRSTY FAIRCLOUGH

Who Bombed Birmingham? (UK, Granada Television, 1990, 105 mins). Directed by Mike Beckham. Written by Rob Ritchie. Produced by Mike Beckham. Original music by Shaun Davey. Cinematography by Ken Morgan. Sound by Nick Steer. Cast: Roger Allam, Andy Bradford, Brendan Cauldwell, Ciarán Hinds, John Hurt, John Kavanagh, Brendan Laird, Robert Lang, Patrick Malahide, Donal McCann, Gerard McSorley, Vincent Murphy, Niall O'Brien, Bob Peck, Terence Rigby, David Ryall Martin Shaw, Niall Toibin, and John Woodvine.

Further reading

- Paget, D., No Other Way to Tell It: Dramadoc/Docudrama on Television, Manchester: Manchester University Press, 1998.
- Pettitt, L., Screening Ireland: Film and Television Representation, Manchester: Manchester University Press, 2000.
- Rosenthal, Alan (ed.), Why Docudrama? Fact-fiction on Film and TV, Carbondale, IL: Southern Illinois University Press, 1998.

Why We Fight

(US, Capra, 1942–5)

Why We Fight was the most widely circulating North American propaganda documentary series about World War II, both inside and outside the United States. The producer, Frank Capra, made this series between 1942 and 1945, directing a large team of Hollywood volunteers—script writers, editors, directors, music composers, commentators, and so on—among whom were, most noticeably, Anthony Veiller, Anatole Litvak, Walter Huston, William Hornbeck, Carl Foreman, Lloyd Nolan, Dimitri Tiomkim and Eric Knight. Although Ivens and Flaherty participated in the project on a temporary basis, their contributions were not significant to the final result. What was significant was the collaboration of the Disney studios in producing the geographical animations. The series consists of seven episodes: Prelude to War (1942), The Nazis Strike (1942), Divide and Conquer (1943), The Battle of Britain (1943), The Battle of Russia (1943), The Battle of China (1944), and War Comes to America (1945).

Figure 21 Why We Fight (part five, Battle of Russia), documentary by Frank Capra and Anatole Litvak, 1943 (Courtesy of the Everett Collection)

Why We Fight was produced to motivate North American recruits who were mobilized for the war. Before the attack on Pearl Harbor, the majority of North Americans viewed the war in Europe as something remote and rather strange. Pearl Harbor marked a radical change in this perception and mobilized the entire country. The production was subject to strict control measures. The initial content of the series was defined by the Army's Bureau of Public Relations in fifteen texts, slightly before Pearl Harbor. A team of script writers made the first adaptation, and Capra started to screen any type of filmed material, including Nazi, Italian, and Soviet material such as documentaries and newsreels. In May 1942 the final setup of the chapters and their basic features were determined. September 1942 already saw the first rough-cut editing of the first parts. In November 1942 the first film of the series, Prelude to War, was released. Each phase of the production process was meticulously revised by the military.

In Why We Fight, Capra opted for persuasive arguments and emotive techniques. His messages were simple, clear, and repetitive. First of all, the war was necessary; survival so dictated it. Refraining from engaging in it was equivalent to choosing slavery under the Japanese, German, and Italian enemies. The enemy was represented as cruel and treacherous; the message was to beat them first and then talk. The Allied countries were defended, especially Great Britain and the Soviet Union. The corresponding explanations did not leave the audience with any doubts either: France had fallen into German hands through inside treason, as had Denmark, Sweden, and Norway; Great Britain and the Soviet Union had resisted surrender by their own efforts and had fought until the end like heroes. There were no sociological analyses or ideological explanations. The one-front policy that the state propaganda proclaimed required straightforward explanations that were easy to understand. Capra and his team converted the series into the concise and all-understanding history that the recruits needed to be able to face their enemies.

For the editing of Why We Fight, Capra used a large variety of filmed material. This obviously included newsreels and documentaries from both the Allied Forces and the enemy, blended, however, with footage from feature films. The series reminded one of The March of Time; however, the typical hints of humor, sentiment, human feeling, decision, and determination were Capra's, who followed the final cuts from a close distance.

In Why We Fight everything was subjected to efficiency in terms of propaganda. It is impossible to prove the persuasive argument of the series; however, the results of the questionnaires completed by soldiers gave the semblance of a major success. Not all of the chapters were equally successful. The first four chapters were appreciated the most. Their impact surpassed any expectations. In the United States the series won an Oscar, which facilitated its way to commercial cinemas, apart from being obligatory material in the military training for North American recruits. It was also released in Allied and neutral countries, as copies were distributed in various languages. For obvious reasons, The Battle of Britain was shown in Great Britain, on direct instruction by Churchill, and The Battle of Russia was released in the Soviet Union, ordered expressly by Stalin. No real information is available, however, about the audience at the time. In 2000 the National Film Preservation Board decided to include Why We Fight into the National Film Registry.

JULIO MONTERO

See also: Capra, Frank

Why We Fight series:

Prelude to War (US Army Special Service Division; US War Department. Animation: Walt Disney Productions; Research Aid: Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences; Photography: Consolidated Film Industries, CFI, 1942). Distributed by Twentieth Century Fox Film Corporation; LS Video; Office of War Information, Bureau of Motion Pictures; War Activities Committee; Questar Video Inc. Produced by Frank Capra (uncredited) and Anatole Litvak (uncredited). Writing credits: Julius J. Epstein, Phillip G. Epstein, Robert Heller (uncredited), Eric Knight (uncredited) and Anthony Veiller (uncredited). Original music by Hugo Friedhofer (uncredited), Leigh Harline (uncredited), Arthur Lange (uncredited), Cyril J. Mockridge (uncredited), and David Raksin (uncredited). Cinematography by Robert Flaherty (uncredited). Film edited by William Hornbeck (uncredited). Narrators (uncredited): Walter Huston and Anthony Veiller.

The Nazis Strike (US Army Special Service Division; US War Department Distributed by Office of War Information, Bureau of Motion Pictures; War Activities Committee; Questar Video Inc., 1942). Produced by Frank Capra. Directed by Frank Capra and Anatole Litvak. Writing credits: Julius J. Epstein and Phillip G. Epstein. Original music by Anthony Collins (uncredited), Louis Gruenberg (uncredited), Leigh Harline (uncredited), Dimitri Tiomkim (uncredited), and Roy Webb (uncredited). Film edited by William Hornbeck (uncredited). Narrator: Walter Huston (uncredited).

Divide and Conquer (US Army Special Service Division; US War Department. Animation: Walt Disney Productions. Distributed by Office of War Information, Bureau of Motion Pictures; War Activities Committee; Questar Video Inc., 1943). Produced by Frank Capra (uncredited). Directed by Frank Capra and Anatole Litvak (uncredited). Writing credits: Julius J. Epstein and Phillip G. Epstein. Original music by Dimitri Tiomkim. Film edited by William Hornbeck (uncredited). Narrators: Walter Huston and Anthony Veiller (uncredited).

The Battle of Britain (US Army Special Service Division; US War Department. Animation: Walt Disney Productions. Distributed by Office of War Information, Bureau of Motion Pictures; War Activities Committee; Questar Video Inc., 1943). Produced by Frank Capra (uncredited). Directed by Frank Capra and Anthony Veiller (uncredited). Writing credits: Julius J. Epstein and Phillip G. Epstein. Original music by Dimitri Tiomkim (uncredited), Howard Jackson (uncredited), William Lava (uncredited), and Max Steiner (uncredited). Film edited by William Hornbeck (uncredited). Narrators: Walter Huston and Anthony Veiller (uncredited).

The Battle of Russia (US Army Special Service Division; US War Department, 1943. Distributed by Twentieth Century Fox Film Corporation; Office of War Information, Bureau of Motion Pictures; War Activities Committee; Questar Video Inc.). Produced by Frank Capra (uncredited). Directed by Frank Capra and Anatole Litvak. Writing credits: Julius J. Epstein, Phillip G. Epstein, Anatole Litvak, Anthony Veiller, and Robert Heller. Original music by Dimitri Tiomkim. Film edited by William Hornbeck (uncredited). Narrators: Walter Huston and Anthony Veiller (uncredited).

The Battle of China (US Army Special Service Division; War Department, 1944. Distributed by Office of War Information, Bureau of Motion Pictures; War Activities Committee; Questar Video Inc. and MPI Home Video). Produced by Anatole Litvak (uncredited). Directed by Frank Capra and Anatole Litvak (uncredited). Writing credits: Julius J. Epstein and Phillip Epstein. Original music by Dimitri Tiomkim (uncredited). Film edited by William Hornbeck (uncredited). Narrators: Walter Huston and Anthony Veiller (uncredited).

War Comes to America (US Army Pictorial Services, 1945. Distributed by MPI Home Video; Questar Video Inc.; RKO; War Activities Committee of the Motion Pictures Industry). Produced by Frank Capra. Directed by Frank Capra and Anatole Litvak. Writing credits: Julius J. Epstein, Phillip G. Epstein, Anatole Litvak, and Anthony Veiller. Original music by Dimitri Tiomkim (uncredited). Film edited by William Hornbeck. Narrators: Lloyd Nolan and Walter Huston (uncredited).

Further reading

- Bohn, Thomas W., An Historical and Descriptive Analysis of the 'Why We Fight' Series, with a new Introduction, New York: Arno Press, 1977.
- Capra, Frank, The Name above the Title: An Autobiography, New York: Da Capo Press, 1997.

- Culbert, David, "'Why We Fight': Social Engineering for a Democratic Society at War", in K.R.M. Short (ed.), Film & Radio Propaganda in World War II, London and Canberra: Croom Helm, 1983.
- Murphy, William, 'The Method of Why We Fight', Journal of Popular Film I, 1972: 185–96.

Wild, Nettie

A former actor and radio journalist, Wild is known for four feature-length documentaries made since 1988. The films, direct cinema studies of complex political and social confrontations, are driven by what Wild refers to as her 'sense of cinematic drama'.

Her first feature, A Rustling of Leaves: Inside the Philippine Revolution, placed her and her crew within a guerrilla war waged against the government of Corazon Aquino and right-wing paramilitary squads. Throughout the documentary, the filmmakers negotiate their vulnerability, first with members of the heavy-handed Filipino army and death squads and later, when traveling with the guerrilla New People's Army, against the hazards of the war itself. The film's most shocking moment is a firefight between the rebels and government forces in which Wild's soundman is shot and killed.

Wild's second film, Blockade, focuses on the struggle between the Gitksan first nation in British Columbia and nonnative logging families to determine who controls the forests around them. The Gitksan block the Canadian Pacific Railway tracks, leading to a confrontation with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Wild, although sympathetic to the Gitksan, recognizes that the nonnative loggers, many of whom have worked in the woods for generations, are being placed in an equally precarious situation.

In her ambitious film A Place Called Chiapas, Wild studies the aftermath of the 1994 Zapatista revolution. The film is not only a study of the peasant rebellion itself but also of the role of an outside observer. In one sequence the enigmatic Subcommandante Marcos invites sympathizers from North America and Europe to visit his 'postmodern revolution'. Wild films the political tourists with various degrees of bemusement but also with a growing realization that she herself is just another visitor. When she finally is granted her interview with Marcos, the resulting footage says as much about the awkwardness of the encounter as it does about the nature of the revolution.

It is with this same sense of nondetached irony that Wild filmed a small revolution in her own city. Fix: The Story of an Addicted City documents the personalities around efforts to build North America's first legal safe drug-injection site in Vancouver's notorious Downtown Eastside. For two years Wild followed the charismatic Dean Wilson, a heroin addict and president of the Vancouver Area Network of Drug Users and his equally dedicated partner, Ann Livingston, a faith-based organizer and nonuser. Opening the injection site in the face of opposition from the nearby community, Dean and Livingston also work with Vancouver's conservative mayor, Phillip Owen, in an effort to establish a humane and realistic policy toward the city's addicts (an effort that would later cost Owen his own party's support for reelection).

As was the case with her other films, Wild and her company, Canada Wild Productions, used Fix as an organizing tool. The film has played mainstream cinemas in more than forty Canadian cities. Each screening has been followed by a community forum with local drug users, health care professionals, activists, politicians, and police.

SETH FELDMAN

Biography

Born in New York City in 1952 and educated at the University of British Columbia. Beginning her career as an actor, she cofounded and performed with Touchstone Theatre and Headlines Theatre (where she produced, wrote, as well as acted in various productions). Wild worked as a broadcast journalist for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, producing documentaries for several radio programs as well CBC's national news. Wild's first independent documentary was a video based on the Headlines Theatre production of Buy, Buy, Vancouver. The documentary, about the disappearance of affordable housing, was the first video invited to the Grierson Documentary Seminar, where it attracted the attention and support of Santiago Alvarez. Her subsequent films have been widely recognized. A Rustling of Leaves won the People's Choice Award at the 1989 Berlin Film Festival (Forum of New Cinema), the Prix du Public at the National Film Board's Salute to the Documentary, and the Grand Prize at the Houston Film Festival. In 1993 Blockade shared honors as Most Popular Canadian Feature at the Vancouver International Film Festival, won the Red Ribbon at the American Film and Video Festival, and the Silver Award at the Houston International Film Festival. In 1998 A Place Called Chiapas won the Audience Award for Best Documentary at the AFI-Los Angeles Film Festival, Best Feature Documentary from the International Documentary Association, and a Genie Award for best Canadian Feature Documentary. In 2003 Fix won Wild's second Genie for Best Canadian Documentary. That same year, her work was the subject of a retrospective at the Hot Docs documentary film festival in Toronto.

Selected films

- 1988 A Rustling of Leaves: Inside the Philippine Revolution: director, producer, writer
- 1993 Blockade: director, producer, second camera
- 1999 A Place Called Chiapas: director, producer, writer, cocamera
- 2002 Fix: The Story of an Addicted City: director, producer, cocamera

Further reading

- Hoover, Travis, 'Nettie Wild: The Documentarian Becomes the Documented', Film Freak Central, www.filmfreakcentral.net/hotdocs/hotdocsnettiewild.htm, n.d.
- Posner, Michael, 'Hanging onto the Horses: A Rustling of Leaves: Inside the Philippine Revolution', in Canadian Dreams: The Making and Marketing of Independent Films, Vancouver: Douglas & McIntyre, 1993: 51–78.
- Wild, Nettie, 'Just Some Lady with a Camera: Canadian National Railroad versus Filmmaker Nettie Wild', Point of View, fall, 1993: 6–8.
- 'In Search of Light', Brick 63, fall, 1999: 8–17.
- 'Nettie Wild', Point of View 39, 2000: 11.
- 'Interview', University of Calgary Gauntlet, March 25, 2004, gauntlet.ucalgary.ca/story/3746
- Wintonick, Peter, 'Time, Trust and Money', Cinema Canada 160, 1989: 13–16.

Wildenhahn, Klaus

Klaus Wildenhahn's career ran parallel to the development of television documentary in postwar Germany. Wildenhahn came to television two years after the six regional stations in Western Germany had been merged into the federal umbrella organization ARD (Arbeitsgemeinschaft der öffentlich-rechtlichen Rundfunkanstalten). His first assignment, to the political magazine programme Panorama in 1961, occurred when the administrative structure of public service television was still a work in progress. Wildenhahn profited from the fact that in these formative years editorial responsibilities and limits had yet to be established. This freedom enabled him to experiment with new journalistic formats.

The political situation at that time provided an important background for Wildenhahn's professional career, as well as for his ideas on the ethics of documentary filmmaking. During the 1950s Germany had experienced a radical turn toward political and cultural conservatism as a result of the decade-long governance of the Christian-Democratic Party (CDU) under chancellor Konrad Adenauer. Wildenhahn's early setting must be understood in this context. Against the historical backdrop of the Third Reich, the first German postwar government had established a rigorous political agenda based on the denial of moral guilt for the Holocaust and the subordination of civic needs to the state's requirements in favour of public welfare. By the mid-1950s the 'Wirtschaftswunder' (economic miracle) had led to a social climate of exclusion and economic sedation. The rise of the television medium became strongly interwoven with the idea of national identity, not least owing to the victory of the German soccer team at the World Championship in 1954, the first major televised event of postwar Germany.

Wildenhahn's ideas of the purposiveness of documentary films were shaped in these particular years of rapid social change. Claiming the necessity of an ethical bias toward misrepresented milieux and social groups in documentary film, Wildenhahn considered television to be an important mouthpiece for the 'unheard voices' (Wildenhahn 1992) in society. In retrospect it can be said that the urgency of his demand was underlined by the fact that throughout the 1960s, in which Wildenhahn realized two documentaries a year, the Adenauer government was succeeded by two other conservative governments. Wildenhahn's description of his style as an 'aesthetic of resistance', in reference to the German culture critic Peter Weiss, must be seen in this political context.

Wildenhahn's work was almost exclusively concerned with subjects of social justice and public life. In his second documentary for Panorama, Der Tod kam wie bestellt (1962), Wildenhahn examined the murder of Patrice Lumumba and the involvement of the UNO. His leftist biography earned him the reputation of a controversial figure, and typically this judgement did not change when the Social-Democratic Party came into power in 1969. By the mid-1960s the seeming liberalism during the first years of public service television had turned out to be nothing more than an early misconception that was corrected with a few personnel changes. That Wildenhahn was able to work within the structure of the ARD until his retirement in 1995, however, underlines his pivotal role in the development of the documentary film and television journalism in Western Germany.

Wildenhahn repeatedly criticized the authoritative top-down configuration of public service journalism. In opposition to this intellectual elitism cultivated by the political class, he claimed that the documentary content itself should determine its form. For Wildenhahn, the virtues of documentary film were not defined aesthetically, but solely by ethical and political nature: through the intimacy between the filmmaker and the filmed person, thorough, long-term observations, long shots, and the renunciation of external comments or 'synthetic' inserts. This documentary altruism affected a whole generation of German filmmakers and became the main characteristic of Wildenhahn's distinctive style.

In the late 1970s, this influence led to the controversy between Wildenhahn and the media critic Klaus Kreimeier about partiality in the documentary film and the filmmaker's deliberate subordination under the reality of the camera. Their disagreement provoked an influential debate about the political and social responsibility of the documentary film as a part of the media public. In his 1980 essay 'Industriellandschaft mit Einzelhändlern' (Industrial Landscape with Retailers), Wildenhahn responded to Kreimeier's criticism with the argument that 'the documented' themselves should take over the author's role, as the filmmaker only provides the technical framework for their story.

Wildenhahn was not so naive to believe that his documentary method would automatically reveal an absolute truth or an accurate representation of social reality. He had become familiar with the work of D.A. Pennebaker, Albert Maysles, and Richard Leacock in 1963 while working on a TV feature about the beginnings of direct cinema. The impact of their work was already noticeable in Wildenhahn's first 'on location' documentary, Parteitag '64 (1964) about the national convention of the Social-Democratic Party. Wildenhahn was the first German filmmaker to adopt the methods of the direct cinema movement, but he remained sceptical about its effect on filmic realism, the new immediacy of the documentary experience, as a sheer consequence of smaller and therefore more mobile film equipment. He considered an ideological discourse primarily based on a technological premise as equally problematic as the hierarchical practice he tried to overcome. Wildenhahn evaded this dilemma by turning toward a highly political position. Because the documentary filmmaker can never achieve absolute objectivity, he or she has no other choice but to endorse this partiality.

Wildenhahn's output of 'worker films' remained the strongest indication of this ethical bias. According to Wildenhahn the working-class milieu was the scene where the slow transformation of the government's social paradigm became most evident. He continuously returned to close observations of workplaces and documentations of worker strikes until the early 1990s. The strong position films, such as Emden goes to the USA (1975–6), or Rheinhausen. Herbst '88 (1988), adopted between the factions of workers and the union emphasized the social-democratic values maintained in the body of Wildenhahn's work. His conviction that only a unified position would help to defy the forces of free market made his films a rare example of social- and class-conscious documentary filmmaking in German television.

Constancy characterizes Wildenhahn's oeuvre. He consistently articulated his social policy, even in his late films. His final documentary for the ARD in 1995 was the only one not shot on 16mm film.

ANDREAS BUSCHE

See also: Leacock, Richard; Maysles, Albert; Pennebaker, D.A.

Biography

Born in Bonn, Germany, June 19, 1930. Studied sociology, publishing and political science at the Free University Hamburg. Left the university 1953 and moved to London, where he worked in a psychiatric hospital. Returned to Hamburg 1959. Produced commercials on 35mm for the National Lottery. 1960–64 'visual realizer' for journalistic television programmes at the ARD. 1964–75 editor in 'teleplay' department at the NDR/ARD. 1968–72 scholar at the German Film- und Fernsehakademie (Film and Television Academy), Berlin. 1969 first documentary, 'Institutssommer', with the newly founded filmmaker collective 'Gruppe Wochenschau'. In 1975 laid off at the NDR/ARD for his controversial documentary 'Emden geht nach USA'. 1976 'Emden geht nach USA' wins Golden Grimme Award. 1975 freelance editor at the radio of the WDR/ARD. 1977/1979/1980 jury member of the documentary film festival Duisburger Filmwoche. 1975–95 freelance editor for the 'education', 'philosophy, history, education', 'religion and history', 'feature, documentary, history', and 'society and education' departments at the NDR/ARD, and freelance contributor for the WDR/ARD. Retired in 1995.

Selected films

- | | |
|--------|--|
| 1964 | Parteitag 1964 : director, concept, writer |
| 1967 | In der Fremde : director, writer |
| 1971 | Der Hamburger Aufstand Oktober 1923 : director, concept, cowriter |
| 1975–6 | Emden geht nach USA : director, concept, cowriter |
| 1988 | Rheinhausen. Herbst '88 : director, narrator, |
| 1992 | Freier Fall: Johanna K. : director, concept |
| 1994–5 | Reise nach Mostar : director, concept |

Further reading

- Berg, Jan, 'Die Fiktion des Nichtfiktionalen. Zur Abbildtheorie von Klaus Wildenhahn', Filme 4, August 1980.
- Biedermann, Werner and Haardt, Angela (eds), Beiträge aus der Wirklichkeit, Duisburg: Filmforum der Volkshochschule, 1981.
- Kluge, Alexander, 'Debatte über den Dokumentarfilm', in Klaus Eder and Alexander Kluge

- (eds), Ulmer Dramaturgien. Reibungsverluste, München: Carl Hanser Verlag, 1980.
- Schröder, Nicolaus (ed.), Klaus Wildenhahn, Dokumentarist, Berlin: Freunde der Deutschen Kinemathek, 2000.
- Wildenhahn, Klaus, Teilstücke in Fernsehdokumentarismus. Bilanz und Perspektiven, Peter Zimmermann (ed.), Stuttgart: Europäisches Medienforum, 1992.

Wintonick, Peter

With roots in fiction filmmaking during a period of the late 1970s and early 1980s, Canadian Peter Wintonick turned his interests to documentaries after honing his skills as an editor on a series of feature-length productions. The New Cinema (1984), a feature video documentary about independent film, marked Wintonick's directorial debut and hinted at his future as a filmmaker interested in the social ramifications of the form and its ties with fiction. The use of both fiction and nonfiction film language and techniques under the rubric of documentary filmmaking is a recurrent feature of Wintonick's highly constructed work, resulting in texts that touch but do not quite blur the line between the two practices.

Wintonick's films are pragmatic in nature, his exploration of subject matter satisfying both his personal search for knowledge and his desire to share that information with an audience. Much of his body of work could be classified as committed filmmaking insofar as his socio-ideological position behind the camera is rarely concealed. Although Wintonick's personal politics are not necessarily on display, his perspective is echoed in the particular discourse presented onscreen.

Wintonick is best known for Manufacturing Consent: Noam Chomsky and the Media (1992), an epic feature-length documentary detailing activist-academic Noam Chomsky's critique of corporate news-gathering and the vested interests that lie behind media coverage. Co-directed with Mark Achbar, the film is a complex system of compilation footage, interviews, and staged elements. According to the National Film Board of Canada, it is the most successful documentary in Canadian history. It has played theatrically in two hundred cities around the world, won twenty-two awards, appeared in more than fifty international film festivals, has been broadcast in thirty markets, and has been translated into a dozen languages. It marked the first production from Necessary Illusions, a company founded by Wintonick, Achbar, and Francis Miquet devoted to the development, production, and distribution of media on sociocultural issues. Preceded by a number of smaller productions prepared for television broadcast, Cinéma Vérité: Defining the Moment (1999), was Wintonick's next major achievement. It continued his examination of media, filmmaking, and journalism through his own filmmaking while attempting to delineate the major currents that spawned the vérité movement and established its profile within the documentary world. A hybrid of documentary styles, the film is notable for its first-person interviews with the luminaries of the movement, including Robert Drew, Richard Leacock, Jean Rouch, and Michel Brault.

Wintonick's interest in the virtual forum of information exchange offered by the Internet led to his development of the Virtual Film Festival. Founded in 1996, the site functioned as a point of convergence for documentary filmmakers to showcase their independently produced digital works and exchange ideas with other documentarians from around the world. Issues related to funding ultimately saw the closing of the site, but Wintonick's interest in multimedia as a vital link between both filmmakers and audiences alike continues to inform his ongoing role as a postproduction consultant and executive producer for independent productions.

MICHAEL B. BAKER

See also: Manufacturing Consent: Noam Chomsky and the Media

Biography

Born in Trenton, Ontario, June 10, 1953. Attended Carleton University in Ottawa with an interest in journalism, theatre, film, photography 1972. Graduated from the Algonquin College Film Production Centre in Ottawa 1973. Editor at the International Cinemedia Centre Ltd 1972–7. Editor and associate producer for Ron Mann's Poetry in Motion, a theatrical documentary about the history and art of performance poetry. Produced and directed first documentary, The New Cinema, winner of the Blue Ribbon Award at the American Film Festival 1984. Formed Necessary Illusions with Mark Achbar and Francis Miquet 1988.

Associate Professor at Concordia University in the Department of Film Studies 1988–9. Completed Manufacturing Consent: Noam Chomsky and the Media, a coproduction of Necessary Illusions and the National Film Board of Canada 1992. Coproducer and codirector of web-based Virtual Film Festival (now archived on CD-ROM) 1994–6. Cofounder/Chair of the Banff New Media Institute's Digidocs programme 1995. Programmer for Canadian International Documentary Festival (Toronto), Visions on the Real (Adelaide), and Amsterdam International Documentary Festival.

Selected films

- 1982 Poetry in Motion (Mann): associate producer, editor
 1984 The New Cinema: director, producer, editor
 1985 The Journey (Watkins): coproducer, coeditor (Canadian unit)
 1987 A Rustling of Leaves: Inside the Philippine Revolution (Wild): editor, associate producer
 1992 Manufacturing Consent: Noam Chomsky and the Media (Achbar): codirector, coproducer, editor
 1999 Cinéma Vérité: Defining the Moment: director, coeditor
 2002 Seeing is Believing: Handicams, Human Rights and the News (Cizek): codirector, coproducer

Further reading

- Achbar, Mark and Wintonick, Peter, 'Manufacturing Dissent', Cineaste 3, 1993.
 Enright, Robert, 'Vérité, Vérité, All is Vérité', Border Crossings 3, 2000.
 Glassman, Marc, 'Mediating Noam Chomsky. Manufacturing Consent: Noam Chomsky and the Media', Take One 2, winter 1993.

Wiseman, Frederick

Frederick Wiseman is a vérité documentary filmmaker with a long record of achievement. He chose a 'fly-on-the-wall' approach to filmmaking and continued with this method throughout his career. Wiseman lets the camera roll for long periods and does not use interviews, music, titles, or narration.

Editing is where the film's structure is born. He has been called a 'pioneer' of vérité, along with D.A. Pennebaker and the Maysles brothers (Poppy 2002), and is considered 'one of the most influential and prolific figures in documentary filmmaking' (Aftab and Weltz n.d.: 1).

Trained in law, Wiseman was teaching at Boston University's Institute of Law and Medicine when he turned his attention to the conditions at a nearby Massachusetts mental hospital. He was an amateur filmmaker and uninterested in the abstractions of the law. The result, in 1967, was his eighty-four-minute film Titicut Follies. It is considered by many to be a documentary classic. Because of its importance to Wiseman's career and documentary filmmaking, it is worth focusing on.

The story takes its name from a musical revue put on by the guards and mental patients at the Bridgewater State Hospital for the Criminally Insane. The black-and-white footage heightens the drama and terror; the unfolding story blurs the lines between sanity and insanity. So controversial was the film that the Massachusetts Supreme Court banned it from being shown. It ruled that the film was both obscene and exploitive, and had invaded inmate privacy. However, supporters of the film argued that the public's right to know what happens at public institutions outweighs privacy issues. Wiseman himself has argued that if an institution receives public tax support, citizens are entitled to observe its operation.

Though a masterpiece to many, Titicut Follies was not without its critics. A Time magazine reviewer said that the film was 'a raw poorly edited report', that offered no solutions (n.a. 1967a). A critic maintained that the privacy issue was bogus and that the real question was whether the film was an 'objective documentary' or a 'propaganda stunt' (ibid.). Accused of filming with hidden cameras, Wiseman denied the charge. Additionally, the film raised questions as to whether or not it was art. In 1993, twenty-four years later, the film aired on public television.

Titicut Follies helped to launch a career that included more than thirty documentaries. PBS nationally broadcast Wiseman's Law and Order, Hospital, Juvenile Court, Essene, Basic Training, Primate, Welfare, Meat, Canal Zone, and Sinai Field Mission, among others.

Wiseman's films have won numerous awards, including at the New York Film Festival, San Francisco International Film Festival, Spoleto Film Festival, London Film Festival, Athens International Film Festival, American Film Festival, and the Melbourne and Sydney Festivals. He has earned Emmy Awards, Dupont Awards, and the Personal Achievement Gabriel Award, presented by the Catholic Broadcasters' Association. Retrospective screenings of his work have taken place at the Chicago Film Festival, London Film Festival, and Paris Film Cinemathèque, among other venues.

Wiseman has remained steadfast in his convictions regarding documentary filmmaking. To the annoyance of some, he refuses to comment about what his films are about and what should be done in terms of what he has exposed. He believes this information is in the film and viewers have to make up their own mind. His films have also been criticized for being overly long.

Though often considered the 'dean' of 'cinéma vérité', Wiseman himself says that it is, 'just a pompous French term that has absolutely no meaning as far as I'm concerned. The effort is to be selective about your observations and organize them into a dramatic structure' (Aftab and Wetz n.d.: 2).

Wiseman's long and somewhat controversial career has provided the United States and the world with some of the most poignant examinations of institutions and life in America. He continues to see America as a largely unexplored country cinematically. Although primarily a documentary filmmaker, he has made two fiction films (The Stunt Man, 1980, and Seraphita's Diary, 1982).

LOU BUTTINO

See also: Basic Training; High School; Hospital; Law and Order; Meat; Titicut Follies; Welfare

Biography

Born in Boston, Massachusetts, January 1, 1930. BA, Williams College, Williamstown, MA, 1951. LLB, Yale University. Initially practiced and taught law before taking up documentary filmmaking in 1967.

Films

1967 Titicut Follies

1969 High School
 1969 Law and Order
 1970 Hospital
 1971 Basic Training
 1972 Essene
 1973 Juvenile Court
 1974 Primate
 1975 Welfare
 1976 Meat
 1977 Canal Zone
 1978 Sinai Field Mission
 1980 Model
 1983 The Store
 1985 Racetrack
 1986 Multi-handicapped
 1986 Adjustment & Work
 1987 Deaf
 1987 Missile
 1989 Near Death
 1991 Aspen
 1993 Zoo
 1994 High School II
 1995 Ballet
 1996 La Comédie Française
 1997 Public Housing
 1999 Belfast, Maine
 2001 Domæstic Violence I
 2002 Domestic Violence II

Further reading

- Aftab, Kaleem and Wetz, Alexandra, 'Fred Wiseman', www.iol.ie/galfilm/filmwest, n.d.
- Arlen, Michael J., The Camera Age: Essays on Television, New York: Penguin, 1982.
- Barnouw, Erik, Documentary: A History of Non-fiction Film, New York: Oxford University Press, 1974.
- Benson, Thomas W., Documentary Dilemmas: Frederick Wiseman's 'Titicut Follies', Carboridale, IL Southern Illinois Press, 1991.
- Eames, David, 'Watching Wiseman Watch', The New York Times Magazine, October 2, 1977: 96–102, 108.
- Edelstein, David, 'Frederick Wiseman', The New York Times, March 16, 2003.
- Ellsworth, Liz, Frederick Wiseman: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston: G.K. Hall & Co., 1979.
- Fenton, John H., 'Film Stirs Furor in Mass., Legislators See Follies Made at Memorial Hospital', The New York Times, October 18, 1967: 40.
- Gill, Brendan, 'The Current Cinema', The New Yorker 43, October 28, 1967: 166–7.
- Houston, Bobby, 'Titicut Follies', Documentary, December 2003.

- n.a., 'The Talk of the Town: New Producer', The New Yorker 39, September 14, 1963: 33–5.
- n.a., 'Cinema: Festival Action, Side Show Action, Titicut Follies', Time 90, no. 13, September 29, 1967a.
- n.a., 'Tempest in a Snake Pit', Newsweek 70, November 11, 1967b: 539.
- Nichols, Bill, 'Fred Wiseman's Documentaries: Theory and Structure', Film Quarterly 31, no. 3, spring 1978: 15–28.
- O'Connor, John, 'Wiseman's Latest Film is Another "Reality Fiction"', The New York Times, November 7, 1976: 27.
- Poppy, Nick, 'Frederick Wiseman', Salon.com.2002/01/30, 2002.
- Rosenthal, Alan (ed.), New Challenges in Documentary, Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1988.
- Schickel, Richard, 'Sorriest Spectacle: The Titicut Follies', Life 63, December 1, 1967: 12.
- Walker, Jess, 'The Cool World', Film Comment 2, 1964: 51–2.

Woodstock: Three Days of Peace and Music

(US, Wadleigh, 1970)

Michael Wadleigh's epic documentary of the three-day Woodstock Music and Art Fair, which took place on August 15–17, 1969 at Max Yasgur's farm outside Woodstock, in upstate New York, represents one of the most vivid accounts of the 1960s American counterculture. The Woodstock Festival built on the success of the International Pop Festival at Monterey, California in June 1967 and the free concert in Hyde Park, London (Stones in the Park) in June 1969, attracting an audience of four hundred thousand over the three days. Filmed by D.A. Pennebaker as Monterey Pop (1968), the Monterey Festival was the first to bill a plethora of West Coast rock bands such as Country Joe & The Fish, Canned Heat, Jefferson Airplane, and Big Brother & The Holding Company, with The Who and Jimi Hendrix headlining. The Woodstock Festival also concentrated on folk, blues, and rock, featuring many of the bands that played at Monterey, together with Joan Baez, Joe Cocker, Crosby, Stills & Nash, Arlo Guthrie, and Richie Havens, all of whom feature in the film, as well as Ravi Shankar, The Grateful Dead, and The Band, who were not included. The original director's cut of two hundred and twenty-five minutes was made from more than one hundred and twenty hours of footage of the Festival, but edited to one hundred and eighty-five minutes for the film's release in 1970. The director's cut has been available since 1994, with eight further segments on the widescreen DVD released by Warner in 2000.

Wadleigh's film won Best Documentary Feature at the Academy Awards in 1971 (as well as being nominated for Editing and Sound awards), and it is regarded by many as the best concert film ever made. Shot on 16mm film, Woodstock combines a vivid account of many of the artists and bands that played over the three days, with attention given to the audience (listening, dancing, talking, tripping on drugs, bathing, getting soaked), as well as interviews with the organisers and the reaction of locals. Wadleigh intended to depict the Festival as a contemporary version of The Canterbury Tales: a pilgrimage for hippies seeking communal expression of music and love. The film begins with images of the bucolic setting, symbolic of the ideal lifestyle that the Festival attempted to embody. In the early scenes the camera cuts between pastoral images and the building of the enormous concert stage, switching from ground-level angles to helicopter-eye views of events. The visual style derives from the editing work of Thelma Schoonmaker and a young Martin Scorsese (whose music documentary of The Band, The Last Waltz, 1978, shows the influence of Woodstock), particularly the liberal use of split screens that are deployed partly to incorporate extra footage, partly to emphasise the massive scale of the event, and partly to juxtapose images of the crowd, the musicians, and the construction of the stage.

Although individual performances stand out in the film—notably, those of Joan Baez, The Who, and Jimi Hendrix—the gathering of so many people suggests, as Sheila Whiteley argues, that the triumph of the Festival was to engender 'participation rather than passivity' in the audience. Given that there was not enough stock to film all the acts, Wadleigh was more interested in documenting antiwar and political songs than ballads. This political edge is most evident when Joan Baez calls for the release of the labor union organiser Joe Hill, with Country Joe McDonald singing the quintessential anti-Vietnam anthem 'I-Feel-Like-I'm-Fixin'-to-Die-Rag'. Three tracks from Jimi Hendrix's set ('Voodoo Chile', 'The Star Spangled Banner', and 'Purple Haze'), played at 6:30am on the Monday, close the film in electrifying fashion.

Although Woodstock is commonly seen as the apotheosis of the counterculture and peace movement, Wadleigh's film also hints at the commercial side of the Festival, as it provided a forum for the promoters and organisers to target the crowds as consumers. The Festival promoters, Joel Rosenman and John Roberts, make a case for the commercial integrity of the event in Young Men with Unlimited Capital, but the fact that the audience was vastly greater than expected meant that it was impossible to control tickets and many avoided paying. Wadleigh's film and the album were part of the $1,500,000 package that offset the $3,400,000 spent on or after the Festival (leaving only a loss of $100,000 a year on). Wadleigh's film does not detail these figures, but it does provide glimpses of the tensions between the free festival that Woodstock became and the economics of running the event. This commercial undercurrent affected many of the rock festivals in the late 1960s and early 1970s, particularly the three Isle of Wight Festivals held in August 1968, 1969, and 1970. The documentary Message to Love: The Isle of White Festival (Murray Lerner, 1995) conveys the almost complete organisational breakdown of the third Festival in 1970, revealing a discontented audience, many of whom refused to pay the entrance fee. Both documentaries offset the musical exuberance of the bands by exposing some of the logistical problems of running such massive-scale events, with muddy roads, congested campsites, lack of adequate facilities, and electrical problems hampering filming. Problems also surfaced in the production of Woodstock, most notably when the music producer David Geffen exerted control over the film, arguing that Wadleigh could not use the concert footage of Crosby, Stills & Nash unless he included their version of Joni Mitchell's 'Woodstock' as the closing song (a track inspired by the Festival).

MARTIN HALLIWELL

See also: Monterey Pop

Woodstock (US, Warner Bros, 1970, 216 mins). Distributed by Warner Bros. Produced by Bob Maurice. Directed by Michael Wadleigh. Cinematography by Michael Wadleigh, David Myers, Richard Pearce, Don Lenzer, and Al Wertheimer. Music by Joan Baez, Canned Heat, Joe Cocker & The Grease Band, Country Joe McDonald, Country Joe & The Fish, Crosby, Stills & Nash, Arlo Guthrie, Richie Havens, Jimi Hendrix, Jefferson Airplane, Janis Joplin, Santana, John Sebastian, Shanana, Sly & The Family Stone, Ten Years After, and The Who. Edited by Thelma Shoonmaker and Martin Scorsese. Sound directed by Larry Johnson. Filmed at White Lake, Bethel, New York, August 1969.

Further reading

- Hinton, Brian, Message to Love: The Isle of Wight Festival 1968–69–1970, Chessington: Castle Communications, 1995.
- Makower, Joel, Woodstock: The Oral History, New York: Doubleday, 1989.
- Palmer, Robert, Rock & Roll: An Unruly History, New York: Harmony Books, 1995.
- Rosenman, Joel, Young Men with Unlimited Capital: The Story of Woodstock, New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1974 (reprinted Houston, TX: Scriveny Press, 1999).
- Santelli, Robert, Aquarius Rising: The Rock Festival Years, New York: Dell, 1980.
- Spitz, Robert Stephen, Barefoot in Babylon: The Creation of the Woodstock Music Festival 1969, New York: Viking, 1979.
- Whiteley, Sheila, Women and Popular Music: Sexuality, Identity and Subjectivity, London: Routledge, 2000.
- Young, Jean, Woodstock Festival Remembered, New York: Ballantine Books, 1979.

Workers Leaving the Lumière Factory and Other Lumière Shorts

(France, Lumière, 1895)

The technical contributions of the Lumière brothers, Auguste and Louis, to the development of the motion picture have received much-deserved recognition in most histories of the cinema. The reputation of the films they produced between 1895 and the turn of the century has fared less well. More than one commentator has dubbed them 'primitive cinema' in the most pejorative sense, devoid of any form, artistry, or purpose beyond that of recording movement. Their approach has been likened to that of today's rank amateur with a video camera, eager to record scenery, family life, and action but sadly deficient in terms of cinematic literacy, resulting in fifty-foot home movies running for a minute or less. Theirs, it is charged, was simply the recording of an unadjusted, unmodified reality. Thus it happened that these Frenchmen, with their images of daily life (actualités, or unbiased records of observation), unwittingly established that nonfictional genre of the cinema, the documentary, which may be some compensation for the alleged lack of structure in their considerable output.

This unflattering depiction of two artless, naïve pioneers requires revision. A useful starting point is their extraordinarily successful careers as owners of a photographic plate manufacturing business in Lyons, already well established by the time they encountered motion pictures. Like Thomas Alva Edison, they viewed their invention, the cinématographe, as a potentially profitable expansion of an existing enterprise. It is surely not accidental that two of their earliest public screenings, in June 1895, of Disembarcation of Congress Members at Neuville-sur-Saône/Arrivée des Congressistes à Neuville-sur-Saône, and of the eminent physicist, Pierre-Jules-César Janssen in Conversation, were presented within twenty-four hours of their creation, to the subjects of the film. This group was a technically knowledgeable audience of scientists and photographers whose interest, presumably, would be in the practical and financial possibilities of the new medium rather than in the entertainment value of the vaudeville turns of their competitor, Edison's Kinetoscope. In a sense, these actualités were publicity projects designed to flatter and impress potential customers with the capabilities of their camera-printer-projector. It is illuminating to note that this movie demonstration, in Lyons, and subsequently at the Brussels Exposition that same summer, was only part of the programme. The remainder was devoted to another of their commercial ventures, Autochromie, a colour photographic process, also designed to reproduce life more realistically. Obeying one of the most important tenets of business, they waited until they had shot a sufficient number of movie items to satisfy demand before staging their much-publicized exhibition in Paris on December 28. Significantly, it opened with what can be regarded as an industrial 'commercial' for their centre of production, Workers Leaving the Lumière Factory/Sortie d'usine. So many prints had to be made that the original negative wore out, necessitating the shooting of an identically staged version in 1896, the movie industry's first remake! The same business acumen is observable in their initial foray into Russia in May of that same year. The subject, Coronation of Tsar Nicholas II, was carefully chosen for its potential appeal to the tens of millions throughout his empire. Its success was not lost on the tsar himself, who ordered the appointment of two movie photographers to film future state occasions. Naturally they used equipment rented from the Lumières.

Of course entrepreneurial skill is not necessarily synonymous with artistic ability. It must be admitted that the sheer volume of titles produced in the first two years—in the many hundreds—include numerous examples of the 'unmediated representation of reality' charge levelled at them by critics. This was, perhaps, inevitable given that the Lumières had limited control over their scores of cameramen operating on four continents. Trains enter and leave stations with much of a sameness; what could be interchangeable crowds promenade around race courses from Melbourne to Madrid; and there are multiple episodes of cavalry galloping to and from the camera. That said, we may discern a definite pattern in those items that were the work of the brothers themselves. First, they conform to fundamental narrative conventions, with beginnings, middles, and conclusions. Second, their expertise as still photographers is diligently transferred to the new medium with due attention paid to compositional framing, balance, and perspective. Consider, again, Workers Leaving the Lumière Factory. The audience sits, as if in a live theatre facing a proscenium arch, the screen. As the film begins, the two factory doors are closed. Then, continuing the theatrical analogy, they swing open for the camera as if the curtain is being raised. Men and women stream out into the street. Unlike the conventioners disembarking at Neuville sur Saône, who acknowledge Louis Lumière by smiling or doffing their hats to the camera, these workers are totally oblivious to its objectivity as they move out of range to the left and right, at the same time giving the scene its symmetry. Once all have exited, the left-hand door begins to swing shut. After all movement has stopped, the camera ceases operation signifying the end of the episode. Because it is rooted to the spot throughout, the opening and closing images are virtually identical to the extent that they could be spliced together and the entire incident shown in a never-ending loop.

This concern with beginnings and ends, features usually associated with the narrative mode, is observable in many of their very early works. Destruction of a Wall/Démolition d'un mur opens with a group of workmen contemplating the task at hand, after which one of them applies a winch to the free-standing edifice. While a second labourer delivers a series of blows to weaken the foundation, a third looks on, ready to assist him. The supervisor orders more pressure to be applied by the winch at which point the wall falls over. In a cloud of dust all three labourers begin to smash the debris into smaller pieces. There is a comprehensiveness in this 'how to' film that is surely at odds with its categorization as a formless vignette. Similarly, Carmaux: Bringing Out the Coke/Carmaux: défournage du coke is a step-by-step account of dealing with one component of iron production. A long slab of red-hot coke emerges from its oven and is set on by a worker wielding a hose of cold water. Others join him with long metal rods and proceed to prod at the mass to reduce it to useable chunks.

On the negative side, it must be admitted that the Lumières, at least in the earliest years, were prisoners of their own limited technique and technology. A camera that remained rigidly anchored, moving neither to the left nor right, and a magazine's capacity to hold, effectively, no more than one minute's running time of film, were singly or in combination responsible for certain shortcomings, not the least of which are inconclusive endings to a number of their films. Arrival of a Train at the Station/L'Arrivée d'un train en gare de La Ciotat, one of the works included in the Paris exhibition, opens with an angle shot of the platform and waiting passengers. An engine, pulling eleven carriages, steams into the foreground and comes to a stop as the doors open and a few people disembark. Those waiting prepare to board at which point the film comes to an end. Though we have been privileged to see one step in the process of passenger movement, it would have made for more satisfactory viewing had the process of embarkation been complete, but that would have entailed a running time at least half as long again. The limitation imposed by the amount of film in the camera is more dramatically illustrated in Boat Leaving the Harbour/Barque sortant du port. Two men row an open boat towards the open sea while a third sits in the stern. Their actions are observed from the edge of a breakwater by two women with small children.

As the craft passes the jetty, one of the women acknowledges them. Both females then prepare for departure. At this point, a large wave hits the craft, turning it at right angles to its intended direction, and forces it dangerously near the breakwater. Filming ceases at this juncture, and so we are denied what might well have been a dramatic reaction by those spectators to the rowers' plight.

The lack of fluidity imposed by the Lumières' immobile camera is illustrated in what is probably their most famous work from this early period, The Gardener and the Bad Boy/L'Arroseur arrosé. A humorous anecdote, it contains the seeds of what was to become a staple of the silent screen for the next three decades: slapstick comedy. Again, careful symmetrical construction of the scene is observable in the opening frames where, left of centre, a gardener is busily watering a flowerbed. A boy enters from the right and steps on the hose located centre. The flow of water stops and the gardener, puzzled at what has happened, turns the nozzle towards his face to investigate. The boy then releases his foot and the water gushes out with so much force that it knocks the gardener's cap from his head. Enraged, he drops the hose and runs after the perpetrator. At this juncture both individuals disappear left of frame, and one wishes the camera would make a slight pan in their direction. Instead, the victim of the prank has to drag the boy into view before administering a spanking, after which the youngster exits right. The story ends as it had begun with the gardener returning to his watering chore. Despite the technical shortcoming, this film lends itself to reflection on at least two levels. It may be regarded as a simple morality tale: interfere with the work of a diligent labourer and one must pay the consequence, although the spectator can find enjoyment both in the naughty deed and in the miscreant's punishment. As a precursor of silent screen comedy, it embodies a number of classic elements. The participants are mere moving objects, lacking any character trait that might detract from enjoyment of the joke. The gardener is an innocent victim; the spanking he administers is a mild one, otherwise the audience would be uneasy; and, in the end, after comic disruption has upset the status quo, moral equilibrium is restored.

The films of the Lumière brothers constitute a milestone in the representation of the real. In the innumerable scenes of life on city streets that predominate in their catalogue listings, we are witnessing a mode of representation first made available in the picture postcard. That, in turn, was made possible with the appearance of high-speed emulsion, as distinct from the collodion wet-plate process. The latter had permitted the reproduction of static rural vistas, but the newer one enabled filmmakers to capture the fin-de-siècle urban landscape in all its unscripted, unpredictable hustle and bustle. The Lumières and their cameramen chose a framing to catch moments of reality, known in outline only, and filmed them without attempting to manipulate the subjects before their lens. The results, for all their shortcomings, fascinated audiences of the day, and have continued to do so for more than a century.

JAMES M. SKINNER

See also: Lumière Brothers, The

The Lumière catalogue lists more than two thousand entries made by the company between 1895 and 1904, when production ceased. These are accessible to the public only in compilation form. The most complete of these is The Lumière Brothers' First Films (1895–7), 1996, made in collaboration with the Institut and containing eighty-three titles, with narration by Bernard Tavernier. The Movies Begin: Volume II, The European Pioneers, produced by Kino Video and utilizing British Film Institute archival material contains examples personally directed by Louis Lumière. These include, La Sortie des usines/Exiting the Factory (1895), Démolition d'un mur/Demolition of a wall (1895), Querelle enfantine/Childish Quarrel (1895), Carmaux, défournage du coke/Carmaux: Drawing out the Coke (1896), and several examples of assistants' work in the US in 1896. Granada Television's Early Photography: Camera & Moving Pictures, Vol. 8, includes L'Arroseur arrosé/The Gardener and the Bad Boy (1895), Partie d'écarte/Card Game (1895), Barque sortant du port/Boat Leaving the Harbour (1895), Arrivée d'un train en gare de La Ciotat/Arrival of a Train at La Ciotat Station (1895), and films made abroad, including examples from Russia (Couronnement du Tsar/Crowning of Tsar Nicholas II, 1895), Switzerland (Cortège arabe/Arab Cortège, 1896), Australia and Egypt.

Further reading

- Barsam, Richard M., Non-Fiction Film: A Critical History, Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press, 1963.
- Burch, Noel, Life to these Shadows, London: BFI, 1990.
- Elsaesser, Thomas (ed.), Early Cinema: Space-Frame-Narrative, London: BFI, 1990.
- Fell, John L. (ed.), Film Before Griffith, Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1983.
- Film and the Narrative Tradition, Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1986.
- Mitry, Jean, Histoire du cinéma, art et industrie, 1895–1914, T.1, Paris: Editions Universitaires, 1967.
- North, Joseph H., The Early Development of the Motion Picture, 1887–1900, New York: Arno, 1973.
- Pinèl, Vincent, 'Lumière: Anthologie du cinéma no. 78', Supplement to L'avant-scène cinéma, no. 147, May, 1974.
- Sadoul, Georges, Louis Lumière, Paris: Seghers, 1964.

World at War, The

(UK, Thames Television, 1974–5)

The World at War is one of the most ambitious and comprehensive documentaries on World War II. It consists of a series of twenty-six episodes, each lasting almost one hour, produced by Jeremy Isaacs for Thames Television. The first episode, A New Germany, was broadcast on the BBC on October 31, 1973. Three years later six new episodes were added, for a total running time of almost thirty-two hours. Broadcast in many countries around the world, The World at War won several awards, including an International Emmy and the George Polk Memorial Award. It is regularly used as an educational aid in British secondary schools.

The team that produced the programme included fourteen writers and ten producers, with Dr Noble Frankland DFC as Chief Historical Adviser. The voice of the popular Sir Laurence Olivier provided continuity to the first twenty-six episodes. Work on the documentary began in 1971, with research carried out in the archives of many countries. The World at War presents excerpts from an array of original audiovisual materials, including newsreels, original raw rushes from war cameramen, filmed testimonies and interviews, propaganda films, photographs taken by soldiers on the battlefield, and fragments of radio transmissions, documentaries, songs, and music from the war years. The final result is a montage of thousands of images and clips, which convey the chronological progression of the events, as well as give an account of a multiplicity of points of view. Despite this sweeping kaleidoscope of materials, the documentary presents a strong narrative continuity, being divided into episodes that are coherent both in spatial and chronological terms. The World at War, which is clearly aimed at eliciting the empathy of the spectator, includes many testimonies that intertwine with and comment on the original documents. There is no academic commentary; much space is given instead to interviews, including with ordinary people, veterans, and survivors. Among the better-known interviewees are Karl Wolff (Hitler's adjutant); Traudi Junge (Hitler's secretary); John Colville (Parliamentary Private Secretary to Winston Churchill); and actor James Stewart, former USAAF bomber pilot.

The original twenty-six-episode series opens with A New Germany, dedicated to Hitler's rise to power in Germany; this is followed by twenty-four episodes that give an account of the involvement of the various countries in the war and analyse the most important battles. The last episode, Remember, is entirely devoted to the testimonies of survivors and to official celebrations and yearly gatherings of veterans. The structure of the programme is partly reminiscent of Frank Capra's series of films, Why We Fight.

The organization of each episode is similar: an analysis of the domestic political situation and of the foreign agenda of each country is followed by a study of the military tactics and of the reality of the war front. Attention is always devoted to the preparations for war, both in terms of the protection of civilians (construction of bunkers, distribution of gas masks) and in terms of the race to arms and to technological innovations in weaponry. The breaking of the war into the daily life of the various cities targeted by air raids is documented, as well as the international reactions to the bombings.

The various episodes are connected through the use of animation maps and of contemporary images of the sites of the great battles. Images of the two fronts alternate, in the attempt to recreate the battle step-by-step; the involvement of the spectator is encouraged by a series of questions and answers: What will be the right move? Why did the Maginot Line not hold? The advancements of the troops are recreated by a forward movement of the camera, conveying a subjective vision. Spectators are invited to be entirely involved in the flow of images and music; rarely are they informed about their sources. Olivier's persuasive voice is simultaneously the strong and the weak point of the documentary. Because it is easily recognizable, it functions as a real bond between the different episodes; on the other hand, the actor's at times subdued, at times emphatic tones seek to elicit the audience's emotional response, almost undervaluing the force of the images.

After the first few episodes, which follow a predominately chronological development ending with the entrance of the United States in the war, The World at War presents a series of episodes devoted to the great battles and to the crucial moments of the war. We travel to Africa with Desert—The War in North Africa; to Russia with Stalingrad and Red Star—The Soviet Union; to Italy for the march of the Allies with Tough Old Gut; and to Asia for the British defeat with It's a Lovely Day Tomorrow. Special episodes are devoted to the atomic catastrophe (The Bomb) and to the Holocaust (Genocide). Britain Alone is devoted to the situation in Great Britain after the capitulation of France and before the American intervention, to the heroic resistance to the Nazi air raids, to the preparation of the cities and coastal lines against the feared German landing. In line with documentary films such as Listen to Britain (Jennings, 1942), Britain Alone places emphasis on the characteristic British understatement and reserve: we see the population carrying out the normal working activities in a London destroyed by the bombs. Many of the episodes devoted to Britain, in fact, look like the products of the Crown Film Unit. The most spectacular and dramatic episode is doubtlessly Morning, devoted to the D-Day invasion. It presents a succession of sequences from the two fronts, in which the preparations of the German defence alternate with those for the American landing. We are shown the training of the American soldiers, the generals' speeches, the long preparations, and the departure for Normandy. The landing is shot with a subjective camera, and we are not spared the most gruesome images of the dead and injured on Omaha beach.

The six episodes added in 1976 (Secretary to Hitler, Who Won World War II?, Warrior, Hitler's Germany, The Two Deaths of Adolf Hitler, and The Final Solution—Auschwitz), are a sort of appendix to the documentary. They further examine some of the topics of the previous series, and in particular Nazism, the concentration camps, and the figure of Hitler. Hitler's Germany investigates the German history before the material covered by the first series, including the Weimar Republic and the ascent of Hitler to power. The last six episodes are no longer narrated by Sir Laurence Olivier, but by Eric Porter. Among the new episodes, Warrior is an examination of the memories of veterans of all factions focusing on their traumas and problems, somehow suggesting the communal destiny of all the fighters of World War II.

STEFANO BASCHIERA

The World at War (UK, Thames Television, 1973–6, almost 32 hours). Distributed by Thames Television. Series Producer: Jeremy Isaacs. Unit Production Manager: Liz Sutherland. Writers: Laurence Thompson, Peter Batty, Jerome Kuehl, J.P.W. Mallalieu, Neal Ascherson, Charles Douglas-Home, David Wheeler, John Williams, Angus Calder, Charles Bloomberg, Stuart Hood, Courtney Browne, David Elstein, and Jeremy Isaacs. Producers: David Elstein, Peter Batty, Ted Childs, Martin Smith, Ben Shephard, John Pett, Phillip Whitehead, Michael Darlow, Hugh Raggett, and Jermome Kuehl. Chief Historical Adviser: Dr Noble Frankland DFC. Music: Carl Davis. Narrated by Sir Laurence Olivier and Eric Porter.

World in Action, The

(Canada, National Film Board, 1942–6)

Shortly after it was founded, and with the outbreak of World War II, the National Film Board (NFB) of Canada began two monthly theatrical series of twenty-minute news magazines modeled on the highly successful American The March of Time. The first was Canada Carries On, intended to depict Canada's part in the war to its own people and to others. It was produced by Stuart Legg, veteran British documentarian whom John Grierson, head of the NFB, had brought over to assist in the work of the new institution. Once the first series was underway (the first issue was in April 1940), Legg began to develop the second, The World in Action (WIA), which became his project. With some exceptions he wrote and directed every issue. United Artists distributed the series.

This is Blitz (January 1942) was the first of the WIA. It used captured newsreel footage to reveal the devastation that German aggression had caused. The second part dealt with Allied counter-strategy. Many of the issues concerned noncombative but important wartime topics. Its treatment of economic/social/political issues became one of its special distinctions. Food—Weapon of Conquest (March 1942) was the second WIA release. Time magazine called it 'a blueprint of how to make an involved, dull, major aspect of World War II understandable and acceptable to moviegoers'. Inside Fighting Russia (April 1942) was composed mostly of footage obtained from the Soviets. As the Russians tended to be secretive, this represented quite a coup. War for Men's Minds (June 1943) concerned psychological warfare. The most ambitious and intellectual of the WIA films, it was also the first of the Canadian films to look ahead to peace.

The two series were noteworthy for their departures from usual wartime propaganda strategy: they contain little hatred or violence. There are two recurrent emphases: one is that we Canadians are doing our part (in a distinctive Canadian way); the other is that Canada is an important part of the world. These themes would seem to follow from Canada's uncertainty about its national character and its sense of geographical isolation, from its newness as a nation and lack of recognition as a world power. The divisive issue of differences between French-speaking Canada (which did not fully support the war) and English-speaking Canada (which did) was avoided.

The World in Action emphasis shifted from matters of immediate wartime concerns to those that would concern the postwar world. The international view and steady look ahead to peace were quite exceptional during wartime. Examples of internationalism would be Labour Front (October 1943) and especially Global Air Routes (April 1944). Grierson took satisfaction in turning the globe upside down, as he put it, in the NFB films: putting Canada at the center rather than the periphery of the world. When Asia Speaks (June 1944) was so accurate and farseeing in its analysis that it was still in active nontheatrical distribution long after the war. Now—The Peace (May 1945) dealt with the new United Nations organization.

If Canada Carries On paid The March of Time the compliment of imitation, The World in Action began to compete with it in the world market, including the United States. By the end of the war WIA was reaching a monthly audience of thirty million in twenty-one countries. Although Canada Carries On lasted until April 1951 (the same year The March of Time ended), however, The World in Action appeared only irregularly after 1946. One can assume that at least part of the reason for this was because Grierson and Legg had left Canada. It remains a memorable achievement in the history of the National Film Board.

JACK C. ELLIS

See also: Grierson, John; Legg, Stuart; Canada

The World in Action (Canada, National Film Board, 1942–46, 20 mins each monthly issue). Distributed by United Artists. Written, produced, and directed by Stuart Legg. Usual collaborators: assistant editor Tom Daly; music composed by Lucio Agostini; commentary read by Lorne Greene; animated maps by Evelyn Lambart.

Further reading

- Ellis, Jack C., John Grierson: Life, Contributions, Influence, Carbondale, IL: Southern Illinois University Press, 2000.
- Evans, Gary, John Grierson and the National Film Board: The Politics of Wartime Propaganda, Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1984.
- The John Grierson Project, McGill University, John Grierson and the NFB, Toronto: ECW Press, 1984.
- Hardy, Forsyth, John Grierson: A Documentary Biography, London: Faber & Faber, 1979.
- Jones, D.B., Movies and Memoranda: An Interpretive History of the National Film Board of Canada, Ottawa: Canadian Film Institute and Deneau Publishers, 1981.
- McKay, Marjorie, History of the National Film Board of Canada, Montreal: National Film Board, 1964.
- Nelson, Joyce, The Colonized Eye: Rethinking the Grierson Legend, Toronto: Between the Lines, 1988.

Wright, Basil

Basil Wright developed an interest in film aesthetics and made some student films at Cambridge. He became the first young filmmaker inducted into the British documentary film movement by its founder, his lifelong mentor, John Grierson. Wright joined the movement shortly after being hugely impressed by the famous November 1929 London Film Society double bill of Drifters (John Grierson, 1929), and Battleship Potemkin (Sergei Eisenstein, USSR, 1926). Wright's landmark achievement, The Song of Ceylon (1934), demonstrated that the movement was capable of producing outstanding work. It established Wright as a noted documentary filmmaker but has somewhat overshadowed his other films and his contributions as a producer, writer, and conscientious documentary activist.

Wright was the first British documentary movement filmmaker to have the adjective 'poetic' applied to his work. He was accompanied during the shooting of his first full-fledged directorial assignment, The Country Comes to Town (1931), by Robert Flaherty, renowned director of Nanook of the North (1922). Wright credited Flaherty with showing him how to immerse himself in the environment being filmed, and with making him aware of the value of recording serendipitous events. Flaherty also demonstrated how to frame shots with sensitivity and, through careful observation, anticipate subjects' movements. Wright returned the favour by contributing strong material to Industrial Britain (Robert Flaherty, 1931), an important early documentary produced in the collaborative manner typical of the movement during this period (Calder-Marshall 1963). Later, Wright played a key role in the similarly collaborative Night Mail (1936).

Wright consolidated his personal style and attracted serious critical attention with the direction of Liner Cruising South (1933), Cargo from Jamaica (1933), and Windmill in Barbados (1933–4), filmed en route to and in the Caribbean. Far removed from the other documentary movement filmmakers, he exercised considerable autonomy shooting these films. Grierson encouraged the maturation of Wright's individual poetic talent, offering creative input and imposing control during postproduction. Wright's modest trilogy, characterized by graceful camera pans, an eye for human and natural beauty, and a slightly elliptical tone, was praised by modernist critics writing for the influential journals Close-Up and Film Art, as well as by Grierson (Stollery 2000). The consequences for film art of the coming of sound was a live issue at this time. Alberto Cavalcanti's collaboration with Wright as Windmill in Barbados' 'sound supervisor' presaged their more extensive experimental work on The Song of Ceylon.

After Wright's early years at the Empire Marketing Board (EMB) and the General Post Office (GPO) Film Unit the documentary movement diversified. He moved into more senior roles as an organizer and producer, founding the Realist Film Unit and working with Grierson at Film Centre to supply documentaries for a range of sponsors. Wright directed Children at School (1937), on good and bad practices and conditions in state education. This was part of the series of documentaries, including Housing Problems (Edgar Anstey and Arthur Elton, 1935), commissioned to promote the gas industry while simultaneously addressing social problems. The Face of Scotland (1938) reunited Wright with The Song of Ceylon's composer, Walter Leigh, and displayed some similarities to their earlier collaboration.

Wright's wartime commissions for the Ministry of Information (MOI) provided less scope for innovation. Harry Watt continued experimenting with narrativised forms of documentary in films such as Target for Tonight (1941), before directing features at Ealing, but Wright remained faithful to a more purist conception of the aesthetic and social role of documentary. However, it was Humphrey Jennings and Stewart McAllister, for example in Listen to Britain (1942), who advanced the development of poetic documentary during World War II. As a senior figure, Wright's major contribution was advisory and supervisory. He worked intermittently with Grierson in Canada, then in 1945 briefly took over as producer in charge of the Crown Film Unit.

An underexplored dimension of Wright's work is its representations of the world beyond Britain. Internationalism was a central preoccupation of Grierson's that Wright revisited in a number of different contexts. Some of Wright's earliest published writing criticized conventional travelogues, a genre he sought to elevate through modernist aesthetics in his Caribbean films and in The Song of Ceylon (Low 1979). Wright's films differed from other British documentary movement Empire films, such as Contact (Paul Rotha, 1933), which tended to celebrate modernisation, Western technology, and progress. Wright's early Empire films take a more individualistic approach. They romanticize non-Western cultures as appealing yet tantalisingly inaccessible repositories of sensuality and traditional wisdom (Stollery 2000).

In the 1930s liberal internationalism overlapped with enlightened imperialism; different emphases arose from different combinations of collaborators and sponsors. Modern Orphans of the Storm (Basil Wright and Ian Dalrymple, 1937), was a campaign film responding immediately to the plight of child refugees displaced by the Spanish civil war. Men of Africa (Alex Shaw, 1940), written and produced by Wright for the Colonial Office, can be seen as a hybrid between orthodox British documentary perspectives on Empire and Wright's more Romantic view of native cultures. It lauds the benevolence of British rule in East Africa, representing apparently progressive developments in various fields of endeavour, but also celebrates the vibrant sights and sounds of African cultures.

After the war an optimistic, progressive internationalism prevailed within the documentary movement, and Wright began working with Grierson for the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO). Along with others in the movement, Wright argued, for example in his 1947 essay 'Documentary Today', that documentary production must arrive at a new equilibrium between national and international concerns (Aitken 1998). World Without End (Basil Wright, Paul Rotha, 1953) integrates Wright's delicately poetic approach with the urgent internationalism of The World is Rich (1947), Rotha's earlier film about world food. In World Without End material shot by Wright in Thailand is intercut with material shot by Rotha in Mexico, outlining the need for global solutions to global problems.

Grierson's status as British documentary's leading proponent, with Rotha a close second, has led to Wright's publications being overlooked. Yet in a quieter way he, too, was constantly active as a proselytizer for the movement, writing for all the documentary movement journals and becoming The Spectator's film critic in 1938. In 1936, when the movement's diversification required a new London-based publication to keep its various constituents and sponsors in touch with each other, Wright's family's money helped to establish World Film News (Low 1997). Later in his career he wrote books and began teaching. Wright's most illuminating reflections occur in articles or interviews where he discusses his individual creative processes, his collaborations, and specific technicalities of filmmaking. In this respect he is the most intimate of the early British documentary theorist-practitioners. He lived in an era and belonged to a tradition, however, that precluded any public recognition of the gay sensibility informing some of his more poetic, personal work.

MARTIN STOLLERY

See also: Night Mail; Song of Ceylon, The

Biography

Born London, June 12, 1907. Graduated Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, reading classics and economics in 1929. Met John Grierson and joined Empire Marketing Board (EMB) Film Unit in 1930, directed first film 1931. Directed his most acclaimed film, The Song of Ceylon, 1934–5. Moved with the film unit to the General Post Office (GPO) in 1934. Moved into producing, cofounded the Realist Film Unit and joined Grierson at Film Centre 1937. Made films for the Ministry of Information during World War II and advised Grierson on National Film Board policy in Canada. Appointed producer in charge of the Crown Film Unit 1945. Worked at UNESCO with Grierson and Julian Huxley in the immediate postwar period. Lectured on filmmaking at the University of California in the 1960s. Published a critical history of film, The Long View, 1974. Died October 14, 1987, in London.

Further reading

- Aitken, Ian, The Documentary Film Movement: An Anthology, Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press, 1998.
- Calder-Marshall, Arthur, The Innocent Eye: The Life of Robert J. Flaherty, London: W.H. Allen, 1963.
- Hardy, Forsyth H. (ed.), Grierson on Documentary, London: Faber, 1946.
- John Grierson: A Documentary Biography, London: Faber, 1979.
- Low, Rachael, Films of Comment and Persuasion of the 1930s, London: George Allen & Unwin, 1979.
- Documentary and Educational Films of the 1930s, London: Routledge, 1997.
- Stollery, Martin, Alternative Empires: European Modernist Cinemas and Cultures of Imperialism, Exeter: University of Exeter Press, 2000.
- Sussex, Elizabeth, The Rise and Fall of British Documentary, Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1975.
- Swann, Paul, The British Documentary Film Movement 1926–46, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1989.
- Wright, Basil, Use of the Film, London: Bodley Head, 1948.
- The Long View, London: Secker & Warburg, 1974.

Yugoslavia (former)

The first documentary films in the territory of the former Yugoslavia were made by Dr Karel Grossman in Slovenia (1903), and by Milton Manaki who was filming local rituals and folk dances of Macedonia (1905). The Arrival of the Sultan Reshad the Fifth in Solun and Bitolj was one of the first important documentaries by Manaki, an amazing film enthusiast after whom, during the 1990s, the Camera Film Festival in Bitola was named. Another man holding a special place in history is the Croat Josip Karaman for using film media to express his patriotic feelings, employing the Croatian language instead of Italian, which was predominant at that time in Dalmatia (1910).

During the time of the Kingdom of Yugoslavia, between the two World Wars, documentary production was very lively. In Croatia the School of National Health made popular and scientific films, and The State Film Centre in Belgrade managed production and distribution for the whole country. World War II made the country unable to indulge in film activities, except for Croatia, where under the occupation of Nazi Germany, the puppet nationalistic regime NDH (Independent State of Croatia) erected the Film Company Hrvatski Slikopis. Besides the militant propaganda films, NDH produced romantic, patriotic documentaries that emphasised 'national values'. At the same time a partisan resistance movement, led by the Communist Party, became aware of the importance and power of moving images. The committee decided to register on-camera some of the important war battles and, in 1943 the first film team was formed.

More importance was accorded to film the next year, when Marshall Tito, the leader of the Communist resistance, ordained the founding of The Film Association as a part of the National Liberation Struggle. Two years later, when the war was over, the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia started its first National Film Committee. Cinema was considered to be a powerful means of mass propaganda. Film became a 'must' in a new society that was enthusiastically creating 'people's culture' and had also to deal with illiteracy. The very first films were documentaries that reflected on the tragedy of the war that had just ended. Films like Jasenovac by Gustav Gavrin and Kosta Hlavaty, on the horror of the biggest concentration camp in Yugoslavia, or Belgrade by Nikola Popovic, Steps of Freedom by Rados Novakovic, and Istra by Branko Marjanovic, were all made in 1945, the year of the liberation.

The first two postwar years were a period of documentary making that acted as film education, which officially did not exist at the time. A huge number of filmmakers entered the business either by order or by recommendation of the Communist Party; they schooled themselves through practice. Later, many of them went into feature fiction production (Marjanovic, Popovic, Novakovic).

The newsreel monthlies Filmski Mjesecnik were the first regular documentaries produced by the state in socialist Yugoslavia. They captured the relevant issues regarding spreading Communist political doctrine, enthusiasm for rebuilding the country, agrarian reforms, and important political and cultural events. They were screened on a regular basis in cinemas before feature films were shown. At first, after World War II, cinema production and distribution from Slovenia to Macedonia were managed by The State Film Company of Yugoslavia (Drzavno Filmsko Poduzece Jugoslavije), but soon thereafter, according to the governments' intentions to decentralise film production, new companies came into being in each republic and autonomous territory. Some of them specialised in producing documentaries and shorts (Dunav film, Zastava, Bosna, Duga, Kinoteka 16, Zagreb, Studio film).

Because films were produced, distributed, and owned by the state, censorship was an obligatory aspect of the film business. Nevertheless, it was far less rigid than in other countries of Eastern Europe. A certain degree of freedom regarding the choice of the film theme, and especially regarding the style, was always present. The authors were exposed to cinema from the West, and some of them followed new trends such as cinéma vérité and direct film styles. The filmmakers travelled with their works to Western and Eastern European festivals and were in touch with new cultural movements.

After making 'politically correct' films in the 1950s that glorified the revolutionary struggle and the working class and denouncing the bourgeoisie, most of the filmmakers switched in the 1960s to visually strong and poetic documentary miniatures or analytical essays that were critical of society. Most of these short pieces were visually powerful and verbally ascetic, fitting perfectly in regular screenings as a prefilm in the theatres. No wonder Yugoslavian spectators held the documentary genre in high esteem.

A remarkable opus was created by filmmakers Rudolf Sremec, Krsto Skanata, Stjepan Zaninovic, and Zika Ristic. The cinematic approach of Croatian director Sremec was characterised by a 'friendly' camera style. With his almost one hundred films, he showed an enormous ability to penetrate invisibly into the lives of the people he filmed. His moving documentary Time of Silence/Vrijeme sutnje (1971) unveiled the shocking custom in a Slavonian village of 'storing' old people in houses on the edge of the forest and leaving them alone to die. This devoted documentary maker was known abroad for his People on Wheels/Ljudi na tockovima (1963), in which he vividly portrayed people who travel every day from the rural area to the cities for work. Krsto Skanata and Stjepan Zaninovic marked the early documentary production in Serbia and became known by challenging the themes that concerned the consequences of World War II. Krsto Skanata approached his subjects in the style of direct cinema. He tried to follow the path of the truth and make films that would reveal the essence of the problem. At the same time, he was smart enough to nuance his approach in such a way that censors would accept and approve the film. One of his first films, In the Shadow of Magic/U senci magije (1955), uncovers the deep backwardness in socialist Yugoslavia. His film First Case—a Man/Prvi padez—covek (1964) addresses the human dignity of a miner who loses his arm and has to struggle on his own. Soldier, At Ease!/Ratnice, voljno! (1966) focuses on the tragedy of a soldier who fought in the war and believed in a certain ideology that he later realised was false. Skanata's style was straightforward and analytical. Stylistically, the films were often made in a traditional manner. His reputation allowed him to challenge all sort of subjects, those that were pro-regime as well as those that questioned the justice of it. The films Terrorists/Teroristi (1970) and 12 Months of Winter/12 Meseci zime (released 1983, shot 1971) were banned from public screening in certain parts of Yugoslavia and only released later on.

Another author who dealt with revolution and the indebtedness of those who survived toward those who fell for freedom is Sjepan Zaninovic. His first big success was the film Messages/Poruke (1960), which revived the ideals of people who inscribed graffiti on the walls of the war prisons during World War II. His film The Dialogue of Comrades on a War Photo/Dijalog drugova sa ratnog fotosa (1968) portrayed the destinies of freedom fighters and of those who disappeared after the war in the post-revolutionary madness. Zika Ristic from Bosnia and Herzegovina produced remarkable documentaries both in quantity and quality. The best ones are The Barge-Steerers of the Drina/Splavari na Drini (1951), an exciting ode to humanity's struggle against nature; Yet—a City/Ipak jedan grad (1966), a satirical commentary on bureaucracy; and Helmets/Sljemovi (1967), an engaged essay on war and peace. In the embrace of Bosna Film, later on Sutjeska, many documentary enthusiasts gathered in Sarajevo and created dozens of inspiring films.

In Croatia, a director who introduced a new approach in treating small, everyday subjects was Kreso Golik. His film From 3 to 22/Od 3 do 22 (1966) follows a working mother through her exhausting daily activities. Through the destiny of an individual, Golik portrays the socialist society in many of its dark shades. This sharp and visually strong documentary is even today one of the most powerful ever made in Yugoslavia.

A director from the younger generation, Krsto Papić mastered portraying the mentality of the tough people from the robust area of Herzegovina. When My Knife Strikes You/Kad te moja cakija ubode (1968) deals powerfully with murderers who confess their crimes which were often triggered for trivial reasons. Following the cinéma vérité style, Papić treats every issue quite critically, giving a profound analysis of the social milieu. Special Trains/Specijalni vlakovi (1972) is a socially and politically engaged film that observes the consequences of the huge workers' emigration that took place in Yugoslavia during the 1960s and 1970s, when hundreds of thousands of people went to work in West Germany.

One of the most profound documentary makers in Croatia is Petar Krelja, who devoted his whole opus to people on the margins of society, uncovering the daily lives of those who seem to be merely a statistic in social research (see the entry for Petar Krelja).

During the movement in the early 1970s known as the Croatian Spring, a short period of liberalisation, Krelja dared to make some documentaries that went beyond the Communist Party norms, and three of his films were banned. This was the time of national 'awakening', with attempts to political and cultural decentralisation toward the different Republics of Yugoslavia. It was the struggle for a more liberal socialism—'socialism with a human face'.

As a reaction to these tendencies, the existing political establishment forbade many filmmakers from continuing with their projects. President Tito reacted severely, and many film authors had a hard time returning to their previous positions.

The Serbian director Željimir Žilnik suffered a similar fate. His June Turmoil/Lipanjaska gibanja (1969), which depicted student demonstrations, was banned. Žilnik, who took an active part in a cultural movement in fiction film called Black Wave, was considered by the authorities as a dangerous, provocative political rebel, and many of his films were banned; however, he was highly appreciated for his directness and visually expressive film language by the film critics at home and abroad. The film The Unemployed/Nezaposleni ljudi (1968) received the Grand Prix at the Oberhausen Festival but was criticised at home on ideological grounds, along with Freedom or Cartoons/Sloboda ili strip (1972), which was banned.

At the same time, a younger generation of filmmakers became influenced by film trends in the West and became more intrigued by film aesthetics than political issues. Zoran Tadić made sophisticated documentaries about human solitude. His films Last Post Station Donji Dolac/Zadnja posta Donji Dolac (1971), Friends/Druge (1972), Plaits/Pletenice (1974), and Festivity/Derneck (1975) were made with an ascetic constraint and minimalism, but emphasised the intimacy of the human stories. His profoundly composed visual miniatures were odes to the values of a simple lifestyle.

Nikola Babić became known for his visually powerful analysis of human nature. His films Sije (1970), Vox Populi (1970), Bino, Seagull's Eye/Bino, oko galebovo (1973) were cinematically intriguing studies of people's mentalities.

Meanwhile, in Serbia, apart from Skanata, Zaninović, J. Zivanović, and M. Strbac, a group of film enthusiasts gathered around Dunav Film and started to make more exciting and fresher documentaries. Italian film critics in 1966 named the style of the new authors Sarajevo's Documentary Film School. Most of these directors later went into fiction film, but at that time Aleksandar Petrović, Purisa Djordjević, Dusan Makavejev, and later Petar Lalović and Aleksandar Ilić introduced a contemplative, philosophical, and cinematically thrilling approach in treating reality. Filmmakers tried to avoid the traditional narrative structure and followed an unconventional way of storytelling, characterised by poetic, rather surrealist inputs. Some of them, such as Makavejev, were able to perform intriguing twists in treating politically and socially sensitive issues. The Parade/Parada (1962) portrays one of the socialist-populist marches with humour and hidden sarcasm.

Two directors who gained a special place in the documentary scene are Vlatko Gilic and Zivko Nikolic. Both were born in Montenegro, lived in Belgrade and were often concerned with aspects of life in their home country such as rigid traditionalism, suppression of women, and the tough life in the hilly, deserted areas. What made their work special was a strong personal imprint in crossing borders of film genres and mixing the real and surreal. Their contemplative films, characterised by specific moods and atmospheres, were transforming the documentary starting point at a metaphorical level.

In Gilic's film In continuo (1971), the focus is on a slaughterhouse, transmitting the metaphor of human destiny toward killing and bloodshed. In his Love/Ljubav (1973), there is an ordinary meeting of a wife and husband during a lunch break that gets elevated to an ode to pure love. During the 1980s Zivko Nikolic was even more radical in breaking the conventions of fiction and documentary. He would recreate a whole mysterious world out of a small documentary element. With few words and a minimalist soundtrack, Nikolic's visuals, carefully created in many layers, invoke a philosophical discourse on life. Ane (1980) portrays the world of a woman who is patiently waiting for her husband, a sailor. The Builder/Graditelj (1980) speaks of a man who builds houses for others but does not have one himself. Marko Perov (1975) creates the world of an old dying man who observes life around him. A Stamp/Biljeg (1981) is a powerful, ironic work on the society in which a hydrocentre is erected in an area where there is no water.

In Macedonia the most remarkable documentary maker was Stole Popov, whose films Australia, Australia (1976) and Dae (1979) spoke eloquently about the pain and nostalgia of Macedonians abroad and of the Gypsy minority at home, respectively. In Slovenia, the most intriguing author was Dusan Povh, whose film Three Monuments/Trije spomeniki (1958) evokes poetical memories of World War II. Milan Ljubic, Filip Robar Dorin, and Frantisek Cap also made films that merged political and social ideas.

The years after the death of President Tito (1980) brought a certain degree of disobedience and rebellion. Some political issues were more directly addressed; others, not being previously touched at all, were now courageously depicted. Zaninovic stirred the public with the documentary The Case of Dr Milos Zanko/Slucaj dr Milosa Zanka (1987), in which he anticipated the decay of Yugoslavia. Some politically radical directors appeared again on the documentary scene, such as Želimir Žilnik, Lordan Zafranovic, Joca Jovanovic, Petar Ljubojev, and, from the younger generation, Nikola Lorencin, Nenad Puhovski, Selamu Tarku, Mirjana Zoranovic, Želimir Gvardiol, Miroslav Mandic, Vuk Janic, Vladimir Perovic, Momir Matovic, and Milan Knezevic. Their films dealt with social and political changes, emigration, injustice, and people's dissatisfaction.

In 1991 and 1992 peaking conflicts led to war and the final split of Yugoslavia into five independent states. Although the cinema industry was heavily hit both by the transitional structural socioeconomic processes and by poverty caused by war, documentary filmmaking was still alive and very vivid. Each of the new states focused on making documentaries in favour of their national policy, justifying the deeds of military and political authorities. Alongside more or less hidden propaganda films made during the period of war (1991–5) and the time of transitional crises (1991–9), some valuable documentary pieces were also created.

Because with the fall of the country only Serbia and Montenegro retained the name Yugoslavia, the following sections do not concern the independent states of Croatia, Slovenia, Bosnia and Herzegovina, and Macedonia, but only documentary production in the new Yugoslavia.

In Serbia, production was mostly television-orientated, with many attempts by small producers to create relevant works. Dozens of new companies appeared, but only a few made an impact and survived. One of the most ambitious is Film Focus, led by Miroslav Bata Petrovic, who made interesting, often humorous comments on the turbulent reality, as well as giving others a chance to make these kinds of films. The independent media group B 92, besides radio and television production, indulged itself in the production of meaningful documentaries. Belgrade Follies (1997), directed by feature film director Goran Markovic, is a shocking and disturbing documentary about people's anger towards Milošević's regime. His next feature-length autobiographical documentary, Serbia, Year Zero/Srbija, godine nulte (2001) is a rather moving self-analysis of the responsibility of those who witnessed the tragedy of Yugoslavia, made in a personal and quite humorous style. Goran Radovanovic is one of the Belgrade-based authors who found support abroad and managed to make several daring and intriguing films. Both My Country—For Internal Use Only/Moja domovina—za unutrašnju upotrebu (2000) and Otpor! The Fight to Save Serbia/Otpor! Borba za opstanak Srbije (2001) were critical of the regime of that time. His last feature-length documentary, Casting! (2003), speaks of the devaluation of moral values among youngsters in today's Serbia.

In Montenegro, one of the rare directors who continued from the 1980s onwards is Momir Matovic. He stayed faithful to his personal, special style of nonnarrative, non-verbal documentary impressions of life. The Last Cinema Screening/Posljednja bioskopska predstava (1993) portrays a cinema freak who walks dozens of kilometres every day to go to the cinema. The String of Life/Zica zivota (1996) depicts the sober, ascetic lifestyle of villagers far from civilisation. Similar in approach is another Montenegro-born director working in Serbia, Vladimir Perovic, who often, like Matovic, expresses political criticism in a hidden way. His films The Guard/Cuvar (2002) and Vanishing/Nestajanje (2003) are made without words. They focus on people who lead lonely lives in an absurd society, guarding a factory that does not work or going to a school that has only one student.

After the fall of the former Yugoslavia, the five new states that used to logistically depend upon each other before the war had to learn how to survive on their own in the film world. The political conflict created an atmosphere of non-collaboration and hostility which only started to diminish in around 2000. Economical crises in all of the new states caused a lack of money for independent productions, and the possible solution lies in cooperation with Western European funds, as well as in the reconstruction of the previous cultural liaisons between the different states of the former Yugoslavia.

RADA SESIC

Yugoslavia: Death of a Nation

(UK, MacQueen and Mitchell, 1995)

More than 200 documentaries have been made on the topic of Yugoslavia's break-up in the 1990s. Among those, Yugoslavia: Death of a Nation (1995) remains probably the best known, commonly perceived as a film in which 'the facts are allowed to speak for themselves, and responsibilities are made clear' (Cohen 1995).

The international television coproduction was realised by the London-based Brian Lapping Associates, a production company specialising in current affairs, including documentaries on the Falklands War, the Gulf War, South Africa, as well as the acclaimed series on the end of the Soviet Union, The Second Russian Revolution (1992). Producer Norma Percy has to her credit a number of documentaries dealing with controversy and conflict, ranging from the US Watergate scandal to the Israeli-Arab troubles, and including works on Algeria, China, and Northern Ireland.

Death of a Nation was completed in 1995 and broadcast in the United Kingdom and Europe in the autumn (after the Srebrenica massacre had taken place) and in the United States (Discovery Channel) during Christmas week. It also played in the former Yugoslav republics. An accompanying book, by journalists Laura Silber (who had acted as a consultant) and Allan Little, was also published, to make for a complete study pack. Lesson plans, containing clips from the film and excerpts from the book, are available on study websites supported by The Guardian newspaper and the Discovery Channel.

The film tells the story through well-selected footage and features numerous interviews with various parties in the conflict. It follows a chronological approach, tackling the crisis by beginning with the early Kosovo troubles, and structuring the story around the 1987 rise of Milošević to political leadership. From this narrative point of view, it then gives accounts on the break-up of Slovenia, Croatia, and Bosnia. In five hour-long segments (The Cracks Appear, Descent into War, The Collapse of Unity, The Gates of Hell and No Escape), it attempts to present a systematic account of the reasons and responsibilities for the country's violent break-up. It makes use of a large variety of documentary sources and features interviews with most of the main Yugoslav players. Even though issues of Western involvement in the conflict are not addressed explicitly, a number of Western diplomats are also interviewed. The result is a convincing account of the claims, misunderstandings, and reactions of the main actors, presented within an absorbing narrative revealing how the recent tensions mounted. Although historians questioned some of the choices, the overall recognition was that the book and the documentary had granted to all sides the opportunity to speak, thus making the bias negligible and remaining an 'accessible guide to the immediate causes and the detailed course of the wars' (Stokes, Lampe and Rusinow 1996: 147).

Norma Percy has stated that, above all, she is interested in 'how big decisions are made'.

A leading principle in her approach is to stress the role that individuals play in the story by securing interviews with key players, aiming to have them experience a 'catharsis on camera'. 'Things are generally dictated by a few people or one man', she said, '[s]o we try to speak to everyone involved, which is a very good research technique, in that you check statements against each other' (quoted in Cohen 1995). During the preproduction period, a series of informal interviews were carried out, allowing identification of the major themes that were also to be researched. Later, the filmmakers returned for filmed interviews, during which the same question was often put to the interviewees, particularly to those who were known to have been involved in a key situation. For example, both Milošević and Tuđman were questioned about their alleged 1991 meeting over the division of Bosnia between Serbia and Croatia, both presenting twisted and evasive accounts.

Background researchers looked through hundreds of hours of archival material. Michael Simkin's discovery of a forgotten reportage showing Milošević's notorious visit to Kosovo in 1987 became one of the best-known images related to Yugoslavia's break-up. A wealth of videotaped events was made available to the filmmakers in all republics (for example, unused footage of atrocities in the town of Zvornik by Arkan's paramilitary Tigers, was found in Reuters' Belgrade office). According to director Paul Mitchell, the warring parties filmed most events 'because they believed they would thus be able to show who had allowed Yugoslavia to be destroyed' (quoted in Cohen 1995).

The film enjoyed wide international acclaim. However, it also became the subject of criticism, raising questions of a wider theoretical nature regarding the function of documentary film as historical record.

Talking of the film, political scientist Susan Woodward (1997) identified three problematic consequences of what she described as 'journalistic dominance' and its 'insidious influence for historical scholarship': first, the leading 'role of narrative in shaping perceptions of the war'; second, 'the ahistorical character of these narratives that, ironically, seem almost obsessed with identifying these conflicts as historical'; and third, the use of a 'personalized "source" as primary evidence'. In Death of a Nation, she noted, facts that did not fit the narrative had been frequently ignored, and similar events had been recorded with different sympathies in different parts of the country. These seemingly minor inaccuracies, Woodward argued, were accountable for the most serious troubles. She criticized the film for taking nationalism out of its concrete politicoeconomic context, for misunderstanding and misreporting the blank-labelled 'Titoist period' and its immediate aftermath, and for selectively paying attention to nationalist tendencies and outcomes. The causes of nationalism, she claimed, could never be correctly identified if they were only explained by referencing incidents of 'rising nationalism' (as seen in the use of Milošević's visit to Kosovo as a key historical event taken out of socioeconomic context). While putting together an absorbing narrative, the filmmakers had failed to trace the roots of nationalism in the changes of domestic economic powers of the republics, in the controversial policies of the International Monetary Fund, and in the adverse impact that economic reforms had on employment and redistribution during the 1980s. Leaving those issues out meant that the film failed to identify the real factors behind the rise of nationalism, Woodward insisted.

As a current affairs documentary, Death of a Nation inevitably catered to the explanatory needs of the day. It explained the violence by referencing to select events and thus asserting certain causal links that brought most elements together in a plausible narrative. Deciding which images and events to use and which ones to lay to rest depended on the preferred narrative on Yugoslavia's break-up adopted by the filmmakers. The approach was premised on a belief that there is a direct causal link between the present-day state of things and concrete past events. However, which events precisely? In their interpretative endeavors, the filmmakers were compelled to highlight events that fell in line with the chosen explanatory framework, thus walking a dangerous tightrope between reconstruction and manipulation. While claiming that 'social sweep and history are not really our focus' (Percy quoted in Cohen 1995), the authors of the film extensively adjusted the complex picture of the past to fit the prevailing media interpretation of current events (Iordanova 2001).

The credibility of Death of a Nation was seriously questioned on at least one occasion. During the first trial at the International Tribunal for War Crimes in Yugoslavia at the Hague in 1996, British political scientist James Gow, who had acted as one of the film's consultants, was called in by the prosecution as an expert witness. In his testimony, Gow used excerpts from the film. In cross-examination, defense attorney Fons Orie questioned examples of incorrect translation of statements made during interviews (some by Milošević), and asked Gow to elaborate on his views of the difference between translation and interpretation. In response, Gow explained that the translations were a matter 'of the choice of a particular word which in this case, I think, made no substantive difference to the sense [...] it is important for the translator to interpret the sense which is intended to be conveyed by the speaker' (Gow in Tadic-Transcripts 2004: 577–8).

Using Death of a Nation as evidence set a precedent that was continued in The Hague with the use of other documentaries. In 2002, during opening statements at his trial, Slobodan Milošević screened excerpts of the BBC documentary Moral Combat (Alan Little, 2000) and the entire German film Es began mit einer Lüge/It Began with a Lie (Jo Angerer and Mathias Werth, 2002). This use of documentaries (as works that inevitably contain significant interpretative element) as evidence raises a range of further questions.

The troubles in Yugoslavia continued beyond 1995 and the country was in the news headlines on a continual basis. The well-known visuals of the Bosnian war and of Milošević's visit to Kosovo were continuously recycled by broadcasters. At the time of the Kosovo war in 1999, Death of a Nation was edited and played in a shorter version on the BBC, the narrative adjusted to stress the Kosovo aspects, creating a suitable background introduction to the continuing hostilities. The book and the film remain the most popular background material on the Yugoslav wars, thus making the chosen narrative line shape all further perceptions about the region.

DINA IORDANOVA

See also: Krelja, Petar

Yugoslavia: Death of a Nation (US/UK/France, BBC (UK), Canal+ (France), Discovery USA, ORF (Austria), VRPO (The Netherlands), RTBF (Belgium), SVT2 (Sweden), NRK (Norway), Danmarks Radio (Denmark), and ABC (Australia), 1995, 250 mins). Produced by Brian Lapping Associates (Norma Percy), London. Directed by Angus McQueen and Paul Mitchell. Narrated by Robin Ellis. Consultant Laura Silber.

Further reading

- Cohen, Roger, 'Covering All Sides in the Balkan War', in The New York Times, 24 December 1995, Section 2: 37.
- Gow, James, 'Testimony at Dusko Tadic Trial', Tadic-Transcripts, International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia, 2004: 534–78, available at www.un.org/icty/inde.htm (accessed 13 May 1996).
- Gow, James, Paterson, Richard and Preston, Alison (eds), Bosnia by Television, London: British Film Institute, 1996.
- Iordanova, Dina, Cinema of Flames: Balkan Film, Culture and the Media, London: BFI, 2001: 71–89.
- Silber, Laura and Little, Allan, The Death of Yugoslavia, London: Penguin Books/BBC Books, and New York: Penguin Books, 1995.
- Stokes, Gale, Lampe, John and Rusinow, Dennison, with Julie Mostov, 'Instant History: Understanding the Wars of Yugoslav Succession', in Slavic Review 55, no. 1, spring, 1996: 147.
- Woodward, Susan L., 'It Depends on When You Start the Story: Narratives as Camouflage and the Political Use of Scholarship on the Yugoslav Wars, 1991–96', paper presented at the workshop on 'Doing History in the Shadow of the Balkan Wars' Working Group on Southeast European Studies, University of Michigan, Ann Arbor, January 17–18, 1997.

Z

Zahn, Peter von

Having made more than one thousand films for television, Peter von Zahn is one of the legends of German TV history. He was one of the pioneers of the first trial operations of radio and television in Hamburg (NWDR), and he became the head of the text department as early as July 1945. His characteristic reportage style was very much influenced by Anglo-American journalism. He was sent to the United States by the NWDR as a result of conflicts with Chancellor Konrad Adenauer about his independent radio commentaries. There he started his TV reports, Berichte aus der neuen Welt/Reports from the New World in 1955. He reported with his typical, high-pressured voice about daily life and his family's experiences in this modern society. These stories set standards for reportage and documentary in early German television. His style was a mixture of the features that he had made for radio and the American style of reporting represented by Edward R. Murrow, Fred Friendly, and others. This style was primarily oriented to text and content and then looked for the images needed to illustrate it. It stands in sharp contrast to the newsreels and the cultural films of the Third Reich period, which concentrated strongly on the image and dynamic editing. His personal features, which were broadcast once a month, shaped the image of the United States in postwar Germany.

Beside the series Berichte aus der neuen Welt, von Zahn also created a series called Bilder aus der farbigen Welt/Images from the Colourful World, where he presented political topics from Africa, South America, and Asia and showed the clash between modern industrialization and traditional cultures. He built a worldwide network of journalists working for his own Washington-based company, Documentary Programs Inc. The idea was to report on the same topic from different countries and thus provide a deeper perspective. In October 1961 he started the weekly series Reporter der Windrose/Reporter of the Wind Rose and reported from different regions in the world to bring them into German homes. The idea was for audiences to learn about and see something of the countries and cultures outside of Europe. It was the first attempt at a regular broadcast on foreign affairs subjects. The goal was to analyze the structure of the societies in the modern world and to compare developments. The first program was titled People on the Move and presented case studies of people moving to the huge cities and political emigrants, as well as economic migration and holidays in sunny places. After one hundred and four programs and two years of intensive work, the stations decided to terminate the series and begin using their own foreign correspondents in different countries. Peter von Zahn also produced portraits of important statesmen like Ben Gurion, which brought him the Grimme Prize in 1964.

Besides shaping the documentary work of the SDR (Stuttgarter Schule), Peter von Zahn successfully established another journalistic style in German television, which was influenced by the radio essays and Anglo-American school of reporting. He produced many more films until 1993, when at 80 years of age, he decided to withdraw from active filmmaking but still published columns as a journalist and wrote his memoirs. He is seen as one of the pioneers and legends of German television.

Biography

Born January 29, 1913, in Chemnitz; grew up in Dresden. After working as a voluntary worker in a publishing house, began to study jurisprudence, history, and philosophy in Vienna, Jena, and Freiburg in 1931. 1939–45 soldier in World War II. After the war, worked for the British military station 'Radio Hamburg' and became one of the pioneers of the Northwest German Radio (NWDR). 1948–51 head of the Düsseldorf studio of NWDR. 1951–60 American correspondent for the NWDR, first only in radio, then from 1955 onward for TV as well. Founded own company, Documentary Programs Inc., in Washington. Back in Germany, founded own production company, Windrose Film- und Fernsehproduktion GmbH in 1960 and Anatol AV und Filmproduktion GmbH in 1976; worked as director, author, and producer until 1996. Died July 26, 2001 in Hamburg.

Selected films

- 1955 Bilder aus der Neuen Welt/Images from the New World: director, script
- 1961 Bericht aus der farbigen Welt/Images from the Colourful World: director
- 1961 Reporter der Windrose/Reporter of the Wind Rose: producer, director
- 1963 Windrose der Zeit/Wind Rose of Time: director
- 1970 Die Kuba-Krise 1962/The Cuba Crisis 1962: director
- 1974 Die geheimen Papiere des Pentagon/The Secret Papers of Pentagon: director
- 1976 Fünf Prüfungen des Oberbürgermeisters—Konrad Adenauer/Five Examinations of the Mayor—Konrad Adenauer: script
- 1993 Shalom Dresden: director
- 1996 Beobachtungen im Ruhrgebiet I & II/Observations on the Ruhr Area I & II: script, director

Further reading

- Zahn, Peter von, Stimme der ersten Stunde. Erinnerungen 1913–51, Stuttgart, 1991.
- Reporter der Windrose. Erinnerungen 1951–64, Stuttgart, 1994.
- 'Reporter der Windrose', in Heinz B. Heller and Peter Zimmermann (eds), Blicke in die Welt. Reportagen und Magazine des nordwestdeutschen Fernsehens in den 50er und 60er Jahren, Konstanz, 1995: 117–25.

— Bilder aus der farbigen Welt, in Strategie der Blicke. Zur Modellierung von Wirklichkeit in Dokumentarfilm und Reportage, Dieter Ertel and Peter Zimmermann (eds), Konstanz, 1996: 177–82.

Zimmermann, Peter, 'Beruf Reporter. Ein Interview mit Peter von Zahn', in Heinz B. Heller and Peter Zimmermann (eds), Blicke in die Welt. Reportagen und Magazine des nordwestdeutschen Fernsehens in den 50er und 60er Jahren, Konstanz, 1995: 127–40.

Zetterling, Mai

A pioneering feminist filmmaker noted for her social consciousness, Mai Zetterling made psychologically complex films in the latter half of her career that challenge various orthodoxies (religious, sexual, ideological) and exhibit a pessimistic, sometimes bleak, worldview familiar to fans of her more famous compatriot, Ingmar Bergman. Although a product of the same industrial/artistic complex in which Bergman and earlier luminaries of Swedish cinema (such as Victor Sjöström, Mauritz Stiller, and Gösta Werner) came into being, Zetterling evinces in her work a more modern take on heterosexual relationships and institutionalized forms of injustice.

This can be partly attributed to her exposure, both direct and indirect, to a wide variety of cultures and lifestyles throughout the world before the actress's mid-career makeover as a writer-director. Indeed, it was during her years spent abroad as an actress working primarily in British and American film that she first came to inhabit the worlds of spiritually dispossessed and emotionally estranged women—roles that would prove substantive for her own controversial forays into Freudian-Marxist territory. Any attempt to sort through the major themes of Zetterling's work behind the camera should therefore take into account her many onscreen appearances across a range of internationally diverse productions, from her countrymen's angst-ridden social dramas of the 1940s to the English-language potboilers in which she starred during the 1950s. While critics often remarked on the actress's charm and beauty (her blue eyes and blonde hair were apparently made for Technicolor), these stereotypically Swedish traits were matched by a rigorous intelligence and devotion to philosophical inquiry, key elements of her stark black-and-white films.

After training at Stockholm's Royal Dramatic Theater and starring in such plays as Ella Wilcke's En sommar på egen hand/A Summer of One's Own (1941), the sixteen-year-old Swede made her screen debut in the swash-buckler Lasse-Maja (1942). Her most famous early starring role was Bertha, the teenage girlfriend of a school pupil in Alf Sjöberg's Hets/Torment (1944). With a plot that sounds reminiscent of those peppering Zetterling's own oeuvre, the film explores Bertha and Jan-Erick's titular feelings of anguish, which spring from the latter's sadistic teacher (whose own torment drives him to rape and murder the young girl).

After winning international acclaim for her role in Hets, which gave the nineteen-year-old actress the opportunity to betray a mature understanding of the cruelties that people inflict on others, Zetterling continued acting in Swedish films (including Gustaf Molander's domestically successful Nu Borjar Livet/We Live Now (1948) and Ingmar Bergman's Musik i mörker/Night is My Future (1948)), making the occasional trip to London to appear in such films as Basil Dearden's Frieda (1947). This latter film, which concerns an immigrant woman residing in England during the postwar period, contains autobiographical elements impossible to ignore, for by this time in her career Zetterling was oscillating not only between stage and screen but also between two countries, with England becoming her temporary residence after she signed on with the Rank Organisation. This British film company was intent on molding her into an international star, although the spate of melodramas and crime thrillers in which she appeared did little to further this goal. Throughout the 1950s, a period of economic uncertainty and upheaval for the British film industry, many of Zetterling's star-vehicles were box office failures; however, in tackling a multitude of roles in low-budget films, and by eventually gravitating away from Rank, she was able to expand her acting repertoire to accommodate different ethnicities and cultural backgrounds (playing everything from a French exchange student in Edmond T. Greville's The Romantic Age (1949) and an exploited prima ballerina in Val Guest's Dance Little Lady (1954), to a murder suspect in Marc Allégret's Blackmailed (1951)). Significantly, she played numerous German roles throughout this period, from the frowned-upon war bride of a British RAF officer in Frieda, to Hildegard, the amnesiac object of a German professor's fatherly desire, in Portrait from Life (1948). Whether in these British films or in such Hollywood fare as A Prize of Gold (1955), a drama about a war refugee dedicated to saving a group of German orphans, Teutonic themes and iconography frequently congealed around the Swedish actress as cross-cultural signifiers of her uncanny 'otherness'.

By the early 1960s Zetterling had become increasingly dissatisfied with her acting career and was seeking opportunities to step behind the cameras. Given the green light by Roger Moorfoot of the BBC, she directed numerous shorts for television, including The Polite Invasion (1960), concerning Swedish immigration; Lords of Little Egypt (1961), about the Gypsies at St Maries-de-la-Mer; The Prosperity Race (1962), which delves into the emerging sense of affluence and entitlement among the Swedish middle class; and Do-It-Yourself Democracy (1963), her look at social and political concerns unique to Iceland. Among this BBC batch, her antiwar short, The War Game (1961), stands out not only because it garnered the Golden Lion award at the 1963 Venice Film Festival, but, more importantly, because of its satirical take on the way violence (here represented by a toy gun) snakes surreptitiously into childhood.

Five years after her divorce from dance choreographer Tutte Lemkow, Zetterling wed director and screenwriter David Hughes. Their marriage, which lasted from 1958 to 1979, was mutually nourishing as a source of cinematic inspiration and collaboration. The two codirected a half-dozen films, beginning with the flashback-laden literary adaptation Ålskande par/Loving Couples (1964) and ending with a ten-minute episode for the omnibus feature Visions of Eight (1972–3), entitled The Strongest. These two films bookend an extremely fertile period in Zetterling's career, one that witnessed not only a stylistic maturation but also a developing sense of the struggles historically faced by women from various social and cultural backgrounds. Fed into her introspective narratives are images of loneliness and obsession—themes that, as biographer Louise Heck-Rabi argues, permeate her filmography and filter into the director's vested interests in feminism. Although these motifs are primarily reserved for her nondocumentary work—most notably Doktor Glas (1968), the pessimistic story of a physician driven to murder by his insatiable desire for a pastor's nonreciprocating wife, and Nattlek/Night Games (1966), a notoriously provocative examination of what polite society deems sexually perverse (incest, orgies, masturbation) and corporeally abject (vomiting, childbirth)—one can detect analogous themes percolating throughout her nonfiction films as well. For instance, Vincent the Dutchman, her 1971 color documentary about Vincent Van Gogh, pivots on isolation and obsession, customary states of mind for the notoriously tormented and introspective painter.

After making Vincent the Dutchman for British television, Zetterling was approached by producer David Wolper and asked to contribute an episode to the multi-director documentary Visions of Eight. Appropriately entitled The Strongest, this segment—which playfully deconstructs the men's weightlifting competition at the 1972 Olympic Games in Munich and provides yet another glimpse of the filmmaker's interest in man's peculiar fixations—finds her tapping into her own strengths as a satirist, as well as a technical virtuoso attuned to the short-film format. In the wake of Visions of Eight came even more documentary shorts. These run the gamut from a tour of the city of Stockholm to a hagiographic piece on tennis legend Stan Smith. Zetterling's frequent forays into nonfiction filmmaking throughout the 1970s suggest that she, like the narrator of her 1976 novel Bird of Passage, was becoming 'a creature of habit', sensitive not only to each day's 'particular rhythm' (Zetterling 1976: 102), but also to the guiding spirit of documentary investigation—its purported pursuit of truth and ontological grounding in reality.

With the publication of Bird of Passage, Zetterling had already begun making a name for herself as an accomplished novelist and essayist, pursuits she had begun a decade earlier when her book, Night Games, was unleashed on an unsuspecting public. A passage from that 1966 novel—'One concentrates on one's perversions to get rid of that greasy film of boredom that has begun to form on everything and everyone one knows' (Zetterling 1966: 30)—might just as well have been included in her 1985 autobiography, All Those Tomorrows, so indicative is it of Zetterling's own modus operandi. That she became even more focused on the 'perversions' of modern life during the 1980s that she continued to zero in on the tormented psyches of women in such films as Scrubbers (1982), a reform school/prison drama, and Amorosa (1986), a documentary-like biopic concerning the short, scandal-ridden life of Swedish novelist Agnes von Krusenstjerna (the author on whose work Zetterling's first feature, Älskande par, was based), is a testament of her lifelong dedication to feminist concerns. By the time she succumbed to cancer in London on March 17, 1994, Zetterling had amassed a staggering body of work, the legacy and longevity of which secure her a pivotal place in film history.

DAVID SCOTT DIFFRIENT

See also: Visions of Eight

Biography

Born Mai Elizabeth Zetterling in Västerås, Sweden on May 24, 1925. Lived with her mother and stepfather in Australia from 1929 to 1932 before returning home and beginning a career in stage acting. After training at Stockholm's Royal Dramatic Theater and starring in such plays as Ella Wilcke's En sommar på egen hand (1941), made her screen debut in Lasse-Maja (1942). Continued acting in Swedish films throughout the 1940s and 1950s. Began directing shorts for television in the early 1960s. Married and divorced the dance choreographer Tutte Lemkow. Married director and screenwriter David Hughes in 1958. Divorced from Hughes in 1979. Died in London March 17, 1994.

Selected films

- 1960 The Polite Invasion: director
- 1961 Lords of Little Egypt: director
- 1961 The War Game: director, producer
- 1962 The Prosperity Race: director
- 1963 Do-It-Yourself Democracy: director
- 1971 Vincent the Dutchman: codirector (with David Hughes), producer
- 1973 The Strongest (episode in Visions of Eight): codirector (with David Hughes)
- 1978 The Rain's Hat: director, editor

Further reading

- de Beauvoir, Simone, The Second Sex, New York: Vintage, 1989 reissue.
- Gilbert, Harriet (ed.), The Sexual Imagination: A Feminist Companion, London: Jonathan Cape, 1993.

- Heck-Rabi, Louise, 'Zetterling, Mai', in Amy L. Unterburdger (ed.), The St James Encyclopedia of Women Filmmakers, Farmington Hills, MI: Visible Ink Press, 1999.
- Kaplan, E. Ann (ed.), Feminism and Film, Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2000.
- McGregor, C., 'Mai is Behind the Camera Now', The New York Times, April 30, 1972.
- Meyer, Donald B., Sex and Power: The Rise of Women in America, Russia, Sweden and Italy, Middletown, CT: Wesleyan University Press, 1987.
- Waldman, Diane and Janet Walker (eds), Feminism and Documentary, Minneapolis, MN: University of Minnesota Press, 1999.
- Zetterling, Mai, Night Games, New York: Coward-McCann, Inc., 1966.
- Shadow of the Sun, New York: Vintage, 1975.
- Bird of Passage, New York: Vintage, 1976.
- All Those Tomorrows, Grove Press, 1985.

Zielke, Willy

Willy Zielke is one of few German filmmakers notable for having done avant-garde work during the National Socialist, or Nazi, era in Germany. His work is exemplary for many. After a visionary start in the 1920s, his career stagnated under National Socialism, and he enjoyed only modest success in the new Federal Republic.

Zielke originally worked as a photographer. In 1929 he presented a series of studies at the pioneering film and photography exhibition (FiFo) in Stuttgart, which established photography as a serious art form worthy of respect and brought attention to Zielke's concern with objectivity.

In 1931 Zielke experimented with film. Critics praised the original camera tricks and the unusual settings of his unfortunately forgotten first silent films: Bubi träumt (1931), München. Willy Zielke zeigt eine Stadt (1931), and Anton Nicklas, ein Münchner Original (1932).

In 1932 Zielke shot his first contracted work (without pay), a socially engaged short film with the title Arbeitslos—Das Schicksal von Millionen/Unemployed—The Destiny of Millions. Most of the actors were found at an unemployment office, and production costs were covered by donations from Munich factories. The film, which was influenced by the aesthetics of Brecht's proletarian theater, denounced unemployment as a hopeless, demoralized state of being. Assembled images and symbolic characters showed the influence of Zielke's photographic work, as well as the Constructivists, known for their cutting technique. After its debut performance on April 3, 1933, in the Atlantic Cinema in Munich, the film disappeared from public view.

In 1943 Zielke agreed to direct a longer, funded version of Arbeitslos—Das Schicksal von Millionen, changing the name of the film to Die Wahrheit/The Truth. The dominant figure in the newer version of the film is the idealized worker, who replaces the realistic portrait of the unemployed found in the first Arbeitslos. The workers enter empty factory halls in marching formation to the song 'Deutschland erwache' (Germany Awake). The passage from the Weimar Republic to the National Socialist regime is presented as the solution to the world economic crisis.

Until 1934 Zielke taught at the Bayerischen Staatslehranstalt. He left his academic position to devote himself entirely to filmmaking. He married Elfriede Weissberger and lived in Munich.

In July 1934 Zielke was asked to create a film with sound to mark the one hundredth anniversary of the German railway system. He wrote, directed, and did camera work for Das Stahltier/The Steel Animal, a title he chose himself. He did not follow the conventional pattern of such films by enumerating the steps of development. Rather, he mixed elements from feature films, documentaries, and experimental films to present his theme from multiple perspectives. Das Stahltier defies established aesthetic and generic conventions. This film is also influenced by the Russian Constructivist, as well as Brechtian theater.

Technical modernization is presented in the film as the superior means of modern social development. In the plot, a prospective engineer overcomes the initial suspicion and distrust of the workers, gaining their respect and trust. Zielke used railway workers, rather than actors, to play the roles of the workers. Close-ups of their expressive faces and gestures are reminders of Zielke's photographic background. Some scenes, which show the men working half-naked or wrestling, suggest a homoerotic element, at least when viewed today.

The financial backers of Das Stahltier were not pleased with the results, as the film was intended to promote train travel and use the opportunity of the one hundredth anniversary as an occasion for propaganda and advertisement. Das Stahltier was not approved for public screening. The film was shown at Walter Frentz's seminar for cinematic film at the Lessing faculty, the only public screening during the National Socialist regime.

Leni Riefenstahl attended the seminar and was impressed by Das Stahltier. She hired Zielke as a cameraman for her production company. Their first project together was made in 1935, and was called Tag der Freiheit! Unsere Wehrmacht! / Freedom Day! Our Army!, a film that was supposed to document Germany's military power on the occasion of the reintroduction of the armed forces.

Riefenstahl's Olympia Film GmbH asked Zielke to make the prologue to a film on the 1936 Olympic Games. Riefenstahl used the material shot by Zielke, but she cut a new prologue to the film, which he rejected. Their cooperative relationship ended in a quarrel.

In February 1937, Zielke was admitted into the University Hospital in Munich, with a diagnosis of schizophrenia. He spent the next five years in several psychiatric institutions and in the labor camp Herzogsägmühle in Bavaria. His diagnosis had drastic consequences, as his disease and prognosis were classified as 'genetically transmitted with no recovery' and, on the basis of this judgment, he was sterilized. Zielke suffered harsh treatment in numerous mental hospitals under the Nazi regime.

In 1942, Leni Riefenstahl arranged for Zielke's release. From 1944 until the end of the war in 1945, Zielke shot for Riefenstahl's Tief-land in Kitzbühel (Bavaria) and later in Prague. Riefenstahl, however, claimed she was unable to use the footage. She stated that she could not find any use for Zielke's material. During this period, Zielke married his second wife, Ilse.

Zielke suffered though a long period of sickness on his release from the mental hospitals, as a result of his treatment there. After working for Riefenstahl on Tief-land, he stopped working until 1952. He made a fresh start, under the name Viktor Valet, with a short film about the landscapes of Niederrhein, Verzauberter Niederrhein / Magic Niederrhein. The expressionist, structured imagery is highly reminiscent of the German silent film tradition.

Despite several small contracts with the innovative production company Gesellschaft für bildende Filme (GbF) in Munich, Zielke could barely support himself. He was consigned to do some takes for Schöpfung ohne Ende / Never-ending Creation, a film by GbF produced for the Bavarian factories. He ignored schedules and production specifications, and was considered difficult and uncooperative by his colleagues and assistants on the film.

Das Stahltier, long considered lost, resurfaced in France in 1953. The legal owner of the film, the now-called Deutsche Bahn AG, agreed to a public presentation after some of the more experimental scenes were edited out. Zielke saw this as a destructive infringement of his rights as a filmmaker. Nevertheless, in February 1954 the edited version was shown in Frankfurt am Main.

In 1956 Zielke made Verlorene Freiheit / Lost Freedom. The plot, which centers on a little blind girl's failed attempts to set a bird free, suggests a parallel with Zielke's situation and his sense of frustration at the restrictions placed on his creativity. Aluminium—Portrait eines Metalles / Aluminum—Portrait of a Metal, which appeared in 1957, was the last Zielke film to receive a public screening. The picture, produced by the GfB, traced the development of aluminum. The filmmaker's innovative use of color, light, and montage illustrate that, even at this late stage in his career, Zielke remained a creative artist.

In the 1960s Zielke accepted sporadic German/Russian translation projects, mostly under the name Viktor Valet. In 1962 he patented one of his technical shooting processes, the jalousie system (sun drape system).

During the last ten years of his life, Zielke enjoyed a renewed interest in his photography. He had an exhibition of his photography in Arles, France in 1982.

THOMAS TODE

See also: Riefenstahl, Leni

Biography

Born in Lodz, Poland, September 18, 1902. Relocated to Munich, 1921. Student at the Bayrischen Staatslehranstalt für Fotografie in Munich until 1926. Assistant in the portrait studio of Franz Grainer, Munich and Minya Dietz-Dührkoop, Hamburg, 1927. Member between 1928 and 1934 of the Gesellschaft Deutscher Lichtbildner (GDL). Assistant Professor at the Bayrischen Staatslehranstalt für Fotografie. Admitted to the Schwabing hospital because of a nervous breakdown, February 1937. Two months later, transferred to the psychiatric hospital Eglfing Haar (München), with a diagnosis of schizophrenia. In October, sent to the Wanderhof Herzogsägmühle work camp. Initiated a hunger strike and was committed to the Eglfing Haar psychiatric hospital from 1939 to 1942. Upon release, moved in with mother and uncle, and met Ilse, whom he later married. Resided in Berlin from 1961. Moved to Lichtenberg 1969. Died September 16, 1989, Hannover, Lower Saxony, West Germany.

Selected films

- 1931 Bubi träumt
- 1931 München. Willy Zielke zeigt eine Stadt
- 1932 Anton Nicklas, ein Münchner Original
- 1933 Arbeitslos—Das Schicksal von Millionen
- 1934 Die Wahrheit
- 1935 Das Stahltier
- 1953 Verzauberter Niederrhein
- 1956 Verlorene Freiheit
- 1957 Aluminium—Porträt eines Metalles

Further reading

- Cozarinsky, Edgardo (ed.), Resistance des images, tilages, sauegarde et restaurations dans la collection films de la Cinemateque francaise, Paris: Cinemateque française, 1996.
- Elsaesser, Thomas, Das Weimarer Kino—aufgeklärt und doppelbödig, Berlin, 1999.
- Graham, Cooper C., Leni Riefenstahl and Olympia, New York, 1986.
- Riefenstahl, Leni, Memoiren, Frankfurt/Main: Ullstein Verlag, 1996.
- Rother, Rainer, Leni Riefenstahl—Die Verführung des Talents, Berlin, 2000.
- Schöppe, Wilhelm Sch (Hg), Meister der Kamera erzählen, Halle/Saale, 1935.
- Wetzel, Kraft and Hagemann, Peter, Zensur: Verbotene deutsche Filme 1933–45, Berlin, 1978.
- Zielke, Willy, Technik des Bromöl-Umdruckes, Enzyklopädie der Photographie und Kinetographie, Heft 116, Halle Saale, 1931.
- (n)akt-Einführung in die Aktfotografie, n.d..

Zone, La

(France, Lacombe, 1927)

La Zone: au pays des chiffonniers/The Zone: The Rag-pickers' Country is a twenty-eight-minute documentary film about the rag-pickers and secondhand dealers of Paris. This historic trade allowed poor people to earn a meager living in the urban wasteland on the outskirts of the capital. La Zone belongs to the cluster of poetic documentaries with a social awareness made during the late 1920s, a dynamic period of filmmaking just before the arrival of sound film. It blends together different strands of French avant-garde, modernism, naturalism, and impressionism.

The film opens with chain mixes that set the scene and atmosphere about the 'unknown places' in our midst that the viewer is about to discover. An animated map of Paris demarcates the old fortifications surrounding the city. Beyond that point is a no-man's land, a material and psychological frontier between the city and its suburbs, an uncertain zone between two worlds that is as alien to the ordinary inner-city Parisian as a foreign land with unusual inhabitants. Its narrowness is visually conveyed by the opening's long shots of alleyways. What there is to discover here is the appalling living conditions of the poor in a shantytown only a stone's throw away from the last stop on the Métro.

The narrative structure of La Zone uses the time frame of one day in the city, which is also found in other films of the period, including Rien que les heures (Alberto Cavalcanti, 1926) and Berlin: Die Sinfonie der Großstadt/Berlin: The Symphony of a Great City (Walther Ruttmann, 1927). The final fade-out signals the end of the day, not the end of the story. The people who live in La Zone create a familiar social structure in their particular urban environment: working families, children playing, dogs and cats in alleyways, a lunch break on the job, neighbors chatting, street musicians and vendors, and the flea market, the 'commercial center' of La Zone. What underpins this recognizable setting is a realization of how some of them make a precarious living; they recycle what richer people throw away.

The film story follows the work day of a team, a woman and two men, as they begin their collection route in the early hours of morning before the garbage trucks pick up what still has some value: glass, paper, clothes, bread. It is an efficient working team, moving rapidly along the streets, foraging in the rubbish with their bare hands, and taking away what they find in a wheeled cart. They sell what can be recycled. There is also a 'lower caste' in the world of the chiffonniers—those who work the huge garbage piles and try to salvage what may have been missed once the trucks reach the city incinerator.

Georges Lacombe depicted a harsh reality of urban society that many would prefer to ignore altogether. He did so with empathy: the chiffonniers do useful work. There are also other people living in this parallel city, people who have lost everything. One is the former music hall singer, La Goulue, who has only memories to share, but who found shelter in La Zone.

The 1920s were a time of profound turmoil in European life and social conditions that were a consequence of years of war and revolution. It was also a time when new technologies were becoming facts of everyday life for the increasing urban masses—the radio, the automobile, the refrigerator. Despite this new way of life, old social problems and barriers persisted, aggravated by economic uncertainties and postwar migration. Poor immigrants, fleeing devastated Eastern Europe, arrived in Western Europe. Some were skilled workers, like the Polish miners who restarted the coal mines of northeastern France; however, many were unskilled, and some ended up joining the small army of social outcasts living and working, surviving at the geographical and social periphery of rich Parisian arrondissements.

Film audiences of the 1920s were increasingly attracted to exploration and ethnographic films. The camera could renew the discovery of the world and its peoples. These films were diverse; they could introduce traditional societies, as did Nanook of the North (Robert Flaherty, 1922), or present some technological challenge and travel adventure such as La Croisière noire (Léon Poirier, 1926), the Citroën expedition across Africa. Some films praised the colonial empire; others introduced a documentary point of view—Voyage au Congo (Marc Allégret, 1927)—at a time when reporter Albert Londres published his powerful indictment of colonialism. The subtitle of La Zone: Au pays des chiffonniers, introduces some ‘foreign’ locale, another ‘country’ subtly playing on words and depicting a disquieting world of its own.

Georges Lacombe (1902–90) was assistant director to René Clair. Like several filmmakers of his generation, he started with a short film, using basic equipment and taking advantage of his immediate urban surroundings. He looked at it with a curious and open mind. La Zone was his first and most accomplished essay in short documentary film, and it caught the attention of the cinematographic avant-garde of the 1920s.

Other films would later explore this universe on the margins of society and often include a subtext defending those who have been abandoned or humiliated (Aubervilliers, Eli Lotar, 1945). La Zone was not a militant film but a statement of fact revealing social implications, and Lacombe benefited from the specialized infrastructure—theaters, periodicals, and ciné-clubs—put in place during the 1920s to support avant-garde films.

La Zone: Au pays des chiffonniers has become a classic of the era and continues to be regularly scheduled in film retrospectives around the world. Its topic, its critical and social perspective, and its formal quality beautifully blending its realist content and impressionist images all contribute to its relevance in documentary film history, as well as in social history.

SUZANNE LANGLOIS

See also: Lacombe, Georges

La Zone: Au pays des chiffonniers (France, 1928, 35mm, 28 mins). Produced by La Société des films Charles Dullin. Directed by Georges Lacombe. Photography: Georges Périnal and D. Pierson. Filmed in Paris and its surroundings, along the city limits of the old fortifications, the municipal incinerator at Ivry, and the flea market at the Porte de Clignancourt.

Further reading

- n.a., 100 Années Lumière, Paris: AFAA Intermedia, 1989.
- n.a., ‘Dictionnaire du cinéma français des années vingt’, in François Albera and Jean A. Gili (eds), 1895 Revue de l’Association française de recherche sur l’histoire du cinéma 33, June 2001.
- Abel, Richard, French Cinema: The First Wave 1915–29, Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1984.
- Aitken, Ian, European Film Theory and Cinema. A Critical Introduction, Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press, 2001.
- Bordwell, David, French Impressionist Cinema: Film Culture, Film Theory and Film Style, New York: Arno Press, 1980.
- Ghali, Nouredine, L’Avant-Garde cinématographique en France dans les années vingt, Paris: Editions Paris Expérimental, 1995.

Index

Film titles in italics have an entry in the text.

7Up series 467, 950
12 photographers 21
15 866
17eme Parallèle, Le 246, 433
24 Hours or More 341
79 Springtimes of Ho Chi Minh (79 Primaveras) 35, 833–35
89 mm from Europe 581
273 Degrees below Zero 103
400 Million, The 262–64, 432, 496

A

A Almadraba Atuneira/The Tunny-Fishery 735
A Bartos Csálád/The Bartos Family 261
A bientôt j'espère/See You Soon, I Hope 269
A Cidade Qualquer/Just Another City 738
A Grammar of Film: An Analysis of Film Technique (book) 879–80
A hora de Norica/Hour of the News 113
A Ilha de Moraes 737
A Ilha dos Amores 737
A la découverte des Français/In Search of the French 267
A Lei da Terra/The Law of the Earth 737
A l'Est d'Eaton/East of Eaton 48
A Propos de Nice/On the Subject of Nice 266
A tout prendre/Take It All 139
Aarm wurd' ich nicht sagen 361
ABC (Australian Broadcasting Corporation) 54–55, 57
ABC del Etnocido/ABC of Ethnocide 529
ABC (US TV channel) 348–49, 491, 536, 766
Abel Gance: The Charm of Dynamite 18
Abel Gance: Yesterday and Tomorrow 17–18
Aboriginal dispossession films (Australia) 55
Abrego, Eugenio 169
Abril de Vietnam en el año del gato/April in Vietnam in the Year of the Cat 36
According to Arthur 594

Achbar, Mark 609
Achilleas 328
Act of God 18–19
Acting: Lee Strasberg and the Actors' Studio 496
Adalil 361
Adama/Earth 419
Adams, Ansel 892
Adato, Perry Miller 297–98
Addicted to Solitude 814
Adel, Shahaboddin 410
Adenauer, Konrad 1006
Adeus Macau 155–56
Adio Kerida 563
Adolescents, The (aka That Tender Age) 20–22
Adorno, Theodor 8
Adventurer, The 848
Aenigma, Est 330
Aero-Engine 226
Affiliated Film Producers 440
African Political Broadcasts 30
African Queen, The 22
Afrikaner Resistance Movement (AWB) 951
After Mabo 380–81
Agadati, Baruch 418–19
Age of Ignorance 49
Agee on Film (book) 22
Agee, James 22–23, 82–83, 207
Agelastos Petra/Mourning Stone 332
Agence France Press (AFP) 782
Aggeli, Gaye 330
Agland, Phil 24–25
Agnew, Spiro 828
Aguaespejo in granadino/Watermirror of Granada 871
Aguirre, der Zorn Gottes/The Wrath of God 363
Aichhholzer, Josek 62, 63
Air of Death 134
Airport 43
Akerman, Chantal 25–28
Akiri, Iwasaki 473

- 'Ako' (White Morning) 22
 Akomrah, John 28–30
 Al-dhakira al-khasba/Fertile Memory 673
 Al-Jazeera 675
 Al-Momia/The Night of Counting 676
 Alan King Associates (AKA) 884
 Alawiha, Borhan 673
 Aldin, Samir Jamal 898
 Aldri-Mer!/Never Again! 814
 Alekan, Henri 73
 Alexander, Donald 30–31
 Alexander Nevsky 80, 660
 Alfama, Velha Lisboa/The Oldest Lisbon 734
 Alfred 968
 Algar, James 561
 Ali, Muhammad 996–97
 Alk, Howard 444
 All That is Solid 380
 All the Way Up There 743
 All'armi siam fascisti/To Arms! We are Fascists
 428
 Allégret, Marc 32–34, 726, 970–71
 Allende, Salvador 75–76, 341–42, 527
 Allio, René 271
 Almadrabas/Trap-Nets 869
 Almond, Paul 47
 Alpine mountains 244
 Alt om min far/All About My Father 810
 Althans, Ewald 92–93
 Altman, Alberta 439–41
 Alumínio tis Ellados/Greek Aluminium 325
 Aluminium–Porträt eines metalles/Portrait of a Metal 1033
 Alvarez, Santiago 34–37, 526–27, 533, 689–90,
 739, 833
 Ayam!, Ayam!/The Days, The Days 671
 Am Siel/At the Sluice 681
 America Goes Over 83
 American Documentary Films 171
 American Dream 503
American Family, An 37–38
 American Film Institute (AFI)
 Blank, Les 99
 Brault, Michel 110
 Capra, Frank 146
 Huston, John 388
 American Frontier 223
 American Institute of Planners 171
 American Standoff 504
 Amiralay, Omar 676
 Amor, Mujeres y Flores/Love, Women and Flowers 769
 Amorosa 1031
 Amundsen, Roald 323, 811, 860
An Essay for the Dis-alienation of Blacks 275
Anagrams of Ideas on Art, Form and Film (book) 205
Anais Nin Observed 38–40
 Anatomie d'un rapport/Anatomy of a Relationship
 661
 Anatomy of Apartheid, The 905
 And the Dish Ran Away with the Spoon 991–93
 And the Pursuit of Happiness 598
 And Then the City was Born 776
 Anderson, Lindsay 40–41, 45, 251–52, 457, 948
 Anderson, Robin 57–58
 Ando, Tadao 47
 Ane 1024
 animation
 79 Springtimes of Ho Chi Minh 834–35
 Alvarez, Santiago 36
 Berlin: Symphony of a Great City, The 89
 Böttcher, Jürgen 105
 Burns, Ken 122–23
 Canada, French 137
 Canada, NFB 128
 City of Gold 130
 Germany 294–95
 Gertrude Stein: When This You See, Remember Me 297
 Hell Unlimited 360
 India 405
 Journey, The 461
 Koenig, Wolf 501
 LB7 533
 Litvak, Anatole 560
 Low, Colin 579
 Lye, Len 584–85
 Marker, Chris 612
 Romance of Transportation, The 501–2
 Thomson, Margaret, 906
 Why We Fight 1002
 World at War, The 1016
 ANFB (Australian National Film Board) 54, 65
Angel Pavement (book) 985
Angela: Portrait of a Revolutionary 42–43
 Angellini, Pier 429
 Angelopoulos, Theo 331
 Angelos' Film 261
 Angle Pictures 649
 Angola na Guerra e no Progresso/Angola: War and Peace 736
 Angry Boy 441
 Anka, Paul 502, 568–69
 see also Lonely Boy
 Années Déclit, Les 203
 Années, Les 80 27
 Ansara, Martha 241
 Ansiktenni skugga/Faces in the Shadows 813
 Anstey, Edgar 43–45, 227, 230–31, 377, 406, 816, 945
 Anthony, Susan B. 122
 Antonia: A Portrait of a Woman 303
 Antonio, Emile de 45–47, 397–99, 697, 824, 939
 Antonioni, Michelangelo 20, 161, 425, 427, 701
 Anzolo, Alfredo 525

- Apted, Michael 950
 Apocalypse Now 119, 353–55
 Apted, Michael 47–49
 Araya 526
 Arbeitslos-Das Schicksal von Millionen/
 Unemployed-The Destiny of Millions 1032
 Arcand, Denys 48–49
 Archangelsky Mujik 307
 Arche, Alte 59
 Ard Al-Saba/Land of Saba 676
 Arena besetzt/Arena Occupied 62
 Argentina 529–31
 Argument in Indianapolis 662
Ark, The 49–51, 951
 Armstrong, Louis 29, 451–52
 Army Film Centre (AFC) in India 401
 Army Film and Photographic Unit (AFPU) 107, 121
 Arraial do Cabo/Village of the Cable 112
 Arrival of a Train at a Station, A 400
 Arrival of a Train at the Station/L'arrivée d'un train en gare de la Ciotat 1014 Arroseur arrosé, L' 583, 1015 art of record 4–7
 Arteaga, Marcela 631
 Arthur, Elton 377
 Arthur Rimbaud, A Biography 210
 Artists Under the Big Top: Perplexed 498
 Aru kikanjoshi 030
 Aruanda 112
 As Armas e o Povo/Arms and the People 736
 As I Walk 438
 Asaltar de Cielos/Attach the Skies 875
 Ascenseur pour l'échafaud/Frantic 596
Ascent of Man, The 9, 51–52
 Ashihei, Hino 473
 Asia Film Company, The 157
 Asia Speaks 1017
 Associação Brasileira de Video Popular (ABVP) 113
 Association of Cinematograph and Allied Technicians (ACT) 101–2, 649–50 associative montage technique 593
 Atget, Eugene 115–16
 Athena/Athens 330
 Atlantean 415
 Atlantic Patrol 136
 Atlas Film Co. 101
 Attenborough, Richard 108
 Au carrefour de la vie/At the Crossroads of Life 889
 Au pays des mages noirs/In the Land of the Black
 Seers 783
 Au Pays de Georges Sand/In the Country of Georges Sand 234
 Au-delà des grilles 73
Aubervilliers 52–53, 267, 458
 Auden, W. H. 86, 179–80
 Audy, Michel 141
 Auf amol a Streik/Amol on Strike 62
 Aufsätze/Compositions 681
 August 421
 Aujourd'hui, dis-moi 28
 Australia
 A Big Country 55
 Camera Natura 125–26
 history 53–54
 independent broadcasters and dramatised
 documentary 55–56
 independent set-up (present) 56–58
 National Film Archive and Sound Collection 53
 National Library 54
 public broadcasting and documentary practice
 54–55
 Special Broadcasting Service 379
 Australian National Film Board (ANFB) 364
 Australian Sugar 53
 Austria
 Austro-Fascism/The Third Reich 1933–45 60–61
 film store 62
 globalization of documentaries 63–64 historical archaeology (present) 63
 Marshall Plan movie and 'documentary films'
 1945–65 61–62
 National Socialist Films 61
 new documentary film 62–63 origins 1895–1918 59–60
 war films 60
 'auteurist cinema' (Adolescents, The) 20
Autobiography of Alice B. Toklas, The (book) 298
 'autonomous art' 8
 Avec André Gide/With André Gide 32–33
 Avoda/Work 418
 Awakening Land of Israel, The 418
 Axelrod, Nathan 418
 Az örvény/Free Fall 261
- B
 Babilônia 2000 186
 Bach, J. S. 213
 Bach, Jean 321
Back of Beyond, The 54, 65–66, 364–65
 Back to God's Country 126
 Back-Breaking Leaf, The 130, 501
 Badgley, Frank 128
 Bahr, Fax 353–55
 Baka-The People of the Rain Forest 24–25
 Baker, Josephine 970
 Bakri, Mohamed 673
 Balázs, Béla 89
 Balcon, Michael 649
 Baldi, Gian Vittorio 20–21, 425
 Ballad of Crowfoot, The 131

- Ballantyne, Tanya 131, 140, 151
 Baloot/Acorn 409–10
 Bambini in Città/Children in Town 425
 Banditi a Orgosolo 822–23
 Bang Carlsen, John 66–67
 Banyan production house 991
 Baradinsky, Oscar 205
 Barbaneagra, Paul 775
 Barber, Chris 645–46
 Barclay, Barry 67–69
 Barker, Nicholas 952
 Barnes, Geoff 55
 Barnouw, Erik 173, 223, 367–69, 447
 Barry, Iris 172
 Barsam, Richard 225–26, 257
 Barta, Dona 775
 Barta, Tereza 776
 Barthes, Roland 228
 Baseball 122
Basic Training 69–70
 Basse, Wilfried 70–72
 Bastion Point: Day 507 637
Bataille du rail, La 72–73
 Bathrick, David 93
 Battaglia di Algeri, La/The Battle of Algiers 276
 Battleship Potemkin 649
 Battle of Algiers, The 9, 672
 Battle of Britain, The 1002
Battle of Chile, The 9, 75–77, 342, 528
Battle of China, The 77–78, 1002
 Battle of Dingjunshan, The 157
 Battle of East St Louis, The 194
Battle of Midway, The 78–79, 107
Battle for Our Soviet Ukraine, The 73–75
Battle of Russia, The 77, 79–81, 1002
Battle of San Pietro, The 81–83, 386
Battle of the Somme, The 4–5, 83–86, 953
 Battleship Potemkin 114, 115, 221, 430, 431, 559, 649, 703, 792, 942
 Bauernkrieg 518
 Baumblütenzeit in Werder 71
 Baur, Gabrielle 898
 Bazin, André 2–4, 12, 253, 487, 596, 599, 706
BBC: The Voice of Britain 86–87, 945
 BBC
 Anstey, Edgar 44
 Antonio, Emile de 46
 Ascent of Man, The 51–52
 Australia 55
 Blank, Les 99
 Community Programme Unit 964–65
 Craigie, Jill 188
 Developing World series 991–92
 documentaries 947, 949–50
 Dylan, Bob 218
 Empire Marketing Board 86
 Every Day Except Christmas 239
 Family, The 212
 Frontier, The 958
 General Post Office Film Unit 945
 Gold, Jack 306
 Graef, Roger 317
 Grange Hill 564
 Gray, John 820
 Greece without Columns 327
 Grierson, John 337
 history 947–50
 Hole in the Soul 594
 In the Company of Men 396–97
 In the Year of the Pig 399
 India 714
 Julien, Isaac 466
 Lapping, Brian, 532–34
 Longinotto, Kim 571
 MacDonald, Kevin 589
 Making of an Englishman, The 589
 Malle, Louis 714
 Mitchell, Denis 638–39
 Moral Combat 1027
 Myanmar 864
 Nazis, The: A Warning from History 669
 Pennebaker, D. A. 218
 Police 883
 public service remit 965
 Schlesinger, John 816
 Sense of Loss, A 830
 Signs of the Times 952
 Smoking Dogs 28
 Sorrow and the Pity, The 858
 Stewart, Charles 883–84
 Swallow, Norman 895
 Troubles We've Seen, The 925
 True Story of Lili Marlene, The 456
 Two Hours from London 188
 Vas, Robert 958–59
 Voigt, Andreas 968
 War Game, The 950, 973–75
 Watson, Paul 212
 World at War, The 1015
 Zetterling, Mai 1030
 BBC-Droitwich 981
 Be Safe or Be Sorry 711
 Beachell, Ches 130
 Beauty and the Beast 73
 Beckerman, Ruth 62, 63
 Beckett, Samuel 788
 Beddington, Jack 31
 BeDevil, 'Choo Choo Choo Choo' 644
 Before the Guests Arrive 66
 Befreier und Befriete 804
 Behar, Nina 775
 Behind the Rent Strike 951
 Behind the Spanish Lines 650
 Beijing Film Studio 159, 159–60

- Beirut in a Road Full of Apricots 675
 Beit Avi/My Father's House 419
 Belabbe, Boujad 672
 Belarmino 736, 738
 Belgian National Railroad Company 33
 Belgrade 1021
 Belgrade Follies 1024
 Belhiba, Fitouri 672
 Belly of an Architect, The 18
 Jean-Paul Belmondo 542
 Belmont, Charles 270
 Belovi/The Belovs 504
 Bemerkungen über den Rothirsch/Remarks on the Red Deer 882
 Ben-Gurion, David 419, 1028
 Benacerraf, Margot 526
 Benefit of Doubt 998
 Benegal, Shyam 402
 Benjamin, Walter 381
 Benn, Tony 974
 Benning, James 94
 Benoit-Lévy, Edmond 87
 Benoit-Lévy, Jean 87–88
 Bensimon, Jacques 133
 Berg, Bengt 811
 Berg der Schicksals/Mountain of Destiny 759
 Bergala, Alain 301
Berlin: The Symphony of a Great City 8, 89–90, 176, 226,
 294, 602, 605, 750, 809, 815, 855, 922, 1034
 Berlin-Fieber, Happening für Ada 701
 Berliner, Alan 90–92
 Berliner, Oscar 91
 Berlusconi, Silvio 656
Beruf: Neonazi 92–94
 Bessie My Man 429
 Betjemen, John 44
 Between Friends 107
 Be'Yerushalaim/In Jerusalem 420
 Beyond Genocide 404
 Bezjian, Nigol 675
 Bianchi, Sérgio 113
 Biberman, Herbert 802–3
Bibliographie internationale du cinéma et de la télévision
 (book) 641
 Biermanns, Wolf 291
 Big Blockade, The 148
 Big Country, A (Australia) 55
 Big Flame, The 949
 Biggar, Helen 359
 Bilder aus der farbigen Welt/Images from the Colourful World 1028
 Billops, Camille 249–50
 Biquefarre 787
Bird of Passage (book) 1031
 Birri, Fernando 526, 910
 Birth of a Nation, The 122
 Biscuit Eater, The 679
 Bitomsky, Harmut 94–97
 Bitter Melons 614
 Bitter Sweet 674
 Bjelke-Petersen, Joh 55
 Bjorn's Inferno 490
 Black Audio Film Collective 28, 347–48
Black Box BRD 97
 Black British Film movement 573
 Black Harvest 57
 Black is ... Black Ain't 765
 Black Legend 816
 Black Natchez 718
 Black Panthers 957
 'Black September' 966
 'Black series' (Polish documentaries) 103, 729
Black Skin, White Masks (book) 275
 Black, Stephanie 992–93
 Blagoslovite/zhenshchinu/Bless the Woman 795
 Bland vilder och vilda djur/Among Savages and Wild Animals 811
 Blank, Les 98–100, 118–20, 168, 201–2
 The Blitz 567
 Blitz, Jeff 878
 Blockade 1004
 Bloody May 866
 Blossoms of Fire 202
 Blow Job 977
 Blue Group (Japan) 448
 Blue Murder 55
 Blue Scar 188
Blue-Eyed 100–101
 Blunden Harbor 282–83
 Boat Leaving the Harbour/Barque sortant du port 1014
 Boca do Lixo/The Scavengers 186
 Bodywork 58
 Boiangui, Alexandru 776
 Bom Povo Português/Good Portuguese People 737
 Bombay: Our City 403
 Bond, Ralph 30, 101–2
 Bóni/Farmer 393
 Bonengel, Winfried 92–93
 Bonjour Capitaliste 62
Bonjour Cinéma (book) 265
 Bonne Année, La/Happy New Year 543
 Boomerang! 768
 Bordansky, Jorge 113
 Borge, Erik 812
 Borges, Jorge Luis 18
 Borinage 684
 Bosnia
 Honigman, Heddy 369–70
 Lapping, Brian 123
 Ljubic, Vesna 562
 Troubles We've Seen 925–26
 Yugoslavia: Death of a Nation 1026–27
 Yugoslavia (former) 1022, 1024–26

- Bossak, Jerzy 102–4, 728
 Bostan, Ion 775–76
 Bötcher, Jürgen 104–6, 290–93
 Boule de Suif 778
 Boulting, John 106–8
 Boulting, Roy 106–8, 121, 207
 Bouvier, François 141
 Bowie, David 47, 709
 Bowling for Columbine 237–38, 654, 772
 Boyd, Anne 58
 Bradbury, David 54, 56
 Brakhage, Stan 108–10
 Brando, Marlon 353
 Brasilianas 525, 616
 Brault, Michel 20–21, 110–12, 130, 138–39, 501, 725, 1008
 Braunberger, Pierre 705
 Brazil 112–14, 527, 530
 Brazza, ou l'épopée du Congo 727
 Bread 359
 Breaking the Silence: Truth and Lies 716
 Brecht, Bertolt 10, 95, 311, 377, 685, 687, 803
 Brel 780–81
 Brennan, Kevin 65
 Bresson, Robert 21
 Bricklayer, The 488
Bridge, The 114–15, 223, 430, 749
 Brief History of Erroll Morris, A 589
Brief History of Time, A (book) 659
 Bring on the Night 47
 Bringing them Home 55
 Brit Damim/Blood Covenant 419
 Britain Can Take It (London Blitz) 5–6, 14
 Britain Can Take It? 899
 Britain Expects 650
 Britain Prepared 953
 British Film Institute (BFI) 45, 338, 465, 958
 British Free Cinema movement see Free Cinema Movement
 British Instructional Films (BIF) 180, 822
 British Instructional studios 247
 British Realist Tradition 305
 British Visatone sound system 856
 Brito, Leonel 737
 Brittain, Don 130
 Britten, Benjamin 86, 101, 180, 688–89, 945
 Brockie, Jenny 55
 Brodsky, Benjamin 157
 Bronowski, Jacob 9, 51
 Bronson, Charles 76
Bronx Morning, A 115–16, 546
 Brooklyn Bridge, The 123
 Broomfield, Nicholas 11, 357–58, 951
 Brouillette, Richard 341
 Browning, Sally 55
 Brownlow, Kevin 18
 Bruch, Martin 64
 Brundage, Avery 968
 Brûles, Les/The Promised Land 138
 Brunei 863
 Brunel, Adrian 649
 Brutality in Stone 499
 Bu Shin Klaipan 866
 Buchanan, Donald 129
 Budrala, Dimitru 777
Bufo Marinus (Cane toad) 58
 Buil, José 630
 Bujold, Geneviève 111
 Buñuel, Luis 265, 514, 869
 Burch, Noël 116–18
Burden of Dreams 118–20, 202
Burma Victory 107, 120–22
 Burning Times, The 837
 Burns, Ken 122–24
 Buschmaenner Kalahari/Kalahari Bushmen 60
 Bush, George W. 654
 Butler, George 747
Bystander (magazine) 84
- C
- Cabel, Nicoale 776
 Cabinet of Dr Cagliari, The/Das Kabinett des Dr Cagliari 606
 Cabra Marcado para Morrer/Man Marked to Die 113, 530
 Caesar, David 58
Cahiers du Cinéma (journal) 415, 596, 660
 Calcutta 597, 713
 Calder, Angus 5
 Calinescu, Paul 775
 Callahan, Henry 345
 Callers of Kontu 57
 Calypso Dreams 992
Calypso Log (book) 185
 Cambodia 864
Camera Natura 125–26
 Caméra Oeil/Camera Eye 301
 Cameramen at War 585
 Campos, António 735, 737
 Canada
 Associated Screen News 128
 battle for Canadian screens 126–27
 Canadian Broadcasting Corporation 133
 Canadian Motion Picture Bureau 128
 Crawley films 128–29
 documentary explorers 127
 French 137–42
 introduction 126
 'make or buy'? 132
 NFB (National Film Board)
 aboriginal production 131
 Arcand Denys 48
 Brault, Michel 110

- Canada Carries On* series 136–37
 challenge for change 131, 151
Churchill's Island 169
 cinéma vérité 130–31
City of Gold 173–74, 579
 decentralization 131–32
 decline 132–33
 French Canada 137–42
 Grierson, John 128–29, 169, 337, 439, 768, 880
 Groulx, Gilles 340
 Koenig, Wolf 501–2
 labyrinth 130–31
 Legg, Stuart 537
 Leiterman, Douglas 541
Lonely Boy 568
 Low, Colin 579–80
 Macartney-Filgate, Terence 587
Manufacturing Consent: Noam Chomsky and the Media 1008
March of Time, The 610, 1017
Nanook of the North 666
 Nanouk Films 21
 Not Peace but A Sword 553
 Obamsawin, Alanis 691
 Perrault, Pierre 712
 Poirer, Anne Claire 724–25
 Rubbo, Michael 788, 972
Sad Song of Yellow Skin 798
 Shannon, Kathleen 836
 société nouvelle 140 sound recording (synchronized) 501
 Stoney, George 886
 Studio D 131, 152, 490, 837
 Unit B 110, 129–30, 139, 173, 568–69 television explosion 135–36
see also Candid Eye Films
Canada Carries On series 129, 136–37, 169, 537, 610, 1018
 Canadian Army Film and Photo Unit 129
 Canadian Broadcasting Corporation (CBC) controversial documentaries 134 documentary series 133–34
 history 133
 King, Allan 489–90
Mills of the Gods: Viet Nam, The 636
 Perrault, Pierre 712
 public affairs series 133 theatrical feature documentaries 134
 Watson, Patrick 980
Canadian Culture at the Crossroads ... (book)
 541–42
 Canadian Independent Film Caucus (CIFC) 136
 Canadian Pacific Railway (CPR) 126
 Canary Bananas 535
 Canciones para después de una guerra/Songs for after a War 873
 Candid Eye Films (Canada)
 Back-breaking Leaf, The Brault, Michel 110
 cinéma vérité 130
 Days Before Christmas, The 110
 French Canada 139
 Lonely Boy 568–69
 Macartney-Filgate, Terence 110, 501, 587
 movement 21
 NFB, Canada 501
Cane Toads: An Unnatural History 58, 142–43
 Canellopoulos, Takis 328
 Cannibal Tours 57, 699
 Canto a la emigracion/A Hymn to Emigration 869
 Canudo, Ricciotto 143–44, 234
 Capra, Fight 1016
 Capra, Frank 77, 80, 81–82, 107, 144–46, 257, 679, 932–33, 1001
 ‘Capracorn’ films 145 car factories (France) 265
 Caribbean Eye 991
 Caribbean Institute of Mass Communication
 (CARIMAC) 992
 Carl Sandburg: Echoes and Silences 634
 Carlos: Cinetrato de un caminate/Cine-Portrait of a Walker 526
 Carlsen, Jon Bang 814
 Carmaux: Bringing Out the Coke/Défournage du coke 1014
 Carmine, Al 298
 Carné, Marcel 266
 Carneiro, Mário 112
Carnets du Congo/Notebooks from the Congo (book)
 32–33
 Caro diario 656
 Carré, Jean-Michel 270
 Cartier-Bresson, Henri 130, 345, 501, 587, 757
 Carvalho, Vladimir 113
 Carville, James 356
 Casa Grande e Senzala/Big House and Slave
 Quarter 113
 Case of Charlie Gordon, The 129
 Case of De Milos Zanko, The 1024
 Cassavetes, John 437, 746–47
 Cassuto, Joseph 91
 Casting! 1024
 Castro, Fidel 34, 36, 189, 342, 972–73
 Catembe 736
Catherine, Called Birdy (book) 278
 Cathy Come Home 9, 563, 565–66, 949
 Cat's Cradle 108
 Cavalcanti, Alberto
 BBC-Droitwich 981
 biography 147–50
 Coal Face 179–80
 documentary films 553–55

- GPO Film Unit 946
Granton Trawler 317
 Jennings, Humphrey 453
Night Mail 688–89
Rien que les heures 69, 143, 226, 266, 762–63, 1034
Song of Ceylon, The 856
We Live in Two Worlds 984–85
 Cayrol, Jean 685–87, 755
 Cech, Vladimir 191
 Celibacy 905
 Central Film Management Bureau (China) 159–60
 Central Newsreel and Documentary Studio (CNDS) in China 160–61
 Centre National de la Cinématographie (CNC) 599–600
 Centro de Capacitacion Cinematográfica (CCC) 629–31
 Centro de Producción de Cortometraje (CPC) 629–30
 Centro de Trabalho Indigenista (CIT) 113
 Cerny Petr/Black Peter 192
 Cerro Pelado (ship) 35
 C'était un rendez-vous/Rendezvous 543–44
 Ceylon Tea Marketing Board 855
 Chagrin et la pitié, Le see Sorrow and the Pity, The Chair, The 12, 150–51, 220
 Challenge for Change 886
 Challenge for Change, The/Société Nouvelle 131, 151–53, 579
 Chambi, Manuel 526
 Chamoun, Jean 673–74
 Chan, Evans
 Adeus Macau 155–56
 film genre 153
 Journey to Beijing 155–56
 Life and Times of Wu Zhong-Kian, The 154
 Sorceress of the New Piano 154
Chang: A Drama of the Wilderness 155–56, 183, 818–19
 Channel 4 (UK) 416, 723
 Chanson d'Armor/Song of Armor 234
 Chant du Styrene, Le/The Song of Styrene 756
 Chaplin, Charlie 848
 Chapman, Chris 130
 Charlie is My Darling 998
 Charlotte vie ou theater 897
 Charter Film, The 101
 Chasse au lion à l'arc, La/The Lion Hunters 783
 Chat dans le sac, Le/The Cat in the Bag 139, 340
 Chekisty/The Story of the KGB 796
Chelovek Kruptnim planon/Close-Up (book) 307
 Chelsea Girls 977
 Chequerboard 55
 Chiang Kai-shek 164, 262
 Chief, The 541
 Chihuly, Dale 47
 Child of the Streets, A 402
Children at School 156–57
 Children Growing Up with Other People 906
 Children Learning by Experience 906
 Children's Film Foundation 248
 Chile 528, 530
 Chile, la memoria obstinado/Obstinate Memory 342
 Chilean films (Alvarez, Santiago) 36
China! 163–64
 China: Beyond the Clouds 25
 China
 Communist Party 15
 Cultural Revolution 433 culture 263
 film documentaries 157–63
 Greene, Felix 332–34
 politics 434
 USSR 160
 China Central Television (CCTV) 161
 China, Der Alltag, Der Künste 701
 China Strikes Back 546, 632
 China Syndrome, The 768
 Chinese Communist Party (CCP) 158–59, 161
 Chircales/Brickworkers 529, 768–69
 Chirigue corrective, La/Corrective Surgery 264
 'Chomskyan Revolution of Linguistics' 609
 Chopra, Joyce 348, 463, 536
 Christa Wolf-Zeitschleifen/Time Warps 292
 Christensen, Theodor 812
 Christmas at Moose Factory 691
 Christmas Under Fire 982
Chronique d'un été/Chronicle of a Summer 10, 13, 139, 164–67, 345, 358, 459, 535, 612, 657–58, 697, 784
 Chroniques de mars/Chronicles of March 269
Chulas Fronteras ('Beautiful Borderlands') 168–69
 Chung-Kuo Cina 427
 Churchill, Winston 555, 816, 974
Churchill's Island 137, 169–71, 537
 Chute de la Maison Rouge, La/Fall of the Red House 233
 Chutney in Yuh Soca 992
 Ciclón/Hurricane 35
 Cienfuegos, Camilo 189
 Cinco Vezes Favela/Five Times ShantyTown 185
 Cinema Action 476
 Cinema Juku (Japan) 450
Cinema (magazine) 83, 85
 'Cinema of Moral Anxiety' (Poland) 486
Cinema Quarterly (journal) 364
 Cinéma Vérité: Defining the Moment 1008 cinéma vérité ('film truth')
 American Family, An 37
 Australia 55, 58

- Bedevil, Choo, Choo, Choo, Choo 644
 Brault, Michel 21, 110, 1008
 Brazil 112
 Broomfield, Nick 357
 Canada, NFB 130, 131, 134–35
Chair, The 150
Chronique d'un été 139, 164–66, 358, 744
 Czech republic/Slovakia, 191, 876
 Drew, Robert 219
 'direct cinema' comparison 568
Enthusiasm 223
 editing 619
 Epstein, Jean 234
 France 268, 467
 French films 268
 GDR 290
Gimme Shelter 299
 Godard, Jean-Luc 151
 Goldovskaya, Maria 308
 Guzzetti, Alfred 345
 Holban, Florica 776
Hoop Dreams 371
Hour of the Furnaces, The 377
 Iran 411
 Ireland 414
 Ivens, Joris 433
 Japan 448
Joli Mai, Le 458
Joyce at 34 463
 Junge, Winfried 467
 Kiślowski, Krzysztof 487, 489
 King, Allan 490
 Leacock, Richard 441, 534, 1008
 Lelouch, Claude 543
Lonely Boy 568–69
 Longinotto, Kim 571
 Lye, Len 585
 McElwee, Ross 590–91
 Marker, Chris 268, 611
 Maysles, Albert 618–19
 Memorandum 627
Monterey Pop 652
 Morin, Edgar 657–58
 Öphuls, Marcel 697
 Pennebaker, D. A. 652–53, 708–9, 1008
 Pincus, Edward 718
 Podnieks, Juris 724
 Rouch, Jean 21, 139, 202, 534, 604, 782, 784, 1008
Sans Soleil/Sunless 808
 Scenes from Childhood 345
 Schlesinger, John 816
 Schurmann, Edwin 774
 Seidl, Ulrich 825
 Špàta, Jan 876
 Stoney, George 886
 The Things I Cannot Change 131
 Thomson, Margaret 907
 United States 998
 Vachek, Karel 955
War Room, The 975
 Whitehead, Peter 998
 Wiseman, Frederick 1010
 Yugoslavia 1022–23
 Zapatista uprising in Mexico 135
 see also 'direct cinema'
 Cinémathèque Française 519–20, 783
Cinématographe (journal) 272–74
Cinématographe vu de L'Etna, Le/Filming around Etna 233
 Cinequanon (Portugal) 737
 Circumcision, La/The Circumcision 783
 Cités de la plaine 507
City of Gold 130, 173–74, 579
City, The 171–73, 223
 Ciucurencu 775
 Civil War, The 122–23
 Civilization 9
 Clair, René 174–77, 225, 510–11, 763, 1035
 Clark, Mark 81–82
 Clarke, Kenneth 9
 Classmates (aka Kick) 158
 Claw 492
 Clément, René 72–73
 Clinton, Bill 976
Close Up (journal) 101, 359, 364
 Close-Up (Canadian TV series) 133, 536, 592, 979
Close-Up/Nama-y Nazdik (film) 177–79, 484, 486
 'closeness to life' (Lebensnähe) 4
Coal Face 10, 86, 179–80, 336, 537, 553, 945
 Cocteau, Jean 73
 Coffey, Essie 241
 Cohn-Vossen, Richard 291
 Col cuore fermo Sicilia/Sicily in Good Heart 426
 Col ferro e col fuoco (With Iron and Fire) 423
 Cold War, The 416
 Cole, Tom 463
 Colonia e Vilões/Colonies and Villages 737
 Color Adjustment 765
 Colors/Rang-ha 485
 Colossus on the River 492
 Columbus on Trial 732
 Come Back, Africa 772–73
 Come Down Pale Moon 826
 Comerio, Luca 425–26
 Comizi d'Amore/Love Meetings 429
 Commandon, Jean 264
 Commercial Press of Shanghai 157
 Commoli, Jean-Louis 269
 Commune de Paris, La 978–79
 Communist Party of Great Britain (CPGB) 649–51
 Community Programme Unit (CPU) at BBC 964–65

- Complaint of Rape, A 317
 Condorcet, Marie Jean-Antoine 6
 Confort et l'indifférence, Le/Comfort and Indifference 49, 140
 Connolly, Bob 57–58
 Connu de nos services 898
 Conquest in 1930 942
 Conquest of Everest, The 900
 Conquête de Clichy, La/The Conquest of Clichy 269
 Conrad, Joseph 353, 970–71
 Consider Kalla 266
 'Constructivism in the Cinema' (essay) 793
Contact 180–82, 946, 1019
 Contacts 203
 Continental Films 599
Contrapuntal Editing (book) 708
 Contre l'oubli/Against Forgetting 301
 Control Room 675
 Conversations of Salamanca 871
 Cooper, Bridget (Budge) 31
 Cooper, Gary 145
 Cooper, Merian C. 155, 182–84, 318–19, 408, 817–18
 Cooper's Children of the City 31
 Copland, Aaron 171–72
 Coppola, Eleanor 353, 355
 Coppola, Francis Ford 119, 353–55
 Cordell, Michael 58
 Cornell, Joseph 108
 Corporation, The 135
 Corral 130, 579
 Corti, Axel 62
 Cosa, La/The Thing 429, 655
 Cosmos 9
 Couldn't Be Fairer 57
 Countdown 702
 Countdown to War 523
 Country Comes to Town, The 943
 Cousteau, Jacques 9, 184–85, 713, 845–46
 Coutinho, Edouard 112–13, 185–87, 530
 Covered Wagon, The 942
 Cowan, Paul 132
 Craigie, Jill 188
 Crawley, Budge 128, 135
 Crazy 370
 Creative Film Foundation 205
 Crise du logement, La/The Housing Shortage 267
 Crisis 495–96
 Crisis: Behind a Presidential Commitment 220, 844
 Crisp, Donald 79
 Croatia 1022–23
 Croatian Spring 508
 Croisière noire, La/The Black Journey 32, 265, 726, 817, 1035
 Crommie, David 548–49
 Cronkite, Walter 827–28
 Crossing Over 993
 Crossroad, Street 826
 Crown Film Unit see General Post Office (GPO) Film Unit
 Cry of the City 850
 Cry from the Heart 55
 Cry of the Wild 135
 Cuba 527–28, 833
Cuba Si! 9, 189–90
 Cuban Institute of Film Art and Industry (ICAIC) 35, 37, 76, 527–28, 533, 739–40, 992
 Cuckoo's Secret, The 823
 CUEC (Centro Universitario de Estudios Cinematográficos) 629
 Cuenca 872
 Culloden 9, 821, 950, 978–79
 Cultural Revolution (China) 160
 Cunnamulla 57, 700
 Cürlis, Hans 71
 Curtis, Edward S. 127
 Cyrano et d'Artagnan 17
 Czech Republic/Slovakia 190–93
 Czechoslovak New Wave 191–92
 Czechoslovakia 876, 955
- D
- da Paz dos Reis, Aurelio 734, 738
 Dada art movement 174–75
 Daguerrotypes 957
 Dairies 718–19
 Daisy: The Story of a Facelift 789
 Dalibor 955
 Daly, Tom 129, 170, 173
 Damaged Goods 848
 Damiano, Damiani 428
 Danish Kulturfilm 392
 Denmark/Denmark 811
 Dansereau, Fernand 132
 Darwell, James 79
 Das Blaue Licht/The Blue Light 759
 Das Gefühl des Augenblicks/Sensibility of the Moment 815
 Das Kino von John Ford 96
 Das Leben unser Presidenten/Our President's Life 289
 Das Rote Sprachrohr 71
 Das Stahltier/The Steel Animal 1032–33
 Datta, Manjira 403
 Davis, Angela 42–43
 Davis, Neil 56
 Davis, Peter 194–95, 351–52, 697, 827–28
 Davis, Thomas 413
 Dawn Guard 107
 Day After, The 766
 Days Before Christmas, The 110, 501

- Days of Hope 950
 de Almeida, Faria 736
 De América soy hijo 36
 de Antonio, Emile see Antonio, Emile de De bandas, vidas y otros sonos/Of Bands, Lives and other Musics 630
 de Barros, Leitão 734
 De Brug see Bridge, The de Champlain, Samuel 48
 de Foucauld, Charles 727
 de Gaulle, Général 859
 de la Fuente, Rodriguez 874
 de Laforgue, Leo 90
 De l'autre côte 27–28
 De Maalstroom/The Maelstrom 261 de Macedo, António 736–37
 de Martino, Ernesto 425–26
 De Mère en fille/Mother-to-Be 140, 725 de Montaigne, Michel 125
 de Moraes, Wenceslaus 737
 de Nantes, Jacquot 956
 De Nuremburg à Nuremburg/From Nuremburg to Nuremburg 781
 de Oliveira, Manuel 735
 de Rochemont, Louis 560, 610, 697, 767–68, 851 de Seta, Vittoria 424, 427
 De Wigwam 430
Dead Birds 195–98, 282–83
 Dear Daughter 415–16
 Dear Phone 18
Death of a Princess 198–200, 905
 Death of Yugoslavia, The 523
 Debussy, Claude 540
December 7 200–201
 Decisions 317
 Deckie Learner 338
 Déclin de l'empire américain, Le/Decline of the American Empire 49
 Deep Hearts 282–84
 Deep Throat 648
 DEFA (Deutsche Film-Aktiengesellschaft) 104,
 288–93, 467, 968–69
 Defence of Madrid, The 359, 650, 901
 Defoe, Daniel 482
 Dei mjuke hendene/In the House of Angels 814
Del Mio Corazón 201–2
 Délits flagrants/Caught Red-Handed 271
 Dell, Jeffrey 188
 Deluge 103
 Den blodige tiden/Bloody Times 538
 Den Strømlinjede Gris/The Streamlined Pig 779, 813
 Deng Xiaoping 161
 Denis Mitchell Films 639
 Denti, Jorge 530
 Depardon, Raymond 202–4, 269, 271
 Depeche Mode 101 709
 Der Ball/The Prom 64
 Der heilige Berg/The Holy Mountain 759
 Der Tag im Film 293
 Der Tod kam wie bestellt 1006
 Der VW-Komplex 95–96
 Der Weg nach oben/The Way Forward 288
 Deren, Maya 115, 204–6, 215–16, 260
 Derenkowsky, Eleanora see Deren, Maya
 Derrière le décor 540
 Des Lachende Mann/The Laughing Man 291
 Descrizione di un matrimonio/Description of a Wedding 426
Desert Victory 107, 121, 206–8, 928, 933, 947
 Deslaw, Eugen 786
 Despergue a las 18:30/Take-off at 18:30 36
 D'Est 27–28
 d'Estaing, Giscard 203
 Destruction of a Wall/Démolition d'un mur 1014
 Det Sociala Arvet/The Social Heritage 813
 Det Stora Aventuret/The Big Adventure 811
 Deutsche Film-und Fernsehakademie Berlin
 (DFFB) 804
Deutschland Erwache (book) 539
 Deutschland Erwache!/Wake Up Germany! 539
 Deutschland-zwischen gestern und heute 294
 Devil Never Sleeps, The 732
 Devlin, Bernard 138
 Dewever, Jean 267
 di Carlo, Carlo 426
 di Gianni, Luigi 426
 Dianying 546–47
 Diario di un maestro/A Schoolmaster's Diary 832
 Diary of an Unknown Soldier, The 950
Diary for Timothy, A 207–9, 456, 928, 928–29, 947
 Dictionnaire du Cinéma (book) 541
 Die Andere Seite/The Other Side 61
 Die Grosse Ekstase des Bildschnitzers Steiner/The Great Ecstasy of Woodcarver Steiner 363 Die Kaisermanöver in Maehren/The King's manoeuvre in Maehren 60
 Die Kinder von Golzow 466–69
 Die Küche/The Kitchen 291
 Die Letzen Männer/The Last Men 64
 Die Mauer/The Wall 292
 Die Rote des Rots von Technicolor 96
 Die Schreckenstage in Wien/Time of Horror in Vienna 60
 Die Überlebenden/The Survivors 98
 Die UFA 95
 Die Vergessene Stadt/The Forgotten Town 815
 Die Wahrheit/The Truth 1032
 Die Windrose/The Windrose 289
 Dilapidated Dwelling, The 482
 Dindo, Richard 210–11, 897
 Dineen, Molly 49–50, 396–97, 951–52
Dinner Party, The 212
 Diplomat, The 56

- ‘direct cinema’
 American Family, An 37
 Anka, Paul 502
 Brault, Michel 111
 Broomfield, Nick 357
 Chat dans le sac, Le 139
 China 162
 Chronique d’un été 165
 cinéma vérité comparison 568
 Czechoslovakia 876
 Depardon, Raymond 202–3
 Dont Look Back 217–19
 Drew, Robert 219
 Edresen, Sigve 814
Enthusiasm 233
Everyday Except Christmas 238
 Gamin 529
 Germany 296
Gimme Shelter 302
 Gldovskaya, Maria 307
 Graef, Roger 316
 Grigsby, Michael 339
 Groulx, Gilles 340
 Guzmán, Patricio 343
 Guzzetti, Alfred 345
 Hának, Dusan 716
 Hegedus, Chris 356
High School 365
 Jutra, Claude 139
 Ivens, Joris 433
Jane 442
Jazz on a Summer’s Day 451
 King, Allan 489–91
 Klein, James 494
 Kossakovsky, Viktor 505
 Leacock, Richard 534
 Lelouch, Claude 543
 Latin America 528
 Malle, Louis 596–97, 714
 Marshall, John 613–14
 Maysles, Albert 618
 Mexico 629
 Middletown 195
 Mitchell, Denis 639
 model 12
On the Bowery 696
 Perrault, Pierre 712
 Pincus, Edward 718
 political films 140
Primary 744–45
 Reichert, Julia 751–52
 Rogosin, Lionel 772
Salesman 619, 800–801
Seeing Red 823–24
Selling of the Pentagon, The 828
 Shuker, Gregory 843–44
 Siamo Italiano 896
 Stewart, Charles 883
 Stoney, George 885–86
Union Maids 939
 United Kingdom 951
 United States 11, 467, 639, 652–53
 When We Were Kings 996
 Wild, Nettie 1004
 Wildenhahn, Kaus 1006–7
 Wiseman Frederick 203, 365
 Yugoslavia 1021
 Disney studios 1001
 Disney, Walt 156
 Disparaitre/Vanishing 141
 Distant Early Warning (DEW) line 461
 Divide and Conquer 77
Divided World, A 212–14, 320
Divine Horsemen: The Living Gods of Haiti 205, 215–16
 Divorce Iranian Style 572
 Do It 898
 Do Sanh-Der letzte film/The Last Film 315
 Do-It-Yourself Democracy 1030
 ‘Dock of the Bay’ 365
Dockers 216–17
 Document, The 133
 Documentary Education Resources (DER) 614
 Documentary and Experimental Film Center (DEFC) in Iran 411
 ‘documentary film therapy’ 15
 Documentary Technicians Alliance (DATA) 31
 Dog Man Star 109
Doing It Yourself (book) 751
 Dokumentorajo/Document: On the Road 930
 Dollfuss-Regime, Austria 60
 Dom kallar oss Mods/They Call Us Misfits 813
 Dom s rizariami/The House on Arbat Street 308
 Domestic Violence 532
 Domnick, Hans 296
 Donald Cammell: The Ultimate Performance 589
 d’Onofrio, Piero 429
Don’t Look Back 217–19, 652, 708–9, 998
 Double Lives, Second Chances 488
 Douro Faina Fluvial/Working at the Douro 734–35
 Dovzhenko, Alexander 73–74
 Dragon’s Egg, The 490
 Drazkiewicz, Marek 731
 Dread 637
 Dream Girls 837–38
 Drehbuch: Die Zeiten 467, 469
 Drew Associates 149–50, 219–20, 442, 535, 618–19, 708, 744, 844
 Drew, Robert 23, 219–20, 535, 618, 745, 801, 844, 1008
Drifters 10, 181, 220–23, 317, 336, 689, 819, 942, 981
 Drowning by Numbers 18

- De jour comme de nuit/Day and Night 271
 du Luart, Yolande 43
 Du und mancher Kamerad/You and Some Comrades 289
 Dubček, Alexander 191
 Duchamp, Marcel 109
 Dukhovnje, golosa 852
 Dulac, Germaine 87
 Dunkley, Christopher 52
 Dunn, Willie 131
 Dunton, Davidson 133
 Duplessis et après ... /Quebec: Duplessis and After ... 49
 Duplessis, Maurice 49, 138–40
 Dupont, Eugene 59
 Duràn, Ciro 529
 Durruti (Spain) 870
 Dutch Film League 114
 Dutta, Madhusree 403–4
 Dwaj Ludzie z Szafa/Two Men and a Wardrobe
 729
 Dyke, Willard Van 223–24
 Dylan, Bob 217–19, 652, 709
 Dylan Thomas: The World I Breathe 633
 Dzieci Oskarzaja/The Children Accuse 729
 Dziga Vertov Group 604, 673
- E
- Eastern Valley 30
 Easy Rider 98
 Eat the Kimono 837
 Ebert, Roger 354
 Ecce homo/Behold the Man 562
 EDA party (Greece) 325
 Edinburgh Film Guild 821
 Edison, Thomas Alva 59, 1013
 Edresen, Sigve 814
 Educated Youth in the Countryside 160
 Edvard Munch 950
 Edwards, Ros 237
 Eichler, Udi 18
 Eichmann, Adolf 539
 Eichmann und das dritte Reich/and the Third Reich 539
 Eiffel, Georges 176
Eiffel Tower, The/La tour 176, 225–26, 510
 Eighty Days 929
 Ein Arbeiterclub in Sheffield/A Working-Men's Club in Sheffield 683
 Ein Großkampftag/Boxing Day 235
 Einarson, Oddvar 813
 Eisenstein, Sergei
 Agee, James 22
 Alexander Nevsky 80, 660
 Battleship Potemkin 114, 221, 431, 559, 649,
 703, 792, 942
 Bronx Morning, A 115
 editing 117
 Experimental Cinema 437 film theory 793
 Film World 651
 Flaherty, Robert 848
 Kino-fist 796
 Leyda, Jay 545–47
 Makavejev, Dusan 594
 Man's Hope 608
 montage 108, 221, 294, 418, 750, 780, 832, 925, 960
 Montagu, Ivor 648–49
 movement 222
 newsreels 412, 935
 Oktyabr/October: Ten Days that Shook the World 792
 Pelecian, Artavazd 706–7
 Prokofiev 766
 Que viva Mexico! 491–92, 848–49
 Shub, Esfir 242
 Strike 377
 Turksib 936
 Vertov, Dziga 242, 792
 Eisler, Hanns 431–32
 Ekato Ores tou Mai/One Hundred Hours in May 328
 El abuelo Cheno/Grandfather Cheno 630
 El Acaran/The Scorpion 992
 El Caso Pinochet 342
 El Descencanto/The Disenchantment 873
 El Equipo Tercer Año (The Third Year Group) 75
 El golpe de estado/The Coup d'État 342
 El Grito/The Scream 629
 el Maanouni, Ahmed 671
 El Poder popular/The Power of the People
 342
 El Proceso de Burgos/The Process of Burgos 874
 El Sol de membrillo/The Sun of the Quince Tree
 874
 Elaine Stritch at Liberty 709
 Eldeyjan/Days of Destruction 392
 Eldridge, John 820
 Elegiya dorogi 852–53
 Elegiya iz Rossii 852
 Eleutherios Venizlos 327
 Elfert, Peter 390
 Eloge de l'amour/In Praise of Love 302
 Elsewhere 64
 Elton, Arthur 226–28, 230, 942–45
 Elvira Luz Cruz, pena maxima/Maximum Punishment 629
 Embracig Nitsutsumarete/Embracing 450
 Emigholz, Heinz 228–30
 Emma and Elvis 751
 Emmer, Luciano 424–26, 430
 Emond, Bernard 141

- Empire Marketing Board (EMB)
 BBC 86
 Bond, Ralph 101
 Drifters 221–22
 Elton, Arthur 226
 Flaherty, Robert 649
 GPO Film Unit 944–45
 Granton Trawler 317
 Grierson, John 335
 history 941
 Industrial Britain 406
 Line to Tcherva Hut 554
 Watt, Harry, 981
 Wright, Basil 1019
 Empty Quarter 203
 En by ved navn København/A City Called Copenhagen 779–80
 En construcción/Under Construction 875
 En Nombre de Dios/In the Name of God 343
 En pays neuf/In New Lands 138
 En Rade 147
 En sælfangsti Nordgrønland/A Sealing in North
 Greenland 392
 En Sommersaga/A Summer Saga 811
En tant que femmes: rapport de recherches (report)
 725
 En tant que femmes film series 725
 Endresen, Sigve 814
 Endurance: The Story of a Glorious Failure
 862
 Energy War, The 356, 709
 Enginemem 338
English Journey (book) 29, 985
 ENI (Italy) 424, 433
 Enligt lag/By Law 813
 Ennemi intime, L’/The Close Enemy 270
Enough to Eat? 4, 44, 230–31, 945
 Entertainers, The 639
Enthusiasm (Symphony of the Don Basin) 231–33, 961
 Entr’acte 175, 763, 888
 Entre la mer et l’eau douce/Drifting Upstream 111
 Enuua ca simu a forza du mondu/We, Who are the Strength of the World 428–29
 Epheremae 775
 Epstein, Jean 144, 233–35, 265–66
 Epstein, Marie 88
 Epstein, Robert 909
Eric Pressburger: The Life and Death of a Screenwriter
 (book) 588
 Erinnerung an eine Landschaft/Memory of a Landscape-for Manuela 291
 ERT (TV) network in Greece 329
 Ertel, Dieter 235–36
 Erzschermerz/Ore Pain 63
 Es began mit einer Lüge/It Began with a Lie 1027
 Escalona, Enrique 630
 Escape to Life 986–87
 Esdra, Micaela 20
 ‘Eskimo film’ 391, 394
 Eskimos of Pond Inlet 339
 España 478
 España 1800/Spain 1800 872
 España 1936/Spain 1936 870
 Espinosa, Julio Garcia 912
 Espoir/Man’s Hope see Sierra de Teruel
 Essence de verbena/Essence of Feasts 869
Esthétique et psychologie du cinéma (book) 541
 Et La vie/Life Also 270
Eternity 236–37
 Ethiopia In Seeds of Despair 884
 Ethnic Notions 765
Etre et avoir/To Be and To Have 237–38
 Ett Anständigt Liv/A Decent Life 813
 Étuda o zkoušce/Study of a Rehearsal 877
 Études sur Paris 809
 Eugene Hill see Leyda, Jay
European Film Theory and Cinema (book) 1
 European Recovery Program (ERP) 61
Every Day Except Christmas 41, 238–40, 948,
 983–84
 Everything Can Happen 581
 Exil Shanghai 702
Exile and the Kingdom 240–41
Experimental Cinema (journal) 437, 849 exploration documentaries
 Italy 425
 see also Canada
 Eye Witness/Coup d’oeil series 129
 Eyes of Stone 403
- F
- Fabre, Jean-Henri 822
 Faça Segundo a Arte/Make It as You Know 736
 Face of Britain, The 946, 985
 Face of Scotland, The 1019
 Face to Face 402
 Faces in November 845
 Facing the Music 57
 ‘Factory’ studio 976
 factual films (France) 266
 Fahrenheit 9/11 11, 653, 772, 846
Fall of the Romanov Dynasty, The 242–43, 842
 Fall, The 998–99
 Fallen Champ: The Untold Story of Mike Tyson 503
 Family Album 90
 Family Life 949
 Family of Man (photographic project) 90
Family Portrait 243–44, 457
 Family Portrait Sitzings 345
 Family, The 212

- FAMU (Film Faculty of the Academy of Music and Performing Arts) in Prague 955–56
- Fanck, Arnold 244–45
- Far from Poland 303
- Far from Vietnam/Loin du Vietnam* 245–47
- Farkas, Thomas 112
- Farm Security Administration (FSA) in US 765
- Farocki, Harun 96, 304
- Farrebique 787
- Fassbinder, Rainer Werner 97, 896
- Fast, Cheap and Out of Control 659
- Fat 905
- Fata Morgana 362
- Feathers of Peace, The 67–68
- Federation of Workers' Film Societies (FOWFS) 101
- Feeding the Baby 584
- Feierabend/Spare Time 289
- Feindt, Johann 92
- Ferrante, Giacomo 429
- Ferrari, Giorgio 423
- Fest, Joachim C. 95
- Fêtes de Belgique ou l'effusion collective/Feast of Belgium or Collective Effusion 889
- 'Fiammetta' 20
- Fiat 424, 429
- Fidyk, Andrzej 731
- Field, Connie 14, 549
- Field, Mary 247–48, 822–23
- Fifty Fighting Years 651
- Fighter, The 496
- Fighting Lady, The 767
- Fighting Soldiers 473–74
- Films of Scotland Committee 821
- Filles du Roy, Les 725
- Film Advisory Board (FAB) in India 401
- Film Art* (journal) 359
- Film Distribution Agency (Poland) 730
- Film Finance Corporation (Australia) 55
- Film is the World of a Living Thing* (book) 931
- Film Library Quarterly* (journal) 596
- Film Production Agency (Poland) 730
- Film Quarterly* (journal) 46, 99
- Film and Radio Monthly* (journal) 158
- Film Technique and Film Acting* (book) 649
- Film World* (book) 651
- Filme e Realidade/Film and Reality 147–48
- Filmkritik* (journal) 95–96
- Filmographie universelle* (book) 641
- Films beget Films 546
- Filmski Mjesecnik (newsreels) 1021
- Finding Christa* 249–50
- Finis Terrae/End of the World 234, 266
- Fiore, Robert 747
- Fire Over England 554
- Fires Were Started* 10, 207, 250–51, 455, 753, 928, 947
- Fires Were Started* (book) 251
- First Contact 57
- First Days, The 452–53
- First Graders/avvali-ha 485
- First Intifada, The 673
- First Love* 253–54, 488
- Fitzcarraldo, Carlos 118, 120, 363
- Fitzwater, Bill 55
- Five Year Plan, The 232
- Fix: The Story of an Addicted City 1005
- Flaherty, Robert
- biography 254–58
 - Canada, documentary explorers 127
 - cinema 220–22
 - Country Comes to Town, The 943
 - Eisenstein, Sergei 848
 - Empire Marketing Board 649
 - Grierson, John 127, 254, 256, 941
 - Heyer, John 364
 - Industrial Britain* 239–40, 406, 900
 - Land, The 513
 - Leacock, Richard 535
 - Louisiana Story* 254, 257, 578–79, 696
 - Man of Aran* 221, 254, 256, 412, 600, 900
 - man and nature 740
 - Man's Hope* 608
 - Moana* 254–56, 406–7, 642–43
 - Nanook of the North* 664–67, 809, 970
 - Rogosin, Lionel 772
 - Seta, Vittorio de 832
 - Song of Ceylon, The* 854
 - Stoney, George 886
 - 'story documentary' 496
 - Twenty-Four Dollar Island 606
 - US Film Service 577
 - Wright, Basil 943
 - see also Nanook of the North
- Flamenco 874
- Flemish Farm, The 188
- Flüestern und SCREIEN/Whispering and SHOUTING 291
- Flugten 812
- Flugten/The Escape 778
- Flynn, Errol 121, 207
- Fog Line 8
- Fogo Island series 579–80
- Fond de l'air est rouge, Le 612
- Fonda, Henry 79
- Fonda, Jane 407, 442–43
- Fontaine du Vaucluse, La/Fountain of the Vaucluse, The 596
- Footnote to Fact 438
- For Benefit of the Doubt 998
- For gaesterne kommer/Before the Guests Arrive 814
- For Harde Livet/For Your Life 814
- For Love or Money* 258–59

- For Today We Live 30
 Ford, Alexander 418
 Ford, John 78–79, 81, 96, 107, 200–201, 553, 627, 889
 Foreman, George 995–96
 Foreman Went to France, The 982
Forest of Bliss 259–60, 282–84
Forever the Land (book) 513
 Forgács, Péter 260–62
 Forget Bagdad 898
 Forgotten Faces, The 950
 Forgotten War, The 864
 Forgotten Years series (Russia) 796
 Forlani, Remo 755
 Forman, Denis 338
 Forman, Milos 191, 967
 Forster, E. M. 208
 Forward, Soviet! 961
400 Million, The 262–64, 432, 496
 Fourth Dimension, The 920–21
 Four Corners (Australia) 55, 94
400 Million, The 262–64, 432, 496
 Fox, Beryl 636
 Fox, Francis 132
 Fox, Stan 133
 Fradetel, Marcel 274
 Fragile Earth 25
 Fragoso, Belarmino 736
 France 264–72
 Francisco Boix, un fotógrafo en el inferno/
 A Photographer in Hell 875
 Franco, General 915–16
 Defence of Madrid 359, 650
 Espoir 608
 Jungmans, Carl 471
 Heart of Spain 892
 Land Without Bread 516
 Malraux, André 599
 Spain 870, 873, 875
 Spanish Earth, The 432
 To Die in Madrid 268
 Testimony on Intervention 901–2
 Franju, Georges 14, 272–75, 374–75, 805–6
 Frank, Robert 746–47
 Frankfurter, Bernhard 62
Frantz Fanon: Black Skin, White Mask 275–77, 466
Frauen und Filmen (journal) 804
 Free at Last: His Final Days 845
 Free Cinema movement 14, 40–41, 238–39, 251, 305, 457, 645, 948, 958, 983
 Free Dairy/The Romanian Revolution of 1989 777
 Free Thaelmann 650
 Freer, James D. 126
 Freethinker, The 979
 Freire, Gilberto 113
 French Affair, A 25
 French New Wave cinema 151, 414, 419, 596, 661, 956
 Freund, Karl 89
 Freyer, Ellen 277–79
 Fridriksson, Fridrik por 393
 Frissell, Varick 127
 Fritz, Sonia 630
 From 3 to 22 1022
From Cagliari to Hitler (book) 922
 From a Night Porters's Point of View 488
 Front Line 56
 Front Line of Democracy, The 158
 Frontier Films (NY documentary school) 223, 350–51, 495, 546, 631, 667, 892
 Frontier, The 958
 Fuego in Castile/Fire in Castile 871
 Fuller, Samuel 96
 Fumio, Kamei 446–47
 Furnace Builders 104
 Furtado, Jorge 113
- G
- Gabriel Orozco: proyecto filmico documental/
 A Documentary Film Project 630–31
 Gaea Girls 837–38
 Gagnan, Emile 184
 Galan, Hector 280–82
 Gambling, Gods and LSD 898
 Gamin 529
 Gan, Alexei 793
 Gance, Abel 175, 510, 640, 726
 Gandhi, Indira 403
 Gandhi, Mahatma 400–401
 gangsterzy i Filantropi/Gangsters and Philanthropists 729
 Gardner, Robert 195–98, 259–60, 282–85
 Garlic is as Good as Ten Mothers 119
 Gass, Karl 289, 292, 467
 Gast, Léon 995–96
 Gates of Heaven 119, 658
 Gates of Italy, The 537
 Gauguin 754
 Gaumont films 265, 823
 Gazi/Gas 328
Gegen-Öffentlichkeit (oppositional public sphere) 498–99
 General Motors (GM) 493–94, 770–71
 General Post Office (GPO) Film Unit
 Australia 54
 BBC 945
 BBC: The Voice of Britain 86
 Bond, Ralph 101
 British Visatone sound system 856
 Cavalcanti, Alberto 147–49
 Coal Face 180
 Elton, Arthur 226–27

- film industry 944
Fires Were Started 251
Granton Trawler 317
 international communication films 947
 Jackson, Pat 436
 Jacoby, Irving 439
 Jennings, Humphrey 452, 556
 Line to Tcherva Hut 553
 LUCE 422–23
 Lye, Len 584
 sync-sound system 981
 US Film Service 576
We Live in Two Worlds 985
 Workers and Jobs 230
 Wright, Basil 156, 1019
 Genèse d'un repas/Genesis of a Meal 270, 661
 Genet Chatila 897
 'Geneviève' 20
 Génie helvétique, Le 898
 Gente del Po/People of the Po 425
 Gents da Praia da Viera/People from Praia da Viera 737
 Geopolitik: Hitler's Plan for Empire 137, 537
 Georgia 105
Georgia O'Keefe 285–88
 Georgie Girl 309–10
 Gerasimov, Serguei 160
 Geri 952
 German Democratic Republic (GDR) 104, 288–93, 466–69, 968–69
 German Documentary Association (AG Dok) 296
 Germany
 documentary films 293–97
 see also Hitler, Adolf; Riefenstahl, Leni
 Germany in Autumn 499–500
Gertrude Stein: When This You See, Remember Me 297–98, 634
 Getting to Our Place 743
 Geyrhalter, Nikolaus 64
 Gheerbrandt, Denis 270
 Ghetto 898
 Giannikaki, Mily 328
 Gibson, Ross 125
 Gide, André 32–33, 970–71
 Giedroyc, Coky 39
 Gilbert, Craig 37
 Gilbertson, Jenny 820
 Gilic, Vlatko 1023–24
 Gilsenan, Alan 415–16
Gimme Shelter 299–300
 Gina 49
 Girls Sports: On the Right Track 277–78
 Gislason, Oskar 391
 Gitai, Amos 421
 Glace à trois faces, La/Mirror with Three Faces 233
 Gladiators, The 978
 Gladin, Stefan 777
 Gladu, André 111
 Glaneurs et la glaneuse, Les/The Gleaners and the She-gleaner 271
 Glascock, Baylis 38
Glass 300–301
 Glass, Philip 109, 506–7
 Glaube Liebe Hoffnung/Faith, Love, Hope 969
 Glawogger, Michael 63
 Gleaners and I, The 957
 Gleyser, Raymundo 528, 531
 Glimpses of Modern Russia 101
 Globo Reporter 186
 Globo Shell Especial/Shell Global Special 113
 Glocken aus der Tiefe/Bells from the Deep 363
 Glover, Guy 137
 GMD (Guomindang) National Party in China 157–58
 Gobetti, Carlo 428
 Gobetti, Paola 428
 Godard, Jean-Luc 151, 153, 246, 269, 301–3, 312–13, 673, 753, 884
 Godbout, Jacques 140
 Godmilow, Jill 303–5
 God's Country 597
 Goebbels, Joseph 95, 294, 471, 539–40, 760, 922
 Goff, Bruce 229
 Goff in der Wüste/Goff in the Desert 229
 Going Home 676
 Gold, Jack 305–7
 Golden Eighties 27
 Golden Gloves 139
 Goldi: When Saturnz Returns 28
 Goldovskaya, Marina 307–9
 Goldovsky, Yevsei 307
 Goldson, Annie 309–11
 Golestan, Ebrahim 409
 Golik, Kreso 1022
 Gone with the Wind 122
 Good Husband, Dear Son 370
 Good News 64
Good Woman of Bangkok, The 57, 311–13, 700
 Gorbachev, Mikhail 191, 307, 723
 Goren, Amit 421
 Goretta, Claude 895–96
 Gorilla Bathes At Noon 594
 Gorin, Jean-Pierre 312–14, 673
 Gosling, Maureen 118, 202
 Gosnell, Larry 134
 Gossliwil 897
 Gottheim, Larry 8
 Government Film Unit (GFU) in Ceylon 710
 Govorukhin, Stanislav 795
 Goya 871
 Grabe, Hans-Dieter 314–16
 Graef, Roger 316–17, 338
 Grams, Wolfgang 97

- Granada, My Granada 478
 Grand Méliès, Le 273–74
 Grange Hill 564
Granton Trawler 317–18, 336, 944
 Grapes of Wrath, The (book) 79, 496, 575
Grass 318–20, 408
 Grass: A Nation's Battle for Life 818–19
 'Grasslands' 721
 Gray, John 820
Great Adventure, The 320–22
Great Day in Harlem, A 321–22
Great White Silence, The 322–24
 Greaves, Bill 130
 Greece 324–32
 Greece Without Columns 327
 Greek Film Center (EKK) 325, 331
 'Greek-ness' issue 327
 Green Society 449
 Greenaway, Peter 18–19
 Greene, Felix 163–64, 332–34
 Greene, Lorne 136
 Greenland on its Way-Home Rule Since 1979 394
 Grenoble Olympics 967
 Grey Gardens 619
Grierson on Documentary (book of essays) 336
 Grierson, John
 actuality 239
 Anstey, Edgar 43
 Australia 54
 Baldi, Gian Vittorio 21
 Bond, Ralph 101
 Canada, NFB 128–29, 169, 337, 439, 880
 Canada Carries On 136–37
 Cavalcanti, Alberto 147–48
 Challenge for Change 151–52
 Christensen, Theodor 812
 Churchill's Island 170
 Coal Face 179–80, 336
 'creative treatment of actuality/reality' 126, 584 de Seta, Vittorio 822–23
 documentary film 334–38
 'documentary' term 253
 Drew, Robert 219
 Drifters 10, 220–23, 336, 942
 Empire Marketing Board 35
 Enough to Eat? 230
 Flaherty, Robert 127, 254, 256, 941
 General Post Office Film Unit 553
 'good totalitarianism' 334
 GPO Film Unit 148
 Granton Trawler 317, 336, 944
 Heyer, John 364
 Housing Problems 227
 I Remember, I remember 337
 Industrial Britain 406
 Jacoby, Irving 439
 Jennings, Humphrey 453
 Legg, Stuart 537
 Listen to Britain 558
 Lorentz, Pare 575, 577, 721
 Lye, Len 584
 Macartney-Filgate, Terence 587
 Malraux, André 599
 Man of Aran 601
 March of Time, The 768
 Moana 643
 Nanook of the North 666
 NFB, Canada 768
 NFU, New Zealand 311
 Night Mail 336, 432, 688
 Parer, Damien 703
 Rogosin, Lionel 772
 Roos, Jørgen 778
 Rotha, Paul 180, 946
 Scotland 819
 Song of Ceylon, The 336, 855–56
 Spare Time 947
 Spottiswoode, Raymond 880
 Tallents, Stephen 941–42
 Taylor, John 900
 'the found story' 578
 Watt, Harry 981
 We Live in Two Worlds 985
 World War I 334
 Wright, Basil 221, 226, 1018, 1019
 Grierson, Marion 942
 Grierson, Ruby 101, 379, 942
 Grigsby, Michael 338–40
 Grizmek, Bernhard 296
 Gross, Nathan 419
 Große Weite Welt/Big, Wide World 969
 Grossman, Karel 1021
 Groulx, Gilles 110, 130, 139–40, 340–41, 725
 Growing Up Female 493–94, 750–51, 823
 Grüningers Case 210
 Grupo Zero (Portugal) 737
 Grusch, Werner 62
 Guerner, Enrique 869
 Guernica 755
 Guerre d'Algérie, La 70
 Guevara, Che 36, 189, 245, 376–77, 740
 Gulca, Stere 777
 Gunn, Gilbert 937
 Gusti, Dimitrie 774
 Gute Ernte/Good Crop 61
 Guzmán, Patricio 75–76, 341, 341–44, 528
 Guzzetti, Alfred 344–46
 gypsies 835
- H
 Haanstra, Bert 300–301
 Haiku 492
 Half Life: A Parable for the Nuclear Age 57

- Hall de nuit 28
 Hall, Stuart 348
 Halliwell, Geri 952
 Hamilton, Juan 285, 287
 Hammid, Alexander 441
 Hamptons, The 503
 Hanák, Dušan 715–16
 Handbikemovie 64
 Handler, Mario 526
Handsworth Songs 29, 347–48
 Hanoi Martes 13/Tuesday 13th 35
 Hansen, Laila 394
Happy Mother's Day, A 348–50, 536
 Hara Factory Workers Struggle 866
 Hardy, Thomas 25
 Harlan County, USA 14, 503
 Harlan, Thomas 737
 Harmless People, The 383
 Harris, Wilson 156
 Harrison, Marguerite 318–19, 408
 Hartkorn, Morten 394
 Hasta la vitoria siempre/Always until Victory 36
 Hatami, Ali Shah 411
 Hatch, James 249
 Hatzopoulos, Takis 328
 Haufler, Max 210
 'Hava Nagila' (song) 690
 Hawes, Stanley 54
 Hawking, Stephen 659
 Health for the Nation 947
 Heart of the Angel 951
 Heart of Britain 454
Heart of Darkness (book) 970
Heart of Spain 350–51, 495, 892
Hearts of Darkness: A Film-maker's Apocalypse 119, 353–55
Hearts and Minds 194, 351–53, 828, 829
 Heaven 643–44
 Heftig og bergeistret/Cool and Crazy 800
 Hegedus, Chris 355–57, 709, 975–76
 Hegg, A. E. 173
 Hegin, Sven Anders 160
 Heider, Karl 196–97
Heidi Fleiss: Hollywood Madam 357–59
 Heinrichs, Margarethe 62
 Heisler, Stuart 679
Hell Unlimited 259–360
 Heller, André 63
 Heller, Peter 360–62
 Hello, Do You Hear Us? 723
 Hemingway, Ernest 432, 901
 Hendrix, Jimi 652
 Henningsen, Poul 811
 Henriksen, Leonardo 76
 Henry Ford Hospital 548
 Henry Miller Odyssey, The 38
 Hepp, Joseph 325
 Heritage of Lanka 711
 Heritage of Slavery 194
 Héritiers, Les/Heirs 340
 Hermógenes Cayo 741
 Herrhausen, Alfred 97
 Herz aus Glas/Heart of Glass 363
 Herzog, Werner 14, 118–19, 362–64, 544
 Hesant, Philippe 238
 Heta Buraku/Heta Village 449
 Heuwetter/Hay Weather 290
 Heyer, John 54, 65, 364–65
 Heynowski, Walter 290–91
 Hi wa Katabuki/The Setting Sun 481
 Hickenlooper, George 353–55
 High Culture 454
 High Over the Borders 439
High School 365–67
 Himmel und Erde/Sky and Earth 62
 Hirari, Rafiq 676
 Hiroshima, mon amour/Hiroshima, My Love 753, 756
 Hiroshima, Nagasaki-Atom bombenopfer sagen auf/Atom Bomb Victims Speak Out 315
Hiroshima-Nagasaki, August 1945 367–69
 Hirtenreise 518
 His Family 814
 Histaklut al Acco/Observing Acre 420
 Histoire d'A/A Story 270
 Histoire du soldat inconnu/History of the Unknown Soldier 888
 Histoires du cinéma/Histories of Cinema 77, 302
History: The Last Things Before the Last (book) 4
 History and Romance of Transportation, The 632
 Hitchcock, Alfred 648–49
 Hitler, Adolf
 Battle of Russia, The 80
 Berlin Olympic games 966
 Canada Carries On series 137
 Dovzhenko, Alexander 74
 Gance, Abel 17
 Leiser, Erwin 538–39
 Litvak, Anatole 559–60
 March of Time, The 610
 Mein Kampf 624–26
 Nazis, The: A Warning from History 669–70
 Nazism 7
 Night and Fog 685
 Olympia 692
 On the Dead Angle 63
 Reichsautobahn 95
 Riefenstahl, Leni 759–60
 Triumph of the Will 7, 118, 625, 922–24
 Wall, The 105
 Ho Chi Minh 398–99, 833–34
 Hokusai 21
 Holban, Florica 776
 Hold-Up 743

- Hole in the Soul 594
 Holmes, Burton 319
 The Holocaust
 Althans, Ewald 94
 Aujourd'hui, dis-moi 26
 Beruf: Neonazi 92–93
 Charlotte vie ou theater 897
 Escape to Life 986
 Israel 417, 419, 421
 Kirchheimer, Manfred 492
 Lanzmann, Claude 521
 Leiser, Ewin 540
 Mein Kampf 624
 Memorandum 130, 625–26
 My Father's House 496
 Nazis, The: A Warning from History 670
 Night and Fog 686, 754–55, 758, 839, 847
 Sang des bêtes, Le 806
 Shoah 839–40
 Sweetest Sound, The 91
 Home from the Hill 50, 951
 Home from the Sea 711
 Homeland 724
 Homework 485–86
 homosexuality
 Allégret, Marc 33
 American Family, An 37
 Frantz Fanon: Black Skin, White Mask 276
 Ireland 415
 Jutra, Claude, 139
 Looking for Langston 574
 Mclean, Ross (CBC) 592
 Portillo, Lourdes 713
 Riggs, Marlon 764
 Schlesinger, John 816
 Honbres y toros/Men and Bulls 872
 Honecker, Erich 291
 Honigmann, Heddy 369–70
 Hoodwinked 416
Hoop Dreams 370–72
 Hopper, Dennis 353
 Hora de los hornos, La/The Hour of the Furnaces 528
 Horsey Mail, The 436
 Horsfield, Bruce 570
 Horta, José Ramos 56
Hospital 372–73
 Høst, Per 812
 Hostage: The Bachar Tapes 676
 Hot Dogs film festival (Toronto) 136, 1005
 'Hot Time in the Old Town Tonight' (song) 766
Hôtel des Invalides 374–76
 Hotel Monterey 26
 Hotel Terminus: The Life and Times of Klaus Barbie 697–98, 840, 925
 Hotere 637
 Hotet/The Threat 813
 Hound of the Deep, The 385
Hour of the Furnaces, The 375–77, 912–13
 House on 92nd Street, The 767
 House Un-American Activities Committee (HUAC) 802
 Housing Discrimination 414
Housing Problems 10, 44, 227, 230–31, 377–79, 856, 900, 943, 1019
 Housing in Scotland 938
 How Green Was My Valley 79
 How the Myth Was Made 886
 How to Invent Reality 814
How to Make a Movie (manual) 383
 How Yukong Moved the Mountains 10
 Howe, Arthur 676
 Hřebejk, Jan 192
 Hsu Chih-Chiang 163
 Hubbard, Frances 254
 Hughes, John 379–81
 Huisken, Joop 289
 human rights
 China 164
 Chile 343
 December 7 400
 Goldson, Annie 310
 Great Adventure, The 321
 Khmer Rouge Killing Machine, The 864
 Life and Debt 992
 Pilger, John 718
 Time of Harvey Milk, The 910
 Who Bombed Birmingham? 1000
Human, Too Human 382, 597
 Humphrey, Hubert 219–20, 535, 652, 744–45
 Humphrey Jennings: The Man who Listened to Britain 589
 Hundertwasser 62
 Hundstage/Dogdays 63
Hunters, The 382–84, 614
 Hurley, Frank 56, 384–86, 860, 862
 Hurwitz, Leo 667–68, 892
 Huston, John 81–82, 386–88
 Huston, Walter 80
 Huxley, Julian 230
- I
- I am Twenty 402
 I Cantieiri del'Adriatico/Adriatic Shipyards 423
 I dementicati/The Forgotten Ones 832
I Do Not Know What It Is I Am Like 389–90
 I Katasrofi tis Thessalonikis/The Destruction of Thessaloniki 324
 I Live in Behrampada 404
 I loved You ... 505
 I Remember, I remember 337
 I Tragodia tou Aigaiou/The Tragedy of Aegean 326

- I was a Fireman 928
 ICAIC see Cuban Institute of Film Art and Industry
 ICAM (Instituto de Cinematografia, Audiovisuais e Multimédia) in Portugal 737
 Iceland/Greenland 390–94
 Icelandic Film Fund 393
 Ichikawa, Kon 395, 917, 967
 IDHEC (Institut des hautes études cinématographiques) 116, 596, 641, 847
 If You Love This Planet 837
 Ifigli del carbone/The Sons of Coal 423
 Ika Hands 284
 Ikebana 21
 Ikiteite yokkata/Still it's Good to Live 474
 Il Bacio di Tosca 897
 Il Monde di notte/World by Night 647
 Il y a longtemps que je t'aime/I've Loved You for a Long Time 725
 Illeksen 57
 Ilha das Flores/Island of the Flowers 113
 Iliesiu, Sorin 777
 Iliesu, Mirel 775
 Im toten Winkel/On the Dead Angle 63
Images du Cinéma Français (book) 705
Imagining Reality: The Faber Book of Documentary 588
 IMAX films
 Canada, NFB 130–31, 135
 Journey into Amazing caves 394
 Jacoby, Irving 441
 Transitions 131
 Titanica 135
 Imbach, Thomas 898
 Immer bereit/Always Ready 288
 In Calabria 833
 In Circles 298
In the Company of Men 50, 396–97, 951
 In Defence of Madrid 477–78
 In Der Totale Urlaub/The Total Holiday 236
 In the Grip of the Polar Ice 385
 In Hermano Fidel/My brother Fidel 36
 In the Name of God 403
 In Prison 638
 In Search of Lost Time 211
 In Search of Truth on Wartime 716
 In the Secret Country 715
 In Time Indefinite 591
 In Today we Live 101
 In Two Minds 949
 In a Visit 581
In the Year of the Pig 46, 397–400, 824, 939
 INCE (National Institute of Educational Cinema) in Brazil 616
 Incident at Loch Ness 119
 Incident at Oglala 47
 INCOM (Industria Corta Metragio) 423
 Indama Yakbi al-Rigal/When Men Cry 672
 Independence of Romania, The 774
 Independent Film-makers Association (IFA) 477
 India
 documentary films 400–405
 Malle, Louis 597
Indian Documentary (magazine) 402
 Indian Green Revolution 404
 Indian News Parade (INP) 401
 Indonesia 864
Industrial Britain 239–40, 406–7
 Inextinguishable Fire 304
 Information Films of India (IFI) 401
 Initiation à la danse de possession/Initiation to the Dance of the Possessed 783
 Inner Eye, The 403
 Innocent Eye, The 816
 Inquiry 979
 Inside Nazi Germany 610
 institutional mode of production (IMP) 117
 Institut Français d'Afrique Noire (IFAN) 782
 Instituto Nacional do Cinema Educativo (INCE) in Brazil 112
 Insurrección de la burguesia, La/The Uprising of the Bourgeoisie 342
 International Federation of Film Archives (FIAPF) 520
 Interviews with My Lai Veterans 894
 Introduction to the End of an Argument 675
Introduction to the Enemy 407
 Invent Reality 66
 Invisible–Illegal in Europe 969
Invitation to the Film 413
 Ir Ha'Ohalim/Tent City 419
 IRA 841–42, 1000
 Iracema, uma transa Amazonica/Iracema, An Amazonian Affair 113
 Iran 407–12, 677
 Iranian Documentary Film-makers' Association (IRDFA) 411
 Ireland 412–16
 Irish Empire, The 416
 Irish Film Society 413
 Is the Crown at War with Us? 691
 Is It Easy to Be Young? 723
 Isaacs, Jeremy 416–17, 1015–17
 Iskustvo Kino 307
 Islamic Republic of Iran Broadcasting (IRIB) 411
 Ísland ílifandi myndum/Iceland in Moving Pictures 390–91
 Israel
 documentary films 417–22
 Lebanon 673
 Issue Should be Avoided, The 958
 Istoriya grazhdanskoi voiny/The History of the Civil War 796
 Istoriya krsanoi armii/The History of the Red Army 796
 Italian Communist Party (PCI) 655

- Italiane e l'amore, Le (Latin Lovers) 21
 Italy
 exploration documentaries 425
 Fiat 424, 429
 film documentaries 422–30
 missionaries 424–25 public channels 427
 tourism 424
 types of documentaries 427
 Itan Mera Giortis/It Was A Feast Day 328
 It's a Crime 501
 It's Now or Never 66
 It's a Wonderful Life 145
 Ivens, Joris
 17e Parallele 246
 400 Million, The 262–64
 Baldi, Jean Vittorio 21
 China 161
 De Brug 114
 DEFA (GDR) 289
 documentary films 430–35
 ENI (Italy) 424
 Housing Problems 44
 Karmen, Roman 478
 Kline, Herbert 551, 553
 Lotar, Eli 53
 Malraux, André 599
 Maros, Vassilis 325
 Marxism 10
 New Earth 683–84
 Rain 749, 763
 Regen 7
 Spanish Earth, The 10, 350, 438, 478, 496, 901
 Storck, Henri 887
 US Film Service 577
 Zuidersee 514
 Ives, Bert 53
- J
- J'accuse/I Accuse 726
 Jackson, Angela 42–43
 Jackson, Pat 121, 436–37
 Jacobs, Lewis 437–39
 Jacoby, Irving 439–42
 Jacopetti, Gualtiero 646
 Jacquot de Nantes 957
 Jagger, Mick 118
 Jaguar 785
 Jahre der Entscheidung 471–72
 James, Steve 370–72
 Jamil, Muhammad Shukri 676
Jane 442–43, 708
Janis 135, 443–45
 Janovics, Eugen (Jeno) 774
 Japan 445–51
 Jarl, Stefan 813
 Jarre, Maurice 274
 Jasenovac 1021
 Jaws 847
 Jazz 122
Jazz on a Summer's Day 321, 451–53 880–82
 Je tu il elle 26
 Jeanne Dielman ... 26 28
 Jefferson, Thomas 122
 Jenin, Jenin 673
 Jennings, Humphrey
 Anderson, Lindsay 40
 BBC: The Voice of Britain 86
 Cavalcanti, Alberto 453
 Diary for Timothy, A 207–9, 928–29
 documentary films 452–58
 Family Portrait 243–44
 Fires Were Started 250–51, 928, 947
 history and tradition 239
 I was a Fireman 928
 Jackson, Pat 436
 Listen To Britain 5, 339, 432, 555, 928, 947, 1016, 1019
 London Can Take It 567–68
 Mass Observation 10, 251–52, 452, 556 poetic tradition 959
 'propoganda for the human race' 899
 Spare Time 6, 10, 148, 556, 947
 True Story of Lili Marlene, The 923–24, 928
 Vas, Robert 958–59
 wartime films 948
 Jeremy, John 163
 'Jerusalem' 347, 739
 Jésus de Montréal/Jesus of Montreal 49
 Jeux interdits 73
 Jim Shvante marili svanets/Salt for Svanetia 794
 Johanna d'Arc de Mongolia 701
 Johnson, Lyndon B. 533–34
 Johnston, Lawrence 236–37
 Joking Relationship, A 614
Joli Mai, Le/The Lovely May 268, 458–60, 612
 Jones, David 50
 Joplin, Janis 135, 443–45
 Journey of a Nation 364
Journey, The 460–62, 979
 Journey to Beijing 155–56
 Journey Together 107–8
Joyce at 34 463–66
 Joyce, James 721, 766
 Ju/'hoansi 614–15
 Judex 375
 Jugend der Welt 471
 Juguetes rotos/Broken Toys 872
 Julien, Isaac 275–76, 465–66, 573
 Junge, Barbara 466–71
 Junge, Winfried 289, 466–71
 Junghans, Carl 471–72
 Jungle Woman, The 385

- Jusqu'à la Victoire/Until Victory 673
 Jutra, Claude 21, 139–41
 Juvenile Liaison 2 951
- K
- Kafr Kassem 673
 Kahn, Albert 264
 Kak, Sanjay 404
 Kalatozov, Mikhail 794
 Kalish, Donald 42
 Kambalai 404
 Kamei, Fumio 473–76
 Kampen om Mardøla/The Fight for Mardøla 813–14
 Kane, Art 321–22
 Kanehsatake: 270 Years of Resistance 502
 Kanin, Garson 207
 Kaplan, Nelly 17
 Kar, Law 154
 Karabasz, Kazimierz 103, 729
 Karamaggiolos, Menelaos 331
 Karaman, Josip 1021
 Kareez/Canal 410
 Karlin, Marc 476–77
 Karmen, Roman 477–79
 Katsuhiko, Fukada 481
 Katzourakis, Kyriakos 332
 Kauffmann, Stanley 479–81
 Kaufman, Denis Arkadyevich see Vertov, Dziga
 Kaufman, Mikhail 791
 Kaul, Mani 402
 Kawase, Naomi 481–82
 Kazuo, Hara 449–50
 Keiller, Patrick 482–84
 Kendall, Jeni 55
 Kenji, Mizoguchi 117
 Kennedy, Jacqueline 745
 Kennedy, John F. 219–20, 533, 535, 618, 652, 744–45, 844
 Kennedy, Robert 533
 Kerouac, Jack 746
 Kerr, Walter 443
 Kes 564–65
 KGH (Greenland Trade Department) 393
 Khalfan and Zanzibar 345
 Khleifi, Michel 673
 Khmer Rouge Killing Machine, The 864
 Kiarostami, Abbas 177–78, 484–87, 677
 Kid Who Couldn't Miss 132, 134
Kieślowski on Kieślowski (interview) 487
 Kieślowski, Krzysztof 253, 487–89
 Kill or be Killed 585
 Killers, The 850
 Kincaid, Jamaica 993
 Kinemacolor process 953
Kinematograph Weekly (journal) 74
- 'Kinetoscope Hall', Vienna 59
 King, Allan 134, 489–91
 King, Don 996
 King Kong 155, 182–83, 818
 King, Martin Luther 100, 689
 King, Martin Luther Jr. 533, 845
 King Norodom Sihanouk 864
Kino: A History of Russian and Soviet Film (book) 604
 Kino-Eye 961
Kino-Front (journal) 232
 Kino-Pravda (film-truth) 246, 791, 960–61
 Kinoglaz/Kino-Eye: Life Caught Unawares 791
kinoki (neologism) 960
 Kinski, Klaus 119–20
 Kirchheimer, Manfred 491–93
 Kiss 977
 Klaffke, Pamela 47
 Kleiman, Naum 307
 Klein, Herbert 419
 Klein, James 493–95, 751, 823–24
 Kleinerman, Isaac 962–63
 Klic/The Key 191
 Kline, Herbert 350–51, 495–97, 551–52
 Klingensmaier Thomas 100
Klint (book) 883
 Klondike Gold Rush 173
 Kluge, Alexander 497–501
 Knight, Eric 80
 Knofflikari/Buttoners 191
 'Know Your Country' 53
 Knox, Robert 855, 857
 Knud 779–80
 Kobayashi, Issa 446, 474
 Koenig, Wolf 130, 173, 501–2, 568–8, 587
 Koepp, Volker 290, 293
 Köfinger, Kurt 60
 Kolm, Anton 60
 Kolm, Luise 60
 Kolowrat, Graf Alexander 60
 Kolya/Kolja 192
 Komm in der Garten/Come into the Garden 202
 Kon-Tiki 812
 Konec/End 706
 Kongress der Penguin 897
 Konzert in Freien/Outdoor Concert 105, 293
 Kopple, Barbara 502–4
 Korda, Alexander 256, 554–55
 Korup-An African Rain Forest 24–25
 Kosminsky, Peter 841–42
 Kossakovsky, Viktor 504–5
 Koundouros, Roussos 326
 Kourkoulakou, Lila 327
 Koutsaftis, Filoppos 332
Koyaanisqatsi 505–6
 KPD (Kommunistische Partei Deutschlands) 288

- Kracauer, Siegfried cinematic realism 2, 7, 15, 430–31, 513
From Cagliari to Hitler 922
Man with the Movie Camera 604
 'Nazi newsreel music' 295
 'terra incognita' 14
Theory of Film 4
- Kramer, Robert 507–8
- Krauser, Jochen 291
- Kreimeier, Klaus 95
- Krelja, Peter 508–9
- Krieg, Peter 831
- Kroitor, Roman 130, 568–69, 587
- Kroppem Min/My Body 814
- Kroske, Gert 292
- Kruschev, Nikita 74
- Kryonas, Apostolos 328
- Ku Klux Klan 892
- Kubelka, Peter 233
- Kühnen, Michael 93
- Kuleshov effect 115
- Kulturfilmbuch* (book) 294
- Kulturfilme* 159, 244, 294
- !Kung ju/'hoansi 382
- !Kung of Nyae Nyae, The 383
- Kya Ka Ra Ba A 481
- Kyoto 395
- L
- La Belgique nouvelle/New Belgium 888
- La espalda del mundo/The Back of the World 875
- La sémiologie en question* (book) 641
- La Veja memoria/The Old Memory 873
- Lacombe, Georges 510–12, 1034–35
- Ladybird Ladybird 565
- Lahola, Leopold 419
- Lair of the Spider, The 823
- Lajola, Anna 428
- L'Amour existe/Love Exists* 512
- Land, The* 257, 513–14, 577
- Land Without Bread* (Las Hurdes) 514–17, 869
- Langjahr, Erich 517–19, 897
- Langlois, Henri 272–74, 519–21, 600, 783
- Lanzmann, Claude 14, 270, 521–22, 839–40
- Lao Patriotic Front Documentary Film Service 864
- Laos 864–65
- L'appel du silence 727
- Lapping, Brian 522–24
- L'Arroseur arrosé 583
- Las fiestas del centenario 919
- Las Hurdes see Land Without Bread
- Las Madres de la Plaza de Mayo/Mothers of the Plaza de Mayo 530, 732
- Las riquezas de Quintana Roo 919
- Lasky Jedne Plavovlasky/Love of a Blonde 191
- Lasky, Jesse 182, 256, 319, 818
- Last Secret, The 958
- Last Waltz, The 1011
- Latalla, Marcin 731
- Latin America 524–31
- Law and Order* 12, 531–33
- Lawson, David 28
- LBJ* 35–36, 533–34, 689
- La condition humaine* (book) 599
- Le Grice, Malcolm 8
- Le Monde de Paul Delvaux/The World of Paul Delvaux 889
- Le Patron est Mort/The Boss is Dead 888
- Le Retour du Tchad* (book) 970
- Leacock, Richard
Chair, The 150
 cinéma vérité 1008
 'direct cinema' 219
 documentary films 534–37
 dramatic events 12
 Drew, Robert 219–20
 Ertel, Dieter 235
 Flaherty, Robert 257, 535
Happy Mother's Day, A 348–49
Law and Order 12
 Louisiana Story 257
 Marshall, John 614
 mobile reporting 744
Momma Don't Allow 646
 Primary 618
 Rouch, Jean 535
 Wildenhahn, Klaus 1007
- Leader, The Driver and the Leader's Wife, The 11
- Leader, The, His Driver and the Driver's Wife 951
- Leahy, Joe 57
- Lear '87 archive 304
- Leaving Home 405
- Lebanon 675
- Lebenswelt* ('lifeworld') 2, 4, 12
- Le Cavalier, Louise 47
- Leduc, Paul 529
- Lee, Spike 29
- Legendre, Maurice 514
- Legg, Stuart 136–37, 169–70, 537–38, 1017
- Leiden University 114
- Leipzig in Herbst/in Autumn 968–69
- Leipzig in Herbst/Leipzig in Fall 292
- Leiris, Michel 32
- Leiser, Erwin 95, 538–41, 624
- Leiterman, Douglas 133, 541–42
- Lektionen in Finsternis/Lessons in Darkness 362–63
- Lelouch, Claude 542–44, 967
- Lenin 961
- Leningrad at War 478
- Lennon, John 975
- Lennon, Peter 414
- Lerner, Yehuda 521

- Leroy Douglas 492
 Lerski, Helmer 418–19
Les Caves du Vatican/Lafcaadio's Adventures (book) 33
Les Faux-Monnayeurs/The Counterfeiters (book) 33
Les grandes missions du cinéma (book) 88
 Lesiewicz, Witold 729
 Leslie, Alfred 746
L'Espoir (book) 599, 607
Lessons of Darkness 544–45
 Lest We Forget 128
 Let There Be Light 81, 387
Let Us Now Praise Famous Men (book) 22–23
 Leth, Jorgen 813–14
 Letjat zhuravli/The Cranes are Flying 794
 Letter to the Next Generation 493–94
 Letters from Vietnam 845
 Lettre de Beyrouth/Letter from Beirut 674
 Lettre de Sibérie/Letter from Siberia 268, 612, 807
 L'étude du sang/The Study of Blood 264
 Letzes Jahr Titanic/Last Year Titanic 969
 Leve blant løver/Living among Lions 814
 Level Five 612
 Lever, Yver 138
 Lévesque, René 49, 140
 Lévi-Strauss, Claude 32, 95
 Lewis, Mark 58, 142
 Leyda, Jay 74, 115, 545–47, 705–6, 934
 Lhomme, Pierre 458–59
 L'hommes aux semelles d'or/The Man with the Golden Soles 676
 Li Minwei 157
 Lianhua Film Company 158
 Lichtenstein, Roy 47
 Lied der Ströme/Song of Streams 289
 Life Apart, A 339
Life and Death of Frida Kahlo, The 548–49
 Life and Debt 991–93
 Life on Earth 9
 Life, Love and Death 543
Life (magazine) 219, 287, 534, 535
 Life and Nothing More/Zendagi va digar Hich 484
 Life in Outer Space 845
 Life Space 162
 Life and Times of John Huston Esq, The 884
Life and Times of Rosie the Riveter, The 14, 549–51
 Life and Times of Wu Zhong-Kian, The 154
 Life Underground, A 339
Lights out in Europe 495–96, 551–53
 likeness of everyday occurrence 1–4
 'Lili Marlene' (song) 929
 Lind, Alfred 390
 L'Inde fantôme 597
Line to Tcherva Hut 553–54, 947, 985
 Linea paterna, La/The Paternal Line 630
Lion Has Wings, The 554–55
 Lion in the House, A 751
 Lippman, Walter 941
 L'Isola di Varano/Varano Island 426
 List, Niki 62
Listen To Britain 5, 251, 339, 432, 455, 555–59, 928, 947, 1016, 1019
 L'Italia non e un paese povero/Italy is not a Poor Country 424, 433
 Littin, Miguel 76
 Little Capitalist Tetralogy (Vachek, Karel) 955–56
 Little Dieter Needs to Fly 98
 Litttaufer, Karen 394
 Litvak, Anatole 77, 80, 559–60
 Living Camera, The (series) 150–51
Living Desert, The 561–62
 Living on the Edge 339
 Living Lenin 778
 Ljubavni slučaj ili tragedija sluzbenice PTT/Love Affair ... 593
 Ljubic, Vesna 562–63
 Loach, Ken career 949–50
 documentary films 563–67
 family dramas 564
 politics 564
 Stewart, Charles 884
 Løchen, Erik 812
 Locke, Edouard 47
 Lodger, The 649
 Loin du Vietnam/Far from Vietnam 301, 612
 Loisios, Leon 326, 328
 Lombardi, Guido 428
London Can Take It 452, 482, 558, 567–68, 820, 982
 Londoners, The 900
 Lone Ranger, The 35
Lone Boy 130, 502, 568–70
 Lonely Night, The 441
Long Tan: The True Story 570–71
 Long Way Home, The 839
 Longest, The 968
 Longinotto, Kim 571–73, 837
 Look Back in Anger 239
Looking for Langstan 465, 573–75
 Loon's Necklace, The 128
 L'Opéra-Mouffe 957
 Lopes, Fernando 736, 738
 L'Or des mers 234
 Lords of Little Egypt 1030
 Lorentz, Pare 223, 257, 513, 575–78, 719, 765–66, 886, 892
 Loridan, Marceline 246, 433
 Lorraine coeur d'acier/Lorraine Steel Heart 269
 Los Hijos de Baragua/My Footsteps in Baragua 991–92
 Los Rollos perdidos de Pancho Villa/Pancho Villas's Lost Reels 630

- Losers, The 967
 Losev 504
Lost Horizon (book) 552
 Lotar, Eli 52–53, 267, 514, 516
 Loubignac, Jean 265
Louisiana Story 254, 257, 578–79, 696
 Lourdes et ses miracles/Lourdes and its Miracles 787
 Love Arik Sharon 421
 Love/Ljubav 1024
 Low, Colin 130, 151, 173, 579–80
 Lozinski, Marcel 580–82, 731
 LUCE (l'Unione Cinematografica Educativa) 422–23
 Lugowski, David M. 116
 Lukács, Georg 4, 15–16, 153, 154
Lukácsian Film Theory and Cinema (book) 1
 Lullaby 961
 Lumber 943
 Lumière, Auguste 544, 582, 1012
 Lumière Brothers
 Algeria 671
 Austria 59
 Canada 126
 early films 1
 France 264
 Guzzetti, Alfred 345
 Kaufmann, Stanley, 479
 India 400
 history of cinema 582–84
 Portugal 734
 Spain 868
 Lumière, Louis 4, 520, 544, 582–83, 1012
 Lump, The 305
 Lursmani cheqmashi/Nail in the Boot 794
 Luther Metke at 94 740
 Lutte, La/Wrestling 139
 Lye, Len 584–86
- M
- Ma Femme Chamada Bicho/My Wife, Bicho 737
 Ma première brasse/My First Stroke 661
 Macartney-Filgate, Terence 130, 587–88
 McCartney, Paul 975
 MacDonald, David 107, 121
 MacDonald, Kevin 588–90
 MacDonald, Sandra 133
 Macedonia 1024
 McElwee, Ross 590–91
 McGuinness, James Kevin 79
 McKeand, Martin 199
 Mackenzie, Jack 78
 McLaren, Norman 129, 359
 McLean, Ross (CBC) 133, 592–93
 McLean, Ross (NFB) 128–29
 McMurchy, Megan 258
 Machin, Alfred 264
 Mäedchen in Wittstock/Girls in Wittstock 290
 Magia Verde/Green Magic 427
 Magic Lantern Foundation, The 405
 Magiciens de Wanzerbe, Les/The Magicians of Wanzerbe 783
 Maîtres fous, Les/The Mad Masters 267, 783
 Makarcynski, Tadeusz 728
 Makavejev, Dusan 593–96
 Makedonikas Games/Macedonian Wedding 327–28
 Makhmalbaf, Mohsen 177–78, 486
 Making of an Englishman, The 588
 Makmalbaf, Mohsen 677
 Malaysia 865
 Maldonaldo, Eduardo 529
 Malet, Leo 540
 Malle, Louis 382, 402, 596–98, 713–15, 847, 860
 Malraux, André 598–600, 607–8
 Maltese Falcon, The 81
 Malvinas, Historia de traicones/Story of Betrayal 530
 Mama General 361
Man of Aran 22, 254, 256, 407, 412, 513, 578, 600–602, 666, 900
Man with the Movie Camera 10, 232, 602–5, 781, 791, 907–8, 961
 Man, One Family 651
 Man Who Loved Gary Lineker, The 964
 Man Who Skied Down Everest, The 135
 Manaki, Ienake 774
 Manchukuo Film Association 159
 Mander, Fred 156
Manhatta 605–7
 Mani Matter, 897
 Mann, Ron 135
Man's Hope 607–8
 Manteau, Le 507
 Manthoulis, Roviros 329
 Mantilla, Fernando Garcia 869
Manufacturing Consent: Noam Chomsky and the Media 135, 609–10, 1008
 Mao Tse-tung 164
 Mapai party (Israel) 419
 Marcel Duchamp: In His Own Words 438
 March, Frédéric 263
March of Time, The 169, 231, 585, 610–11, 697, 767, 851, 945, 1003, 1017
 Maréchal ferrant, Le/The Blacksmith Farrier 787
 Marguillies, Stan 965
 Maria Sabina mujer espiritu/Spiritual Woman 630
 'Marie-France et Véronique' 21
 Marker, Chris
 Battle of Chile, The 76
 CNC 600
 Cuba Si! 9, 189–90
 documentary films 611–13

- Free Cinema 14
 French films 268
 Goldovskaya, Marina 309
Joli Mai, Le/The Lovely May 458–59
 Karlin, Marc 476
 Lettre de Sibérie 268 political/militant cinema 433
 reality 177
Sans Soleil/Sunless 125, 434, 807–8
 SLON 246
 Market in Berlin 71
 Markovic, Goran 1024
 Marks, Dick 57
 Markt in Berlin/Street Markets in Berlin 294
 Marlene, Lili 928–30
 Maros, Vassilis 325–27, 329
 Married 742
 Married in America 47–48
 Married Couple, A 490
 Marshall, George C. 82, 144
 Marshall, John 382–84, 613–16
 Marti, José 37
 Mary Cassat: Impressionist from Philadelphia 634
 Masanori, Oe 449
 Mason, Bill 135
 Masri, Mai 673–74
 Mass Observation (MO) project 453, 456, 556, 558, 568, 947
 Master, A Building in Copacabana 186
Mastersingers of Nuremberg, The (opera) 7
 Maternelle, La 88
 Mathison, Trevor 29
 Matii samepo/Their Empire 794
 Mato Eles?/Did I Kill Them? 113
 Matovic, Momir 1025
 Matreinson, Heidar 393
 Matuszewski, Boleslaw 143
 Maudite galette, La/The Damned Dough 49
 Mauri/Life Force 636
 Maurikios, Dimitiris 329–30
 Mauro, Humberto 112, 616–18
 Mawson, Douglas 384–85
 Max Hafler, 'The Mute' 210
 Mayer, Rudi 60
 Mayse Gomshodeh/The Lost Requiem 409
 Maysles, Albert 618–21, 744–45, 801, 1007
 Mazzetti, Lorenza 948
Meat 621–22, 988
Mechanics of the Brain, The 622–24
Media Marathon (book) 368
 Médicales, Les/Concerned with Medicine 267
 Meet the Pioneers 40
 Megacities 63
 Mehrenfar, Farhad 411
Mein Kampf 538–40, 624–26, 924
 Melbourne Cinema Division 53
 Melford, George 127
 Méliès, George 582
 Mellele (gypsy community) 330
Memorandum 130, 626–27
 Memory 476
 Memory of the Rose, The 775 memory and spectatorship 3
Memphis Belle 627–28
 Men of Africa 1019
 Men in Danger 436, 947
 Mendel Szajnfelds zweite Reise nach Deutschland/
 Second Journey to Germany 314
 Mendive, Manuel 740
 Mendoza, Carlos 629
 Menk (My/Us) 707
 Menschen am Sonntag/People on Sunday 525–26, 850
 Menu, Paul 774
 Meravidis, Dimitris 324
 Meravidis, Prodomos 325
 Mercier, Jean-Francois 141
 Mesguich, Felix 671
 Meshes of the Afternoon 15, 205
 Message to Love: The Isle of Wight Festival 1012
 Messter, Oskar 293
 Meszaro, Titus 775
 Metal and Melancholy 369
Metaphors on Vision (manifesto) 109
 Methadone: An American Way of Dealing 493, 750–51, 823
 Metro, Le 272
 Mettler, Peter 898
 Metz, Christian 641
 Mexican Revolution 920
 Mexico 628–31, 918–19
 Meyer, Carl 89
 Meyers, Sidney 631–32, 696
 Mi Tai Nora 741
 Michael X 28
 Michelangelo 123
 Michelangelo: Das Leben eines Titanen 295
 Middle East see Near/Middle East
 Middletown 195
 Midnight Cowboy 816
 Milestones 507
 Miller Adato, Perry 633–35
Mills of the Gods: Viet Nam, The 541, 635–36
 Milosevic 1025–27
 Minamata Series (Japan) 448–50
 Minefield! 107
 Mineral Wealth 53
 Mingozzi, Gianfranco 426
 Mingxing Film Company 158
 Minh-ha, Trinh T. 666
 Minimata: kanjo-san to sono sekai/The Victims and Their World 931
 Ministry of Information (MOI)
 Anstey, Edgar 44
 Boulting brothers 107

- DATA 31
 Elton, Arthur 227
 Hurley, Frank 385
 India 401
 Jennings, Humphrey 453
London Can Take It 567
 Lye, Len 585
 peace aim documentaries 937–38
True Glory, The 207
Tunisian Victory 933
 MIPE TV ('direct cinema') 139
 Mir, Ezra 401
 Miramax Films 654–55
 Mirror Effect 672
 Mise Éire/I am Ireland 413
 Misselwitz, Helke 292
 Missing 768
 Mississippi River 766
 Mita, Merata 68, 636–38
 Mitchell, Denis 338, 638–40
 Mitry, Jean 640–42
Moana 221, 254–56, 406–7, 513, 578–79, 642–43, 666, 941, 970
 Moati, Serge 269
 'mockumentary' format 142
 Models 64
 Modern Orphans of the Storm 1019 modernism
 British Empire 385
 European 175
 'formalist-modernism' 8
 Japanese cinema 117
 Land, The 513
 Rien que les heures 147, 763
 Scotland 819, 821
 Strand, Paul 890
 Three Songs about Lenin 908
 United States 606
 Zone, La 1034
 'Mods Trilogy' 813
 Moffat, Tacey 643–45
 Moghadasian, Mohammad 410
 Mohan, Reena 404
 Moi, un Noir/I, a Black 21, 255, 267, 784
 Moisson, Charles 59
 Mokhtari, Ebrahim 410
 Moments Like These 379
Momma Don't Allow 645–46, 753, 948, 984
 Monastiraki 330
 Moncada, Mercedes 630
 Monde du silence, Le see Silent World, The Mondo Cane/A Dog's Life 646–48
 Money Changers, The 848
 Monos como Becky/Monkeys Like Becky 875
 Monroe, Marilyn 739
 Montagne infidèle, La 233
 Montagu, Ivor 359, 648–52
 Montenegro 1025
Monterey Pop 444, 652–53, 709, 1011
 see also Woodstock: Three Days of Peace
 Montero, Germaine 52
Monthly Film Bulletin (journal) 75, 122, 244
 Montreal World Fair, Expo 67 130
 Moodeitj, Yorgas 643
 Moore, Michael
 Bowling for Columbine 237
 Broomfield, Nick 358
 documentary films 653–55
 Fahrenheit 9/11 11, 846
 Lumière Brothers 582
 Ophüls Marc
 Roger Or 846
 Seidl, Ulrich 825
 Switzerland 898
 Mor Vran (La mer des corbeaux)/The Sea of the Crows 234
 Morais, José Álvaro 737
 Moravská Hellas/Moravian Hellas 955
 'More' (song) 647
 Moretti, Nanni 429, 655–57
 Morgarten findet statt/Morgarten is Happening 518
 Morin, Edgar 10, 49, 164–67, 345, 358, 657–58, 784
 Morning in the Streets 638
 'Morphology of the Photographic Image, The' 2
 Morris, Errol 55, 110, 658–60, 825, 902–3
 Morrison, George 414
 Mort du cygne, La 88
 Motazed, Khanbaba 408
 Mother of Many Children 691
 Mother, The 114
 Mothership Collection, The 29–30
 Mothlight 108
 Motivations 740
 Motzilor, County, The 775
 Moullet, Luc 270, 660–61
 Mountbatten, Lord 120
 Mourir a Madrid see To Die in Madrid
 Mourir à tue-tête/A Scream from Silence 725
 Mouton noir, Le/The Black Sheep 140
 Moving the Mountain 47
 Moving Pictures 580
 Moyers, Bill 145
 Mr Death: The Rise and Fall of Fred A. Leuchter Jr 659
 Mr Wrong 742
 Much Ado about Something 789
 Mugrabi, Avi 421
 Muller, Jorge 342
 Mulroney, Brian 461
 Mulvey, Laura 739
 Mumford, Lewis 171
 Edvard Munch 950

- Mund, Karlheinz 292
 Munich or Peace in Our Time 859
 Munoz, Susana 530
 Munroe, Marilyn 881
 Murdoch, Rupert 477
 Murer, Fredi M. 895–97
 Muriel 686
 Murrow, Edward R. 235, 662–63, 1028
 Muscle Beach 894
 Museum of Modern Art (MoMA) in New York
 172, 224, 441, 722, 849
 Museum of the Revolution, Leningrad 242
 Music Tells You, The 709
 Mussolini 422, 428
 Muzykanci/Musicians 729
 My African Farm 951
 My Crazy Life 313
 My Demons 964
My Eskimo Friends (book) 255, 667
 My Fathers's House 496
 My Homeland 958
My Pet Goat (book) 654
 My Survival as an Aboriginal 241
 Myanmar (Burma) 863–64
 Mysore Mallige 405
 Mystère de l'atelier quinze, Le/The Mystery of Workshop Fifteen 754, 756
- N
- Nacer de nuevo/Born Again 769
 Naderi, Nader Afshar 411
 Naderi, Nader Afshi 409
 !Nai: The Story of a !Kung Woman 382, 614–15
Nana, Mom and Me 664
 Nanook of the North
 Agee James 22
 Allégret, Marc 32
 Canudo, Ricciotto 143–44
Chronique d'un été 165
 Clair, René 175
 Cooper, Merian C. 182
 documentary film 664–67
Drifters 221
 ethnographic films 391
 Flaherty, Robert 127, 254–56, 318–19, 406, 578, 601, 970
 human quality 809
 past cultures 513
 traditional societies 1035
 Nanouk Films 21
 Naomi, Kawase 450
 Neapolitano, Gaspare Gian 427
 Naranjo-Morse, Nora 47
 Nasvek 707
 Nation is Built, A 385
 Nation Once Again, A 413
 'nation-films' genre 811
 National Coal Board (NCB) 31
 National Council of Civil Liberties (NCCL)
 649
 National Film Archive and Sound Collection
 (Australia) 53
 National Film Board (NFB) of Canada see Canada,
 NFB
 National Film Institute (NFI) in Ireland 413
 National Film and Television Archive (NFTVA) in UK 860, 862
 National Film Unit (NFU) of New Zealand 311
 National Iranian Radio and Television Service
 (NIRTV) 409–10
 National Library (Australia) 54
 National Socialist (NS) films, Austria 61
 National Union of Teachers (NUT) 156
 Native Earth 364
Native Land 667–69, 892
 NATO 289, 460
 Nattlek/Night Games 1031
naturalism term 12
 Nature of Things, The 133
 Naturens Hämnd/The Revenge of Nature 813
 Nave, La/The Ship 423
 Navratil, Anton 192
 Nazaré, Praia des Pescadores/The fishers of Nazaré 734
 Nazis Strike, The 77
Nazis, The: A Warning from History 9, 669–70
 NBC TV channel 963
 Near/Middle East
 documentary films 671–78
 female filmmakers 674
 Necessary Illusions (company) 1008
 Nedfall/Fallout 812
 Ne'eman, Judd 420
Negro Soldier, The 679–80
 Nehru 844
 Neighbors 501
 Nel Mezzogiorno qualcosa è cambiato/In the South Something has Changed 425
 Nelugama 711
 Nema Barikada/Silent Barricade 190
 Nest in the Heat, A 672
 Nestler, Peter 681–83
 Neuman, David 718
 Never ands Always 639
 Nevětší přání (I and II) /The Greatest Wish
 876–77
 Nevinost bez zaštite/Innocence Unprotected 593
 Nevsky, Alexander 80
 New Day Films 493
 'New Documentary Film' movement (China) 162
New Earth 683–84
 New German Cinema 362
 New History movement 13–14

- New Latin America Cinema movement 910
 New Pastures 364
New Theatre (journal) 495–96
 New Times at Crossroad Street 827
 New Zealand 310–11
 Newfoundland Scene 128
 Newman, Alfred 78
 Newman, Sydney 48, 132, 137, 140
 News from Home 26
 Newspaper Train 585
 Newsreel movement 507
 Nga Tamatoa (Maori group) 68
 Ngati 67–68
 Ni olvido ni perdón/Neither Forget nor Forgive 210
 Ni tsutsumarete/Embracing 481
 Nicaragua-No Pasarán 56
 Nice Coloured Girls 644–45
 Nice Time in 1957 896
 Nichols, Dudley 79
 Nickel, Gitta 290
 Nicotiana 736
 Nieuwe Gronden/New Earth 431, 683–84
Night and Fog (Nuit et Brouillard) 626, 684–88, 754–55, 758, 839, 847
Night Games (book) 1031
 Night of the Hunter, The 22
Night Mail 86, 149, 336, 432, 436, 537, 554, 688–89, 710, 820, 855, 946, 981
 Nightcleaners 476
 Nightfall 673
 Nihon no higeki/A Japanese Tragedy 447, 473
 Nihon to Nihonjin/Japan and the Japanese 395
 Nikolic, Zivko 1023
 Nilsson, Eric M. 814
 Nilsson, Lennart 814
 Nine Days in '26 958
 Nine Days of a Year 778
 Niño Fidencio, taumaturgo de Espinazo/Healer form Espinazo 629
 No. 16 Barkhor South Street 162
 No Address 691
 No Game 449
 No les pedimos un viaje a la luna/We are not Asking for a Trip to the Moon 629
 'No Other Love' (song) 963
 No Parasas/They Won't Get Through 62
 Nobody's Business 91
 Noces de papier, Les/Paper Wedding 111
 NO-DO (Spanish newsreel) 870–73
 Noistottus 429
 Nomad Puppeteers, The 402
 Nordemar, Olle 812
 Noriaki, Tsuchimoto 930–32
 Normalsalz 228
 Noronha, Linduarte 112
 Norrish, Ben 128
 North Sea 946, 981–82
 Northeast Film Studio (China) 159, 161
 Northern Lights 391
 Norway 813–14
 Nosotros y el Jazz 992
 Not a Love Story 837
Notes on the Making of Apocalypse Now (book) 355
 Nothing but the Hours see Rien que les heures
 Notre Musique/Our Music 302
 Noujaim, Jehane 675
 November Days 925
Now 35, 533, 689–90, 739
 Now–Peace 1017
 Nuestra Voz de Tierra, Memoria y Futuro/Our Voice of Land, Memory and Future 769
 Nuit et Brouillard see Night and Fog
 Numéros zéro 203
 Nur Leichte Kämpfe im Raum Da Nang 314–15
 Nuremberg and Vietnam: An American Tragedy 859
 Nussbaun, Eric 775
 Nyman, Michael 18–19
- O
- O Amor Natural 369
 O Canto do Mar/The Song of the Sea 147–49
 O Descobrimento do Brasil/Discovery of Brazil, The 616
 O Dreamland 41, 948
 O Dromos Pros ti Dysi/The Way West 332
 O Outro Teatro/The Other Theatre 737
 O Movimento das Coisas/Things in Motion 737
 O Pintor e a Cidade/The Painter and the City 735
 O Prisioneiro da Grade de Ferro/The Prisoner of the Iron Grating 113
 O Sport, Ty-Mir 966
 O ThIaikos Orthros/The Matins of Thera 328
 Obamsawin, Alanis 131
Oberhausener Manifest (pamphlet) 804
 Objective Burma 121, 207
 Obomsawin, Alanis 691–92
 Obrazy Star ho Sveta/Pictures of the Old World 715–16
 O'Brien, Frederick 256
 O'Brien, Willis 183
 October 703
 October 14 866
 Oded Hanoded/Oded the Traveller 418
 Odenwaldstetten 681
 Oertel, Curt 295
 Office of War Information (OWI) 440–41, 679
 Ofrenda, La: Days of the Dead 732
Ogoniok (magazine) 478
 Oi Geyfyres tou Ioniou/The Bridges of the Ionian Sea 330
 Oktyabr/October: Ten Days that Shook the World 792
 O'Leary, Liam 413

- Olin, Margreth 814
 Oliver, Margot 258
 Olsson, Oscar 811
Olympia 6–7, 71, 471, 692–96, 758, 760, 765, 917, 965, 1033
 OMNIMAX format 131, 580
 On the Borderline 409
On the Bowery 696
 On the Dead Angle 63
 On the Pole 150, 535
 One Family 942
 One Sixth of the World 961
 Only the Strong Survive 357, 709
 Opération béton/Operation Concrete 301
 Operation Blue Jay 392
 Ophüls, Marcel 14, 697–99, 829–30, 858–59, 925–27
 Oppenheimer, Robert 369
 Or des mers, L', Song of Armor 234
 Ordeal by Ice 137
 Orders from Above 958
 Ordinary Fascism 778
 Ordinary Spring 775
 Ordres, Les/The Orders 111
 O'Rourke, Denis 56–58, 311–12, 699–701
 Orr, John 230
 Ortiz, Chavela 202
 Osborne, John 239
 O'Shea, John 67
 Österreich in Bild und Ton (OEBUT)/Austria in Vision and Sound 60–61
 Österreichische Produktivitätszentrum (OEPZ) 61
 Österreichischen Film Förderungsfonds (OEFF)/Austrian Film Promotion Fund 62
 Other Half of the Sky, The: A China Memoir 463
 Ottinger, Ulrike 701–2
 Otto John: Eine Deutsche Geschichte/A German Story 540
 Otzenberger, Claude 269
 On est au Coton/Cotton Mill 48
 Our Beautiful House 776
 Our Boys 415
 Our Country 413
 Our Daily Bread 721, 849
 Our Empire's Fight for Freedom 5
Our Own Image (book) 67
 Out of Chaos 188
 The Outback, Australia 65
 Outrage, The 477
 'outside world' (Aussenwelt) 4, 15
 Overlanders, The 364
 Owen, Alun 239
 Owens, Jesse 693–94
- P
- Pachahi, Maysoon 674
 Pacific 231 640
 Pacific Films 67
 Pacific Northwest 223
 Page of History, A 157
 Painlevé, Jean 156, 264, 274
 Painters Painting 46
 Paisley, Ian 830
 Pale Horseman, The 440
 Palermo, Ivan 428
 Palestine is Still the Issue 715
 Palestinian Liberation Organisation (PLO) 673
 Panagiotopoulos, Yannis 325
 Panc 777
 Panola 718
 Paolucci, Gianni 423
 Papayannidis, Takis 330
 Paper Heads 715
 Papic, Krsto 1023
 Parade, The/Parada 1023
 Paradise of the Heart 955
 Parer, Damien 54, 56, 703–5
Paris 1900 703–4
 Paris qui dort/The Crazy Ray 176
 Paris Was a Woman 986
 Parrish, Robert 79
 Paruchizan zenshi/Prehistory of the Partisans 930
 Pasión de Maria Elena, La/Naria Elena's Passion 630
 Pasolini, Pier Paolo 21, 429
 Passion of Remembrance, The 464
 Passions of Louis Malle, The 598
 Pasteur, Louis 87, 144, 234
 Pastina, Ovidu Rose 777
 Pastor Hall 106
 Pat and Bill Loud 37–38
 Pathé 264–65, 823
 Pathé Frères 59
 Pathy, P. V. 400
 Patriot, The 499
 Patu!/A Club: To Assault 636
 Patwardhan, Anand 403
 Paul Delvaux ou les femmes défendues/Forbidden Women 889
 Paul Dessau 291
 Paul Rotha Productions (PRP) 31
 Paul Tomkowicz: Street-railway Switchman 130
 Pavlov, Ivan 622–23
 Paysans d'hier et d'aujourd'hui/Countrymen of Yesterday and Today 266
 PBS (Public Broadcasting Service) in US 122, 356, 493
 Peace and Plenty 651
 Pearl Harbor, Hawaii 200
 Pebahl, Hans 61
 Peck, Raymond 128
 Peking 473
 Pelecian, Artavazd 706–8
 Pelisky/Cosy Dens 192

- Peltier, Leonard 47
 Penn, Zak 119
 Pennebaker, Alan 217–19
 Pennebaker, D. A.
 Chair, The 150
 cinéma vérité 708, 1008
 ‘direct cinema’ 202
 documentary films 708–10
 Don't Look Back 998
 Drew, Robert 219–20
 Hegedus, Chris 355
 Jane 442
 Marshall, John 614
 mobile reporting 744
 Monterey Pop 444, 652–53, 1011
 Primary 11, 618, 708
 War Room, The 975–76
 Wildenhahn, Klaus 1007
 Penefather, Joan 133
 Peões/Workers 186–87
 People of the Cumberland 546, 632
 People on Wheels/Ljudi na tickovima 1022
 People's History, A 134
 People's Republic of China 159–60
 Percy, Norma 1025
 Pereira, Nelson 113
 Peries, Lester James 710–11
 Periptoseis tou Ochi/Instances of ‘NO’ 329
 Perlov, David 420
 Peron, Juan 376
 Perrault, Pierre 111, 138, 712–13
 Persistent and Finagling 799
 Pesn o Gerojach/Song of Heroes 431
 Pets or Meat 772
 Pett and Pott 147
Phantom India 713–15
 Phantom Lady 850
 Philibert, Nicholas 237–38
 Philippines 865–66
 Philips Radio 430
 photogénie 233–34
 Fotografie und Jenseits/Photography and Beyond 229
 Photographer, The 223, 440
 Pialat, Maurice 512
 Piazzale Loreto/Loreto Square 428
 Picasso 755
 Pichel, Irving 79
 Picture of Light 898
 Pictures from a Revolution 345
Pictures of the Old World 715–16
 Piedra sober Piedra/Stone upon Stone 36
 Pier, Kenneth M. 78
 Pilger, John 715–17
 Pillow Book, The 18
 Pilz, Michael 62
 Pimpf war jeder/Everyone was a ‘Pimpf’ 540
 Pincus, Edward 718–19
 Pinochet, Augusto 56, 341
 Pistiner, Ada 776
 Place Called Chiapas, A 135, 1004
 Place de la République 714
 Place de l'équation/The Place of the Equation 341
 Place in the Sun, A 302
 Place to Stand, A 130
 Planas, testimonio de un etnocido/Testimony about Ethnocide 769
 Playback 94
 Plein soleil 73
Plow that Broke the Plains, The 575, 578, 719–23, 891–92
 Plummer, Christopher 490, 592, 725
podlinni material (authentic material) 842
 Podnieks, Juris 722–24
 Pöech, Rudolf 59–60
Poet's Defence, The (book) 51
 Point of Order 45, 397, 399, 697
Point of View (magazine) 136
 Pointe Courte, La 957
 Poirier, Anne-Claire 724–26
 Poirer, Claire 140–41
 Poirier, Léon 32, 726–28, 810, 817
 Poland
 biographical films 731
 documentary films 102,-3, 728–32
 ‘Freedom Shock’ 730
 Polanski, Roman 729
 Polemonta 329
 Police 883
 Police State 55
Polish Film Chronicles 104
 Polite Invasion, The 1030
 Pontecorvo, Gillo 9, 672
 Ponting, Herbert 322–24
 Pop, Sabina 777
 Popovic, Nikola 1021
 Popovici, Slavomir 775
 Popular Unity (Chile) 75–76
 Por que perdimos la guerra?/Why did We Lose the War? 873
 Portillo, Lourdes 530, 732–34
 Portrait of God 67
 Portugal
 April Revolution 507, 737
 biographical films 738
 culture 735–36, 738
 documentary films 734–38
 tourism 735
 Portyo da Minha Infância/Port of My Childhood 738
 Potamkin, Harry Alan 222
 Poto and Cabengo 313
 Pou, Armando 868
 Poundmaker's Lodge: A Healing Place 691

Pour la suite du monde/For the Continuation of the World 21, 110–11, 138–39, 712
 Pour un maillot jaune/For a Yellow Jersey 542
 POV (Point of View series) on PBS 91, 764
 Power and the Land 577
 Power in the Land, A 101
 Prater, Vienna (amusement park) 59
Prayer 738–40
 Predators (Discovery Channel series) 9
 Preloran, Jorge 740–42
 Preston, Gaylene 742–44
 Pretty Boy 597
 Prévert, Jacques 52, 273
 Prévert, Pierre 53
 Priestley, J. B. 29, 985
Primary 11, 535, 618, 652, 708, 744–46, 975
 Primate 622, 988
 Pripayat 64
 Prisoners Prove Intervention 901–2
 ‘Private Hungary’ series 261
 Privelege 978
 Proč?/Why? 876
 Progressive Film Institute (PFI) 650–51, 901–2
 Prokopiou, Angelos 325–26
 Prokopiou, Yorgis 325
 Prometheus Desmotis/Prometheus in Chains in Delphi 324
 Prosperity Race, The 1030
 Proud to be British 951
 Proulx, Maurice 138
 Proust, Marcel 211
 Provencher, Paul 138
 Psarras, Tasos 330
 Psetsky, Alan 297
 Psychiatry in Russia 618
 Public Enemy Number One 56
Public Opinions (book) 941
 Pudovkin, Vsevolod 622, 649, 651, 703, 793
Pull My Daisy 746–47
Pumping Iron 747
Pumping Iron II: The Women 747
 Punishment Park 950, 978
 Punition, La/The Punishment 784
 Punitive Damage 309–10, 743
 Pyramide humaine, La/The Human Pyramid 784

Q

Qassari, Yasmine 672
 Qingtai, Ren 157
 Que viva Mexico! 491–92
 Quebec cinema 110
 Quiet Mutiny, The 715
 Quiet One, The 632, 696
 Quiet Revolution (Quebec) 139
 Quinn, Bob 415

R

Raad, Walid 676
 Raconto da un affresco/Story Taken from A Fresco 424
 Radax, Ferry 62
 Radharc Films (Ireland) 414
 Radio Televis Eirann (RTE) 414–16
 RAF Film Unit 107
 Rafferty, Max 42
 Raging Torrents 158
 Rahmanian, Hamid 676–77
Rain/Regen 7, 430, 749–50
 Raines, Kathleen 251
 Raisa Nemchinskaya, artistka zirka/Artist of the Circus 307
 Ramparts We Watch, The 558–59, 767
 Rangierier 104
 Rango 818
 Rank and File, The 950
 Rank, J. Arthur 248
 Raphael, John 84
 Rapsódia Portuguesa/Portuguese Rhapsody 735
 Raquetteurs, Les/The Snowshoes 21, 110, 130, 139, 141, 340
 Rasmussen, Knud 391, 779, 811
 Rathburn, Eldon 130, 173
 Rats in the Ranks 57
 Raum Da Nang/Only Light 315
 Ray, Satyajit 403
 Raymond, Susan 38
 Raza, el spiritu de Franco/Race, Franco’s Spirit 873
 Raza/Race 873
 Reagan, Ronald 461
 Real Falchera FC 429
 ‘Realism and Surrealism’ 273
Realist Film Theory and Cinema (book) 1
 Realist Film Unit 230, 900, 906
 Réassemblage 920
 Recuerdos/Remembrances 631
 Red Hollywood 116
 Red Nightmare 828
 Redding, Otis 365
 Redes 525
 Reed, Carol 207
 Reed, Langford 83
 Reed, T. V. 23
 Reeds 775
 Refuge England 958
 Regen see Rain
 Regent’s Park Zoo, London 49–51
 Reggae 992
 Reggio, Godfrey 505–7
 Regional Indigenous Council of Cauca (CRIC) in Colombia 769
 Regular, Irregular (With or without Order) 485
 Reichert, Julia 493–94, 750–52, 823–24, 939

- Reichsanstalt für den Unterrichtsfilm (RfdU)
71
- Reichsautobahn 95
- Reis, Luiz Thomas 112
- Reisz, Karel 251, 752–53, 948, 958, 983
- Réjeanne Padovani 49
- Rekawa/Line of Destiny 710
- Renaissance Songs, The 775
- Rendez-vous d'Anna, Les 26
- Renoir, Auguste 703
- Renoir, Jean 53, 651, 757
- Report from the Aleutians 81, 386
- Reporter der Windrose/Reporter of the Wind
Rose 1028
- Reporters 203
- Requiem 103
- Resettlement Administration (RA) in US
720–21, 765, 892
- Resnais, Alain 123, 268, 600, 611, 684–85,
753–57, 775–76, 847
- Respite finem/Hospice 876
- Retour du Tchad/Return from Chad 32
- Retour, Le* 757–58
- Retour à la vie/Return to Life 758
- 'retrophenia' 591
- Return to Life 351, 495
- Révillon Frères 255
- Revolucion orozquista/Orozco Revolution 524
- Révolution d'Octobre/October Revolution 781
- Reybould, Clarence 181
- Reynolds, Quentin 454
- Rhodes: Life nio Lopes 735
- Richard Sutcliffe Ltd 40
- Richards, Jeffrey 323
- Richter, Hans 896
- Riefenstahl, Leni books 762
documentary films 758–62
Fanck Arnold 245
Hitler, Adolf 145, 245
Leiser, Erwin 540
Night and Fog (Nuit et Brouillard) 685
NSDAP party rallies 294–95
Olympia 71, 471, 692–95, 765, 917, 965, 1033
Triumph of the Will 7, 92, 145, 499, 625–26, 692, 695, 921–24
whole 'world' 7
Zielke, Willy 1033
- Rien que les heures* 143, 147, 176, 226, 266,
762–64, 855, 1034
- Rig Veda text 389
- Riggs, Marlon 764–66
- Rijavec, Frank 240
- Ring, Ragnar 811
- Rival World, The 538
- River of Dreams 380–81
- River, The* 223, 575–76, 578, 721, 765–77
- River's Elegy 161
- Rivers of Sand 282–83
- Road to God Knows Where, The 415–16
- Roads End 198
- Robens, Alf 31
- Robert Drew Associates see Drew Associates
- Roberts, Graham 74
- Robinson, Edward G. 107
- Robinson, Roland 65
- Robinson in Space 482–83
- Rocha, Gregoria 630
- Rocha, Paul 737
- Rochin, Roberto 630
- Rocky Road to Dublin, The 414–15
- Rodakiewicz, Henwar 171–72
- Rodgers, Richard 963
- Rodriguez, Marta 768–70
- Roger* 55, 770–72, 904
- Rogosin, Lionel 696, 772–73
- Rokk i Reykjavik/Rock in Reykjavik 393
- Rolando, Gloria 992–94
- role of documentary film 14–16
- Rolling Stone* (magazine) 99
- Rom 131
- Romance of Transportation, The 501
- Romania
documentary films 773–78
ethnographic documentaries 776
- Romm, Mikhail 778
- Rommel 932
- Rommel, Erwin 206
- Ronder, Paul 368
- Room, Abram 232
- Roos, Jorgen 394, 778–79, 812
- Roosevelt, Franklin D. 78–79, 495, 575–77, 720, 765
- Rosenberg, Michael 25
- Rosenberg, Murray 417
- Rosif, Frederic 915–16
- Rossellini, Roberto 402
- Rossif, Frederic 14, 268, 270, 780–82
- Rostow, Walt 194–95
- Rotha, Paul
Alexander, Donald 30–31
BBC: The Voice of Britain 86
Contact 180–81
Face of Britain, The 985
Flaherty, Robert 254
Flaherty Robert 601
Grierson, John 946
We Live in Two Worlds 985
'world revolution' 938
World Without End 4, 227
World of Plenty 231
- Rothschild, Amalie 664
- Rotman, Patrick 70
- Rotterdam Europort 433

- Rouch, Jean
Adolescents, The 20–21
 anthropology 32
Chronique d'un été 10–11, 164–67, 255, 345, 358, 744
 cinéma vérité 110, 130, 534, 1008
 CNC 600
 documentary films 782–86
 ethnography 267
 French Canada 139
 Leacock, Richard 535
 McElwee, Ross 591
 Moi, un Noir 255
 Morin, Edgar 657
Nanook of the North 666
 Ophüls, Marcel 697
 Roue, La 17, 175, 640
 Rouquier, Georges 267, 786–88
 Route de l'Ouest, La/The Westward Road 48
 Route inconnue, La/The Unknown Road 727
 Route One/USA 507
 Routine Pleasures 313
 Rowe, Glenys 142
 Roy Cohn/Jack Smith 304
 Royal Opera House-Behind the Scenes 416
 Rubbo, Michael 788–9, 798–99, 972–73
 Rugged Island, The-A Shetland Lyric 820
 Ruiz, Raúl 528
 Rulfo, Juan Carlos 630
 Rund und die Michwirtschaft/On the Dairy Farm 61
 Running Away Backwards 490
 Rush to Judgement 397
 Rushdie, Salman 348
 Russia/Soviet Union 790–97, 935–36
 Russian Revolution 933–35
 Rustling of Leaves, A: Inside the Philippines Revolution 1004
 Ruttman, Walter 8, 89–90, 430–31, 750, 809, 815, 922
 Ryazanov, Eldar 794–95
- S
- Saab, Jocelyne 674
 Sacrifice of Babulal Bhuiya, The 403
Sad Song of Yellow Skin 57, 788, 798–99, 972
 Sadiá studio (Romania) 775
Sadness: A Monologue by William Yang 799–800
 Sagan, Carl 9
 Sagolandet/The Land of Dreams 813
 Said, Edward 199–200
 Saif, Sami 814
 Sakkaf, Noura 674
 Salazar, António de Oliviera 735
Salesman 800–802
 Salloum, Jayce 675–76
- Salmon, Colin 276
 Saloman, Henry 962–63
Salt of the Earth 802–4
 'Same Name Syndrome' 91
 San Clemente 203
 Sanctuary of Nature, The 775
 Sander, Helke 804–5
Sang des bêtes, Le/The Blood of the Beasts 239, 274, 374, 805–7
 Sanrizuka Series (Japan) 448–50
Sans Soleil/Sunless 125, 434, 458, 612, 807–9
 Santa en Bilbao/Easter in Bilbao 870
 Santo Forte/The Mighty Spirit 186
 Saraceni, César 112
 Sastry, S. N. S. 402
 Saura, Carlos 872, 874
 Sauvage, André 809–10
 Savage Eye, The 632, 894
 Saving of Bill Blewitt, The 981, 985
 Sayyar, Mohammad Gholi 408
 SBS/SBSi (film production in Australia) 55
 Scandinavia 810–14
 Scenes from Childhood 345
 Schadt, Thomas 90, 814–15
 Scharzenegger, Arnold 747
 Schaut auf diese Stadt/Look at this City 289
 Scheider, Bert 351
 Scheumann, Gerhard 290–91
 Schlesinger, John 816–17, 968
 Schlöndorff, Volker 97
 Schmid, Daniel 896
 Schmiederer, Oscar 63
 Schoedsack, Ernest B. 155, 182, 318–19, 408, 817–19
 Schoeneman, Sybil 292
 School in a Mail-Box 54
 Schorm, Evald 876
 Schurmann, Edwin 773
 Schwitters, Kurt 70
Science and Human Values (book) 51
 Scioperi a Torino/Strikes in Turin 428
 Scofield, Paul 482–83
 Scorsese, Martin 1011
 Scotland 819–22
 Scott of the Antarctic 861
 Scott, Robert 322–23, 860–62
 Screen Club of Brussels 888
 Scrine, Gil 54
 Scrubbers 1031
 Seals, John 55
 Seasons, The 707
 Seawards the Great Ships 819–20
 Second Russian Revolution, The 523
 Secrets of Life 248
Secrets of Nature 822–23
 Secrets of a Soul 623
 SED (Sozialische Einheitspartei Deutschlands) 288, 291

- See It Now 662
 Seed and Earth 345
 Seeds of Hope 884
 Seeds of Plenty, Seeds of Sorrow 404
Seeing Red: Stories of American Communists 310, 493–94, 751–52, 823–25
 Segal, Uma 403
 Segregation in Schools 662
 Seidl, Ulrich 63–64, 825–26
 Seine rencontre Paris, La/The Seine Meets Paris
 433
 Seleckis, Ivars 826–27
Selling of the Pentagon, The 194, 351–52, 827–29
 Selrig, Delphine 26
 Semmler, Dean 55
 Senna, Orlando 113
 Sennen-Ballade 518
 Señorita Extraviada/Missing Young Woman 733
Sense of Loss, A 829–31, 925
Septemberweizen/September Wheat 831–32
Sequence (journal) 40
 Serbia 1023–24
 Serbia, Year Zero/Srbija, godine nulte 1024
 Serpent, The 477
 Serreau, Coline 270
 Sestier, Marius 400
 Seta, Vittorio de, 822–23
 Seul ou avec d'autres/Alone or with Others 48
 Seven Men 639
 Seven Songs for Malcolm X 29
79 Springtimes of Ho Chi Minh 35, 833–35
 Sevilas 874
 Seybold, Katrin 835–36
 SFC (Statens Filmcentral) 393
 Shackleton, Ernest 323–24, 860–62
 Shadowplay 864
 Shadows 746–47
 Shadows of the City 674
 Shafti, Hooshand 408
 Shakedown in Sante Fe 281
 Shanghai Vice 25
 Shannon, Kathleen 131, 836–37
 Sheeler, Charles 605–7
 Sheen, Martin 353
 Shell Film Unit 227, 364–65, 537
 Shelter 403
 Sheppard, Dick 86
 Sheppard Report, 1965 (Canada) 132
 Sherman's March 590–91
 Shi Jian 161
Shinjuku Boys 837–39
 Shinsuke, Ogawa 448–50, 481
 Shiroyasu, Suzuki 449–50
Shoah 14, 270, 521, 839–41
 Shock of the New 895
 Shoot for the Contents 920
Shoot to Kill 841–42, 1000
 Short Circuit 492
 Shortest Day, The 777
 Shub, Esfir
 biography 792–93
 documentary films 842–43
 Eisenstein, Sergei 242
 España 478
 Fall of the Romanov Dynasty, The 242–43, 593
 Forgotten Years series 796 historical compilation film 793
 Leyda, Jay 547
 newsreels 412, 697, 935
 Vertov, Dziga 793
 Why We Fight series 559
 Shuker, Gregory 150, 843–45
 Si c'était à refaire/If I had to Do it All Over Again
 543
 Siamo Italiano/We Are Italians 896
 Siciliala, La rivisitata/Sicily Revisited 833
 Siedem dni w tygodniu/Seven Days a Week
 488
 Sieg des Glaubens/Victory of Faith 759,
 922–23
 Sierra de Teruel (L'Espoir/Man's Hope) 599, 607–8
Sight and Sound (magazine) 231, 251, 696, 928
 Signs of the Times 952
 Silent Village, The 456, 929
 Silent War, The 339
Silent World, The 9, 184, 596, 713, 845–48
 Silva, Jorga 75, 768–70
 Simões, Rui 737
 Sinai, Khosrow 409
 Sinclair, Upton 848–49
 Singapore 866
 Siodmak, Robert 850–51
 Sir Alfred of Charles de Gaulle Airport 676–77
 Sirena/The Stroke 190
 Sistach, Marisa 630
 Skanata, Krsto 1022
 Skid Row 489–90
 Slad/Trace 731
 Sleep 12, 977
Small Place, A (book) 993
 Smith, Percy 247, 822, 822–23
 Smoke Menace, The 900
 Smooth Talk 464
 SNCF (French railway) 72
 Snow, Edgar 159
 Snyder, Robert 38–39
 So ist Das Leben 471
 So It Doesn't Hurt 581
 'Socialism is Good' (song) 163
 Société Nouvelle see Challenge for Change, The Société pour le Lancement des Oeuvres Nouvelles
 (SLON) 246, 246–47
 Sokolov, Ippolit 232

- Sokurov, Alexandr 851–54
 Solanas, Ferdinand 375–77
 ‘solidarity films’ (Austria) 62
 Solovki Power 308
 Solzenitsyn, Alexander 795
 Solzenitsyn’s Children ... are Making a Lot of Noise in Paris 799
 Some Women 884
 Son des Français d’Amérique, Le 111
 Song of Ceylon, A 857
Song of Ceylon, The 10, 147, 149, 157, 179, 181, 205,
 336, 436, 689, 854–58, 900, 944, 981, 1019
 Sorceress of the New Piano 154
 Søring Northover/Southerner Going North 812
Sorrow and the Pity, The 14, 270, 697–98, 858–60, 925
 SOS Noronha 787
 Souffle au coeur, Le 714
 Soufrière, La 362
 Sound of Music, The 592
South 860–62
 South African Experience, The 905
 South of the Border 56
 Southeast Asia
 documentary films 863–68
 geography 863
 Southeast Asia Command (SEAC) Film Unit 121
 Southeast Passage: A Journey to New Blank Spots on the European Map 702
 Soviet Kulturfilms 623
 Soviet Military Administration (SMAD) 288
 Space between Words, The 316–17, 884
 Spain
 documentary films 868–76
 Durrutti 870
 Goya 871
 Shub Esfir film 843
 World War I 868
 Spanish ABC 650, 901
 Spanish Civil war 901
 Spanish Earth, The 10, 432, 438, 478, 496, 578, 599, 901
 Spanish Mountains, The 10
 Spare Time 6, 10, 148–49, 556, 947
 Sparling, Gordon 129
 Špata, Jan 876–78
 Special Broadcasting Service (SBS) in Australia 379
 Special Enquiry 948
Specificity of the Aesthetic, The (book) 15 spectatorship and memory 3
Spellbound 878–79
 spelling bees 878–79
 Spice Girls, The 952
 Spielberg, Steven 677, 847
 Spiral Staircase, The 850
 Spiste Horisonter/Eaten Horizons 779, 812
 Spomencina ne treba verovati/Don’t Trust Monuments 593
 spoken commentary
 Gardner, Robert 283
Lessons of Darkness 545
Turksib 794
Tunisian Victory 932–33
 Spottiswoode, Raymond 879–80
 Sprížnčei volbou/Elective Affinities 955
 Spy in the House of Love 39
 Sreda/Wednesday 504
 SS Lusitania 339
 Stace, Arthur 236–37
 Staka, Andrea 898
 Stalin 81, 794, 796
 Stamp, A/Biljeg 1024
 Starowicz, Mark 134
 Stars 104
 Startup.com 356
 State of Things, The 73
 States of Emergency 368
 Station 307 596
 Stations of the Elevated 492 statues aussi meurent, Les/The Statues also Die 268, 755
 Stavrakas, Dimitris 328
 Steel 711
 Stefansson, Vilhjamur 127
 Steichen, Edward 90, 767
 Steiglitz, Alfred 285–87
 Stein, Gertrude 109
 Steinbeck, John 575
 Steiner, Ralph 115, 171, 668, 891
 Steiner, Roland 292
 Steloff, Frances 38
 Stéphane, Nicole 915
 Stephanopolis, George 356
 Stern, Bert 451, 880–82
 Stern, Horst 882–83
 Sterne, Laurence 807
 Sterns stunde (Stern’s hour) 882
 Stewart, Charles 316, 883–85
 Stewart, Hugh 933
 Stewart, James 145
 Støj/Noise 779
 Stolen Generations 55
 Stoll Picture Productions 822
 Stoney, George 885–87
 Storck, Henri 887–90
 Store Gutter grater ikke/Big Boys Don’t Cry 814
 Strachwitz, Chris 168
 Strand, Paul 23, 605–7, 667–68, 890–93
 Strasberg, Lee 496
 Straub, Jean-Marie 681
 Street Angels 159
 Strength and Agility of Insects, The 822
 Strick, Joseph 893–94

- String of Life, The/Zica zivota 1025
 Stroma tis Katastrofis/Layer of Destruction 331
 Stroszek 119
 structures of documentary film 8–14
 Struggle for Democracy, The 980
 Students for a Democratic Society (SDS) 407
 ‘Studio H&S’ 290–91
 ‘Stuttgarter Schule’ 235
 ‘Style of Fritz Lang’, The 273
 Suarez, Rosario 740
 Sucksdorff, Arne 112, 156, 212–14, 320–21, 811
 Süd 27
 Sudan 676
 Suddeutscher Rundfunk (SDR) 235–36
 Suharto, President 56
 Suite Varsovienne/Warsaw Suite 728
 Sulieman, Elia 675
 Summereder, Angela 63
 Sun Mingjing 158
 suna no onna/Woman in the Dunes 21–22
 Sunagawa Series (Japan) 447
 Sunday in the Park 968
 Sunday too far Away 125
 Superior Institute of Religious Studies (ISER) 186
 Sur les bords de la caméra/On the Edge of the Camera 888
 Surname Viet Given Name Nam 920
 Sussex, Elizabeth 86
 Sususmu, Hani 447
 Svěrák, Jan 192
 Sverige, vårt vackra land/Sweden, Our Beautiful Country 811
 Swallow, Norman 894–95
 Sweet Movie 594
 Sweet Toronto 709
 Sweetest Sound, The 91
 Swerak, Jan 191
 Switzerland
 documentary films 895–98
 ethnographic documentaries 897
 Symphonie einer Weltstadt/Symphony of the Metropolis 90
 Symphonie paysanne/Peasant Symphony 888
 Symphony on a Hymn Tune 766
 Synchrony 438
 Syracuse Group 408
- T
- Tabloid (Canadian current affairs) 133, 592
 Tag der Freiheit-Unsere Wehrmacht!/Day of Freedom-Our Armed Forces! 760
 Taheridoost, Gholamhussein 410
 Taiga 702
 Taken for a Ride 493–94
 Takht-e Jamshid/Persopolis 410
 Tale of Love, A 921
 Tall: The American Skyscraper and Louis Sullivan 492
 Tallents, Stephen 406, 941–42
 Tan, Royston 866
 Tangata Whenua 68
 Tanner, Alain 895–96
 Taranta, La 426
Target for Tonight 899–900, 928, 947, 981–82, 1019
 Tarva Yeghenaknere (Vremena goda/The Seasons) 707
 Tatakau heitai/Fighting Soldiers 446
 Tavernier, Bertrand 925
 Taylor, Donald 942, 944
 Taylor, John 406, 900–901
 Tchaikovsky, Boris 27
 Te Manu Aute (Maori group) 68
 Te Paho 637
 Te Rua 67–68
 Tempestaire, Le 234
 Temps de l’avant, Le/Before the Time Comes 725
 Temps du ghetto, Le/The Ghetto Time 268
 Ten Days that Shook the World 895
Tender Buttons 109
 Terminal, The 677
 Terminus 816
 Territories 465
 Teshigahara, Hiroshi 20–22
 Tessier, Albert 138
 Testament 28–29
Testimony on Non-Intervention 650, 901–2
 Tetzlaff, Kurt 291–92
 Tex-Mex life 168
 Thaelmann, Ernst 650
 Thailand 866
 That Was The Week That Was 133
 Thatcher, Margaret 347, 530, 564
 ‘The Caissons Go Rolling Along’ 69
The Cinematograph in Science, Education and Matters of State (book) 953
The Cinema as Graphic Art (book)
The Dani of West Irian (book) 196
The Decisive Moment (book) 587
 ‘The Documentary Gets Personal’ 345
The Documentary Tradition (book) 438
 ‘The Documentary World’ (book) 94
The Film Form (book) 547
 ‘The Film Generation’ (essay) 479
 The Film Sense 547 (book)
The Film Till Now (book) 180
 The Fog of War: Eleven Lessons from the Life of Robert S. McNamara 659–60
The Great White South (book) 323
The Jungle (book) 848
The Nation (magazine) 22, 83, 628
The Political Censorship of Films (pamphlet) 649
The Rise of the American Film (book) 437–38
The War of the Worlds (book) 974

- Théâtre National Populaire (TNP) 274
Theory of Film (book) 4
Theory of Film Practice (book) 116
 Theyer, Hans 60
Thin Blue Line, The 55, 659, 902–4
 Things I Cannot Change, The 131, 140, 151
 Thirteen, The 778
 This England 639
 This Hour Has Seven Days 980
 This Is Australia 53
 This is Not Beirut 676
 This is Spinal Tap 709
 This Modern Age 610
 Thomas, Antony 198–99, 904–6
 Thomas the Imposter 375
 Thomson, Margaret 906–7
 Thomson, Virgil 766
 Thorndike, Andrew 289, 467, 547
 Thornley, Jeni 258
 ‘Thoughts Toward an Aesthetic of the Cinema’ 15
 Three of Many 104
Three Songs about Lenin 907–9, 935, 961
 Three Worlds of Bali, The 864
 Thursday’s Children 40
 Tiananmen Square (China) 160–61
 Tiefland/Lowlands 761, 922
 Tierische Liebe/Animal Love 64
 Till I End My Song 416
Time (magazine) 22, 287, 552, 999, 1009, 1017
 Time in New England 891
 Time of Silence/Vrijeme eutnje 1022
Times of Harvey Milk, The 909–10
 Timișoara-December 1989 777
 Tina Women 986–87
 Tino Rangatiratanga (self-determination) 68
 Trintignant, Jean-Louis 543
Tire Dié/Throw Me a Dime 910–13
 TISHE!/Hush! 505
 Titanica 135
Titicut Folies 614, 913–15, 1009
 Titless Wonders 743
 Tito, President 1024
 Tkachihi/Weavers 307
 Tlacuilo, el que escribe pintando/He Who Writes
 While Painting 630
To Die in Madrid/Mourir a Madrid 14, 268, 478, 781, 872, 915–17
 To Die–To Live 958
To the Distant Observer (book) 117
 To Hold Our Ground 615
 To Liv(e) 153
 To Love or kill: Man vs Animal 905
 Today 843
Today’s Cinema (magazine) 244
 Together 948
 Toklas, Alice B. 198
 Tokyo Olympiad/kiroku chisein eiga 395–96, 448
Tokyo Orinpikku (Tokyo Olympiad) 917–18, 967
 Toland, Gregg 79, 200–201
 Tomkin, Dmitri 80
 Tomorrow’s Saturday 338
 Tongues Untied 765–66
 Tonight Let’s All Make Love in London 999
 Tonnelier, Le/The Cooper 786
 Tony Blair 951–52
 Too Many Too Soon 711
 Torerillos 61/Little Bullfighters 61 872
 Torero! 526
 Torino: la coscienza operaia/Turin: The Working-Class Consciousness 428
 Torre Bela 737
 Tortour de France 235
 Toscano, Salvador 918–20
 Touch of the Tarbrush 29
 Toujours plus/Always More 661 Tour, La see Eiffel Tower, The tourism in Italy 425
 Toute la mémoire du monde 755
 Toute une nuit 26
Towards a Third Cinema (manifesto) 376
 Tower of Industrial Life, A 345
 Tracking Down Maggie 951
 Tràgica muerte de Joselito/The Tragic Death of Joselito 868
 Tran Van Thuy 865
 transgender issues 837–39
 Transitions 131
 Traps 380
 Traum des Sandino/Sandino’s Dream 62
 Traumstrassen der Welt/Dream Roads of the World 296
 travel films (economics) 319
 Treasure of the Sierra Madre, The 387
 Treize jours en France/Thirteen Days in France
 967
 Tressler, Georg 61
 Tribal Dances 401
 Tribute to Modern Art, A 496
Tritsat Dneiei (magazine) 478
 Trinh T. Minh-ha 920–21
 Trinidad and Tobago 993
Tristram Shandy (book) 807–8
 Triumph of the Will
 Bonengel, Winfried 92
 Brutality in Stone 499
 Capra, Frank 145
 documentary 921–25
 Hitler, Adolf 7, 118, 625
 Mein Kampf 625
 Night and Fog (Nuit et Brouillard) 685
 Nuremburg Rally set 499
 Riefenstahl, Leni 7, 92, 145, 499, 625–26, 692,
 695, 758–59, 921–24
 World at War, The 14, 625

- Trop c'est assez/Too Much is Enough 341
 Tropical Story, A 345
Troubles We've Seen, The 925–27
True Glory, The 207, 927–28
True Story of Lili Marlene, The 456, 928–30
 True-Life Adventures 561
 Trujillo, Marisol 738
 Trut!/Seagull! 811
 Tsalal 521
 Tschoertner, Petra 292
 Tu as crié Let Me Go!/You Screamed Let Me Go!
 141, 725
Tunisian Victory 107, 386, 932–33
 Turbine I 289
 Turin, Viktor 794, 908, 933–35, 935
Turksib 794, 908, 933, 935–37
 Twenty-Four Dollar Island 606
 Twins: The Divided Self 905
 Two Hours from London 188
 Two Laws 241
Tyneside Story 937–39
 Tzabar/Sabra 418
- U
- U Nyi Pu 863
 U Ohn Maung 863
 UFA (Universumfilm Aktiengesellschaft) 60
 Ukraine in Flames 74
 Ulama: El Juego de la vida y la muerte/The Game of Life and Death 630
 Uloapena Hranice/The Stolen Frontier 190
 Ulysses (book) 894
 Um Tesouro/The Treasury 737
 Un homme et une femme/A Man and a Woman
 543
 Und Neues blüht aus de Ruinen/And New Life
 Blooms in the Ruins 61
 Under the Rubble 674
 Underground Orchestra, The 369
 Undersea World of Jacques Cousteau, The 184
 Un chapeau de paille d'Italie/The Italian Straw
 Hat 225
Une famille à Bruxelles (book) 28
 Une histoire de vent/A Tale of the Wind 434
 UNE (União Nacional dos Estudantes) 185
 Unemployed, The/ Nezaposleni ljudi 1023
 UNESCO 188, 889, 1019
 Unfinished Business 724
Union Maids 493–94, 551, 751, 751–52, 823–24, 939–40
 United Kingdom 940–52
 United Nations (UN) 925
 Unity is Strength 101
 University Square, The-Romania 777
 Universumfilm Aktiengesellschaft (UFA) 293–95
 Unlimited Girls 405
 Unmade Beds 952
 Unsere Alten Tage/Our Old Times 292
 Unsere Kinder/Our Children 292
 Uomini soli/Lonely Men 425
 Up the Junction 949
 Upstream 943
Upton Sinclair Presents William Fox 848
 Urban, Charles 4, 85, 953–54
 Ursula oder das unwerte Lebenn 896
 US Film Service 576–77
 USSR and China 160
- V
- Vachani, Nilita 403
 Vachek, Karel 955–56
 Vaeni, Constantin 776
 Val Del Mar, José 871
 Valet, Viktor see Zielke, Willy
 Valiant Years 816
 Valley Town 180, 223
 Valour and the Horror, The 134
 Van Dyke, Willard 171, 180, 440–41
 Vanishing Street, The 958
 Vanishing/Nestajanje 1025
 Vannini, Fabio 429
 Vanzi, Luigi 647
 Varda, Agnès 271, 600, 611, 956–58
 Varlamov, Leonid 160
 Vas, Robert 958–60
 Vavra, Otaka 190
 Védres, Nicole 705
 Veiel, Andres 97
 Veiled Revolution, The 674
 Vejen med nord/The Way Towards the North 391
 Vektløs/Weightless 814
 Velikaya otechestvennaya voina/The Eastern Front 796
 Velo, Carlos 526, 628, 869
 Vend d'Est/Wind from the East 269
 Vendanges/Grapeharvest 786
 Venezia citta moderna/Venice Modern City 424
 Ventre de l'Amérique, Le/The Belly of America
 661
 Venus Boyz 898
 Verdun 726
 Verhaag, Bertram 100
 Verlorene Freiheit/Lost Freedom 1033
 Vernon Florida 658
 Verriegelte Zeit/Barred Times 292
 Vertov, Dziga
 Alvarez, Santiago 34
 Bronx Morning, A 115
 cinéma vérité 165
 'counter cinema' 269
 Deren, Maya 205

- documentary films 960–64
 Eisenstein, Sergei 792
Enthusiasm 231–33
 Epstein, Jean 233
 film craft 22
 film theory and philosophy 792–93
 Godard, Jean-Luc 246
 Gorin, Jean-Pierre 312
 Kino-nedaiya/Cinema Week 790
 Kinoglaz/Kino-Eye: Life Caught Unawares 791
 life caught unawares' 936
Man with the Movie Camera 10, 602–4, 791, 907–8
Mechanics of the Brain, The 623
 montage sequences 418, 750
 newsreels 412
 One Sixth of the Earth 908
 Shub, Esfir 242–43, 793, 842
 'Studio H&S' 290
Three Songs about Lenin 907, 935
 Turin, Viktor 934
see also Dziga Vertov Group
 Verzauberter Niederhein/Magic Niederhein 1033
 Veuve, Jacqueline 897
 Via Persia 107
 Victor, Renaud 271
 Victory at Sea 610
Victory at Sea 962–64
 Victory in Right Bank Ukraine 74
Video Diaries 964–65
 Vie des animaux, La/Animal Life 267
 Vie est à nous, La 651
 Vietnam 865, 920–21
 Vietnam Central Documentary Film Unit 865
 Vietnam War
 1960s events and authority 697
 Diaries 719
 For Benefit of the Doubt 998
 film documentaries 865
 Front Line 56
 Hearts of Darkness: A Filmmakers Apocalypse
 353–55
 Hearts and Minds 351–53, 799, 828, 829
 In the Year of the Pig 46, 398–99
 Mills of the Gods: Viet Nam 133, 541
 Nur Leichte Kämpfe im Raum Da Nang
 314–15
 Ophüls, Marcel 925
 Pilger, John 716–17
 Sad Song of Yellow Skin 57, 788, 798–99, 972
 Students for a Democratic Society 407
 Thailand 866
 Vietnam 867
 Vigo, Jean 147, 266
 Viking, The 127
 Vincent the Dutchman 1031
 Viola, Bill 389–90
 Violent City 76
 Visiones: Latino Art and Culture 281
 Visions of Eight 395
Visions of Eight/Munchen Olympiade 965–66, 1029
 Visit, The 305
 Visual Anthropology Foundation (Romania)
 777–78
 Vladimir Il'ich Lenin 778
 Vohra, Paromita 405
 Voice of the World 227, 944
 Voigt, Andreas 292–93, 968–70
 Volleyball 48
 von Zahn, Peter 296
 Vor bjergene sejler/Where the Mountains Are Sailing 392
 Vosmoj Director/Eighth Director 307
Voyage au Congo/Travels in the Congo 32–34, 145–46, 265, 726, 970–71, 1035
 Voyage sentimental 117
 Voyage to Recovery 413
 Voz de los sobrevivientes, La/The Voice of the Survivors 769
 Vrettakos, Costas 331
- W
- Wadleigh, Michael 1011
 Wagner, Richard 7
 Wähle das Leben/You Must Choose Life 539
Waiting for Fidel 788, 799, 972–73
 Waiting for Godot 788
 Waiting for the Moon 303
 Wakefield Express 40
 Wall, The 105
 Walls of Fire 496
 War Clouds in the Pacific 137, 170
 War Effort in Guangzhou, The 159
War Game, The 821, 950, 973–75, 978–79
 War of Lebanon, The 675
War Room, The 57, 356, 709, 975–76
 War Stories Our Mother Never Told Us 743
 War on Terror 716
 Warhol, Andy 12, 976–78
 Warrendale 134, 480, 490
 Was ich bin, sind meine Filme/I am My Films 119
 Washerwomen 104
 Water like a Black Buffalo 776
 Water Toboggan 583
 Water Wrackets 18
 Watkins, Paul 460
 Watkins, Peter 821, 950, 973, 978–79
 Watling, Jack 108
 Watson, Patrick 133, 979–80
 Watson, Paul 212
 Watt, Harry 688–89, 820, 899, 946, 947,
 980–83, 981, 985
 Waverley Steps 820
 Waves of Revolution 403

- Way We Live, The 188
We Are the Lambeth Boys 732, 958, 983–84
We Live in Two Worlds 947, 984–86
 We Were So Beloved 492
 Wedding On Saturday 639
 Wedding of Palo, The 391
 Wege in die Zukunft/Roads to the Future 61
 Weill, Claudia 463
 Weiss, Andrea 986–88
 Weiss, Jiri 190
 Weiss, Peter 813
 Welcome to Warren 751
Welfare 988–89
 Well Done 898
 Welles, Orson 353, 355
 Wenders, Wim 73, 393
 Wenzel, Frank 392
 Werner Herzog Eats his Shoe 119
 Wesker, Arnold 102
 Wesslén, Stig 811
 West Highland 820
 West Indies and Caribbean 989–95
 Western Approaches 108, 121, 436, 928
 Wet Earth and Warm People 789, 799
 Wet Parade, The 848
 Wexler, Haskell 407
 What Do These Old Films Mean? (series) 116
When the Dog Bites 995
 When My Knife Strikes You 1023
 When the Pie Was Opened 585
When We Were Kings 995–97
 Whistle at Eaton Falls, The 850
 White Corridors 437
 White Shadows in the South Seas 818
White Shadows in the South Seas (book) 256, 642, 818
 Whitehead, Peter 997–1000
Who Bombed Birmingham? 9, 1000–1001
 Who Cares? 951
 Who Needs a Heart 28
 Wholly Communion 998
Why We Fight 79–80, 144–45, 559, 559–60, 1001–4, 1016
 Wie die Jungen Singen/How the Boys Sang 61
 Wie kommen wieder/We Come Back 62
 Wien Retour-Franz West 1924–34 63
 Wien-Film 60
 Wij Bouen/We Are Building 683–84
 Wild Man Blues 503
 Wild, Nettie 1004–5
 Wildenhahn, Klaus 296, 1005–8
 Wilhelm, Prince 811
 Wilkins, George H. 127
 Will There Be Salmon Tomorrow? 393
 ‘William Tell Overture’ 35
 Williams, Jano 837
 Window Water Baby Moving 109
 Wings of Desire 73
 Wings Over Everest 649
 Winston, Brian 222, 251–52, 255
 Winter Ade/Goodbye Winter 292
 Wintonick, Peter 135, 609, 1008–9
 Wir Bergler in den Bergen ... 896–97
 Wiseman, Frederick
 Basic Training 69–70
 cinéma vérité 1010
 ‘direct cinema’ 203
 ‘discovery points’ 12
 documentary films 1008–11
 High School 365–66
 Hospital 372–73
 Law and Order 531–32
 Meat 621–22
 social institutions 619
 Titicut Follies 913–14
 Welfare 988–89
 Wisotski, Jochen 291–92
 With Babies and Banners 551
 With Our King and Queen Through India 953
 Witness 134
 Wittgenstein Tractatus 261
 Wizyta/A Visit 731
 Wolper, David L. 965
 Woman Before the Mirror 740
 Women in Art 285, 287
 Women’s Auxiliary Air Force (WAAF) 899
 Wonder Ring, The 108–9
 Wonderful World of Louis Armstrong 28
 Wonderworks 277
 Woodlanders, The 25
Woodstock: Three Days of Peace 1011–12
 Woodstock Festivals 503
 Woolcock, Penny 995
 Woolfe, H. Bruce 247–48, 822–23
 Words for Battle 456, 557
 Work Party 585
Workers’ Cinema (magazine) 101
 Workers’ Educational Association (WEA) 217
 Workers and Jobs 230
Workers Leaving the Lumière Factory and other Lumière Shorts 582, 1012–14
 Working Mothers 837
World in Action, The 129, 137, 169, 610, 1017–18
World at War, The 5, 6, 9, 13–14, 416, 1015–17
 World Exposition, Osaka 449
World Film News (magazine) 86, 1019
 World II/Vesola II 729
 World is Rich, The 1019
 World of Plenty 231

- World Union of Documentary 102
 World War I
 Allégret, Marc 33
 Battle of the Somme, The 4, 83
 Benoit-Lévy, Jean 88
 Canada 128
 Diary of an Unknown Soldier, The 950
 Dineen, Molly 396
 France 265
 Franju, Georges 273
 Germany 293, 759, 923–24
 Grierson, John 334
 Hell Unlimited 359
 Hôtel des Invalides 374
 Hurley, Frank 385
 India 400
 Kid Who Couldn't Miss, The 132
 Lest We Forget 128
 Lights Out in Europe 552
 Long Tan: The True Story 571
 Mexico 631
 near/Middle East 672
 Paris 1900 706
 Pilger, John 717
 Plow that Broke the Plains, The 721–22
 Poirier, Léon 726
 Romania 774
 Schoedsack, Ernest B. 318, 817
 Secrets of Nature 822
 Spain 868
 Tell England 128
 United States 941
 Urban, Charles 953
 World Without End 4, 1019
 World Without Sun 9
 Worms, Michel 274
 WR: Misterije organisma/Mysteries of Organism
 593–94
 Wrestlers, The 400
Wretched of the Earth, The (book) 275
 Wright, Basil
 Children at School 156
 Coal Face 10
 Conquest in 1930 942
 documentary films 1018–20
 Elton, Arthur 226
 Everyday Except Christmas 239
 Flaherty, Robert 943
 Grierson, John 221, 226, 1019
 Industrial Britain 406
 Jackson, Pat 436
 Lumber 943
 Night Mail 688–89, 710, 946
 Song of Ceylon, The 147, 854–56
 Stoney, George 886
 ‘world revolution’ 938
 Wright, Frank Lloyd 122
 Written Face, The 897
 Wu Wenguang 162
- X
- Xanthopoulos, Lefteris 330
 XVth Congress (Communist Party of GB) 651
- Y
- Y el cielo fue tornado por asalto/And Heaven was Taken by Storm 36
 Yamagata International Documentary Film Festival 451
 Yan'an Film Group 159, 161
 Yanki No! 618
 Yap ... How Did You Know We'd Like TV? 57, 699
 Yasujiro, Ozu 117
 Year of the Dogs 58
 Yearsley, Albert 865
 Yellow Caravan, The 408
 Yesterday Girl 498
 ‘Yesterday’ (song) 801
 Yet, I still Believe 778
 Yfantres/The Weavers 324
 Yorgos Seferis-Imerologia Katastromatos/
 Logbooks 332
 Yorti sti Drapetsona/Feast in Drapetsona 330
 You are On Indian Land 886
 Young Soul Rebels 465
 Youth 395
 Yuan Muzhi 159
 Yugodivas 898
Yugoslavia: Death of a Nation 1025–27
 Yugoslavia (former) 1021–25
 Yumi Yet 57
- Z
- Z Cars 949
 Zahn, Peter von 1028–29
 Zaninovic, Sjepan 1022
 Zavattini, Cesare 423, 426
 Zdrada/Treason 731
 Zechmeister/Carousing Master 63
 Zeichen der Zeit/Signs of the Time 235
 Zelenka, Petr 191
 Zemesvatého Patricka/The Land of St.Patrick
 877
 Zetterling, Mai 966, 1029–31
 Zhao Ziyang 161
 Zheng Junli 158
 Zhuangzi Tests his Wife 157
 Zielke, Willy 1032–33
 Ziggy Stardust and the Spiders from Mars 709
 Žilnik, Želimir 1023–24

- Zils, Paul 402
Zionist Socialist Films 417
Zizn'/Life 706
Zone, La: au pays du chiffonniers 458, 510–11, 809, 1034–36
Zot Hi Ha'aretz/This is the Land 418
- Zou Zou 970
Zrcaldeni/Reflections 876
Zubrycki, Tom 55, 56
Zuiderzee 683
Zukor, Adolph 126
Zyciorys/Curriculum Vitae 488

Taylor & Francis

eBooks

FOR LIBRARIES

ORDER YOUR FREE 30 DAY
INSTITUTIONAL
TRIAL TODAY!

Over 23,000 eBook titles in the Humanities, Social Sciences, STM and Law from some of the world's leading imprints.

Choose from a range of subject packages or create your own!

Benefits for you

- ▶ Free MARC records
- ▶ COUNTER-compliant usage statistics
- ▶ Flexible purchase and pricing options

Benefits for your user

- ▶ Off-site, anytime access via Athens or referring URL
- ▶ Print or copy pages or chapters
- ▶ Full content search
- ▶ Bookmark, highlight and annotate text
- ▶ Access to thousands of pages of quality research at the click of a button

For more information, pricing enquiries or to order a free trial, contact your local online sales team.

UK and Rest of World: online.sales@tandf.co.uk

US, Canada and Latin America:
e-reference@taylorandfrancis.com

www.ebooksubscriptions.com

Taylor & Francis eBooks
Taylor & Francis Group

A flexible and dynamic resource for teaching, learning and research.